FREEDOM OF INFORMATION

TRIBUTE TO FORMER PARLIAMENTARIAN, GERALD BALDWIN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Madam Speaker, I believe I have unanimous consent for this motion. Whereas the House of Commons just yesterday passed the freedom of information bill, and whereas my predecessor, Mr. Gerald Baldwin, worked tirelessly toward and supported the principle of freedom of information, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East (Mr. Allmand) and the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That this House unanimously commend Gerald Baldwin for his unceasing work for freedom of information legislation, and further, for his years of dedicated service to his fellow countrymen.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Does the House want to applaud this motion? The hon. member for St. John's East.

Mr. Nielsen: There was no negative.

Madam Speaker: No one said "no", but I did not put it to the House because it is a congratulatory motion.

FISHERIES

DEMAND FOR ASSISTANCE TO INDUSTRY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Last night the finance minister announced a special farm financial assistance program which provides for $200,000,000 over the next two years to assist farmers in financial distress. Naturally, we welcome such an announcement, but at the same time we fail to understand why similar assistance was not provided for the fishing industry which employs 80,000 Canadians and forms the backbone of the economy of the Atlantic provinces. Many companies have been forced into bankruptcy and the industry still faces an uncertain future. I would therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser):

That this House direct the Minister of Finance to provide immediate assistance to the fishing industry in a program similar to that which is now being offered to the agricultural industry.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AGRICULTURE

CALL FOR RESIGNATION OF MINISTER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I wish to move a motion. Since the majority of Canadian farmers continue to face an intolerable burden because of high interest rates, and since the budget last night did nothing to cope with credit charges on operating loans and on existing credit, even though the additions to Farm Credit Corporation loans will be welcome, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Lewycky):

That this House calls on the Minister of Agriculture to resign because of his unwillingness to deal with the number one problem for farmers in Canada—high interest rates.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

BILINGUALISM

EXPENSE OF SENDING OFFICIALS TO FRANCE FOR LANGUAGE TRAINING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Last night the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) said that "the private sector and the provinces could not be expected to accept income restraints unless the Government of Canada showed leadership in the conduct of its own affairs." During the past few days, the national press has reported that the assistant secretary to the cabinet for economic development policy, who receives a salary of approximately $75,000 a year, is to be sent to the south of France for bilingual language training. This four-month joyride will cost Canadian taxpayers, whom the minister has asked to show restraint, some $11,800. While many Canadians and, I dare say, many hon. members opposite would be pleased to see one of the architects of the present budgetary fiascos deported, banished, or otherwise disposed of, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer):

That if this government is truly serious about showing leadership, and if it is serious about restraint, then the President of the Treasury Board should launch an immediate review of all such ridiculous and inexcusable examples of wasteful government spending.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

WESTERN DEVELOPMENT FUND

REDUCTION IN BUDGET—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, the 1982-83 allocation in the 1980 budget for expenditures under the Western Development Fund was set at $750 million. Under the 1981 budget this allocation was cut by 75 per cent to $182 million. Under last night's budget the people of western Canada are further insulted, as the 1982-83 allocation receives a further massacre of 50 per cent. Now a further $92 million has gone from the pockets of westerners. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers):

That this House censure the Minister of Finance for his apparent lack of understanding in failing to appreciate the hopes and aspirations of westerners and his lack of honesty in failing to admit that this fund was a fraud from the date of its conception.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PENSIONS

DENOUNCEMENT OF DEINDEXATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Madam Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the minister responsible for pensions has stated that the first priority of the Liberal government with regard to pension reform was to bring all senior citizens above the poverty line, and in view of the fact that single pensioners are still more than $800 below the poverty line, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell):

That this House condemn the minister and the Liberal government for abandoning this commitment and instead cutting basic pension benefits by deindexation, which will require more and more pensioners to submit to a means test just to ensure that they fall no further below the poverty line than they are already, and that if the minister does not rescind last night's budgetary measure, she should resign.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

VOLUNTARY ORGANIZATIONS

CONDEMNATION OF GOVERNMENT POSITION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, last night's budget once again ignored a matter of urgent necessity. Following "Consultation 81", the government made a public undertaking to act on the give-and-take tax proposals of the national voluntary organizations. Last week the Minister of State for Social Development (Mr. Chrétien) told this House that he had personally raised this matter before the cabinet. Last night's budget, as well as November's discredited budget, demonstrated an abysmal ignorance of the potential caring contribution of Canada's voluntary sector during these times of social and economic hardship. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid):

That this House urge the government to admit to Canada's three million volunteers that it has no intention of encouraging a working partnership with the voluntary sector, and that its distrustful, interventionist grant policy was intended to undermine the time-proven ability of non-government agencies to deliver their sorely needed caring services.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE MINISTRY

CALL FOR RESIGNATIONS OF PRIME MINISTER AND MINISTER OF FINANCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Gilchrist (Scarborough East): Madam Speaker, up until last night Canadians at least had hope. When Canadian workers asked for legitimate job creation, when Canadian businesses asked for tax reform to aid industrial recovery, when the Canadian economy demanded investment encouragement for plants, processes and opportunities, when

Canadian youth cried out for higher education and better training and when senior Canadians asked only for stable costs and a dignified retirement, this government gave them higher taxes, higher interest rates, higher debt, higher inflation, and higher unemployment. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Lethbridge-Foothills (Mr. Thacker):

That the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister do the only worth-while remaining act of which they are capable, namely, resign before the downward economic spiral becomes a national economic disaster.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

CALL FOR RESIGNATIONS OF MINISTER OF FINANCE AND LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, in light of the fact that the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) has forced public employees with low incomes to accept wage controls at the same percentage level as cabinet ministers and other senior bureaucrats and appointees earning over $100,000 a year, and since the Minister of Finance has encouraged other Canadians to accept this unjust system of sharing the economic burden, and in view of the support for these measures last night by the Leader of the Conservative Party (Mr. Clark) who, on previous occasions, admitted he would also retain the high interest rate policy of the Liberal government, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Young):

That the Minister of Finance immediately offer his resignation to the Canadian people and, to be consistent with the Liberal-Conservative concept of sharing and solidarity, that the Leader of the Conservative Party also tender his resignation.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

NORTHERN CANADA POWER COMMISSION—IMPLEMENTATION OF COMMITTEE RECOMMENDATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, the all-party report by the subcommittee on the Northern Canada Power Commission was an excellent documentation of the problems of electrical power generation and distribution north of the 60th Parallel. The recommendations are sound and embody the thinking and direction of all those groups which are affected and involved in this complex matter. The report was tabled in this House several weeks ago. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cochrane-Superior (Mr. Penner):

That the ministers in charge evolve and table in this House at the earliest opportunity a target time frame or schedule during which the recommendations made in the report are to be implemented.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

METRIC CONVERSION

CALL FOR MORATORIUM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I, along with my fellow Canadians, am disappointed with the horrendous budgetary deficit projection of $19.6 billion plus and the disconcerting failure of the federal government to curb its own spending. Federal government demands on the borrowing market cannot have other than an inflationary effect on interest rates generally. This government has a double standard, one for the taxpayer and another for itself. It was delinquent in not ferreting out spending cuts which become obvious, extravagant foreign aid giveaways, language programs, rising executive staffs, the metric program, plus $5 million worth of firecrackers. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gustafson):

• (1415)

That since Alberta has become the fourth province to exhibit formally its opposition to the forced metric program, by moving to assist Calgary resident Mrs. Kasparian, who has been charged because she used imperial, the government declare a moratorium on advancing the forced metric program, thereby saving at least $10 million this year alone in federal overhead costs and countless millions to retailers and consumers who will be hardest hit by the forced program.

Madam Speaker: Oral Questions.

FINANCE

THE BUDGET—INDEXATION OF INCOME TAXES

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance, who has just had his third strike, and in any honest or honourable government would be out by now. We have had the reaction of the market and the dollar to his budget. The dollar is sliding; the market is slumping dramatically. A lot of Canadians do not yet understand that last night, among other things, they had a massive tax increase imposed upon them of an average of $100 per taxpayer, at least.

The November budget, part of which still remains, talked a great deal about equity. I wonder if the Minister of Finance could tell us what has happened to that concept of equity, when he is forcing millions of lower and middle-income Canadians into higher tax brackets, by his changes in the indexation proposal, while those with incomes above $50,000 per year will continue to pay the same rates? Why in these massive new tax increases is he socking it to lower and middle-income Canadians, and why is he sparing the rich?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I would just say in reply to the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition that the concept of sharing is fully evident in the budget provisions. In the budget, it is true that we have asked certain Canadians to yield some of their benefits in order to help Canadians who are out of work or unemployed or who are faced with the loss of their homes or their businesses. We believe that it is reasonable in these circumstances to ask Canadians who are employed to share with those who are unemployed, so that we all can get through this difficult situation in a spirit of equity and sharing. That is the principle underlying the budget.

EFFECT ON PENSIONS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, the problem with the minister's answer is that some Canadians share more than others. Lower and middle-income Canadians are being asked by this government to share, in the minister's words, more of the burden than are the rich. That does not meet any standard of equity which the country can recognize. Let me come to a particular group of Canadians who are being asked, if I might use the minister's word, to yield certain of their benefits. Even taking account of the changes in the Guaranteed Income Supplement, the 1.2 million Canadians who are receiving the old age pension will have their benefits, that they could have counted on, reduced because of the minister's action last night.

Some hon. Members: That is not true.

Mr. Clark: That is to say, 1.2 million elderly Canadians will be affected. Liberal members opposite say that is not true; I suggest that they read the budget, before they say that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Let me ask the Minister of Finance why the elderly are singled out to pay for this government's mistakes?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I first want to underline to the Leader of the Opposition that the purpose of the whole strategy of the government is to bring down the economy—

Mr. Clark: To its knees.

Mr. MacEachen: —from a high level of inflation, at present very close to 12 per cent, to 6 per cent. If the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition and others in the country join in this national campaign to reduce inflation to 6 per cent, the incomes of those persons about whom he speaks will suffer very little damage, or the damage will be minimized, so there is a basic incentive for all Canadians to move to the 6 per cent level, if their concern is about the impact of the cap either on the personal income tax side or upon old age security.

• (1420)

However, it is vitally important to underline that no recipient of the old age pension who is in need is affected by this particular provision. It is the attempt of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition to instil anxiety in the minds of our senior citizens. I want to give the absolute assurance that no pensioner in need will be affected in any way by these measures.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, either the minister will amend his budget, or he is not telling the truth. The minister refuses to tell us why his tax proposals of last night spare the rich and hit low and middle-income Canadians, and why he is imposing special taxes upon 1.2 million elderly Canadians. He refuses to tell us why they are being singled out.

TAXATION OF EMPLOYEE BENEFITS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, why is the minister continuing the tax upon Blue Cross contributions, upon dental care provisions, and upon other employee benefits?

Mr. Nielsen: Including northern benefits.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition has again repeated that we are putting a special tax on the elderly. That is totally false.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, once again we hear no answers from the Minister of Finance, who is taxing low-income Canadians, taxing middle-income Canadians, taxing the elderly, and sparing the rich.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

LEVEL OF PREMIUM RATE

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, let me turn to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Since last night's budget shows an $800 million increase in the take from unemployment insurance premiums next year, can the minister tell the House how large an increase he is contemplating in this hidden tax which the Minister of Finance failed to mention last night?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, as the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition knows, the standard practice is for the assessment of any change in premium rates to be made after the third quarter of the year when we can more accurately determine what the exact numbers will be. The figures provided in the budget last night are a forecast. We are prepared to continue the conventional practice and to look at what the reality is in the third quarter, at which time I am sure the Minister of Finance will be glad to tell the Leader of the Opposition and others what changes might have to be made in the premium rate for unemployment insurance.

SOCIAL SECURITY

EFFECT OF BUDGET ON OLD AGE PENSION BENEFITS

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I too want to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. The meanest move in his budget last night was to reduce sharply the indexing of old age security for those who do not receive the supplement. In other words, that means that an elderly person who receives just over $8,000 a year in total income—which is what the minister receives every month—will receive $100 less next year, thanks to the minister. Is this what the minister interprets as the urgent pension reform about which he and the Minister of National Health and Welfare have been talking so much?

• (1425)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, again, obviously, the hon. member is misleading the House by saying that next year recipients of old age security will get less. They will get more. Obviously they will get more. When the hon. lady understands that, perhaps she will be able to put a proper question.

Miss MacDonald: Madam Speaker, there was a time when the Minister of Finance would not have moved against the old age pensioners of this country.

REPORTED STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I want to direct my supplementary question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare who last night was quoted as saying, concerning this cutback, "I can live with it and they", the pensioners "can all live with it as well." It is easy to live with when you are making $100,000 per year, but it is not so easy to live with when you are making $8,000 or $9,000.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: I want to ask the minister what she means by saying, "They can live with it." What kind of Liberal arrogance is this? Is this the new Liberal approach to social policy?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, what I tried to express last night, and which I will reiterate today, is that all Canadians, in times of crisis, are ready to make serious sacrifices provided it makes sense to them, when it means creating jobs for their own children on the one hand, and providing for those most in need by making sure they are fully protected, on the other hand. That is what the budget of last night does. The pensioners who get only the basic OAS, which means 45 per cent of over two million pensioners, because they are not in need, this month will get $239 as I announced a few days ago, but next January will get $249 instead of $251.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss Bégin: I want to repeat, because of the seriousness of family budgeting, they will get $239 this month and next January they will get $249 instead of $251.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, if the minister can have pride in that slight increase it just proves that a Liberal in this country is reduced to the point where he or she will take pride in anything.

EFFECT OF BUDGET ON UNEMPLOYMENT

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Finance. Last night we had a no hope budget, with reduced pensions, reduced family allowances and taxes increased by more than $1 billion. If the backbenchers opposite will be quiet I would like to put my question to the Minister of Finance. Considering that all of this will take money out of the economy and lead to more bankruptcies, and more losses of jobs, will the minister confirm what one of his senior officials said during the lockup last night, namely, that unemployment in Canada, which is already at a disastrous high level, will remain virtually unchanged throughout this year?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I think that, first of all, I have to appeal to the hon. member's sense of honesty and ask him to admit that when he states that the old age security and family allowances will be reduced next year, he is not making a factual statement. The old age security and family allowances will be increased next year by six per cent. That is not a decrease. I want to tell the hon. member also, that if he joins with the rest of us in trying to bring inflation down to six per cent, then, of course, he will minimize the effect of that move on all groups in the country.

If I may answer the final question of the hon. member, I should like to draw to his attention the various measures in housing and in job creation that will add substantially to job opportunities in the economy this year and next. I believe that that is a very solid contribution that was made last night in this budget.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, I say it is the Minister of Finance who is trying to mislead the people of Canada. He knows as well as anyone in this House that every pensioner in the country who will not get the GIS will get less of an increase than he or she would have without this budget.

• (1430)

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, it would be nice if every pensioner in this country, rich, poor or average, could see the smirking faces in the Liberal caucus.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ENERGY

REQUEST THAT SCHEDULED OIL PRICE INCREASE BE POSTPONED

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have another question about one of the main concerns of ordinary Canadians, namely, inflation. Considering that the thrust of the budget, according to the minister, was to bring down inflation, and considering that not one price increase was stopped and not one rollback took place, my question this time is to the Prime Minister who will be meeting with the First Ministers tomorrow.

On Thursday oil prices are scheduled to go up 10 per cent at the wellhead, which increase will lead to a 1 per cent rise in the cost of living and 22,000 fewer jobs in Canada. At that meeting will the Prime Minister urge the premiers of the producing provinces to forgo, along with the federal government, the 10 per cent increase on Thursday?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I first want to thank the Leader of the New Democratic Party for having recognized in posing his question that there will be no decrease, as seems to have been alleged, in old age pensions and that there will be an increase—not as large as might otherwise have been expected, but there will be an increase, not a decrease, and I thank him for having put the record straight on that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: As regards the price of petroleum at the wellhead, the hon. member knows that price was reached after long and arduous discussions between the producing provinces and the federal government. I would be happy to carry the representations of the hon. member to the premiers tomorrow, but naturally that is not an area in which we can assert jurisdiction alone. It is a negotiated agreement which, incidentally, was adhered to by the former New Democratic Premier of Saskatchewan. I repeat, I would be happy to carry that representation to them, but I certainly would not want to indicate that the federal government alone would go back on that contractual arrangement.

POSITION OF GOVERNMENT

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, so that we are perfectly clear on this point, the agreement, as the Prime Minister knows, was negotiated late last summer or into the fall and, as this whole country knows, things have changed considerably for the worse since then. Is the Prime Minister saying to the House, on behalf of the federal government, that in his meeting with the premiers tomorrow he is prepared to forgo the federal government's share of that proposed increase? I would like him to make that very clear, and in so doing will he be then saying to the premiers and the oil industry that he expects them to do the same so that at last we can have some concrete action which will be a positive step to reducing inflation in this country?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I find the suggestion a little bit bewildering because for months the New Democratic Party, indeed the members of the official opposition, argued that what this country needed was the certainty and security of knowing what the prices would be. The hon. member knows that not only were those prices reached after long and arduous negotiation, but in some cases there was a refusal to continue production by the producing provinces. He knows that the agreement meant prices for Canadian consumers substantially below world prices, and I do not see it as being in the public interest to reopen that contract at this time.

I can understand the suggestion now made by the Leader of the New Democratic Party, but I think he has to bear in mind the some 18 months of difficulty during which these negotiations took place. He has to bear in mind the consequences of the Alsands project being stalled and eventually stopped for that period of time, the consequences of the fact that eastern Canadian refiners and importers had to sign contracts for offshore oil, and the consequences due to the fact that therefore a lot of the production was shut-in in Alberta and Saskatchewan. I do not think that I can, simply on the basis of a question, now say that these 18 months of arduous negotiations will be swept away just because the Leader of the New Democratic Party has a suggestion in mind.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF MINISTER FOR THE CAPITAL TERRITORY, OF AUSTRALIA

Madam Speaker: I would like to draw the attention of the House to the presence in our gallery of the Hon. William Michael Hodgman, Australian Minister for the Capital Territory and Minister assisting the Minister for Industry and Commerce.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PENSIONS

EFFECT OF BUDGET

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to see that the Prime Minister has finally admitted that the energy negotiation delays were the key factor in the cancellation of the Alsands project. He never admitted that before, and now we know.

I have a very simple question for the Prime Minister regarding pensions of senior citizens. Will he explain to this House how a pensioner is better off when inflation is up 11 per cent, as is projected, and his pension cheque will be up only 6 per cent?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, in so far as what the hon. member calls an admission about the cancellation of the tar sands is concerned, I do not think he has to feign surprise in that regard. It is certain that for a period of many months the federal Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources was saying that we were prepared to go ahead with the tar sands. He said this in answer to many questions in this House, and the hon. member knows that the answer was that the Premier of Alberta said that he would not go ahead with the tar sands unless the whole energy agreement was settled. Therefore, the stalling on the Alsands was not by the federal government; we had made the concessions needed there. The reason why they did not proceed 18 months before was because the Premier of Alberta, as is his right, wanted to look at negotiations as a whole package. That is the reason why Alsands did not proceed earlier.

In so far as the question on pensions is concerned, Madam Speaker, I am afraid the Minister of Finance did not succeed in convincing the opposition of what is behind this whole budget when he talks of a 6 per cent future. I am confident the people of Canada will have got the message and that they, and many of the economic decision makers in this country, the businessmen and even labour leaders, will be prepared to recognize that it is in our interest to bring inflation down to 6 per cent next year. If we can do it—and we can only do it collectively—there will be no reduction even in the speed of the increase in old age pensions. Six per cent is what they will get, 6 per cent will be the CPI if we have co-operation—

An hon. Member: If!

Mr. Trudeau: If! If! I know it is a lot to ask the opposition to co-operate in bringing this country back to its feet.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, all we are trying to do with these questions is to expose the dishonesty of the previous answers which were that the pensioners will be getting more. They will not be getting more; they will be getting less in real terms.

INTEREST RATE LEVELS

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, one of the other very important concerns of Canadians is the question of high interest rates. The federal government budgetary deficit of $20 billion is clearly a major obstacle to achieving low interest rates, and when you combine that with the $44 billion of government debt coming due between now and the end of the year, the obstacle is almost insurmountable. What measures is the minister proposing to lead this country to a lower level of interest rates in the face of those two obstacles?

• (1440)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, it is obvious the hon. member has not yet grasped the central message of the budget—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: —that is, to bring inflation down to 6 per cent. That is the surest way to bring down interest rates. It is the hard way, but it is the surest way and the one that will have lasting results.

REQUEST FOR TAX INCENTIVES FOR INDUSTRY

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Today the stock market dropped like a stone because the minister has failed to recognize that this country faces a full-scale financial crisis. Major corporate bankruptcies are pending because companies are staggering under their debt load and they cannot generate cash to keep their doors open. Instead of bringing in major tax savings and tax incentives, the minister is proposing to consult with industry over the next few months on a variety of proposals, which is like consulting with a home owner whose house is burning down on whether to get a pail of water.

Why does the minister not introduce tax incentives and savings incentives now, immediately, when the economy desperately needs them? Why is the minister waiting until later when all these companies will be broke and the jobs will be lost?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, here again obviously the hon. member has either not read the budget or has not understood it. We have provided for interest assistance to small businesses, farmers and fishermen. We are providing a total of $400 million under a special program to reduce interest rates by 4 per cent to all these groups in the community.

Mr. Blenkarn: On new purchases only.

Mr. MacEachen: That is a direct, immediate measure to relieve the burden of interest rates on small businesses, on farmers and on fishermen. That seems to me an element of the budget that escaped the hon. member's attention.

Miss Carney: Madam Speaker, in the past we have heard the Minister of Finance explain how our economic troubles are the fault of U.S. policy or are the fault of policies in Europe. Now I suppose he will say it is the stock market's fault for wiping $2.5 billion from the value of stocks because of his budget.

TAXATION OF EMPLOYEE BENEFITS

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is also for the Minister of Finance. The November 12 budget slapped an additional tax increase on construction and resource industry workers by taxing their job-related expenses, such as health and dental plans, transportation, and room and board. In British Columbia these tax increases amount to about $3 an hour for each worker. How can the minister expect these workers, who were hit with these tax increases only seven months ago, to limit their wage demands to 6 per cent? Why does the Minister of Finance not remove these unfair taxes if he really expects workers in the resource and construction industries to accept these kinds of limits?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I believe that the choice I stated last night is very clear. If Canadians generally want to live in a world of recession they will insist upon wage settlements and income demands of 11 and 12 per cent. If Canadians want to move into a world of recovery and an economy of growth, they will in their own self-interests—

Mr. Blenkarn: Demand your resignation.

Mr. MacEachen: —take steps to reduce these income demands. It seems totally inconsistent to me for the hon. member to be suggesting, in order to get Canadians to behave in their own best interests that I ought to make tax changes as a way of providing them, in a sense, with a bribe in order to take that course of action.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): You are having as much trouble as you had in November.

Mr. Paproski: You could help by resigning.

AIR TRANSPORT

FUEL COMPENSATION RECOVERY CHARGE

Mr. Jack Burghardt (London West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Can the minister tell us whether or not the government has further reviewed its decision concerning the transportation fuel compensation recovery charge? This charge was levied on exported aviation fuel between May, 1981, and January, 1982. Can the minister tell us whether or not any decision has been taken regarding a refund to the domestic air transportation industry?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, this matter has indeed been reviewed following representations from the Air Transport Association of Canada as well as many representations from members of the Liberal caucus.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: Following those representations, the Minister of Finance and myself have agreed to ensure that the money be fully remitted to Canadian carriers as well as to foreign carriers.

HOUSING

EFFECT OF BUDGET

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Prior to last evening the major problems that confronted Canadian families were high interest rates, high unemployment, the large deficit of the government, and inflation. As of last evening we will continue to have high unemployment, as witnessed by the official statement put out by officials of the minister's own department. The government has done nothing about the high interest rates that affect every single home owner across the country.

Some hon. Members: Right on.

Mr. Deans: We will not have as much money in the economy as a result of the government's determination to extract $1.3 billion in additional tax revenue from Canadians. How can the government expect the economy of Canada to recover if Canadians will have less money to purchase the goods and if Canadians will not be able to buy the homes they are capable of building, or will not be able to keep the homes they now have?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I am pleased the hon. member raised the question of housing. Last night I announced a five-point package in a new and expanded housing program. I would tell the hon. member, because he has raised the question of interest rates, that the government will provide grants of assistance not only to first-time purchasers of new homes, but also to buyers of existing homes. I believe that is assistance to the home owner and also to the construction industry.

However, I can also tell the hon. member that we have enriched the application of the Canada mortgage renewal plan. If he will look at the budget papers, the hon. member will find that any home owner who is spending more than 30 per cent of gross income as a result of mortgage renewal will be eligible for a grant up to $3,000. It will be no longer necessary to defer interest before becoming eligible for such a grant. It seems to me that is a very important step that has been taken in the budget to assist the home owner faced with renewal who has a burden higher than the normal burden carried by home owners. Has the hon. member noticed that particular provision in the budget statement?

Mr. Deans: Madam Speaker, I did in fact notice that provision in the budget. It was very interesting, although I expect it will be about as effective as the provisions brought in last November.

QUERY RESPECTING GOVERNMENT TAX POLICIES

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I have a direct question to ask the Minister of Finance. Why did the government decide to tax Canadians even higher than they are now being taxed in order to find money to give away, rather than direct that the interest rate levels currently being charged for mortgages be reduced to a level that is manageable on a monthly basis for Canadians earning dollars in Canada today?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, it is true that we will be collecting more revenues as a result of the budget last night. We are collecting these revenues in order to provide assistance to the unemployed. For example, the hon. member's leader has been calling for a job-creation program. As a result of these new revenues, and the reallocation of other resources, we will be spending, as a result of last night's budget, more than $750 million to generate jobs in the economy.

Mr. Deans: Purchasing power generates jobs.

Mr. MacEachen: That is one of the ways in which these revenues will be spent at the present time.

FISHERIES

THE BUDGET—IMPACT ON FISHERMEN

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance and it concerns fishermen and fish processors. Why does the budget not appear to include any relief for fishermen or fish processors who are in serious difficulty—I want the minister to hear exactly what I have to say—meeting present interest rates on past investment or current operating expense? There is absolutely nothing in the budget to help these people.

• (1450)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows, interest assistance for small businesses, farmers and fishermen was announced last night. As I stated earlier, $400 million will be allocated to this program. The eligibility for recipients of this program will be identical to the eligibility rules for the Small Business Development Bond, and the Small Business Development Bond in the November budget was expanded to include unincorporated businesses, including fishermen.

POSITION OF FISHERMEN AND FISH PROCESSORS

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): The minister said earlier in reply to a question that he did not want questioners to mislead the House. Of course we do not want the minister to mislead the House unintentionally. However, looking at the speech which the minister made last night, under the heading "Interest Assistance for Small Businesses, Farmers and Fishermen", the small business investment grants described there, and to which the minister has just alluded, are clearly stated to be only available if the person or the corporation is undertaking new investment.

I also point out that on page 9 of the printed portion of the minister's text it is again in reference to new investment. I point out as well that according to page 5 of the "immediate release communiqué" in which the minister talks about this, it is again only available to finance purchases of new depreciable property for use in Canada. Now that the minister has the facts straight, why is there nothing to help fishermen and fish processors in this country who are going under now because they cannot maintain the interest rates on past investment and current operating expenses?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I certainly do not want to mislead the hon. member on this point. Perhaps there is a misunderstanding between us. If he will read the budget speech he will see that the small business bond tax provision continues. The program now being introduced is a new direct expenditure program which will supplement the financing available under the Small Business Bond Program to firms in financial difficulty. As I heard the hon. member describe the firms which he has in mind, they are in financial difficulty and will be eligible for this type of assistance.

HOUSING

EFFECT OF PURCHASE GRANTS ON MORTGAGE PAYMENTS

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. In his reply to the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain, the minister made reference to the $3,000 first-time home buyer grant. Given that the average price of a Canadian home with a 20 per cent down payment would require mortgage payments at 17 per cent of $842 a month, if that $3,000 is to be used to buy down the mortgage it means a decrease in that mortgage interest payment from $842 a month to $800 a month, a 5 per cent decrease. The minister knows that that will be taxed back as a result of an increase in taxes by virtue of decreased indexing. How does the minister see this as a stimulus to housing and a means of making housing more affordable to Canadians?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, the hon. member makes reference to average prices. The $3,000 grant is available not only to single family home owners but to those in duplexes, town houses, and those purchasing condominiums. For example, we believe that the $3,000 as applied to a purchase of a condominium at $50,000 is a significant contribution to a young couple who are entering the home purchase market for the first time. We believe that it ranges anywhere from 3 per cent to 6 per cent, and could be higher in some cases.

We believe that is a significant contribution in view of the way the government has had to look for resources and has had to allocate resources in a budget that does not increase the deficit. It appears that the industry seems to agree, and it would appear that this program will indeed result in a stimulus to the industry of a minimum of 25,000 housing starts in the country.

Mr. McGrath: It seems to me that we have heard that song before on the last housing policy brought in here by the government; we heard the same song from that minister. He has failed to address himself to the question of how that person can afford to meet his mortgage interest payments when it is a one-time grant for one year and when mortgage interest payments are continuing to rise. That is the question he does not understand.

IMPACT OF BUDGET ON CONSTRUCTION INDUSTRY

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, following the announcement by the Minister of Finance last night, real estate companies on the Toronto Stock Exchange fell by 9.5 per cent. So much for confidence in the minister's policy! The Urban Development Institute said, "Our biggest concern is that a number of Canadians will hold off their purchases until they have a clearer indication of what the legislation will be." That refers to the fact that the mortgage interest deferral has been put off until consultation takes place. I would ask the minister how the budget of last night addresses itself to an industry that is crippled and on the verge of collapse. Let him answer that question.

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I would urge that the industry representatives and Canadians inform themselves on the total budget and all of the $400 million allocated in last evening's budget to assisting the housing industry. For example, the hon. member does not indicate that the $3,000 is intended to be an immediate stimulus. It is effective today to people who will be out looking for houses on the weekend. It will not wait for the four months of delay, for example, that we experienced in the House through delay by the opposition with the previous budget.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cosgrove: As well, I would remind the hon. member that, also provided in the budget, is an increase for non-profit and co-op housing, 2,500 units, and we raised that to 27,500, which is 27,500 units more than the Conservative Party recommended to Canadians when they had the same responsibility.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ENERGY

FORTHCOMING INCREASE IN OIL COSTS

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In his budget last night the minister proposed to hold federal regulated prices to 6 per cent. The Thursday oil price increase itself will be an increase of 10 per cent, and next year consumers will face a whopping increase of 31 per cent in energy costs. In view of the fact that the Prime Minister today, in response to our suggestions for postponement of oil price increases, said that it was not in the public interest to reopen the oil deal, would the minister agree that he is being unrealistic and misleading when he expects airlines and marketing boards, which are all affected by these increased energy prices, to hold the 6 per cent guidelines? How will they do that?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I indicated in the budget statement last night that the government is requesting all regulatory agencies to keep their price increases at 6 per cent unless they can be justified as necessary.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: What about wages?

Mr. MacEachen: The government itself will monitor all the price increases that will take place by regulatory agencies, or which will be submitted by the departments, to ensure that only in those cases where solid justification can be brought forward will these increases take place. It is a serious part of our program and we intend to enforce it to the very limit.

EFFECT ON RETIRED CITIZENS

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the same minister. As the minister knows, oil and energy costs form a large part of all family budgets. However, they place an extra pressure on households that rely on retirement incomes. How, in the name of all honesty, can the minister justify allowing the oil industry to grab another 10 per cent in a price increase this Thursday, while saying to 50 per cent of those Canadians who rely on retirement incomes that their incomes will be restricted, in terms of cost of living increases, to 6 per cent and 5 per cent?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I believe that the Prime Minister has already explained the nature of the agreement that exists affecting the energy industry. I do not think that I can add anything further to that aspect of the question.

I would tell the hon. member that, as far as recipients of old age security are concerned, where these recipients are in receipt of the guaranteed income supplement, that guaranteed income supplement will be fully indexed at whatever the rate of inflation happens to be. In addition to that, any amount that would be lost to them as a result of the reduction from 11 per cent to 6 per cent will be made up under the special compensation to recipients of the guaranteed income supplement so that no pensioner in need will be affected by this particular action of the government.

NATIONAL SECURITY

REPORTED DEATH OF IGOR GOUZENKO

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. Could the Solicitor General confirm or deny the rumour that the gentleman known as Mr. Igor Gouzenko, to whom this country and the western world owe so very, very much, has died and is being buried here in Ottawa, today?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I received numerous press inquiries before the question period on this subject. I have had inquiries made, and I hope to be able to have that information and make it public shortly, if, indeed, I can confirm or deny that rumour.

MR. McDERMID—CHEAPER POSTAGE RATES FOR SENIOR CITIZENS

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, it is my duty to present a petition signed by 5,159 citizens of Brampton-Georgetown and surrounding districts in Ontario. The purpose of this petition is to urge the government to offer some relief from the increased burden of postage rates to senior citizens of Canada, co-ordinated by Mrs. Sybil Watts of Brampton who has been the driving force behind this petition; it requests the House to look into the possibility of offering cheaper postal rates to seniors whose active and essential correspondence has been so severely curtailed because of the increase of postage rates to 30 cents a letter.

The petitioners hope that in your examination of the petition you will find the petition in order, and that you will exercise the powers vested in the office of the Speaker of the House to refer the matter to the appropriate body for consideration at the earliest possible time in order that this serious burden to many seniors can be alleviated.

MR. OGLE—WORLD INVOLVEMENT IN NUCLEAR ARMAMENTS

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Madam Speaker, I have a petition to the honourable the House of Commons of Canada in Parliament assembled. The petition of the undersigned residents of the city of Saskatoon in the province of Saskatchewan, who now avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right thus to present a grievance common to your petitioners in the certain assurance that your Honourable House will therefore provide a remedy, humbly sheweth: That the world involvement in nuclear armaments will lead to the probable destruction of the human race; wherefore the undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon Members of Parliament to express their fears and concerns for the future of all mankind. And as in duty bound your petitioners will ever pray.

MR. HEAP—TESTING OF CRUISE MISSILES ON CANADIAN SOIL

THE LATE IGOR GOUZENKO

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, on a point of order, further to what the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) has said I think the House should know that the death of Igor Gouzenko has in fact taken place. I would hope that the government, at a suitable occasion, will pay a tribute to Mr. Gouzenko, perhaps by awarding posthumously the Order of Canada in recognition of the risks he has taken.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: That is not a point of order.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. McGRATH—REMARKS OF MR. COSGROVE RESPECTING BILL C-89

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, I hope you will entertain this as a point of order because I believe it does speak to the issue of order in the House. On a number of occasions the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove), who is responsible for housing, during the course of the question period has accused the opposition of delaying Bill C-89 by four months.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. McGrath: That was the subject of a point of order on two or three previous occasions when we sought to correct the record. We tried to point out, by way of a point of order, that the minister was—

Madam Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member knows that I cannot entertain this as a point of order. It is really a point of debate. Hon. members on both sides probably have different opinions about these particular circumstances, but it is debate, and I do ask the hon. member not to insist on raising it as a point of order, if he is interested in keeping order in the House.

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, could I ask for your guidance? If the minister persists in saying that we did something which we say we did not, then that obviously creates a disorder in the House. If the minister insists on doing that, I have the right to question whether or not the minister is, in fact, deliberately misleading the House.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is asking for my guidance. I do not think he needs it. He knows he can take the occasion, when he is making a speech or when he is asking questions again in the House, which he does very often, to try to elucidate those points; but he certainly cannot convince me that it is a point of order.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

RCMP POLICING ARRANGEMENTS WITH NOVA SCOTIA

Question No. 3,751—Mr. MacKay:

1. Were contractual arrangements made between the government and the province of Nova Scotia for the policing of that province by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police affected by the withdrawal of services of other police forces and the consequent supplying of emergency policing by the RCMP and, if so, in what respect?

2. Under whose authority and by whom are invoices sent for the services rendered by the RCMP where other police forces have withdrawn their services?

3. Were the invoices paid in full?

4. During the past five years in Nova Scotia, in what instances did city, town or municipal police withdraw their services resulting in RCMP involvement and, in each case, what was the cost of the RCMP services and the amount paid?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): 1. No. As all contracts for provincial policing services are required to be tabled pursuant to Section 20(3) of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, they are therefore public documents.

2. Such invoices are forwarded to the Attorney General by the Chief Financial Officer under authority of Sections 12, 13 and 14 of the Provincial Policing Agreement.

3. Yes.

4. Westville from June 9, 1978 to October 17, 1978, New Waterford from July 5, 1978 to July 8, 1978, Truro from October 19, 1979 to October 24, 1979, New Glasgow from October 18, 1979 to October 25, 1979, Amherst from October 22, 1979 to October 25, 1979, Trenton from September 11, 1980 to November 14, 1980, and Halifax from May 29, 1981 to July 23, 1981. The cost of performing emergency police services at the aforementioned municipalities is unknown as all such costs were incorporated in the over-all provincial policing invoices sent to the province in the respective year.

MR. DON MARRIOTT

Question No. 4,107—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the answer to question No. 3,066 stating that Mr. Don Marriott, director of restaurants and catering at the National Arts Centre, did not directly or indirectly purchase a cash register for the National Arts Centre (a) from whom was the cash register purchased and was it purchased from Mr. Marriott or from any establishment in which he had an interest (b) on what date was it purchased and for what amount (c) what were the names of all the persons involved in the transaction?

Mr. Jack Masters (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): I am informed by the National Arts Centre as follows: (a) the cash register was purchased from Jonny's Antiques Ltd. of Shakespeare, Ontario, a company in which Mr. Marriott did not hold an interest; (b) the actual date of purchase is unknown, however the cash register was shipped from Shakespeare, October 30, 1979 and invoiced November 5, 1979, for the amount of $1,700 including provincial sales tax, handling and shipping; (c) purchase of the cash register was negotiated by Mr. Marriott and the principals of Jonny's Antiques are Jonny Kalish and James Bisback.

CONTRACTUAL COMMITMENTS

Question No. 4,271—Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton):

Does the government maintain records showing the extent to which it is contractually committed for each fiscal year beyond 1982-83 for leases and other goods and services and (a) if not, for what reason (b) if so, for each year, what is the dollar value of those contractual commitments?

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Public Works and Supply and Services as follows: for leases: yes, for goods and services: no.

(a) The Department of Supply and Services, as the main contractor of government goods and services, does not keep records of the global amount of long-term commitments. In order to provide a global amount, each department would have to look to individual transactions which in time and money would be prohibitive.

(b) Contractual Commitments—Leases	Dollar Value

April 2029—March 2030	282.15

The foregoing amounts include short term Crown-lease contracts and long-term lease-purchase contracts, the latter normally covering a period of up to 35 years. This explains the abrupt reduction of commitments in the year 2014. Moreover, the amounts exclude operating and other costs which can only be committed on an annual basis at the start of each fiscal year. A further point is that commitment values change from month to month due to new leases entered into and old leases terminating.

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Monday June 28, 1982, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, when I finished my remarks last night I was commenting on the fact that we have a full-scale crisis of confidence in our country today, and this budget comes nowhere near addressing that crisis of confidence. It is another run at the same iceberg that we ran into last November and we are going to have the same damage that we had at that time.

We have a projected $20 billion budget deficit. In the discussions that I have held with some of the economists in this country, that $20 billion projection is probably low. I think anyone who understands estimates knows that when something is put at $19.8 billion, just below the $20 billion level, it will rise to that $20 billion level.

There is no plan in this budget for economic recovery. The minister does not seem to understand that we have a confidence crisis in the country. Canadians are desperate. Canadians are hanging on to small businesses. They are suffering around a 25 per cent or 50 per cent loss of capacity. People are in desperate need of leadership in the country today. Seventy-five per cent of the people are worried that they or the immediate members of their families will lose their jobs over the next year. That is the state we are in today.

The response of the minister is to put the boots to those who are hardest hit in the economy today, the low-income people and the pensioners. We could not even get a straight admission from the minister today that he was putting the boots to the pensioners. Let me quote what this same minister said when he was the minister of national health and welfare. He said:

> Clearly, we owe it to our older people, who have borne the burdens of the past half century, to ensure that they have a decent and adequate income for their retirement years.

• (1510)

That is the same minister who just last night took away half of the inflationary increase of their pensions next year. This is the same minister who is desperately looking for help in fighting these problems. Let me just remind you, Mr. Speaker, of a pathetic line in his budget last night. He was looking around for help. Talking about other industrialized countries, he said:

> Their governments are unable or have not chosen to design their economic policies to help us get out of the recession.

Is the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) seriously expecting other countries in the world to help us get out of our recession, to design their policies so that he can have his problems solved for him? This man is sitting with his head deeply in the ground wondering where the help is going to come from. He is looking all over the place, except right here at home. That is where we have to start to solve our economic problems, not grasping at straws in other countries of the world, but facing up to the reality at home.

Is it any wonder that Canadians shake their heads in bewilderment when they think of this minister and the total lack of new policies and directions that have been indicated in this budget? The budget was simply tinkering with some of the policies that got us into the problems that we have today. It is too little, too late and many Canadians will suffer as a result of it.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to step back a little and look at this budget in the context of what has happened in the past two and one half years since February, 1980. This is a record of an inept government, a record of failure that is unparalleled in Canadian political history. Let us go through the litany of these failures.

The Constitution, which was declared illegal by the Supreme Court, had to be changed in order to meet the requirements of the provinces and the people of Canada. The National Energy Program was wrong right from the start. It was first changed in September, 1981, changed again in May, 1982 and is still not right.

Let us now come to the Foreign Investment Review Agency. A major change was heralded in the 1982 election. It was going to increase significantly the amount of intervention in the economy by this agency. It has been presided over by the most extreme of the nationalist members of the cabinet. This agency is not working. It has led to an incredible degree of uncertainty on the part of foreign and domestic investors. It has become a symbol of the lack of understanding of the need for job-creating investments in this country on the part of the government. The changes in the budget last night were not enough, but the fact that changes were made recognizes that the directions that were chosen in February, 1980, were wrong for the country.

The budget of last November was a disaster from the start. The economic direction in that budget was all wrong. Since then we have had at least 35 changes in the income tax provisions. That represents a tremendous amount of uncertainty; uncertainty means delay of economic activity, and that means fewer jobs. There are still more changes to come. The minister has not yet put that one to bed and he is on to his next budget.

The energy security act which heralded the introduction of an omnibus bill, which was going to hijack the rights of Parliament, was forced to be changed by the opposition members. This is a consistent pattern of failure. It is a consistent pattern whereby this government is being forced to change the direction it wanted to follow for a direction that this opposition party was pressing for.

The official opposition, the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada, has been the only entity in this country that has kept the federal government on a reasonable track. Consider the damage that would have been done if there had not been an opposition party fighting for the rights of Canadians and fighting for changes in these policies. Think of the damage that would have been done and the position we would have been in today if that government, with its pattern of failure, had continued on in the same direction. This government cannot continue to lead us in that direction. The country cannot afford to pay the price of the irresponsible and incompetent actions of the government, egged on by the New Democratic Party in many of the directions it is proposing to go. It has only been brought on track by this official opposition. The damage to the country has been too great. The delays in changing these policies have meant a tremendous increase in the amount of unemployment. I will come back to that in a minute.

Divisions have erupted with splits between the east and the west and Quebec and the rest of Canada as a result of the high interest rate policy, the energy program, the Constitution and so on. Why is it that this government continues to take

Canadians to the edge of the cliff and push some of them over? It is irresponsible and it has to change. Canadians want better than that. They want a change. That is why we believe that today an election is necessary to give Canadians the opportunity to rid this country of this government of failure.

The government has been beaten by the country. It has been beaten back by the opposition parties time and again. The budget of last night is not an isolated event; it is part of a series of failures. The government must go to the people to let the people decide. The budget of last night is the sixth major failure since February, 1980.

Let us look at the damage that has been done since that date. Interest rates in general are up three percentage points. More important, mortgage interest rates are up six full percentage points since this government took office. The inflation rate is up two and one half percentage points, close to 12 per cent, almost the all-time high.

The most important number of all is the number of people who are unemployed today who were not unemployed two and one half years ago. There are 300,000 additional people unemployed today. With their families, that means about one million have been directly affected.

From time to time we hear about the number of bankruptcies that have occurred. It does not mean too much unless you have been through a bankruptcy. It is a very debilitating experience to know people who have gone through a bankruptcy. They have lost their confidence and the dream they have been working toward. Since February, 1980, 18,000 businesses have gone bankrupt. During that period 18,000 dreams have been shattered. There are 55,000 individuals who have declared personal bankruptcy.

This government must begin to realize that it is individual people who are being hurt. It is not the political game that we are playing here in the House of Commons that is important; we must deal with the real world. We cannot stay here in an ivory tower in Ottawa; we must deal with individual Canadians who are losing their jobs and their businesses. That is the damage that has been done in the past two and one half years.

Last night I sat back and considered whether this budget would change things and there would be a change in the direction of the country as a result of the budget. The answer I had to come to was no, and the minister knows that. The signal that he does not intend to do that is the fact that he did not give us any projections in the budget last night. There were no five-year projections. There were not even one-year projections. The only projections that we got were what is going to happen in this current fiscal year. We could not even get an unemployment figure or inflation figure past the current figure. Either the minister does not know what he is doing or he is afraid to tell Canadians the truth. He wants to hold back the truth from them.

What will the interest rate be this time next year? What will the inflation rate be this time next year? How many people will be unemployed? We have been trying to find out from the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) how many people who are unemployed today will run out of benefits by the end of the year. These are the sort of figures, that is the sort of information, that we are trying to get out of the Minister of Finance, but he was afraid to give it. He did not want to put that information in front of the Canadian people because of the further damage it would do to his reputation as a Minister of Finance. That is the damage that has been built up over 15 years. That is the damage to the credibility of this government and the damage done to the people of Canada today who are unemployed, who are suffering from high interest rates, who have to roll over their mortgage today at 20 per cent. This is what has happened over the past 15 years of economic mismanagement. That is what we have to turn around and I want to put on the record some thoughts about how we can turn that around later in my remarks, Mr. Speaker.

Let us look at what has happened since the time when we were standing in this House last November after the last budget. In that budget the minister said that the growth rate was going to be 2.2 per cent. Last night he told us that this year the growth rate would be down 2 per cent. That is a change of minus 4.2 per cent.

The unemployment rate last year at this time, or last November, he said would be 7.8 per cent. This year we know it is 10.2 per cent and it will probably be higher before the end of the year. That is how much difference we have seen in a short period of time, partly because of the bad estimations he made at that time, but partly because of the disastrous policies that were brought in in that budget.

The budget deficit indicates there has been an incredible miscalculation. Last year, in the November budget, it was going to be $6.6 billion. This year it is going to be $19.8 billion. That is a difference of $13 billion. It is incredible that he could have been so far wrong. When you think of that, how can any Canadian have any confidence whatsoever in any of the numbers, any of the projections that he puts forward? It may be that that is why, Mr. Speaker, he did not want to give us any estimates of what is going to happen next year—because he just does not know.

This is the crisis of confidence that I was referring to in my opening remarks, and it has not been addressed by this patchwork quilt of a budget. It has not been addressed in any way at all. We need to have a change. We need to have a change in some of the very high profile policies that have been associated with this government and that have had such an impact on the confidence level of people inside the country and outside the country.

The National Energy Program, the way the Foreign Investment Review Agency has been administered, last November's budget, and the budgetary deficit which I have just referred to, are symbols of mismanagement and excessive government intervention that are causing incredible damage to the country today. They must be changed. The budget should have shown Canadians that this government understands and is sensitive to the concerns of the people these policies are affecting.

The environment has been poisoned by these policies over the past two and a half years, but did we have any changes last night of any significance? No, we did not. We had a little bit more tinkering at the edges. But words are not enough, Mr. Speaker; the words and the tinkering on the part of the government last night are clearly not enough. It is clearly not enough to blame others, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) did again in question period today. All this government can do is blame others. Every time this government blames the Government of Alberta, the Government of Québec, the Government of the United States, or the gnomes of Zurich or the international markets or whatever, they rob Canadians of something they need and are looking for most, and that is the hope and the confidence that we can do something about our own problems here in this country. That hope was shattered again last night.

I say to the minister, Mr. Speaker, that Canadians know the last budget was wrong and they wanted to see a change in direction. They looked for some admission of error, for some acknowledgement that a change in direction was needed from last November, something that would give them a sense of confidence that things would change, that things would improve. They hoped that maybe the job situation would be better towards the end of the year, that there would be some light at the end of the tunnel. Canadians were looking for that—and they were disappointed. The minister robbed them of that hope with his budget speech last night. Confidence will not be turned around by a $20 billion deficit, almost three times the estimate a short seven months before. It will not be turned around by estimates that are totally out of whack with what the unemployment rate would be and how many people would be unemployed.

Canadians have spoken today. They have spoken in the marketplace where the dollar has dropped to about 77 cents. The stock market has dropped about 40 points today in the market. There is no confidence out there and the budget last night had no success in regaining the level of confidence that is so desperately needed in the country today.

People are frightened. They are frightened by that $20 billion deficit figure, because it is out of control. When the federal government has to compete in the marketplace for the scarce amount of money available—and it has increased its requirements by almost three times—Canadians know that that will mean higher interest rates. It will mean that some borrowers, some small-business men, some home owners, just will not be able to get the money that they need to finance their homes or their small businesses.

Canadians do not understand why, when the government calls for restraint, it increases it own spending by 20 per cent—not just this year but 20 per cent last year and 20 per cent again this year. They do not understand why this government cannot manage its funds better. Canadians do not understand why the government has increased personal taxes by $1.3 billion in this budget. At the same time, it withdraws the indexation protection that has been given to Canadians for ten years now. They do not understand why that is done, particularly after the mistake that was made in last year's budget. In last year's budget the Minister of Finance raised taxes by $1.4 billion. He has raised them again by $1.3 billion, right in the middle of the most serious recession that we have had for years.

We know, Mr. Speaker, that 224,000 people are unemployed today, more than was the case back in November, 1981. We know that the growth rate has dropped from the 2.2 per cent estimate to a minus 2 per cent figure. It is partly the result of the actions taken in that budget of increasing taxes, of withdrawing investment incentives from the marketplace, job creating investment incentives that would have put some of those people back to work.

In question period today we had the Minister of Employment and Immigration admitting that there will be a further increase in unemployment insurance premiums. It has been estimated that that increase will be some $2 billion to $2.5 billion because of the high levels of unemployment in the country today. What does the Minister of Finance do? He did not put that in his budget statement, he did not talk about that. It was hidden there. We had to dig that out of one of the tables. He never mentioned that; he only talked about the $1.3 billion increase in taxes. That is the sort of trickiness that continues to undermine the confidence of people in the country today. It is no way to put business back on the books of small businesses. It is no way to create jobs. It is no way to turn the economy around. That increase in taxes just perpetuates the vicious circle that we are in today.

This budget is tricky in a number of other instances, Mr. Speaker. It is similar to the last one. I recall saying the same thing the last time I was speaking in the budget debate. This budget leaves the impression that some action will be taken, that things are being done. But much of that is in limbo. I want to refer to some of these things that are in limbo, Mr. Speaker. There is a large list; there are nine different items in that budget that are still in limbo. We got the impression in hearing and reading the minister's budget speech last night, that this was action that was being taken right away.

There is a plan to increase the investment of funds in term deposits through a tax gimmick, that of only taxing the real return and not the inflationary return. There is another program to increase the funds available for the purchase of Canadian corporation shares. There is a further provision to allow for lower interest rates in the purchase of a new home, for small business loans and also for Canadian corporations to receive a greater amount of risk capital.

These are all items we are pleased to see. Many of them are derived directly from policies this opposition party, when it was in government and at other times, has put forward as principal elements of economic policy. Hon. members will recall the mortgage and tax credit for home owners so that they could receive interest relief. Hon. members will recall the Small Business Development Bond we brought in two and a half years ago and the Canadian common stock investment fund. All these proposals of the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada would have had the same impact as the proposals put forward by the Government of Canada in the budget last night. We welcome those, but we wonder why there is a delay. Why can these not be implemented right away to do the job now when interest rates are at 20 per cent and when there is slow growth in the economy? Instead, they will be put away for a further three, four, five or six months—who knows?—for further study. We do not see action today.

Some provisions arising from the November budget are still hanging. There is the whole question of interest deductibility. That has not been decided yet. It will be carried forward, reviewed again and perhaps never implemented. That degree of uncertainty is still there and is causing businesses to slow down their investment activities.

The tabling of the Ways and Means motion last night should have been done in such a form that we could have dealt with it directly in this House and in Committee of the Whole so that we could get on with budget legislation. Instead, it is being referred to committees in the private sector for further review. How much further review of the November budget do we have to have? How much longer do we have to wait until that budget can be brought into the House of Commons and dealt with by Members of Parliament so that we can rid the country of the tremendous uncertainty that budget has caused? Does the minister not yet have the confidence to bring in that legislation so that we can deal with it?

The Canadian rental support plan was announced in the November budget. There was an incredible statement in the budget last night. The plan is not working, we know that. The minister has told us it is not working, but the government said in the budget papers of last night that it will show flexibility in relation to the amount of money over and above the $7,500 already offered. The government will show some flexibility, but members of the real estate community tell us that they feel that $7,500 will have to be $20,000 if it is to have any impact on getting housing starts going. We still have uncertainty. What does flexibility mean?

Two other elements of the proposals of the government with respect to restraining levels of pay are still hanging in the air. They are still not decided, and that again undermines the credibility of the government in getting on with the job and dealing with the problems we have.

In addition to that the government has been tricky in relation to the budget deficit. I said it probably was more than $20 billion. I am sure it will be more than $20 billion. I hope the minister will have his minister of state make clear just exactly how the number is arrived at so that we can judge whether it is another trick on the minister's part or whether the budget figure is really an accurate one.

Government spending will increase 20 per cent. Do hon. members recall hearing the Minister of Finance talking about a 20 per cent increase in government spending in his speech last night? No, that was not in the speech. The minister ignored that. I looked through the budget papers to try to find out what the figure would be. In the first line of one particular paragraph it was stated that government spending would increase by 15 per cent. Then I looked a little further down. Three or four paragraphs later buried in the middle of a paragraph I found that over-all government spending on a national accounts basis—the most accurate basis for measuring government spending—would be increased by 20 per cent. This is a very tricky budget indeed.

That raises another question, and that is the question of indexation. With his statement last night the minister took the first step toward removing indexation. Taxes were effectively increased by $1.3 billion, or 6 per cent, but the budget also removes a key element of discipline in government spending which was brought in on the suggestion of the Hon. Robert Stanfield.

However, more important than that discipline, which is very important at a time when government spending has been running away at 20 per cent annum for two years, is where this withdrawal of indexation stops. How far will we go? The minister has removed indexation from certain social programs and the pension funds of certain Canadians. Is this the beginning of the end? The minister calls this tax expenditure. What other tax expenditures are going to go? Does this mean we will be taxed on the imputed rent of our houses? Is that the next step? Will there be capital gains taxes on the principal residences of Canadians? What other taxation will there be to satisfy the greed and the unquenchable thirst of this government for Canadians' money? That is the question we are asking the minister today.

There have been some changes since the November budget. We are pleased with some of them, and I referred to some of them last night. I will not go through them again. I just observe that 35 changes have already been made. Is that not enough of a sign of the minister's incompetence and the lack of confidence that instils in the Canadian community?

If that is not enough, let us look at the changes which have not yet been made in the budget of last November. The minister did not explain last night why dental and health benefits are still being taxed. The dental association has told us that those increased taxes will hurt low and middle-income Canadians more than other Canadians. The minister did not tell us why employee benefits, particularly in the mining and natural resource sectors, will still be taxed. This past weekend we heard about problems in labour negotiations currently under way in British Columbia where employees have been taxed $3 an hour, or $19 a day. That amounts to about $3,500 or $4,000 in tax which has to be paid by those employees. Is it any wonder they are having trouble with their labour negotiations? That is the most inflationary element the minister could have put into that budget of last November, and we still do not understand why he has left it in.

The minister also has not told us why he has left in the proposal not to allow interest deductibility on loans made to purchase registered retirement savings plans. That is a very mean proposal by the minister. It is mean because again it hits low and middle-income people, the people who cannot afford to pay out of ready cash. They have to go to the bank and have forced savings plans. However, the interest paid will not be tax deductible.

There were seven elements of the November budget which I have identified by which individual Canadians over 65 years of age would be taxed additionally. I have not had an opportunity to check thoroughly on this, but I understand that of those seven elements, one has been withdrawn, one has been amended but five are still in place whereby senior citizens will continue to be taxed at a higher rate than prior to the November budget.

There are other parts of the budget of last November which should have been changed. One aspect is the capital cost allowance. At a time when we needed job creation, the minister withdrew large capital cost allowances from Canadian businesses. Other elements were the resource allowances in Canadian steel companies and the treatment of reserves on the sale of property, small businesses and farms. This has not been changed significantly, and certainly not in the budget of last night.

By leaving those last three matters in, the minister has ignored the fact that we should not just be looking at tax revenue; it is what that money can generate if it is left in the hands of private citizens to put to work in the economy. That creates jobs. The jobs created generate revenues for the government, but all the minister has chosen to look at is the fact that it represents tax revenues. When we remove those job—creating and investment tax incentives—what the minister calls loopholes—is it any wonder we have gone from a 2.4 per cent or a 2.2 per cent growth expectation to a loss of minus 2 per cent this coming year?

That budget should have been totally withdrawn. There was no reason why that abortion of a budget should have been left in place; it should have been taken off the books altogether. The minister should have started afresh last night and learned from the mistakes brought home to him day in and day out since November 12 last year and which he has totally ignored. The minister is not reading his mail, Mr. Speaker.

I should like to comment briefly on the public sector restraint program, Mr. Speaker. Prior to the budget, we in the Conservative Party said that we would support the public sector restraint program provided that it met two conditions. First, that it would take place within the context of a broad restraint program by the Government of Canada; and second, that the program would have some flexibility so that people on low incomes who are in the worst economic position today could be treated differently and those who warranted some merit increases could be treated differently.

Neither objective has been achieved in this budget. Clearly, no restraint program is being offered by the Government of Canada when it is increasing spending by 20 per cent this year. Obviously, there is no flexibility when a 6 per cent limit is placed on everyone, whether a clerk, SX3, a deputy minister or the president of a Crown corporation. Everyone, the good employee and the not so good employee, is treated the same way. I urge the government to consider these proposals to extend government restraint programs and to put tighter control on government spending in order to bring it below 20 per cent.

I would also ask the government to consider capping wage and salary budgets to allow for some flexibility so that there could be different treatment for low-income employees in the government as well as for those who merit some increased remuneration because of good work.

Today's approach is inequitable, Mr. Speaker. It is too rigid and not appropriate to the circumstances. The public sector is being asked to make sacrifices but it is unlikely that it will feel part of a major recovery program that is so important to the country today.

I should like to return to the broad perspective that I discussed earlier and outline some of the Progressive Conservative Party's approaches within that perspective. In the 1980 election and following that, the Liberal Party, urged on by the New Democratic Party, took a major step to move the country toward more government, greater intervention and regulation and more government involvement in our lives.

We saw this in high profile programs such as the National Energy Program, the Foreign Investment Review Agency changes and the industrial policy which has been discussed by the government. These are high profile examples of this movement toward greater intervention. More pervasive and less obvious, however, are the increases in government spending which cover a number of smaller programs. In 1980, government spending rose by 16 per cent, in 1981 by 20 per cent and 20 per cent is projected for 1982. This will require tax increases. First, there were massive tax increases under the National Energy Program. In the November budget and in this budget the tax increases were not quite as obvious but they were there and the impact is being felt across the board.

More damaging than all that, however, is the method that the government has used to inject itself into the lives of Canadians. The government has removed those tax incentives and the so-called loopholes which used to encourage productive job-creating investment in the past and replaced them with direct, bureaucratically controlled programs, grants or direct subsidies, programs used extensively in research and development, by the Department of Industry Trade and Commerce, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, and in this budget and the one before, in housing and in the oil and gas industry.

The policy of the Progressive Conservative Party is to change high profile programs such as the Foreign Investment Review Agency and the National Energy Program. We would keep the parts of those programs that could be of benefit to Canadians and throw out those parts which are obstacles to economic progress and are too arbitrary.

It is important to realize that if the government can provide a clear signal of change in the direction of its policy, that will be the key to recovery of the confidence that is missing and which is needed to encourage Canadians, whether individual investors or companies, to expand and embark on job-creating activities. The government's tinkering with the National Energy Program and the Foreign Investment Review Agency in the past few weeks is not enough. The two ministers concerned should be changed. Both have become associated with one of the key things that is wrong with the government, and that is excessive nationalism and excessive government intervention. Both should resign or be changed by the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson: The Conservative Party would also replace those direct grant programs with tax reductions, whether they be general tax reductions or some targeted incentives similar to those things that were removed by the budget of last November. This would encourage productive investment in research and development, training and export industries. The tax reduction way is less arbitrary. It does not require bureaucratic decision or a lot of red tape. It only requires an individual to decide whether he wants to take advantage of a particular program. He does not have to come to Ottawa, cap in hand, to ask the minister or one of his officials whether he can participate in a particular program. Last night we were told that one of the drawbacks of the program proposed for small businesses that was announced by the Minister of Finance is that small business does not have the time to take advantage of it. People are too busy to waste time fighting through the red tape in Ottawa.

We must also remember that if incentives for research and development, export promotion and job training can be put in place, the return to the government and to the people of Canada will be immense. Product development will improve and so will our competitive position, thus reducing inflation and equipping Canadians with the means of taking advantage of their opportunities and putting them in a frame of mind to grasp these opportunities aggressively and run with them.

The time is right for a major shift in the direction of government policy. We need to move toward less regulation and less government control. That translates into lower taxes. We must move toward more restraint and better management of government operations. We must also move toward less direct government grants and subsidies. These should be replaced with tax incentives that would generate productive job-creating investment.

I am convinced that this combination would lead to a stronger economy, more government revenues, less unemployment and lower interest rates. The time is right for this. Canadians have had too many examples of the government's failures and have lost all confidence in this minister and the government. They are tired of the government's trickiness, its approach to budget making and other policies. They can see a new direction in the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada, a move away from the Liberal-NDP coalition that has been in place for the last two and a half years.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wilson: That direction relies on the energy, the initiative and the motivation of individual Canadians. It has less trust in the benevolence and paternalism of the state. That is the direction in which we should be moving.

It is for that reason that I move, seconded by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark):

That all the words after the word "That" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"because of widespread lack of confidence in the management of Canada's economy, aggravated by an incredible budgetary deficit of $19.6 billion and a totally unrealistic and intolerable increase in government spending of 20 per cent at a time when the government itself is calling for restraint at 6 per cent, all of which results in a squeeze on pensioners, mothers and the unemployed and perpetuates high inflation and high interest rates, this House is of the opinion that the only effective method of restoring confidence in the economy and giving Canadians hope for the future is the immediate resignation of the government."

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, as we begin this budget debate today we can hear, if we are quiet, a ghost in these halls. The ghost of R. B. Bennett has returned. Fifty years ago he had a solution to the difficult economic times in this country. His solution was to increase taxes, and we know what happened.

I suspect that if this continues we will have in a few years the MacEachen buggy for transportation. I also want to remind the members opposite that any revolt in history found its roots in the people's concern about taxes and tax increases. The minister's first budget missed the mark, Mr. Speaker; the second time he was up he swung and missed; the third time the minister has struck out.

Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, the dollar closed at 77.70. This morning it dropped below 77 cents, and at one o'clock was worth 77.13 cents U.S. In other words, the money market's reflection of last night's budget indicated that investor confidence in this country has deteriorated.

As of two o'clock today the Toronto Stock Exchange composite index had gone down 40.78 points, a decline of nearly 3 per cent. The largest loss was in real estate and various construction issues which declined 219 points, or nearly 7 per cent. Oil and gas losses were second and the utilities were third. In other words, the economic barometers which quickly reflect the views of investors indicate that they have seen nothing to give them any encouragement.

This was a budget of betrayal. I do not expect that there has ever been as many Canadians in their homes and offices focus on their radios and televisions as there were last night, awaiting the good news, awaiting some indication of hope and new direction. But, Mr. Speaker, the people of this country were betrayed by this government. Instead of new policies and new directions, they received tax increases. Senior citizens are going to be asked to receive less benefits than they would normally receive next year. Single parent families are going to find that their family allowance will be less than they expected. The working people of Canada are being asked to pay the price of this Liberal government's economic mismanagement over the last number of years.

To get an indication of what this government feels the next number of months will hold, we look at the budget documents and what the government has projected. Every budget has a number of pages where the government projects the rate of inflation and unemployment, and what job opportunities will be like. But we note the absence of those pages in this budget. There is very little forecasting, and I wonder if that was not a conscious omission, Mr. Speaker. Knowing what is going to happen in the next six to 18 months, would any government want to describe the phenomena of more difficult economic and social times?

Just seven months ago, Mr. Speaker, we had a budget—so-called, because it has never seen the light of day in this House—which forecast unemployment of 946,000 in Canada this year. It was wrong, because today we have, according to Statistics Canada figures, 1,241,000 unemployed plus nearly 200,000 people who have given up looking for work. The budget suggested that the unemployment rate would be about 9 per cent, but today it stands at 10.4 per cent.

Real gross national product was predicted to be up 2.2 per cent. On an annualized basis it is now down 8 per cent. Seven months after the budget inflation is 11.8 per cent and destroying the purchasing power of virtually every single Canadian, and the prime rate today is 18.25 per cent. The dollar is at an all-time low, housing starts are off 50 per cent over last year, more than 1,000 construction companies have gone bankrupt in the last year, and the budget deficit is touching $20 billion. Because of this budget that deficit is likely going to be closer to $23 billion by the end of this year.

The reason for that is that this budget assumes a major economic recovery in this quarter and the following quarter. Anyone with any economic understanding or with financial know-how will know that as a result of this budget economic recovery is not about to occur. We also find that the decline in industrial capacity will likely continue for a number of months according to all projections, having fallen now for ten consecutive months.

Since the last federal election 18,000 businesses have gone bankrupt. What does that mean? It means that, not counting those who have gone through the process of receivership or all those businesses which simply closed their doors, boarded up their windows and walked away, we are talking about tens of thousands of Canadians who have lost their hopes and dreams along with their life savings as a result of the economic conditions this government has been perpetuating for the last number of years.

However, statistics do not clearly describe the human tragedy and suffering which is occurring in Canada today. They do not describe the fear that people have, the want that so many Canadians are experiencing, or the anxiety and despair. When you have nearly two million people, Mr. Speaker, caught in the web of enforced idleness, what does that do to the health and morale of the country? What does that do to the household where the breadwinner is sitting idle with no hope of finding a job in the immediate future? I suspect that as a result of these conditions, which will be aggravated by the budget of last night, we are going to see an overwhelming wave of protest of discontent and anger unprecedented in Canadian history. It is an understatement to say that the economy is not healthy.

I listened with interest to a number of premiers who were commenting on the budget and saying how it would affect the provinces. Most premiers said they were afraid Canada was heading into a very serious depression, that some sectors of our economy are too far gone now ever to recover properly because they have fallen beyond the point of no return.

If you visit shopping centres and walk up and down the main streets of Canada today, you will notice an absence of people purchasing commodities in businesses, shops and small factories. People do not have the purchasing power they had a year or 18 months ago. People are not buying today because they are unable to do so.

Industrial capacity in our country is operating at less than 70 per cent. Plants are laying off employees and are closing down because no one is purchasing their goods. Offices right across Canada are closing their doors. They are cutting back on staff because no one is using their services. Half of our mines are closed because people are not producing their goods for manufacturing purposes. The saw mills have been laying off employees from one end of Canada to the other. Today in the province of British Columbia nearly one quarter of the IWA membership is laid off because people cannot afford to buy or to build new homes and factories.

People cannot afford to buy goods and services in this country. But how does the government react? The government reacts by raising taxes, by restricting wages and salaries which will keep more money out of the marketplace. This situation reminds me of the old medieval doctor whose idea of assisting his patient was to take a knife and insert it into him to make him bleed. That is kind of methodology the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) is using today. Dr. Allan is asking us to bleed a little more.

I received a telegram this morning from the Community Business and Professional Association of Canada. This telegram states that it is high time workers are not again singled out to take the rap and that well-paid workers are their best customers. The business community of this country is concerned when their customers are no longer employed or are being threatened with lay-off. We know what is happening to the business community of this country. Some token assistance was included in the budget for those businesses interested in expanding, buying new plant equipment and machinery. But what businesses are able to do this? What businesses are in the process of expanding during these times to take advantage of these programs?

Last April a survey was taken by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business. All of the participating businesses were asked how many were planning to expand their plants and how many were not planning to expand operations. Last April's statistics are very interesting. Thirty per cent of those participating said they would be reducing operations; 65 per cent said they would simply try to hang on—not expand—to where they were today; and 5 per cent said they wre considering expanding operations. We all know that things have worsened economically since April. I suspect we are looking at only 2 to 3 per cent of the Canadian business sector that is interested in expanding. That is the kind of percentage of business that may benefit from some of the token business support in this particular budget.

The cruelest blow of all came in the area of taxes. Canadians surely felt betrayed when they saw tax increases. These increases are a result of the deindexation to be introduced following last night's budget. This deindexation step will cost Canadians $1.3 billion. I am sure that measure shocked people across the country. People were looking for some new direction and some new initiative. Instead they found they would be paying more in taxes and were being asked to bail out this government's mismanagement of the economy. Not only were taxes increased right across the board, but certain groups have been identified to pay a particular price and to carry an extra burden. These include our senior citizens, the "wealthy", group. They are the ones being asked to carry an extra burden. The increases they would have expected next year will be less than the rate of inflation. My mother and father are senior citizens. I know what "life of luxury" they lead. They have a difficult time getting by. Last night's news did not come in a very favourable way for them.

What about family allowances? It is interesting to consider that three out of every five working women in this country live below the poverty level, as evidenced in a recent report tabled by the government, and depend on family allowances to assist them in these difficult times. They are struggling to raise a family of one, two or three. They found out, too, that there was good news in the budget for them. They found out that they will not receive the same increases that they normally would next year. I admit the very poor will get a slight increase next year; they will gain 93 cents a week. The very poor will be able to purchase two thirds of a litre of milk extra a week thanks to this budget. That is the kind of progressive legislation which this government is prepared to introduce.

It is interesting that the average family in Canada—if there is such a thing, but I am thinking of two parents and two children with a family income of about $30,000 a year—will lose $125 a year because of the personal exemptions that they will cease to have. They will also lose about $72 a year in family allowances. That is not a major amount, but just the same, during these very difficult times with inflation chasing us at around 11 per cent, having $200 less in the average family income is not the news they were hoping to hear from the Minister of Finance last night.

What is in this budget for the manufacturing sector? One thing all Canadians know is that long-term job security in this country is not in the resource sector, it is not in the energy sector, but in the manufacturing sector. What incentive and encouragement, hope and help did that sector get in this budget? It got absolutely nothing. The most critical sector of our economy got absolutely nothing.

What did the resource sector get? What do I tell my unemployed IWA people in western Canada? What did the budget have for them? What did the budget have for that sector of the economy? It had absolutely nothing.

What about the mining sector? What about the fishing sector? What about the tourist industry? I could go on and on, Mr. Speaker. There is very little in this budget that will assist any of the critical, strategic advantages that we have in some sectors of our economy.

One of the most disappointing features was that research and development have been largely overlooked. The research and development sector is where Canada holds a key in terms of its economic development and its long-term recovery program. We have a well-educated, well-trained population who are able to take advantage of research and development programs in our labs both in the private and public sector. But was there anything in this budget to encourage research and development in Canada, other than a very token amount attached to the Small Business Development Bond program? There was absolutely nothing. This was a real disappointment for those people who are looking for breakthroughs in terms of research and development through to production in Canada.

The Canadian small business sector got welcome news. They found that FIRA is going to be opened up so that more foreign competition can come into the country. Let me remind this House that the Canadian Federation of Independent Business feels very strongly about FIRA. They know that the small business sector of this country is the one sector that virtually is 100 per cent Canadian owned and is the job creator in Canada. This is where research and development takes place. But what assistance did it get in this budget? The floodgates were opened up for FIRA so that we can have more foreign takeovers and more foreign intervention in Canada.

We remind the House that one of the reasons we are facing difficult economic times today is that we have lost control of our economy. The decisions on the Canadian economy are being made in the boardrooms of Tokyo and Dallas instead of Toronto, Vancouver, Halifax and Winnipeg. Thanks to the Minister of Finance, this budget will make that problem even greater.

I recently received some devastating news. A small businessman in my riding who operated a firm which was participating in research and development in the satellite technology field indicated that he had been receiving a very critical component of their operation from a manufacturing firm in Mississauga. He told me that he was grateful for the Canadian involvement in the development of a new product which could be marketed both domestically and internationally. However, he received notice that the New York parent company had advised the Mississauga firm, which was a branch plant, that it could no longer supply the Canadian market because all of the components were needed in New York state. Therefore, this small business which had conducted research and development through to production programming suddenly discovered that it was no longer capable of delivering to its own domestic market as a result of the decision by the parent company in New York state. That is the kind of situation which we must start reversing in Canada and the opening up of the FIRA floodgates is not the direction in which we want to head.

Mr. Crosbie: What inconsistent twaddle!

Mr. Riis: This budget has been misdirected in a number of areas. The government has found the cause of inflation in this country. It is called the public sector. It is the villain that has caused inflation. Of course, the response is to restrain wages and salaries to 6 per cent this year and 5 per cent next year. I would remind hon. members opposite that wage settlements for the last five years in the public sector have fallen behind the private sector and the private sector has fallen behind the rate of inflation. Anyone who says that the public sector is the villain in this inflationary spiral—

Mr. Kristiansen: Is a liar.

Mr. Riis: —is missing the point. A leaked document intended for the cabinet which was written in January of 1981 called "Anti-Inflation Policy Option" said that for PR purposes restricting public sector wages is a good idea, but in terms of having anything to do with reducing inflation in this country it is totally useless. That was from the government's own advisers to the cabinet back in January of 1981.

What will be the result of these restrictions in those communities of Atlantic Canada which depend on the federal and provincial public sector for a major portion of their economic base? We have examples of how wage restraint can be effected. Many of us remember back to 1975 when the Anti-Inflation Board was introduced. The purpose was to reduce inflation in Canada. I remind hon. members opposite that when the Anti-Inflation Board was formed in 1975 the level of inflation was 7.5 per cent. When the guidelines were removed the inflation rate had not gone down but had increased to 9 per cent. Canadians all across Canada had taken devastating wage and salary cuts.

I challenge anyone to show me a credible author, researcher or financier who says that wage controls are a reasonable or workable method of combating inflation, because I suggest they do not.

Of course, these restraints are across the board. But this will not be welcome news to those two out of three women whose incomes fall below the poverty line. Their $12,000 a year will receive a 6 per cent guideline, just as some of those across the way who are making $120,000.

Mr. Kristiansen: Governor Bouey.

Mr. Riis: Is that the kind of equity that we want?

Since the government has indicated that its own regulatory agencies will be following the 6 per cent and 5 per cent guidelines, a good test will involve the energy increases coming up in a few days. The price of oil will be rising 10 per cent on July 1 and the price of gasoline will be increasing by 25 cents per thousand cubic feet on August 1. This presents an excellent opportunity for those members opposite to demonstrate their commitment to this program. Do they have the courage to introduce a limit or a freeze or restriction of 6 per cent on that particular agreement?

Next year the government will have another opportunity to prove its commitment, because in 1983 energy costs will not rise by 10 per cent, 20 per cent or 30 per cent, they are going up over 30 per cent in one year. If that is not the cause of inflation in this country, then I do not know what is.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Riis: Perhaps there is a better way to show its commitment. On Thursday we will likely see an increase in the bank rate. As investors around the world view this particular budget and the direction provided by the government, I believe we will once again see the need for the Bank of Canada to intervene and jack up interest rates. Why not have the Bank of Canada follow the same route and limit any increase in interest to 6 per cent? The bank rate on Thursday will likely be approximately 16.58 per cent. If that were limited to a 6 per cent increase, it would mean that next year the rate would be limited to 17.57 per cent. If the government is to show that kind of commitment to such a program, this would be the type of news that Canadians would probably enjoy hearing.

Mr. Wilson: Do you want interest rates at 17 per cent?

Mr. Broadbent: Even that is too high.

Mr. Riis: Of course that is too high. It would demonstrate a commitment of some kind, but the government is not prepared to do that.

It is our policy to reduce interest rates, because without any reduction in interest rates in Canada there is no hope of any kind of economic recovery program and absolutely no hope of any recessionary turnaround.

With respect to job creation, I do not know how the Minister of Finance had the courage to stand in the House and discuss a job-creation program which would create 100,000 jobs when there are nearly two million Canadians out of work.

Mr. Deans: It is also a lot of nonsense.

Mr. Riis: It is nonsense. It is cosmetic, an ad hoc and band-aid approach. It pales when one considers that although 100,000 jobs may be created, there are nearly two million unemployed. It is MacEachenism all over again.

At this time I wish to propose an amendment on behalf of the New Democratic Party. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent):

That the amendment be amended by inserting thereto, after the word "rates", the following:

"and further for failing to bring about an immediate reduction in interest rates; for increasing the tax burden on lower and middle income Canadians; for failing to implement a strategy to strengthen Canada's job producing industrial capacity; for failing to strengthen FIRA's ability to protect Canadian productive capacity and jobs; for further reducing the purchasing power of many Canadians by instituting wage controls in the public sector; and for reducing pensions and other social programs; therefore—"

I want to comment very briefly on the housing provision that was introduced. After much fanfare the impression was that the housing industry can now begin to take off. The program introduced was to result in a miraculous change with respect to the housing program in Canada. Again, I do not know how the Minister of Finance had the courage to stand up and say that the government was going to make a major commitment to the co-operative housing sector by adding 2,000 more units across Canada. The city of Vancouver alone will take up 2,000 more co-operative housing units, let alone the idea that this will have any meaningful impact across the country.

Considering the $3,000 grant, the problem is not to assemble a downpayment to buy a home these days but, rather, it is what on earth to do with the 20 per cent mortgage. That is what is keeping Canadians from purchasing homes, not the fact that they do not have $3,000 toward a downpayment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Riis: It is interesting to look at the figures. One finds that a typical home in Canada costs $67,500 today. It requires a 10 per cent downpayment which means that, in order to qualify for a mortgage, a family's income would have to be $45,000 per year. The average family income in this country is less than $30,000. What this means is that virtually no Canadian will be able to take advantage of this program. Perhaps there will be a handful of exceptions. I might also add that the government grant might cause some incentive to add $3,000 to the purchase price.

Is there anything in the budget for renters? Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation itself states that half a million low-income renters pay more than 30 per cent of their income for shelter, yet when one considers what this budget will do for the renters of Canada, one finds that it will do very little indeed.

Some hon. Members: Nothing!

Mr. Riis: "Nothing", as a number of my colleagues say, would be closer to the truth.

Mr. Deans: Just adding to their tax burden.

Mr. Riis: As a westerner, I was listening very closely to what the minister had to say concerning the Western Development Fund. I remember that back in 1980 when it was introduced, $4 billion was devoted to assisting western Canadians. Then in the next budget it was reduced to $2.2 billion. In this budget the western development fund is totally non-existent. That is interesting.

Mr. Broadbent: It is the story of the Liberals of western Canada.

Mr. Riis: As the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) indicates, it is the story of the Liberals of western Canada who have met with the same result as the Western Development Fund.

I suspect that in this budget we have seen the beginning of the end of indexing in Canada. It will take $1.3 billion out of the taxpayers' hands and put it into the government's hands, which means, of course, that the government will have a vested interest in inflation. That is very dangerous. This government cannot be disciplined if it has a vested interest in the rate of inflation assisting its cash flow. We see that the budget will protect one group, the investors of Canada. A number of provisions in the budget will assist investors in their problems with inflation, but there is nothing for the average working Canadian.

This was a missed opportunity. The people of Canada were looking to the Minister of Finance to provide them with some hope and a new direction. The opportunity to reduce interest rates was missed. The opportunity to initiate renegotiation of those oil and gas prices was missed. There was an opportunity to cut the taxes of Canadians to enable them once again to purchase goods and services from Canadian manufacturers and suppliers. There was an opportunity really to stimulate housing and to create jobs because of the massive spin-offs from that industry. But that was missed as well.

There was an opportunity to introduce serious procurement policies. When we look at the facts, we find that if Canadians were prepared to use one week's wages to buy Canadian goods as opposed to foreign imports, it would automatically create 25,000 jobs just by that one deed alone. We need to have strong "Buy Canada" programs in place, strong procurement programs in place and strong production agreements with some of the foreign multinationals as well. We should say to the foreign multinationals that if they are to carry on operations in Canada, then they must start providing jobs in this country, not simply use it as a marketplace. We should tell the Japanese auto industry that if it is to provide 200,000 vehicles to Canadian purchasers this year, then it must start sourcing some parts and components and assembling those vehicles in this country as well. In other words, if these multinationals are to gain profits in Canada, then they must start creating jobs in this country as well. That is our bottom line.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Riis: Again, that was a missed opportunity.

There was a missed opportunity to introduce research and development incentives for Canadian companies, individuals and institutions. Of course, there was a whole number of changes for which we were hoping in relation to those who work in the northern parts of Canada. There should be changes in northern benefits for those who must travel and live away from home working in the resource sectors.

There should also be changes in tax deductions for those having to face the burden of child care costs. The budget should have included increases in child tax credits. There are a variety of measures which would be progressive, confidence building and which would send a clear signal to Canadians that this government has a policy and a strategy and that need the co-operation of Canadians from every region. But as a result of the lack of direction and the introduction of punitive measures, Canadians are now pitted against Canadians, regions are pitted against regions and virtually every Canadian is against the Government of Canada. This is the kind of solidarity we have in our country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Mitchell: MacEachen, solidarity forever.

Mr. Riis: I want to end by reading the following quote:

> What we need today are progressive economic, social and financial measures, but we are not getting them. That is why all across this country at the present time there is a rising tide of discontent. We find it everywhere. Criticisms are being levelled against this Parliament; criticisms that in the main I think are unfair are borne out to some extent by this Parliament itself. Today, for example, we have the budget debate; but . . . I counted at one time only 20 government supporters in their seats, and there were not very many more on the opposition benches. That goes to show that Parliament is apathetic, and I believe hon. members of this Parliament are disillusioned. The time has come, I say, when in the Dominion of Canada we need a forward-looking policy for the people of this country, and the government is giving neither the policy nor the leadership necessary to bring about the formation of it.

That was stated by Mr. M. J. Coldwell on April 28, 1939, and it applies today as it applied then.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, let me begin by thanking hon. members of the opposition for their contributions this afternoon. We all know that this is a very serious time. It is a very important debate. We on this side of the House are certainly more than interested in hearing the proposals of hon. members of the opposition, as we are in hearing from all Canadians concerning the ways in which we can come to grips with the economic situation now facing our country. I only regret that in their rush to spill out the recycled speeches of days, weeks, months and years past, hon. members opposite have been neglectful in facing the reality of the present situation.

Once again, we have heard a grand litany of condemnation about the failure of the government and missed opportunity, without ever once referring to the kind of realism which must be faced by any government in this period of time. We heard all the gimmicks. It was like watching the snake oil salesman who has instant anwers to all the problems, except that once again hon. members did not find any way of bringing their remarks together with any consistency, rationality or purpose. In fact, once again we are faced with a very deliberate attempt to distort the basic reality of our economic situation and the answers that we have put forth. I can only say that it was deliberate, because they have done it before and we have tried to correct their indiscretion.

We have had, from the opening moments of the House today, attempts by members opposite in both parties to suggest that the measures introduced last night by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) are somehow going inexorably to tax those with low incomes, that there will be an enormous burden upon the poor. We heard the last speaker from the NDP wax about single parent mothers who unquestionably in our society suffer the most in terms of income support and services. That hon. member neglected to mention, and we can only assume it was a deliberate omission because he is far too intelligent a person to forget such things, that of the 3.5 million women who receive family allowances, 2.5 million receive child credits. Those child credits will in fact be increased this year over and above what the normal increase was expected to be.

That, frankly, was irresponsible. I do not say that in any personal sense, but it is irresponsible of the hon. member to stand up in this House and try to foment fear and anxiety by the proclamation of false information. That is really an irresponsible act by someone who has taken an oath to be a Member of Parliament and to try to maintain some degree of obligation to veracity when he speaks in this House. He was not alone. I do not want to single out that particular member, but that is an example of the kinds of things we have heard all week.

We heard the members from Saskatchewan hooting, hollering, and whooping in the backbenches saying that the western fund has disappeared. It has not disappeared. The very day the budget was released, we had the distribution of the Gilson report which has a $3.2 billion commitment from that western fund to totally modernize western rail transportation. That would create 10,000 new jobs in western Canada based upon that fund.

Members opposite say that fund has disappeared. Of course it has disappeared. It has been put on the table so that farmers, producers, and commodity people in western Canada can put it to work to modernize the railways system in western Canada so that we can move our goods to market, sell and create jobs in Canada. Somehow the hollow head from Churchill (Mr. Murphy) says that that fund has disappeared. The only time we know he is awake is when we hear his head rattle.

An hon. Member: At least he has something in it.

Mr. Axworthy: It is very loose. I do not think this House deserves that kind of misdirection and misinformation.

We are here today to talk about something which we think is important to Canadians, and that is the creation of jobs and work for Canadians. Every budget that is put together reflects or mirrors the reality of a society. It means that we have to make difficult choices. There are infinite demands.

Any one of us, whether within our personal ambitions or in our communities, province or region, have a shopping basket full of demands that we want answered. Unfortunately, the other side of the ledger is that for those infinite demands there is a limited amount of resources. That is the rough part of having to be in government and having to make these tough choices.

Perhaps the inexperienced members in that corner have never experienced, and those in this corner experienced only briefly, the knack of knowing how to provide leadership in this country and making difficult choices in a difficult period of time. There are hard choices, tough ones. We live in a world where there are no easy chances. There are no quick gimmicks.

We have confidence that Canadians are not going to be inveigled by those false prophets. They understand full well that the time has come in Canada to start making tough choices about where we want to go. It is not because we think there has to be some great depression as has been prophesied by members opposite. We realize that the only way we can restore our economy and rewrite the social fabric is to get busy and make those choices that must be made.

The choices are very clearly enunciated in this budget. We want to create work for Canadians. We realize that as events have unfolded and evolved in this country and around the world, one of the critical needs is to make sure that people have work. We feel for the 1.2 million unemployed in this country. There is not a member on this side of the House who has not visited the unemployed in his or her area and talked to unemployed lumberjacks, automobile workers or miners. We know the kind of suffering and anguish suffered by those without work. It is for that reason that the budget of this government has put $2.3 billion on the table which will create in immediate, direct terms 200,000 jobs. That is not something to be swept away, ignored and neglected. That $2.3 billion is a major commitment by this government.

We have heard wild cries of condemnation from members on the other side. They say we are changing the tax system, that we are deindexing down to 5 per cent or 6 per cent for certain tax brackets and changing the pensions and some of the allowances. Yes, we are doing that. We are doing it because we believe there are enough Canadians who feel compassion and concern for their fellow Canadians who are out of work. They are prepared to give up a small portion of their benefits and advantages to help 200,000 Canadians return to work.

We have confidence that there are enough Canadians who are prepared to share their benefits and advantages rather than hoard them in a selfish little pool as members opposite advocate. We strongly believe there are millions of Canadians who realize the time has come when we can no longer retreat into the shell of our own selfishness but must be prepared to share. We must be prepared to share the responsibility and share the resources because we realize that we live in a difficult world.

Members opposite say that somehow the problems faced by the lumber industry can be magically whisked away by one stroke of a pen in a budget. They ignore the fact that 80 per cent of lumber products manufactured in Canada are sold in the United States for housing. They do not seem to recognize that the United States housing market is down this year over last year by over 50 per cent. With the size of the market in this country, even if we spent $10 billion, we could not begin to match the demand of that kind of market in the lumber industry.

Mr. Kempling: They have a million housing starts.

Mr. Axworthy: Yes, but there were two million last year. If the hon. member would only wake up from his 20 years of sleep, he would realize the realities of the world we live in. The fact is that housing production is down 50 per cent. The hon. member will have the opportunity to refute those statistics.

The same is true in the automobile industry. We have internationalized our economies. We have all said it is to the ultimate benefit of our world that we provide for an economy in which there is free trade and a free flow of capital. However, there is a price to be paid for that. The price is that when interest rates go up in the United States, if we in this country do not have some parity in those interest rates, there will be a massive flow of capital out of our country that will provide an enormous deflation of any kind of investment.

The NDP say they would reduce interest rates. What would they do with the hundreds of billions of dollars flowing out of our country? What is their answer? What is their quick fix for that? There are no quick fixes in today's world. We do not want to listen to them any more. We are trying to convince Canadians that it is time to get away from gimmickry and to come to grips with having to make honest, realistic choices based upon the situation.

Let me talk about the whole question of restraint. The Minister of Finance and this government have repeatedly said that we can provide for stability in this country only if we get inflation under control. It is a corrosive, cancerous, deep-rooted sickness in our society that must be eliminated. It must be eradicated if we are to provide for any certainty in investment, any stability in our markets, any sense that one's income has a continuity to it. It is endemic to all countries in this world. We are simply saying that we have to find the ways to convince Canadians, whether it is business, labour, public servants or politicians, that we cannot always be on a happy joyride and that we have to come to grips with the eradication of our fundamental problems.

The federal government, Mr. Speaker, does not have the total dominance over the economy. We are only one aspect. The kind of impact that we can make has declined over the years. Some 20 years ago, 60 per cent of all public sector spending was at the federal level. That has reversed in that period of time; 60 per cent is now spent by the provinces and the municipalities.

What we notice with a great deal of sorrow and sometimes frustration is that their wage settlements are running at 13 per cent and 14 per cent, that they are not only above the private sector but way above federal sector settlements. Nevertheless, we still believe that we have to set some direction, some standard, some measurement, some purpose in society by giving leadership and showing where we can go.

We are not doing it by taking on public servants as victims or by picking upon them. We are simply saying that these are people in our society who have protection, who have job security, who have an advantage that many other workers do not have. As Minister of Employment and Immigration I go weekly to talk with people who are being laid off and are suffering the miseries of the market because the mining industry cannot sell its product or because the automobile manufacturers cannot sell their cars. They would like the same kind of security and protection that people in other industries have, including those in the public service. We are simply saying to those Canadians who have the advantage, who have the benefit of a degree of permanency, of security of income and of jobs, that surely they can be prepared to share some of their resources with those who do not have that same degree of security.

That is what we are putting on the table and saying that there is a trade-off to be made. We find it surprising, Mr. Speaker, that certain labour leaders—not all but some labour leaders—are saying they will fight this to the death. I find that they are saying, in effect, that they are going to oppose measures that would give their own brothers and sisters in other unions a chance to go back to work. They are saying: "We are prepared to protect our own turf and territory and sacrifice other workers who cannot get jobs". That is really what they are saying. Mr. Speaker, that is a serious condemnation. That is the kind of attitude we must defeat. The kind of appeal we are making is for members opposite to forget the kind of partisan nit-picking they have been engaged in in this House. We need to recruit their responsibility and their co-operation in trying to change those attitudes.

Mr. Blackburn: More jobs.

Mr. Axworthy: We hear from the member from Brant (Mr. Blackburn), who, by the way, is a Member of Parliament who came to my office time and time again, saying: "Please create work in the high unemployment market in my community." This the government did, so that we now have a labour system and investment going in this community. And now he is being opposed to it.

Mr. Blackburn: On a point of order, I would like to remind the minister that since he came to Brantford the unemployment rate has gone up and not down.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The point of order is not well taken. Members can only be recognized in their place.

Mr. Axworthy: I would be glad to point out to the hon. member, and to his constituents in particular, that if he now wants to withdraw and let them have his resignation, I am sure they would be glad to respond to his request. I am sure that the people in his constituency would have a point of view very different from his.

We are making an appeal to Canadians, Mr. Speaker, to come to grips with the fact that we must deal with the problem of inflation. We must ask them to accept restraints not just on their wages but also on prices and allowances and on pensions. In that way we can provide some basic signposts, some directions for the others to follow. We have invited the premiers to Ottawa to ask them if they are prepared to do the same in their areas of responsibility. We hope that those who come will follow and that the private sector will follow as well.

We also realize, Mr. Speaker, that the turning around of the Canadian economy is like trying to steer a big ship; you can turn the wheel, but it has a long, long turning arc and it will take time. In the meantime, in between periods, there are many Canadians out of work. That is why we felt it was absolutely imperative that we put measures into this budget that provide for immediate job creation across Canada, that give Canadians the opportunity to begin going to work right away.

We have included in this budget, Mr. Speaker, a number of initiatives that can be applied to different regions, to different groups, to help them respond to the problem of unemployment. There is an increase of $450 million for direct job creation; that was put in the budget last night. It raises direct spending on direct job creation to its highest level ever in this country.

In this one fiscal year alone we will be spending over $658 million on direct job creation. The $450 million will create some 70,000 additional jobs. If we add that to the 131,000 jobs already being created over the period, we have in direct job creation measures over 200,000 additional jobs being offered to Canadians through the direct employment policies of this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: Those 200,000 jobs are not thrown out at random, as advocated by the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson). He asked that we just give tax credits, give tax credits to everyone. We do not believe in that, Mr. Speaker. We believe that at this time we must target our approaches; we must zero in on where the problems are most extreme and where they are most difficult. That is why we use direct job creation to go into the areas of chronic or high unemployment, where the work is seasonal, or where there have been a large number of lay-offs. We have used the Canada development project to go into areas where there have been major lay-offs, whether it is Windsor, Brantford, Newfoundland or Vancouver Island. We have done that in order to help those workers restore their benefit and to have work in between times.

We are using that type of project so that the native people can build housing. We have heard great cries of lament in the past: "What are you doing for the native people?" One of the purposes of the job-creation program is to deal with the labour component of major housing programs across Canada. Those community development projects are often scoffed at by some members, who say that they are only band-aids or make-work projects. What they are really doing, Mr. Speaker, is helping to rebuild our community. We are building shipping units, we are building fishing wharfs, we are putting money into housing, we are putting money into new community facilities. In fact, Mr. Speaker, over 60 per cent of the community development projects goes into construction-related activities.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, over 40 per cent of those who become enrolled in those projects are young people. They are perhaps those who need the greatest help at this point in time. These direct employment projects are particularly targeted to the needs of the young. They need that first-time job experience to get a job record in the employment market.

That, Mr. Speaker, is where the community development projects are going. It is our intention again this summer to meet with business and labour to talk about a new development strategy for young people, so that they can begin targeting in on how they can get jobs, new jobs, with the assistance of industry. We can set up new centres across the country, give special attention to that hard core of structurally unemployed young people. These are the people who too often are on the sidelines. We want to begin taking special measures for them and we now have the funds and resources that we can allocate to those kinds of programs.

That is why we ask other Canadians to help in these efforts, to help native people build housing, to help people in the Gaspé or in Newfoundland or on Vancouver Island to go back to work. That is the kind of measure that we are promoting.

That is not the only housing measure that we have created in this area. We also have within the budget a major stimulus in the housing market. I find it very surprising, Mr. Speaker, having listened carefully to remarks of members opposite, to hear them saying: "Do something for the housing market". Let me just give an example of what the budget will do. Between the rental units applied and cited last March by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove) and those announced today, something like 54,000 new jobs will be created over the next two years.

The Canada home renovation plan, which was mentioned last night, will create something like 20,000 new jobs. We launched last night a $300 million program for first time home buyers of existing homes and new construction that will provide direct assistance to close on 100,000 purchasers in this country and should create and stimulate 50,000 additional jobs. What this in fact totals up to over that period of time in the housing market alone is over 124,000 new jobs created directly by that stimulus in the housing construction market. Right now, the moment the budget was announced, those measures are available to go into place. One hundred twenty-four thousand additional jobs will be created because of those housing measures.

It seems odd that those facts were somehow forgotten by hon. members opposite. Somehow they managed to forget that particular stimulus. In addition to the 200,000 jobs which are being created through our direct employment measures, we are creating 124,000 jobs through the stimulus in this budget provided by its housing measures.

In addition to that a third part of the job creation initiative was an additional $300 million going to economic development programs. The hon. member asks what is going to research, what is going to manufacturing and what there will be by way of aids to industry. Is the hon. member indifferent to an additional $300 million going to various programs, going into productivity increases, going into investment programs and going into research and development programs? How do hon. members opposite think we are able to develop major programs like the Bombardier project which is providing 20,000 jobs? We are able to do that through the expenditures in the economic development envelope. The Minister of Finance has put an additional $300 million forward through the budget. The hon. member raised the question; we have just given him the answer. The money is going to create direct supports and incentives for private industry in those areas, to say nothing of the special grant going to small business. Hon. members somehow have conveniently overlooked and not talked about that; they do not want to talk about the truth or face the reality because that does not fit their own orthodoxes.

Mr. Wilson: The reality is there.

Mr. Axworthy: The reality is that we are again using resources. Hon. members ask what the money is going for. The $2.3 billion is going to create permanent long-term jobs through economic development programs, going into housing construction to create work in the housing field and the construction field across Canada, going into direct employment programs to help those young people who need first-time jobs and going into new ILAP programs so that we can help additional communities and the hon. member for Brant will not be the only one whose constituency gets those kinds of benefits, ungrateful as the hon. member may be. The fact is that that is the combination of programs we are providing for Canadians.

We are asked whether they are providing hope, direction and purpose. I think we should begin to look at what the figures really add up to. When we talk about jobs created in total by way of direct job creation in housing immediately in terms of this budget, we are talking about an additional 124,000 jobs, by estimate. We must add that to the previous programs announced, the existing job-creation programs already in our portfolios, plus the rental supply program and the renovations program. That is an additional 200,000 jobs. We are talking in terms of direct stimulus through this budget creating well over 300,000 additional employment opportunities to be provided to Canadians within this fiscal year.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: That is by way of combination, but I point out that that has not been the only series of measures we have undertaken. We are just now going through the last stages of debate in the Senate of the training bill which was passed in this House last week. That legislation will put $1 billion into community colleges and industry and on-the-job training programs across Canada. It will provide new training opportunities for over 300,000 Canadians. That will provide for additional funds going into those places to provide new equipment and new facilities.

In terms of a larger growth strategy and in terms of the longer-term program of aiming at economic development, we must go back to the last November budget papers in which we put forward a series of measures. Those are also proceeding at the same time. The training bill provides $1 billion. The modernization of the transportation system in western Canada is a $13 billion program with $3.5 billion being contributed by the national government. Major programs are going ahead in the areas of research and the establishment of microelectronic centres across Canada to develop research and development in that critical area of microchip programs. The measures brought in in this budget to provide a special response and direction must be looked at in parallel with the measures introduced last November, which are proceeding and are now being implemented and brought into effect to provide for some direction.

One thing I will say is that this government does not believe it can do all this by itself. We cannot do it alone. We must have the co-operation of the other levels of government, which should also be prepared to provide restraints in their spending, restraints on their incomes and restraints on their prices so that we do not have extravagant settlements which will price us out of international markets. We need the same kind of discipline, restraint and commitment to be shown by trade union leaders and business executives at bargaining tables and when it comes to decisions on pricing goods. There really must be a coalition to deal with the economic crisis. We must develop a basic sense of unity among Canadians.

I say in closing that the difficulties we have at this point in the history of our country can only be frustrated by the divisiveness and misinformation we hear from certain hon. members opposite who seem to have objectives in mind other than the objective of trying to come to grips with the economic problems faced by Canada. No one will deny them their partisan advantages and their reasons for trying to get a few more points here and there on some pool or other. But surely the time has come for all Canadians to pull together in this effort and not listen to siren calls. We must come to grips with the fact that if we are going to deal with the economic situation in Canada, we must deal with it together, working in a co-operative fashion and putting forward, each of us, our best talents and resources in the most effective way possible.

That is the kind of partnership we need in this country. We need a partnership toward progress and a partnership toward recovery. We must ignore the calls of depression and frustration we hear from hon. members opposite. It is time we heard calls for unity, purpose and progress. That is the one thing this government is prepared to provide to Canadians.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I just want to deal for a moment with the last speaker, who illustrates why this country is in the difficulties it is in and why the people of this country no longer have any confidence in this government. The minister who just sat down has told us all the things the government is doing for job creation. Why, then, do we have 1.2 million unemployed, if there is such a wonderful program? Why would the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) not even put in his budget a forecast for unemployment if the government is so confident that it is going to create as many jobs as it says? For the first time in our history the Minister of Finance does not include in his budget a forecast of unemployment for the rest of this year or for next year, but we have this minion of his getting up in the House and telling us about the great job programs he has.

He has nothing. He tells us he is putting $2.3 billion on the table. Where did he get the $2.3 billion? He got it from the old age pensioners by stopping indexing of pensions for the old age pensioners. He stopped the indexing for those on family allowances. He stopped the indexing for the personal income taxpayers of this country, so that they are only going to be indexed next year to 6 per cent and then 5 per cent. That is where he got the money he says he is laying on the table, and then he juggles words in his budget and reannounces, two or three times, things already announced before.

What summarizes the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) is this: he said in this House when he was housing critic for the Liberal opposition on October 29, 1979:

> If there is a requirement to raise interest rates, there is an equal requirement to help those people who are hurt by those interest rate increases.

The mortgage interest rate then was 12 per cent. That hypocrite has been in this House and in the government during times when mortgage interest rates went to 22 per cent, and he did nothing, nor did his government, to help those people interest rates were hurting. "An equal requirement to help those who were hurt by those interest rate increases." He is a mountebank, Mr. Speaker. He is a poseur, Mr. Speaker. He is a cheap bluff, Mr. Speaker. He is a trickster, Mr. Speaker. He is a man who does not practise what he preaches, and therefore his words in this House are utterly unconvincing to anyone who listens to him and knows what his shameful record is. It is shameful.

Mr. Fisher: What about giving us a few ideas?

Mr. Crosbie: Just wait. There is a great wind rushing around in the head of the hon. member and coming out of his two ears because there is nothing in there to fill the gap, Mr. Speaker. If he will listen he will hear a few things.

In the Ottawa Citizen today there is a report of a housewife, I believe, called Kathy Lafrange who summed up the situation perfectly. She says, "It's the poor buggers like us, and all the others, who feel it when they have to renew mortgages." She says that the Minister of Finance has not really changed a thing but has just shuffled some things around and now has a deficit of nearly $20 billion. That sums it up. The public knows what this budget is. It has not changed a thing. Poor MacEachen has just shuffled some things around and now he has a deficit of $20 billion. The public knows what is being attempted.

I was minister of finance briefly and I brought a budget into this House on December 11, 1979. I have nothing to be ashamed of, thank God. It was fair, it was square shooting and when you heard it you understood it. There was no peculiar language in it. There was nothing tricky. You did not have to comb through every word to see what was there. You knew there was a tax increase if there was a tax increase and you knew there was not if there was not. You knew there was a new program if there was a new program. Had that budget been implemented and not stopped by the Liberal-NDP coalition who were together then and are together now, although the NDP want to absolve themselves from responsibility, we would not be in the economic situation we are in today. We would be in far better economic shape. We would not have 1.2 million unemployed, a cost of living increase of 11.8 per cent and interest rates of 18 and 20 per cent.

The minister did not wear new shoes last night, Mr. Speaker, he wore sneakers. That is his technique—the sneaking technique, the tricky technique. That is the hallmark of this budget; it is tricky, it is complicated, it is devious, it decreases understanding, it is the old shell game so that you do not know which shell the pea is under. Every word has to be watched and in order to get the real meaning you have to leave the budget speech and go to the details of the budget. It is just like his last two budgets.

The tragedy is that there is no longer any thrust or any pretence of a thrust or strategy to get us out of this economic chaos. There is no longer a pretence that the government has a plan, no longer a pretence that it has a hope. All it has done is devise two or three little programs so that its members can go back and pretend to the farmers, the small-business men and the unemployed that it is doing something for them when it is doing nothing.

Just seven and a half months ago it told us what its philosophy was. It told us it had the answer. I refer to page 11 of the budget of November 12, 1981, where the following passage occurs:

> The fundamental response of the government to the interest rate problem has been the basic deficit-reduction strategy of this budget. By tightening fiscal policy and reducing the deficit even more than had been planned a year ago, the government is strengthening the over-all thrust of its anti-inflation strategy and relieving the burden which would otherwise fall upon the Bank of Canada. In recent weeks there has been some decline in interest rates, amounting to about 4 percentage points for short-term rates. The mortgage rate has fallen below 20 per cent. The government is confident that its policy will gradually bring down the rate of inflation and that this will be reflected in further declines of interest rates.

Seven and a half months ago the government's fundamental strategy was said to be a deficit reduction strategy and everything else hinged on that. What has happened since? In that budget the minister said we would have a deficit of $10.5 billion, but now, seven and a half months later, the deficit has increased by $9.1 billion to about $20 billion. Everybody in his department should be fired for making an estimate seven and a half months ago that the deficit would be $10.5 billion when it is now almost double that. Can such incompetence or such deliberate deceit be tolerated? It is either monumental incompetence or deliberate fraud and deceit that has been practised upon the Canadian people.

What has happened to the deficit reduction strategy? In the last budget the deficit was $10.5 billion and now it is $20 billion. According to the budget of seven and a half months ago, the government was going to borrow $6.6 billion in the public debt market for financial requirements. Now it is going to borrow $17.1 billion, an increase of $10.5 billion or 2.5 times more than it was. In just seven and a half months the government's borrowing requirements have increased 2.5 times to $17 billion. It will compete with the provinces and the private sector and the person who wants a mortgage to borrow that money and will force interest rates up.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Minister of Finance and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) went to Versailles where they told President Reagan that he would have to reduce his deficit because that was the only way the world could be saved economically. They told him that he could not bring interest rates down unless he brough his deficit down. Mr. Speaker, the deficit in the United States is $103 billion and its economy is ten times the size of ours! In U.S. terms, our deficit would be $200 billion. Yet our representatives told the President of the United States what he had to do. Now we see what they have done. They have a deficit twice that of the United States. So much for their strategy of seven and a half months ago.

In the lockup we asked about the government's strategy to overcome inflation and bring down interest rates, but no one could tell us what it was. There is no strategy. The government is in a whirlpool. It has Canada in the centre of the pool. We are becalmed and the government does not know what to do. All it can offer is a few little political palliatives in an effort to satisfy its sheeplike backbenchers and get them through the summer so that they will continue to vote with the government and keep it in power. All it wants is to be in power, event though it is bankrupt of ideas, bankrupt of action and is bankrupting this country.

Never has a minister of finance of this country so demeaned himself as has this minister from Cape Breton. On page 2 of his budget speech he referred to the United States and all the industrialized countries of Europe, saying that they created additional hardship for Canadians. He said: "Their governments are unable or have not chosen to design their economic policies to help us get out of the recession." Imagine, Mr. Speaker; the Minister of Finance says that the governments of the United States, Germany, Belgium and Luxembourg have not designed their economic policies to help us out of the recession! Of course not. They devise their economic policies to get themselves out of recession and it is up to the Government of Canada to devise policies to get us out of the recession. But the Minister of Finance complains that the other countries have not devised policies to get us out of the recession. This is how we are led, Mr. Speaker. This group is leading us blindly to disaster and does not even have the good grace to take the blame and responsibility but wants to blame everything on the United States and the western European countries. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fisher) is looking bedazzled. He does not know what it is all about but he will when the next election comes around.

You will notice, Mr. Speaker, that there is not a word in the budget about monetary policy. I think it is peculiar that the government should bring in a document which deals with our financial and economic position, in which high interest rates form the cross upon which Canada is being crucified, but the budget does not once discuss monetary policy or say whether the government will continue to support the Bank of Canada or direct it to reduce interest rates or even print more money to meet this gigantic deficit. Monetary policy is not discussed in this document. It is a complete admission that the government is bankrupt of ideas.

Today the markets are shaky, the dollar is down and all our other problems continue. The government has admitted that the gross national product will decrease by 2 per cent this year. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance yawns. He does not care if the gross national product declines by 2 per cent. That means that the goods and services manufactured in Canada this year will decrease. There will be less for all at the end of 1982 under the stewardship of the government, but it does not care. As long as it can remain in power and have the perks and the executive jet aircraft—and two new ones have been ordered at a cost of $27 million to fly members opposite around Canada so that they can look down and see the carnage below—it does not care.

There is no forecast of unemployment in the budget. That is the devious Minister of Finance; if you do not like the forecast your people give you, you do not include a forecast in your budget. There is no forecast for inflation or just about anything else.

The interest on the public debt, Mr. Speaker, has gone up 21.1 per cent this year. Just seven months ago the minister forecast interest costs of $16.5 billion; it has now gone up by $1.1 billion. Just about one out of every five dollars that the government spends will be spent on interest. That is where we are headed. We look at the paper today and see the latest figures on what Canada owes the rest of the world. Canada was $90 billion in the red on its balance of payments in 1981, up from an estimated $78 billion one year earlier. The $90 billion is the net balance that we owe the rest of the world, which is a record. We are sliding further and further into debt to the rest of the world.

Is there any plan to deal with that in the budget? Not at all. Is there any concern? Not at all. This budget does not even revoke last November's budget; it is still there. That budget, the most hated document ever delivered in this House in our history, still lives. Departmental officials have told us that there were 25 changes up until yesterday, and eight more in last night's budget. There have been 33 backward steps taken by this minister but he has still left intact many damaging items from the last budget which increases the uncertainty.

For example, Mr. Speaker, there is not a word said about northern allowances. The minister is still determined to tax northern allowances, as he promised to do in his budget of seven months ago. Just look at how uncertain he remains. Instead of trying to make everything clear and certain so that the public and the investor can understand, if we look at page 6 of the budget we see the minister saying first that he has proposals to reduce the taxation of investment income and interest rates to borrowers. There is a new form of term deposit and a new scheme which applies to common shares of Canadian corporations so you will not be taxed on your inflationary gains. But then he says these measures are not going to be implemented now; there is going to be a committee which will look at them. That, of course, creates tremendous uncertainty from now until the end of September when that committee is supposed to report and the government is supposed to make a decision. So there is no certainty for the investor here. They are going to hold their money, not knowing whether these devices will come into effect.

Then at the top of page 7 we see he is only going to postpone for one year the 12.5 per cent corporate distributions tax. Then we see that the proposals related to the deduction of interest expense will be reviewed. Just reviewed. A little further down we see that the precise drafting of these income tax amendments affecting life insurance and charitable foundations are delayed. On and on it goes, Mr. Speaker—uncertainty. The people who have money to invest, foreign and domestic, will not invest it while all this uncertainty remains. No one can estimate the damage that this uncertainty is doing to Canada.

I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that this country is in the middle of a full-blown financial crisis. Long-term debt markets are all gone, no one will lend money long term. There is a crisis of confidence. Both the stock market and the bond market are in great trouble. Yet instead of encouraging a new high level of savings by encouraging, for example, the RRSPs, the government has done the opposite and is going to borrow two and a half times what it said it was going to borrow. At the same time it is doing nothing to encourage savings.

The financial requirements of the government as a percentage of our GNP have reached the highest in our history. With this uncertainty and with the condition of some of our major companies such as Dome Petroleum, to which the government had to give a $100 million guarantee several days ago because it is on the verge of going under as a result of this government's energy policy and its own impetuosity urged on by the government, anything can happen in the markets. If there is an emergency, a fire, you do not discuss it for three or four months, you do not consult with the person whose home is burning down; you hand them a bucket of water immediately. Our financial markets are burning down and the government wants to spend from now until the end of September discussing what is to be done during the emergency. It is just the opposite of what is needed.

This whole budget document is riddled with deception. But one of the worst pieces of deception is the deindexing of income tax which the government has now engaged in. That was instituted by Mr. John Turner in his budget of February, 1973 and he adopted the principle which was suggested by Mr. Bob Stanfield. At the time Mr. Turner brought in indexation the inflation rate was 7.5 per cent. Today it is 11.8 per cent, more than 4 per cent higher, so people are suffering far more from inflation today than they were in the days that John Turner brought in this reform which was suggested and urged on him by Mr. Stanfield. He said in his speech:

> I am deeply concerned about inflation and the effect that inflation has on a tax system which is based on a progressive rate schedule. I therefore propose to take steps now to provide a lasting solution to this problem should inflation continue.

Well, it certainly has continued under this government. He then went on to say:

> —an increase in a person's income may be real or simply the result of inflation. Put another way, if a man gets a five per cent raise in salary, but the cost of living has also increased 5 per cent, he has the same real purchasing power he had before, and nothing more. Yet, the progressive tax system can leave him worse off than he was before because he has entered a higher tax bracket. What I want to do is eliminate that unfair and unintended result from our tax system.

If it was unfair in 1973, it is even more unfair now in 1982 with inflation far worse than it was then. But this Minister of Finance is now going to go back to unfairness; he is going to cap the indexing of income tax to 6 per cent this year and 5 per cent the year after. Mr. Turner went on to say:

> The indexing of rates and exemptions will produce a tax liability which will no longer erode a person's purchasing power as a result of inflation interacting with the progressive tax system. A person will no longer pay tax at a higher marginal rate simply because inflation swept him up into a higher tax bracket. For a person on a fixed income the result of indexing would be to reduce his taxes each year if prices rise.

That is all now going to be reversed. He went on to say:

> —this new system will be recognized everywhere as a bold and sensitive response to a rather fundamental tax problem.

Well, the boldness and insensitivity are not recognized by the present Minister of Finance and the government of which he is part. Here is this very bold and sensitive reform which the government is now reversing just at a time, Mr. Speaker, when President Reagan and the United States of America are adopting the indexing of the income tax system. It is also a fact that the effect of this move is going to be felt most by those on lower incomes. They will suffer the largest percentage increase in tax. Next year the government is going to take $1,300,000,000 more from Canadians in income tax than this year because of deindexation. Of course, it is also going to make those who receive family allowances and old age pensions suffer.

This is the start of the doing away with deindexing. Why is this so? Because the government is unable to control its spending. The government is forced to deindex because it is unable to control its spending. In the year the Prime Minister came to power, the total spending of the Canadian government was less than the budget deficit this year of $20 billion. Canada's total spending in 1968-69 when this profligate wastrel Prime Minister took over was less than the deficit this year because of the government's inability or unwillingness to control its spending. Now the government is going to take it out on the ordinary person.

Has the government indexed energy prices? My friends to the left have mentioned that the government has not done that. Energy prices will rise far beyond 6 per cent this year and 5 per cent next year. Has the government deindexed energy taxes—the petroleum compensation charge, the Canadian ownership charge and all of the other indirect taxes? The government is collecting $8 billion more in indirect taxes from the Canadian people this year than it did last year. Has the government reduced those taxes? No, the government has not. The government has not reduced anything. It has not deindexed anything. The government has deindexed the only benefits people receive.

Now let me talk about unemployment insurance. The minister in his usual devious way does not tell us that by the beginning of the next calendar year he will have a huge deficit increase in the UIC fund. This year it is $5.6 billion. There will be a projected deficit of something like $2.2 billion according to the minister's documents. When the government sets the rates at the end of this year for 1983, there will be a huge increase in the rates to be paid by the employer and by all the millions of people employed in Canada. That is a tax increase about which the government has not told the Canadian public. This will add about $2,600,000,000 to the tax increases which the people who face deindexation will have to stand and bear next year. There is not a word about that in the budget. There is no frankness, there is no honesty, and there is no willingness to tell the public what it faces. There is a pretence that the minister is being bold and that he is asking us all to share equally in the sacrifices. But he does not tell us what the sacrifices really are.

Mr. Taylor: Heaven help Canada.

Mr. Crosbie: I am looking at page 12 of the Budget Papers. It is shocking what the English language has come to. By the way, the government's new expenditures this year add up to $700 million, not $2.3 billion. The government is just jiggling its numbers to get to $2.3 billion. But do you know what one of the savings is that this government has, Mr. Speaker? One of the areas of saving, we are told, is in military pay savings and defence spending; reprofiling. What the hell is defence reprofiling? How do you achieve a saving by reprofiling? Who are we supposed to be? How innocent and stupid are we supposed to be to believe that there is some great saving to come from defence spending reprofiling?

I referred earlier to other examples where deception is practised on the people of Canada. For instance, the $3,000 grant for housing aid. The government does not say that in order to qualify for this grant of $3,000 you have to have a 10 per cent downpayment. That is not mentioned in the budget speech given here last night to which the people of Canada were listening. That item is in the Budget Papers where some of the conditions are itemized. Do not look for a $3,000 grant to buy a new house this year unless you have a 10 per cent downpayment. This is the kind of thing practised throughout that document.

Then we are told there will be great benefits for small business and farmers, and fishermen. The same thing happens with the section on small business. Small business is led to believe that great things will happen. But when you look at the Budget Papers, particularly page 23, and you get down to brass tacks, you will see that the loans and grants promised will only be available if you buy new depreciable property to be used in an active business in Canada. If you are in financial difficulty, you are not in any position to buy new depreciable property or to finance expenditures on scientific research. How many small businesses in this country will rush out to finance expenditures on scentific research in order to get the 4 per cent interest rate reduction which this government promises? When you look at the small print, it is not at all what it seems.

Fishermen were told by the Minister of Finance last night that they were included in all of these wonderful things. They are not. The fishermen are only included, in so far as they are small-business men, if they want to buy depreciable property. How many fishermen in Newfoundland this year can afford to buy depreciable property for which they will get a grant equal to 4 per cent of the 18 per cent, 20 per cent or 22 per cent interest rate? There is no help for fishermen.

There is a special section for farm financial assistance which gives a little bit to the farmer. Out of $200 million, the government is allocating $100 million to the program. But even there it is not what the minister pretends it to be in the budget speech—that tricky and deceiving budget speech in which he specializes. You will see all through this document the practice of deceit and deception by the minister. He cannot give an honest report to the people of Canada. He cannot bare his chest and really share with us. He has no program of recovery. All he can depend upon now is this little pea under the shell game that promises hope for farmers, fishermen, small-business men and people who need housing, but they will be sadly disappointed. Where is the help for the person who has already lost his or her home? Is that $3,000 grant for a new house going to help the person who has lost his home? Where is the help for the small-business man who is already bankrupt or the small-business man now going bankrupt? What about the farmers who have gone out of business? It is all a charade. There is no hope for recovery.

Then we hear the so-called Minister of Employment and Immigration speak. He is the minister of unemployment. He announces all his job-creation programs. These programs were already announced in Newfoundland. One Member of Parliament put out a household bulletin listing some of the projects before the budget even came down. That is how honest that announcement is. Government members announce things five or six times. They let a few days pass by and they announce programs again. People are supposed to believe that this is a great new burst of funds for job-creation programs.

There is no hope for recovery. This country has no hope for recovery whatsoever with the persons who are now in power—the Prime Minister, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) and the Minister of Finance. I call them the economic horsemen of the apocalypse. Never has a Minister of Finance so abused his trust. He reminds me of the ancient mariner. I want to conclude my speech by quoting from the great poem "The Rime of the Ancient Mariner" as follows:

> Alone, alone, all, all alone,
> Alone on a wide wide sea!
> And never a saint took pity on > My soul in agony.

That will be the hallmark of this Minister of Finance. This Minister of Finance, like the ancient mariner, has an albatross around his neck. That albatross is the economic corpse that he has left in this country. It is the economic condition of this country that is around the minister's neck as he goes through the rest of his life "alone, alone on a wide wide sea" with the economic albatrosses that are found in every part of Canada from Newfoundland to British Columbia, to the Yukon to the Northwest Territories. This is a country full of economic damage which the government could have prevented. Even now it will not reverse its course or admit that it is wrong. The only thing it can do is to get out and let the Canadian people put someone in who can do the job, and honest job for them.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, I will not, of course, attempt to answer the observations of the hon. member from Newfoundland for whom I have a great admiration and a certain envy, I suppose, for his facility with words and his colourful expressions. I am sure when he spoke about deception that he was not referring to his definition of deficit in comparing it to per capita rather than to the GNP. I am sure the hon. member will not mind if I put some facts in Hansard dealing with the deficit, although that will not be my main thrust today.

However, it might be of interest to members here to know that in 1942 and 1943 the deficit in this country represented over 20 per cent of the GNP. The only meaningful ratio when defining or discussing a deficit is in its relation to the GNP, which is the ability to repay that deficit sooner or later.

It might surprise some hon. members to know that after the budget last night the OECD papers indicate that that ratio in Canada will be 5.2 per cent next year and that in the United States the ratio will be 5.4 per cent. Our ratio compares favourably with that of most trading partners. As I have already mentioned, it is but a fraction of a ratio in relation to the GNP which prevailed during the war years of 1942 and 1943. I do not become overly concerned about a deficit, an attitude which, I admit, may be unorthodox. I would only worry about the deficit if we printed money to offset it, because this would be inflationary.

In what little research I have conducted I have failed to come across any concrete examples in North America, Canada or the United States, where the government and private enterprise have had to fight for the same pool of capital. I want to talk in a serious vein because as the former minister of labour and manpower, one who really cares for this country, I have always had a concern for the unemployed. I am old enough to remember the hungry thirties. When I tend to get callous around this place, I reread the book entitled "The Ten Lost Years" to remind me of the impact of the recession or depression in the west. I want to say to those people who are listening that the first thing that we must do to move toward recovery is to appraise realistically what we can do as a nation and a government. For instance, there is nothing the government can do about the price of commodities. There is nothing the government can do about the fact that copper is selling at 58 cents a pound, which is a historic low that has been unmatched since the 1930s. This situation exists as well for resources such as zinc, lead, and lumber. While this is of very little consolation to our hard-pressed mining industry and to those who live on the production of natural resources, I do not believe that even our greatest critics would presume for a moment that there is anything we can do as a country to increase the cost of these commodities. Sooner or later the economic fortunes of our trading partners will improve. Copper, silver, gold, zinc and lumber will increase in price. Therefore, the very important question for the country to ask is: will we be in a position to take advantage of the economic resurgence of our trading partners? Will we be competitive in six months, nine months or one year from now, or even sooner, when our traditional trading partners turn to Canada to see what the cost of our raw materials will and should be?

We will not be competitive with a 12 per cent inflationary rate, and this is the message which I think must be echoed again and again in Canada. With a 12 per cent inflation rate we are running the risk of pricing ourselves out of the competitive market. I believe that most Canadians appreciate and understand that fact.

Inflation is something that we cannot ignore, although most of us do. Ironically, unlike unemployment where everyone is a loser, there are winners and losers in the fight against inflation. My favourite economist, Lester Thurow, wrote a book just two years ago. I know that the hon. member who just sat down read that book. Thurow talks about a zero-sum society. He lists the winners and the losers in the fight against inflation. It is very easy to discern who the winners are at the present time. They are very decent Canadians who are listening to this debate. They are those people with money in the bank; senior citizens, young people, people who have saved money which they have earned or have invested. Their money is in the bank earning 16 per cent, 17 per cent or 18 per cent interest rates. They are the winners right now. Ironically, inflation works to their benefit.

Other winners are those who have their wages or income totally insulated from the negative impact of inflation through COLA clauses. Other winners are those with job security who are hardly affected by inflation. I do not begrudge them their insulation. I derive no pleasure from categorizing them as winners, and I do not use it as a derogatory term. Perhaps it is just my way of stating the facts.

The losers in the fight against inflation are the ones who concern me. They are obvious to all of us who care. They are the 1.2 million Canadians who are unemployed through no fault of their own. They are the ones whom Thurow described as the inflation fighters. They are the 1.2 million Canadians out of work because of the tight monetary policy of this government—a legitimate tight monetary policy which exists in virtually every industrialized country of the world.

It is not hard to tell who the losers are. Other losers are the small-business men who, because of the American interest rate policy and our inability to ignore that policy, must borrow to survive, to meet their payroll and cash flow, let alone just expand their businesses. Unless things improve small-business men are destined eventually to go bankrupt in large numbers, if it has not already happened. As well, larger business concerns—some of them household names—have cash flow problems. I could go on and on listing the losers, according to Thurow.

The point I am making is that the Liberal government made it very clear last night in the budget that we feel it is time to share the burden in the fight against inflation. It is time for those of us who are fortunate enough to be categorized winners to assume our moral and legal obligation to spread the impact of inflation in Canada. I do not regret for one minute the increase in my taxes or the deindexation if that money, when pooled with that of all other members of the House and other Canadians who may not have to be concerned about inflation or unemployment, can assist in providing funds at least to soften the negative impact of inflation on less fortunate Canadians.

Mr. Riis: What about people making $12,000?

Mr. Mackasey: The hon. member, one of my favourites, should not interrupt, because when we subsidized interest rates last night for the small-business man, the farmer and the fisherman, we subsidized those people who until last night had to fight against inflation in Canada by themselves.

What we did last night is in good Liberal tradition and overdue by my standards, if I may say so. Some of the real losers in the fight against inflation were those young Canadians who purchased a home. I have bought homes in my day when it was necessary to pool our money, when two spouses who went out to work had to cut expenses in order to put down a downpayment on a home. We knew we could meet those downpayments as long as no unforeseen circumstances arose. In the old days it was sickness that you did not want to happen. Today, you are suddenly faced with renewed mortgage rates which five years ago would have been considered usurious. Those people are the real victims of inflation.

What did the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) do? How did he tackle inflation? Once again I depend on the people who know, and I return to Thurow's very excellent book, "Five Economic Challenges" in which this leading economist reminds us that inflation has been around since before Christ, that there is no great magic to fighting inflation, and that if you want to create a major recession, you can reduce inflation to zero. In fact, West Germany and Switzerland did it a few years ago when they dramatically cut down the money supply. This drove its unemployment rate sky high, so then sent the unemployed back to Portugal, back to Greece, back to Italy. We do not have that luxury. That is out.

Thurow said that mandatory controls could be imposed. In a federal system, we all know of the undesirability of wage and price controls, although they will work in time. However, there could be voluntary control. If every single Canadian listening were to reduce his or her expectations voluntarily, and voluntarily limit his or her income to 6 per cent, inflation would drop dramatically. But this is utopian. We do not live in a perfect society. No one has ever been able to create that kind of atmosphere.

"We can balance the budget" is one of the favourite cliches of the business community. For 20 or 30 years, Portugal has balanced its budget. It also had the lowest standard of living in Europe, no roads, no schools, no hospitals, no quality of life. It was never quite able to find the money to finance these necessities in the same year that it wanted to balance the budget. What is left? Obviously, and I think properly, the minister has tried to combine voluntary restraint, which we exercised to some degree last night, mandatory control, while we have some control, some influence, some public service, and a continuation of a reasonably tight money policy in the hope that the mixture will have the desired results. It will, because as Thurow reminded us, even an abnormally absurd tight money policy such as that in Great Britain will work in time. Mind you, it will create social unrest, destroy the economy, reduce capacity to about 30 per cent and eliminate productivity, but it will certainly cure inflation. I do not think that we want to go that way in this country, particularly when it is within the capacity of Canadians, by practising a little self-restraint, to make such an undesirable option unnecessary.

Thurow identified inflation fighters, and I enumerated some of them. Many people are affected by abnormally high, usurious interest rates, such as the couple, one of whom is suddenly out of work, the farmer who is going bankrupt because he cannot find money for seed, the fisherman who cannot finance new nets, or the businessman who cannot meet payrolls. We cannot go on in this way. We must share the burden. What we did last night was legitimate and overdue. It was liberal policy, and I mean small "l" liberal. It was something which should appeal to anyone out there who has any concern for his fellow man. The government, through the minister, by imposing some extra income tax on those of us whom Thurow classifies as the victims or the winners of inflation, by asking us to share $800, $1,000, $200, or whatever the amount is per year, depending on one's tax bracket, has provided a billion or so dollars which can be used, at least to relieve the agony and suffering of those who have willingly or unwillingly been the legitimate fighters against inflation. When we subsidized the interest rates of the farmer, the fisherman or the small-business man through the budget last night, we gave him hope. We provided him with some direction and leadership. We said, "We care. Although we cannot bring your interest rate down to zero, because of the selfishness of the Americans, we can at least subsidize you and share your burden through our taxes." It is common sense. We find it in the Bible, in either Testament. It is logical, from a selfish point of view, and in everyone's interest, including that of the business community. When we said we would provide some seed money, if you like, we would help provide the down payment for people who want to buy a home, we were taking the first legitimate step toward restimulating the economy and reducing the level of unemployment in this country.

I am proud that the minister did not bow to the temptation of increasing the deficit, not because I think it is bad but, rather, because I can hear the whole reactionary group out there condemning the minister if he were to increase the deficit. That would be a tragedy. He did not bow to the temptation of interfering with automatic regulators, reducing the unemployment insurance benefits, or any of those alternatives. He stuck to Liberal philosophy. He stuck to his care and concern, for which he has been well known in his 20 years of public record in this House.

Mr. Riis: What will happen now?

Mr. Mackasey: What will happen? We will come out of this recession the moment we get rid of the gloom and doom which prevails in the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: The hon. member is one of my close friends for whom I have great admiration. I think he does care. This country cannot forget the fact that we are one of the greatest, wealthiest countries in the world today, despite the fact that we have a 10 per cent unemployment rate. Let us look at it in another way. Nine people out of ten in the work force are working. Our unemployment insurance is supplying an income for healthy, well-educated, articulate workers who are out of work through no fault of their own. I laugh when I hear people speaking like the hon. member who just left, about the huge deficit in the unemployment insurance fund. That fund belongs to the workers of this country and their employers, and to no one else. No matter how many times the federal government has reached in to steal a little more, it is still viable, desirable, and progressive legislation. The Liberal Party did nothing in last night's budget to minimize, destroy or curtail any of the basic social policies with which this government is proud to be associated. That is significant, because the temptations are there.

I am neither pleased nor happy that we have had to deindex the tax brackets to protect incomes. One of the problems in fighting inflation today, as opposed to 20 years ago, is that we have built so many regulators into the economy that they do not react quite as swifty to supply and demand as they once did. I am not suggesting that we should destroy those regulators. Those of us who have studied the hungry thirties know that textile workers would work for 90 cents a day in Montreal, but people would come along and offer to work for 85 cents a day if they could have the job. People remember that in the west one could not receive welfare if one had a radio in one's house. One certainly could not get help in Manitoba if one had a driver's licence, and God help the unemployed on welfare who was not a worker. The whole puritan ethic was that a man must work by the sweat of his brow. One could not get any kind of relief without putting in any kind of back-breaking work, such as digging ditches, so that someone else could fill them. We do not want to go back to those days, nor do we as a government want to put our head in the sand and turn our backs on those people out there for whom we should show the greatest sympathy, those who have been the victims of the war against inflation.

I listened to the critic for external affairs and I suspect he does better in that field than in the field of finance. When he spoke, he did not suggest one positive step. His whole speech was meant to attack the personality of the minister, who has done more for the poor of Cape Breton than the hon. gentleman will ever do or ever did when he was minister of finance in Newfoundland.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: People who protest too much have guilty consciences at times, and perhaps the hon. gentleman is concerned that he left nothing of distinction when he served in the House. This minister has. Nobody can erase the history books.

• (1750)

Last night the minister asked for the co-operation not just of those in the House, but of Canadians from coast to coast, those who by good fortune, accident or design have not so far had to share any of the burden in our determined effort to bring inflation down to 6 or 7 per cent. That is not new. That has been the history of the fight against inflation for decades. That is why economists like Thurow who study history remind us that there are winners and there are losers. If we do not get inflation down from double-digit figures, at the time when the world recovery commences and our partners start nibbling for our copper, zinc, lead and lumber in competition with the Americans, the Australians and many others, if we have to build into our price the 12 per cent inflation, we are not going to recover. We will not recover nearly as fast as we would if we got inflation down to a reasonable level.

If you did not care for the less fortunate and were not prepared to share the burden with the unemployed, those on fixed income and those who traditionally suffer from inflation, such as the businessman, the farmer and the fishermen, it would make only common sense to care, if we are to maintain the standard of excellence and standard of living for which this country is famous.

I do not intend to run over my time. I believe that Canadians, to a much greater degree than members of the opposition and some members of the press think, understand what we are trying to say. They understand what the minister and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) are saying.

This country was built on sharing. There is nothing new or novel about asking Canadians to share the risk and pool their resources. This is why Canada is the greatest country in the world. This is why we have been able to develop our own language policy, culture, traditions and distinct way of life side by side with the United States. This is why we are distinct in every way, shape and form from our best friends. Somehow Canadians have always met the challenge.

One of our problems is that there has been no national dream, no building of our railroads, no building of our seaway, nothing to unite us. There has been nothing to make us forget those things that normally disturb people in a country so vast and with such regional differences.

Perhaps it is a bit simplistic on my part, naive I suppose, to think that Canadians may be prepared to get together this time and over the next six months or year to unite in the fight against inflation. When we look at it this time, let us have the courage to do those things we need to do to insulate us from the influences of other countries in the future.

Young Canadians understand that, those who will be pouring out this month from our universities, CEGEPs and high schools. New Canadians, perhaps first generation Canadians in many ways, want to roll up their sleeves and do things.

There is a tremendous pool of goodwill and positive nationalism out there that needs to be tapped and used. I cannot think of a better cause than a united effort on the part of all of us to lick inflation, and we can. If each and every one of us today has to share a burden that we did not have this time yesterday, so be it. It is in the Canadian tradition, the best tradition. May I call it six o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it agreed we call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed consideration of the motion (Mr. MacEachen) that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government, and the amendment of Mr. Wilson (p. 18905) and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Riis (p. 18908).

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Mr. Speaker, in joining in our budgetary debate, I felt I would like to make a few comments that I hope the members will find relevant. I say that Mr. Speaker, because I think we have reached the juncture in Canada's economic history when this House must stop playing political games. It must, Mr. Speaker, accept the reality for the state of our economy at the present time. The truth is that Canada economically needs major surgery, it needs major treatment.

I believe that the budget that we were introduced to last night is not going to help in the operation that I see must be done with respect to the Canadian economy. In fact, Mr. Speaker, it is going to hinder, it is going to hurt the economic revival of this country still further. I say that and, I suppose, as my evidence I could offer the fact that the marketplace—which is the best judge of whether the public is responding with confidence, whether the public is saying "Yes, Mr. Trudeau", "Yes, Mr. MacEachen", "Yes, the government of the day has some answers and our confidence is renewed"—is, I would suggest, the best barometer. The fact is, as we know in today's trading on the Toronto stock exchange, the composite index fell 50 points by the time it closed. That is a day when our index falling 50 points is in sharp contrast to the Dow Jones that actually went up today in New York.

The apologists for the Trudeau government to my left, the socialists to my left, say that happens often.

Mr. Deans: It does.

Mr. Stevens: You see, Mr. Speaker, how eager they are to rush in and defend this government that they have propped up for so many years. I think it is absolutely incredible that the socialistic rump to my left, having led, if you like, this government into the whorehouse that they now find themselves in, are rushing out, looking back into the House and saying: "What on earth are you fellows in the government doing in that house of ill-repute?" The fact is that they have egged on the members of this government to their present economic plight. They have told them, when they have already been spending too much money, to spend still more.

In short, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that it is a joint responsibility that we must deal with in this House when we are considering the economic malaise we have fallen into. That joint responsibility is between the Trudeau Liberal government and the NDP rump group to our left. Mr. Speaker, I say that because many of us can remember sitting through that minority Parliament of 1972 to 1974 when the Prime Minister of the day, eager to be propped up, eager to stay in power, responded to every whim and every demand of the socialists to our left. That was their price for giving the Prime Minister at that time the support that he received.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: In short, Mr. Speaker, what happened during that period was that programs were put in place, ongoing expenditures were somehow put into statutory form, and there was no realization as to what the ultimate cost to the Canadian public was going to be with respect to those expenditures.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Tell the truth for a change.

Mr. Stevens: We are living with the repercussions of that honeymoon.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Kempling: Who has the floor?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, order.

Mr. Stevens: I would suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that, when we are considering this budget before us, we not consider it merely as the budget of the present government that is in power, that it is really a budget that is being jointly presented to the Canadian people, if it were being presented fairly, by the Trudeau Liberal government, with their almost coalition partners, the NDP itself.

Mr. Kempling: That is right.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deans: This is a horrible speech.

Mr. Stevens: Every time I hear these socialists going forth, going out to the hustings, with their crocodile tears about how they want to help the poor, to help the elderly, to help those who have been downtrodden, I can only end up concluding that that is a hyprocritical approach for any group to be taking.

Mr. Kempling: Amen.

Mr. Stevens: The fact is that they have hurt the senior citizens of this country perhaps more than any other group in the political arena. They have done the unforgivable, they have egged the government of the day on to spending programs that the nation now finds it cannot afford.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: Imagine, Mr. Speaker, to be stunned last night with the realization that spending has got so out of control, as far as this government is concerned, up to $90 billion per year, that the net result is that almost $20 billion has to be put on the cuff somewhere. Literally, the government has run out of money; it cannot finance these programs.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, when I say that, the repercussions are twofold. To the degree that spending is out of control it is putting pressure on our system. It puts the pressure on our system in the form of inflationary pressures and in turn, I would suggest, it drives up the interest rates that we are now living with. Is that helping the poor of this country? Is that helping the old age pensioner? Is it helping the man who is out of work to have this conspiracy between the NDP and the Trudeau Liberals driving up interest rates in the country to the near breaking point, the 20 per cent level?

• (2010)

Mr. Kristiansen: Get off it, Sinc.

Mr. Deans: It was the Tories who supported the Liberal high interest rate policy, and you know it.

Mr. Stevens: Every time the NDP advocates still more spending, I think every other member of this House should go out to where the voters are and explain the inflationary repercussions and the high interest structure the NDP is virtually insisting should be put in place.

Mr. Deans: That's a lie.

Mr. Young: That's a lie.

Mr. Epp: Order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Young: It is a plain, outright lie.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, it is funny when you hit the quick—

Mr. Young: Tell the truth.

Mr. Deans: If you know it.

Mr. Stevens: When you hit the quick, it is always interesting to see—

Mr. Deans: Get out of the gutter, Sinc.

Mr. Stevens: —how the rabbits come out of their burrows so fast.

Mr. Deans: Deal with the facts, if you know them.

Mr. Stevens: There are those in the socialist ranks who still believe their program might work. I would like to ask them when. We have had 15 years of it now. We have had 15 years of trying to spend our way out of problems. When is the Valhalla going to come? The British have been ravaged by the type of experimentation about which the socialists love to talk. The British found that this orientation toward government spending and government involvement and interference only led to two things. On the one hand, it artificially triggered consumption, it artificially built up the buying power of the nation, which resulted in the inflation which plagued Great Britain for many years. On the other hand, that same force—

Mr. Cosgrove: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have been troubled for the last two or three minutes about a comment used and language used by the—

Mr. Epp: They are coming to get you, Paul.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member will have to delay his point of order.

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed consideration of the motion (Mr. MacEachen) that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government and the amendment of Mr. Wilson (p. 18905) and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Riis (p. 18908).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove) was rising on a point of order.

Mr. Cosgrove: Mr. Speaker, at the first opportunity after listening to a descriptive word which was used by the member who has the floor in this debate, I looked through the rules for what words are permissible and what words are not permissible in this House. I am not anxious to repeat the word because I found it indecent. I thought it unbecoming to this Parliament and I thought it unbecoming that it be uttered in a public place. The word was a description of what is known as a house of ill repute. It is not shown in the section on language that is not permissible, but I would not want the occasion to go by lest it be thought that all members who were in the House at the time the word was used, found it acceptable or becoming to this institution. There are children in the gallery this evening and there may be some children in Canada watching these proceedings on television.

I object to the use of that word as unbecoming to this place and I would ask that you consider whether the word is indecent and therefore not permissible as parliamentary language.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The matter of deciding what is parliamentary or unparliamentary is sometimes difficult. In the opinion of the Chair the language was offensive but it was not unparliamentary. I would call to the attention of the hon. member who has the floor that the language he used hardly brought dignity or credit to the House of Commons, and I ask that he refrain from such language.

Mr. Stevens: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will not comment on your ruling. During the dinner break I had an opportunity to read the relevant section in Beauchesne and of course I consulted the Oxford dictionary. I think it would be most enlightening for all members of the House to look to the Oxford dictionary for the word I used and upon which you commented.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I would invite the hon. member to proceed to the debate. I do not think it is to the advantage of the hon. members or to the House to have a discussion on the matter.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I should like to continue with the main thrust of what I was saying. We have had a scenario in which the government, starting in 1968, has consistently put expenditure programs in place. In this it was substantially aided and abetted by the NDP. The culmination of all this is the type of budget that we received yesterday evening. I think it would be relevant to put a few statistics on the record. The net result of the budget is that we will now find that government spending this year will equal $8,251 per taxpayer, compared to only $1,692 per taxpayer in 1967-68, the year before the Prime Minister took office. On a per capita basis, government spending this year will amount to $3,175 for every man, woman and child in Canada, compared to only $549 per capita in the 1967-68 period.

Many methods could be used to show the true impact of what the government's spending, which is virtually out of control, has led us into. It has very dramatically sopped up the available investment money that would normally be routed into various plant expansions and business investments which in turn, would create jobs for Canadians. This money has now gone into relatively nonproductive activities.

Mr. Kristiansen: You mean things like private takeovers.

Mr. Stevens: My socialistic friends want to get into the act. They ask about private takeovers. Perhaps they are forgetting that the parent of the takeover craze was their own prize Crown corporation, Petro-Canada. In one fell swoop it laid out $1.4 billion U.S. for Petro-Canada. On an after tax basis, that money alone cost the Canadian taxpayers $70 million. That could be regarded as part of the almost $20 billion deficit in the budget now before us.

I almost hope that the socialists to our left will keep putting in these little comments because I think they so neatly substantiate my point. It was they, in effect, who set these poor critters up and left them carrying a very, very dangerous piece of baggage, namely, an economy and budgetary fiscal position that is virtually out of control.

When I say that, Mr. Speaker, I think it is only relevant to remember that not only were we presented with a budget last night, but we were presented with one year's forecast of what the picture ahead of us looks like, namely the 1982-83 period, and nothing more. We were not given the benefit of seeing fiscal year 1984 or fiscal year 1985. On inquiry I found the reason we were not given the benefit of that information to see what lies in store if this government, heaven forbid, should continue in power is that they do not know. The government brought in a budget last night which literally does not project the ongoing expenditure-revenue figures beyond fiscal 1983. That leads me to comment on the fact that this budget was thrown together in the last four weeks, and I think we have to ask ourselves what triggered it. We were assured in the November, 1981, budget that they had the solution, all was in place and the government was going to lower inflation and basically get our economy turned around. So what triggered this sudden panic so that within four weeks the government felt it necessary to bring in the budget last night in a half-baked form? I ask that, Mr. Speaker, because I think the government of the day, irrespective of whether it is Conservative or Liberal, has to control expenditures, not in an immediate sense but in the long term. If there is to be a meaningful reduction in government spending you have to start looking at not just the present 12-month period, but the spending two, three, four or five years down the road. For example, I can give you figures of what our spending levels would have been had we been able to stay in power and maintain those levels. By 1981-82, for example, the total projected spending under the Clark government was to be $61.5 billion. It turned out to be under this government $67.5 billion, almost $6 billion more than our projections when we were in power. But when we shift into the present fiscal year, 1982-83, we find that the November budget projected expenditures this year to be roughly $75.5 billion. Our spending for that same period was to be $67.218 billion. However, last night we found that $75 billion had moved up to $78.1 billion, a jump of almost $3 billion in federal government spending between last November and last night.

The reason I stress this, sir, and you are faster in arithmetic than I am, but you can see that with our expenditure level at $67 billion and the present government spending level at $78.1 billion, there is a difference of over $10 billion. That, Mr. Speaker, is part of the dilemma we are now faced with.

This government, Mr. Speaker, because it did not care to cut costs and try to run a tight ship as we proposed to do, has now subjected the nation to a $10 billion expenditure this year that we would not have run into. The net effect of the lack of confidence which has arisen from coast to coast is that production activities, the gross national product as it is sometimes referred to, has gone negative, and not only have we these higher expenditures but revenue has started to fall off. The net result is that while we anticipated our financial requirements to be $5.6 billion, we now find that the financial requirements of this government are $17 billion. There is the $10 billion difference, and it is simply overspending by this government compared to the Crosbie-Clark spending program which was brought in in December, 1979.

We all recall, Mr. Speaker, what happened. Absolutely horrified by the word "restraint" and a government which was trying to run a responsible fiscal and monetary position, the socialists moved a motion of no confidence in our spending program. Of course, always eager to get back into power for their own reasons, the Liberals supported the socialists, and the net result was the election which led to the return of the Trudeau Liberal government. I mention this, Mr. Speaker, because surely that is part of the substantiation which is needed when I say we should not just criticize the present government for the dilemma we are in. The truth is that it was a joint effort on the part of the socialists to my left and the near-socialists in front of us, the Trudeau Liberals.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deans: You went to the public, they voted you out, and you still bleed about it.

Mr. Epp: You guys are pretty sensitive tonight.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, any time my friend to the left wants to go to the public, I say, let us go to the public and have an election.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, how quickly the House leader of the socialists forgets that when we had the last vote of confidence in this House every member of my party turned out to vote this government out of office, but only 80 per cent of his party turned up.

An hon. Member: Save the Liberals.

Mr. Deans: No respect for the democratic process.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, we can see who really believes in democracy in this country. On the vote tomorrow those who believe in democracy and want to let the Canadian public speak on this budget will have an opportunity to stand up in the House and support our amendment which will result in the defeat of this government. For once they can let the Canadian public decide who should bring in the next budget and govern in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, the NDP is saying that it is their amendment on which the vote will be taken tomorrow. Well, I hope they vote for their own amendment because sometimes they do get things a little mixed up.

• (2040)

Let me touch on another point in the budget which was rather disturbing. It concerns the minister's proposal to reduce taxation on investment income and interest rates to borrowers. I think it is generally agreed that in the lack of confidence climate in our country some type of stimulus is needed to get the investing public eager to build plants and facilities that we need to give more employment to Canadians. It is unfortunate that what the minister has really done is to introduce into an already confused picture still more confusion. Instead of giving certainty he has in effect said that this is the game plan we feel should win over the next two, three or four years. We have come up with a bright idea to have some type of inflation-indexed term deposit instrument. We are not too sure what form it should take, but we think it would be a good idea to have a so-called blue ribbon committee look over the idea in the next few months and come back to report to us. Having said that, I think the government underestimates the consternation developing in the investment community. As investors are trying to make up their minds whether or not to invest any money in Canada, a new idea is introduced. Investors are asked how they would like some type of indexed-for-inflation instrument of which they have never heard before.

Those who know how businessmen react will tell you that a feeling of dismay abounds. Why do they need to be treated to more guinea pig approaches or more test tube experiments at a time when a more fundamental return to the basics is needed? In short, there will be an attitude on the part of businessmen addressed to the government that had the government come up with a policy to show a smaller, not a bigger deficit, to show less spending than anticipated, and that along with less regulation, less intervention in the energy, mining and manufacturing fields, that would have given Canadians the confidence to get on with the job of creating more employment. People do not want the government to start playing games using Canada as some type of a test tube or an experimental area for a program that apparently has never been put in place before in any country in the world.

When I asked where this kind of indexed-for-inflation instrument had been tried, Denmark was the only country mentioned. Today I checked this out, but no one knew anything about this type of thing being in place in Denmark, and we have to continue checking. However, a departmental official suggested to me today that the only place he knew where this type of thing had been tried was in one or more of the Latin American countries in South America. We are now taking our guidance, if you like, from countries that have had inflation levels as high as 5 per cent or 10 per cent per month. This shows to me the very sad, almost bankrupt, position which the government is in regarding new ideas to solve our problems.

A constituent suggested to me that the only reason Canada can still say it is not a banana republic is the fact that we do not happen to grow bananas in Canada. However, we meet all other tests.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I would suggest it is time for Canadians to become more concerned about what we are discussing tonight. Forty cents of every dollar earned by Canadians is taken by some government to be respent on his or her behalf. It has often been said that a slave is a person who is taxed 100 per cent. In Canada, we are 40 per cent on the way there. It is time we told our socialist friends to the left and our near socialists opposite that Canadians have had enough of this big spending deficit approach and we should stop doing this. If the Liberals are not willing to stop, let us go back to the Canadian public as soon as possible and find out who they want to govern this country in the future.

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to have the opportunity to speak in this debate. This debate is very important. We are in a crucial period in Canada's history and it is not an easy time to be in government. It is, however, a challenging time. What we must do is try to discuss what it is necessary to do in this budget. We have to do it in an honest, fair and responsible way.

It was necessary for this budget to spell out Canada's economic problems responsibly, honestly and candidly. It was necessary to spell out the economic problems and not gild the lily. We have to face up to the fact that Canada at the moment is in a recession. There is no getting around that. It is also fair to say that western industrial countries are also in a recession. Canada is a major trading country. We would like to expand our trade with other countries. Canada's economy is intrinsically linked with the economy of other countries, particularly that of the United States. I think it is fair to say also that the tail does not wag the dog.

The other day the chief economist for the Conference Board of Canada said that realistically it is not practical to suggest that Canada by itself and its government could solve all the problems of the western economies. The United States has high interest rates. Canada has high interest rates. Unemployment is high in the United States, and we too have high unemployment in Canada. Fortunately for the Americans, some success has been achieved in reducing inflation. The Americans have had more success than Canadians in this area. If Canada is to pull itself out of the recession, we have to do what is necessary to resolve inflation. We have to bite the bullet. This will not be easy, but that is honesty and responsibility in government, and that is what the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) did last night.

We cannot escape the fact of our deficit. The minister was most candid about the deficit and the size of it last night. Canada's deficit is $19.5 billion. At present over 20 per cent of federal expenditures go toward debt servicing.

Let us be honest and examine what options the government has before it in terms of trying to pull this country out of a recession. First, can we spend our way out of it? If we are to listen to what the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) said, I guess we cannot spend our way out of it. I do not think we can afford to let the percentage of federal expenditures allocated toward servicing the debt go up indefinitely. Were we to do that and were we to wind up with bigger and bigger deficits, we would find ourselves in a sink hole from which we might never recover.

Now, what would the NDP have us do? I suggest that they are consistent. They would tell us to spend, spend and spend. They would have us create more jobs and if, in the process, we go deeper in debt, the dollar drops lower, the cost of imports were to go up and, if necessary, we would have to put restraint controls there, it would be fine. They seem to be prepared to do that. I do not happen to think that that is a responsible approach to bringing the country out of a recession.

Is it possible for the government to provide everyone in the country who is unemployed with a job? I am sure we would like to be able to do that through direct job creation, but the simple fact of the matter is that we cannot afford it. However, what we can attempt to do is to employ a reasonable program that can try to provide some stimulus to some areas in particular that are hardest hit by unemployment. In the long run, if we wanted to shift the nature of Canadian society to a socialist society, perhaps everyone would have a job, but we may wind up in the position of a country like Poland. I was amused to read an article about the recent economic crisis there in which a worker is reported to have said, "Here we have several myths. The government pretends that everyone gets paid, and everyone in return pretends that they work."

That is not what the Liberal Party is all about. Contrary to what you may believe, if you listen to the hon. member for York-Peel, this is not a socialist party. This is a party and a government which believes in social justice. We believe in social justice within a free enterprise fabric.

Mr. Huntington: That is not so. That used to be so.

Mr. Smith: Let us review some of the other suggested options. What about artificially lowering interest rates? We hear about this day in and day out from the official opposition. If we were to accept what the hon. member for York-Peel just said at face value, we should not be interfering in the laws of supply and demand. We should not be interfering in market forces. But, on the other hand, we hear from some of his colleagues in his caucus on a daily basis that we should artificially lower interest rates. I suggest that we should all recognize that for every person who borrows, someone is lending. The simple fact is that if you can get a higher return for your money in the United States than in Canada, most people will move their money out of the country to the States where they can get a higher return.

Mr. Huntington: What about Switzerland? What about Japan?

Mr. Smith: There are a number of results from an outflow of capital from the country. The value of the dollar drops. The cost of imports rises. This triggers another inflationary spiral which, in turn, results in pushing interest rates. That is not a reasonable and practicable solution to the problem.

We occasionally hear as well that the economy can be stimulated by inflating the money supply, printing more money and combining that with lower interest rates. All of the conditions which I have just mentioned would occur if we took that approach and just abandoned caution with regard to the deficit. This would put us into a very deep sink hole.

However, these approaches are suggested rather glibly by some members opposite—I am not suggesting by all of them—on almost a daily basis. I would suggest that if we took that approach, the cure would be worse than the disease. I would suggest that some members of the opposition do the people of Canada and the political process in Canada a disservice when they suggest that there is, in fact, a quick fix that is available, an easy answer or options to turn to. Those members are heavy on criticism from their side but very light on alternatives.

Mr. MacKay: We noticed that about you also.

Mr. Smith: As I say, at least with the New Democratic Party you get the party line regularly, which is to spend and not worry about the deficit. They want more government hiring and more state control, which is not the route the government wishes to follow or this party wants to follow. However, when it comes to the Tories, you have to put your glasses on to see which ones are wearing a red shirt and which a blue shirt.

Another factor which I believe has contributed to the impression many Canadians have that there are in fact quick fixes and easy answers available has been the role of the media. While I do not mean to be critical of individual members of the media—

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): You are safe. No one is up there.

Mr. Smith: —I think there are collective impressions which are sometimes left in the minds of Canadians that sudden solutions do exist. You will see a build-up of hype about a certain event which would be taking place. For example, there was the annual cabinet meeting up at Meach Lake a couple of months ago. If you were to listen to the media and political pundits around Ottawa who started reporting on that Meach Lake meeting for about a month before it took place, you would get the impression there was to be a war council there which would receive wisdom from on high, and that they would suddenly come out with a new plan to solve all of Canada's problems. We saw all that hype being built up for that event until it finally occurred. Once the meeting was over we stayed on track, we continued to fight against inflation, and there is a big letdown from the expectations.

Another example concerns the Versailles conference. For several weeks leading up to that conference we got the impression that all the world's economic problems would be resolved at Versailles. I realize that members of the media all have a job to do and some would like to make their stories as dramatic as possible in order to have them circulated. However, the build-up does not reflect the real world. It is Alice in Wonderland.

The same thing happened last week as soon as we heard there would be a budget last night. All this hype took place again. I recently watched a television program on which there was a panel. One member of this panel was a small-business man. He was asked, "Would you like lower interest rates so it would be easier to operate your business?" He said, "Yes, I sure would." Then there was a home owner who was having difficulty meeting his mortgage payments. He was asked, "Would you not like it if your mortgage rates were a little lower so you would be able to carry on with the payments on your house?" He said, "Yes, I sure would." An unemployed person was then interviewed. He was asked, "Would it not be great if you could get a job out of this budget?"

Mr. Epp: And feed your family.

Mr. Kempling: What is wrong with that?

Mr. Smith: Who would not want that? The Minister of Finance is a decent man. He is a man of compassion who cares about Canadians. He has been here since 1953.

Mr. Nickerson: Too long.

Mr. Smith: He has given his life to Parliament and Canadians to try to improve their lifestyle. To listen to members opposite—be fair—you would get the impression that the Minister of Finance eats a bowl of nails for breakfast every morning, perhaps across the table from Mr. Bouey, and says, "What mean things can we do today?"

I ask hon. members opposite to be practical and fair. Do you not think that politicians like to be popular? What politician does not like to be popular? What politician would not like to be responsible for actions which would have everyone come and wave palm branches for him as he walks by. Everyone would like to do that if possible, but it is not responsible politics or responsible government. Do you not think that the Minister of Finance would like to wave a wand so that interest rates would go down? Do you not think that he would like to be able to push a button to decrease unemployment? Do you not think he would like to be able to simply pass a bill which would reduce the deficit?

The minister would like to see businessmen have lower interest rates for the operation of their businesses. He would like to see lower mortgage rates for home owners as well as jobs for the unemployed. However, in order to accomplish all of those goals we have to tackle inflation. We must be prepared to be honest and responsible enough in government to make Canadians aware of the reality that unless inflation is brought under control none of those goals will be obtainable. That is the fact, and everyone sitting in the House who is honest admits it and is aware of it. That fight against inflation is exactly what the minister took on as his major target last night.

The first point the minister made last night was the lowering of expectations of Canadians in terms of their income. He set a good example with respect to Members of Parliament since we will be taking a cut. That is acceptable, and I do not think any of us are complaining about that cut. He also indicated that we have to look at the federal government as a whole and the influence that the pay settlements of those in the federal public service have on the rest of the economy. He said that we will have to have a 6 per cent ceiling for the next 12 months and a 5 per cent ceiling for the following 12 months. We will be urging the provincial governments and the private sector to follow that example. Now that is responsible government. It may not be sugar-coated government, it may not be popular government, but that is responsible government, and that is what this minister, this party and this government are all about. This action is not punitive action; rather, it is necessary. We must all put the bit between our teeth, and we must all bite the bullet.

Mr. Huntington: It's all planned.

Mr. Smith: I suspect that the Tories will support that legislation. I may be wrong, but I suspect that they will support it. I do not expect the NDP members to support it. Why will they not support it? The fact is that they are so wrapped up with big labour that they cannot get out of bed with them even when it is on fire, and that is the fact. The CLC and the NDP; the NDP and the CLC—it is hard to get them out of one's mind. It is one group. I am not really sure who the piper is who is playing the tune. One week it may be one side and the next week it may be the other side in that dynamic duo. But in any event, they like the Alice in Wonderland approach that everyone can have a bigger slice of an ever-expanding pie and no one ever needs to worry about the long run and the future. That kind of pie in the sky approach does not get anyone anywhere, and it is not responsible. I happen to think that the NDP, because of its influence with big labour and the union movement, could really do this country a service by persuading them that they must show some leadership and responsibility to their own members, rather than inflaming them with rhetoric and stirring them up to storm the barricades, refusing to be responsible about fighting inflation like everyone else in this country. Will they do this? I hope they will, but I think I will be proven wrong. I think we will see the NDP fanning the flames—

Mr. Huntington: Crystal ball.

Mr. Smith: —of labour unrest, not trying to resolve the problem of inflation in this country but, rather, trying to make it worse.

Another aspect of our attack on inflation relates to limiting indexation for Canadians. First, the indexing factor in the income tax system will be limited to 6 per cent in the first 12 months and 5 per cent in the following year. Indexed pensions will be subject to the same ceiling for the next two years, 6 per cent and 5 per cent. If we are really serious, we must do it across the board. All Canadians must make some degree of sacrifice, some perhaps more than others. Those who have the ability to pay will have to make the greater sacrifice. I think all Canadians must seriously respond to this literally in a partriotic way. Therefore, family allowances and old age security payments will be subject to those same limitations. But, following the Liberal tradition, that will not apply to those on the guaranteed income supplement and also those receiving veterans pensions, as we all know. I think that is a reasonable and responsible saw-off in the sort of situation we are in right now.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): You would!

Mr. Smith: Now they ask, "Who would?"

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I said, "You would".

Mr. Smith: There is a typical example—

Mr. Epp: He said, "You would", not "Who would?"

Mr. Smith: Oh, I would. Earlier today we heard some objections from hon. members of the Tory party about this policy. I will not get into the question of intent, but I would suggest there was some misleading rhetoric as to old age pensions being cut, and that, of course, is complete, utter nonsense. That is an irresponsible approach because we all know, and anyone who looked at this very thoroughly knows, that old age pensions will continue to go up.

Mr. Nickerson: Now, now, tell the truth.

Mr. Smith: They will not go up at the rate they would otherwise, but they will continue to go up. We have heard speeches from the hon. member for York-Peel, who complains all the time about government spending, but when it comes to the question of what he would cut, we never hear about that. Oh, he is all for cutting government spending, but what will he cut? I would like him to spell that out because that is something he always leaves out in his speeches.

As another part of our attack on inflation, we are considering the entire question involving those areas of the economy in which administered prices fall under federal jurisdiction. Those agencies which regulate those goods and services in the fields of transportation, communications, etc. will adhere to those guidelines, except in the most exceptional circumstances. At the same time we have launched an all-out attack on inflation by setting a good example ourselves, I would suggest, throughout the public sector, and at the federal level we are also taking action to shore up investment and confidence in this country. That is very important. We want to see private investment in this country. This is a party which does believe in incentive and the work ethic.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Smith: We want to see people investing in this country and creating jobs. If one looks at page six of the minister's budget address, it really spells it out in no uncertain terms. First of all, we have the new form of term deposit whereby those who invest funds in it will not be taxed on that part of the interest above the rate of inflation. What is that all about? Then we have this point about Canadians investing funds and new plans for the purchase of common shares of Canadian corporations, and the impact on the part of the capital gains tax. That is a typical example of a party and a government which does want to stimulate investment in this country, which does believe in incentives and encouraging people to take risks, take a chance on Canada and invest their dollars out in the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Smith: Buyers of new homes will be able to secure mortgages at significantly reduced interest rates, from three to six percentage points lower than the prevailing rates. Small businesses, farmers and fishermen will be able to secure loans for new equipment and investment at similarly reduced interest rates. Canadian corporations will have improved access to risk capital. It is all there.

Mr. Huntington: Where?

Mr. Smith: I do not think the hon. member has read it. Well, I will tell him where it is. It is on page six of the minister's speech last night, right in the middle of the budget address. I can only conclude that they all had cotton batting in their ears last night, because, judging from their comments, they certainly were not listening.

This government has indicated flexibility and responsiveness by making some shifts to encourage investment in this country. That is all spelled out on the top of page seven of the minister's address last night. There are six points there relating to the November budget. The 12.5 per cent corporate distribution tax applicable to small business will be postponed for one year, to January 1, 1983. Why are we doing that? It is because we believe in small business and we want to help it. That is a reasonable and responsible way to do it. That is not sugar-coated government. That is responsible government.

The proposals related to the deduction of interest expense will be reviewed and their effective date will not be before 1983. Why? It is because we want to encourage investment and confidence in this country. The proposed automobile standby charge has been reduced from 2.5 per cent to 2 per cent. The rules on the restriction of interest expense will not apply to commitments relating to employee share purchase loans undertaken prior to November 12, 1981. We also have the provisions concerning forward averaging and corporate reorganizations. That is responsiveness. That is flexibility. That is responsible government, I would suggest.

There are also the aspects relating to foreign investment, relaxing the process in less than major acquisitions so as to encourage investment in this country. In addition to an all-out attack on inflation and an attempt to put investor confidence into this country, we are also taking a reasonable approach to create jobs and sustain growth in employment.

I turn to page eight of the budget speech. I would encourage hon. members opposite to do that. I am sure they have not yet read it. If one considers it long enough, some of the good things in it may sink in. There is a $200 million allocation to direct employment programs. Why are we doing that? It is because we want to stimulate growth in this country. But we are doing it in a reasonable amount. I am sure it will not be enough to satisfy the red Tories opposite, but of course the blue Tories think that we are spending too much money. It is too bad that they cannot get their act together and decide which side of the fence they are on. At least I know what side of the fence the NDP members are on. I do not agree with that side of the fence, but I know what side of the fence they are on.

Mr. Deans: Leave us alone.

Mr. Smith: I certainly cannot say that about the hon. members opposite.

• (2110)

Also, there is $150 million for increased spending on localized, employment-intensive projects under existing government construction and other programs. Together with more than $100 million available from existing employment and immigration allocations, this will provide more than $450 million for direct job creation. Combined with the $300 million for economic development programs that create permanent private sector jobs through levered investment incentives, there is a $750 million program. I suggest that is a very serious, responsible manageable commitment to stimulate jobs in this country.

Then we have the program which the minister responsible for housing talks about. I do not think I have to repeat what I said. What we have in this budget is a responsible approach, not a candy approach, but a candid honest analysis of what the immediate problems are and a responsible way in which to deal with them.

With regard to the Tories, we knew they did not like it even before they saw it. Perhaps that is a natural outcome of the parliamentary process which is by nature adversarial. However, I would find it easy to deal with the Tories if I knew whether they were taking the approach which we heard from the hon. member for York-Peel or the approach we heard from the hon. member for Yellowhead (Mr. Clark), or the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) and the hon. member for Kingston and The Islands (Miss MacDonald). One really does not know. You need a score card to tell whether they are wearing blue shirts or red shirts.

In conclusion, this is a responsible budget. It is an honest budget. It tells it like it is. What does it do? It points to a tunnel. However, there is a light at the end of the tunnel. If we stick to it and lick inflation, we will also lick the problems of unemployment, interest rates and the deficit. However, we will not do all those things unless we are serious, single-minded, supportive and try to make it work. That is why I believe we have a responsible minister bringing in a responsible and honest budget. I am happy to stand up in this House and speak in support of him and the budget he presented last night.

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, in speaking to the budget that was presented by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) last night, a number of thoughts come to mind. One has to decide which one best reflects one's own inner attitude regarding the economy and the performance of the minister.

What is more important is, what are Canadians feeling like today? Do they have hope? Do they see the economy growing? Do they see the possibility of attaining the goals they set for themselves as individuals, heads of families, business people, farmers, ordinary tax-paying Canadians? Do they feel that the country and the government is more responsive to their needs than prior to the budget last night before it was announced?

I must say that I am a sad Member of Parliament in this House tonight. I am sad because I believe that this country is the best country in the world but it is not getting the government it so rightly deserves.

In 1981, Goldwin Smith, an observer of Canadian life, after having taken a look at our society at that time, some 90 years ago, said that if he had to put a salutation over Canada's door, it would be this epitaph: "Canada is a country that is resource-rich, policy-poor."

Possibly at no other stage has that attitude been more prevalent among Canadians. They believe this country is resource-rich, be they natural resources or human resources. At no other time have they felt that policies to meet and reach that potential have fallen so short of the potential that could be Canada's.

The hon. member for Don Valley East (Mr. Smith) is a good apologist for the government. He has a role to play. I accept that. However, for the first time from his mouth today and for the first time last night from the mouth of the Minister of Finance was there even a slight concession that Canada is in a recession.

Some Canadians may go further. Because of the lack of a job, loss of business or loss of opportunity, some Canadians are facing a personal depression. That is a strong word. However, all one has to do is to look today at the reaction of ordinary Canadians to the budget of yesterday to see that that is true.

Throughout the speech of the hon. member for Don Valley East or the budget that was presented last night, the reasons for the trouble in Canada were not laid at the doorstep of this government. What are the reasons? Their first reason was the United States and the policies in that country. When times were good, how many times did we hear members opposite railing against our neighbour to the south? Now, because the shoe is on the other foot, they use the argument that once the United States recovers, things will be better in Canada. They say there is a world recession. For example, base metal prices are low. When one looks at our mining industry and international markets, one sees that that is a fact.

A former minister of finance, in defending the performance of the Liberal government of that day, had the gall to say that the anchovy crop off the coast of Peru was causing difficulties in our economy. At no time do they say that largely because of government promises, government action or government decisions problems are created here in Canada by this government on the floor of this House. They will not accept that responsibility. They like to accept the perks of government, the power that comes with government, but how often do we see them taking the responsibility that comes with government?

The question for us tonight, is do you, can you, should you believe the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Finance? We have all heard the Prime Minister say that he was going to wrestle inflation to the ground. Unfortunately, many Canadians believed him. As of yesterday's budget, we are once again to believe that despite the National Energy Program, the November 12 budget and the changes of December 18, if we follow this drummer, we will move out of the recession, have a maximum 6 per cent inflation and good times will be back in Canada.

The government must face the reality of the little boy who cried wolf once too often. Today we have a crisis of confidence. The resources are still there and the potential is still there, but today people do not have confidence in their government. But today people do not have confidence in their government. They do not believe you, gentlemen and ladies, they do not believe you any more. They have heard that once too often.

While it may be tragic for you in an electoral sense—and only time will tell that—that is not the important issue today. The important issue is that because of this government's leadership Canadians today are unemployed. Because of its leadership Canadians are losing their homes. Because of its leadership people are losing their businesses. Because of its leadership people with 30 and 35 years of experience, who are 50 and 55 years of age and were hoping that in another five or ten years of employment they could take retirement, now, suddenly, ten years early, find themselves out of work. They go on the labour market and they say, "Can you give me a job?", and they are told they are too old.

That is the government's legacy, and no matter what rhetoric they use, no matter what they say, that remains, and Canadians will not forget it.

I was not here last night, Mr. Speaker, but I would have liked to have been here. I had given a commitment to a small community in my riding. I spoke at a high school graduation, a small graduation, there were 19 grade 12 graduates. That is not large by most high school standards anymore. At the banquet, I asked a number of those graduates, "What is your plan now that you are stepping forth, so to speak, into the adult world?" And what they said invariably was, "Give us a chance, give us work, show us the opportunities and we will go and get it and we will build this country." The spirit that developed this country is there with our young people. The tragedy of this government's economic leadership today is that young people who are looking for work cannot find it. At what stage do they say that the opportunities they hear us speaking about, the opportunities that they innately and inherently feel are in Canada, they cannot realize? What happens to those young people, in terms of their attitude to the country, to the institutions of the country—and yes, Mr. Speaker, in terms of their attitude to this institution and the democratic process? Those are serious words but I mean them tonight. It is a question all members, but especially the government members opposite, should answer.

We hear as well now that we can lick inflation, that we can beat inflation if we lower our expectations. Lower our expectations! Just think of that statement for a bit, Mr. Speaker. We are telling Canadians to lower their expectations—for Canada! Do you believe that in the period of John A. Macdonald, Cartier and Brown, they told Canadians that lowering their expectations would build the country? Do you think that Laurier and Sifton told people who were immigrants without anything, immigrants who came to western Canada and all they had was 160 acres, to till their soil, grow their own food, build their own homes, build the barn, did they tell them to lower their expectations? Surely this country has gone away beyond the vision of those people. Today we hear the government say, "Lower your expectations, and things will be better."

No, it should be the other way, Mr. Speaker. They should be able as a government to say: "Canadians, young people, middle aged, older people, this country is great, here are the opportunities, here is the climate, go out and get it." Surely that should be the policy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Epp: On the Peace Tower in this building, engraved in stone, is the statement: "Without vision the people perish." Without the vision of government, without the leadership, do not talk to me about the fact that you like government, that you are comfortable in the government benches. Talk to me about how you will lead Canadians, how you will give them vision once again. Because only as we are going to have economic development, economic success, will the matters of social justice again become valid in this House and in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Epp: Only then. You cannot talk about social justice until such a moment as you give economic opportunity. Too many of us have people back in the Soviet Union. They hear a lot about social justice; they see very little of economic development as individuals, and so it becomes empty.

So, the first thing that has to happen, Mr. Speaker, is for this government to understand that it, and it first—not others, it—holds first responsibility to the economic crisis that we find ourselves in as Canadians. Should that happen, I think we would then be able to start on the road to recovery.

Canadians today are afraid. I said that today I was sad. Possibly people hearing me would say I am more angry than sad. I am both. But there is a myth that has gone through the Canadian public consciousness. I did not live in that period of time, but coming out of the 1930s there was an apology that "Tory times are tough times."

Mr. Breau: They still are.

Mr. Epp: And the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau) still believes that. There was the mythology, though, on the other side of that coin, that no matter what the Liberal Party did to you, they were good economic managers. Take a look at them now, Mr. Speaker. Any management expertise they might have had, any management reputation they might have developed at some time, surely has broken like shards at their feet. And the people who are most disappointed are Canadians.

We hear about the deficit. Jocularly, almost, they say: "We must do something about the deficit, it is serious, we have to do something." Let us look at the deficit. I remember a few weeks ago when there were rumours that the deficit was going to be substantially higher than the $10.9 billion projected in the November 12 budget. There were members in the House and commentators who were saying that the budget could almost go all the way up to $15 billion, maybe to $16 billion, and in some quarters some members were saying: "Oh, do you think it could go that high, do you think it could any higher?" None of us dared believe that the deficit could approach $20 billion. That $20 billion—or $19.6 billion—is projected on two other matters which the government does not want to talk about, and that is this: one, what will be the shortfall in the unemployment insurance fund—which we will know at the end of the third quarter, that will be January 1983. It could be, most likely, another $2 billion. Plus, the minister is banking that the deficit will not go any higher because he is planning that there will be growth in the next two quarters. Does any Canadian who has looked at the situation today believe that we will have that kind of growth in the next quarter? Can you show me one reputable economist or investor who believes that? And this is the smoke and mirrors that the minister likes to play with. Somehow he feels that the light of truth will simply not sear away those words that he is so quick to use.

With respect to the deficit of $20 billion plus, there is no other single factor which will more quickly, more dramatically or more deeply erode confidence in our country than that deficit. If hon. members opposite individually were spending 33 per cent annually more than they earned, how long would their families survive? How long would they sit around their breakfast tables as families and make plans for the future? Is that the legacy they are leaving to Canadians?

I know there are many Canadians who have invested in Canada savings bonds. Last September the bond issue came out at 19 per cent plus. In my mind, at least, the setting of that rate set a target for interest rates for the next year. Why should a Canadian invest in Canadian business if he is guaranteed 19 per cent plus without risk?

Mr. Peterson: How much did you pay?

Mr. Epp: The hon. member opposite wants to be personal. He can do that, but I point out that the only way we are going to get our economy back in line is by rewarding risk-takers to a greater extent than we reward bond holders. What will be the rate for the bond issue this year? Is that a factor in the deficit? The government has to get into the bond market. It has to get $20 billion, and the more it can find domestically the better.

Mr. Huntington: They need $60 billion.

Mr. Epp: With the rollovers the government needs $60 billion, but to get that what offer does the government have to make to Canadians, with inflation running at the rate it is today? What offer does the government have to make to Canadians, and what will be the cost? That is the legacy of hon. members opposite.

An interesting exchange took place in the House of Commons today during the question period. It was a rather sad exchange about old age security. The government was hanging on to the fact that old age security payments for next year would go up—not down—and from a strictly dollar point of view, that is correct. If OAS is to be inflated by 6 per cent, obviously the payments will be higher than they are this year. That is fair enough argument for the government to make. However, at no point was the government willing to concede that the amount pensioners will receive will be less than what they expected in terms of meeting inflation and the erosion of their buying power next year.

Mr. Paproski: A heartless government.

Mr. Epp: The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) likes to champion causes and create the image that she is always there working for the less fortunate in our society. She said the government would give pensioners $10 per month more. They will get $239 this year and $249 next year. Let us examine that for a moment. These are the people who were our pioneers. These are the people whose salaries almost invariably were substantially lower than salaries earned today—by those of us who have work. They are the people who saved for that time when they would be senior citizens. Is it valid to give them that kind of sleight of hand argument? Is it valid to give them smoke and mirrors and to say that, because it is more, they therefore should not ask for an explanation as to why it would otherwise be less?

The government is asking for confidence. The government wants the economy to start rolling. If that is the goal and that is the sincere aim, I say in all sincerity that the government should tell Canadians the whole story and not hold back that which might not be favourable. Only then will the government gain some credibility.

I also found it interesting that the hon. member for Don Valley East (Mr. Smith) blamed the media for the government's problems. He said the media had created a hype. At the time of the Meach Lake experience the government went to the mountain top. I suppose the members of the government wanted to get some revelation—perhaps not equal to the Ten Commandments, but some revelation nonetheless.

An hon. Member: Water.

Mr. Epp: If they went for water, that would have been better. After Meach Lake the response of members of the government to any questions in the House was, "Wait for Versailles, wait for Versailles." The response was that when the minister returned from Versailles—

Mr. Smith: We never said that.

Mr. Peterson: Nonsense.

Mr. Epp: Was that not said?

Mr. Peterson: No. Name one who did.

Mr. Epp: I will name one: the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Paproski: Pierre Trudeau.

Mr. Epp: Or the Prime Minsiter.

Mr. Peterson: What did he say?

Mr. Epp: Then after Versailles the response was, "Wait for the economic statement", which became a budget. Hon. members opposite can blame the media all they want. Some days I take a certain jaundiced view of the media myself, but let hon. members be honest; they used every one of those events to hold off the inevitable, which came last night in the budget.

How can we turn the economy around? Is it possible? I believe it is because of our potential as a country. Tomorrow there will be what I suppose I can call a federal-provincial conference. There will be a meeting of the Prime Minister with the ten premiers of the country. The Prime Minister has told them, "We must co-operate." That is true, but when we look at the events of the past 18 months, can we say that the Prime Minsiter is the best person to preach co-operation in Canadian federalism?

Mr. Huntington: He said co-operative federalism is dead.

Mr. Epp: I believe in co-operative federalism.

Mr. Rossi: You are not the judge of that.

Mr. Epp: Fair enough, but the Prime Minister said co-operative federalism is dead.

Mr. Rossi: Who are you to judge that?

Mr. Epp: I am telling the hon. member what the Prime Minister said. What happened with the EPF? What happened in the constitutional debate? The Prime Minister said co-operative federalism is dead. How can he expect, after one short post-budget meeting tomorrow, that suddenly co-operation will be natural? The Prime Minister himself said today that the energy agreement with Alberta and Saskatchewan took 18 months to achieve. What about the Atlantic offshore problem?

Mr. Peterson: What about the budget?

Mr. Epp: These are all factors in tomorrow's meeting. Granted, we are in very difficult times and need co-operative federalism, but this Prime Minister is the only Prime Minister in the history of the country who has had such an abysmal record in dealing with the provinces.

Mr. Rossi: On account of you guys. On account of you, trouble-makers.

Mr. Epp: I note the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau), who was the chairman of a committee which made a report which was totally annihilated and destroyed by the Minister of Finance, is in the House.

Mr. Breau: You haven't read the report.

Mr. Epp: If the hon. member for Gloucester wants to speak, he can ask his whip. His whip might even let him speak next year.

Mr. Breau: Tomorrow at five o'clock.

Mr. Epp: Is there any other factor? I believe that if we return to co-operative federalism, in time confidence can be restored. However, the federal government will have to recognize that the provinces are partners in federalism and that they have a role to play. That role should not simply be to answer a call by the Prime Minister to come to Ottawa 48 hours after the budget to be told, "That is what you will do, or else." The Prime Minister has taken that approach too often.

• (2140)

There are other aspects of the budget that I should like to touch upon. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove) spoke about the housing program, but, Mr. Speaker, to date every program he has brought forward has fallen well short of his projections. Now we hear about a $3,000 grant for first time home buyers and, on the face of it, it is a step in the right direction. It could increase house building, construction jobs and jobs in the subtrades. But let us analyse this, Mr. Speaker.

A family in Winnipeg buying a basic house at a cost of approximately $60,000 would have to put 10 per cent down under this plan. With their $7,000 and the $3,000 grant, they are left with a mortgage of $50,000. It does not take long to figure how much interest that young couple must pay, at 18 per cent. In the first twelve months, when they receive the $3,000, their interest payment, taxes and upkeep will amount to $9,000.

The government is in charge of one of the richest countries in the world, Mr. Speaker. We can turn this country around but, first of all, the government must come clean with the people. It has perpetrated a disaster on the country. The next election will put it back in its place and that is, out of office. Unfortunately, future generations will have to shoulder the deficit it has created.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal-Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to take part in the debate on the budget brought down yesterday by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). Mr. Speaker, I sincerely believe, considering the difficult economic situation facing all industrialized countries, that the budget tabled by the Minister of Finance is a good budget and a realistic one, because it pursues two important objectives, namely to fight unemployment and inflation. The opposition parties, both the Progressive Conservative and the New Democratic Party, will say that it is not enough or that it is too little, too late, but if we look at this budget, still bearing in mind the economic situation and from a realistic rather than a political point of view, we must admit that it is a realistic budget, and I am confident that the measures announced in this budget will make a positive contribution towards helping Canadians who are facing problems at the present time.

Mr. Speaker, looking at the measures announced in the budget that will provide assistance to the unemployed, homeowners who are being squeezed by high mortgage rates, farmers, fishermen and small businesses, we shall see that the programs have met the expectations of Canadians. In fact, the government will spend $1.4 billion on financial assistance for these groups and on job creation.

And just how, Mr. Speaker, does the government intend to fight unemployment? First of all, the government will inject $200 million into local development programs which are extremely important, not only for job creation but also for the kind of services they set up for Canadians in ridings across the country. In addition, the government will spend $300 million on economic development programs in the private sector for the creation of permanent jobs. Both types of programs will ensure that additional jobs are created quickly and targeted especially to areas which have been particularly hard hit by the recession. Mr. Speaker, the government has decided to fight unemployment by creating jobs through housing assistance programs. The minister has announced five major measures to respond to the needs of the housing sector, while at the same time creating employment. The following is a passage related to the first program, and I quote:

> The government will provide grants of $3,000 to all purchasers of new houses on which construction starts before December 31, 1982, and to first-time buyers who purchase an existing house before that date. It is estimated that 100,000 purchasers will be eligible for this grant. The total cost of this new program is $300 million.

Under the second program, the government will add an additional $30 million allocation to the home renovation plan, thus increasing it to $60 million. Mr. Speaker, last Wednesday I had an opportunity to meet with Montreal representatives of the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation and city of Montreal officials, and I can assure the House that the program is greatly appreciated by the people of Montreal and that there are many applications, and I congratulate the minister on having given this program his special attention.

The third program also recognizes the needs of low-income Canadians. Under the program, the number of co-operative housing units will be increased by 2,500, thus raising the total number from 25,000 to 27,500 in 1982, in recognition of the housing needs of low-income groups. To demonstrate the importance of co-operative housing programs, Mr. Speaker, I would like to quote a letter from a member of a co-operative in my riding. I must say that in 1981 I saw 843 housing units under construction and, recently, I had the opportunity to attend the opening ceremonies of a co-operative which has managed to recycle or use an abandoned school and convert it into housing units. I can assure the House that the 31 families now living in those units built under the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation assistance program have nothing but praise for the minister's decision. I should like to quote a letter from someone in my riding who belongs to the co-operative movement:

Sir:

> As a voter in the Sainte-Marie riding, Mr. Malépart, I want to congratulate you for supporting the co-operative formula. I should think that you will gain more support if additional units are built. Having lived through that experiment in the past two years, I can assure you that the formula ought to be put forward. Unlike the low rental housing alternative, it gives tenants a sense of autonomy; people residing in co-operative units talk to each other, contribute to the chores to be done, which promotes dialogue and security. The units are very well maintained and the rent is reasonable, which is why I joined the movement because I have a small income and I could hardly make ends meet. This housing unit formula was just what I needed and I am sure I was not the only one in that predicament. I am a member of a Quebec association for the protection of the rights of people who are retired or about to be and I want to assure you that I am interested in anything that has to do with housing and I follow all programs very closely. Keep up the good work.

Yours truly,

Marie-Paule Langlois,
President
Rosemont Boulevard Co-operative Housing

Mr. Speaker, when people write letters like that, I think that one should stop criticizing—naturally, being permanently in the official opposition does account for a negative approach—and that after a series of programs such as that one, the Minister of Finance is to be congratulated. The programs which I have just mentioned should provide some 65,000 jobs during the next two years. I think that it is important. Moreover, the government is prepared to show some flexibility about the rental support plan which provides interest-free loans of $7,500. The government is prepared to increase that amount in some areas. It should be remembered that last March that plan was increased to 30,000 rental units and the creation of 50,000 additional jobs is anticipated. And I should add that this is another program of which the representatives from Montreal are proud and wish to make extensive use. Mr. Speaker, the Minister announced that the Canada Mortgage Renewal Plan introduced last November will be extended to December 31, 1983. Thus all home owners having to spend more than 30 per cent of their gross income on their mortgage payment, as a result of a renewal taking place after last evening, will be eligible for a grant of up to $3,000. It will no longer be necessary to defer interest before becoming eligible for a grant.

Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that the constituents of Montreal-Sainte-Marie will be pleased to take advantage of those housing and job-creation programs. I should like to mention that after consultation with my nine other colleagues from eastern Montreal, we asked for job-creation programs through housing construction and direct assistance to business. This was done after consultation with the people of eastern Montreal during a four-day tour on economic issues. Mr. Speaker, the minister also announced the injection of $500 million for interest assistance to small businesses, farmers and fishermen. This will reduce plant closures and job losses. Those are, Mr. Speaker, important steps to fight unemployment.

Now let us see the steps taken by the government to bring down inflation, an evil affecting everyone but especially small and middle-income Canadians. We must remember that the minister has asked all Canadians to work together to bring down inflation, but that he insisted on protecting low-income Canadians, including middle-income families receiving family allowances and the child tax credit and senior citizens who receive the guaranteed income supplement. As its first anti-inflation measure, the government has decided to cut pay increases to 6 per cent for the next year and to 5 per cent the year after for employees in the federal public sector.

The first affected will be members of the House of Commons, ministers of the Crown and senators. In addition to restricting salary increases to 6 per cent next year and to 5 per cent the following year, the minister has announced that our salaries will be reduced this year. In addition, pay increases for public servants and Crown corporation employees will be limited to the same targets of 6 per cent and 5 per cent for the next two years. Moreover, the government will limit the indexation of personal exemptions and tax brackets to 6 per cent for the 1983 taxation year and to 5 per cent for the 1984 taxation year. Effective January 1, 1983, indexation of the pensions paid to former Members of Parliament and public servants will be limited to 6 per cent for 12 months and to 5 per cent for the following 12 months. Effective the same dates, the indexing factor applicable to family allowances and old age security pensions will also be limited to 6 per cent and 5 per cent for the next 2 years.

However, Mr. Speaker, I am glad to note that the Minister of Finance has protected low income families by increasing by $50 the child tax credit for the 1982 taxation year which will continue to be fully indexed. This increase will raise the credit from $293 to $343 for each child. I believe that this decision is much fairer than that made by the Parti Québecois government in Quebec on January 1, which was to grant no increase in family allowances, and I would like to remind my Progressive Conservative friends in this regard that when they were in power, they had created a committee to remove the universality principle from the family allowance program. Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the minister for protecting senior citizens receiving the guaranteed income supplement in part or in full, which will continue to be fully indexed. Then again the Minister of Finance did not follow the example set by the Lévesque government when they decided, on January 1, to index social benefits at 8 per cent rather than the amount of indexing, and in the case of mothers with children to index at 6 per cent only. He provided instead for increases in the federal family allowances and tax credit. I would also tell my Progressive Conservative friends that as far as the basic pension is concerned, they themselves had a committee looking into the abolition of universal pensions, let alone limiting indexation to 6 per cent. They should be honest in their comments today. Also, veterans' pensions will remain fully indexed.

Mr. Speaker, in order to fight inflation, the Canadian government is not content with limiting salary increases. It is also asking federal agencies that regulate the cost of essential goods and services, such as public transportation, public communications and food, to endorse the objects of this budget and to limit price increases. In addition, the Prime Minister will meet tomorrow with provincial premiers. He will ask them to limit price increases as well within their jurisdiction, and I hope they will agree to that.

Mr. Speaker, the budget also includes a new interesting proposal to consider implementing a special program of interest rates lowered by 3 to 6 per cent for buyers of new homes. Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, this budget puts foward significant proposals to fight unemployment and inflation, and I am convinced that all my constituents in my Montréal-Sainte-Marie riding will make maximum use of these new assistance programs. I will make it a duty to help them get more, because I am convinced that Canadians across the country will use the programs made available by the Canadian government, despite the criticism voiced by the Progressive Conservatives and the New Democrats.

[English]

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I am certainly pleased to have an opportunity to speak on this budget. I will not begin the major part of my speech now since there is only a minute or two left. I wonder if it might be considered ten o'clock in order that I could commence fresh tomorrow.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deans: Fine. Then let me deal very briefly with the remarks of the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) who devoted much of his time to putting on the record matters which were blatantly unsupportable by the facts. I want to make it quite clear that his comments were not only unkind and unjustified, they were untrue. I would suggest that if the hon. member were to be as honourable as he claims to be, he would be prepared to come into the House and retract many of the statements he made. However, knowing the calibre and quality of much of the comment made by the official opposition, I am quite sure he would not want to do that.

I want to put very quickly, sir, one matter on the record. A lot has been said about the deficit, and it is true the deficit has reached a level which must surely be causing every single member of the House of Commons great alarm. However, if we continue with the policies set out in the budget document presented to us by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) on Monday evening, there is no doubt in my mind that the deficit we have today is but a pittance compared to the deficit we are going to have within the next year.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

[English]

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES—PUBLICITY ISSUED BY MONTREAL FESTIVAL

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East): Mr. Speaker, on June 21 I put a question to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove) with respect to an ad which appeared in the Montreal Gazette on June 19. This was an ad published by the Festival du Vieux Port de Montréal, a federal Crown corporation which reports to parliament through the Minister of Public Works. This ad which was completely in the French language was published in an English-language newspaper, namely The Gazette, in a city where 20 per cent of the population is English speaking.

In my question I asked the minister why this ad was published in French in violation and in contradiction of the Federal Officials Languages Act and in violation of the provisions of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in those sections dealing with language rights. I asked the minister to investigate why this ad had been published in such contravention and in such an insensitive way. I asked the minister what he would do to correct this situation. He responded that he had not been aware of the situation but he felt that it was an insensitive act on the part of those who did it and that he would look into the matter.

Following that answer in the House I learned through the press, not directly through my office, that the reason the ad was published only in French is that an English version had not yet been prepared. I do not think that is an acceptable reason. I might point out as well that all other publicity materials published by the federal Crown corporation Festival du Vieux Port de Montréal were also published solely and completely in the French language. I have here an invitation to a reception to announce the summer program of the festival. It is in French only. I have another invitation from Mr. Paul Gerin-Lajoie, president of the Crown corporation, with respect to another opening ceremony, which is completely in French. When the ad was finally put in the Montreal Gazette in English on June 26 a so-called translated ad was printed with some terrible mistakes in the English language. For example they translated the French which read: "Programmation à diviser et à conserver" as "unscrew and save". In other words I was to unscrew this from the Montreal Gazette and save it. I do not believe there is any excuse to violate the federal Official Languages Act in English or in French anywhere in this country.

This is not the first time I have complained about the federal public service in Quebec operating solely in French. I have done so before, and I have complained with respect to billboard programs only in French in parts of Montreal where the population is 80 per cent English-speaking. I have complained about places where federal public servants in Quebec refuse to speak English to English-speaking clients in the city of Montreal. It is my belief that the federal government through its ministers must make clear to the public service in Quebec that we operate in both official languages and that we serve the public in the official language of their choice.

In 1977 the federal government made it clear in a published statement that the federal government does not come under the provisions of Bill 101 in Quebec. Bill 101 is a provincial law covering provincial matters and a provincial responsibility. All matters in Quebec that come under federal responsibility are subject to the bilingual provision of the federal law on that subject matter.

I might say that since my question was raised in the House the federal government has published a full page ad in the Montreal Gazette about which I was extremely pleased. This confirmed the federal government's policy on official languages. This ad is titled, "The Government of Canada Serving You in Both Official Languages in Your Area". It sets out all the departments in Montreal and where you can complain if there is any violation of language rights in the Montreal area. That is the sort of policy I want to see but it must be maintained in every area of the public service in Quebec and throughout Canada.

I also want to make it clear that I am not opposed to any measure which will fully protect and help the French language in Quebec flourish. However, one language is not helped by bringing punitive measures against another language, especially a minority language. I might also add that actions such as these by federal civil servants in Quebec are occurring at a time when there is a provincial government which is continually eroding minority rights of English speaking people in the province of Quebec. Therefore, this action, when added to the sins of the other government, are not well received.

I am pleased with this follow-up ad which was put in The Gazette on June 23 setting out our policy on official languages, but I want to urge very strongly that the government ensure that all their directors and top civil servants in Quebec are made fully aware of our policy on official languages in Quebec, and to ensure that the population of that province is served in the official language of choice, be it English or French, and that the same policy be pursued throughout the country with respect to the French language minorities in other provinces.

[Translation]

Mr. Henri Tousignant (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to reply tonight to the question the hon. member raised in the House on June 21. The minister had promised then to look into the matter. I understand that the minister has asked the officials of the Festival du Vieux Port de Montréal to provide him with detailed information concerning the publication of an ad completely in French in the English-speaking Montreal Gazette. The Festival du Vieux Port de Montréal is a federal Crown corporation which is listed in Schedule C of the Financial Administration Act and which reports to Parliament through the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove). It was established in 1981 to update the waterfront in old Montreal. Its purpose is to promote, administer and develop the waterfront. It must comply with the Government of Canada's official language policy and, as a matter of fact, has always complied with them. It is unfortunate that the ad which was published in The Gazette of June 19 was in French only. This ad was designed to promote the Festival du Vieux Port this summer which was scheduled to begin on June 20. In view of the tight publicity schedule and last-minute changes to the French version, it was decided to publish the ad anyway to make sure that The Gazette readership would be aware of the event. On June 26, as the hon. member has just mentioned the ad was published again, in English this time, in The Gazette and the Ottawa Citizen.

Of course, errors will happen as they often do in French translation. I would also emphasize, Mr. Speaker, that this is an exceptional case, even a unique one. I want to assure hon. members that every effort will be made to ensure that the Canadian government's policy on official languages is strictly adhered to by the corporation of the Vieux Port de Montreal. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would take this opportunity to commend the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East (Mr. Allmand) for his perceptiveness and pay tribute to his continuing vigilance, either in this House or outside. He never hesitates to defend our policy on official languages. I hope he is satisfied with this information.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—ANNOUNCEMENT OF LAY-OFFS. (B) REQUEST THAT MINISTER MAKE REPRESENTATIONS TO CABINET

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago I rose in the House of Commons and asked the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) to assure the 3,000 CN workers who were being laid off that they will indeed be rehired, and that the lay-offs are only temporary. I asked him to advise these workers when they will be rehired. At that time the minister advised that the lay-offs were until October 15, 1982. However, he did not say if they would all be rehired. This only leads to scared speculation, not reassurance.

I would like to ask the minister a question: if not all of these 3,000 CN employees, 750 of whom live in the Moncton area, are not rehired, where does the minister expect them to find alternative employment? In the Moncton area there is little hope they would find suitable employment because there are no jobs available. Much of the credit for this must go to the federal government.

Many of the actions initiated by this government and by the minister himself have cost the maritimes and the Moncton area thousands of jobs, jobs that are desperately needed and that simply cannot be found. In the past year the government is responsible for terminating the Atlantic Limited with the loss of hundreds of jobs and millions in revenues. This decision was taken on one of Canada's most popular and best used passenger trains. It is responsible for transferring the water quality control out of Moncton to Brampton, Ontario, thereby terminating several more jobs. It is undoubtedly responsible for the odious and questionable decision to close down CFB Chatham. This closure will cost the community 1,500 jobs and $30 million annually in lost revenues. CFB Chatham contributes over 40 per cent of basic employment in the Miramichi region. This is a move that will reverberate all the way to Moncton. This government is also responsible for postponing the multi-million dollar Mitel project.

Now, any hope that had been held to improve the Atlantic economy and relieve the massive unemployment of this region has been shattered by a budget that has completely ignored this rampant problem. The finance minister failed again to find an answer to the severe economic retardation and spiralling unemployment that afflicts Atlantic Canada. This region has the highest unemployment of any region in Canada—14.5 per cent—and it promises to get worse. In fact, all indicators suggest that the recent budget could very well aggravate the unemployment problem.

There is an alternative to these lay-offs; a very feasible and constructive alternative to these unwanted and apparently unnecessarily long lay-offs. The CN employees who are being laid off could well be kept on to maintain and repair the rail equipment and prepare it for the time when business is better. This is a policy supported and advocated by the CN employees who are eager and anxious to work.

A great deal of CN equipment is not being properly maintained and a slow period such as we are in would be an ideal time to repair and maintain the rolling stock as well as the tracks, bridges etc. Three bad derailments have occurred in the past eight months in the maritime region that are directly attributable to the poor condition of either the rolling stock or the beds. Human error was not responsible. These derailments cost millions of dollars in clean-up operations, lost cargo and lost equipment. Those same dollars could better and more safely be used to keep men working to maintain this equipment at peak condition.

If the men were kept working to maintain this equipment CN would be in a better position to handle increased goods when business improves. I trust they will not allow themselves to be caught in a position of having to turn away business because they do not have the equipment needed to handle the job. That is simply bad management.

I have a telegram I received from the New Brunswick Federation of Labour advising me of a motion passed by its brotherhood unanimously condemning plans by CN and CP railways to further extend the length of the earlier announced closure of the main shops. In the telegram the Federation says:

> These lay-offs will cause thousands of railway workers across Canada to be unemployed, further compounding an already disastrous unemployment situation. Federal Liberal government support of this action demonstrates a total disregard for the dignity of those workers affected who want to be a productive part of society.

The effects of these lay-offs will undoubtedly compound the problems afflicting the economy. These CN employees are being told they will be laid off for 13 weeks. That is 3 months and one week. We are talking about three months and one week during which families are required to tighten their belts and live without incomes, whereby additional dollars would be forever lost to the business community. These people want to work; they are proud and independent. They want the 13 weeks of work and the assurance they will all have jobs. I am hoping that the callous and insensitive attitudes offered the Canadian public are not perpetuated in this situation too.

Last night the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) stole the last hope a great many Canadians had for economic recovery and for new jobs. Economists predict the situation will get worse before it gets better. The nonproductive and avoidable lay-off of 3,000 employees will not help this situation. It will only worsen the predicament.

The Minister of Transport has an opportunity here to aid 750 people in the Moncton area and another 2,300 across Canada in maintaining their jobs, and preserving their pride and dignity, and to keep the economy of these affected regions from becoming worse. I recommend that the Minister of Transport urge CN and CP to put these workers to work this summer maintaining the rail equipment. It is a job that has to be done, one these workers have the expertise to do and one that will allow rail employees the dignity of working and earning a living.

This government also has a responsibility to Canadians to ensure a prosperous economic environment. To borrow the words of the Minister of Finance:

> Canadians want to know how we can get our economy growing again, how we can get industry to invest, expand and provide the jobs our people need. There are 1,250,000 among us who are unemployed. Still more are struggling to make ends meet in the face of high inflation and interest rates. We are all suffering one way or another from the recession that is battering our economy. We are all searching for a way out of it.

The minister continued to say that the purpose of his budget was to offer Canadians a way to end the recession and to speed our progress toward recovery through immediate action. As the government elected by Canadians to do the job, the ball is in their court. I suggest they get on with it. Recovery cannot be aided by laying off 3,000 rail employees.

It seems that this government is determined to ride to glory on the backs of pensioners, the armed services, and those productively employed. My position as a Member of Parliament requires that, despite the deaf ears and petrified minds I am attempting to appeal to, I must continue to appeal to those minds on behalf of the people of the Atlantic region of Canada.

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I compliment the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Corbett) for speaking so strongly on behalf of the constituents in that part of the country. However, I would remind the hon. member that Canadian National must compete in the marketplace the same as any private industry.

It is faced with the same financial pressures in times of declining business activity as other Canadian companies, whether publicly or privately owned. If, as a Crown corporation, CN is asked to isolate itself from the marketplace, the government would be expected to provide financial assistance, and on a very large scale.

In response to last night's budget, the hon. member's party criticized this government viciously for the deplorable deficits, yet he did not recommend tonight how the government will pay CN to cover these workers. Let us have some constructive suggestions, not just willy-nilly criticisms.

The hon. member is aware, because the minister has pointed out in this House and I have pointed out previously in this chamber, that CN lost $67 million in the first quarter compared to a $70 million gain last year. Revenue tonne miles for the first five and a half months of 1982 were down almost 15 per cent. Carloadings were down 16 per cent at the end of May and 9,500 cars are sitting idle.

It is in this context that CN was forced to take the difficult decision of extending the regular close-down of maintenance shops. I emphasize that it is a close-down. The planned recall date is October 15.

In conclusion, I want to repeat what I and the minister have said, that most workers will be receiving up to 80 per cent of their salaries during the close-down period. I hope the hon. member will look at this particular situation in the context of what the Minister of Finance said last night. Only through the spirit of solidarity and sharing are we going to improve the situation and get these employees back to work.

When the hon. member tries to shoulder the blame on the government, I remind him that in a democratic system of government the opposition is part of that government. The opposition has a role to play, to remind Canadians that we have to put our shoulders together, and work together to bring down this 12 per cent recession to a 6 per cent recovery.

INDIAN AFFAIRS—DELAY IN ON-RESERVE HOUSING PROGRAM. (B) CONSTRUCTION OF SCHOOL AT DILLON, SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, the circumstances I want to bring up this evening have to do with questions I put to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) on June 16 during question period. As yet I have heard nothing in reply from the minister. I am very concerned. If I cannot get answers to these questions this evening from the hon. parliamentary secretary, I would like him to at least take time to prepare a response very soon on this pressing problem.

The Buffalo River Indian Band in Dillon, Saskatchewan is very concerned about a school which is soon to be built in their community. The band is located in a remote area of northern Saskatchewan. Because of their situation they appealed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, asking that their school be built in accordance with provincial standards. Although it is not the case in all areas of Canada, it is a fact that in Saskatchewan standards set for building schools are far superior to the federal standard set by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

After pressing the minister the band received a commitment that the school would be built according to provincial standards, and as a result these would be a much better facility to meet the needs of the local citizens.

Now that the time for the construction of the new school has come upon us, it is suspected that the minister is being pressured by some department officials to back out of his commitment. Some questions need to be answered and I respectfully ask that they be answered now or fairly soon.

First, will the minister keep his commitment and see that the school for the Buffalo River Band will be built to provincial standards, or at least an updated federal equivalent, which could be the case? This would help many other Indian bands in Saskatchewan as well.

Second, I would like to know when this information will be communicated to the band officials.

Third, if there are any problems, will the minister meet with the band to solve them?

Finally, when will construction of the new school actually commence?

These questions need to be answered, and answered soon, so that the children at Dillon will not have to face another year of going to school in a building in such decrepit condition. Part of the national media last year covered the situation of the parents at Dillon, members of the Buffalo River Band, pulling their students out of school and not allowing them to go back until the government made a commitment to build a school for them. The conditions are very bad in the present school.

I see that my time is quickly passing, so I would like to pose a second question. It is a question dealing with the on-reserve housing program in the province of Saskatchewan. I imagine this not only applies to Saskatchewan but extends throughout Canada. I am familiar with the Saskatchewan situation and this particular case. Of 505 units allocated to Saskatchewan this year, none has been started as of yet. The reason is that circular "J-1" was introduced and is being very strictly enforced, at least to this point in time. I would like to ask the minister, to have the "J-1" circular withdrawn, or at least have the rules relaxed, so that many bands—some of the bands, or all of them—can meet the criteria that will allow them to begin their housing projects now. It is very unpleasant for anyone with experience in trying to build a house during the winter months, to meet the very stringent budget the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development sets for the Indian bands.

I would like to point out in respect of the school situation for the Buffalo River Band, that the province of Saskatchewan set up the Department of Northern Saskatchewan a number of years ago, in the early 1970s. As a result, communities of similar size and structure, not on reservation land, were built to great standards by the Department of Northern Saskatchewan. They have never at any time had better educational facilities. They have sewer and water in almost all of their housing projects. They are modern communities in which people are very proud to live.

That is not so on Indian reserves in northern Saskatchewan, in particular, and in the entire province in general, and we would like to see the standards of reserves raised significantly above what they have been to this point. It seems that the department is getting more and more heavily structured and leaning away from allowing Indian people to control their own destiny. It seems they have become dependent on the federal government and dependent upon a welfare handout sytem. They have little hope of building their economies or the economic bases on reserves so that they can seek some kind of self determination and be responsible for their own affairs. I believe the present ratio is about 33 to one; there is one federal government employee for every 33 treaty Indians in Canada. That number is growing all the time. We must start moving away from that and begin putting more control of what happens to treaty Indian people on their lands into their own hands.

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chénier), let me say that I will not have time in the three minutes allotted to me to respond to all the hon. member's concerns, but I will address his last concern first, that is, his concern about "J" circulars.

The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) has been asked to suspend his department's "J" circulars which relate to the Indian on-reserve housing program. The reason given for this request is to allow the housing program on Indian reserves in Saskatchewan to begin. First let me say there is nothing in the "J" circulars themselves which prevents the housing program from beginning in Saskatchewan or, for that matter, in any other region of this department.

Until very recently, the departmental guidelines concerning the Indian on-reserve housing program were contained in the department's circular No. 57. That circular has been updated and included in a series of departmental circulars with alphabetical designations. The designation for community services and housing is "J". This circular reflects the government's concern about Indian on-reserve housing and that the performance of the housing program on Indian reserves meets its targets.

In these circulars Indian bands are asked to identify all the funding sources to complete a housing project before appropriated capital is released to the band. This will avoid the situation where housing projects end up underfunded, resulting in incompleted houses. This identification of sources has been a requirement of the program for some time. This position was discussed with Indian leaders from Saskatchewan during the week of June 14. Meetings are being held now, and will continue in the near future, to familiarize departmental staff and Indian bands with these new program guidelines.

I recommend that the hon. member write directly to the minister about the particular band he was discussing tonight.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock in the afternoon.

At 10.29 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

REQUEST THAT NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY REFLECT ON POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, with reference to the invitation of the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose) to reflect on my position regarding the reinstatement of capital punishment, the facts are that Donald Marshall pleaded innocent from the beginning, and alternately Clifford Olson boasted that he had deliberately planned and murdered a number of young people. These facts strengthen my belief that anyone who deliberately plans and murders another human being, and this is proven beyond a shadow of a doubt, should be put to death. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper):

That this House requests the NDP to reflect on its policies which permit a murderer like Olson to continue to live, while at the same time supporting abortion which is in reality the murder of unborn children.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FINANCE

THE BUDGET—POSITION OF FORMER FINANCE MINISTER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, according to confirmed reports in this morning's national press, former Liberal minister of finance John Turner consulted on several occasions with the present Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) on the totally inadequate budget which was presented here last Monday. It appears, therefore, that indexation of income, pensions and family allowances which was originally proposed by the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada, is now being disposed of by the Turner/MacEachen team on the hopeful assumption that the inflation rate will fall to a mere 6 per cent within only six months. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. Gilchrist):

That if former finance minister John Turner supports the removal of this plan, he should run once again for Parliament and he should therefore urge the Prime Minister to call the long overdue by-elections in three outstanding federal ridings so that the people of Canada will be able to express their clear opinion on his latest removal of full indexation.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED INCREASE IN ALLOWABLE INCOMES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mel Gass (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, Canadian veterans managed to survive a number of wars, but now find they cannot survive life in Canada due to these tough economic times and an uncaring Liberal government. It is ironic that tomorrow we will be celebrating Dominion Day in Canada, and yet the very people who fought to keep this country free are being forgotten in their time of need. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Corbett):

That this House instruct the Minister of Veterans Affairs to take immediate steps to raise substantially the annual allowable incomes in respect of the war veterans allowance from their current unacceptable and unrealistic levels.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

TAXATION OF HEALTH AND NORTHERN BENEFITS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, in light of the fact that Monday's budget failed to retract the government's policy of taxing dental, medical and northern benefits received by many employees, and in view of the fact that the taxation of medical and dental benefits represents a tax on those very benefits the government should be encouraging, and since the taxation of northern benefits is in reality a tax on the extra work-related expenses incurred as a result of higher costs in remote and northern areas and should not be the subject of taxation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton):

That this government which retreated on so many other tax measures on Monday evening should announce immediately an extension of non-taxation for medical, dental and northern benefits until it has a comprehensive government policy on these issues.

IMMIGRATION

ELIGIBILITY OF LEBANESE VISITORS FOR MEDICAL CARE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, I seek unanimous consent of the House on a matter of extreme urgency. The Minister of Employment and Immigration has recently taken action to allow Lebanese visitors to Canada to remain in Canada for an additional year, with a minister's permit to work. Further, Lebanese visitors who have eligible Canadian relatives who can sponsor them, or are able to offer a guarantee of assistance, may also apply for permanent residence without leaving Canada.

While the minister is to be commended for his actions in this regard, many Lebanese visitors to Canada will require normal medical care over the next year. The cost to their families will be prohibitive, because their present status does not allow these people to enrol in medicare. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga):

That this House direct the Minister of Employment and Immigration and the Minister of Health and Welfare to enact the necessary changes in the regulations to allow these people coverage under medicare so that when the need arises for medical attention the Lebanese people visiting Canada will not be unfairly treated.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

SOCIAL SECURITY

IMPACT OF BUDGET ON OLD AGE PENSIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, tomorrow we celebrate Canada's 115th birthday and pay our tribute and respect to the thousands of elderly citizens whose effort and dedication in past years helped provide a better future for us all. Yet in Monday night's budget, grabbing even more of the taxpayers' money to throw away on its disastrous economic policies, the government ignored the financial plight of many of our senior citizens who do not receive the Guaranteed Income Supplement, and announced plans to raise the personal income taxes of this group. These people who, while working hard for our future comfort, set aside a meagre amount of money for their own, should not be so shabbily punished. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis):

That the Minister of Finance, in tribute to this group of very special Canadians on the eve of Dominion Day, immediately announce his intention to rescind the tax penalty on all Canadians receiving the old age security pension.

They worked hard for our security. We should protect theirs.

POSITION OF FORMER FINANCE MINISTER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I rise—with regard to press reports that the Hon. John Turner, a former minister of finance, met to discuss the current budget with the present Minister of Finance—to establish whether force or coercion was used on Mr. Turner to effect this meeting. Was he tricked into meeting with the leading member of the gang that cannot shoot straight? Was "Old Blue Eyes" bleary-eyed over the budget proposals, or did he concur in this latest canoe trip to Dunkirk? I therefore, move, seconded by the hon. member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer):

That the Minister of Finance explain to this House just how this seemingly impossible meeting was arranged and whether or not the Canadian people have John Turner to blame for the budget mess.

Did Mr. Turner indicate that the Canadian people and the press will have John Turner to kick around again soon, or was the present Minister of Finance seeking ways to vacate the sinking ship?

CROWSNEST PASS RATES—SUGGESTED REFERENDUM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, on Monday last the Gilson report on the Crow rate was made public in Winnipeg. Since the major impact of any change to the Crow rate will be felt by prairie grain producers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong):

That the federal government conduct a referendum among Canadian Wheat Board permit holders so that grain producers themselves can choose between the recommendations of the Hall Commission and those of the Gilson report, and furthermore that a democratic referendum be conducted before any legislation affecting western grain transportation is introduced before the House of Commons in the fall.

CROWN CORPORATIONS

SPEECH BY DEVCO PRESIDENT AT LIBERAL PARTY DINNER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Wright (Calgary North): Madam Speaker, given that the President of the Treasury Board fired Neil Fraser for voicing his opinion about government policy, and given that the Prime Minister has limited free speech by stating that public service personnel may only philosophize about public policy, and given that Steve Rankin, President of Devco, a Crown corporation, spoke at a Liberal dinner last week in West Bay, Nova Scotia, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That the President of the Treasury Board make a statement as to whether there are two classes of Public Service personnel where free speech is concerned, especially depending on their policital affiliation.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

EMPLOYMENT

THE BUDGET—ALLOCATION OF FUNDS FOR DIRECT JOB CREATION

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The minister will obviously know that on Monday night in the budget speech the Minister of Finance indicated or left the impression that there was to be $750 million allocated for job creation. Indeed, in his own speech on the budget yesterday, the Minister of Employment and Immigration said the following about job creation:

It is for that reason that the budget of this government has put $2.3 billion on the table which will create in immediate, direct term 200,000 jobs.

He also said:

There is an increase of $450 million for direct job creation; that was put in the budget last night.

Those statements and those numbers are clearly misleading and, in my view, intentionally confusing. I would like the Minister of Employment and Immigration to stand now and confirm to this House that his department received $100 million for direct job allocation for this year and not $2.3 billion, not $750 million, and not $450 million. Will he do that now?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): To be frank, Madam Speaker, I do not know what the hon. member for Rosedale is talking about. His figures are totally and completely confused, because the budget statement was very clear in its allocation of the funds. I would like to point out that with the additional money allocated in the budget this government will be spending more this year than ever in its history on direct job creation. It will be creating close to 60,000 or 70,000 new jobs on top of the over 115,000 or 120,000 employment opportunities provided in this year's estimates for job creation. The total amount we are allocating for direct job creation has nothing to do with the money in housing or the money in economic development. The amount allocated to my department for direct job creation is well over $650 million this year.

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, there the minister goes with his number nonsense and word magic. If he looks at page 13 of the budget papers, he will see new expenditure measures. The first one is direct employment measures. It is not $450 million, not $250 million, not $750 million, and certainly not $2.3 billion, but $100 million. That is at page 13 of the budget papers. Why will the minister not admit it?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: Instead of trying to mislead the people.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, there is only one group in this House trying to mislead the people, and that is the group across the aisle from us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: At a time when this country needs some degree of hope and inspiration—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Axworthy: —the opposition is irresponsibly distorting the facts and creating confusion. That has a serious detrimental effect on the economic growth of the country. We are looking at the biggest problem in the economy right across from us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Oral Questions

ACCURACY OF FUNDING COMMITMENT

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, the figures I used come from the budget papers of the Minister of Finance. Page 13 allocates $100 million for direct job creation this year. There is not any other figure. At a time when the Minister of Finance is asking the people of the country to share the burdens and benefits, what Canadians really want to know is why the Minister of Employment and Immigration and, indeed, the government are not willing to share the truth. The fact of the matter is not in the speeches of the Minister of Employment and Immigration and not in the speeches of the Minister of Finance but in the budget papers themselves. Page 13 tells the truth. Why won't the government?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, let me try to help the hon. member for Rosedale in his addition, because obviously his ability in mathematics is sorely lacking. The fact of the matter is that the budget clearly stated an additional $200 million will go into the new CCDP round of employment opportunities. In addition, there are $150 million for special employment initiatives which are construction related. In addition, $300 million are allocated to the economic development reserve for long-term permament job creation. That adds up, in anybody's language, to $650 million. The hon. member for Rosedale has a problem. We have a new training bill which provides opportunities for retraining, and I suggest the hon. member take it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FINANCE

THE BUDGET—CONSULTATION WITH FORMER FINANCE MINISTER

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance on the subject of the budget. The Toronto Star reported today that the Hon. John Turner consulted with the Minister of Finance on "several occasions" about the contents of the budget. This is very appropriate, since the period when Mr. Turner was minister of finance was the last time that government spending got totally out of whack. I would remind the House that government spending over the four years that he was in office increased by 108 per cent.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wilson: Hon. members opposite do not like the truth, Madam Speaker. I repeat, government spending increased by 108 per cent over four years. What did the minister discuss with Mr. Turner? Was it the proposal to remove indexation from senior citizens, or was it some ideas on how to contain the government's budget deficit?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The question has been asked.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I must say that I am surprised that the hon. member would expect me to advise the House on conversations I have with private citizens, no matter from what source they may come. That is an extraordinarily new idea that is proposed by the hon. member.

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, I am very interested that the minister does not deny that he took a great deal of advice from the former minister of finance on the contents of the budget. That certainly shows in the budget.

POSSIBILITY OF MANDATORY WAGE AND PRICE CONTROLS

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question. A number of Liberal members of Parliament are referring to this budget as a three-month budget. It has fallen well short of their expectations, and some parliamentary secretaries are saying that there will be mandatory controls in the fall.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Who?

Mr. Wilson: I believe it was the member from Willowdale and the member from Sudbury.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wilson: It is very difficult to put questions today, Madam Speaker.

When does the minister propose to bring forward his next budget, and under what circumstances will he do so? What economic circumstances might involve the mandatory controls referred to on page 11 of the budget document where there is mention that one of the options is a controlled society? What conditions would lead to that controlled society?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, in the budget statement I made it very clear that the government is not proposing to the House of Commons the implementation of a system of price controls. That is why, in the final part of my speech to which the hon. member made reference, I rejected that possibility again. I want to assure the hon. member that we are proceeding with the implementation of the wage restraint in the public sector and we are confident that the private sector will see the validity of that approach as well. Comprehensive wage and price controls are not in the cards.

PUBLIC SERVICE

IMPOSITION OF WAGE CONTROLS—EFFECT ON CONTRACTS

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. Yesterday federal civil servants learned that not only have they been chosen as the principal victims of the government's wage control policy, but that contracts they have signed which afford them increases in excess of the 6 per cent guideline will be broken by the government by force of law. Yesterday the Prime Minister indicated that the federal government could not go back on its contractual agreements with the oil producing provinces with regard to oil price increases this coming month which will add at least one percentage point to inflation.

Can the President of the Treasury Board explain to me, this House, and the Canadian public, why the double standard? How can the minister expect civil servants to continue doing the job required of them when, on the one hand, the government is prepared to break contracts with them, while on the other hand it is not prepared to interfere in the inflationary rise in the price of oil?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, first I would like to point out that the principal victims, as the hon. member refers to them, are the members of this House of Commons and I think we should all be grateful for that. The questioner himself is one of the principal victims. Members of Parliament are taking a cut in wages, as are ministers.

The Minister of Finance, when he delivered his budget, indicated that the exceptional circumstances of our economy today require exceptional action, action which obviously most of us would not like to take were it not for the very serious economic circumstances with which we are confronted, but of which the hon. member does not seem to be conscious. Therefore, the program has been designed to provide a maximum degree of equity to all parts of the public sector which are afffected.

ROLL BACK OF WAGES FOR CLERKS

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I note the minister failed to answer the question. He talks about a maximum degree of equity. How does he explain equity in a situation where, two years ago, when 800 clerks employed by the Government of Canada and earning just slightly over $11,000 a year, had to go on strike to get a 13 per cent increase, and will now have it rolled back to the point where they will lose something in the order of $600 a year? Their wages will go to $12,000-plus a year, which is below the poverty line for a family in Canada. Let me ask the minister: where the hell is the equity in that?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, let me point out that the clerks in the last round of negotiations did not go on strike. They have a contract with a particular incremental increase at the present time, and when that contract comes up for a further increase they will go under the program. As a result of that they will also get out of the program sooner than they would have had they gone in after the second year of the contract. That is the way the program is designed to operate.

APPLICATION OF GUIDELINES TO ALL SALARY LEVELS

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Let me ask the minister again where is the equity in denying people earning $12,000 a year a decent wage increase in order that they can live with their families in some kind of dignity, while at the same time applying exactly the same kind of guidelines to people earning $79,000, $80,000 and $100,000 a year? That is absolutely unacceptable.

Mr. Nystrom: Like Bouey.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, the hon. member does not seem to recognize that what is at stake here is a war, a battle, a national battle—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Johnston: —against inflation. Madam Speaker, if we are successful in this crusade then no one will suffer because inflation will be at 6 per cent and 5 per cent. Six and five is where we intend to take inflation in this country, and we can do it with some help from our friends in the NDP, and the constituencies they represent.

FINANCE

INCREASE IN GOVERNMENT DEFICIT

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In the seven-month budget of November 12, 1981, you stated that the government's fundamental response to the interest rate problem was deficit reduction which would bring down inflation and interest rates. You said you had a deficit then of $10.5 billion and that you were going to borrow $6.6 billion.

On May 20 you told this House that you were urging the Americans, and I quote, "to reduce their deficit so there could be a drop in interest rates". My question to the minister is this. You have now revealed a deficit—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is a senior enough member in the House to know that he must address the Chair.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, my question to the minister is this: on Monday the minister admitted to a deficit of $20 billion and that his financing requirements were $17 billion. What is your strategy now that the deficit reduction strategy is in ruins?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Crosbie: How are you now going to bring down interest rates since you can no longer reduce the deficit?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows perfectly well that the principal cause of the increased deficit and the increased financial requirements is due to the recession and that, as recovery takes place in Canada, that increase in the deficit will be automatically reversed. The increase in the deficit is the automatic response to the recession. It is a large deficit. It is the result of the recession, and it was not my view that we ought at this time to weaken the economy further by an effort to reduce the deficit below its present level. That is the reason for carrying the deficit which, as I have stated, and I will repeat, will automatically be reversed as a result of a recovery in the economy.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, the economy is in a shambles because everyone has lost faith in this government which will not answer questions put to its ministers.

MONETARY POLICY

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question to the minister is this: your deficit reduction strategy has now gone. There is no longer a deficit. You have to borrow $17 million—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. May I remind the hon. member that the correct form is "the minister's deficit . . . " and then whatever follows.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, my question to the minister is this: his deficit is now $17 billion. He has to go to the markets and compete with provinces, municipalities and private individuals to borrow that amount. My question to the minister in the third person is this: is the government still going to continue to support the tight money policy of the Bank of Canada, which will mean that with the government's huge demands interest rates must go up? Or is the government going to direct the Bank of Canada to change its monetary policy to print more money so that the minister can borrow this huge amount, more than the whole expenditure of the government in 1968, without interest rates going up? Which is the government going to do? Are we now doomed to high interest rates with no hope whatsoever as a result of your huge deficit?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): No, Madam Speaker. I want to assure the hon. member that will not be the outcome. If the economy were in a very buoyant situation, this current deficit would undoubtedly put upward pressure on interest rates and on inflation. But the economy is not in a buoyant situation. It is in a period of recession and weakness.

Mr. Blackburn: Why are you raising taxes then?

Mr. MacEachen: With that situation, Madam Speaker, and with savings rates in this country at 13 per cent at the present time, financing of this deficit will not have the effect on interest rates and inflation which the hon. member fears. I want to give him my view that his fears will not be realized.

Mr. Crosbie: That is assurance, is it?

FINANCING OF DEBT

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. I want to point out to the minister that in the next 12 months either he has to borrow or refinance very close to $60 billion in government debt. All last year the minister and the government were price leaders in the marketplace, as witness the 19.5 per cent savings bond rate. What kind of rates of interest does the minister contemplate paying in order to finance, in the markets of Canada, this $60 billion that it has to look after within the next 12 months?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I have already explained to the hon. member for St. John's West—

Mr. Crosbie: You did not satisfy me.

Mr. MacEachen: —that, in my opinion, because of the current recession in the economy, because of the weakness in the economy, because of the reduced demand of private borrowers in the market as a result of that weakness, because of the high level of savings in this country, that it will be possible to finance the requirements of the government in the market without putting undue pressure on interest rates and without crowding private borrowers out of the market.

Mr. Andre: Nonsense.

Mr. MacEachen: That is my view, Madam Speaker, which I gave to the hon. member in reply to his question.

Mr. Andre: That is as accurate as your November 12 view.

LEVEL OF GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, the market has indicated pretty clearly that it does not have any confidence in the minister's figures. The minister came to this House and said he had a 6 per cent solution for Canada, but he went ahead and increased the government's expense by 20 per cent. Would he explain to this House how he can expect the country to have any confidence in the management of the country's affairs when he asks everybody to reduce their expectations to 6 per cent and he increases his government expense by 20 per cent?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, that is another false statement that is made by the hon. member.

Mr. Andre: It is on page 12 of your documents.

Mr. MacEachen: If the hon. member refers to the Public Accounts, which are the traditional way of looking at total outlays—

Mr. Wilson: You did not say that last year.

Mr. MacEachen: —he will find that the increase in expenditures year to year is significantly less than 20 per cent. I would remind the hon. member, in making these comparisons, that when he uses the national accounts he is bringing into the total expenditures items such as the oil compensation charge which is then offset by compensation payments. When netted out, the total outlays are reduced, as they ought to be.

BUDGET'S CAPITAL COST ALLOWANCE PROVISIONS

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. We on this side of the House welcome any measure that will assist small businesses in terms of development. But I point out to the minister that on November 12 last year he brought in a provision with respect to capital cost allowance which has done more to prevent retooling and has dried up cash flow. If the minister is serious about resuscitating small business and if he wants to give a signal to the business community, will he consider repealing—which he did not the other night—the capital cost allowance provision in his budget of November 12, 1981?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): No, Madam Speaker, I could not possibly repeal overall the capital cost allowance.

Mr. Crosbie: Why not? You have repealed everyting else.

Mr. MacEachen: If accepted, that would be a further large addition to the deficit which hon. members opposite have been complaining about in their last several questions.

Mr. Crosbie: Cut government advertising and the Minister of Justice.

Mr. MacEachen: The new regime that has been put in place under the November budget does not increase the tax liabilities of firms or corporations; it advances these payments more rapidly than otherwise would take place.

Mr. Crosbie: Cut out the lies and deceit.

Mr. MacEachen: I would remind the hon. member as well that the treatment of the capital cost allowance made under the income tax law in Canada is more favourable than the one currently in place in the United States, our neighbour to the south.

Mr. Speyer: Madam Speaker, I point out to the minister that when businessmen and women of Canada are going broke it is very difficult for them to expand and develop.

SMALL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BOND PROGRAM

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Finance. I think the minister will admit, as he did to my colleague, the hon. member for Bruce-Grey, that when there is no tax room banks are not lending money under the Small Business Development Bond Program. Will the minister tell the thousands of Canadians who have made applications at their banks what proposals he has to make the small business bond effective?

• (1440)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the small business bond is in effect and is available from financial institutions which still have tax room available. Their ability to finance these loans will increase as repayments on previously granted loans take place as well.

RAILWAYS

EFFECT OF WAGE CONTROLS ON CANADIAN NATIONAL AND CANADIAN PACIFIC AGREEMENTS

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. He will know that Canadian National Railways and Canadian Pacific Railways bargain as a unit with railway unions. My question is this: how will the government's policy of 6 per cent and 5 per cent wage controls in 1982 and 1983 respectively for Crown corporations affect collective agreements recently signed by CN and CP with railway unions? Will the completed bargaining on behalf of CN workers be respected by the government, or will we have a situation in which CN workers will be getting only a 6 per cent increase in 1982, that is to say, half the increase received by Canadian Pacific workers in 1982, or will it affect 1982 at all? I wonder whether the minister could clarify this question for us. There is a great deal of confusion as to how the new policy will affect existing agreements.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, upon the tabling of the bill of course we will be able to have a complete exchange and discussion on the full details of transitional provisions under the application of the bill. As I have already said, here and outside the House, the first year of application of the new program comes into effect either at the expiration of an existing collective agreement or at the first wage rate increase under that agreement. Clearly an agreement which is in existence will be respected.

As to the additional consideration which is raised with respect to joint bargaining, that is a legal question which will have to be addressed in another forum.

TIMING OF IMPOSITION

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Madam Speaker, is the minister saying that agreements signed at any time in 1982 prior to the coming down of the budget which would be retroactive to January 1, 1982, i.e. that those increases which have been provided for in 1982 will be respected? Is that what the minister is saying, and that only increases provided for within the same agreement in 1983 will be affected by this policy, or has the government bothered to think this through?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, indeed the government has spent a great deal of time thinking it through. All circumstances will be covered in the proposed legislation. I think I explained in answer to the first question that, where an agreement is signed and is in effect, the program comes into effect either at the termination of that agreement or at the next wage rate increase under that agreement.

SALARIES OF MINISTERS' STAFFS

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. It concerns a story which appeared in The Toronto Star saying that on June 17, just prior to the budget, the federal government, under the direction of the President of the Treasury Board, raised the salaries for cabinet ministers' personal staffs, special assistants, and other political appointees in their offices by at least 10 per cent. This was just prior to a budget which imposed restrictions of 6 per cent on the Public Service of Canada. Now, is that story true?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, perhaps I did not get the full gist of the question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Johnston: If the hon. member is saying, "Have there been increases in the public service, in ministers' offices or elsewhere, exempt staff or whatever", prior to the budget earlier this year, of course the answer is yes.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): No. You heard the question.

Mr. Johnston: The program will then come into effect at the expiration of that contract period as it does with respect to other groups. The same six and five rule will apply to everybody if, as, and when they come into effect under the program.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I have never known that the hon. gentleman was so hard of hearing.

TERMS OF REPORTED DIRECTIVE

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, my question was: did the minister, in a directive dated June 17 this year, just prior to the bringing down of a budget on which we are told the cabinet consulted, permit or allow an increase before the budget of ministerial aides' salaries, their office staff, executive assistants and special assistants, by an amount equal to 10 per cent? It is a simple question. Yes or no will do.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, as I explained, any contract or any pay period which came up prior to the budget date will be respected, whether it is in ministerial staff or in departments. Collective agreements have been approved as recently as last week in the public service. It goes without saying.

ENERGY

COLD LAKE PROJECT—LOAN MADE TO IMPERIAL OIL

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. A year ago the minister arranged a government loan of some $40 million to Imperial Oil in an attempt to salvage the Cold Lake project. What is the state of that loan today? Will it be repaid, or is it now lost forever?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the condition of the loan was that it would be repaid if the project proceeded before the end of June this year. Obviously the project is not proceeding at the present time and, therefore, the loan will not be repaid because the money has been used to employ engineers and staff who have proceeded with further engineering work on the project. But under the agreement which was arrived at, there was no obligation to repay after July 1.

Mr. Shields: When an incompetent minister blows $40 million of taxpayers' money, the honourable thing to do is to resign. If he does not believe that, perhaps he could consult with his visiting colleague from Great Britain.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

REQUEST FOR WITHDRAWAL

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. Is he prepared to withdraw the national energy policy which is now acknowledged across Canada to be the one single instrument that has deterred investment to get our economy going? It has deterred investment from across Canada and from foreign sources. Will the minister withdraw his national energy policy?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, indeed I will have great pleasure in meeting with my British colleague in a few minutes. I will certainly be listening with great interest to the advice he will provide me, but I expect that the advice he will provide me will not be of the type which my hon. friend is suggesting.

If my hon. friend believes that money paid to Canadian workers, engineers and professionals to develop plans that may be useful in terms of building a plant, or a similar plant, at a later stage, is a waste of money, he has his facts wrong. That money was not blown. It was used in developing plans which may be very useful in the future. The money was used to employ a number of Canadians, including some in the hon. member's own riding. As far as the last question which he raised is concerned, he is talking the same nonsense which he usually puts forward.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

DELAY IN FINALIZING CONTRACT

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. One of the reasons for mass unemployment and business failures is the way the government treats contracts and contractors. On the minister's desk is a letter from a samll contractor which reads in part:

> Our construction company is at a standstill, our men have all received their records of employment and so we are becoming a statistic. All happening because a contract that was being organized last August, signed by us and the Fountain Indian Band in January and left to collect dust in the Vancouver DIA office till now it is at this point such a mix-up that we have been informed that the job is not forthcoming.

Is the minister determined to discourage and destroy both the companies and the Indian bands in question in these agreements?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, what wide-sweeping, ridiculous conclusions the hon. member has come to; they are beyond any reason. If he cared to indicate the name of the firm which says that it submitted a bid for a contract which was not given to it, I would be pleased to look into it. If he would care to indentify the letter, I will try to find where it is on my "desk".

POSITION OF MINISTER

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. The company is Varian Construction; the minister can find it on his desk. The letter continues:

• (1450)

> Some of the people at the Vancouver branch DIA have done more damage than good and we feel this is not only detrimental to our company but very much so to our native Indian people.

In the interests of protecting the officials of the Department of Indian Affairs in Vancouver, will the minister sacrifice the companies in question?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I do know that there are many hundreds and, indeed, thousands of relationships between small business contractors, chiefs and band councils, as well as my officials, from coast to coast. I have very seldom heard of any type of bitter complaint of contractors. They are doing business on an ongoing basis with Indian bands and my department, year in and year out.

If there is anything particularly irregular about this matter, or if there have been delays, I will check into it and advise the hon. member. But I am certainly not prepared to come to conclusions of his kind, which attack public servants who cannot speak for themselves, without at least having an opportunity to check the facts, and that is what I propose to do.

CANADIAN RADIO-TELEVISION AND TELECOMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION

RATE INCREASES GRANTED TO BRITISH COLUMBIA TELEPHONE COMPANY

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Communications I will address my question to the Deputy Prime Minister who may know that the latest B.C. Tel rate increase was approved by the CRTC, as were all earlier rate increases, on the condition that the company, B.C. Tel, improve its services to the customers. This has not happened. Indeed, service has worsened. Now B.C. Tel is planning to lay off 2,200 employees throughout British Columbia, which will result in a further deterioration of service to customers. Will the government instruct the CRTC to withdraw a substantial portion of the rate increases granted to B.C. Tel over the past two years in light of the company's continuing contempt for the CRTC instructions to improve its service?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I cannot answer that question at the moment, but I will discuss the matter with the Minister of Communications and provide the hon. member with a reply as early as possible.

Miss Jewett: I would like to thank the Deputy Prime Minister for that reply.

EFFECT OF COMPANY LAY-OFFS ON UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE FUND

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): I now turn to the Minister of Employment and Immigration who may know that at the same time B.C. Tel is planning this very large lay-off of 2,200 people, the company will tomorrow issue a quarterly dividend of 40 cents a share, amounting to $13.4 million, going to its shareholders and to its parent company in the United States. Therefore, B.C. Tel is clearly taking advantage of bad economic times to generate even more profits at the expense of 2,200 working people.

Since the government will have to pick up the tab in unemployment insurance benefits, will the minister look into this exploitation of both the Canadian taxpayer and of his program? It is flagrant abuse of the UIC program.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, just to repeat the answer given by the Deputy Prime Minister, it is a situation we will have to consider in order to see what responsibilities there may be for the federal government, although—

Miss Jewett: UIC.

Mr. Axworthy: —the fact is that when one comes to the matter of paying for the unemployment insurance program, one finds that it is a premium program donated by both the employees and the employers. Therefore, they both share in the contribution toward those funds so that no one is getting a free ride in that case. Everyone must pay their fair share which, after all, is the principle we are trying to discuss—

Miss Jewett: What about the government?

Mr. Axworthy: —that everyone in this country should be paying their fair share.

Miss Jewett: He missed the whole question. Why do you not listen, Lloyd?

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

PROJECTED INCREASE IN PREMIUMS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance who will know that after the Minister of Employment and Immigration admitted yesterday that there would be a substantial increase in unemployment insurance premiums, officials of the Department of Finance estimated that employee premiums could rise next year to $2.50 for every $100 of insurable income. Will the Minister of Finance tell the House of Commons why he did not announce, in his budget, this secret tax increase of 52 per cent in UIC premiums?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, it is true that as the unemployment increases the contribution will have to be increased. If the Leader of the Opposition recalls, because of the very satisfactory employment experience in the preceding year, in the last budget of November we did reduce the contribution rates. Obviously, they will have to be increased, but I did not think that the time to have done it was in June. The more likely time would be later in the year. There is no effort to seek to keep secret a matter which could not possibly be secret in any event, because everyone who knows the law knows that the contribution rates must go up in any event.

AMOUNT OF PROJECTED INCREASE

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, the public knows that the honest budget of 1979 included those forecast increases in unemployment insurance premiums. This minister's budget, which could not be so described, did not do that. Will he confirm that the government is now contemplating, as his officials said yesterday, a 52 per cent increase in the premiums paid by employees for unemployment insurance, a 52 per cent secret tax?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): There is no such secret tax, Madam Speaker. That is absolute nonsense. I am not confirming the so-called comments of some anonymous official.

EMPLOYERS' SHARE OF INCREASED PREMIUMS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, we have the word of the public servants that there will be—

Mr. MacEachen: Who is he?

Mr. Clark: Who are they? The minister can indicate himself. They were speaking for his department—

Mr. MacEachen: Who is he?

Mr. Clark: —officially, in response to inquiries. Perhaps journalists get better answers from officials than Members of Parliament get from this minister in the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: We now know that there will be an increase of 52 per cent in the employee premiums paid for unemployment insurance. Will the minister tell us what kind of a percentage increase he is proposing that employers will pay for unemployment insurance as a result of his government's policy of creating joblessness and creating increasing demands on the unemployment insurance fund?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition says that "we now know". Anyone who knows the law, and anyone who knows anything about the unemployment insurance system, would know that there would be increases for contributions—

Mr. Epp: Why didn't you say so?

Mr. MacEachen: —from employees and employers. Here again the Leader of the Opposition is trying to make a big point out of the obvious to everyone except himself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

AMOUNT OF EMPLOYERS' SHARE

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, we now know, the Minister of Finance has agreed, that there will be an increase to $2.50 per $100 of insurable income for employees, an increase of 52 per cent in what the employees pay. Will he confirm that the amount being paid by employers will rise from $2.31 per $100 of insurable earnings to $3, that is, an increase of 34 per cent? Will he confirm that, having confirmed the 52 per cent increase?

Mr. Lalonde: No, that is not what he said.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I have not confirmed any figure that the Leader of the Opposition has used. I will confirm that the increases will take place in accordance with the law passed by the Parliament of Canada, not in accordance with some secret result which the Leader of the Opposition imagines exists somewhere.

PUBLIC WORKS

CONSTRUCTION OF MONTREAL POSTAL TERMINAL

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works and concerns the major area postal plant in the City of Montreal. Can the minister inform the House whether, to his knowledge, there were any problems with the construction of this multimillion dollar Montreal postal terminal and, if so, what steps were taken to investigate these problems?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for the question because it gives me the opportunity, as the Minister of Public Works, to invite all hon. members, and Canadians generally, once again to enjoy the Peace Tower which will be open to the public tomorrow for the first time in two years, on Canada's birthday.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cosgrove: Madam Speaker, if I had had former notice of the question of the hon. member concerning the specific project, I might have had the opportunity to give him an answer today. Now, having notice, I will attemp to have the answer for him next week.

QUERY RESPECTING DIFFICULTIES DURING CONSTRUCTION

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, I wish the minister had made that announcement in a statement on motions so that we could amplify on it.

May I ask his colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, a similar question. Is he aware of any difficulties? Specifically, was there any interference with the Department of Public Works during the planning and construction phase of this Montreal area postal plant in Montreal? Were there any interventions by cabinet ministers with respect to any of the details? Is the minister satisfied that the taxpayers of Canada received fair value for the $300 million spent on this building?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Madam Speaker, usually, the questions we answer are urgent. The question refers to the time when the post office was under construction, but it has been completed for a number of years. In fact, the hon. member asking the question was himself a minister for several months. If the hon. member was worried about this post office, at the time his party was in power he should have asked about any problems that might have arisen at the construction or at the design stage. I have had no indication that there was anything wrong, but if the hon. member has more recent information, he should be a bit more specific about what he knows and we shall then make inquiries if necessary.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. DEANS—WITHDRAWAL OF UNPARLIAMENTARY LANGUAGE

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Earlier today I had an opportunity to read last night's Hansard. You will note that at page 18923 during the speech of the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens), the hon. member made a statement which I am sure to everyone who was listening would be quite unacceptable and would no doubt be recognized as untrue. However, I note that Hansard picked up a comment that I made from my seat in which I said "That's a lie". No matter what my opinion of it may be, I recognize that to be unparliamentary and I withdraw it.

Madam Speaker: I thank the hon. member for his withdrawal.

MR. STEVENS—REMARKS OF MR. YOUNG AND MR. DEANS

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my point of order, of which I gave your office notice, touched in part on the matter raised by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans). I was also in my point of order going to draw Your Honour's attention to a similar remark made by the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Young). The actual exchange, as the member for Hamilton Mountain has indicated, appears at page 18923 of Hansard.

At that time I was indicating that the New Democratic Party had been instrumental in encouraging the government to get into the spending program and into the deficit position that it is now regretting, and that this should be drawn to the attention of all Canadian voters. At that time the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain said, "That's a lie". The hon. member for Beaches said, "That's a lie". The hon. member for Beaches also said "It is a plain, outright lie". Hansard then records the following:

> MR. YOUNG: Tell the truth.
> MR. DEANS: If you know it.
> MR. STEVENS: When you hit the quick, it is always interesting to see . . . how the rabbits come out ot their burrows so fast.

I have consulted Beauschesne. I find at page 108 of Beauschesne there are no less than 40 instances cited for the use of the word "lie". On all occasions it has been found an unparliamentary expression. I would point out two particularly relevant times when this matter has been raised. At page 1593 of Hansard for December 2, 1976, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is recorded in Hansard as saying:

> However, it would be helpful if in the meantime members opposite did not smuggle in lies and falsehoods.

The Speaker at page 1646 of Hansard for December 3, 1976, stated:

> The argument that was put forward by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants yesterday was that the use of the words "lies" and "falsehood" constituted unparliamentary language. It is always difficult for the Chair to have to decide on the interpretation of language.
> The clear precedent of the past is that even though there are always shades of meaning which tend to excuse the use of such language, when such language was used in the past it was found to be unparliamentary, and rather than getting into an interpretation of shades of meaning it is a safer course to take it as a danger signal and when that kind of language is used it must be withdrawn.

I would cite your own ruling, Madam Speaker, of June 16 in this House when there was a similar comment. You said: "It's an absolute, it must be withdrawn."

In view of that, Madam Speaker, I hope you will find that the expressions as they appear in Hansard are totally unparliamentary and that you will request the members to withdraw them.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I withdrew my comment prior to the hon. member rising. I do, however, wish to bring to Your Honour's attention, since you have been asked to look into this matter, that the quotation the hon. member read is not complete. The hon. member was not drawing attention only to the high level of expenditure of the government and borrowing. He went on to say, and he failed to quote this:

> —and the high interest structure the NDP is virtually insisting should be put in place.

That is what I said was a lie.

Madam Speaker: Order. I believe the hon. member is now entering into debate on the speech itself. I recognize that those words are unparliamentary. The hon. member for Hamilton Mountain did withdraw them. I believe there was an indication that the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Young) also used those words. Perhaps he would like to take the floor at this time and withdraw.

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Madam Speaker, I too was on my feet at the same time as the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Sinclair) who was anxious to get up and repeat his own rhetoric of last night. However, recognizing that the language is unparliamentary, I also withdraw, although I recognize that what the hon. member had to say at the time was certainly not true.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Madam Speaker: I have to remind the hon. member that he cannot say indirectly what is not allowed to be said directly. The last part of his sentence should also be withdrawn.

Mr. Young: Gladly, Madam Speaker.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, there is a little wriggling and eeling going on over there. There is no doubt that our precedents require a direct, unqualified withdrawal. The hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Young) should state simply and concisely that he withdraws the offensive expression used.

Mr. Young: Madam Speaker, I suppose I have been following and watching the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) too long. I absolutely withdraw, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Thank you very much.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. STEVENS—REMARK OF MISS JEWETT

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): I have a further point or order. It has just been said for the record, and I heard the hon. member say for the record, that I was a "friend of d'Aubuisson, a pathological killer." That, to me, is totally unparliamentary and it is absolutely repugnant to me that any member of this House would make such an accusation. I refer to the hon. member for New Westminster (Miss Jewett), and I ask that she immediately withdraw the inference and the statement.

Madam Speaker: The Chair certainly did not hear those words. We had entered into a new procedure. The attention of the Chair, at any rate, was completely tied up with other procedures and I certainly did not hear that particular word. I am not sure whether it is an unparliamentary expression. I would ask that we wait until tomorrow to see if it is in Hansard.

PETITIONS

MR. HALLIDAY—RECONSIDERATION OF GUN CONTROL LEGISLATION

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Madam Speaker, it is my duty to present a petition signed by residents of the constituency of Oxford, who strongly request that the Government of Canada vote against Bill C-451 and see to it that this bill never receives passage in this House. In the view of the petitioners, Bill C-451 is the most abominable and arbitrary proposed legislation that has ever been presented in the House of Commons.

MR. MITGES—RECONSIDERATION OF CANADA NON-PROFIT CORPORATIONS LEGISLATION

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition today on a matter of great concern to residents of my riding of Grey-Simcoe and I am sure to Canadians in general. They are gravely concerned, as I am, about the provisions of Bill C-10, the Canada Non-Profit Corporations Act. In particular, there is universal condemnation of clauses 116, 214 and 215 which would interfere in the memberships of churches and other religious organizations. There is a unanimous call for the repeal of these three clauses and all other possible references to churches and other religious organizations in this bill.

MR. STEWART—STUDENT SUMMER EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Ron Stewart (Simcoe South): Madam Speaker, the Petition of the undersigned residents in the City of Barrie in the province of Ontario who now avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right thus to present a grievance common to your petitioners in the certain assurance that your honourable House will therefor provide a remedy, humbly sheweth:

That due to the current high rate of unemployment, many positions which previously were available as summer employment for students are being filled by unemployed adults and,

That many companies and the federal government itself are discriminating against students by placing age as a condition of employment in that applicants must be at least 21 years of age,

Wherefore, the undersigned, your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to adopt measures to end such discrimination because of age.

And as in duty bound your petitioners will ever pray.

MR. NYSTROM—MAINTENANCE OF CROWSNEST PASS RATES

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, I present a petition on behalf of several hundred people in my riding who are concerned about the effect of the Crow rate and concerned about the possibility of the Crow disappearing and affecting their farm income and their farm communities. What they are specifically asking, Madam Speaker, is the following:

Wherefore, the undersigned your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to maintain the Crow rate in perpetuity as presently guaranteed by statute, And as in duty bound your petitoners will ever pray.

That, Madam Speaker, is signed by some 730 people, over 700 of whom are in my constituency of Yorkton-Melville and the other 15 or 20-odd are in the City of Regina.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): I am sorry, Madam Speaker, it is a small matter but it should not create a precedent. The Prime Minister is not in the House and I think I heard you say that he was the mover of the measure. Surely, it should be another minister of the Crown, for the record.

[English]

Mr. Smith: I would ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I rise today, rather significantly, with respect to a question on the Order Paper in my name, No. 4,120. It has been on the Order Paper since March 9, 1982 and remains unanswered. I bring it to the attention of the parliamentary secretary, particularly in light of the question posed today to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) by my colleague from Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker)in which he indicated that there had been a directive by the President of the Treasury Board which in effect would give a preferential wage increase to exempt staff and political staff of ministers of the cabinet of the country.

I am just wondering about the budget which was brought down asking Canadians to restrain themselves to the extent of 6 per cent increases in salaries. My question, Madam Speaker, deals with the practice which releases an undertaking by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) to use Crown corporations and other forms of emoluments for exempt staff, to circumvent the guidelines with respect to salaries for the exempt staff of ministers and thereby in another way circumvent the restraint that one would expect from a Canadian government under such attack for its profligate spending ways. The question, Madam Speaker, is not a difficult one to answer. I simply bring it to the attention of the parliamentary secretary. The question is as follows:

1. For each Cabinet Minister, what are the names of executive assistants and other members of exempt staff who are receiving income from sources other than from funds allotted to ministerial budgets?

2. What are the names of those who receive income, favours, loans or other benefits of value from sources other than those permitted by the conflict of interest guidelines for Cabinet Ministers and former Cabinet Ministers?

• (1520)

3. Did the Prime Minister supply every cabinet minister, every executive assistant and all members of the exempt staff with copies of the "Code of Ethics" produced by the late Prime Minister Pearson and with a copy of the conflict of interest guidelines for Cabinet Ministers and former Cabinet Ministers?

If the parliamentary secretary were doing his job, he certainly would have this question answered. This is not the first time I have brought to his attention the fact that he is attempting to delay answering this question until this session prorogues.

Mr. Smith: Madam Speaker, I do not know the exact stage of preparation of the answer at this moment, but I will be more than delighted to look into this on behalf of my good friend, the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn), and see what I can do to come up with the answer for him as soon as possible.

Mr. Young: Madam Speaker, my question to the parliamentary secretary concerns Order Paper question No. 4,165 placed on the Order Paper on March 19. The question concerns the apartment buildings in Toronto named Main Square. This series of questions concerns the rents CMHC is charging people in those apartment dwellings who are on fixed incomes. The answers to these questions are even more important as a result of the budget the other evening, as it affects people who are on pension incomes. Surely the question should not be difficult to answer, and I ask the parliamentary secretary—I urge him—to bring forward the answers as early as possible; next week, perhaps.

Mr. Smith: Madam Speaker, I will be very happy to look into the progress of the answer to this question as well.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, once again I draw the attention of the parliamentary secretary to the fact that question No. 2,042, asked by me on January 29, 1981, has still not been answered. It simply asks for the total costs of the December-January world tour of that year by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and goes on to ask:

What percentage of the total cost of the trip will be paid by the Canadian taxpayer?

Surely it is an affront to the House and to the people of Canada that a simple question as to what cost was run up in the Prime Minister's world tour is not being answered.

Mr. Nielsen: A year and a half later.

Mr. Stevens: I think this is at least the twelfth time I have risen to ask why this question has not been answered. I have tried the quiet method. I have not asked about this question for a few weeks, in the hope that that method might pacify somebody. Obviously that is not working, so I ask the parliamentary secretary once again why the question has not been answered.

Mr. Smith: Madam Speaker, the last time I looked into that answer I believe most of the information was in. However, the answer did involve several departments, and one or two had not filed their returns. However, I will be more than pleased to look into this on behalf of the hon. member. I will be delighted to do so.

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Smith: Madam Speaker, Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers Nos. 62, 63 and 64 in the name of the hon. member for Skeena are acceptable to the government, subject to the usual reservations concerning internal departmental memoranda.

Mr. Fulton: Madam Speaker, I wonder if the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Smith) could give this House some idea of what the last part of that sentence, "subject to the usual reservations concerning internal departmental memoranda", means. These motions for the production of papers have been on the Order Paper for a year now, and they involve 212 documents. Is the parliamentary secretary saying that parts of some of those documents are being tabled, some of the documents are being tabled or some of the parts of some of the documents are being tabled? Perhaps he could give us some idea of exactly what is being tabled today.

Mr. Smith: Madam Speaker, I am sure it is not necessary for me to give a definitive definition of what that means. If the hon. member consults his House leader, I am sure he will be enlightened. There are many precedents which quite clearly define the scope of that phrase, and the documents are at the Table in any event. They are with the Clerk now, so if the hon. member wants to go to the Table and peruse them, I think he will quite readily find the answers to his questions.

Notices of motions for the production of papers Nos. 62, 63 and 64 agreed to.

Mr. Smith: I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining notices of motions for the production of papers stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order with respect to House business. This will be our last day of sitting until next Monday. I wonder if the government House leader could confirm for the record the business for as far into next week as he can take us.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, we shall vote on the New Democratic Party's subamendment later today, and after this second day of debate on the budget, we shall resume debate next week on Monday, when we come back after Canada Day and the weekend. Monday will be the third day of debate on the budget. Tuesday will be the fourth day, and a second no-confidence vote will be on the motion proposed by the Progressive Conservative Party. Wednesday will be the fifth day of the debate on the budget and Thursday the sixth, with a final vote on the motion concerning the budget. That is the order of business for next week, unless circumstances dictate otherwise. This may happen, as I explained to my fellow House leaders, when, after discussion, they have examined the bill or bills that were introduced and that arise from the budget, and if we manage to agree on how to proceed with the bill or bills, we may have to change the order of business for next week, starting after Tuesday. As far as Monday and Tuesday of next week are concerned, that is final. Unless there is agreement otherwise at our level, Monday and Tuesday will be two of the days for debate on the budget. Obviously, we still assume Monday will be the third day and Tuesday the fourth day of the debate on the budget.

[English]

Mr. Deans: Madam Speaker, I rise with respect to two matters. One relates to what the govervent House leader has just said. My understanding is that Monday will be what is normally called "leaders' day". I just hope that understanding holds.

The second matter I want to raise is this: the government House leader will be aware of the study conducted by several members of the New Democratic Party into pollution in the Great Lakes, and Lake Ontario in particular, and of the meetings which they held. There has come to light a situation whereby traces of dioxin have been found in the human tissue of the bodies of individuals in Kingston, Ontario. I wonder if the government House leader might give some consideration to a special reference, which we would support, of the matter of toxic waste and its disposal to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry in order that the committee might look into this entire matter and determine whether there are recommendations which might be made, given the severity of the problem and the difficulty we are encountering in dealing with it.

Mr. Nielsen: It should be discussed at House leaders' meetings.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, the first question was whether Monday is "leaders' day". There is no such day in the Standing Orders. It all depends on who speaks on Monday and who the leaders are. We will see at that time.

The second question was about making a reference to a committee. I do not have sufficient information to judge and conclude whether such a reference might be advisable at this time under the circumstances. I will refer the request of the hon. gentleman to the ministers concerned, the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc), and when we have a House leaders' meeting, probably some time next week, we might discuss this subject again.

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed, from Tuesday, June 29, 1982, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government, and the amendment of Mr. Wilson (p. 18905) and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Riis (p. 18908).

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have 28 minutes afforded to me. I started last evening and took two minutes. I want to spend some time speaking about the budget.

The budget does not begin to address the problems that confront by far the vast majority of Canadians. The budget has attempted, in a piecemeal way, to put forward some proposals which, I assume, are intended to deal with the unemployment situation that confronts us in Canada, to deal with the very high interest rates that confront us in Canada, to deal with the massive deficit that confronts us in Canada, to deal with the problem of inflation, which is undoubtedly a problem which must be grappled with, and to deal with the lowest dollar value in Canadian history.

Had the government been serious about the problems of this country, it would have recognized right away that the single most difficult and vexing problem that Canadians who are working have to deal with, is meeting their mortgage interest cost. The high level of interest being charged on mortgages is usurious by almost any standard that could have been applied up until 1980. The government should have dealt directly and forthrightly with the problem of high interest rates for people faced with trying to provide their families with a decent place to live at a cost they can afford.

Had the government been serious about the economic dislocation that occurred in businesses, large and small, and about the cutbacks in employment, it would have recognized that the single largest contributing factor to the unemployment that has occurred from coast to coast is the high interest rates that manufacturers and consumers have been required to carry. This has meant that products manufactured by Canadians cannot be purchased by consumers because they cannot afford to pay the 20, 22 or 24 per cent interest rates they have been faced with.

Had the government been serious about the record high level of inflation, it would have recognized that the exorbitant interest rates of the last two years have made a serious contribution to it. It would have recognized that every single commodity that is for sale, every single product manufactured in any part of this country, must of necessity incorporate the high interest rate into its price structure as a cost of doing business. Had the government been serious about reducing the deficit, it would have immediately addressed the problem of high intrest rates which have reduced the purchasing power of Canadians, which have made it virtually impossible for Canadian families to buy a home and which have until now eaten away at wages of people who are attempting to make ends meet. Had the government been serious about the deficit, it would have understood that the single largest contributing factor to the deficit has been the outfall of high interest rates which meant a decrease in consumer purchasing, which meant a decrease in manufacturing, which meant an increase in unemployment, which meant a decrease in the amount of personal taxes paid by the majority of Canadians, which meant an increase in unemployment insurance costs, which meant an increase in the cost of operating government in terms of the necessity to provide social assistance for Canadians unable to find work, and which meant a decrease in the corporate tax payable.

Why has there been such a massive shift in the level of indebtedness of this country and a shortfall in revenue over expenditure from November of last year to July of this year? That has come about because not enough people are working or buying products or paying taxes. The government's policy has been one of the contributing factors to the significant downturn in the economy.

You will recognize on behalf of your constituents, Mr. Speaker, that if the government had been serious about dealing with the economic problems of the country, it would have begun by addressing the exorbitant and usurious rates of interest and the destruction that has flowed from allowing those rates to be charged.

In November last year, some seven months ago, I pointed out to the government the need to address the problems of Canada where they existed and the need to look seriously at measures that could be taken in the House to assist Canadians to get back to work, to assist Canadian families to stabilize their lives, to assist the government in raising the necessary tax dollars to pay the important bills, and to assist the government in designing an economic strategy. At that time I put it to the government that there is one real motivator in the economy that rises above all the others in terms of social and economic impact, and that is the provision of housing to meet the need that has been established from coast to coast.

It has been clearly demonstrated that 220,000 housing units should be built in Canada this year but that no more than 130,000 are to be built, and I suspect that is the absolute maximum. Many Canadians cannot find a place to live—not only a place within their means but any kind of decent accommodation for their families.

I pointed out to the government that for every single house built, 2.2 to three jobs were created, some on the site and some in the industries that provide the bath tubs, the shingles, the tiles, the eavestroughing and other component parts. If an additional 80,000 units were built, close to 200,000 jobs would be created. If those 200,000 jobs were created now, the rate of unemployment, seasonally adjusted as it always is, although I do not know how you adjust people who are seasonally employed—would decrease from 11.6 per cent to 8.8 per cent. We should build the homes that people need and begin the process of creating jobs. Unemployment would then be brought down to a level which, if not acceptable, would at least be closer to being manageable. If those 200,000 people were put to work building the homes people need, unemployment insurance payments would be reduced by $2 billion per year. That could already have been achieved if the government had paid attention to those of us who are every bit as committed to the future of the country as it is. We would have created 200,000 jobs, we would have reduced the level of unemployment from 11.6 to 8.6 and we would have reduced unemployment insurance payments by $2 billion. Then, by way of federal, provincial and municipal taxes, we would have raised $1.16 billion. What would we have? We would have housing for people and we would have 200,000 people working, building and manufacturing. We would not have to find $2.2 billion for the government to spend. We would have a tax benefit of $1.16 billion as a result of this program. In addition to the well known statistical information which says that every dollar invested in a mortgage is recoverable through the payments, we would have saved the government over $3 billion. I would suggest to those who are still in the House—only a few I know—that when you measure that potential against what the government has offered as an economic recovery plan, you have to ask yourself what in heaven's name is wrong. Why is this government so pigheaded, foolish and blind to the methods available to us to begin that process of rebuilding this country? Why is this government tampering when we all recognize that a massive effort is required?

What does the government's program do? It brings forward a $3,000 grant to first-time home buyers, and first-time or otherwise buyers of new homes built during the current year. What that says is that as long as you dig a hole in the ground by the end of December, 1982, then that house will be eligible for the $3,000 grant some time in 1983. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that when you consider it, it is ludicrous. That does not even begin to address the problem. It does not begin to provide homes for people at a price they can afford. It takes money out of the treasury which will not be recovered. It is the kind of program typical of a government bankrupt of ideas. Let me just tell you, Mr. Speaker, that if a person living in Ottawa wanted to buy a home he or she would find the average price of that home to be $68,500.

Mr. Blenkarn: Not a new house.

Mr. Deans: That is the average price. The average income in Ottawa is just under $30,000 a year. The strange thing is that with that income you do not qualify for a mortgage on a $68,500 house. Therefore, $3,000 in that kind of situation is absolutely of no help. For the government to offer this up as its answer to the housing crisis is shameful, but then it suggests that somehow or other the introduction of this program, and these other small and piecemeal programs it has brought forward, is the way we are going to get Canada back on its feet. The government suggests this is the way to create the economic impetus to enable us to rise from the ashes of destruction brought about by its policies. It will instil in Canadians the desire and drive to build this country to even greater heights and we are going to be able to give homes to people. The government says that people will be able to find and keep their jobs and earn enough to pay the necessary cost of living. If this is the government's answer, then I ask you: is it any wonder that those of us on this side of the House look at the government with disdain, and feel, as my colleague, the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) says, despair?

I do not understand this government's initiatives. I do not know how it expects that people, who the day before the budget was brought in could not afford to buy a car, buy a home or meet their mortgage payments with these high interest rates, will, as a result of this budget and its hidden taxes, be able to meet those commitments once the budget is in place. I mean, how can you do those things now that you could not do before if you have less money? How can you possibly expect that there will be a recovery when people are in that kind of situation? I do not understand it. There has to be something missing in the minds of the people who advise this government. How in heaven's name can we expect to have manufacturers back to producing at 90 per cent or 100 per cent of capacity, how can we expect to have people back working on the lines, in the shops and offices, if the money available to be spent on goods and services is to be reduced by $1.3 billion? I say through you, Mr. Speaker, that it defies logic. Yet this government proudly stands up and tells us that this budget is really going to meet the need.

This budget, Mr. Speaker, reduces by $1.3 billion the money available to consumers, people who were struggling along and making ends meet. The government then says that this is somehow or other intended to stimulate industry in such a way, and create purchasing power in such a way, that we will have greater employment, more productivity, more tax revenue, and we will be back to the good old days.

Well, I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that is patent nonsense. That is absolutely false hope. That is the worst kind of chicanery I have seen in years. There is no doubt in my mind that if the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen)—and I have always considered him to be an honourable man—stops to think about it, he must surely understand clearly that you cannot reduce the size of the consumer marketplace and expect to sell more. You cannot restrict people's wages to a level below that of inflation and expect them to be able to buy more. I am sure the end result will be—and I hope I am wrong although I do not see how—that people will buy less because they do not have the money to spend, and those who manufacture will manufacture less, those who work in manufacturing plants will work less, we will have higher unemployment, and that will mean an even larger burden on those who continue to pay taxes. In addition, the deficit will continue to grow, and in the end we will be faced with virtual bankruptcy.

Now, I put it to the government in the most forceful terms I can that it is not too late. It is almost too late, but there is still time. I put to the government that if this government is serious about the future of this country and if this government feels any sense of obligation to the working families from coast to coast in this country who are struggling today, the government will pay heed to their cry. Their cry is as loud in the eastern part of the country as it is in the west. The cry is that we must take steps to bring down the interest rates currently being charged. We must, as an absolute priority, bring that level down to a level that is manageable in order that average income earners can go into the marketplace and purchase those things which their neighbours and friends are making. That is the cry of the people of Canada. That is the cry of the small businessman who just put on his door the notice "Out of business, bankrupt" because he could not meet the short-term high-interest payments that he had to make in order to carry his inventory. That is the cry of the large corporations paying out millions of dollars yearly on interest payments which they can ill afford to pay and which price their products out of the market, making it impossible for Canadians to absorb the productive capacity of the country. That is the cry of those who are locked into mortgages paying 20 per cent or more. They are begging and saying to the government, "Please, we cannot carry this burden any more." That is the problem in this country.

I say to you again, as I said before, that we have the ability to solve this problem. I recognize that building homes for people is not the end-all and the be-all. That is not a panacea for everything, but I want to put to the government that activity is vitally important and it is the single most important motivator of any in economic terms. If we were simply to follow the example I have given, and if the government had followed in November what I suggested by putting $2 billion to $3 billion—not necessarily all tax dollars—into building homes, we would not have seen the increase in the deficit from the $10 billion or $11 billion to beyond the $19 billion at which it now stands.

When the government told me in November that we could not afford to spend that money because we did not have it, I said then that was wrong. I said then that this was an investment in the future of Canada, an investment from which we would derive a return both in social and in economic terms, an investment from which we would get every single penny back plus interest. I said then that if this investment had been undertaken in November it would have, by virtue of the statistics that I have given, made it unnecessary in this country to absorb that additional $9 billion worth of indebtedness. I do not understand it. If there is a flaw in it, for God's sake, get up and say so. If there is something wrong with that and it will not work as a means of starting the recovery process, then let someone rise and tell me.

Mr. Keeper: They do not dare.

Mr. Deans: I say to you, Mr. Speaker, it is clear to me that between November and December we wasted an opportunity to put Canadians to work because this government was too blind to the realities. We cannot afford such waste many more times.

What do we need? We need a government worth its salt that is prepared to stand up on behalf of Canadians. To stand up on behalf of Canadians is not asking people earning $12,000 a year to tighten their belts. To stand up on behalf of Canadians is to say that we recognize the major problem. It is the interest rate and we are going to bring it down. It is to say we recognize how to create jobs, and build homes. We recognize that small businesses are not able to carry the burden any longer and we will make sure that in the interim period during the recovery these people are given assistance. It is to say we recognize that farmers who have been attempting for years to make it on a meagre income deserve to be given some additional consideration during this very difficult time, and we recognize that what we invest in Canada today we will reap tenfold in the years to come.

This government's policies are bankrupt. It appears that the government is intending to make the country bankrupt like its policies. I want to say to you, Mr. Speaker, and to anyone who cares to listen that there is another way. There may be more than one way, but the way I am proposing today will work. It will not inflict on Canadians additional tax burdens nor will it require Canadians to tighten their belts. It will not require us to suffer 12 per cent or 15 per cent unemployment. It will not require us to pay high interest rates, which this government has supported over the last three years together with its friends in the Conservative Party. This has to stop, and it has to stop now.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure and indeed a privilege for me to have the opportunity to intervene in this debate on the budget. It has also given me the opportunity to follow the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans), for whom I have a good deal of respect on most subjects except for his view of the economy and how it works as well as the solutions that he proposes in the well known tradition of his party, which is to spend our way out of all problems.

Mr. Deans: That is not what I said.

Mr. Johnston: He asked what is the road to recovery. He invited someone to stand up and tell him what it is. I would like to spend a few moments doing that this afternoon, and I hope the hon. member will remain in the House for that purpose.

He asked what we can do. He said, "Let us stand up on behalf of all Canadians". I invite him to stand up with us on behalf of all Canadians and support this budget, and particularly to support the restraint measures which are contained in this budget.

Mr. Blenkarn: Where?

Mr. Johnston: I invite him particularly to support the measures which are designated to bring down inflation and interest rates in Canada at the same time to 6 per cent and 5 per cent.

Mr. Deans: You cannot do it and you won't do it.

Mr. Johnston: The hon. member for Hamilton Mountain says that it cannot be done. That, of course, is his privilege.

Mr. Blenkarn: And you have increased government expense by 20 per cent.

Mr. Johnston: I do not think most Canadians would agree with the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain's point of view.

Mr. Deans: Your policy won't do it.

Mr. Johnston: We are counting on the good sense, judgment and the commitment of Canadians to stand up and support us in this national crusade about which I will be speaking this afternoon.

My colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) yesterday spoke about the budget in terms of employment opportunities. Today, I would like to spend a few minutes dealing with a number of other aspects of the budget which I consider to be relevant and which I think hon. members, particularly from the party of the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain, will be interested.

Mr. Riis: And so will the stock market.

Mr. Johnston: The opposition, and I refer to the collective opposition, refers very little to the international slump in which the entire western world finds itself.

Mr. Deans: It does not affect housing.

Mr. Johnston: Why is that?

Mr. Deans: Why does it not affect housing?

Mr. Johnston: Why is that? I suppose, as political opportunists, the opposition would like Canadians to believe that all the problems that beset this country and the economy at the present time are the product of the sins, past or present, of this government. If they are to win any respect for their views from Canadians—and nearly all Canadians know better—they have to acknowledge that a good measure or a good part of our problems stems from the international economic situation in which we find ourselves today as members of the industrialized western world.

• (1600)

I would ask the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain: would the market for B.C. lumber be helped a great deal by way, for example, of a housing program in Canada in the absence of a U.S. recovery? Does he seriously believe, or is he seriously putting forward the proposition, that the B.C. lumber market will come back in the absence of a U.S. recovery?

Mr. Deans: It would be better than it is today.

Mr. Johnston: Is he suggesting that larger Canadian domestic markets for such items as copper, lead or aluminum will come back in the absence of an international recovery? Canadian sales of automobiles or our output of finished cars, for example, are they likely to come back in the absence of an international recovery?

Mr. Deans: If you restrict Japanese imports.

Mr. Johnston: I am thinking of a company in my own area, Pratt & Whitney of Montreal. As the hon. member knows, it is a manufacturer of jet aircraft engines. Is it likely to come back in the absence of sales in the United States and abroad?

I am interested in noting a comment by Mr. Jack McArthur in The Toronto Star of June 22. I think he had the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain and some members of the Conservative Party in mind when he said:

> Some criticism now is so exaggerated that it's just silly.

Also he said:

> Who caused the similar inflations in France, Italy and in Britain? Or the dropping currencies in those and other countries such as Japan, Germany and Switzerland? Who's responsible for the terrible unemployment in the U.S. and in almost every other important western industrial nation?
> It wasn't Trudeau and MacEachen and they can't insulate us from those things.

That is a lesson the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain and other opposition members have yet to learn. As I said earlier, their criticisms will be taken more seriously if they deal with the real world. To that extent, opposition criticism of the government without reference to the international circumstances in which we all find ourselves frankly is biased, dishonest and misleading. It gives the people of Canada a very false picture of the real situation and also gives them false hopes that a new government such as theirs could pull rabbits out of the hat and that a magic touch here and there, with a bit more spending on this or that, will resolve all our problems and make them go away.

As hon. members know, this point has been made a number of times by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen)—the understanding of Canadians about the seriousness of the situation in which we find ourselves could be helped immeasurably if hon. members across the floor publicly recognized that we cannot float Canada off the world on some pink, puffy cloud, protected and isolated from our neighbours with whom we have so much trade and such extensive financial links. When the world slumps, so do we, and in particular with the U.S. in recession.

In this period our ability to solve our problems is seriously limited by those facts. We must realize—and if I can get the attention of the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain—that inflation is, has been and continues to be the number one problem of western society. All other serious problems which concern us, such as unemployment and unacceptably high interest rates to which the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain made reference, cannot and will not be satisfactorily resolved until we come to grips with the inflationary issue. Most other western countries, including our principal trading partner, that is the United States, have done a much better job at controlling inflation than we have. I suggest to opposition members of the House that we cannot afford to lag behind any longer.

We have also finally come to learn that in our long and less than successful battle against inflation, we must commence with restraints on our own incomes. There is simply no other way. Every country in the western world has turned to this as a focal point in its efforts to hold down prices. It is absolutely fundamental in our battle against inflation. Along with the need to curtail wages is the growing recognition in many countries that the indexing of wages and benefits is an automatic generator of further inflation. The hon. member for Hamilton Mountain shakes his head; I will give him evidence of that in a moment.

Mr. Deans: I am shaking my head at your whole presentation.

Mr. Johnston: It is not just indexing by contract or legislation which is at fault. We have often been conned by the insidious argument that because wages do not go up more than the rise in the consumer price index, these increases which are less than the CPI somehow do not count in the inflationary equation. This ridiculous argument has been used with considerable success by a number of people in our society and by a number of union leaders. Where there is no productivity improvement, which has been the case in recent years, all wage or benefit increases push prices up sooner or later. They validate inflation. They turn the screw another notch and they simply build inflation further into the system.

There was an interesting article from which I should like to quote several passages in Business Week of June 21. The article dealt with Europe breaking the grip of wage indexation. If the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain has not seen the article, I would be more than delighted to send along a copy of it, but in the meantime I should like to read several passages into the record. It reads:

> On June 1 the Confindustria, Italy's major employers' association, abruptly revoked its wage indexation compact with the country's trade unions. The action highlights a growing attempt throughout Europe to reverse a decade-long surge in real wages. With more than 10.5 million unemployed, hitherto-docile European corporate officials are turning militant, attempting to squeeze some of the biggest concessions out of trade unions in years.

> But Italian executives are willing to take the risk of squeezing the unions, in part because the existing wage indexation program is moving the country into an increasingly skewed trading position with inflation-resistant Britain and West Germany. While Italy's wages have risen, pay increases in the other two countries have consistently slowed. This is reducing their inflation and improving trade competitiveness with both Italy and France, which are moving in the same high-wage orbit.

Further on it pointed out that:

—Germany is entering a "virtuous circle" in which low wage settlements are bringing inflation down enough to increase employees' purchasing power despite the pay cuts. And although Britain will not reverse its wage-price spiral to the degree of Germany this year, wage and price increases may come in line in 1983.

It is clear that the experience of European countries is such that everybody benefits when wage demands are reduced and the wage-price spiral is broken.

I suggest that we in Canada must reduce real income. I realize this doctrine is very difficult for some members of the NDP to accept. It is stiff medicine, but it aims principally at the employed people of the country rather than Canadians generally. The weak, the unemployed, the poor and the pensioners are people who must be our first concern, but it is the employed who must pay part of this price. It is certainly the employed—and I number among them members of the House and everyone else, all employed—who must accept the main burden for bringing down wages, the rate of inflation, and of course our deficit.

What happens if wage restraint in the country cannot be effectively achieved? What will happen is more and higher inflation, a dollar continuing to fall and imposing its own price penalties which we have seen, and our deficit rising as we stand to help those in trouble. Why should this burden not be concentrated on the employed of the country as opposed to the disadvantaged Canadians to whom I made reference? Why should that not be done through restraining our own wage demands, those of us who are employed?

Mr. Blenkarn: Why do we not restrain government?

Mr. Johnston: Is this too much to ask of Canadians at this time? This is why the government has taken the lead in attempting to break the pattern of wage and benefit increases.

Mr. Riis: Six per cent across the board, eh?

Mr. Johnston: For the benefit of all members of this House, I would like to say that we do not like singling out government employees whose pay increases have not been noticeably out of line.

Mr. Riis: Can we quote you on that?

Mr. Blais: Please do.

Mr. Johnston: Nor do we believe that the recipients of government benefits are less deserving than anyone else in this society. But leadership must begin at home.

Mr. Riis: Especially the cabinet ministers, right?

Mr. Johnston: It must begin here by those employees who are affected by our own legislation and by our own benefit programs. We are hoping to see the six and five rule and objective which we are introducing adopted by other sectors, by other governments, by other businesses and by the private sector.

Mr. Riis: You are not introducing this program.

Mr. Johnston: Preaching restraint without action on our part, action of the kind we have taken, will not be taken seriously.

For a moment, I would like to turn to the deficit problem. If hon. members opposite were conscious of it before, clearly the response in the marketplace after the announcement of the deficit the other night should make them more aware of the seriousness of our projected deficit of just under $20 billion.

Mr. Riis: You were aware of it seven months ago.

Mr. Johnston: Both domestic and foreign investors perceive this deficit to be dangerously high—a question mark about our resolve to improve the management of our affairs.

But I must say that I was astonished on budget night to see the response of the leader of the New Democratic Party to our proposals. He is undoubtedly the last of the big time spenders, perhaps followed by a few other hon. members of his caucus. I have made some rough calculations, but I think my figures are approximately right, and his proposals to cure all our ills come to something over $5 billion a year. We need this injection of new spending, he alleged, to get the economy rolling.

Mr. Riis: The pot calling the kettle black. A $20 billion deficit.

Mr. Johnston: I would say to the leader of the New Democratic Party that the deficit which was revealed the other night is equivalent to injecting $9 billion into the economy. But where was the applause from the New Democratic Party? I must say that I had expected some excited cheering from the ranks of the New Democratic Party when they witnessed the extent to which the economy has been stimulated during this period.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Johnston: That is their approach. What do we see? Stony silence. Perhaps they are beginning to learn, even at this late date, that this deficit route which they preach is full of pitfalls which will cause great damage. The side effect of some of our restraint measures will help to hold the deficit down by reducing government expenditures—

Mr. Blenkarn: To 20 per cent.

Mr. Johnston: —and adding to our income. But let us look at the reality.

Mr. Riis: No, let us not.

Mr. Blenkarn: Let us look at the reality of 20 per cent.

Mr. Johnston: The essential attack on the federal deficit and on provincial deficits can only come when people contribute more out of their incomes to reducing them. We have built in this country one of the best welfare systems in the world, one of which we can all be proud. But we must also pay the bill for that system. That is what I meant when I said that the real incomes of the employed in this country must be reduced so that the capital, which would otherwise go into consumption and into higher and higher wages and prices, into a higher and greater accelerating wage-price spiral so that those resources can be diverted to—

Mr. Blenkarn: To ministerial offices and their expenses.

Mr. Johnston: —our society in time of crisis. That is what the budget is doing. The deficit issue is clearly a real one and it is obviously something which cannot be wished away. It can generate a crisis of confidence and it can undermine other actions that we must take. Therefore, we cannot slow our efforts and our approach to bringing it down at every possible opportunity. We must not be seduced into the expansionary spending programs that are foisted upon us, or I should say, preached to us by our friends in the New Democratic Party.

Mr. Riis: Not friends. Please change that. Not friends.

Mr. Wilson: Liberal-NDP coalition.

Mr. Riis: Not friends.

Mr. Blais: Brothers.

Mr. Johnston: I would like to speak for a moment about the program of restraint. The program of restraint has, as its principal objective, the beginning of a national crusade in this country against inflation. The people instinctively know what is needed. Only some of their union leaders and a few others simply do not seem to understand. The people of this country know that inflation cannot be brought down if their pay increases are not cut back. They have learned how the process works by observation. For wage restraint to become a crusade, other governments and businesses must be involved. I must say that it is disturbing to see recent settlements such as 18 per cent for Toronto University professors, or 15 per cent for Toronto metro outside workers. I was reading some comments by Mr. Godfrey.

Mr. Riis: What about MPs, what was their last increase?

Mr. Johnston: Today's Toronto Star states:

> Etobicoke Council will likely prove Godfrey's point today by ratifying a 1982 contract giving the borough's outside workers a 15 per cent pay increase.
> The union and borough negotiators reached agreement on the 15 per cent raise on Monday night shortly after finance minister Allan MacEachen's plea for economic restraint.
> Until then, the union had threatened to go on strike if workers were not given a 17 per cent "catch-up" increase.
> "Fifteen per cent is way out of line", said one councillor, "but I guess it will go through because this council had no trouble voting themselves a 14.7 per cent increase effective in November."

The country simply cannot tolerate wage settlements at this level. I must say that it is equally disturbing to find most construction workers in the Province of Ontario have been given an increase of $2 per hour. That adds a cost of $4,000 to the price of the average house. Do hon. members realize what that means in terms of the kinds of housing programs we are trying to introduce? A $2 per hour increase raises the cost of the average house by $4,000.

Mr. Riis: Do you get to the energy agreement?

Mr. Johnston: That is surely not the way to control inflation. People in Canada must become seized with the need for wage restraint. They must accept it themselves. They must support our position with regard to union leaders who are extreme in their demands. They must urge their elected representatives, at whatever level, to fight for our 6 per cent and 5 per cent targets so that we will in fact have a rate of inflation of 6 per cent in 1983 and a rate of 5 per cent in the year that follows.

Mr. Riis: Any bets?

Mr. Johnston: Failing the acceptance of this challenge by the people of Canada, what do we have to fall back on? What would there be? Perhaps mandatory, across-the-board controls which would be difficult to enforce without the kind of support that this crusade is intended to generate. Drift? That is the other alternative. Cruising down the river on a Sunday afternoon? We know that rough water lies ahead and we have already drifted over some rapids. To continue that analogy, drifting—

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): For fourteen years!

Mr. Johnston: —always seems to be the easy course until the canoe spills over.

Mr. Riis: Why not call an election on the issue and then we will find out what the people think about it?

• (1620)

Mr. Johnston: The choice is before us. The choice is here for Canadians to make. We on this side are doing our best. We are determined in our efforts to make sure that the reality of the situation in this country is put before the people of Canada.

We would expect, we would hope, and I would exhort the members opposite in their discussions of these very critical issues in this very critical period to make known their own awareness of the depth and universality of this problem to Canadians and to themselves. This is no time for posturing to secure short-term political advantages, even if some of the opportunities look inviting. I hope hon. members of this House will deny themselves those inviting opportunities and raise their sights to the level of the national interest and away from their own partisan interest.

I am saying that the national interest demands a national approach. It demands a national commitment. That is what we seek. Let me quote George Reylea, whose quote appears in yesterday's Ottawa Citizen. When asked to comment on the restraint program, he said:

> I don't mind it a bit; it's a hell of a good thing, we should set the example.

An unnamed RCMP officer said:

The federal government has got to take a stand some place. This is it.

That is the kind of attitude that we see among our public servants. Perhaps we do not see it among the union leaders. That is the kind of attitude we must see across the public service. I hope that ultimately we will see this kind of attitude across Canada.

These are people with an awareness that is much broader than their own personal interests. I received a telex from Mr. R. S. Hurlbut of General Foods dated June 29. Responding to the plea of the Minister of Finance for voluntary wage constraint in the private sector, he said that General Foods today placed a 6 per cent limit on increases to salaried employees. The program is effective July 1. President Hurlbut said that the federal budget "set the tone for an economic recovery in Canada. Now it is up to business, industry and labour to get behind it and make the program work". He went on to say that "if Canada hoped to regain its competitive place in world markets, inflation must be brought under control. Restoring economic health to this country must become the number one priority of every Canadian".

These people know what the national interest is. It is up to every Canadian, not just Mr. Hurlbut of General Foods who has already begun and is doing his part to make this program work. I hope that what we have seen in the case of General Foods and others who will be following their example and our own is the beginning of an avalanche of support for this program to push that crusade I referred to in my earlier comments.

Hon. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) in his appeal to have this restraint initiative flow out through and across the various sectors of Canada. The time is long past due where a restraint initiative should have become a part of government policy.

After having listened to the NDP House leader, the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans), I wonder why they voted against the budget of my colleague, the minister of finance in the Thirty-first Parliament. When a sincere initiative of restraint was put forward, it was labelled short-term pain for long-term gain. It was rejected by both the Liberals and the NDP. It was the NDP who made it possible for that government to fall. It was their motion. As a result, we now have long-term pain for short-term political gain. We have lived with the abuse of political power ever since that dark night of December 11.

It was the NDP who today appealed for lower interest rates, I believe 1 per cent above the rate of inflation. How they get that magic combination of arithmetic, I will never understand. It was the NDP who voted against mortgage deductibility for the home owners of Canada. That in itself has turned out to be the national tragedy. There is not a member of this House who is not aware of the deep, sincere and pitiful anguish experienced by families in thousands of households across this nation as I speak today.

Our trouble started back in 1968 when we changed the rules of this House and deemed the process of supply to be passed, the estimates on May 31 and the appropriations bill on June 30. That is when the trouble began. There were no longer any checks and balances within this chamber, which is really here for the fundamental purpose of controlling supply and forcing accountability.

Accountability was lost from that day forward. Spending went out of control, as has been reported by Canada's auditors general. It is still out of control. They are profligate spenders. When there were good days of high revenues, they never thought of putting a dollar in the bank to cover the bad days, which always come within business cycles.

In 1968 we were spending something like $692 per taxpayer in this country. Today this government is spending over $8,200 per taxpayer in this country. Today we are spending $3,175 for every man, woman and child in Canada. In 1968 it was $549. Our overspending in this fiscal year alone is $1.66 billion a month. I can remember you, Mr. Speaker, being in the Chair not too many months ago when I used to complain about the overspending being a billion dollars a month. In the last year, this government's spending habits have risen from $1 billion a month to $1.66 billion. This government is spending that much more than it is taking in through revenues.

Something is wrong with the whole federal system. Every single person in Canada feels it, knows it and is worried. Everyone is asking what they can do, how they can help, how to get this in check and how they can bring discipline to their own spending.

Spending is out of control. Not only that, we have been borrowing to pay interest on our borrowing. We have been borrowing as though the only source in Canada that needed funds was the federal government.

In the next six months we face potential maturity on official government debt instruments which amount to 48 per cent of the total marketable debt that this government holds. In case that figure is not sufficiently startling, that is some $44¾ billion in potential call on the federal government as we appoach closer and closer to a condition of collapse. This is reckless and irresponsible spending for short-term political gain. It is a tragedy. Our democracy is paying for it.

Since this government has been in power the inflation rate has moved from 9.2 per cent to 11.8 per cent, correct at May. The Canadian dollar has slipped from 84.6 cents to under 77 cents today. As to interest rates, the mortgage rate has moved from 14.69 per cent to 19.75 per cent. The unemployment adjusted rate, Mr. Speaker, has gone from 7.6 per cent to 10.2 per cent in May.

I heard the appeal of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) today. I know that gentleman and he is very sincere, in spite of the fact that he was one of the most powerful critics of this government's spending habits prior to becoming a member of the House of Commons. He was the author of that book "Fiscalamity". It laid it all out and said how the economy should be corrected, but not one measure in that book has been put into place since he has been a minister.

The Minister of Finance on budget night made an appeal to reduce the inflation rate of this country from 12 per cent to 6 per cent by capping increases, and he was to start with Members of Parliament and the federal civil service. He put peculiar emphasis on the word "solidarity" in that appeal.

I have in my hand a copy of the committal order of Lech Walesa, the father and creator of the Solidarity movement in this world. That man was struggling for the people of Poland. He was struggling for their right to join a union. He was struggling for the freedom to choose for the Polish people. He was struggling for the freedom to bargain with employers, even if it was the state. Political freedom was a dream in that land. Mr. Speaker, if you ever want to experience some sober reading, flip through the committal order of Lech Walesa and read the list of places of detention in Poland. They are all listed with the numbers of internees.

As we watch Canada unfold in 1982, more and more people become concerned. When we use the word "solidarity" I hope we can return to a complete understanding of how important that word is to so many people in a country that dreams of the freedom that we have a tendency to take for granted and abuse.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Huntington: That is what is happening here today. I say this, Mr. Speaker, in all sincerity, because the form of government in Canada has been changed. Many of us are very concerned about the condition of rules in this House and that it is moving away from a participatory democracy more and more to a leadership form of democracy, where announcements are made outside the Chamber. We have 3,500 orders in council, rules and regulations coming down per year. We are jammed up with details on massive legislation that is all leading us and directing us to one thing, Mr. Speaker, and that is structured intervention in the marketplace.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, we of all people can understand and feel the historic warning that once you lose freedom in the marketplace, all through history people have lost their political freedom.

I have watched this alliance between the New Democratic Party and the Liberal government, this Liberal-NDP socialist alliance, move in with structure and intervention and control over the marketplace. They move in with an avalanche of Crown corporations. We have just given the minister responsible for the national energy policy powers to put in place, at his will and whim, subject to cabinet approval, Crown corporations with agency of Her Majesty status, which puts them in a place all by themselves. The laws of the provinces, the laws of this federal government, cannot touch these people. These people can commit themselves to debt and to risk, and they create contingent liabilities on top of the burden on this country. The last time I checked, our burden was something like $137 billion of direct debt. We now have another $20 billion to add to that. On top of that debt, our Crown corporations' sub-government has created another known $58 billion of contingent liabilities on this government. It is no wonder that some of us at large in this country, including the chief executive officers of banks, are now outwardly and outspokenly concerned about the condition of this country. Countries do go bankrupt, just the same as we are watching small business, medium business and now large business face bankruptcies and receiverships.

Last evening I heard my colleague, the hon. member from Provencher (Mr. Epp), comment on the Minister of Finance's appeal to the country. He pointed out that the trouble the Minister of Finance and his colleague the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) have, is that no one trusts this government. No one believes them any more, because they are a party that can justify anything. When I say a party that can justify anything, Mr. Speaker, back on January 29, 1982 I was in this House with my earphone plugged in, and the member for Lac-Saint-Jean (Mr. Gimaïel) told us exactly what a Liberal was and pointed out how easy it is for a Liberal to justify anything.

That brought to mind the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) when he wrote in Cité Libre in April, 1963:

> The political philosophy of the Liberal Party is simplicity itself; "Say anything, think anything: better still, think nothing but put us in power, for we are best fitted to govern."

Today we have corrected a budget from last November 12 with a deficit projected at $10.5 billion; and some six or seven months later, that projection was out by an obvious 60, 70 or 80 per cent. In fact, I will say 100 per cent, because the deficit is now projected, seven months later, to be $20 billion. Something is seriously wrong.

With this restraint program and the appeal in the budget from the Minister of Finance and the President of the Treasury Board to work, you need the trust of the nation. As the hon. member from Provencher (Mr. Epp) last night said: "You have cried 'wolf' too often and the people just don't trust you." You have only to go back and look at the question period today to see some of the answers that deliver further mistrust of the government.

In 1968, in the book "Federalism and the French Canadians", the Prime Minister stated:

> Federalism must be welcomed as a valuable tool which permits dynamic parties to plant socialist governments in certain provinces from which the seeds of radicalism can slowly spread.

The people of Saskatchewan woke up to that statement and the truth of it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Huntington: My appeal through you, Mr. Speaker, is that the people of Canada wake up before it is too late, before the system is gone and the freedom that we struggled and fought for through the centuries is gone.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Huntington: In 1968 the Prime Minister promised to hold government interference where it is not needed. What did we have through the last 14 years but a gradual building up, and into the last two years a rapid movement into a structured, totally interventionist federal government, with centralist control over the whole marketplace in the economy of Canada. That is our lot. He said he would not do it; he has done it.

In 1968 this same Prime Minister promised his government would not spend more than it earned. In 1968 the gross debt was $32.5 billion. We do not know what the gross debt is today, but it must be close to $160 billion. The Prime Minister said he would not spend more than his government earned. I heard him.

The 1966 white paper on metrication and the minister who charted the omnibus bill through for the then Liberal government said—and reiterated—that although the implementation dates were not mandatory, they served as guidelines for each member's company or organization in a given sector. Today we have orders in council making metric mandatory. Prison sentences are being imposed or threatened on small merchants and large merchants; it does not matter where. The government wants trust; it has not earned it.

In 1974 the Prime Minister promised not to implement wage and price controls. He said so during an election campaign. He said he would not do it. What did he do one year later? He implemented wage and price controls without a mandate.

In 1974 the Prime Minister promised to rehabilitate passenger train traffic. In 1981, through order in council, 20 per cent of our passenger lines were abandoned. And the government wants trust?

In 1975 the Prime Minister declared there was no way the free market system could be made to work. He added that after wage and price controls were lifted, the government had other tools of control at its disposal. He was speaking of the CTC and the CRTC.

In 1979 the Prime Minister said his government would provide some compromise and some sense of solidarity in federal-provincial relations. During that same election campaign he described himself as a chairman who could reconcile the provinces' differences. What did he do in 1982? He announced the death of co-operative federalism.

In 1980 the Prime Minister campaigned against an 18-cent gasoline tax, an excise tax in the Crosbie budget. What has happened is pitiful history. Even the gasoline and electric light bills of the people of British Columbia have a subtax added to the bottom whereby they are paying for Petro-Canada. Eighty-three cents will be the burden on the Canadian people by the end of 1983, when 18 cents was defeated by the political opportunists of the socialist alliance. I could go on and on and give hon. members chapter and verse as to why this appeal in this hour of need in this country will not reach out. It is because the people do not trust the Liberal Government of Canada.

Mr. Huntington: Does this budget address the interest rate problem? No, it does not. If we want one indicator of the emotional level of sophisticated people in the land, we can read the stock market indicators. Activity on the stock market is mostly the result of emotion in anticipation of the future. The day after the budget was known the Toronto Stock Exchange indicator dropped 40 points. That tells us how the knowledgeable people of the country reacted. The dollar opened at 76 cents and climbed back to almost 77 cents.

There are only three ways to bring interest rates down. High interest rates are a national dilemma. Their high level has been caused by the inflationary policies of governments. They have been caused not just by the policies of the Canadian government but by those of governments the world over. When we move away from a currency or monetary system based on something which can be measured against and turn the currency or monetary system of a country over to politicians, it is not long before it is prostituted and destroyed. It is called fiat money, or false money. Our currency is no longer a medium of exchange in this country. It is a commodity, and somehow or other government policies have to address that.

If we are to address the real problems which have developed as we have come out of the Keynesian era of post-war reconstruction, we have to recognize that we have repeated history once again by allowing rigidities to be built into our system. Those rigidities are the result of control over the marketplace by too much corporate concentration. Capitalist units cannot compete. They are exactly the same as states and state bureaucracies. They want control. They cannot be bothered with the rough and tumble of competition and the give and take of the marketplace. So we have allowed massive corporate concentration unparalleled in any other free society or western society to take place in Canada. These capitalist concentrations buy up all the little annoyances in the marketplace and create monopolies. We allow marketing boards to control supply in order to keep prices up and drain the consumer's pocketbook and wallet.

We also have allowed too much power to be concentrated in the hands of organized labour in key segments of the economy. I am not attacking the rank and file of organized labour; organized labour was necessary and good because it had to match and balance the degree of capitalist corporate concentration we had allowed to develop. That offset had to be there. However, as these organized labour units bargain for more and more of the pie, it is very interesting that fewer and fewer people go back to work. I agree with what the President of the Treasury Board said today. Somehow or other we have to deliver on this one. It is just too bad the people of Canada no longer trust hon. members opposite, and in order to deliver they will need a lot of help.

There are three ways to bring down interest rates. One is an economic collapse, and we are coming dangerously close to the end of a business cycle which could collapse. The second one is to use the Bank of Canada more effectively in controlling the flow and taking the heat off the flow of exchanges in and out of Canada. I spoke about that on June 21, as recorded in Hansard at page 18680, and I tried to put out some questions which would excite some minds to see if we could not break through the impasse the country's economists have come to in managing our economy more effectively in international monetary systems and marketplaces.

Our dilemma also stems from the 1971 Benson tax act. We have now had a decade of socialist taxation. It is an absolute failure. We cannot enter the GATT era unless we move ourselves back to something which taxes costs instead of the profits and home-generated capital we so desperately need in order to manage, own and control our own affairs. We still have to go out and borrow from other countries which save in order to expand and make use of the vast resources we have in this country. Our taxation system is wrong, and we in this House should be paying a lot of attention to a new taxation philosophy which would allow us to prepare for the GATT era and once again allow this country and its workers, its managers, its professionals and even its politicians to hold their heads high in the industrialized world, because we have slipped to thirteenth place from third.

Something is desperately wrong and we are not addressing the fundamental causes of our problems. They are there. They have to be identified, and then we have to go to work with vital debate in order to solve them. We cannot go on listening to the economists who have turned themselves into a debating society, one on one, each putting the other down. That day has gone. The Keynesian era has gone. The rigidities must be addressed. New taxation policies are needed. This government will not bring them in. I am speaking in a canyon here because this government is a structuralist, interventionist, collectivist type of government. It will control, one way or another, everything in the marketplace. There will be no freedom left. I want to go in the opposite direction, and that is the way I want to see my party go.

I am always fascinated when the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) speaks. Many members of the New Democratic Party are good speakers.

Mr. Nystrom: Hear, hear!

Mr. Huntington: They are very fluent and oratorical, and there are some very nice guys down there, too. But we get into trouble with them on their mindset. It pays to listen to the NDP rhetoric.

• (1650)

They have made an appeal to the small business community. In fact, every time they speak they appeal to the small business community. The rhetoric is pretty smooth. In one ad they said, "We should be diversifying our economy away from resource exploration". I think resource exploration has the greatest multiplier for creating jobs and wealth, Mr. Speaker. I do not think we could start from a more sound base, but the policy of the NDP is diversification away from the strongest element there is in the process of creating wealth. The advertisement reads well. Without jobs and wealth how can we sustain the welfare benefits in our system? If we do not develop the resources that we are blessed with, how can we create the jobs and the wealth that is needed to sustain the enviable social welfare system that exists in this country?

For the eight years that I have been a member of this House I have been telling the NDP that, if they continue to support the profligate spending of the Liberal government, one day the welfare system that we are so proud of in Canada and that attracts so many people to the country would be threatened with collapse. That day is here, Mr. Speaker.

This ad that I referred to says that the NDP would restructure the FBDB. Mr. Speaker, it has been in the process of being restructured for the last three years. The ad says they would lend money with more reasonable rules on collateral. How is that possible? The FBDB lost $48 million last year and this year its losses will probably amount to $70 million or $80 million. It is the lender of last resort and has to come to this House for very large appropriations. I support those appropriations, Mr. Speaker, because some winners emerge from the system.

The NDP would give small business managerial, financial and marketing advice. What is CASE doing? It is one of the finest consulting services that this government has ever made available to the business community.

The ad talks about an industrial strategy that would deemphasize the "rip and run" of resource exploration. It says that the NDP wants rent controls. Mr. Speaker, it is interesting that the Marxist activitists are always working against landlords. We have had a period of an almost zero vacancy rate in some parts of Canada.

I have a real feeling for the need for public housing because I could not have started in business if I had not lived in a CMHC house at $49 per month when I was starting out. I know the value of government assistance in housing. Renters could buy those houses when their income reached a certain standard. That is the type of housing that should be provided now; it was very efficient, very effective and very humane. It allowed people dignity and gave them a start in life.

Today grants are offered but people have to apply for them. This means there is more control over their lives. Business has to apply for grants to drill holes—but only if they are winners. Business and individuals have to apply for funds that should be given in tax points. Two million people making decisions at large in this country is a lot better than having 350 bureaucrats isolated and insulated from the reality of the business place making decisions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Huntington: The concepts of the Minister of Finance are exactly opposite to the concepts that work in the world. I told him that on June 21 but, judging from his answers in question period today, apparently he did not hear me.

How are we to resolve the problem, Mr. Speaker? I think the only way we can keep ourselves from being a totally structured, interventionist, centralized government type of country where we risk our basic freedoms and our freedom to choose is to change the government.

Every person in this country who believes in the parliamentary system is concerned about the move away from the fundamental concept of ministerial responsibility. In this session of Parliament we should have seen three ministers resign because of their lack of responsibility for their departments. A minister who creates a jungle of confusion, such as the Minister of Finance has, must resign if the fundamental principle of parliamentary democracy is to survive.

In conclusion, I see you have a copy of "Fiscalamity" in your hand, Mr. Speaker. The author of that is the President of the Treasury Board. It is worth reading because it will show what his mindset was when he wrote it and before he became a politician. It will also show how little he has done since he became a politician.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if my friend from British Columbia would be prepared to answer a serious question.

Mr. Huntington: Certainly.

Mr. Nystrom: The hon. member said that the New Democratic Party advocated policies of reckless spending. I wonder if he would tell us if he is aware of what happened in a province where we can judge the NDP by what it has done. I do not maintain that the NDP is perfect. In Saskatchewan under three Premiers, Tommy Douglas, Woodrow Lloyd and Allan Blakeney, there have been balanced budgets almost all the time and it has had what is probably the lowest per capita debt of any province. Is the hon. member aware of that? Is he also aware that compared to Conservative provinces like Ontario, the per capita debt is greater in such places?

Mr. Huntington: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am aware of those facts. I am also aware of the manner in which resources were taken over and the degree of taxation cash flow that was used to nationalize industries, to buy land and farms and so on. I am also aware the the Government of Saskatchewan would not touch the potash industry as long as there was a risk. It was the private sector and American capital that took all the risk in developing the technology for mining potash. As soon as that technology was in place and all the risk was known, the socialist government of Saskatchewan nationalized the industry.

Now the people of Saskatchewan have spoken out. Too much of their cash flow and too much of their taxation dollar has gone to nationalization and state ownership. They spoke out and rejected the government. I think the NDP went too far with their mania for state ownership over the means of producing goods and services.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member mentions that the NDP government would not take the risk for public ownership of the mines when they were being constructed. Is he aware that with perhaps one exception, all the mines were started under a Liberal government and therefore the NDP could not do anything sooner?

Mr. Huntington: Mr. Speaker, I remember a statement by the leader of the NDP in Saskatchewan to the effect that they were not interested in nationalizing or taking something with that much risk. I could probably find that statement because it is my vertical file at home on Mr. Blakeney.

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, Canada, along with other industrialized nations, is passing through a period of economic recession. To varying degrees unemployment, inflation, high interest rates and lower productivity are apparent in all industrialized countries.

• (1700)

The fundamental reasons for this widespread recession are varied. Higher petroleum costs have adversely affected the cost of everything else. It is difficult to think of any product which does not require energy in its growth, extraction or manufacture. Increased expenditures by governments dating back to the United States financing of the Vietnam war have exceeded real economic growth. As the public's expectations of what governments should provide have greatly expanded, governments have not always matched their increased spending with increased taxation. Accordingly, deficits have grown and money has been printed, which creates the classic inflationary circumstances of more money chasing fewer goods and services.

Canada has not, of course, been immune from these and other international economic misfortunes, and Canada has responded in ways similar to those of other western countries. We have reduced our money supply, we are absorbing substantially higher energy prices, we have sought ways to reduce federal government expenditure.

On the question of restricted money supply, the Business Council on National Issues recently endorsed the government's policy by saying:

> We have nothing but admiration for the battle being waged in the name of common sense with respect to the Bank of Canada's monetary policy. There is really not much point in validating with increased money supply the very inflation that must be reduced.

Excessive money supply is not, of course, the only element which must be addressed resolutely in attempting to reduce high inflation and interest rates. However, in introducing broader policies to reduce inflation and interest rates as the sure route to more jobs and real prosperity, Canada is in a more vulnerable position than most other industrialized countries. About one-third of our gross national product, indeed our very prosperity, if you will, depends upon exports; a much higher percentage than most countries.

Further, about 70 per cent of those exports are to the United States. That fact alone makes us especially vulnerable to economic policies pursued by Washington. We are rendered even more vulnerable by the fact that of our trade with the United States, more than one-half is really intracompany transfer; that is, products or components moving among the plants or warehouses of a single company.

Over the years we have from time to time heard about how, when the United States sneezes, Canada catches a cold, or about the twitchy elephant and its wary bedmate, the mouse. Such metaphors, while colourful and excessive, do have some validity. The U.S., while having achieved some success in reducing inflation, has done so at the expense of massive unemployment. Also, the U.S. although remained incapable of reducing its own interest rates, with its federal government deficit seen as a major factor contributing to the upward pressure on interest rates. If interest rates in Canada were lower than those in the United States, money would naturally flow out of Canada in search of the higher rate of return.

As Canadian dollars were sold to purchase U.S. dollars, the exchange rate of the Canadian dollar against the U.S. dollar would decline. Our imports, largely paid in U.S. dollars, would cost more, as would the repayment of interest and principal on past borrowings. Inflation in Canada would grow as a result. An alternative, in theory, would be to impose currency controls; but if Canadians wish to maintain an open boundary for currency exchange with the country with whom we do so much trade and which has so heavily invested in Canada, then controls to retain capital in Canada are simply not an option.

While we must, apparently, anticipate that interest rates will remain high in the U.S., at least until Congress and the President resolve their current differences over the size of the deficit, there are some things that we can realistically do to increase our own productivity and reduce our inflation and interest rates. The new budget introduces or strengthens a variety of such measures. Other opportunities reside in such concurrent government initiatives as a national program for occupational training, increased export promotion, and more regulatory reform. However, the possibilities for improvement by all such measures are unfortunately limited by an inescapable fact, which again the business Council on National Issues has stated succinctly:

> We cannot and will not return to strong economic growth as long as our major trading partners continue to experience slow growth or stagnation. Canadians' expectation of what can be achieved must be realistic.

This is a truism that Canada and other western nations took to the recent Versailles Summit meeting when they sought modifications of current U.S. economic policies. But it is a statement of cold comfort to the 1.2 million Canadians now unemployed or those who are facing business bankruptcy or farm foreclosure.

To lessen the adverse impact of economic policy pursued elsewhere, we in Canada must achieve more singleness of purpose here at home. Our prosperity in the past has allowed us to afford the luxury of differences between federal and provincial governements which has lessened our ability to define national directions.

Equally, we have allowed ourselves the luxury of an adversary relationship among labour, business and government. Several of our major trading competitors have, in contrast, achieved a harmony of national intent not evident in Canada. Accordingly, I welcome the initiative of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to bring together today the provincial Premiers in an effort to ensure that the two levels of government practise the same restraint, that they march to the same economic tune.

Equally, the refinement of much needed measures to encourage investment by Canadians in productive capacity—not in consumption but in productive capacity—will be recommended by a national committee composed of eminent businessmen, economists and financial experts. This should in turn reinforce consultation and understanding between at least two of the major forces in our economy.

If greater cohesion of national purpose results from these and other initiatives, Mr. Speaker, the probability will be enhanced of Canadians placing themselves in a position to compete effectively when international economic recovery does come.

The economic problem confronting Canadians today is not, after all, a short-term one, however difficult and painful for many those short-term problems may be. There is also the longer-term problem of ensuring that our inflation is sufficiently reduced for us to be able to compete against those who have already achieved such reduction. We must ensure that we do not price ourselves out of world markets.

Canada is not in such a position today, Mr. Speaker. Typically, wage settlements in Canada, including those in the federal and provincial public service, have run well ahead of a number of our major trading competitors during the past few years. Further, our income expectations have considerably exceeded our limited productivity increases. When that happens more inflation and more unemployment inevitably result. Canadians must accept lower income increases if such increases are to match increases in our productivity. This must happen if we are to compete with those in other countries who have achieved a greater equilibrium between increases in their income and their productivity.

Such restraint is now becoming evident elsewhere even in the United States, our major trading and investment partner. That is why in the budget the federal government has shown the way to breaking the wage-price spiral, breaking what is frequently called inflation psychology. The federal government could, of course, impose mandatory wage and price restraints on the whole economy, but that is a Draconian intervention which can be avoided if the example now set by the federal and some provincial governments is followed by the private sector. As the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) stated in his budget speech:

> This strategy will lead in the short run to a lowering of our real income.

There is no escaping that unpalatable fact. The minister added:

> But it will soon slow the process that is eroding our pay cheques. It will check the rise of unemployment. And it will establish a firm basis for the resumption of real income growth throughout the economy.

Income restraint in the federal and provincial public sectors will set not only an example for voluntary action by the private sector—and it is the private sector which has itself advocated voluntary action and not mandatory controls—but it will also release funds to stimulate more private investment in productive capacity. Such funds are not, however, adequate in themselves to enable the federal government to provide necessary investment incentives and to encourage an early return of greater business confidence.

At the same time as the government limits wage increases to 6 per cent this year and 5 per cent next year for a half million federal and Crown corporation employees, it will place similar limits on the indexing of major social programs, exempting those recipients, however, who are in the greatest need. Equally, the government will move on the other side of the equation. It will limit indexing of income tax to the same 6 per cent and 5 per cent formula. And price increases under federal regulatory agencies will also be limited by the same amounts. This whole package, when taken together, will contribute to a national goal of reducing substantially our current high rate of inflation and of regaining our growth momentum.

This package sets for the provinces and the private sector a common goal of no more than 6 per cent this year and 5 per cent next year in those areas of income prices under their control. To succeed, this must be a truly national effort. The national government has now shown the way to move, as the finance minister has noted, from the 12 per cent world of recession to the 6 per cent world of recovery.

This action in itself will contribute to a growing realization in our business community that the federal government deficit will be both constrained and increasingly used in a positive, constructive manner. Investor confidence will be enhanced. Government revenue will be released which, when diverted into incentives for productive investment, can reinforce the mood of greater investor confidence and, in turn, generate greater tax revenue as well as creating badly needed jobs. The private sector is, after all, the principal motivator of the economy, the principal employer of Canadians as well as the generator of prosperity.

It is for this reason that the reduction in government spending is being used in two ways, both directly and indirectly to reduce the deficit and to promote more productive investment.

Some direct measures are immediate. Others are for final decision this autumn but will be retroactive to the date of the budget. When I speak of immediate measures, I have in mind, for example, those relating to the housing industry. The government proposes a $3,000 non-taxable cash grant to all purchasers of new houses for which construction starts before December 31 and first-time buyers of existing houses purchased up to December 31. Some members opposite have argued that such a grant will do nothing to promote the construction industry in particular or the general investment climate in general. This measure is, in fact, an unprecedented aid to help both home buyers and the construction industry.

For example, many Ontario residents can now combine the federal grant of $3,000 with the $5,000 interest-free loan provided by Ontario. Accordingly, the vice-president of the Housing and Urban Development Association of Canada said that:

> This is a very good attempt, especially with the Ontario program—no one can ignore a combined grant of $8,000—it is a good short-term stimulus and we'll look after the long-term ourselves.

The vice-president of the Housing and Urban Development Association of Canada suggested that approximately 30,000 more new houses would be built this year because of these incentives. Thus the incentives not only illustrate the importance of existing federal-provincial co-opertion in the economic field, but also suggest the benefits that the construction of new houses will bring to the Canadian economy as a whole.

When coupled with provincial grants, it is projected that as many as 100,000 new home buyers will take advantage of the scheme. Moreover, the federal grant program is estimated to create 50,000 new jobs in the construction industry alone. Undeniably, such stimulus by government is good for the hard hit construction industry and for the economy generally.

In speaking of immediate measures, I also have in mind such initiatives as the new investment grants to small business, which have been outlined in the budget, the postponement of the dividend tax on small business and the taxation of interest income. Foreign investment review procedures will be streamlined to avoid delays and red tape that have hindered efforts to ensure that Canadians receive maximum benefits from foreign investment. Increasing the threshold for mergers and acquisitions by non-Canadian investors can, for example, bring new opportunity for increased productivity in our economy.

All these and other direct and immediate measures contained in the budget are in a sense bridging mechanisms leading to yet more substantial measures in the time ahead. The budget's more indirect and more fundamental method to encourage investment is based on the fact that current Canadian savings are at levels substantially ahead of several of our major competitors. Our capital markets cannot, however, channel these substantial funds into productive investment when inflation so grossly distorts real earnings. The attractiveness of investing in common shares to provide companies with the funds essential for renewal or expansion are simply not there when inflation distorts the measurement of income from capital. As the valuable document tabled on Monday night entitled "Inflation and the taxation of personal income" states:

> Inflation-induced increases in interest rates can lead to cash flow problems for borrowers and can hamper the proper functioning of the capital markets. These problems have become particularly acute for home buyers and for many businesses contributing to the depth of the current recession in a number of industries. At the same time, the tax treatment of investment income has left many investors facing negative real after-tax rates of return on their savings in spite of higher interest rates.

Accordingly, the government has put forward tax proposals that would remove some of the distortions caused by inflation. These proposals are designed to provide for more appropriate taxation of interest income and capital gains from selected investments by individuals. The committee of businessmen, economists and financial experts which was announced on Monday, during the next three months, refine the measures intended to result in new incentives for investment. These include a registered shareholder investment plan, an imaginative step which, by offering a shelter for investors, will make available substantial additional funds for productive investment. Companies which have found that their traditional sources of investment capital have dried up in the face of inflation and high interest rates will have new funds to invest in the new plant and equipment which we need so urgently to improve our industrial productivity. In welcoming this initiative of the Minister of Finance, the president of the Investment Dealers' Association stated: "His diagnosis of what we have to do in Canada is correct: improve productivity and confidence."

A second major step to improve productivity and confidence will be to create a new form of term deposit. Tax on interest earned on such deposits would not include that part which merely reflects the rate of inflation. With such an incentive, buyers of new homes would be able to obtain mortgages at 3 to 6 percentage points lower than prevailing rates. Loans for new investment would be available at the same reduced rates to farmers, fisherfolk and small businessmen. Here again is a major new opportunity to channel Canadian savings into Canadian productive capacity and into improved productivity which, when matched with wage restraint, will place Canada in a position to compete effectively in world economic recovery.

In accordance with the widespread desire across Canada that major tax reforms be discussed publicly, the Minister of Finance offered proposals for such consultation in his recent green paper. The decision to refer the major proposals which I have just described to an expert committee and to invite public comment by the end of August is fully in accord with the new, more open approach to budget-making. The need for prompt action will, however, be as evident to members of the committee as I am sure it is to every member of the House.

Measures to increase productivity are, after all, the only real panacea for inflation. However, they will only succeed if we have the collective will, unity and determination to reduce our inflation. I do not doubt that Canadians have that will and that determination and that the new budget shows the way forward. Supplementary programs and additional measures such as I have already mentioned will also be necessary, but as a result of the new budget the course is now clearer.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I feel sad for my country today. Our economy is in terrible shape. Businesses are failing. We have heard evidence before the committee of the House on banking and bank profits and we now have the extent of the recession or depression, if one wants to call it that.

When we look at our country, we look at the fact that we have enough oil in Hibernia, in the tar sands and in already known heavy oil deposits to last for more than 200 years. Also we have gas, coal, hydro, uranium and energy of all kinds. Yet we are prevented from exporting that energy and developing that energy for export by a foreign investment review policy and a foreign policy promulgated by the New Democratic Party and certified by the government to ensure that we fail to develop the resources and the potential of the country and fail to supply our people with jobs.

Mr. Waddell: We are against the National Energy Program.

Mr. Blenkarn: You are in favour of the foreign investment review process and you want to ensure that people do not have jobs. You want to keep people out of work.

Mr. Waddell: Baloney.

Mr. Blenkarn: You are the same type of party as the party opposite.

Mr. Waddell: You have voted with them twice as much as we have.

Mr. Blenkarn: We have a non-confidence motion today. It is an amendment by those people to my left to the motion we have put forward. They are trying to trap us and ensure that we will not vote against the government, that we will vote with the government. I want to tell my friend, because he is the only member of that party who is present in the House, that we will vote against the government. We do not care what kind of a fool motion his party puts up because his party is irrelevant. It is irrelevant to the workers of Canada; it is irrelevant to Canadians generally. It will not be long before there are very few of them here.

As I was saying, we in this country have more resources, more water, more available arable land, more fishery resources, more timber resources, more minerals of every kind and more literate people than any nation of the world. Yet we have one of the most serious depressions we have ever faced since the 1930s. Perhaps it is as serious as, or even more serious than the one of the 1930s.

Our gross domestic product has declined 5.1 per cent in the last 12 months. We have a situation where the government comes before the House of Commons with a budget deficit of $20 billion. We have a situation where we have a banana dollar at 77 cents. I ask why we have 11.8 per cent inflation. Why do we have a million and a quarter people unemployed? Why do we have interest rates 2 to 5 percentage points above those in the U.S.A.? Why do we have a lack of confidence in Canada? Why do we have people in Canada who are unable to find jobs when we have assets that any other nation or people in the world would be absolutely jealous of?

Mr. Benjamin: Conservative policies.

Mr. Blenkarn: I hear the hon. member. I remind him that he is a member of the no-hope party. It is called the New Democratic Party, but it is the no-hope party. It is a party which looks after the welfare of people—a welfare party is what it is. It wants to put everyone down to the lowest common denominator. It wants to put everyone in blue jeans, so that they will all be equal and they will all march to the socialist drum. This is what they offer the people of Canada, no future or hope.

It is surprising that the government across the way has accepted their philosophy. Perhaps it is not too surprising. After all, was it not the leader of the government who was an active campaigner for the socialists in the 1962 election and in the 1963 election? Was he not a member of that party who worked so hard for socialist philosophies then and found that the only way to make socialism really work was to join the Liberal Party, because they would then have a base on which to put socialism in charge of Canada?

There once was a Liberal Party, the Liberal Party of Laurier. It was a Liberal Party which said that Canada would be the country of the twentieth century. Would Sir Wilfrid Laurier, as the Liberal leader, have said: "Lower your expectations, lower your hopes, lower your chance to build a profitable business, lower your chance for a better home, lower your expectations; don't go for a better job or more money to get ahead and build your family"? Are those the kinds of things we would have heard from Laurier as leader of the Liberal Party? No, not on your life.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Nor from St. Laurent.

• (1730)

Mr. Blenkarn: My friend says "Nor St. Laurent". Nor Mackenzie King, even. But what do we hear from this party opposite in its budget address? "Lower your expectations".

Then it is wondered why we have not used our Canada to its great potential. We find the answer in the minister's budget address, on page 2, in the second paragraph, where the minister complains about foreign governments and says:

> Their governments are unable, or have not chosen, to design their economic policies to help us get out of our recession.

Well, there you are. A banana republic we surely have become, because now we hear the government saying that foreign governments have not organized their affairs to help us get out of our recession. Well, should they? Should we, with our inherited assets in this great land occupied by about 24 million people, be looking to foreign governments, to foreign countries, to be bailing us out of the recession?

I asked the minister just that type of question in the House the other day, on June 16. With respect to the question of confidence in Canada, the minister said in reply to me that I was responsible for undermining the confidence of the investment community. He said, as reported at page 18514 of Hansard:

> I would suggest to him that he has undermined it by suggesting that somehow the way the bond issue went was due to some Canadian policy. It was due basically to a nervousness in the market environment—

He said:

> Maybe he would agree that he has a responsibility—

He was referring to me and for the first time I wondered how a poor country lawyer from the City of Mississauga was also all of a sudden responsible for the fact that a $750 million bond issue in Europe did not sell very well.

The government's policy has been to the blame the United States, to blame the provinces, to blame business, to blame Brian Peckford on one day, or Peter Lougheed on another day. On June 16, the government blamed me. All of a sudden, it was I who could not make things work, because the people did not have confidence in their government and its operations.

On that same date I forecast in the House of Commons that our deficit would be somewhere between $13 billion and $16 billion. On Monday night I could not believe my ears when I heard that our borrowing requirements were to be in excess of $17 billion and that our deficit would be $20 billion. I had no conception of how badly this government had mismanaged the affairs of Canada. It finally got to the point at which it had to come to the House of Commons on June 28 and tell us that it needed to borrow $17.1 billion, nearly three times what it said in November last would be its financial requirements.

I was first elected to this House of Commons on October 30, 1972. In that year, total government spending was $21,228 million. The total taxes taken in were $19,560 million and the deficit was $566 million. That was ten years ago. If we had kept within the range of inflation, this year's spending would possibly have reached $50 billion. Had we not been a little careful with spending, we might have reached a deficit of a billion dollars. Where are we going? Just ten years later our spending is $90 billion and our tax take is $70 billion. Where have these socialist policies, these NDP-oriented policies, taken us?

This is the party to my left which has been advocating certain policies to the Prime Minister and his colleagues. They are all the same type. They are the front runners for the Liberal Party. My western colleagues refer to the NDP as "Liberal Party West". Clearly it is the "Liberal Party West" because it does not have any member in what is traditionally called east of the Ottawa River, or eastern Canada. What do its members advocate? They have been advocating further state intervention in the lives of individuals, further government control.

Mr. Waddell: Cutting taxes, stimulating the economy, industrial strategy!

Mr. Blenkarn: What have we received from this government? We have received a whole series of these socially-oriented programs, programs designed for what was formerly called an industrial strategy. In 1972, that is what the leader of the NDP, the late David Lewis, called industrial strategy. So what we have received has been the EDP programs, ILAP programs, enterprise development programs and the DIP program.

Mr. Fisher: Tell that to the people at Admiral.

Mr. Blenkarn: They once said they wanted housing programs, so we now have housing programs. We have the NIP program, the CHIP program, the COSP program and all sorts of programs. My goodness gracious, one could write a book about the programs. Indeed, they do write books about the programs and send them around. They are well bound, but I do not think even those books contain all the programs. It would be impossible for a Member of Parliament to really understand all the various alphabet soup programs produced by this government, programs really designed for one purpose and one purpose only.

Let us talk about that purpose, because that is the essence of where we are and the problems we are experiencing. That purpose is to make individual Canadians more and more dependent upon government.

Mr. Huntington: Control the population.

Mr. Blenkarn: The purpose is to take away, bit by bit, the individual economic freedom-making decision of individuals. I point out to Your Honour that when the freedom of people is taken away, their political freedom is taken away. That is why the New Democratic Party made sure that the right to own property was not in the Constitution.

Mr. Waddell: Oh, get out. That was provincial.

Mr. Blenkarn: The NDP did not want it, and the Liberal Party did not want it because somewhere along the line some man would have gone to court and said, "I have a right to own my property and you cannot take it from me".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blenkarn: Hon. members of the NDP do not like it when it is brought back to their attention. They do not like to be reminded—

Mr. Waddell: It is irrelevant.

Mr. Blenkarn: —that the farmers of Saskatchewan, the voters of Saskatchewan, realized what the NDP had done with the right to property—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blenkarn: —how it operated a government which bought up all farmland and pushed up farm prices in Saskatchewan. That is why the NDP was thrown out.

Mr. Waddell: Why do you not attack those guys?

• (1740)

Mr. Fisher: Take it easy on our friends!

Mr. Blenkarn: My friend from Mississauga North (Mr. Fisher) says to take it easy on their friends in the NDP. We now have positive proof that the alliance is there—"take it easy on our friends".

We have a situation where we have had a whole series of economic programs that bit by bit control individuals. A builder may be afraid to criticize the government because he hopes Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation will give him some money to finance a new apartment building in the form of a grant or interest-free loan.

Until recently a public servant was on my mailing list. When he was getting too much mail from me, his wife telephoned my constituency office. She asked that we take their name off the list. She said they support Mr. Blenkarn and are behind him 100 per cent, but are afraid the postman will note that they are always getting mail from him. They are worried that what happened to Neil Fraser might happen to them.

A chartered bank may be afraid to blow the whistle on this government because its guarantee for a loan may not come through. What is going to be the situation with Dome Petroleum?

An executive of an oil company may be worried about whether he will get his PIP grant on one basis or another. Perhaps he does not criticize.

An electrical manufacturer negotiating a foreign sale wants to make sure he receives his financing from the Export Development Corporation at a fancy low rate of interest which the minister and only the minister can supply. Maybe a volunteer organization would like to have a grant. Maybe a Portuguese club, an Italian newspaper or a senior citizens group are looking for a grant. Maybe it is a native person or a researcher at a university. I could go on and on.

These grant and aid programs bit by bit compromise people. They force people into making decisions. Bit by bit they leech away the political and economic freedom that Canadians have. Bit by bit they destroy vitality, entrepreneurship, drive and initiative because it is part of a program designed to bribe, cajole, manoeuvre and direct people from the ivory towers of Ottawa.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): And build up a debt.

Mr. Blenkarn: They do that for sure. What part does the budget play in this great control program? This budget is another giant step toward control. It imposes for the first time wage controls and wage guidelines on a mandatory basis at 6 per cent. It is a further control mechanism.

The budget provides for $3,000 grants to those who buy a new house and fill in the forms to prove that they paid some of their own cash. It is a further dependency. It proposes a program of 4 per cent interest related to small businesses that may want to expand. It subsidizes interest expense for those who do not have the ability to make their mortgage payments. Again and again and again it further intrudes into the decision-making process of individuals. Bit by bit it leeches away by these various measures, by the tiddley make-work programs and by tiddley grant programs, the freedom and capacity of Canada to compete in the world market.

I note, Mr. Speaker, you are ready to call it 5.45. I suggest we call it 5.45 for the bells.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I thank the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn). It being 5.45 p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to Section (6) of Standing Order 60, to interrupt the proceedings and put every question necessary to dispose of the amendment to the amendment now before the House.

The question is on the amendment to the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment to the amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Call in the members.

Before the taking of the vote:

● (1800)

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think we are in a little bit of difficulty here. The seconder of the motion now before the House is not here, so that if the motion is to be put, I suggest it would have to be seconded by an hon. member other than the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: I understand that before we entered the House the motion had already been moved and seconded, and therefore we can proceed to the vote.

Mr. Nielsen: But surely, Madam Speaker, that is the point of order. The leader of the New Democratic Party is not here to second the motion. Therefore, to make our proceedings proper, I suggest to the Chair that the motion be put again and seconded by an hon. member who is in the chamber.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deans: Madam Speaker, as usual, the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) is wrong.

Some hon. Members: Where is your leader?

Mr. Deans: I am sure you are aware, Madam Speaker—and I am sure I do not have to bring it to your attention—that the mover and seconder need only be in the House at the time the motion is accepted by the Chair. The leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent), who seconded the motion on the day it was moved by our finance critic, the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis), is in western Canada today undermining Conservatives.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: My best advice tells me that the motion was moved and seconded the other day when it was presented to the House. What I am doing now is putting the motion to hon. members so that they will be reminded of what the motion really is. We can proceed with the motion as it was seconded whether or not the hon. member for Oshawa is in the House.

The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The House divided on the amendment to the amendment (Mr. Riis), which was negatived on the following division:

HOUSING

GRANT PAYMENT CRITERIA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, one of the growing list of fiascos from the recent tabling of the federal budget is that which involves a $3,000 grant to home buyers. Because of a rather astounding and serious oversight on the part of the Minister of Finance and his officials, the grant will apply only to those buying homes with insured mortgages which, under the National Housing Act must be paid by the buyer before purchase. In light of the fact that many home buyers will not be able to qualify for insured mortgages through NHA-approved lending institutions, and those that do, in addition to facing bureaucratic application-form delays, could be pre-paying up to $1,200, almost half the amount of the grant, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

That the finance minister take immediate steps to see that the mortgage insurance restrictions are removed from these grants, and that the red tape delaying the approval and awarding of these grants be eliminated at once.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POLITICAL PARTIES

STATEMENT MADE BY PRIVY COUNCILLOR—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I rise to take umbrage at the remarks of Privy Councillor and "Grey Eminence" Jack Pickersgill, who stated on the program "Insight" that we have no poor people in Canada. Perhaps there are no "poor" in the circles he travels in, that is, Liberal circles—but then, again, Liberals are always travelling in circles. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper):

That Canadians should know that Liberal Jack Pickersgill says everything is like a rose,

Even though the emperor has no clothes.

All McKim's horses and all McKim's men

Will never put poor "Pick" together again.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands.

FORESTRY

EXPORTATION OF UNPROCESSED LOGS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Madam Speaker, today when thousands of plywood and sawmill workers in British Columbia have been laid off, major forest companies plan to export prime peeler logs for processing in China. I move, therefore, seconded by the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose):

That this House condemns the export of unprocessed logs as a way of taking present and future jobs away from Canadians; further, that the House call upon the Government of British Columbia to develop stricter legislation prohibiting log exports; and that the House demand a proper housing program from the federal government to counteract the depression in the British Columbia lumber industry, caused by high interest rates.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FINANCE

DEMAND FOR BUDGET WITHDRAWALS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, the national energy policy started Canada on the downhill road to disaster. Industries folded, rigs left the country, investment went elsewhere, and bankruptcies erupted. The November 12 budget was supposed to alleviate some of that distress, but it did the very opposite. It hastened bankruptcies and multiplied unemployment. Then came strike three, the June budget, and it put the icing on the cake for the destruction of Canada. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Patterson):

S.O. 43

That this House demand the withdrawal of the November 12 budget and most of the June budget, or the immediate resignation of the minister.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE BUDGET—SUGGESTED RECONSIDERATION BY COLUMNIST—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, I too have a motion under Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that there were only two voices raised in support of last Monday's budget, namely, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce and that of columnist Richard Gwyn; and whereas the Chamber of Commerce has since recanted and now joins the majority of Canadians in opposing the budget, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans):

That this House urges Richard Gwyn, as the sole remaining pro-budget holdout, to reconsider his position.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

CANADIAN CONTENT IN JAPANESE MANUFACTURED VEHICLES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of pressing and urgent necessity. Whereas 18,000 Canadian auto parts workers are on lay-off; whereas Canada is the only major industrial nation which has been unable or unwilling to force Japan into signing an auto and auto parts trade agreement; and whereas Japan is unwilling to arrive at a more equitable export policy with Canada with respect to automobile parts and units, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans):

That at the July 15 and 16 trade talks with Japan the Minister of International Trade insist that the Japanese agree to source 85 per cent of all automobile and truck parts in Canada, and that failing to arrive at such an agreement the minister inform his Japanese counterpart that Canada will reduce the number of Japanese vehicles allowed into Canada this year and that this quota will be accompanied by an additional surtax.

RECOMMENDED MEASURES TO FIGHT POLLUTION OF GREAT LAKES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Madam Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton):

That since scientists have discovered levels of the deadly chemical dioxin in human tissue, this House now directs the government to adopt immediate and minimum measures to protect the health of Canadians who rely on Lake Ontario and its vicinity for their water and food supply by reducing the maximum levels of dioxin contamination in fish from 20 parts per trillion to ten parts per trillion; that the government appoint Canada's full entitlement of commissioners to the International Joint Commission to indicate to the United States government that Canadians are seriously concerned about the water quality of our Great Lakes; and that the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry be requested to establish a subcommittee to investigate the pollution of our Great Lakes by toxic chemical wastes and report its findings to the House as quickly as possible.

SALARY CONTROLS—CALL FOR MINISTER'S RESIGNATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas many armed forces personnel are already hard-pressed financially, with many of them eligible for and receiving provincial welfare, and whereas last week's budget introduced unfair controls on the salaries of those personnel, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong):

That this House calls for the resignation of the Minister of National Defence for not adequately protecting the interests of Canadian Armed Forces members.

EMPLOYMENT

FUNDING OF SUMMER STUDENT JOB-CREATION PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I rise pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the employment situation for students this summer in the lower mainland of British Columbia is the worst it has been for decades, and in view of the fact that thousands of Burnaby students from high schools, Simon Fraser University, BCIT, and the Pacific Vocational Institute have tried in vain to find summer employment, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong):

That this House calls upon the Minister of Employment and Immigration to fund immediately a major summer job-creation program for post-secondary education students as well as high school students and, further, that the minister increase significantly the allocation for federal student aid and assistance, in view of the hardship faced by students this summer.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

INDUSTRY

QUERY RESPECTING POSSIBLE GOVERNMENT SUPPORT FOR MONTREAL TRUCKING COMPANY

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance, not necessarily because it is a week since his budget but because, in the presentation of that budget, the minister talked about the economic crisis affecting Canada and the need for restraint. What justification can the minister give and what leadership is shown by the government in considering a bail out of a trucking firm in Montreal with a loan guarantee to the tune of $30 to $50 million, when that will necessitate changes in the ITC regulations and may very well open the door for all service industries, not alone trucking firms, to seek such federal assistance?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I should like to tell the hon. member that no decision has been reached to provide assistance in this particular case. I take it from his statement and the tone of his question that he would be opposed to any such assistance or relief in this particular case. I will certainly take account of his representation before any final decision is made.

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON CREATING PRECEDENT

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): I thank the minister for the consideration of listening to a representation, Madam Speaker, but I asked a question. I would be much more interested in knowing what the minister thought about these fundamental changes in the ITC regulations which will open the door for applications for bailing out guarantees to all service industries and not manufacturing industries as is the present policy. If the minister feels there is help available for Maislin Industries then, in effect, will every other service industry or trucking industry be knocking at his door?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Yes, Madam Speaker, I believe that every precedent established usually incites further applications for assistance. On that proposition I have absolutely no difference with the hon. member. The content of his question is still speculative, however, because we have not reached any decision. There has been a request for assistance, but no decision has been reached. When a decision is reached the hon. member will be able to put his questions with more knowledge, and certainly I will be able to answer them with more knowledge. At the moment the matter is still undecided.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

POSSIBLE INVOLVEMENT IN MILWAUKEE RAILROAD COMPANY AGREEMENT

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport, Madam Speaker. In view of the fact, and I think it is a fact, that one of the main reasons Maislin is in trouble is because of its U.S. operations and the fact that two thirds or more of its business is in the United States, can the Minister of Transport, who reports for the Canadian National Railways, please explain to the House—and this would be another example of government leadership and responsibility—how in the world CN, a Crown corporation, could be involved in a three-year operating agreement with the Milwaukee Railroad Company which is now in receivership to the tune of $250 million, with the option, after that three-year agreement expires, of taking over the company and accepting its $250 million debt? At the same time, CN has reduced container service to Halifax, has become bogged down in the CAST operation of Montreal which is costing taxpayers money, and last summer used the deficit position of VIA Rail as a reason for the minister to cut service back by 20 per cent. What justification or rationalization is there for CN, a Crown corporation, to act in this way?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the answer is terribly simple. As in the previous instance, that decision has not been made. What CN has with respect to the Milwaukee Railroad Company is an option to buy in three years' time. The purchase has not been made. My hon. friend, who is an expert in transportation, knows very well that CN is already in the United States with the Grand Trunk, for example, which makes an interesting contribution to the financial welfare of the company. There is a border between Canada and the U.S., but freight goes across that border and it is considered useful for CN to have these facilities in the United States.

TELECOMMUNICATIONS

BELL CANADA RATE INCREASE APPLICATIONS

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, over the past few days consumers have learned of proposed rate increases by Bell Canada which would translate into a 25 per cent increase in home phone service, and another 20 per cent increase by CN/CP to send a telegram. I would ask the Minister of Finance whether his officials have examined these applications to learn whether they are justified in light of the 6 per cent inflation guidelines?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the matter will go before the regulatory body and we will have to wait and see what the result of that hearing will be and what action is taken by that agency. In the budget statement we have issued a suggestion or direction to the regulatory agencies and government departments to justify any increases above 6 per cent. When the result of the hearing is known it will be possible for the cabinet or the government to review the situation to see whether in its view the increase has been justified.

ROLE OF MINISTER

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, if the government does not feel that a 20 per cent to 25 per cent increase in the cost of sending a telegram or using a telephone comes under exceptional circumstances, in other words, if the government does not feel these increases are justified, how does the Minister of Finance propose to override the CRTC, the CTC, or any other regulatory agency of the government? Will he do it through an official directive, or will he bring a bill before this House to make sure these companies adhere to the 6 per cent inflation guideline?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, when the finding of the board or, in this case, commission, is made known, then that will be the occasion for the cabinet to review the conclusion on appeal. It seems to me it would be wrong at this stage to set aside the process established by Parliament. When that process is completed, then that will be the opportune time for the government to take its decision.

FINANCE

THE BUDGET—EFFECT OF WAGE REDUCTIONS

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Finance. Having spent the better part of the last four days travelling the country I want to ask the minister a question which has been frequently asked of me. We have interest rates at a level which people cannot afford. We have inflation at a level which people cannot pay to meet. We therefore have unemployment at a level which, I think, is an all-time high in the modern history of this country, and productivity is down to a level which I believe is an all-time low.

People have asked me, and therefore I ask the minister, how can reducing the wages of people who, previous to the introduction of the budget, could not afford to buy the products being manufactured in Canada, help to get the country back on its feet?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for the way he has formulated his question because he has seen the logical progression from high interest rates to high inflation to high unemployment. That is, in a sense, the logic I have been attempting to establish in the House of Commons.

I say to the hon. member that if we are to break what he has described as the source of our difficulty, namely, inflation, we will have to reduce our income demands. That is the logic of the budget statement. If all income demands—and I am putting the emphasis on all—were reduced to 6 per cent, then price increases would drop to 6 per cent. That would be the inevitable result, and we would then be well on the road to success in the battle against inflation to which he properly ascribes the high unemployment we have in the country at the present time.

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON INTEREST RATES

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Finance? The minister will recall, I am sure, that during the period 1975 to 1978 when there were wage controls in this country, prices did not go down. In fact inflation rose at a level far faster than wages rose. I ask the minister again if he can explain the following to me.

If unemployment and low productivity are related directly to high interest rates, as the minister has admitted, and if it is true that people who did not have sufficient money to buy products prior to the introduction of the budget will not have any more money as a result of the budget and, therefore, will be in no better position to buy products, why did the government not tackle the root cause?

Why did the government not take steps to bring down interest rates and thereby serve the purchasing power of the people of Canada and the manufacturing sector in a beneficial way? That would have allowed the manufacturing sector to get back on its feet?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the government did take the only durable step that can be taken to reduce interest rates. We are attempting to break the inflation psychosis in the country by talking about a 6 per cent world of income demands. That is the only way to reduce inflation and the only way to reduce interest rates. The hon. member has that logic in his mind, and he ought to interrelate all these factors because he has all the logic in his head to do it.

Mr. Deans: Madam Speaker, this could well be a book written by Lewis Carroll.

IMPACT OF WAGE CONTROLS

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, given that the shock troops in this battle for 6 per cent are the public service employees, may I ask the Minister of Finance why he thinks it appropriate, proper and morally defensible to act to remove from the bargaining table all matters relating to collective bargaining and to move unilaterally to reduce the wages of people who sat down in good faith and negotiated wage increases? Does the minister really believe that, in the Liberal tradition, this is a morally defensible thing to do?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Yes, Madam Speaker, I think it is morally defensible—

Mr. Broadbent: In the Liberal tradition?

Mr. MacEachen: —because it is in the national interest and it is absolutely imperative if we are to move out of this very serious critical economic situation that we face. At the present time in the country we have to take exceptional steps, and it is an exceptional step that will be recommended to Parliament by the President of the Treasury Board to reduce the income settlements of the Public Service to 6 per cent and then to 5 per cent. That is exceptional. I admit that to the hon. member. It is justified because of the exceptional circumstances that exist in this economy and in various economies in the world. If I wanted to go on to justify it, I would refer the hon. member to the experience of most of our economic partners where wage settlements in the public sector are distinctly lower than the rate of inflation.

Mr. Deans: They are in Canada, too.

Mr. MacEachen: They have been introduced for the very same reason that they are being introduced in Canada, and that is in order to get out of the 12 per cent world of recession and into a 6 per cent world of recovery. That is the exceptional justification for it.

CROWN CORPORATIONS

MORTGAGE RATES OFFERED TO EMPLOYEES

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Madam Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. He will know that farmers are losing their farms, workers are losing their jobs and their homes, and businessmen are losing their businesses because of high interest rates in Canada. How can the President of the Treasury Board justify employees of government-owned Crown corporations receiving mortgages at one half of the present market rate?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): I do not know of the particular circumstance to which the hon. member is referring. Employees of Crown corporations do not come under the jurisdiction of the Treasury Board in any event.

EXPORT DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION MORTGAGE PLAN

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Madam Speaker, in that case my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Surely someone over there is responsible for this atrocious act. Will the Minister of Finance check into the fact that the Export Development Corporation of Canada is planning on offering mortgages to its employees at one half the present market rates which other Canadians have to pay on their homes?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Yes, Madam Speaker. The minister to whom the corporation reports is prepared to answer.

An hon. Member: Then answer it!

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of State (International Trade)): Madam Speaker, I am not aware of the hon. member's claim, but I will check it out and get back to him tomorrow.

TREASURY BOARD

WAGE INCREASE DIRECTIVE COVERING MINISTERIAL STAFFS

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. It follows upon a remark just made by the Minister of Finance that it was in the national interest to limit the wage increases of public servants. If it is in the national interest to limit increases to public servants to 6 per cent in one year and 5 per cent in the following year, how can it be in the national interest for the minister to have signed a directive on last June 17 to increase the salaries of his political staff and the political staff of ministers—his colleagues and the minister—by 10 per cent? How can that be in the national interest?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I have explained on a number of occasions that contracts and pay periods which came up for renewal prior to budget night were treated in a just and equitable fashion. In fact if the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton takes the trouble to read Bill C-124—

Mr. Johnston: Are hon. members opposite interested in the answer to the question, or not?

If he takes the trouble to read Bill C-124, he will see that there are transitional provisions which provide for up to 9 per cent for any group that was open as at June 28 but whose contract would bridge that date. Ministerial staff received 10 per cent, which was very much in line with the general settlements being accorded across the system at that time, effective as of April 1. As I further explained, they go under the system just like everybody else. They will become subject to 6 per cent and 5 per cent increases just as the military will be, just as the RCMP will be, and just as all other groups which have been settled in the period before June 28 will be.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): The minister may have forgotten that the people we are talking about are political exempt staff. They have been allowed a cushion now of 10 per cent, if that bill applies, for a period of time prior to the coming into force of the bill. This was made by a President of the Treasury Board who, during that period of time, was forecasting some sacrifices for other people in the public service that would start right now.

POSITION OF EXEMPT POLITICAL STAFF

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, why does the President of the Treasury Board not do the honourable thing? Rather than defending the indefensible increases for political staff, the appointees of himself and his colleagues, why does he not do the honourable thing and roll them all back so that the exempt staff will stand in exactly the same position as public servants?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, the point I have been making to the hon. gentleman is that the exempt staff does stand in exactly the same position as the public service. He would have us say that because these members of exempt staff are appointed by individual ministers, somehow they should be made particular sacrificial lambs. I do not accept that position whatsoever. They are subject to exactly the same regime in exactly the same manner, and I judge that to be fair in the circumstances.

REQUEST THAT DIRECTIVE BE TABLED

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. The sacrificial lambs about whom he is so concerned never went through any collective bargaining process or never had any collective agreement. His comparison with the public service, let alone with the private sector which they are now asking to restrain itself, is odious at best.

If the minister feels so strongly about these sacrificial lambs, will he do two things—first, will he table a directive which he signed on June 17 and, I suggest, knowing fairly well what was in the mind of the Minister of Finance at the time in terms of his plea to other Canadians? Second, would he table the salaries of his exempt staff and of that of his colleagues over the last year so that we can see what happened last March or April with respect to wage increase for those self-same people, at the same time that he is asking every Canadian, not only public servants, to restrain themselves to 6 per cent?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, if we must get into the area of being odious, I would suggest that that is a very odious question. The hon. member is especially suggesting that these people who work for ministers and in their staff offices—he was a minister himself; he knows how hard they work, the demands on their time and how important they are to the working of government—should not be entitled to an increase which was very much in line with the increases given to other groups during that period. I also point out that that increase was up to 10 per cent. It is up to the minister in question to determine within those ranges, as the member also knows, what the amount should actually be.

Then he said that they did not collectively bargain and therefore they should not get this special treatment. Well, would he say that with respect to the military? They do not collectively bargain, and they were given 11 per cent. Is he suggesting that they should be rolled back as well? What about the RCMP? They do not collectively bargain. Should they be rolled back as well?

Mr. Nielsen: They do.

Mr. Johnston: The fact is that all these groups are being treated in exactly the same fashion, namely, next year at the expiration of that initial pay period which applies to everybody they will receive up to 6 per cent and up to 5 per cent. That is what is provided for in the law and that strikes me as eminently fair.

Mr. Jarvis: Madam Speaker, I was every bit as proud of my staff as I presume the minister might be of his. The difference is that the exempt staff were the beneficiaries of a sleezy, underhanded directive days before the budget. That is what it was. The minister was sneaking in a pay raise when he knew full well that everyone else would be restrained to 6 per cent.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

REQUEST THAT INFORMATION ON SALARIES BE TABLED

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Madam Speaker, if the minister wants to protect the integrity of that exempt staff, why does he not table their salaries over the last year so that we in the House and the entire country can see exactly what has happened in terms of this minister's benevolence?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I reject categorically that sleezy allegation. The fact is that the exempt staff pay period comes up for renewal as of April 1. My recollection is that the decision with respect to the 10 per cent was taken many weeks ago. The fact that it was notified to ministers on June 17 only, is completely irrelevant in the circumstances. I assure the hon. member that the ministers of the Treasury Board who established that 10 per cent did not do so with any knowledge of what the Minister of Finance would finally determine in his budget on June 28.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

HOUSING

ELIGIBILITY CRITERIA FOR GRANTS TO HOME BUYERS

Mr. D. M. Collenette (York East): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works who is responsible for housing policy. The Sunday edition of The Toronto Sun charged that the $3,000 home buyers' grant made available in the budget to first-time home buyers and to buyers of new housing will be reduced by some $600 to $1,200 under a technical requirement of the National Housing Act. Could the minister responsible for CMHC inform the House whether or not this is true?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. It gives me an opportunity to point out to hon. members that the story in the Toronto media is inaccurate and untrue. The $3,000 grant which is available to any purchaser of a new home or to first-time buyers of old homes will be available to anyone who qualifies under those circumstances. The report is one that is inaccurate. The $3,000 grant will stand, and it is effective as of the date the minister announced it.

AGRICULTURE

APPLICATION OF GUIDELINES TO INCOME OF FARMERS

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. Since interprovincial marketing boards were set up to give farmers the assurance that the selling price of their products would cover the cost of production, and since the new budget intends to limit these return to the 6 per cent and 5 per cent formula of the Minister of Finance, while not controlling the input costs of energy, interest rates and other items, will the minister inform the House how he can impose this income and wage control upon farmers, given that there is no authorization in the enabling legislation to allow the minister to set prices arbitrarily?

• (1440)

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, every one of the regulated products but one that are under federal jurisdiction were under the suggested 6 per cent, which is something of which a lot of people are not aware. In Ontario, when they signed the contracts for approximately 15 products this year, there was only one over a 5 per cent increase. Some were as low as a 3.2 per cent increase. In some instances perhaps the marketing boards are ahead of us in controlling what we call inflation. I think they have given leadership, maybe even to government, but certainly they have provided leadership for many other people in our society in that they have agreed to take those kinds of increases early in the year. Some of those contracts were signed in March and April of this year by producer groups.

The Minister of Finance has also suggested that, under special circumstances, if increased costs take place, for example, the merits of an application can be considered if it needs to go above 6 per cent. However, if those input costs come down I cannot see any regulated price commodity or cost-pricing formula—I cannot see any of them asking for more than 6 per cent if the rest of society goes along with what we are suggesting. In most instances marketing boards have given that kind of leadership. All matters under the jurisdiction of the federal Minister of Agriculture have practically stayed under those ranges, except the industrial milk products.

Mr. Hovdebo: Madam Speaker, the minister is skirting the question by ignoring the principles. It sounds to me that what we are talking about is subversion of marketing boards.

LEGISLATIVE AUTHORITY

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Madam Speaker, under what legislative authority will the minister proceed with respect to these prices since these are all federal-provincial agreements? Will the minister be seeking provincial approval before proceeding, or will he implement the peace, order and good government clause in the Constitution, as the government did under the AIB legislation?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, again all the hon. member has to do is check the records which will show, for instance, that eggs were minus 4 per cent last year, not an increase, and other poultry products were lower than what we are suggesting even this year. Again, I do not know what the hon. member is talking about because we have no jurisdiction over some of the provincial marketing boards. Some of them are very strong, and they exist in every province across Canada. It would be up to the provinces to provide guidelines for them. We have been doing some checking and I should be able to release some figures, hopefully later today or tomorrow, to show exactly what some of them have done this year. I think it is to their credit that they have again provided that kind of leadership.

There is a misconception that many people have about marketing boards and the pricing formula that they follow. If input costs are down, they agree to take less. They do not agree to hold the status quo; they agree to go down in price. The only time that they increase prices to the consumers of Canada is if the input costs go up. They are very satisfied with that. Those farmers under programs such as those are the ones who are not going broke either. They run their own business, too.

FISHERIES

APPLICATION OF SMALL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BOND PROGRAM TO FISHERMEN

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. In the budget last week there was an amount of $400 million allocated to small business people, including fishermen. Completely apart from the Small Business Development Bond program, is any of that $400 million going to assist applicants who apply under the Small Business Development Bond? In other words, is the $400 million for other purposes and other applications, or is some of the money going to be used for those people who have to apply under the Small Business Development Bond program?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, a couple of weeks ago I had occasion to meet with fishermen on the west coast. They told me that the previous program of assistance to farmers and fishermen under the provisions of the small business bond had been very helpful. As well, once the financial institutions understood what the intention was, that even unorganized and unincorporated fishermen should have access to it, they found it very helpful.

It is my hope that the new or additional measures announced by the Minister of Finance will be seen and interpreted by financial institutions in exactly the same way. Certainly those fishermen who attended the meeting spoke quite highly of the provisions that existed then, and that was before the budget.

Mr. Fraser: I am certain that the minister is very sincere in talking with fishermen about the Small Business Development Bond program. The fact of the matter is that of the $400 million that has been allocated and trumpeted as aid to fishermen, it clearly seems, on reading the budget documents, to apply only to new investment.

POSITION OF FISH PROCESSING PLANTS

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Madam Speaker, what happens to fishermen, fishing companies, or fish processing companies that cannot get relief from the banks with the Small Business Development Bond or from other lending institutions? Can those people apply to get a piece of the $400 million if they are not investing or making a new investment in plant equipment for capital projects? If they cannot, there is nothing new in the budget for fishermen.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, perhaps I did not understand the hon. member's question fully, for which I blame myself and not him. In the case of corporations and processors who do not meet the criteria of the small business bond legislation or regulations, they have access to the Fisheries Prices Support Board. I am aware that some of them have already presented their cases.

As I say, I can only judge by the experience I have seen. This was not an incidental conversation. It was in the process of consultation with the fisheries advisory council on the west coast where fishermen themselves volunteered—I did not ask them—that the previous program had been helpful and that they hoped that it would be continued. That is why I was personally pleased to hear the Minister of Finance express his support even for the unincorporated fishermen who are in some difficulty at the moment.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CZECHOSLOVAKIA—ACCREDITATION OF NEW AMBASSADOR TO CANADA

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I am sure that the minister is aware that the Government of Czechoslovakia has requested the accreditation of Mr. Vincent Buzek as the new ambassador to Canada. Is he aware that prior to his appointment as ambassador to Canada his previous assignment was in association with Section A, subsection 4 of the main intelligence office of the Czech Ministry of the Interior? Is he also aware that that organization is mainly concerned with espionage in the Americas, including Canada, of course?

In these circumstances will the minister be prepared to grant accreditation or grant agrément for this ambassador?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, until this moment I was not personally aware of those facts. I do not know whether there is any knowledge of that in my department. I will certainly be pleased to consider the matter in light of the hon. member's comments.

NEGOTIATION OF BILATERAL AGREEMENT—QUESTION OF DUAL CITIZENSHIP

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, in view of the fact that the outgoing ambassador from Czechoslovakia has mentioned that the conclusion of a bilateral agreement is very near completion, will the minister soon take an opportunity to brief the House on the progress of that agreement, particularly as it affects the dual accreditation problem which is causing a great deal of anxiety among those loyal Canadians of Czechoslovakian descent?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the double citizenship problem is one which has disturbed Canadians of Czechoslovakian ancestry, Canadians generally, and certainly the Canadian government, for a long time. Either the ambassador was incorrectly quoted or he was mistaken in the statement that the hon. member has quoted, which I have seen myself, but that is not the fact. In fact, although our government has been continuously pressing the Czech government on this we have no indication that they are prepared to accept our point of view. Unfortunately, there is no indication that this matter will be resolved in the near future.

REQUEST THAT RECEIVING OF CREDENTIALS BE POSTPONED

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, is the minister prepared to withhold the agrément on the new ambassador until this matter of dual accreditation has been sorted out to the satisfaction of loyal Canadians of Czech origin?

• (1450)

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Madam Speaker, I do not believe that would be a sensible policy. Surely if we have any hope of resolving this problem with the Czechoslovak government, it is not by cutting off avenues of communication.

Oral Questions

FINANCE

APPOINTMENT OF WOMEN TO ADVISORY COMMITTEE

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, in his budget speech the Minister of Finance indicated that he would be setting up a committee of prominent Canadians drawn from the legal, financial and accounting communities to examine certain budget proposals. Since then he has indeed established a committee of prominent Canadians from these fields. Can he tell the House how many women are included in these appointments?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Yes, Madam Speaker, I will be pleased to advise the hon. lady on that subject. The selection for the current members of the committee was based upon consultation with private sector organizations. Unfortunately, no woman was put forward as a suggested person. Since that time I have had consultations with my colleague, the minister responsible for the status of women. I am seeking her advice, and the advice of the advisory council for women, on whom might be added to this very important committee. I am proceeding to do that in co-operation with the minister and the agency.

TIMING OF APPOINTMENTS

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, what an admission for the Minister of Finance to make in this House of Commons, that the appointment of women to any body, especially a body as important as this one, comes as an afterthought. That is always the way it is treated. Why were the representations of the minister responsible for women not put forward before the original appointments were made, and not after?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to say that the matter has been attended to in a very timely way. I appreciate the hon. member's interest, but it is a bit lagged.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW AGENCY

CHANGES IN PROCEDURES

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In his budget of a week ago the minister announced some changes to FIRA. One of the changes was to increase the threshold for a review of a foreign take-over from $2 million and 100 employees to $5 million and 200 employees. What is the purpose of that change? Is it the intention to exempt any sector of the Canadian economy?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the question should be directed to the minister responsible for FIRA or, in his absence, to the parliamentary secretary. However, I would say that the purpose of these changes generally was to make the operation of the agency more timely and efficient and to make it carry out the wishes of Parliament according to the law.

REQUEST THAT HIGH TECHNOLOGY INDUSTRIES BE EXEMPTED FROM CHANGES

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, the minister is no doubt aware that the hi-tech industry, for example, is perhaps the most dynamic and innovative industry in the country. Many of the firms are small, they are Canadian, and they have an exceptional growth rate. Can the minister explain how opening the door even further to foreign take-overs will help this sector of the Canadian economy? Can he advise whether he is considering exempting at least the hi-tech industry in this country from these changes under FIRA?

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of State (International Trade)): Madam Speaker, unfortunately my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, is not here today. As the Minister of Finance stated, the main reason behind this procedure is to streamline the process and not to deter any of these hi-tech industries as the hon. member mentioned.

VIA RAIL

EFFECT OF CUTBACKS ON TOURIST INDUSTRY IN JASPER

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo-Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. It has to do with the VIA Rail cuts. The minister must be aware that the decision to cut passenger rail service between Vancouver and Jasper has had a terrible effect on the tourist trade in Jasper, and especially on Japanese people trying to get to Jasper. Is the minister willing to sit down with representatives of the Jasper business community to discuss ways and means of remedying this situation?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Yes, Madam Speaker.

ACCESS ROUTES TO JASPER

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo-Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, is it true that the minister is planning to take his summer holidays in Jasper? If so, how does he propose to get there?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, there are a number of ways of getting there. I would simply underline the fact that only 1.7 per cent of those who go to Jasper travel by train.

FINANCE

IMPOSITION OF WAGE CONTROLS—REQUEST THAT HIGH SALARIES BE FROZEN

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Does the minister realize the unfairness of percentage cuts and percentage increases? Six per cent off a salary of $90,000, $100,000 or more does not lower the standard of living of that person or his family. However, 6 per cent off a salary of someone in a lower bracket takes bread out of the mouths of his children. Why does the minister not correct this by freezing the salaries of those in the high brackets, and leaving those in the lower brackets, those who are having difficulty making both ends meet, alone?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, there are a number of comments to be made in reply to the hon. member. First, we did make a proposal along the lines suggested by the hon. member to the first ministers' conference in February. It was not supported either by the first ministers' conference or by members of the House of Commons. Therefore, we did not proceed with that particular suggestion. I understand the hon. member's concern about the impact of any such limits on increases, indexation or salaries, and assure him that the quickest way to minimize the impact of any of these possibilities is to get the rate of inflation down to 6 per cent. That will remove most of the worry the hon. member has.

EXPENSE OF FIREWORKS ON NATIONAL HOLIDAY

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, is the minister suggesting that spending $4 million on firecrackers helped to bring down inflation? Would the minister not have had a much happier feeling down in his heart if he had spent some of that $4 million in helping to alleviate the poverty of women between 50 and 65 who do not receive anything from the government at this time? No answer?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Yes, Madam Speaker, I would like to reply to the hon. member. I would tell him that, in the interest of restraint, the expenditures on the celebration of our national holiday were drastically reduced this year.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

UNITED STATES EXPORT SALES PRICING PROPOSAL

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport in his capacity of answering questions for the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. Is the minister aware of a situation in which the United States Secretary of Agriculture will be acting on proposals to implement an interest rate buy-down feature for grain sales to come under their public law 480 program for grain exports? This would mean that the United States could sell grain on world markets cheaper than other countries. In other words, it would sell grain more cheaply. Is the government aware of this move by the U.S. Department of Agriculture? If so, has it communicated Canada's concern over this problem? Ultimately a situation would develop in which there would not be any additional grain sold, and grain would be sold at a cheaper price. This would have a devastating effect on farmers not only in western Canada but all over Canada.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I must admit I was not aware of that. I will inform myself immediately and provide the hon. member with an answer.

PRIVY COUNCIL OFFICE

REPORTED HOLIDAY ENJOYED BY EMPLOYEE

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, in light of the fact the holiday season is upon us, I would like to give the President of the Treasury Board an opportunity to confirm or deny a report in the Ottawa Citizen and The Toronto Sun that a secretary to the Privy Council office is enjoying four months on the Mediterranean Sea at a cost of $12,000 to the taxpayers, on top of a reported $75,000 salary?

• (1500)

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I did note an earlier report on this subject. I will look into the matter. I have not seen the report in the Ottawa Citizen or The Toronto Star so I am not in a position to discuss any numbers with the hon. member.

TREASURY BOARD

SALARY INCREASES FOR MINISTERS' POLITICAL STAFFS

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, I wonder if I might address my supplementary question to the same minister. Would he deny or confirm that some of the political staff of cabinet ministers not only received a 10 per cent salary increase on the eve of the new budget but also received a reported 10 per cent to 12 per cent increase early in April of this same year?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Peterborough should know that each year there is an adjustment made to the wages of public employees and ministerial staff and also employees of members of this House. This is made by the Committee of Internal Economy. I reject the notion which has been put forward by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton, that this was made on the eve of the budget.

An hon. Member: June 17.

Mr. Johnston: It may very well have been that I signed the letter of June 17, but the decision was made some time ago stipulating 10 per cent, which was at the low end of the amounts that had then been decided upon.

Mr. Clark: Why don't you table the document?

Mr. Johnston: As to the other part of the allegation, that some ministerial staffs had received additional increases of 10 per cent, that would strike me as being most unusual. The wages are there and they cannot be exceeded, unless some particular minister comes to Treasury Board. I am certainly not aware that any ministers have come to the Board asking for increases of that magnitude.

I might explain how the system works, Madam Speaker. It is specifically designed to place standards across the system, fair standards with reasonable annual adjustments that can be made. This is as true of ministerial staff as it is anywhere else in the system.

REQUEST THAT DIRECTIVE AND SALARY INFORMATION BE TABLED

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. Would he not eliminate what he claims to be this confusion—certainly, there is controversy—by taking the simple expedient of tabling the order of June 17 and tabling also an indication of the salaries received by all the exempt staff, before and after June 17?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, what I would be prepared to do is—on the information I actually requested but do not have at hand at the moment—is to advise the hon. Leader of the Opposition as to when Treasury Board ministers actually made the decision to give a 10 per cent increase to ministerial exempt staff. I know the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition would agree that it was a reasonable settlement at that time. It was a very reasonable proposal made to those hard-working exempt staff members. I recall that it is slightly less than the adjustments that were in fact made to employees of members of the House of Commons and their officers by the ministers of the Committee of Internal Economy.

PETITIONS

TABLING OF REPORT OF CLERK OF PETITIONS

Madam Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has laid upon the table reports of the Clerk of Petitions stating that he has examined the petitions presented by hon. members on Wednesday, June 30, 1982, and finds that they meet the requirements of the Standing Orders as to form.

PETITION

MR. McKINNON—CELEBRATION OF CANADA'S 115TH BIRTHDAY

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, it is my duty and pleasure to present a petition signed last week by several thousand people in the city of Victoria. This petition is somewhat different from most petitions. It does not ask that an injustice be rectified.

Madam Speaker: Order please. I am sorry, this object must be removed from the House. This does seem to me to be an exhibit.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: It must be removed from the House. I have never seen a petition like that before. It can be taken to the back of the House, behind the curtain.

Mr. McKinnon: Madam Speaker, I do not wish to upset the decorum of the House. This petition is in the form of a birthday card signed by several thousand people during the celebrations of our birthday. The petition is merely to ask Parliament to accept and pass on to all Canadians their good wishes for a happy birthday and a good 115th year in this wonderful country. And as in duty bound your petitioners will ever pray.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 2,286, 2,448 and 4,316.

AGREEMENT BETWEEN GOVERNMENT AND OGDENSBURG PORT AND BRIDGE AUTHORITY

Question No. 2,286—Mr. Cossitt:

1. (a) What are the terms and details of any agreement in existence between the government and the Ogdensburg Port and Bridge Authority with regard to the International Bridge east of Prescott in the constituency of Leeds-Grenville (b) does the authority own buildings occupied by Canada Customs and Immigration and, if so, is a rental fee paid and, if not, for what reason (c) is the government satisfied with the manner in which the authority has maintained the facilities and, if not, what are any inadequacies?

2. (a) Has there been or is there a problem between the government and the authority with regard to lighting in the area where trucks are examined at night by Canada Customs and Immigration (b) is one of the light circuits out of operation and, if so, for how long has it not been operating and for what reason was it not fixed (c) did the authority on any occasion turn off all the lights to prevent Canada Customs and Immigration from examining trucks at night and was this done to force rent payments on the government?

3. Are any negotiations going on between the government and the authority for the purpose of settling any differences and, if so, what is the status of such negotiations?

Mr. Claude Tessier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): 1. (a) The existing agreements are: an act to incorporate Ogdensburg Bridge Authority Chapter 57 assented to 4 July 1952, and P.C. 1957-331, an agreement respecting financial matters. (b) Yes. No. It is departmental policy to have the operator of the revenue oriented border facility provide and maintain customs accommodation free of charge. (c) No. Repairs and/or alterations would be in order.

2. (a) Yes there was a lighting problem which has been rectified. (b) No. One of the light circuits was out of operation and was repaired within three hours on March 21, 1981. (c) The authority did turn out lights once in an attempt to reduce operating costs.

3. Yes. They are ongoing.

LIGHTING ON PRESCOTT-OGDENSBURG INTERNATIONAL BRIDGE

Question No. 2,448—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Was approximately half the lighting on the Prescott-Ogdensburg International Bridge turned off at any time during April, 1981, as well as half the lighting from the Canada Customs area to provincial highway 16 and, if so (a) was this turned off by the Ogdensburg Port and Bridge Authority (b) on what grounds?

2. Did an accident occur on the bridge recently involving three cars which could be attributed to insufficient lighting and, if so, what are all the details?

3. Has the government determined whether or not any action by United States interests is part of a campaign to harass the government into paying rent for Canada Customs and Canada Immigration buildings and were the buildings to be rent-free under the original agreement signed by parties on both sides of the border?

4. Does the government propose to take any action concerning the situation?

Mr. Claude Tessier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): 1. Yes part of the lighting on the bridge and at the end of the Canada Customs area to provincial highway 16 was turned off although the customs and immigration area was not affected. (a) Yes. (b) In an attempt to reduce operating costs.

2. Yes, on April 23, and an investigation was conducted by the O.P.P.

3. There is no evidence of a campaign to harass the Canadian government. The existing agreements make no specific provision for rent free buildings.

4. No, since the lighting problems have been rectified by the Port and Bridge Authority.

FIREARM ACQUISITION CERTIFICATES

Question No. 4,316—Mr. Malone:

1. For each year since 1978, by province and territory, how many Firearm Acquisition Certificates were issued for (a) long rifles (b) hand guns?

2. How many persons who applied for acquisition certificates for (a) long rifles (b) hand guns were turned down and denied a certificate?

Order Paper Questions

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): 1. The Firearms Acquisition Certificate (FAC) system came into effect on January 1, 1979. For 1979 and subsequent years up to and including 1981, national and provincial FAC statistics are recorded in the Annual Firearms Reports to the Solicitor General of Canada by the Commissioner of the RCMP. As these reports are tabled annually in Parliament by the Solicitor General, your attention is directed to page 9 of the 1979 Report tabled April 23, 1980, page 10 of the 1980 Report tabled March 25, 1981, page 10 of the 1981 Report tabled April 7, 1982.

2. The FAC statistics indicate the number of FAC's issued each year by province and territory and also indicate the number of FAC's which were refused. However, there is no breakdown of FAC's issued for handguns and those issued for long guns since FAC's are issued for any number and any type of firearm acquired during a five-year period.

[English]

Mr. Smith: I would ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I want to draw the parliamentary secretary's attention to a series of questions on the Order Paper, beginning at number 4,188. These questions cover employees of the following agencies: de Havilland Aircraft of Canada, Limited; Air Canada; Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation; Canadian Broadcasting Corporation; Canadian National Railways and its subsidiaries; Cape Breton Development Corporation; Eldorado Aviation Limited; Eldorado Nuclear Limited; Export Development Corporation, which was referred to today in question period; National Arts Centre Corporation; Petro-Canada; and Canadair Limited. The question in all of those cases relates to what occurred today, and that is why I raise it today. It is: Were the loans made, were loans made to any employee of the named corporation or its subsidiaries since March, 1980, and if so, in each case what is the name and title of the employee; on what date was the loan taken out; on what date is it due; what was the amount of the loan; what interest rate is being charged; and what was the purpose of the loan?

I have not raised this before, but in view of what has occurred during the last few days in which the House has been sitting, there was a question raised specifically today about the Export Development Corporation which would seem to me to make the answers to these questions relevant and require some urgent consideration.

I want to ask the parliamentary secretary if he would speak to the appropriate officials in each of those corporations, all of them Crown corporations, to obtain the answers to those simple questions. They ought to be there in the minutes of those corporations somewhere.

Mr. Smith: Madam Speaker, I will be more than happy to look into this matter on behalf of the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton.

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Wednesday, June 30, 1982, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government, and the amendment of Mr. Wilson (p. 18905).

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, when the debate was adjourned on Wednesday last to have a vote on the amendment to the amendment by the New Democratic Party, I was speaking about a number of things concerning the thrust of this budget that we have before us.

Over the weekend I was asked by a number of people, and I certainly have been asked in this House and so have others by members opposite, what we would do if we were the government, the kinds of measures that we would take in a budget to restore confidence in Canada. Madam Speaker, the first thing, of course, that we would do would be to eliminate the iniquitous provisions of the November 12 budget.

That budget was designed to destroy confidence, to destroy the willingness of people to risk their money and to destroy their desire to invest in Canada and create in Canada. That budget, with its horrendously complicated and vicious disallowance of loans, its vicious disallowance of capital cost on equipment and its anti-entrepreneurial stance in terms of taxation, is the kind of thing which has damaged Canada dramatically over the last eight months. We would have eliminated the provisions set forth on November 12. This minister did not do that, but that is the first thing we would have done.

Second, we would have seriously altered or suspended the operation of the Foreign Investment Review Agency. This country is desperately short of capital. The minister has said in answers in the House that we have a high savings rate, but I point out that while we may have a high savings rate in relation to the United States, our personal savings rate is less than half that which exists in Great Britain and less than one-third of that which exists in Japan. Second, our high savings rate is eroded by our high inflation rate. It is all very well to say that Canadians save up to 13 per cent of their disposable income, but when we have an inflation rate of 12 per cent, that saving does not amount to very much. It certainly does not amount to enough to create the renewal required in our industries and to develop our many resources. We need foreign investment in this country. We need it in the worst way, and anything we have in our laws which discourages investment in Canada is anti-Canadian and anti-jobs, and that is the type of thing a government of which I would like to be a part would eliminate.

Next, we would seriously change the national energy policy. That policy, with its PIP grants and with arrangements made on the shores of Dow's Lake to determine where an oil company might drill and what kind of allowance will be given for exploration or development work, is anti-business. It is the kind of thing that is the clearest possible kind of demonstration of government's overriding control of the business community and business decisions. The very concept of the national energy policy's allowing the take-over by government of exploration advantages gained by those who explore under a 25 per cent back-in arrangement is anti-business because it represents expropriation without compensation. When we have those types of provisions in our law, what we in effect are saying is that private property has no sanctity here in Canada, and what we are saying to those who would invest in Canada is that they had better be careful because the government will back in on them or expropriate them without compensation.

Next, we would seriously attack the question of government spending. Government spending this year has increased from roughly $75 billion in the 1981-82 fiscal year to an estimated $90 billion or more in this fiscal year, an increase of well over $15 billion. There has to be some limit on this spending. What we would do is create an all-party committee of Parliament to go over government expenditures with a fine-tooth-comb to priorize government expenditures. I suppose there is nothing a government does that really is bad in terms of expenditures. At least the money is transferred to people or activities. However, there would be priorities. We would look at the priorities and try to eliminate as much spending as possible. We cannot go on forever trying to spend ourselves rich. What we must do is take a look at where we are spending money. Do we really need to increase the budget of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation? Do we really need to spend the money we are spending in foreign countries on foreign aid? Do we really need to spend the money we spend to promote exports, through the Export Development Corporation, to New York City, for example?

Are there a number of programs like CHIP, DIP and NIP which might be eliminated as being no longer absolutely required in this society at the present time? Can we not priorize government expenditures? I say we can, and I say a responsible House of Commons would have a committee which would go over expenditures working with the ministry to reduce government expenditures by 10 per cent. That would certainly eliminate a great many of the problems we have with respect to the financial affairs of the country. If this country could reduce the amount it spends by 10 per cent, it presumably could reduce the amount it has to borrow by $9 billion. That would go a long way toward restoring confidence. While we continue to have a program of spend, spend, spend, we will not get anywhere. I say it is time we priorized our expenditures and seriously looked at expenditures to identify where we could eliminate or reduce government expenditures.

Next, we would make a direct attack on a whole series of alphabet soup programs this government has. We have alphabet soup programs in the fields of housing, enterprise development, foreign aid and culture. Indeed, we have alphabet soup programs in every field. We have agencies and groups. We have programs on programs. The book on ITC programs alone is nearly an inch think. We must look at these programs. What we are getting out of them is anyone's guess. One of the things a government interested in the enterprise system would do is quickly eliminate as many programs as possible and replace them with sensible tax incentives which would be broadly based and would enable the entrepreneur to use his imagination and not worry about a fancy application or detailed brief to some bureaucrat who must sit and read it and pass it on through his department until the program has lost its meaning and purpose.

One of the great problems with these programs is that they require applications and briefs. People are required to study them. Often the people studying them know very little, if anything, about the programs involved. They certainly do not know the detailed requirements which exist in the various parts of the country. Business people in the field know their problems and are prepared to attack them, but they cannot attack them sensibly or make our country grow sensibly if they are hamstrung and tied up by bureaucracy, by regulation and by controls. I say these are not necessary to make our country grow.

Next, we would have to do something about the serious shortage of capital in the country. Somewhere along the line we must do more to encourage saving. We must seriously examine the viability of the capital gains tax and the situation whereby we attempt to tax a second time around dividends of public corporations. Dividends are already taxed, or the income is already taxed, at the corporate level. When it is passed on to the shareholder, it is taxed again. It strikes me that there is no reason for this double taxation. The double taxation of dividends creates inordinate complications in the Income Tax Act and causes inordinate numbers of people to be working for Revenue Canada to analyse tax returns. It causes enormous problems for industry and business, and these duplications and costs should be eliminated if we are to obtain some productivity in the country.

Dealing with capital gains, I suggest to the government that this year would be an ideal time to eliminate the capital gains tax because this year is a year of capital losses. If the capital gains tax were removed, government revenue would probably increase.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The time allotted to the hon. member has expired. Nevertheless, he may continue if there is unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent for the hon. member to continue?

• (1520)

Mr. Blenkarn: I thank the House for its indulgence, Mr. Speaker, and I will only take one minute more. I was speaking about the capital gains tax. This is a year when there are likely to be very significant capital losses. Under the Income Tax Act capital losses can be written off against income to the extent of $2,000. With the number of capital losses taking place now, I suggest to the minister that he might be better off to eliminate the capital gains tax completely and, therefore, the entitlement to write off losses. In fact, there are no gains to be made this year, or any that there are will be inflationary gains. More likely, there are deflationary losses, as our economy is in a tailspin at the moment. Indeed, if anything it is on a run to bankruptcy. We must do a number of things to get this country back on the road to recovery. We must return confidence to the business community, to the farm community and to the home owner. Unless we do that immediately we will be in very bad shape.

In the few minutes allotted to me I have atempted to set out some programs that should be considered. They did not appear in the budget. The budget is remiss in almost every possible detail.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to express my complete support for the measures announced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), particulary the initiatives which relate to my direct concern for housing.

This budget is designed to renew security and confidence, to foster partnership between governments and the private sector and individual Canadians and to achieve economic revival and recovery. It is designed to forge a national purpose and resolve to seek solutions to economic problems and to create jobs immediately. Nowhere are these themes more important than in housing. Housing is the cutting edge and it can lead the way to economic recovery.

To achieve this it is necessary to create a climate in which individual Canadians feel secure and confident in their housing choices. Home owners want to know they can cope with mortgage renewals, renters want to feel assured about the supply of rental accommodation and prospective first-time home buyers want a longer-term security before purchasing a home. This government, in past actions and through specific measures introduced by the Minister of Finance last week, has dealt with these issues. I will set them out one by one.

The Canada mortgage renewal plan will now provide grants. There will be no more interest deferral. Through the commitment to produce 30,000 rental units, the Canada rental supply plan is reaffirmed. The $3,000 grant to buyers of new homes and first-time home purchasers provides immediate stimulus. Combined with the proposal set out in the white paper regarding mortgage funds at less than going rates, it provides a longer-term security framework. The additional 2,500 non-profit and co-op housing units on top of the existing program for 25,000 social housing units will ensure that households on low and moderate income are not forgotten. Finally, the extension of the Canada home renovation plan enables more home owners to improve and repair their homes and thus to remain in their homes.

These actions demonstrate the government's concern for existing home owners, first-time home buyers, renters and for getting the housing industry and jobs in construction going. Canadians see housing as central to their social and financial security. These measures help restore that security. Confidence is needed if first-time home buyers are to purchase a home. This confidence is provided through the two measures I have discussed.

[Translation]

The measures taken by the government with respect to housing will give Canadians an opportunity to show a national resolve to stimulate the housing industry. To be successful, these measures require a definite commitment by, and the co-operation of, other levels of government, industry and our lending institutions. We must, all of us, work together with a sense of national commitment and purpose to get the housing industry back on its feet and pave the way for economic recovery. This is no time to point the accusing finger. This is a time for action and co-operation.

[English]

I am confident that if we all work together we will succeed in this mission, but it is no small job. Some housing analysts have been predicting housing starts will be in the order of 110,000 to 125,000 this year. I would like to see starts this year reach the level of last year, approximating need. This is an ambitious target in the present circumstances and my work, that of my provincial colleagues, the industry and all Canadians concerned will be difficult, but I believe that if we work together we can achieve real progress.

There are substantial rewards for the economy and for individual Canadians in achieving this task. Federal housing actions will create 180,000 jobs, most of them over the next year. These jobs will be in rental construction, the construction of single family dwellings and the renovation of existing housing. They will reduce substantially the high level of unemployment in the residential construction industry. Jobs will be created in the production of building materials and in the manufacture and distribution of appliances and other household furnishings. We know the spin-off effects these initiatives and support have on housing. These benefits will flow to all regions and parts of this country.

The federal government is committed to getting housing going and to restoring security and confidence. The government, through this and the previous budget, has allocated $750 million for housing initiatives in a period of some eight months. This is in addition to the government's ongoing support for social housing, for rehabilitation under the residential rehabilitation assistance program, for home insulation, and for support of native housing. These are new funds allocated to housing. It is also important that hon. members and the public understand that these funds do not represent the replacement of private funds with federal funds. These funds provide incentives to Canadians. They represent the government working with Canadians to create an environment, a partnership, for economic recovery and for renewed security and confidence in the housing market.

This partnership between the government and individual Canadians means that this stimulus of $750 million in the last eight months will result in some $3.7 billion worth of new housing activity in the private sector.

I want to take a few moments now to review our programs specifically. I am particularly pleased with the decision to provide a cash grant of $3,000 to all purchasers of new homes and to first-time buyers of existing housing. I would like to remind hon. members that this assistance applies to all types of homes—single detached and semi-detached houses, triplexes, duplexes, row housing and condominiums. I have indicated that we recognize that under the National Housing Act certain steps will have to be taken to get the grants flowing. The corporation has indicated that they are available as of the date of the budget. The grant is available for all new houses started before the end of 1982, including houses which are already built but not occupied. In the case of first-time buyers purchasing existing housing, the grant will be available to the end of this year. New houses must be purchased before the end of 1983 to qualify for the grant.

This time-frame, Mr. Speaker, is designed to encourage builders who are prepared to build housing on speculation. That is, to begin construction without a commitment from a buyer. We believe that this encouragement should have the private sector moving, because it is supported not only from the federal government but from a number of provinces who in the last few months have moved with similar or parallel programs.

To ensure that the buyer's continued interest in the property is secure and serious, a minimum downpayment of 10 per cent of the purchase price is required over and above the $3,000 grant. The grant, incidentally, is tax free. It is expected that this plan alone will encourage the production of medium-priced housing and, for that reason, there will be a price limit of $100,000 for all areas except metro Toronto, Edmonton, Calgary, greater Vancouver and Victoria, where the limit is $150,000 because of the difference in price ranges.

I noticed, Mr. Speaker, that on the weekend the real estate industry, particularly in metro Toronto, have taken advantage of the annoucement of these plans. Along with the $5,000 interest-free grant, it means, for example, that for condominiums offered for sale at anywhere from $35,000 to $50,000, the $8,000 off is a considerable stimulus to that particular area of the market. The grant is a straight-forward arrangement. It will allow home buyers to take advantage of both the federal and provincial plans as I have noted.

The $3,000 grant has to be seen alongside the longer security aspect of housing which the Minister of Finance addressed on Monday last. Of course, I am referring to the white paper on the tax incentive plan. It is a document entitled "Inflation and the Taxation of Personal Investment Income" dated June, 1982, tabled with the budget material. It is a plan to give tax incentives and at the same time allow interest rates at 3 per cent to 6 per cent lower to be available to certain sectors in the economy. The preface to the document says:

> They would also ease the cost of financing for new home buyers and small businesses, farmers and fishermen and increase the attractiveness of equity investments by individual Canadians.

The $3,000 grant is intended to be a bridge until the committee reports and the legislation is before the House and enacted. However, I would draw members' attention as well to the last sentence in the introduction by the minister:

> —any legislative provision limiting qualifying property by an effective date will include purchases made after the date of issuance of this paper.

So that we see hand in hand an immediate stimulus in the context of a longer term security introduced by the provisions of those intended changes in the income tax structure.

As hon. members are aware, the government has already demonstrated its concern for renters and for the availability of rental accommodation through measures which will increase the production of rental accommodation by some 30,000 units. As you know, Mr. Speaker, one third—10,000—of those units are designed to be offered on a rent-geared-to-income basis to serve Canadians of quite modest income. I am very pleased to say that the $350 million program has been advertised and responded to by the industry, and the first project under that program is being announced today. It is in the Ottawa market where vacancy rates are quite low. The project cost is in excess of $15 million and comprises 343 housing units. It will have federal assistance of slightly more than $2.4 million, a per unit assistance of $7,250. Hon. members will note that the federal assistance results in over $15 million in construction activity. Thus, the $350 million will be used to generate affordable accommodation in the tight rental market. That program is on its way and I am particularly pleased to see that it is starting in concert with budget announcements in support of other housing measures.

I am very pleased to say that the response has been encouraging despite, of course, the slow take-up time. I would have preferred the program to start earlier, but I am confident that the Canadian rental supply plan, with the $350 million allocated in November, taken in conjunction with the $400 million announced Monday last by the minister, introduces a major stimulus to the economy at this time.

The 30,000 units to be assisted under the plan, of course, are in addition to those the government supports presently under the co-operative and non-profit housing program which similarly encourages the construction or acquisition of housing intended mainly for people with limited incomes. As you know, Mr. Speaker, another provision of the budget on Monday last was to increase that 25,000 units to 27,500, and I know that will be good news to a number of organizations right across the country who have expressed interest in sponsoring these socially useful housing projects.

One of the most popular of the government's recent initiatives in housing has been the Canada home renovation plan, which is helping Canadians to stay in their homes and renovate their homes. It provides forgivable loans up to $3,000 to encourage owners to invest in the renovation and improvement of their properties; that is, on the expenditure of twice as much of their own funds. That program was supplemented by an additional $30 million which means, Mr. Speaker, that Canadians will be using $60 million of their savings to support the stimulus of this program announced by the minister.

The public response to the plan has, of course, been overwhelming in many communities. CMHC reports that although the program has been in effect just two months, the total loans approved or in progress amount to almost $8 million of the original $30 million allocated. I welcome the minister's announcement. It is an effective program directed to need, and at the same time it is putting savings to work and getting Canadians working.

I think all hon. members will welcome the changes announced by the Minister of Finance regarding the Canada mortgage renewal plan which offered a combination of grants and interest deferral guarantees for home owners facing renewal at interest rates much higher than the rate on their original mortgage. Members from all parties have complained that Canadians did not respond because they did not want to get into further interest-deferral guarantees. The minister has set aside an additional $50 million so that this program will be changed with the passage of the legislation, but effective to the date of the announcement, so that any family renewing after Monday last and paying over 30 per cent of their income for principal, interest and taxes will now qualify for a grant to meet the difference up to $3,000 annually. This amount as well is tax free. I believe it is quite evident that many Canadians do not consider the interest deferral as attractive, as has been suggested. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that with this change we will see a renewed interest in the plan and applications will be taken up.

As I said at the outset, this budget is important for the range of initiatives taken in the housing area generally, where we have a shared responsibility with the provinces and municipalities. It increases the security of home owners faced with mortgage renewal, as I have just described, and concerned about losing their homes. It faces the difficulties of Canadians looking to rent, and I have announced the first plan under the rental supply program where $350 million is going to work responding to the 2,500 applications by builders right across this country. In my view, the budget provisions restore the confidence of first-time buyers both in the short and long term.

I have indicated that the $3,000 grant is intended to be an immediate stimulus, but in the context of the commitment of the government in the white paper it is to provide that framework of reduction in interest rates over the long haul, not only for home owners but, as the minister has indicated, for farmers, fishermen and small-business men. The budget provides confidence to the residential construction industry, to managers, to owners and to those people who invest and who are concerned about making starts, and stimulus is offered in co-operation, side by side, with some plans already announced in some provinces. In sum, it signals the government's concern and commitment to security for home owners and renters, to reasonable access to ownership and to the principle of the national government which is to work in co-operation with the provinces, municipalities, their agencies and with industry. We have as well considered representations from hundreds of Canadians received by members on both sides of the House over the past few months.

In summary, I want to indicate to hon. members that over the next few weeks I will be visiting my provincial counterparts and meeting with representatives of industry. We will be receiving briefs on the white paper, as the minister has indicated, on those areas of the tax incentive program that will bear on making housing more affordable and purchase more secure. I want to hear their comments on the white paper as well, so I can frame my responses to the minister. I want Canadians to know that this government gives high priority to getting the housing industry on its feet, to getting jobs going again and to boosting the housing industry in Canada. It will require not only these stimuli, not only this leadership and financial commitment of the national government, but the co-operation of all Canadians, my provincial counterparts, the provincial governments, the municipalities and industry.

This is the message of the budget. These are difficult times. Canadians are asked to respond together, and I am convinced that Canadians together can make it happen.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I will not detain the House by commenting on the remarks of the minister responsible for housing. He has made predictions before about the effectiveness of his program in case after case after case. He has seen those predictions proved wrong by the reality with which Canadians have to deal. We hope he is right this time. We expect him to be as right this time as he was last time, and we trust that when it is proved he has failed one more time he will take his courage in his hands and resign along with his government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Most of us have been travelling the country for the last several months speaking to Canadians who are in acute difficulty who know, not as a matter of theory but as a matter of fact with which they have to live day after day after day, just how seriously their lives are undercut by the economic policies being followed by this government. There had been some hope because of the persistent pressure mounted by this party in the House of Commons and elsewhere that we would get a new budget which would bring about a change in economic policy and some hope for Canadians. That was the hope. I could not help but remark the other day that the day after the budget was brought down on June 28 there was a chorus of criticism from across the country, informed criticism, people who knew that what was being proposed just would not work, and that criticism continued unabated. We have seen it in newspapers in this country and elsewhere. We have read it in the U.S. periodical Business Week which was quoted on the last sitting day by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston). However, he neglected to quote from the most recent issue referring to this government's economic policies, which reports that the economic policies of this government have—> —brought Canada to the brink of economic disaster ... The gross national product is shrinking, U.S. and Canadian investors are taking huge amounts of capital out of the country. Business is staggering under an unprecedented debt burden, and the Canadian dollar has fallen to an all-time low.

The article goes on as follows:

> —many economists fear that companies' crippling debt load now eating up 66 per cent of corporate pre-tax cash flows will snuff out prospects for even a weak Canadian recovery this year, whether or not the U.S. economy revives.

The Wall Street Journal for June 30 has an editorial entitled succinctly "Poor Canada". It concludes:

> The new budget is well designed to deepen Canada's stagflation.

We have read the same in Canadian newspapers. For instance:

[Translation]

Today, the Montreal newspaper La Presse printed an article by Mr. Yvan Guay, under the heading: "New Budget Puts Country into Recession."

[English]

And so it goes across the country. Every analyst and individual who has had the opportunity to consider the impact upon his or her life of this budget knows that it is a disaster waiting to happen to them. I see the Member of Parliament for Thunder Bay-Nipigon (Mr. Masters) shaking his head. I would be pleased if either myself or members of my party could go to Thunder Bay to debate the impact of the budget upon the citizens of that coummunity. We would do a fatality count of the number of businesses that have been driven into bankruptcy in the Thunder Bay region. We would do a fatality count of the number of old age pensioners who will see their benefits reduced because this government is asking the elderly to pay the price of this government's incompetence. We would talk to people who have been forced out of work and to abandon their hopes and dreams in that community. We would then recommend to them that if they want a change, they had better send to the House of Commons a Member of Parliament who puts his people's interests ahead of his party line. That is the only way to get a change in this country.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, we are faced today with a very serious crisis in our economy. The statistics are known to everyone. One million two hundred and forty-one thousand Canadians are out of work. The Canadian dollar is worth 77.56 cents in terms of the U.S. dollar. Interest rates are at 16.58 per cent and rising. Every day, 1,200 Canadians are losing their jobs. The desperation these figures are causing is absolutely heartbreaking. The fear of losing one's job, tension rising in families, marriage breakups, violence and suicide, all as a result of economic pressures. The cost in human terms is something we would rather not think about. The statistics are merciless, but although they cannot be denied, they can be manipulated and one gets used to them. But, Mr. Speaker, we do not get used to alcoholism, we do not get used to suicide or battered wives or family breakups. All these phenomena tend to increase when financial conditions get worse, and unfortunately, that is what is happening in Canada today. When discussing economic policies that are putting Canadians out of work, we must also consider the human cost. That is the point I am trying to make. We are talking about policies that are driving people to alcoholism, policies that are causing family breakups and bringing Canadians to suicide. That is what we must remember when we are discussing what is happening to this country. That is what we must not forget when we say we have a duty to our fellow citizens, because we here in the House are the only institution in Canada that is able to compel the government to act. The worst part of this recession is that the Government of Canada, a majority government at that, has no plan at all to get Canada out of this situation. And the unforgivable sin is that once again, this government is trying to trick Canadians instead of providing honest leadership.

[English]

I want to deal for a moment with the question of trickery. Trickery is the trademark of this budget and trickery is the trademark of this government. Consider just a few items, Mr. Speaker. First, a 6 per cent freeze is imposed on every public servant. But 11 days before the freeze a special class, people who work for Liberal ministers, received a 10 per cent raise authorized by the President of the Treasury Board. The man who holds back public servants makes a special deal for his friends who work for Liberal ministers. That is one piece of trickery.

• (1550)

The budget claims $750 million will be spent on job creation. The clear implication is that there will be $750 million of new spending, and that is false. At best there will be $267 million in new spending to create jobs. At worst it will be only $117 million in new moneys allocated this year to job creation. The practice was followed in 1979 of stating in the budget—

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) might be interested in knowing that the Treasury Board decision to provide the 10 per cent wage guideline increase in fact was made on May 13.

Mr. Clark: What the Leader of the Opposition is interested in knowing and what the people of Canada are interested in knowing is that 11 days before the budget came down, a budget which the President of the Treasury Board knew would be imposing limitations upon public servants, the President of the Treasury Board decided to go ahead with a proposal which would give a raise to his friends who worked for Liberal ministers. What the country is interested in knowing is that the double standard is alive and well within government. There is one standard for most of the public service; there is another sweeter and fatter standard for those people who work for Liberal ministers of the Crown. That is the reality.

The minister grins about it. Instead of grinning, I should like to have him table in the House of Commons the order of June 17 and also the salary levels of those exempt staff before and after June 17, so that we will know exactly what is the situation. That would be a means of dealing with the accusation of trickery which I make here, the accusation that the government in this instance, as in so many other ways, is trying to trick the people of Canada into thinking that it is doing something which it is not doing.

Before the President of the Treasury Board rose, I was recalling to the House the fact that in the budget of 1979 introduced by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) the practice was followed of stating in the budget the increase in unemployment insurance contributions. That was the practice in 1979. We knew the payments would go up so we told Canadians the truth. In this budget nothing is mentioned of the increase in unemployment insurance payments. The fact is that each employee in Canada will pay up to $142.50 per year more in unemployment insurance contributions; that is each working Canadian. In effect, that is a tax increase of another $142.50 for every working Canadian who contributes to unemployment insurance, but not a word of that was mentioned in the budget. In the honest budget of 1979 the increases were forecast. This budget which cannot be so characterized was silent on those increases.

Employers as a group—and it is not mentioned in the budget but it is there in the figures—will pay $1.2 billion more per year in their contributions to uenmployment insurance. That will drive some small businesses into bankruptcy; there is no question at all about that. It is a recipe for bankruptcy for some small businesses already on the ropes and ready to be knocked out of the ring. It is a secret tax of 52 per cent for employees and of 34 per cent for employers. The government admits that there will be increases but it refuses to say how much. This budget which is supposed to create confidence pretends that these increases are not there.

It might be fine for Liberal Members of Parliament to pretend that they are not there, but when Canadians pay $142.50 more next year for unemployment insurance benefits and when their employers risk going out of business because of this hidden tax increase which was smuggled into this tricky budget, they will know the high cost of having a government which cannot quite bring itself to be as truthful and as honest as the standards of this place and the country require.

I see the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in the House. When the government was trying to justify having 1,200,000 senior citizens singled out to pay for the mistakes of the government, the Prime Minister said "6 per cent is what they will get; 6 per cent will be the CPI if we have co-operation". He knows that there will not be a reduction in CPI to 6 per cent. He knew it when he stood in his place; he knows it when he sits there now. He knows that the CPI will not be at 6 per cent and that the 1,200,000 senior citizens of the country will suffer from being singled out by the government.

And the deceit goes on. In housing there is a pretence of help with a one-time-only $3,000 grant. The average price of a Canadian home during the first quarter of 1982 was $75,578 across the country. Assuming an effective mortgage of $60,462, together with a builder buy-down of the mortgage to 17 per cent, the monthly payments on the house would equal $842. By applying a $3,000 one-time home buyer grant, the new home owner still faces payments on his home of $800 per month. The government will help buyers who can pay $800 per month. There are not very many of those in Canada, and there will not be very many Canadians who will be helped by this program.

Mr. Berger: What about provincial grants?

Mr. Clark: "What about provincial grants", I am asked by a Liberal Member of Parliament from Quebec who won and earned his way here by attacking Mr. Parizeau and Mr. Lévesque. I am being asked why I do not come to the defence of Mr. Parizeau and Mr. Lévesque here. The only thing I will say for them—

—at least the government of the province of Quebec, Mr. Parizeau and Premier Lévesque are far more aware of the needs of their people than the Liberal federal government here, the government to which belong the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), the member for Laurier (Mr. Berger) and the Right Hon. Prime Minister.

As far as spending is concerned, this government claims that its expenditures—

[English]

Mr. Allmand: What hypocrisy!

Mr. Clark: I hear the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East (Mr. Allmand), a former minister, talking about hypocrisy. At least he does not share in the hypocrisy of his Privy Council colleagues in government because he has been thrown out of the government. I would hope that if he sat there his standards would be sufficiently high that he would not associate himself as a minister with a government which has brought in a budget so full of deceit, so full of trickery and so empty of any hope of economic recovery.

[Translation]

I was talking about spending and restraint policies. As far as spending is concerned, this government claims that its expenditures have not increased more than 17 per cent, while in the national accounts, the government's own figures indicate an increase of 20 per cent. During the election campaign, the Liberals promised to keep the rate of government spending below the growth rate of the GNP. That is another promise they have broken, and now they are spending twice as fast as they promised to do during the campaign. As far as small businesses are concerned, the budget proudly announced a $400 million program to, and I quote:

—reduce interest costs for small businesses.

However, the program is restricted to new investment. To date, 4,500 businesses have gone bankrupt in the first five months of 1982. How many businessmen, how many farmers or fishermen, assuming they would be interested, are in a position to make new investments?

[English]

This budget is designed to deceive. It pretends to be doing things it is not doing. That pretence destroys confidence. Nobody trusts a trickster, and a budget so full of tricks and so full of deceptions is bound to destroy confidence which is key to any recovery.

Apart from trickery, what is in the budget? There is one important initiative—the introduction of restraint on public sector salaries. That is a field in which the government has lagged behind several Canadian provinces. We are relieved that it is beginning to accept that government spending is a major cause of current economic problems. As usual, its proposal is unjust. It pretends that life is as hard for a senior deputy minister as it is for a clerk or secretary, and it applies the same restraint across the board, except of course for the staff of ministers. But it is a step in the right direction toward the government admitting that its own practices affect the economy.

• (1600)

Beyond that, beyond imposing restraint on public servants, old age pensioners and families with children, what is the direction of this budget? What is its purpose? What philosophy or attitude inspires it? What is the government trying to do with this budget? I suggest that it is trying to do two things. First, it is trying to buy time for perhaps yet another budget in the fall or, if we can believe the President of the Treasury Board in his remarks last Wednesday and the parliamentary secretaries from Willowdale (Mr. Peterson) and Sudbury (Mr. Frith), to set the stage for wage and price controls in Canada. Apart from buying time, it is attempting to shift blame. The provinces have already been called in. No doubt big business will be called in and then the labour unions.

Anyone who has watched the confrontation tactics of this government for more than a decade will know that it is looking for someone to blame, someone to fight with, some scapegoat to become its target and its excuse. The one area of unquestionable expertise in this government is setting up a straw man and attacking it. I would imagine that organized labour has been chosen for that role. The government wants to divert attention from its own failings and therefore it is looking for a fight with the unions. I hope that the leaders of organized labour will be wise enough not to be drawn into that trap.

Beyond buying time and shifting blame, what is the theme, the thrust, of this budget? Is it to restore confidence? With a $20 billion deficit and a hatful of tricks, is that the purpose? Is it to practise equity—that equity which was so much the siren song of the budget of last November; equity in a budget which increases taxes except for the rich; equity which singles out the elderly to pay for the government's mistakes; equity which imposes the same standard of restraint on a poor secretary in the public service as it does on a wealthy deputy minister? There is no equity in this budget.

Is its purpose to stimulate investment and thus create jobs? Obviously not when the government keeps in place the National Energy Program which has driven away billions of dollars of investment and when it offers small business, farmers, fishermen and the construction industry incentives which most of them cannot use.

The sad conclusion is that there is no purpose to this budget. There is no economic direction. This document is a short-term political response to an acute political problem. Since Liberal MPs just could not go home this summer with the government doing nothing, we have a camouflaged budget to make it appear as though the government is acting and then the subtle promise of another change in the fall.

We will see how comfortable Liberal MPs are this summer while defending a $20 billion deficit. We will see how comfortable they are defending a hidden 54 per cent increase in UIC contributions. We will see how comfortable they are this summer defending a $1.3 billion tax increase. We will see how comfortable they are defending a special plan to victimize old age pensioners. We will see how comfortable they are defending a special pay increase for the staff who work for Liberal ministers.

There is another remarkable feature of this budget, and that is the revelation that the June 28 budget did not belong to the Minister of Finance alone. It had a co-author, a co-conspirator so far unindicted. John Turner helped to write this budget. The Prime Minister smiles.

Mr. McDermid: He likes that.

Mr. Clark: John Turner helped to write it and the Prime Minister leaked the fact that John Turner helped to write it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Allmand: You should be ashamed of yourself.

Mr. Clark: We have the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East speaking again. I do not know if he is complaining that he was not consulted on the writing of the budget or if he is complaining about the fact that his friend, John Turner, is an unindicted co-conspirator in the preparation of this budget.

I must say that the Minister of Finance could not have chosen a more appropriate co-conspirator than the Hon. John Turner, because the spending policies that were begun by John Turner created much of the economic mess that we face today. It is entirely appropriate that we have a Turner-MacEachen budget because John Turner, along with the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), are the four horsemen of the economic apocalypse that we face in this country today.

An interesting tradition has been started. Years from now, in this tradition, when the roof of the Washington embassy leaks we will get Arthur Erickson to get the bucket. But I want to congratulate the Minister of Finance on persuading John Turner to carry the can for an economic crisis that he did so much to create.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cousineau: Those are John Crosbie's jokes.

Mr. Clark: We just heard the Liberal party's jokes.

The reality is that a large number of Canada's economic problems were created right here in Canada and they can be solved right here at home in Canada. We can have economic recovery in Canada, but first we must put our own house in order. When the co-author of the budget, Mr. Turner, was minister of finance for four years, federal government spending rose by 108 per cent. That was in the 1970s. However, many of those spending programs became a continuing drain on governments. They created a situation where the cost of interest on public debt this year will equal $700 for every woman, every man and every child in this country and will equal $1,800 per taxpayer. That is the cost of interest on the public debt alone. We cannot afford that. We cannot afford the attitude expressed by the President of the Treasury Board last Wednesday at page 18965 of Hansard, when he said:

> The essential attack on the federal deficit and on provincial deficits can only come when people contribute more out of their incomes to reducing them.

That comes from the minister charged with government restraint. He believes that the only way to cut the deficit is to force taxpayers to pay more. There, in a sentence, is what is wrong with this government. It expects others to act—the taxpayers, the Americans, the unions and the old age pensioners. That from the minister responsible for restraint, the minister who stopped the privatization program that would have cut government spending, the minister who stopped the introduction of sunset laws, the minister who stopped the legislation to control Crown corporations, if in fact he had any influence over legislation which comes under his jurisdiction. I quote again:

> The essential attack on the federal deficit and on provincial deficits can only come when people contribute more out of their incomes to reducing them.

That is the quote. That is nonsense. The essential attack on the federal deficit must come from the Government of Canada cutting its spending, cutting its appetite and changing its attitude.

If the government does not want to start cutting expenditures, let Parliament start doing it. The Minister of Finance has set up a committee of outsiders to consider some of the measures he has announced, but measures he cannot produce, for this budget. Of course, that work should have been done by Parliament.

Mr. McDermid: That will save a lot of money.

Mr. Clark: As one of my colleagues says, it will save a lot of money by bringing in these people, paying their per diem expenses and whatever else is involved. That will save a lot of money. That work should have been done by Parliament. Among other advantages, as pointed out by my colleague for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) during question period today, it would have allowed some women to take part in the process. The Minister of Finance discovered ten days after the budget that women constitute 52 per cent of the population of Canada. Before that, he had not deigned to allow one single woman to serve on this committee that he established. That eloquently indicates this government's position on the status of women.

In addition to recognizing the very existence of the majority of the Canadian population, a parliamentary committee would have acted with more authority than a group of advisers. However, that is behind us and it has been done. The minister preferred to go outside to bring in a group of men he could meet with in some dark room. Incidentally, I presume that women will be required to enter these committee meetings through the back door. The minister will probably not allow them to walk in through the front door as equals. He has indicated his chauvinism to such a degree that I imagine he will require them to go through the back door—once he finally finds a woman who is prepared to serve on the committee. However, the minister has made that decision and it is behind us. The minister went outside Parliament to do Parliament's work.

There is still a major job for Parliament to perform. It is a function that was proposed in this House some weeks ago by my colleague from Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn). He proposed, and we propose again today, that the government establish immediately an all-party committee of Parliament to go through the government spending estimates again, not with an eye to the traditional approval, but to find areas where we can save on spending that does not need to be imposed upon Canadians, to identify programs we do not need, inefficiencies we cannot afford and expensive practices that are out of date.

That committee of Parliament, with the authority of Parliament could recommend where spending could be cut. It can prove to the government that restraint is a better answer to deficits than taxing the people. That can be done. It takes nothing more than a simple reference by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard). The committee could work all summer. Certainly the members of our party would be prepared to work all summer. I would hope that the members of the New Democratic Party would do that, starting with what we learned in the examination of the estimates. Perhaps the NDP does not want to serve on a committee that works this summer. They had some difficulty showing up for a vote on their own motion the other night. Perhaps they would have difficulty showing up to undertake their responsibilities on that kind of committee.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: I take it that the contributions from the members of the NDP indicate they want to be dissociate from the rest of their party and indicate their willingness to work through the summer even if others of their colleagues do not. I will take it as that.

The point on this serious proposal is that a committee of this kind can work effectively and can work all summer. The need to do it was made abundantly clear in that abortive and frustrating exercise we all went through some two weeks ago when parliamentarians stood up in robot-like fashion and approved estimates that very few of us would want to take responsibility for in the public eye. That was a farce. We all know it was a farce. We know that Parliament and parliamentary control of public spending has become a farce. That is a reform for another time, something we hope will be reformed by the committee looking into it.

This is an urgent problem, a problem of trying to identify areas where we can save the taxpayers of Canada money right now and cut spending right now. Let us look at some of those things we know about. For example, we know that the Government of Canada spent $110,000 on a metric cooking lesson for Madam Benoit and Bruno Gerussi to help them carry out the propagandizing of metric in the country. Did we really need that $110,000 cooking lesson?

We know that each year the Government of Canada spends half a million dollars to buy briefcases that are given free to public servants, $500,000 so that public servants can have free briefcases. On the day that the post office became a Crown corporation, the Government of Canada, practising its usual restraint, spent $300,000 for free coffee, doughnuts and souvenir envelopes. That was to celebrate getting rid of the post office, or at least putting it into Crown corporation form.

We know there was a payment of between $365 million and $486 million too much for the purchase of Petrofina shares. We know about the JetStars that are used to carry ministers who will not talk to each other, one minister per JetStar to Winnipeg.

We know about the number of consultants employed by this government at extravagant cost. The federal government today has an information and advertising budget of $235 million. By the way, that is the largest advertising budget in Canada. More important, that $235 million which this government spends on propaganda is 17 times the total cost of government in the first year of confederation.

Those are just some of the areas where we know that savings could exist. That is just the tip of the iceberg. What we want to do is let the House of Commons do its job. The House of Commons should be allowed to go after not simply the tip but the whole iceberg. If we could cut seriously into that iceberg, we could save the taxpayers of this country millions, perhaps hundreds of millions, of dollars.

If we did that, we would not have to go to the old age pensioner and say to them that because the Prime Minister will not let Parliament do its work and cut savings, they will have to pay for it. They have to pay for giving Bruno Gerussi a cooking lesson in metric. We would not have to do that if Parliament was allowed to look into the spending carried out by this government, to find areas where we can cut back, so that instead of raising taxes for Canadians in order to reduce deficits, government spending could be cut on those programs on which the government has no business or no right to be spending money.

A profound difference in attitude separates the parties in this House. It is evident in the means that we choose to reduce the deficit. The government believes in taxing people more; we believe in cutting government spending, that is a symbol of a deeper difference about the role of government and the role of the state. Everybody accepts the responsibility of government to help the needy, the elderly and others. I should qualify that: everyone did accept that until the Liberal government singled out old age pensioners to pay for their mistakes.

The difference arises over the question of whether governments or people best encourage the growth and the freedom that have been characteristic of Canada. There has been with this government a steady movement toward control by the state. It is evident in the massive propaganda budgets which other free countries do not consider necessary to persuade their citizens but which has made the Government of Canada the largest propagandist in the land.

It is clear in the National Energy Program where state control has a higher priority than energy production and where the government has become a predator in the marketplace. It is evident in the attitude toward investment, frightening foreigners with FIRA and changing policies on IAACs, capital cost allowances and savings plans which would encourage individual Canadians to invest.

This government has adopted a deliberate anti-investment attitude. It used to pretend it was nationalist. The accurate word today is unemployment. Those policies have driven billions of dollars out of Canada and have cost thousands of Canadians jobs they would otherwise be working at.

Two weeks ago I gave the House several examples of the direct job loss in Canada because of measures in the November budget. I will not repeat all those figures. However, as an example, I want to remind the House that the provision on capital cost allowances alone has not been changed since the November budget. If we accept the estimate put forward by Walter Gordon's Canadian Institute for Economic Policy that $1 million in direct investment creates 40 to 50 jobs, and if we take the lower figure, the 40 jobs, then the government's decision to allow only one half of the capital cost allowance results in the loss of 44,000 jobs in Canada. Forty-four thousands jobs are lost because the government wants more more money and leaves less money for Canadians to be put to work. Those 44,000 Canadians could be working and paying taxes. They want to work. Instead, because of Liberal government policies they are forced to be out of work and to collect unemployment insurance. That is an economic waste. It is a tragic human waste. We cannot stand more of it in this country.

Those are only some of the costs. The anti-investment, anti-job attitude of the Liberal policy also drives up interest rates. The National Energy Program is causing money to flood out of this country. Interest rates are used to bring that money back. If we had a pro-investment attitude in Canada, interest rates would be three or four points lower than they are today.

Projects that might be started in Canada are held back because the government's attitude creates a cloud of uncertainty. That affects large investors. It also affects individuals who have to make decisions such as buying a house, buying a car or starting a small enterprise. This country was built on taking risks, but no one takes risks in this atmosphere. It is interesting to note that when the uncertainty clears a little bit, Canadians will spend some of the money they have been saving. Canadians will buy.

I ask the House to consider what began as a fiasco. Consider the question of the Iraqi cars. Last month those cars went on sale at $6,500 each with a two or three-year guarantee. I spoke to a dealer in one city in Ontario who was allotted 200 cars for his dealership and 130 for his dealership in another city. Those 330 cars were sold out within 48 hours. What is interesting is that 95 per cent of the buyers paid in cash. That was the case with virtually every other dealer in the country. There were 12,000 cars put up in this country where risks are not taken because of this government. But in a circumstance where there is a good deal and a guarantee of two or three years, 12,000 Canadians went out and bought them in 48 hours—and 95 per cent of them paid cash. That means that they have cash waiting there to invest. They have cash waiting to put into the creation of jobs, but they will not put it into the creation of jobs in this country because they are afraid of what this government will do. That is an inexcusable situation in a country like ours.

Mr. Clark: The message from all of this is clear. Canadians are saving furiously. Why are they saving furiously? Because they have not got the foggiest idea what is going to happen to them in the future. There is nothing above them but a great black cloud of uncertainty about what this government is going to do next to gouge them. What old age pensioner would have thought, on the night of June 27, that he or she was going to be singled out for a special attack by the Liberal government? No one knows who is going to be attacked next by this government. Consequently, people who have money are holding it; they are not letting it go to work for Canada. They are not letting it go to work for themselves. This government's attitude is driving Canadians away from the creation of the kind of wealth and job opportunities that are not only key to this country but are at the core of our growth and our development as a nation.

Canadians do not know whether they are going to keep their jobs or lose them. As they look down the street, almost every Canadian has a neighbour somewhere on his or her street who has lost a job. When you are in that situation, you worry whether you are going to be next. Those people do not know whether they will have to renew their mortgages at much higher rates.

Even with all those uncertainties, there are two circumstances under which Canadians will spend some of their savings. The first is an exceptionally good deal, as whith the Iraqi cars. The second is an improved economic outlook and some degree of certainty that removes their fears for their future personal security.

There will not be many Iraqi deals. We cannot count on them to stimulate the economy—although it is interesting that in this regard, by refusing a contract, the government of Iraq has probably done more to stimulate investment in this country than the Government of Canada has. We cannot count on that. What we have to do is remove the uncertainty that hangs like a pall over every individual Canadian with money to invest. As long as Canadians who are working and have money continue to save at such a high rate, the demand that results from consumer spending and risk investment will be soft. We will not be getting the jobs, we will not be getting the growth, we will not be getting the recovery we require.

The only answer is a set of economic policies that will restore confidence in the future of the Canadian economy. Those will cause increased spending by individuals, by companies, and that spending in turn will stimulate demand and increase production. But you do not create confidence with $20 billion deficits. You do not create confidence with a commitment to the continuation of the National Energy Program. You do not create confidence with a budget that tries to trick people.

What this country needs, and what it needed on June 28, is a new budget. What the country also needs is a new minister. What the country needs most of all, as suggested in the amendment, is a new government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: What a new government should do in quick, summary form is, first, to follow policies that encourage investment positively, investment by Canadians and by others, to make this again a country where people can count on their investment being respected, where they can count on being free from knocks on the door in the middle of the night, or expropriation by legislation—such as the Prime Minister is smiling about now and such as he has introduced. We need to establish that climate of confidence to encourage positively investment in Canada by Canadians and others.

Second, we have to develop encouragement by incentives which cause individuals to make their own decisions to invest. There is a choice for government. Two mechanisms are open to them. They can use grants which give control to the government; or they can use incentives which leaves liberty to individuals. We have had too much control by governments, too much of grants which are susceptible to that kind of control. We need to move again to a system that creates the incentives that will allow individual Canadians and others to make the decisions that will cause the nation to grow.

Third, when a government introduces new economic policies, it has to indicate very clearly that those policies are going to be there to stay. We cannot have a situation such as we had with the June 28 budget, where everything is under review; where they propose programs that might or might not be introduced. We have to have some degree of constancy, some degree of certainty, in the programs that are introduced by government.

Fourth, there has to be a restoration of the movement towards serious restraint in government that was a feature of the government of 1979 and 1980. There has to be a return, for example, to sunset laws that will require agencies when they have been established to prove their continued viability, their continued need to exist.

There needs to be some opportunity for committees in this House of Commons to hold to account groups like the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, groups like the Export Development Corporation, others who function now, spending or committing millions of dollars of Canadian money without any effective control—no control by their board, no control by ministers, no control by the House of Commons, simply a licence to spend. That kind of thing cannot be allowed to continue. That kind of thing needs to be changed, and it can be changed in a way that is entirely consistent with our parliamentary traditions and that protects the nature of those agencies.

Again, we have to have a new government that emphasizes productive expenditures by government in growth fields, in fields like research and development. I believe the minister responsible for science and technology is due to speak next. I will be interested in his explaining why the government has reduced the target of the gross national product from the target established in 1979-80 to a much lower target. We should be investing much more now in productive fields like research and development, science and technology, which create jobs and give us a cutting edge for the future.

We should also be investing more money in long-term job creation, to allow men and women, particularly younger, but not exclusively younger, men and women, who want to play a full role in the modern work force, the opportunity to play that kind of role. We should also be creating a system of incentives to encourage individuals to invest in this country.

A new government that is trying to recreate confidence in the country should replace the National Energy Program with a program that will encourage Canadian companies to find oil and gas in this country, not simply to aggrandize, to expand, the role of the state without increasing our capacity to become self-sufficient in energy.

Fundamentally, what we need of a new government in Canada is a recognition that we can solve in Canada economic problems that are caused in Canada. We need a government that will encourage individual initiative and that sense of adventure and risk that have always been key to this country.

Finally, we need a government that will establish an atmosphere of confidence and of trust so that Canada will regain the reputation we once enjoyed as a place where investment was respected, where the word of the government was respected, where the desire to work and to create was not only respected but encouraged.

Those things need to happen if we are going to pull this country out of the economic decline in which we are sliding. This government cannot do it. The only way it can be done is for the amendment before the House to be carried, for this government to lose the vote of confidence. The Prime Minister is in the House. If the Prime Minister is so confident about his economic policy, his and John Turner's, he should take those economic policies to the country. If he believes that his policies are correct, let him ask the people who are affected by them. Let him call a general election.

I hope that if he is not willing to do that, there will be at least enough of his former supporters in the backbenches who will recognize that the country is more important than their party, who will recognize that this nation needs recovery which it cannot get from this government.

• (1630)

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, never since the Great Depression have the people of this nation required a deeper, more profound and imaginative change in economic policy than precisely at this moment in our history. At the same time, never have I listened to a speech which was so systematic in its criticism of a government but which rested, in terms of its own fundamental analysis, on the same set of assumptions as those of the government party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I will deal with that in a minute.

I do not want at this point to repeat a number of the truly alarming statistics about unemployment levels, about inflation levels and about people who are losing their homes. I do not want to repeat the pessimistic analysis provided by the OECD and the gloomy figures on the current level of the Canadian dollar. I will not repeat them. I will not do so because they are pretty well known. Day after day in the newspapers of Canada and day after day in all forms of news media the people of our nation are confronted with these figures. I will not repeat them, but that is not because they are not important. It is a basic task of politicians and political parties to see the relationships between these figures and to look for certain patterns in terms of analysis and in terms of a prescription for what might be done about them.

I want to say today that it is very important for us not to become jaded by these figures and not to become overwhelmed by the data because we see them day after day. That is a very easy tendency, and it is also very easy for us as politicians to become cynical, to say that because we see this unpleasant factual information hour after hour and day after day, there really is nothing that can be done and to use the data in a cynical fashion. Once there is the slightest impulse among politicians to see these figures in a cynical fashion, we should resign as Members of Parliament, because if there is one group of people in a free society which has the moral obligation not to become cynical, it is the people who are elected to do the government business of the nation.

Part of what stops me from being cynical, I suppose, in the face of this morass of figures is our actual confrontation with people who are the real entities behind the statistics. I have heard unemployment figures in the last couple of days. Two weekends ago I met a middle-aged man in the constituency of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell). That middle-aged man has two children and his wife is pregnant with a third. He was profoundly unhappy. For the first time in his life he was unemployed and saw his unemployment insurance benefits running out. He did not know what he was going to do. I thought he was on the verge of tears when he spoke to me, one man to another. When I hear these figures, I think also of other parts of Canada.

[Translation]

The unemployed fail to understand why a wealthy province like theirs is now experiencing such a high rate of unemployment, to the extent that in the manufacturing sector alone, 50,000 jobs have been lost since September. Unemployed Quebecers fail to understand why this is happening in a province as wealthy as Quebec.

[English]

In relation to mortgage problems, I am reminded of two weeks ago today when I met with people in my own constituency who had problems. Among them was a woman in her fifties who had two children and a mother to support. This woman was employed, and at a good salary for a working person in Canada. Her husband was killed a year ago and she came to see me about her home. For her it was not a residence, it was not a house, it was a home, and she described it in that way. She was concerned because her mortgage was coming up for renewal this month and she was to pay $200 more. To use her words, she was going to lose her home and her kids' home unless something was done, and done soon.

The point is that all these problems must always be remembered in terms of the personalities involved. They must be remembered in terms of the men, women and children out there in our country from one coast to the other who are experiencing real difficulty. These are men and women of emotion and frustration and, increasingly I regret to say, men and women who are experiencing fear about the future for themselves and particularly their children in this land of ours.

It is the context in 1982—not 1932—that we must assess the budget presented by the government.

I think there are three useful ways of looking at a budget. The first is to look at it in terms of its technical information, its own analysis of the economy, its own forecast for growth, its own predictions about inflation and also in terms of the technical prescriptions prescribed by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) to deal with economic problems in the coming year.

Second, the budget should be looked at in terms of fairness or equity toward the problems faced by the people of Canada at this point in our history. Does the budget address those problems not only with some technical competence but also, in terms of its urgings upon the people of Canada, with a sense of fairness about the distribution of burdens in dealing with our problems?

The third way of looking at the budget is a little deeper and different from the first two, as important as they are. What does the budget, a financial statement, say about the government's understanding of the Canadian economy and, beyond that, Canadian society at a particular point? A budget does that either directly and explicitly or indirectly. It is very important that we understand budgets in that context. Where does the government want us to go? That is the relevant question one should pose at some time in looking at a budget. What does it want us as a people to do?

I want to discuss each of these points. First, in terms of the technical detail, what are the relevant facts in the budget as I, my colleagues and our financial critic who spoke so well the other day see them? First, we see that taxes are going up by $1.3 billion for all Canadians. We see that pensions and family allowances will be going down, in their net effect, by some $360 million. We see particularly that wages in the public sector will be held at 6 per cent in the coming year and 5 per cent after that in terms of increases. If we include the armed services in that, as we should, that will take some $1 billion out of the economy.

Then, as the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) mentioned in his speech this afternoon, in terms of budgetary analysis at this time we must include changes in the unemployment insurance fund. We note that every employed Canadian will pay somewhere in the neighbourhood of $140 more in the coming year as a result of drain on the unemployment insurance fund.

If we add all these together—taxes going up, pensions and family allowances going down, wage controls in the public sector and increased premiums for unemployment insurance—what we will see in the coming year, in the face of the most serious unemployment level in this land in the past 50 years, is the taking out of the economy of some $4 billion.

What is the result now? What are the implications of this program, first, for the so-called crusade that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) spoke about the other day and about which the Minister of Finance talked as well when he presented the budget? They spoke about the "crusade" against inflation. Was there anything in the budget that dealt with the most serious price increases that have affected the Canadian economy in the past 12 months and will continue to affect it, namely, interest rates and energy costs? There was not a thing, Mr. Speaker. Those prices are not going to be controlled and they are not going to be changed. Nothing is to be done about general interest rate levels, which are so pernicious in their effect on the economy. Indeed, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) indicated in the House the other day, no attempt will be made to renegotiate or delay the energy price increase of another 30 per cent in the coming year. No attempt is to be made at this particularly difficult time in our history to talk in a co-operative and serious way with the producing provinces to see if we can delay the impact of these monumental price increases which are yet to come in the energy field. Nothing was done seriously about prices in the budget.

Where is this crusade—to use the wonderful word of the President of the Treasury Board—to have its focus? We know it is going to be on wages. I think it is relevant to ask whether an approach on wages in the past, in terms of government policy, had any impact. From 1975 to 1978, when the government was at least claiming to be dealing with prices, what was the result? The AIB program at that time was described as being aimed at bringing down the level of inflation by 4 per cent by the third year. Instead of going down by 4 per cent, the rate of inflation actually went up by 1.5 per cent to 9 per cent. It was successful in holding down the wages of ordinary men and women, however. The Conference Board estimated that there was a drop of some 8 per cent in wages compared to what there would have been had the controls program brought in by the Prime Minister at that time not been imposed.

Surely it is a relevant question from a technical point of view for anyone who wants to understand inflation, from the humane point of view or from the point of view of concern for moral justice, to ask why with this past record, the government is bringing in a program that singles out public sector employees for such controls.

The answer to that question was revealed in a secret cabinet document to which I had access last year and which I released to the public of Canada. In that document there was an analysis of the causes of inflation and of what the government might consider as options. The document said that the "main advantage"—and those are the words used in the document—is that the government would be seen to be doing something. Not that the program would be effective, or not that inflation would be brought into line—because they knew from the experience of 1975 to 1978 that it did not have an effect on prices—but the single merit underlined in that document was that such a program would demonstrate to the people of Canada that the government was at least doing something.

I think that when you make victims of men and women, in this case in the public sector, simply to save political face, then the only way to describe such action is to say that it is despicable, and I say that without hesitation, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: The reality is that in Canada in 1982 we do not have wage-generated inflation. The reality is that the Minister of Finance admitted that himself some months ago. The reality is that the so-called crusade and symbolic leadership is just the opposite of leadership; it is a cynical public relations exercise of the worst kind—the kind that first makes scapegoats of employees in the public sector and then sets up as future scapegoats every working person in this country. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, it is despicable.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: This unfairness is compounded when you consider that not only are wages to be controlled, but that with this partial deindexing of family allowances and pensions, the same ordinary people are going to be hit twice.

It should be noted, however, that there is an interesting hypocrisy to be found in the budget. Investors will now be better off because the Liberals accepted a Tory idea. While the Liberals are busy taking away indexation provisions from the average taxpayer, they are simultaneously introducing new indexation benefits for investors that the Conservative Party, as its finance critic said some time ago, first advocated.

I think that is a perfect example of what has come to be known as supply side economics, which operates on the interesting moral precept, that in order to get the rich to work harder you have to give them more money, and in order to get the average Canadian to work harder you have to give him less money. Anyone who believes that would believe anything.

How does this budget stand up, Mr. Speaker? Over all, in terms of fairness and equity it is clear that it fails considerably, certainly from the point of view of distribution of burden. Obviously, also, it will not bring down the rate of inflation to 6 per cent. I repeat, in the experience from 1975 to 1978 at least there was some alleged attempt, in a comprehensive package, to control prices as well as wages, but in this budget there is not the slightest suggestion that determined action will be taken against any other group than wage earners. I say that there is not an intelligent person in the House of Commons or a member of the cabinet—and members of the cabinet are not stupid; they may do stupid things but they are not stupid, not even the Minister of Finance who is sitting opposite at the moment—who seriously believes that inflation will be brought down to 6 per cent by the end of this year. They claim to believe it, but it is a bogus argument.

I should like to deal with a different matter and that is one which the President of the Treasury Board dealt with in his speech at considerable length and which the Minister of Finance has dealt with time and time again. It is our so-called international position.

Are we as a nation going to remain internationally competitive? The great justification for this wage control approach that is at the core of this budget is that it is going to make us internationally competitive; that it is required for that reason. In this, Canadian workers are once again being made the scapegoat for the failures of Canadian governments and, to put it bluntly, for the major sectors of Canadian industry. In fact, perhaps the most serious failure of this budget is that it does not face directly the very real problems of Canadian industry in the tough, competitive international world.

What the budget does in this regard is to place the completely wrong emphasis on wages and salaries. That is an extremely serious mistake because it focuses on the wrong target and ignores what ought to be stressed. In this context I urge the minister, who is sitting opposite this afternoon looking rather bemused in some kind of metaphysical mist, to read an article written by two interesting people, R. H. Hayes and W. J. Abernathy. The minister will be interested to note that it does not appear in a socialist publication or a progressive liberal publication, if that is not a contradition in terms these days. This article, Mr. Speaker, appeared very recently in the Harvard Business Review and is called "Managing our way to economic decline". I urge the Minister of Finance, the Tory finance critic and his leader to read that article because it makes an extremely serious argument, one that I understand is now at last being taken up in American business circles. Perhaps their Canadian counterparts will soon take it up and hopefully the government will pay some attention to it. It diagnoses the problems of North American industry, but are they due to wage increases, government regulations, all the clichés I have just heard from the Leader of the Opposition and repeated in a different form by the minister himself in recent weeks? No. What it says—and I say it applies with much more relevance to the Canadian economy than to the American economy—is that the central failure of North American business is that for many years now it has wrongly put the emphasis on short-run profits and has insisted, as a fundamental part of its operation, on short-run cost reduction. That is to say, keeping wages down instead of emphasizing, as the authors point out, the necessity of looking at the long term, the necessity of doing more research and development and putting emphasis on quality products. Most specifically and relevantly to this budget is the authors' argument that northern European labour costs are now the highest in the world and this has not hindered them from becoming extremely competitive in the modern international atmosphere. The key, positive point that they make is that the Europeans and Japanese plan for the long run, put much greater emphasis on research and development, and, contrary to the methodology of the Conservative Party on my right and the practice of the Liberals across the way, both Japan and northern Europe have much more intervention in their economies by government than we have here in Canada or in the U.S.

I want to say in that context, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Blenkarn: More government intervention!

Mr. Broadbent: Exactly. I want to say in that context that I listened to the Leader of the Opposition making his criticism of that hopeless gang across the way for the cruelty they have inflicted on the people of Canada, but I must say that he trotted out every old Conservative cliché that I have heard in this House for the past 14 years. The single important virtue of Ronald Reagan, Mr. Speaker, is that he at least was an honest Conservative.

We heard from the Leader of the Opposition the cliché about the need for less planning and government involvement. We heard him say that we need to have less of what he called control by government. In particular, there had to be less government spending. Well, I say to him that his own members have been demanding more government spending on pensions, more government intervention in housing, in fisheries and other areas, and I repeat: at least Ronald Reagan is honest. He wanted a cutback in government involvement and activity, but he laid it on the line about what programs he was prepared to cut. That honesty I can respect even though I disagree with it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the point I want to make about the serious problems of Canadian industry which should have been but were not addressed in this budget is that this government had made not only an unfair policy decision as it affects wage earners in this country, but a tremendously erroneous judgment about what is really at the heart of the malaise in Canadian industry. This budget completely lacks an industrial or manufacturing strategy, one that puts its emphasis where it ought to be, namely on the crucial need for Canadian governments and businesses to co-operate in more planning, not less. That is the real need of the Canadian economy and we should have had it firmly expressed in this budget.

Having said that, I also want to say something about the short-run effect of taking so much money out of the Canadian economy. I mentioned earlier that the net effect of tax increases, pension and family allowance reductions, control of wages in the public sector and the coming increases in unemployment insurance premiums is that it is going to take over $4 billion out of the economy. This, precisely at a time when stimulus is needed. It will not mean more jobs, it will mean less jobs. Instead of learning from the errors of the 1930s, the Liberals are repeating them. Instead of stimulating the economy this summer by a tax cut, we are mindlessly increasing taxes. Instead of improving upon the recession by creating more jobs, the Liberals are going to deepen it. In that context, Mr. Speaker, instead of clinging to office this government should resign.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, we desperately need more jobs now for the men and women who would rather be working, paying taxes, and producing goods and services than collecting unemployment insurance or welfare. We in the New Democratic Party say that now is the time to stimulate the economy, not shackle it. Now is the time to provide hope and confidence, not by false statements, silly clichés or contradictory policies of the kind we are getting from the Conservatives, but by describing the situation honestly and distributing the burden fairly.

We say in the immediate sense that what we need is a lowering of taxes now. We need a further expansion of housing programs. We do need and could have lower interest rates if the Minister of Finance would exercise his authority and tell Governor Bouey to bring them down. We do need a serious attempt by the Prime Minister or the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) to negotiate with the producing provinces a delay of the increase in the price of oil which came on the first of this month and the consequent and equivalent price increase of natural gas which will come—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I regret to interrupt the hon. gentleman but the time allotted to him has expired. However, he may continue with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government, and the amendment of Mr. Wilson (p. 18905).

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I will not abuse the generosity of the members of the House by taking much more time. I have said we need more stimulus now, and I do not hesitate to say that at this particular point in our history. We should learn from the 1930s instead of repeating those errors. That is what we should be doing.

Having made three or four short-run proposals, I want to conclude by saying that the most damning criticism of this government at this point in our history, when other nations are taking their industrial development with greater seriousness and paying it greater attention, is that this government, this collection of individuals who call themselves a government, is totally indifferent to the need for planning a modern industrial nation.

What the New Democratic Party says, with more emphasis on this point than on any other, is that this was the time for us to have levelled with the people of Canada; that this was the time for the trade unions and the business community to have been called in. We ought to have said: "Yes, we will expect something of you. We will expect equivalent sacrifice, if you like, but in return we will give you a commitment over the next two, three, four or five years—because putting our house in order is not going to be done overnight—to rid ourselves of this old notion of continuing to be some kind of resource hinterland for the rest of the world, that instead with more government planning, not less, with co-operation of governments, the private sector and the trade union movement we will at long last do some serious planning and create in this country a manufacturing nation of the first order."

That can be done, Mr. Speaker. It ought to be done. The first step to be taken to bring it about is to get rid of the Liberal Party and the Liberal government. The next step is to elect the NDP.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member accept a question?

Mr. Broadbent: Absolutely, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member in his remarks said on several occasions that the government through its budget is taking considerable sums of money out of the economy. I believe he said that on the night of the budget as well. Could the hon. member explain to the House how he calculates that the government is taking considerable sums of money out of the economy? As I read the budget, every cent that is saved by putting limits on salaries, and so on, is going back into the economy in the form of job creation, housing and so on. As I read the budget, every cent that is saved in one place is going directly back into the economy in other places. Could the hon. member explain how he calculates that money is being taken out of the economy as if it were to reduce the deficit, which is not the case?

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I respect the hon. member, but I would also respectfully say in this context that he really has become a Liberal backbencher and been taken in by the old shell game of the cabinet. I would be glad to explain in detail to the hon. member, but I do not want to make another speech at this point the way as I did on budget night. What he says in fact is simply not the case.

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of the Environment and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the budget which was brought down by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) is realistic, responsible and tough.

Mr. Blenkarn: There is nothing for R and D.

Mr. Roberts: The hon. gentleman says there is nothing for R and D. That clearly indicates how little he has studied the budget. If he waits in the House, I will reply to that point a little later in my speech.

This budget is realistic because it concentrates action on those areas where the federal government's action can have the most impact on our economic situation. It is not an abdication but an acceptance of responsibility, to say that Canadian policy changes in themselves cannot change, alter or correct all of the world's economic problems. Canada as a major trading nation obviously is going to continue to receive the impact within our economy of economic events that take place outside. However, there are things that we can do to respond to Canada's economic problems, and those things this budget does do. It concentrates particularly—and there are clear indications that this is important—on counteracting those factors which lead to cost-push inflation, that is the increasing wage rates in the economy. This is one area where the position taken by the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) and that of the government differ. The NDP does not appear to believe that wage rate increases taking place in the Canadian economy, particularly in comparison with that of our major competitor, the United States, are not a factor in the inflationary struggle that we face. Quite clearly, we on this side of the House believe that they are. The government has acted within its powers to respond to those wage rate pressures by bringing those wages in the public service under a capping control.

At a time when wage settlements in Canada are outpacing those in the United States by a factor of 100 per cent, it is quite evident that if the Canadian economy is to be ready to respond and take advantage of a potential upturn in the world economy, we must do something to bring wage rate pressures in the Canadian economy under some control.

The New Democratic Party does not feel that is a problem. We on this side of the House clearly do. I know members in this House generally have been crossing the country talking to people and I can say from my own conversations with a variety of people in industry, labour and banking and from conversations with my constituents that wage rate problems are a fundamental factor of importance in the Canadian economy.

This budget is realistic because it does tackle pressures of cost-push inflation. It does so in a way that does not undermine the restraint program, the monetary and fiscal restraint that we believe is necessary and which if not held would lead to a stoking up of the economy in ways which would be highly inflationary. It is a budget which does emphasize the need for improving the investment climate. It provides in the registered investment shareholders plan and in the incentives for indexed deposit certificates which will encourage investment in the Canadian economy. It concentrates, as my colleague, the minister responsible for housing, indicated to the House earlier this afternoon, an effort on the construction and on the housing side, important not only in terms of meeting housing needs in this country, but important in terms of giving relatively quick stimulation to construction. The budget does focus a relief or a cushioning of some of the impact of higher interest rates in those key areas of the economy where they are most strongly felt.

It is a realistic budget. It takes into account the real world in which Canada must operate. It is a responsible budget. It does not indulge in cloud-cuckoo-land fantasies that there is a quick fix. The budget recognizes the need for restraint. It does make efforts to move us toward new job creation, but in a way which will not increase the deficit. It is concerned, yes, but not panicked by the deficit figures which are projected, because we realize the level of savings in Canada is sufficiently high to finance that deficit and that that deficit flows from a set of temporary factors. It is not, as the United States government deficit is, a consequence of taxation cutbacks and taxation increases in military spending. The Canadian deficit flows from the automatic exercise of stabilizers in the Canadian economy which respond to the recession we are in and which will be overcome as we move out of that recession. Our deficit has not been built in in a relatively permanent way as the United States deficit appears to be.

In talking about a responsible budget, I would like for a few moments to remark upon the arguments presented to us this afternoon by the opposition parties. First, I would like to congratulate the leader of the New Democratic Party on what I think was an earnest and honest speech. There were points in it with which I could not agree, but it seemed to me that the leader of the New Democratic Party did outline, and fairly clearly, major divergences of attitude.

As I said earlier, we do believe the wage pressures which exist at the present time in the Canadian economy are an important factor in the cost-push inflation syndrome. We believe that it is important, through example on our part, that we try and get those wage pressures under control and that other players in the economy, provincial governments and the private sector, respond to the lead that we have given in order that these wage increases which potentially will price us out of international competition will be brought down to reasonable levels. We clearly disagree with the interpretation of the leader of the New Democratic Party in that area.

I listened for some indication in his speech of what alternatives he would suggest. He indicated that he thought we should move quickly to much lower interest rates and that we should engage to a much greater degree in consumer stimulation than we have. What he did not discuss at all—and I hope he will subsequently find the time to do it in a speech here or elsewhere—is how, if we follow that policy, we will be able to avoid the extraordinary, harmful consequences which a similar policy has had within the French economy. The French tried that tack. The result was just recently a second devaluation of almost 6 per cent, an inflation level of 14 per cent and 18 per cent wage increases. The result of what many economists have described as a blown fuse in their economy. Yes, he argued for much greater consumer stimulation, he argued for much lower interest rates, but he did not explain how we would avoid the consequences that a similar policy has clearly had in other economies.

Also he lamented that there was a need to bring forward a clear development and economic planning strategy at this time. What he completely neglected—and perhaps it was because he was unaware of it—was that last November we brought forward an economic development strategy, a document which outlined exactly how we believe those needs should be tackled in the Canadian economy. We have been discussing that strategy publicly and we have been implementing and following the direction which it has charted. It would have been useful in a positive sense this afternoon if he would have given us some indication of those areas of the strategy which he accepts and rejects, and the reasons for doing so.

It is more difficult for me to comment charitably on the speech presented by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). Of course, he said—and I suppose it is not an objectionable sentiment—that we should all put people ahead of the party line. That is particularly understandable in his own case because as far as I can discover there is no party line on the Conservative side to follow. The function of an opposition is not just to oppose or criticize. It is also to propose alternatives and to bring forward some views, some strategy or some approach which it believes would be preferable to the path being pursued by government. That, singularly, the Leader of the Opposition failed to do.

I think it was last May 4 that he lamented he had not been able to find an alternative approach to that of the government, that there was not a better solution. Clearly he has not found one since May. There was almost nothing in his remarks which constituted a constructive endorsement of an alternative policy. He did not have a policy on May 4. He still does not have one.

Perhaps I could ask some questions. Does the Leader of the Opposition think that it is courageous to attack suicide? Does he think it is fearless to be against high inflation rates? Does he think it is brave to be opposed to inflation? Does he think he is being forthright when he attacks unemployment? Is the Pope in favour of peace? It takes much more than rhetoric and indignation, feigned or real, to constitute an economic policy.

A policy is not what the Leader of the Opposition came forward with today. He is opposed to higher unemployment insurance payments and to cutting indexation. He wants stimulative tax cuts for holders of capital. He is opposed to tax increases for others. Of course, with all that he wants lower deficits. That is supposed to be a policy. He wants more private sector consultation. Then when we bring forward proposals for the registered investment shareholder plan and deposit certificates, he opposes further consultation because of delays in implementation. He wants both more consultation and at the same time immediate implementation. He opposes lower interest rates and then votes in favour of lower interest rates. He opposes FIRA and then he voted for the strengthening of FIRA just the other night in the House of Commons. That is supposed to be policy. What it is quite clearly, to use his own language, is trickery and deceit.

The Leader of the Opposition spoke in the House today for 45 minutes, and in 42 minutes he used rhetoric and attack. He talked about the past, indignation feigned or real, but in his 45 minutes—and I am being charitable now—he used only three to bring forward proposals which he would make. What were his great proposals? What was the policy of the Conservative Party as he expressed it? First, a parliamentary committee to study the estimates again. Second, the encouragement of investment incentives. Nowhere in his speech was there a recognition that the government brought forward proposals to encourage investment incentives. There was no discussion, favourable or otherwise, of those suggestions. There was no proposal as to how they could be improved. There was no suggestion as to whether they might not work. There was no suggestion of alternatives, but a simple suggestion in 45 minutes of his speech that we ought to consider what indeed we considered and what the Minister of Finance brought forward for consideration in the House.

Third, he suggested that we should place greater emphasis upon research and development, apparently unaware that the performance in research and development in the country has shown great improvement over the past two years. There has been an increase from just over .9 per cent of the GNP to now well over 1.2 per cent of GNP devoted to research and development. We are not only well on but are above the track for increasing research and development expenditures which his government charted. There have been increases in the private sector in research and development expenditures of an average 25 per cent per year, exactly because the Liberal government brought forward incentives which encouraged a tremendous increase in the research and development field. Of 45 minutes, less than three were devoted to positive suggestions; those simply slapdashedly stated, not analysed. That was his performance today.

I suggest he has done a real disservice, not only to the House but to the country, in not speaking seriously in terms of analysis, as I must say the leader of the New Democratic Party did, and by not seriously coming forward with some indication of what a Progressive Conservative alternative would be. That he did not do. He cannot complain that he did not have time to do it. We endured 45 minutes of ranting and raving, and all we got were wild charges of deceit and trickery. To have the Leader of the Opposition accuse us of trickery after that speech matches the chutzpah of my Jewish constituent who wanted to be treated as an orphan after he had assassinated his parents.

I should say one other thing. When he went through his analysis of all the things he would like to do, such as decreasing the deficit while of course cutting back taxes and increasing a variety of our expenditures, he went on to complain that the real problem had been that we as a government had not seriously tackled the problems of government expenditure. He has been a member of government, if only briefly, and I suspect that he is aware of the facts. Certainly he should know them. The Public Service of Canada has increased over the past 20 years. It has increased on the average each year by 1.3 per cent. The annual growth of the population over that same period on the average has been 1.5 per cent. Over the past 20 years the growth of the public service has not kept pace with the growth of the population, even though public services have to grow to serve the needs of the population. In the years since 1978, indeed, the growth of the public service has declined at a rate even lower than that. It was a German politician of not great repute who developed the tactic of the big lie. The Leader of the Opposition has developed the tactic of the big panic and attacks rather mythical problems and exaggerates.

He talked about the need to get government expenditures under control. He should know that expenditure by the federal government on goods, services and fixed capital has been roughly constant over the last 20 years or so; indeed, in most recent years it has been declining. It is just over 20 per cent of gross national product. It is quite clear that it has not been extraordinary increases in government programs or government expenditures which have caused economic problems in Canada.

I do not ask him to accept my comments on that. I would just refer him briefly to the June report of the Investment Dealers' Association of Canada in which they provide figures which indicate the relatively static level of federal government expenditures as a proportion of the GNP. It concludes by saying:

> Government spending on goods and services has become a less important portion of Canadian aggregate demand. In recent years governments have been making serious and successful efforts to reduce growth in their spending.

What we heard today, when there was an opportunity and a need not only for serious analysis but for a presentation for the alternative view from the Leader of the Official Opposition, was 42 minutes of high school sarcasm and three minutes of non-constructive suggestions.

I said there were three characteristics of this budget. It was realistic, responsible and tough. These were characteristics which were certainly not shown in the speech by the Leader of the Opposition. The budget is tough because it recognizes, admits and communicates to the public of Canada that there are no quick fixes for the Canadian economic situation.

Mr. McDermid: John Turner said that in 1970.

Mr. Roberts: It does not attempt to evade responsibility. It admits that the standard of living in Canada will be lowered temporarily and argues that the burden of that lower standard of living should be shared within the country.

Nothing was more ignominious in a pretty ignominious speech by the Leader of the Opposition than his attempt to frighten—I do not know if that was his deliberate intention but it certainly would be the effect of taking his remarks seriously—old age pensioners and those who are greatly in need in our economy by his accusation of what the impact of this budget would be on their situation. I say that, Mr. Speaker, because it is the poor, those who are not as well-off and those who are on fixed incomes, who have the strongest vested interest in seeing the policies brought forward by this budget work. It is they who will most benefit if and when we bring the push for inflation within our economy under control.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roberts: There has been no recognition on his part that those receiving the guaranteed income supplement, which is virtually half of the old age pensioners, will not have any capping placed on the inflationary adaptation of their pensions, that they will receive what they would have received as an old age pensioner and they would have received as a guaranteed income supplement receiver as if this budget had never been brought forward. Those who will have their incomes capped are those who are not receiving the guaranteed income supplement and those who are not in as great need as those at the lower level in our society.

It is true that this budget does increase taxes. It is designed to stimulate job creation and to help those who are in need, not by increasing our deficit but by increased taxes, so that those who do have income can help with their taxes to create jobs for those who are not so fortunate in our society. The employed will pay more on their unemployment insurance premiums and they will do so because they will be indirectly assisting those who are not fortunate enough to be employed to receive their benefits.

This is a tough budget because it recognizes that we will face the unpleasant fact of high interest rates so long as United States interest rates are high and that unfortunately there is not, as the NDP would like us to believe, a method by which we can lower our interest rates startingly below those in the United States in a quick move to resolve our problems in that manner.

The budget does say that we should cushion the impact of those high interest rates on those who need cushioning the most; those who receive the guaranteed income supplement and those receiving the child tax credit. The budget does say that we should assist farmers, fishermen, small-business men and house purchasers who are those most in need of some relief from high interest rates. However, it accomplishes this in a way which is responsible and realistic. It recognizes that we cannot cushion and insulate everyone in our economy.

I said that this is a realistic budget. It takes into account the real world in which we live. It is a responsible budget. It does not go haring after the impossible, simplistic, dramatic but counterproductive solutions. It is responsible because it recognizes the need to maintain restraint. It is responsible because it does move toward job creation through the construction proposals and it encourages increased investment through the rather inventive and imaginative proposals brought forward for the registered investment shareholders plan and the deposit certificates. It is a tough budget because it recognizes the difficulty of our situation.

It is also a Liberal budget. It is Liberal because it does not just stand aside, as the Conservatives sometimes seem to want us to do, and say: "Let us leave it to the private sector." We acknowledge and recognize that we have responsibilities and an active role to play. We have focused on the cost-push factors which lead to inflation. I suggest it is interesting that both the private sector and certainly the provincial governments as well have reacted to this budget much more responsibly than the members of the official opposition. This Liberal budget recognizes the need to create jobs and investment in Canada by finding new instruments to encourage that investment.

It is not a Tory budget. It is not one which adopts a hands-off policy. It is one that says the government has a responsibility to create a positive and constructive context which will support private sector growth because it recognizes that private sector growth is the motor of the economy.

This is also why it is not a New Democratic Party budget. It does not believe we should abandon restraint programs. It does not believe we should avoid the problems which are posed by galloping wage increases in the Canadian economy. It does recognize the need for the private sector to work with us to generate growth within the economy. It does reinforce the direction which was charted in the economy development strategy a year ago.

It is a difficult budget, one which avoids the excesses which I believe have been presented by both parties on the other side of the House. It is a policy excess on the part of the New Democratic Party and simply a rhetorical excess on the part of the Conservatives. It is a Liberal budget. It is tough, responsible, realistic and deserves the support of the members of the House.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to take part in this leaders' day debate when the leaders are present or have been for part of the time. I am also pleased to hear from the party spokesmen some of the philosophies behind their policies. The hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Roberts) who just spoke for approximately 30 minutes spent about three minutes in defence of the budget and used the rest of his time to attack the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). We sat and endured it.

Mr. McDermid: Talk about being hypocritical. He read the polls in his riding.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): The only defence I will offer in support of the Leader of the Opposition is that he was only telling the House what the people of Canada are saying to him. That is who the government should be listening to. That is all I will say about that matter.

I believe the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) gave an honest speech. He wired himself thoroughly to intervention in the business affairs of this country. He knows that he is doing so. He is cutting off any chance he has to get the labour vote and he realizes that while doing that he is attempting to maintain the alliance with the government side with its tendency toward intervention.

I suggest that this debate has been worth while. I am more interested, however, in putting on the record the efforts that have been made in the House over the last number of years to put an alternative policy before the people of Canada that is distinctly Canadian, practical, economic and is fitted to today's situation. In other words, I want so speak about the budget in perspective. Over the past number of years we have had in intellectual circles, particularly among economists and businessmen, a debate on the theories of Lord Keynes. That debate reached its peak around the fifties. Many of our senior civil servants became great devotees of this pattern that was going to solve all our problems. I think of men like that very fine gentleman, Bob Bryce. I can think of the deputy minister of finance 35 years ago.

Second, we have had a debate among the economists mostly about the theory of monetarism. There has been a great deal of argument backward and forward. We have seen this theory accepted not only in Canada but in the United States, in Great Britain and in most countries in Europe.

Third, we have had a number of debates of a sundry nature of such things as the Phillips curve where you have to balance off unemployment against inflation. That is all we heard from the civil service 25 years ago. The only persons we hear talking about it today are members of the government who keep going back to their schoolbook knowledge gained 25 or 30 years ago.

We have had a certain amount of debate on Galbraith. He is the humorist who poses as an economist. This is the intellectual level which the upwardly mobile people in our civil service have reached. These men like Galbraith are just bad smells in a mist. They are here, they are there, they are every place, and you cannot put your hand on them.

In the last ten years there has been a series of debates in the United States on what I call, and I think it is the correct phrase, the Mundell-Laffer hypothesis. Mundell is a Canadian and Laffer is an American. All these fellows preached was a common sense approach in economics based on quantitative analysis. If in analysing what was happening in the various industrial countries of the world we saw that what the policy was resulting in was exactly the opposite of what it was intended to do, then common sense would suggest we go the other way.

About two or three weeks ago the financial spokesman for the New Democratic Party asked a question in this House. In my judgment, it was probably the most thoughtful question I have heard in this House in two or three years. He asked, in view of the fact that all of the policies the minister is carrying out or talking about are proven failures, would the minister not consider it wise to do just the opposite? At least it would not be any worse than what is happening to us now. That is an Irishman's way of saying, "If I cannot get the cork out, I will push it in." It makes sense. That is exactly what we have been debating here these last two or three years.

We have all the quantitative evidence in the world that certain things that are considered truths under Keynes and the theories of Keynes have become the religion of the guiding lights behind this government. When you have the evidence that these things are not working, commonsense demands you go the opposite way. That is all Reaganomics is, just go the opposite way to what you have been doing.

When I hear condemnations in this House about frightening away the business people, I simply say we should look two or three years down the road. On July 1 of this year the first major move of Reaganomics went into effect in the United States. They reduced their taxes across the board by 10 per cent. In this budget our government increased them 5 per cent, again going the wrong way.

Either on the last sitting day of the House or earlier today, I heard the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) say something that is pure Keynesian. He said in effect that inflation is caused by too much demand for too few goods, demand-pull. He does not realize that one third of our industry is working under a very limited capacity. To put it another way, only two thirds of our industry is being utilized today. The minister fails to recognize that 1.5 million people are either unemployed or partially employed.

We cannot have a demand-pull situation when the factories are full of goods and the mines are overwhelmed with their inventory. Demand-pull is pure Keynesian. Keynes did not know anything about cost-push, yet I heard the Minister of the Environment, the hon. member for St. Paul's mention cost-push. This budget increased the cost-push. Cost are those things that add to the price. The biggest thing used to be the cost of government. In the last two or three years, it has been overtaken by tremendous bursts in the cost of interest. The number one enemy in the last three years has been the cost of interest, then the cost of government, then such things as land costs, and the question of the money supply or monetary theory. Fifth place on the list is labour costs. All this budget does is take advantage of the popular opinion across this country.

It says the first guys that should be clobbered are the public servants. They have seen the example of the other provinces doing it, so they ask themselves, why not do it here. It does not get at the number one, number two or number three basic big costs of cost-push inflation.

We could get this debate on to a high level if the government listened carefully to some of the ideas that have been presented. I am not going to go through them. I have been pleading for years to get the debate up to reality. Let us face the fact that the quantitative evidence shows the paradigm or pattern of Keynesian economics has never applied to Canada because it is such a big country. It is not applying to any country. It is not working.

Let us debate the fact that three years ago, in 1979, a budget was introduced by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie). It had a tax increase of 18 cents on diesel and gasoline with a tax credit for the person who drove a car. That was the first budget in the history of the western world that tried to get at the budget deficit by decreasing taxes. That has never been pointed out in the House by anyone with the exception of myself.

Across the world it caused tremendous ripples. As I said two or three years ago, in the spring of 1980 The Public Interest, which is probably the most profound and widespread intellectual magazine in the world, put out a special issue entitled "Economic Theory and Policy in Disarray". One of the main articles in that magazine was headed "The dissolution of the Keynesian consensus" by James W. Dean. Let me read six sentences to the House:

> On December 13, 1979, the Government of Canada fell. For just six months the Conservatives had governed with a parliamentary minority, and they were defeated on a vote of no onfidence. The issue was their first budget—a budget that rejected Keynesian economic policies, replacing them with radically different recommendations. Unemployment and slow growth were to be fought not by increasing the federal deficit but by reducing it.

• (1740)

This is not a new philosophy. It was tried in a pragmatic way by Mellon, the Secretary of the Treasury under several Presidents of the United States in the 1920s. It was tried by Kennedy from 1962 to 1964. Instead of having a big budget deficit, by reducing the tax he got a surplus, because the demand factor was such at that time that everybody bought the goods, created new wealth and provided enough tax to give him a surplus.

It goes on to say, about the Conservative turnabout:

> Their turnabout mirrored that of much of the economics profession throughout the English-speaking world. It was the decade's last dramatic reflection of a dissolving Keynesian consensus. This paper traces how that dissolution came about.

I am not going to read the whole thing but what I have said should be enough to show that the Crosbie budget of 1979, with just six or seven small tax, decreases as a way of balancing the budget—it could not balance it in one year—was a small but important start.

Then the budget we got in 1980 stopped that. I remember my criticism of the first budget of the present Minister of Finance. I said he zigged when he should have zagged.

Then there was that disastrous budget of November 12, in which they went in a completely opposite way to what they had done over the previous ten years. They are creating a whole series of incentives for people to save money and they call them loopholes. That has put the country in a complete panic and in a paralysis. This frightened the government so much that it even had to recess the House in order to reconsider the budget. They took the brave, stout stand that they were not going to give in. But they gave in in the last part of June, and now they have brought down this budget of June 28.

Instead of learning from the series of mistakes that they made in 1980 and 1981, and heading the wrong way, they added to the costs by increasing the taxes, with no evidence of restraint. In other words, it was a wrong-way budget, but it has served one good purpose. It forced the government members to think.

It is no accident that in this debate minister after minister has got up on the government side trying to defend this budget. They know what the intellectuals think of it, they know what the businessmen think of it, they know what the common people think of it. So they brought in this new budget, in the hope that it would paper over what they thought were the mistakes of November 12. They did withdraw some of the things they did in the November 12 budget. But this is not an economic budget. It is not an accounting budget, it is simply a high tax budget.

They are doing exactly the opposite to what they should be doing. They are still working on the assumption that when you are short of money you tax for it. The truth is that if you want more money, you should lower the taxes, and you will get more money and get the country growing in the process.

I think I have said enough, Mr. Speaker, on the perspective, I think I have said enough on the Crosbie budget. I did not think it went far enough in tax reductions, but at least it was a start. I think I have said enough, if I may use the common phrase for the last three budgets, on the MacEachen budgets. In one case he zigged when he should have zagged; in the other case he brought on national panic and paralysis; and this one can only be described as a budget that brought on stupefaction. Even the Conservative Party members are stupefied. The Conservative Party is stupefied at the immensity of the ignorance that is coming out from the other side of the House. I used to blame this mostly on the mandarins, but I know that the mandarins do stick into the budget certain things which are a contradiction of what we hear, from the floor of the House from the minister.

I never thought that I would hear, in the question period today, the minister talking about a demand-pull type of inflation. He could not spend any more money because there would be more demand-pull and therefore higher prices and more inflation. The hon. member for St. Paul's is right. What we should be looking at is the cost-push. Every time you add to the costs, you force people into the recession, which is now changing into a depression.

We have gone so far into the hole that it is doubtful whether any government could get out of it quickly. So I think the action program has to be, not a single act, or what they call in the modern days of drugs as a single "fix". But there are some things that can be done. They would not hurt the balance of ways and means of the budget or increase the deficit and bring the taxes in, in a year or so.

These things can be considered seriously. They are not political. I think that members of all parties can support them. Let us take the sensitive subject of monetary policy as a starting point. I think that government, to start with, could first just ask the Governor of the Bank of Canada to be silent on the weekly bank rate. This is nothing but far-seeing psychology to convince bankers to raise rates. No one borrows from the Bank of Canada, so why bother announcing the bank rate each week? Just doing that is a negative thing. My suggestion would not cost anything, but it would take a little pressure off the banks which think they have to follow the central bank.

Second, I suggest that the dollar should be allowed to continue to float. Think of all the billions of dollars we have had to expend in this floating crap game. Banks have many more billions of dollars than we have. No country in the world can compete with the five or six hundred billion dollar available from your Eurodollars and other dollars and will look around for a situation where they can make a dollar quickly. That is all we are trying to do, with the bank interfering with the value of our dollar. We are putting a few pennies into a gambling game when the other fellow has got billions; but these few pennies amount to several billion dollars which we have to borrow at 17 per cent, 18 per cent or 19 per cent, adding to our costs. Let the dollar float. Let the world economy come to our assistance in a natural economic way; and do not put us under the control of the American banking system.

Third, let us work out a money supply formula based on reality. Reality is not just the M-1 figures that give the amount in the cash accounts in the banks or the amount of currency. Reality is the combination of money in circulation and the velocity with which it moves. A simple way to discover the velocity is just to do what the banks do; a weekly checkup on the cash flow will tell you how fast money is moving. Because if the money is moving twice as fast as it moved the week before, that has the same effect as doubling the money supply. That, of course, is very important in establishing the inflationary impact, in a quantitative sense, on the supply of money.

You do not have to get into a quarrel with the Governor of the Bank of Canada, you do not have to ask that he be dismissed; just ask him to lay off what he does not know anything about.

On this money supply formula, he knows all about velocity. Let us see if he cannot work out some sort of formula that will give him some indication of when to push forward and when to pull back. He still has all the power under the reserve sections of the Bank of Canada Act.

On the monetary point, these three proposals do not solve very much, they simply ease the restrictions of making adjustments that we have to make in the next year or so.

The next point is on fiscal policy. We have all sorts of ways on the fiscal side—and the government is using some of these in the present budget—of affecting our economic situation. Parliament has amended the Farm Credit Act so that the Farm Credit Corporation does not have to borrow from the consolidated revenue fund but can borrow money and get money by any means. It is in the act. All it has to do is get the permission of the Minister of Finance, but he has not given that permission yet. He is saying, "You have to do it my way", which is to pour public money into a subsidy to reduce interest rates three or four points for those who are in financial straits. The whole industry wants lower interest rates. That is its biggest cost factor. The Export Development Act has been amended in this House, with the support of all parties, to give the corporation the same power to raise money by any means. There is all sorts of money available not only from Canadians at half interest rates—they will provide it—but it is also available in the European market at half interest rates. We can get all the billions we want at 6 per cent to 9 per cent, and we do not need to worry about the exchange value fluctuating. We can cope with that; there is an insurance process already in effect now at Swiss banks. Why was the same power not given to the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation? I asked my Liberal friends. We proposed this in the House a year ago. We proposed this to the minister in debate, but he turned it down because he thought the Minister of Finance did not want him to support this type of thing. Why should the people who want houses not have access to money at half interest rates when it is not costing the government anything? Farmers have been given this right. Exporters have been given this right. Why should this not also be done for the small businessman through the Small Business Development Bond?

I would like to go on with more suggestions, and I am watching the clock carefully. I would like to see the Small Business Development Bond restored immediately, and let us get rid of those phrases "financial difficulties" and "in dire straits". It should be for everybody.

Second, I would like to see the saving techniques mentioned in the House over the last two years restored and put back into the Canadian budget. We could do that very simply, and it would not cost the government anything. Let hon. members not give me the argument about tax expenditures. We do not get any taxes if there is no business. We do not lose anything on nothing.

Then I would like to see action on that Conservative proposal of a few years ago, mortgage interest deductibility and property tax deductibility. Every year we could give that poor devil trying to buy his own home a $2,500 to $3,000 deduction from his costs. Let us compare that with the proposal of the government to hand out government money, which is borrowed at 18 per cent or 19 per cent, for one year only. These are proposals which can be demonstrated to produce a potential income to the government. They wipe out all costs and produce a profit. What is the matter with making money through sensible business management on the part of the government?

In winding up my speech I would like to suggest that there are a thousand individual, innovative programs the government could put into place without any cost to the government. In fact, the government would make a lot of money out of them.

These ideas are not new. Some of them were proposed in the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs three years ago. One is to allow lending organizations to lend money to people buying homes at 6 per cent. Who would lend money at 6 per cent? Everybody would, if we put in one little sweetener, and that sweetener is that if a person sold his house within ten years for a capital gain, half that capital gain would go to the lender. Let us just figure that out and see how quickly we could get our 6 per cent money. The government is not even into that. All it says is "legalize the contractual arrangement." This would not cost the taxpayer anything. It would not cost the government anything. It is not a new idea. I apply the same principle to business.

Second, in connection with businesses, instead of borrowing money, they should be asked to give an interest in their businesses to lenders in lieu of borrowing. Big companies are forced to do it now. They call it turning from bonds over to equity. How quickly we would get money for small business if we accepted the Stanfield proposal of years ago! Money would flow to small business very quickly if a person could invest $5,000 in a small business and take his returns out as part of the profits, instead of having a fixed interest rate. The same thing applies to the share proposal. If we are worried about unemployment and if companies are worrying about not being able to pay increased wages to keep up with inflation, let them pay extra wages in the form of shares or an interest in their businesses. Hundreds of people are doing it, and they give evidence about how it works all the time. The hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Thomson) told the House several months ago that he did that in his businesses.

I could go on and list many things, but the following is the one I put forward above all things. In all capital intensive enterprises in any country, once interest rates go above 6 per cent, the interest payments become the major cost of running a business. At a 10 per cent level with a long pay-out, 75 per cent of the cost of a business is the payment of interest. Someone said in the House today that at the present time nearly two thirds of the cash flow of all our corporations in Canada—based on the frist quarter—is used to pay interest. Just think what the case would be for new business. That 75 per cent is the minimum. With interest rates now at 15 per cent to 20 per cent it is impossible to do anything. Such projects as the pipeline, heavy oil, tar sands and a national power grid from one end of Canada to the other—all of which we should have had 20 years ago—would become good investment opportunities. It has been pointed out by the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) and others that Canadians do not act.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but his allotted time has expired. Nevertheless, he may continue if there is unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent for the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I was planning to wind up at six o'clock.

I am simply pointing out that all these things which were such a shock to us last winter could be corrected in a matter of months, not by way of big handouts but simply by our saying, "Let's finance them by getting rid of that interest cost". Or, as they say in the trade, "Get rid of your front end loading costs" so that businesses are not loaded down with 75 per cent or 80 per cent of their costs being interest. All of a sudden these things which are uneconomic would become economic, and the government, without spending any money, could get many megaprojects going as fast as we could get the manpower allocated to them.

I thank hon. members very much for listening to me. I have made that proposal in the House for 25 years, and I am still trying. No one argues the economics with me. Some years ago the then minister of energy, mines and resources, the Hon. Donald Macdonald, looked at that proposal with his officials and said, "Yes, it is practical". The then minister of finance, Mr. Turner, said, "Yes". His officials looked at it and said it was all right. Why do we not do it? Now that we are shaken up a bit by the stupid following of wrong-way policies for the last number of years, we are finally forced to think. Let us change that thinking into action. There is not a thing I have proposed today which would cost anybody anything. What I have proposed would just make money for everyone.

I would also like—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At 6 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Ron Irwin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, St. Augustine once wrote:

> A nation is an association of reasonable beings united in a peaceful sharing of the things they cherish, therefore to determine the quality of a nation, you must consider what those things are.

Because a budget is so important to a nation, it follows that in framing a budget we should first establish what things we cherish and how they shall be peacefully shared.

The process leaves us with a series of questions that must be answered before the budget can be hammered out. How do we control inflation? How do we treat the unemployed? How can we alleviate some of the unemployment? How can we get our tradesmen working? How can we conquer high interest? How can we help manufacturers, farmers and fishermen? How much tax is permissible?

The use of tax moneys as a catalyst must be clearly defined and understood. For instance, we do not foster the building of homes in a vacuum. We do so because in our nation it is important that our tradesmen work and our people are properly accommodated.

In this budget we have tried to outline those things that we cherish and how they are to be shared. We have decided that we must set an example, and consequently we have said that next year there will only be a 6 per cent increase in salaries for Members of Parliament and civil servants, numbering 500,000 people, and a 5 per cent increase the year after. We could easily have said, and it probably would have been politically popular, that we were cutting back on the civil service. In hard times it is always acceptable to cut back on the civil service. We could have laid off 10 per cent or 15 per cent or even 20 per cent of these employees, but would that have been sharing? I do not think so.

I note that last weekend Governor William Milliken of the state of Michigan went even further than the Canadian government. Michigan's 11,500 unionized secretaries and clerks have agreed to an undisclosed wage cut and a freeze at the new level for the next 16 months. We have proposed a salary increase of 6 per cent, but in Michigan unionized civil servants are saying that they do not even want an increase; that they will take less than they are receiving now as long as they have job security.

Some provinces such as Nova Scotia are following the federal leadership, and some provinces even took the initiative before the federal budget proposals. Members on this side of the House are deeply concerned about the impact on fishermen, small business, farmers and home owners.

We are in hard times, Mr. Speaker; no one disputes that. Within his limited resources, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) provided a budget which has reacted to our concerns.

I will say one thing about the economic downturn, Mr. Speaker. Each member of this House, from all parties, has learned a lot about budgets and economics and I am sure that each has gone through this budget with a fine-tooth-comb.

I think the minister knew this, and even though there was a great deal of criticism from hon. members opposite about where the funds are allocated, certainly there can be little criticism about how they are allocated and about the clarity with which this is set out in the budget document. The budget is concise, direct and to the point, and the minister is to be congratulated.

These are hard economic times. I do not want to go back to the election of the Liberal government or to the tenure of the Conservative government. These hard times go back to 1973 and are directly related to the Middle East oil price increase which occurred at that time. Even in 1979 we had been forewarned of 1981 and 1982. In that year the Economic Council of Canada pointed out that the United States economy was expanding too fast. There was excess demand, insufficient savings, high consumer spending, high levels of borrowing, and a large U.S. federal deficit. In 1981 President Carter noted that the Middle East price drain would take $40 billion out of the U.S. economy because of the increase in OPEC prices.

These are difficult times and government alone cannot solve them, Mr. Speaker. Roy Phillips, President of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, has indicated that the role of government is to provide a supportive environment but that the task of turning things around must come from the private sector and that the private sector must not abdicate its responsibility. Mr. Phillips' words do not constitute an excuse for government to abdicate its responsibility. To amplify what he said, I think we must be more cognizant of the responsibility of government. I do not intend to go over every detail of the budget but in a general way I should like to look at some of the proposals contained in it.

I have dealt with the 6 per cent and 5 per cent increases to public servants. T here is one important thing that many members have overlooked, and that is the fact that these increases apply to regulatory boards, in some instances regulating the price of food, communications such as Bell Telephone, and transportation. They are not to be departed from except in exceptional circumstances.

We have tried to buffer senior citizens, so there will be no change in the GIS which will keep up with inflation and there will be no change in veterans' pensions. The child tax credit has been increased. Small business will be able to get loans at 4 per cent less interest than they can now, farmers at 4 per cent less, and fishermen at 4 per cent less. We have indexed term deposits. In other words, you pay tax only on the interest which exceeds inflation on a special type of term deposit. This money will be pooled, $3 billion of it, and provided to new home buyers. One hon. member says we have not done it yet. Let us get on with the budget, pass it tonight and do it. We will provide a fund of $1.4 billion for direct job creation. There will be a $3,000 grant for new home buyers and first time buyers. There will be 100,000 purchasers.

Mr. Deans: You know that housing prices went up by $3,000 the day you announced it.

Mr. Irwin: We will allocate an additional $30 million for a home renovation program. We will provide more low income and non-profit housing. I see hon. members are getting restless; the truth bothers them. We will provide new rules for the Canada mortgage renewal plan under which you do not have to defer your interest to the end as under the old criteria.

There is one particular aspect of the budget process which I find very discouraging. Perhaps it is the role of a vocal opposition, but they have cast a lot of darkness and very little light on the issues. Perhaps that is how democracy works. If the government proposes A, B and C, the NDP comes back and says yes, but you did not do E, F and G. If we do E, F and G, the Conservatives come back and say yes, but you did not do

X, Y and Z. And on, and on, and on. The opposition reminds me of some people I had back in my riding who deal in the gold market. They look for bad news. They will get up in the morning and say, "Oh, there is a war in Iran. Great, the gold market is going up." "There is a war in Lebanon. Great, the gold market is going up." "There are so many bankruptcies. Great, the gold market is going up." "There are so many suicides. Great, the gold market is going up." That is exactly what I hear from that Greek chorus opposite who spend most of their time wailing; unloved, unwanted and usually unnecessary. That may be the role of the opposition, but certainly it is not the role of a constructive democracy in difficult times. Let me deal first with the Progressive Conservatives.

Mr. Deans: Oh, please don't. You have dealt with them, that is enough.

Mr. Irwin: Only because there are more of them. One writer spoke about the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson), the finance critic of the official opposition. He said:

> Mr. Wilson talks enthusiastically of 'a program of restraint to reduce the size of the burden of the federal government on the economy' and he talks of going through all government expenditures. But after he finishes with advertising, which he suggests might be up to $250 million of a $76 billion total spending package, Mr. Wilson becomes less specific, sounding more like a nibbler than a slasher.

How true. On November 12, 1981, the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre said:

> The small business community which enjoyed the Small Business Development Bond over about a two-year period now will have it taken away.

So we changed it, but the hon. member is still not happy. He wanted more for the farming community. Do you remember that? We allocated from our meagre resources—we are into deficit financing—an additional $100 million. The hon. member is still not happy. He wants $500 million, but he does not tell us where we are going to get it, and he wants us to spend less. Do you remember his famous 22 per cent speech? We have extensively augmented our rental housing program in this budget. The hon. member said in November that our program was only minimal. Will he be satisfied with the new budget? Probably not, because he says that we need 220,000 units, not 15,000. But he does not say where we are to get the money. At the same time he bemoans the 22 per cent and the deficit. He now talks about excessive government intervention and red tape. That is when he is not talking about his former days in the stock exchange, which he talks about a great deal. My grandfather came to this country at the turn of the century and worked in a steel mill. He died in that steel mill in an industrial accident. His widow received no help from the government. There were no safety regulations, but there are now. There are more inspectors now, there is now a more humane monetary approach to widows. These things cost money and they are government intervention. My mother was in an automobile accident and was paralyzed for 17 years. There was no government hospitalization plan, no aid for doctors or prescriptions. Today we have all that, and this is government intervention.

The Environmental Fund, an international non-profit organization, recently ranked the world's 150 nations based on three factors: infant mortality, life expectancy and literacy, which is basically what? How well we are doing in the social sciences, health care and educational facilities. Of those 150 nations, Canada ranked seventh, ahead of the United States, Finland, New Zealand and the United Kingdom. Most of our federal tax moneys are spent on social services, health and education. So what would the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre cut? What social services? What education and health costs?

The Leader of the NDP, the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent), wants us to help renters and home owners with a massive increase in funding for the housing sector. We propose $3,000 grants, and what did he do? Immediately after the budget he went out and gave a news conference. You all saw it. What did he say? He said, "Well, that is not good enough. All that will do will be to make sellers raise the price". In November he was saying "do it", and last week he was saying it will make sellers raise the price. That hon. member will probably never be happy and I will tell you why, because when he is on the same wave length as we Liberals—and periodically he is—it makes him feel uncomfortable.

An hon. Member: Darn right.

Mr. Irwin: Darn right. I should be thankful for small mercies, because this uneasiness is a hopeful sign. To their credit, Mr. Speaker, the NDP has been consistent on FIRA. In November FIRA was forcefully defended by the former hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood—now looking for a provincial riding somewhere in Ontario—and the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis). Moreover, the leader of the NDP, reaffirms his party's support of FIRA in "Trufax", a publication of the Better Business Bureau. There has been much criticism of FIRA, but that is basically because people are looking for a scapegoat, people who do not understand economic forces, foreign domination or just do not give a damn. We have backed away slightly from FIRA by loosening up the rules, but as a party we must never abandon the principles upon which FIRA was established. May I remind the House that these principles were adopted by an all-party committee of this House in 1970. How soon we forget. Why did a concept such as FIRA receive all-party support at one time? Well, between 1948 and 1968 approximately 87 per cent of Canada's foreign capital requirements came from the United States. This resulted in 57 per cent of our manufacturing and 60 per cent of our mining industries being foreign controlled. Approximately 80 per cent of that portion was controlled by U.S. companies. Specific industries where American control was particularly high were: motor vehicles and parts, 96 per cent; industrial electrical equipment, 90 per cent; small electrical appliances, 82 per cent; rubber products, 85 per cent; and synthetic textiles, 72 per cent. There has been some improvement in the intervening years but not a significant one.

C. W. Gonick wrote:

> Today, for example, between one-quarter and one-third of the goods produced in Canada are exported to the United States. These are mostly resource-based products—pulp and paper, nickel, iron ore, lead, zinc, and the like. Canadian jobs, profits, and prosperity in general are heavily dependent on the growth of U.S. markets for these products. It is well known that Canada has never prospered in the face of a depression in the U.S. economy, has never been able to stabilize its prices in the face of American inflation, and has never been able to eliminate unemployment in the face of a downturn in the U.S. economy.

FIRA is a scapegoat because it is highly visible, but it is not in Canada's best interest to run scared at continued foreign domination of our economy this time. The opposition wants a made-in-Canada interest policy, a made-in-Canada job policy and a made-in-Canada trade policy. I suggest the opposition had better look to the decision process and call for decisions on Parliament Hill and not on Wall Street.

The government must act as a buffer in these hard times. I was a mayor one time. One cuts back on spending in bad times and spends in good times. I say that when good times come back we should start cutting back on our spending and pay some of our deficit. Now is not the time to cut back.

On the other hand, we cannot spend our way out of a recession. There must be some prudence. There must be some middle of the road. France found this out very forcefully. It tried to ignore inflation and economic principles, but it wound up with a 14 per cent inflation rate, and just recently it has had to devalue the franc and implement a four-month wage and price freeze. New Zealand has frozen prices, income and rents for the next 12 months. There is a time when reality must be faced and the reality now is that the pie is only so big and the pieces must fit the whole.

Mr. Siddon: Where were you two years ago?

Mr. Gustafson: Where were you ten years ago?

Mr. Irwin: Ten years ago I was out fighting Conservatives. Two years ago I was out fighting Conservatives, and today I am out fighting Conservatives.

Mr. Siddon: You are still wrong.

Mr. Irwin: If you want to go back 25 years ago, I was fighting Conservatives. They sit here today talking about the poor widows. You should have heard the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), Mr. Speaker, talking about suicides. You should have heard him talk about the widows. The Tories forget that it was this party that brought in welfare legislation for widows, for children, for the unemployed and for the immigrants. I remember that and I remind hon. members of that.

Mr. Domm: How much is the deficit?

Mr. Clarke: Now you are talking a different way.

Mr. Irwin: We have tried to accommodate the life insurance companies. They seem satisfied with the new legislation. We have tried to accommodate HUDAC. As a matter of fact, the president of HUDAC, Mr. Cyril Morgan, now feels that HUDAC was listened to as far as the implementation of some policies that have helped his sector, which is housing; are concerned. He feels that he was listened to when he brought criticism to this government in November. He has some praise for this budget.

We have tried to listen. We have tried to accommodate. Only time and the economy will tell if we are right.

Let me turn now to the national energy policy. In the oil and gas sector as a result of the national energy proposals there will be 50 per cent Canadian ownership by 1990. That is not straggering. I cannot think of a country in the world that has less than that. In Canada we seem to feel that the thing to do is to give away our resources as soon as we discover them. Because of public misperception of this goal usually fostered and inflamed by the Official Opposition, we have decided to slow down the process. The minister has indicated that we are ahead of our schedule and that therefore we can do that.

At the same time, as a reminder to members of this House of Commons, I refer to a recent article written by Mr. David Crane, in which he says that the ten most important foreign-controlled oil companies operating in Canada invested $2.5 billion by the end of 1970 and in the same period received dividends of $4 billion. They also hold 80 per cent of equity ownership in Canadian subsidiaries worth $40 billion, which is not bad for a $2.5 billion investment.

Mr. Deans: Which party was in power when that happened?

Mr. Irwin: These companies have expanded from this base into marketing lead holdings, uranium, manufacturing, copper, coal and the building industry.

Mr. Deans: You have been in government for most of the time, and that is why we are in such a mess.

Mr. Irwin: If the hon. member would just stay quiet for a few minutes, he will have a better understanding of resources.

Mr. Deans: I have a good understanding. I do understand, that is the trouble.

Mr. Irwin: The hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) says "Drop PetroCan." I say, never.

Mr. Deans: You guys act like you just took over.

Mr. Irwin: Foreign investment in oil and gas has been welcomed by editorial writers and by people throughout Canada for almost four decades. Just check the editorials. For four decades everybody in this country welcomed foreign investment. We treated foreign companies well. They had a fair return, and they have no complaint about this country.

I return to what the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) said, a one-time Liberal. That is the one good thing in his favour. He was a one-time Liberal.

Mr. Lewis: We will make you a one-time wonder.

Mr. Irwin: The hon. member for St. John's West was a one-time minister of finance and a one-time financial critic. What is he now? He is a leadership contender, a man in the lockup, I understand, who still thinks he is minister of finance.

Mr. Lewis: It would be nice to have one.

Mr. Irwin: I thought he is a man who has a certain amount of experience and that I could listen to him. I came to listen to him. But what did he do? He spent precious time in this House personally attacking the Minister of Finance of this party for almost 40 minutes without saying anything. The only flourish he had is that he ended by quoting from the poem "The Ancient Mariner". I say that the only bird in this House is a duck. It is a dead duck and it is sitting opposite.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Irwin: The Leader of the Official Opposition spoke today. This proves just how much I suffer because I came and listened. The Leader of the Opposition spoke again about using the provinces as scapegoats, that we are once again using them as scapegoats. Remember the argument used concerning the Charter of Rights? It was scapegoats. He has one argument and he goes with it. It does not matter whether we are talking dollars or rights. It is one argument. I suggest the Leader of the Opposition read the British North America Act, and perhaps the Constitution as well. He will find that the provinces do have significant powers. He will also find out that the provinces spend 75 per cent of the tax revenues in Canada. We spend only 25 per cent. When the Leader of the Opposition says that basically we are drawing them in, certainly we are drawing them in. It is their responsibility. It is everyone's responsibility to cure these economic hard times.

Today the Conservatives said, resign. Today the New Democratic Party said, resign.

Mr. Domm: We are unanimous.

Mr. Irwin: How would we govern? We could be governed by the party on my right, which would govern on wishful thinking. We could be governed by the party on my left, which would govern by platitudes. No, we will not resign. Our party has a tradition of hanging tough in hard times. Our party has a tradition of keeping this country together, a tradition of fine social legislation. Every good piece of legislation in this House was brought in by a Liberal government. Hon. members should not forget that. We have a tradition of scope.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Irwin: Our party is the party of Laurier, King, Pearson—

An hon. Member: And conscription.

Mr. Irwin: This Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) intends to lead—

Mr. Domm: Forever.

Mr. Irwin: —not like the party on my right that intends to go for a free ride to see what will happen, and not like the party on my left that shows up here every Monday afternoon asking, "What happened?"

Mr. Lewis: We have never seen a socialist quit yet.

Mr. Irwin: We accept these challenges, Mr. Speaker. We are not going to walk way from them. That is what the people expect of us. These are difficult times and this is a difficult budget. But if we pull together, chart our course, stick to our bearings and get on with other things we will reach our destination.

I will end the way I started with what St. Augustine said. He said this:

• (2030)

A nation is an association of reasonable beings united in a peaceful sharing of the things they cherish,—

I do not think he had the House of Commons in mind when he said that. He continued:

—therefore to determine the quality of a nation, you must consider what those things are.

Let us decide, let us share. After all the partisanship has passed, I know that it would have been the hope of each and every member of the House of Commons—and if it were not, he or she would not have run in the first place—that our country prosper once again. Let us get on with the job.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, finally, after 7.5 months of drift, indecision, confusion and chaos, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) has once again addressed himself to the nation's economy. Due to the crisis in confidence which the last budget created, Canadians knew that a new budget was necessary. Asking this same minister to bring in a budget is tantamount to asking the captain of the Titanic to chart another cruise through the icebergs.

Before commenting directly upon the budget, I wish to draw the attention of the House to the sorry economic record of the present Liberal government. Business bankruptcies have soared as a result of the Liberal high interest rate policy. In the first five months of 1982, 4,500 businesses closed their doors; that is a 55 per cent increase from 1980. Farm bankruptcies increased 111 per cent and unemployment has reached 10.2 per cent. Over 1.2 million Canadians are out of work. That calculation is based upon the number of Canadians who have recorded their willingness to work. Thousands more have given up because the Liberal government has destroyed their will even to register as being available for work. Inflation, which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) wrestled to the ground years ago, has come back. It is an every day occurrence at 11.8 per cent. In the United States, under an administration which the government loves to deride, inflation has been wrestled to 6.7 per cent. One of the main reasons for the huge gap is the cost of energy. The Liberal Party, which rode into power on the sole promise that it would not increase the price of gasoline 18 cents per gallon, now finds that the price of gasoline has risen 86 cents per gallon and federal taxes are 42 cents of that increase. Those were the things the constituents of Simcoe North told me they were concerned about during the last three or four days. The nicest thing about coming to Ottawa from Simcoe North is returning after watching these monkeys day in and day out.

In December, 1981, the Minister of Finance projected a deficit of $10.5 billion. Seven months later he shocked Canadians and the world with a deficit of $19.6 billion. In any business a vice-president of finance who made a 100 per cent error in projections would be fired summarily, but he remains bland and confused as ever, smiling as he answers questions, while all around him Canadians are losing their jobs, homes, farms and businesses. This deficit will cause untold hardship for Canadians. Interest rates will be forced higher as the Government of Canada competes in capital markets for funds to finance the deficit and approximately $25 million worth of Canada Savings Bonds which mature this fall. The investors who supply those funds will not be impressed by a government which operates on such a high deficit and cannot forecast its financial situation with more accuracy. The high interest rate policy of the Liberal Party is killing Canadians. Home owners are giving up when they are faced with 20 per cent mortgage interest rates, farmers are quitting and going bankrupt for the same reason, small businesses are being forced to the wall.

The measures announced in the budget, with which I will deal later, will not deal with these problems. While thousands of Canadians are faced with foreclosures or are forced out of their homes by power sale proceedings, the Liberal government adopts the old diversionary tactic of offering grants to new home owners or to people buying new homes. While thousands of Canadians are going bankrupt, the Liberal government offers interest assistance to small businesses which will expand as long as they are in financial difficulty. The Liberal depression has caused Canadians to cut back on the purchases of appliances, furniture, cars and homes. As a result, those sectors of the economy are in a slump. In order to purchase those items, Canadians need more disposable income. It is therefore a strange time to increase taxes, but that is exactly what the Minister of Finance did in the budget.

As a result of the proposal by the Progressive Conservatives in 1972, personal income tax exemptions were adjusted annually to take into account inflation. This meant that Canadians would not find that inflation was pushing them into higher taxation brackets and higher taxes. It also prevented governments from benefiting from inflation and collecting more revenue. That is income tax exemption indexing.

In the past Liberals have threatened to abandon this principle of fairness. In fact, in November the Minister of Finance invoked the old hocus-pocus to claim that by maintaining indexing he had in fact reduced taxes for Canadians. No one was fooled then, and they are not fooled now. The 6 per cent limit on the indexing of personal income tax exemptions is a tax increase. It is about time the Minister of Finance admitted the truth. The honourable thing for him to do, if he felt in honesty that he needed a tax increase, would have been to maintain the indexing on exemptions and increase taxes, but once again the Minister of Finance abandoned the straightforward course and adopted the devious route known to all Liberals. It is no wonder the Liberal Party faces a crisis of confidence in the country.

The most unacceptable measure in the budget was the decision of the Liberal Party to fight inflation on the backs of the elderly. Up until the recent decision by the Liberal Minister of Finance, old age pensions kept up to inflation because they were indexed accordingly. The Liberals have abandoned that principle of fairness and equity. The Liberals have decreed that every Canadian receiving an old age pension will fall behind the rest of society. Our senior citizens who have given our country so much will be given a double whammy by the Liberals—once by the deindexing of old age pensions exemptions and once by the deindexing of personal exemptions for income tax purposes.

But days before increasing the taxes on senior citizens through the de-indexing of old age pensions and the de-indexing of personal exemptions, the Liberal government looked after its own. On June 17 the Liberals allowed pay increases of nearly 10 per cent for ministerial aides and the political staff of cabinet ministers. This is the government which piously preaches restraint, fairness, equity and untruth, and rushes through this increase for its private staff.

We have 1.2 million Canadians out of work. We have thousands more who have left the work force, utterly discouraged by the failures of the Liberal government. The measures in the budget to address this problem are another Liberal fraud. The Minister of Finance boasts of a $750 million expenditure. Most of that is represented by recycled previous programs. In fact, only $200 million is new funding. But with the misplaced pride of a minister who uses the term "I am announcing, I am announcing", three times within the space of 60 seconds, Canadians are advised that $300 million will be used—I want the House to focus on these words—to create permanent private sector jobs through levered investment incentives. Who in the world knows what that means? The same bureaucrats and the minister who destroyed incentives in the November budget are now going to give us levered investment incentives. That fancy wording comes from a finance minister who stood in the House on Monday night last and made this comment as reported at page 18882 of Hansard, and the same comment is in the printed budget papers—at first I thought it was a typographical error—where he said:

> Let me sum up by listing the items on both sides of the balance—

Every businessman in the country, and everyone who knows anything about balance sheets always says "balance sheet". However, here is the Minister of Finance and the bureaucrats who can just talk about balance. He does not even understand that it is a balance sheet which has two sides. This is the man who is leading us economically.

If the Liberal government desires to take tangible steps in the creation of employment for Canadians, it will get out of the job-creation business and out of the levered investment incentives and concentrate on funding training and retraining.

Mr. Kelly: We did.

Mr. Lewis: Sure you did. Two people came to my office in Midland a week ago seeking funding to enable them to take the registered nursing assistant course for 29 weeks commencing in September. They do not want those fancy words. They do not want these short-term projects. They want assistance while they retrain themselves. They do not want any levered investment incentives. They want legitimate assistance so they can obtain a job. They do not want the smoke and mirrors of the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy).

At the same time that we are discussing jobs I would point out that I was shocked on the weekend to hear some civil servant telling me that a job means something that is created for two months. A job is employment that is created for at least one year.

While we are dealing with job creation, we witnessed a further fancy dance by the Minister of Finance when he dealt with unemployment insurance. You will recall how he said, "I am announcing." In the fine print of the budget an increase in unemployment insurance premiums was announced. There was no mention of that or no "I am announcing". The Minister of Finance and the Liberal Party proposes to implement a 52 per cent increase in unemployment insurance premiums for employees and 34 per cent for employers before the end of the year, but there was no announcement. I find that passing strange. Here we have a man who is so proud of announcements, yet he would not announce the increase in taxes. However, we elicited that information from him during question period.

Canada used to be a country in which there was plenty of adequate housing. This housing was available either by renting or by purchasing accommodation. The rents were reasonable and the apartments were available. Houses were being built and sold. We had a strong, viable industry which employed thousands of Canadians. Well, the Liberals have changed all that. The Liberal high interest policy is discouraging construction of apartments, and new home construction is almost nonexistent.

It is too expensive to buy and carry a home. A family income of $45,000 is required in order to maintain the average Canadian home listed in the Toronto Real Estate Board figures. As a result, housing starts have plummeted. After 1976 there were 273,000 housing starts in Canada. In 1981, after a lot of Liberal hard work, they got it down to 178,000. In 1982, with a lot more effort from the minister in charge of housing (Mr. Cosgrove) the Liberals are predicting 148,000 starts.

The housing industry is in the dire straits that the Prime Minister talks about. The unemployment rate in the construction industry is 19 per cent. How does the Liberal government address the problem? The same experts who brought in AHOP have come up with a new plan. It consists of grants for first time home owners and purchasers of new homes. It is predicted that it will help 8,000 people, not the 100,000 to whom the previous speaker referred.

The Progressive Conservative Party speaks for all home owners, not just the people who want to buy a home. There are tens of thousands of Canadians who have worked hard to own a home and are scared stiff that they will not be able to afford to keep it.

I was recently in a bank where a former client of mine approached me to ask if I was still practising law. He was dressed in mechanics overalls. He had his small son with him. I told him that I no longer practised law but that my partners would look after him. He said, "Mr. Lewis, I cannot meet my new mortgage payments. I will have to sell my home." Those are the Canadians whom we should be helping. They worked hard to buy homes without the benefit of grants. The Progressive Conservatives mortgage interest and realty tax credit plan would have meant $125 a month, $1,500 a year, to that family as a credit against today's horrendously high Liberal interest rates. It probably would have helped that family to keep their home.

Is it not interesting that the Liberals with a $20 billion deficit and a 42-cent tax increase on gasoline cannot afford to help the Canadian home owners? How they laughed at us when we suggested a $10 billion deficit and an 18-cent tax on gasoline! And yet we would have helped Canadian home owners.

Earlier today we saw one more attempt by the Minister of Housing to apologize for the dire straits that the housing industry is in. He went through program after program. Jobs, cheques and applications flowed from his mouth like a gentle rain from heaven as it has for the past few years. We have had the same nonsense from the same nonsensical minister for two years. While interest rates stayed unacceptably high, vacancy rates shrank and housing starts plummeted. If we were to listen to the Minister of Housing, every Canadian would have to move once a week just to move into all the new homes he has built. There would not be anyone working in anything else but the housing industry because he has employed so many Canadians. He has done all that while everything else has gone for a bath.

I would like to make a suggestion to the minister of housing. One Sunday I was at the opening of the Orillia Royal Canadian Legion building complex for senior citizens. I suggest to the minister of housing that, wherever possible when the government is dealing with social housing, that it be linked with the Royal Canadian Legion. I make that suggestion because that complex was planned and organized, as was the first phase, by Branch 34 of the Royal Canadian Legion under the chairmanship of my good friend, Ed Broomfield and his hard-working board of directors. Both phases were set up by the Legion and run by it with no problems and no civil servants. It all goes on smoothly. The Legions from all across Canada are run in a businesslike manner. They served Canada in the time of war and they have continued to serve Canada since the war. They perform a useful service to Canadians through social housing programs.

Mr. Fisher: Who paid for it? You would have ended that program.

Mr. Lewis: We are going to end you.

The federal government has dealt with small business in the budget. It is proposing to allocate $400 million in order to reduce interest costs by up to 4 per cent for two years on borrowing by small business to finance new investments and research and development. The criteria which were set forth in the budget papers are confusing. We really do not know whether or not a business must be going broke in order to receive assistance.

When will the Minister of Finance, the bureaucrats and the Liberal Party understand that a small business facing bankruptcy may not necessarily want to expand. Small businesses may not want to build a new building and fill it with machinery, equipment and staff in the hope that business will come in. That is how the Minister of Finance is running the country. We would all be bankrupt if we did that.

It is easy to become a small-business man under the Liberal government. You just buy a big one and wait. However, we will be saved because the Minister of Finance made a number of proposals in his budget in which he intended to refer these items to an ad hoc committee of prominent Canadians; individuals from the financial and accounting and economic community. I have no quarrel with the people who were named to the committee as I understand it at the present time. However, how could the Minister of Finance and the Liberal Party, with the very outspoken minister responsible for the status of women who claims to be doing such a great job, announce the membership of that committee without including one woman? Not one woman was named as a representative. There is no excuse for that error. The 52 per cent of our population that are women contain many highly qualified financial, accounting and economic experts. They should be represented on the committee. If the hon. member for Kingston and The Islands (Miss MacDonald)—

Mr. Kelly: Why?

Miss MacDonald: The hon. member for Scarborough Centre (Mr. Kelly) says why. He wants to know why.

Mr. Kelly: There is nothing automatic about it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis) has the floor.

Mr. Lewis: I suggest there are many competent women who can sit on that committee. Marie Josie Drouin, from Montreal, Gertrude Mulcahy, the director of research of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants, and Dian Cohen, a noted economist whom the Grits did not want in the lockup because she will not support the party line. More than one prominent Canadian was missed but mentioned later.

• (2050)

Canadians were amused to learn that the Minister of Finance consulted ex-finance minister John Turner during the preparation of the budget. The question is who should be more annoyed that this fact has been made public, the present Minister of Finance or the ex-minister? There is no question that both the finance minister and the Prime Minister have heard the footsteps of John Turner up and down Bay Street and across the nation for several months. It is no wonder they wanted to have him included in this latest fiasco. Misery loves company.

I want to go on record with respect to the ex-finance minister. The Liberal government faces certain defeat in the next federal election as a result of its repeated failures since February, 1980. Nothing would made that defeat more convincing and more sure than to have the Liberal Party led by John Turner.

In Simcoe North John Turner is known as a Bay Street lawyer who quit. In the midst of the 1975 provincial election campaign, he resigned as finance minister of this Liberal government, and who wouldn't, to make a six-figure income on Bay Street. John Turner is no saviour of the Liberal Party or Canada.

This Minister of Finance has called for restraint. At the same time as they pound their chests and brag about increasing taxes on senior citizens, federal expenditures are rising; $62 billion for 1980-81, $75 billion for 1981-82 and $91 billion for 1982-83. That is restraint. They did not dare go beyond 1982-83.

At the same time as they restrain wages and salaries, they sit stupefied while Bell Canada applies to the CRTC for a 25 per cent increase in home telephone rates and a 35 per cent increase in business telephone rates. CN/CP say they will raise the minimum rate for a telegram by 20 per cent. That is how they operate. There is evidence to suggest that they do not know how to restrain prices within their federal jurisdiction. It was a last-minute addition to the budget. The regulatory agencies which are independent still have not heard from the Minister of Finance and the cabinet as to how they are going to restrain prices to the 6 per cent of the finance minister. There is no directive. What kind of operation is that?

The Liberal government has created a crisis in confidence. Canadians no longer believe that the Liberal Party and its bureaucrats have the ability or the desire to come to grips with the economic problems facing Canada. They have watched failure after failure and have seen promise after promise disintegrate in the same manner as the November budget.

How can Canadians have confidence in a government which predicted a $10 billion deficit in November and seven months later revised it to $20 billion? There have been 36 major and minor changes made on seven different occasions. Business, labour, farmers and fishermen, as well as home owners, have been driven to distraction by the indecision of this government.

In a recent discussion with the media in my riding it has been suggested that a coalition of the three political parties be formed. I personally reject that for several reasons. A coalition government is the same as a partnership or marriage. It must be based on trust. Who trusts the Liberal Party?

Our proposals for economic recovery are well known. The Liberals have none. The Progressive Conservative Party has the trust of the Canadian people. We would be foolish to destroy our credibility through association with the Liberal Party. We have seen what it has done to the New Democratic Party.

Who wants to be associated with the Member of Parliament for York East (Mr. Collenette) who says, "Canadians have a cry-baby attitude, particularly in the Toronto area?" Who wants to be associated with the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Frith) who says, "People who expect the government to pull the country out of this mess are asking too much?" The Liberals like to pretend there are no alternatives to this disastrous course which is leading this country to economic ruin, but those alternatives do exist. I want to bring them to the attention of this House once again.

The Progressive Conservative mortgage interest and realty tax plan would have meant up to $1,500 for every Canadian family in 1982 as a reduction of mortgage interest and realty taxes. That plan would be implemented now if it had not been for the NDP.

The Small Business Development Bond criteria should be changed back to what they were when the Progressive Conservative Party introduced the concept in 1979. There should be once-in-a-lifetime interest relief to small business. The November 1981 budget should be withdrawn. The National Energy Program should be revamped. Government spending must be reduced to control the deficit and reduce interest rates.

In closing let me say that if the Liberal government does not want to follow a sensible plan of action, it should resign and make way for a government that will do something about Canada's economy, namely, the Progressive Conservative Party.

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to take part in this debate this evening. It is a very important debate on a budget that was brought forward last week by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). It is a very responsible budget, a very realistic budget, a budget that attempts to deal seriously with the problems of this country and problems faced in the economy.

It is normal to hear the opposition continue to spread gloom and doom. It is normal to hear that from the Progressive Conservative Party. I mention this because it is important that those Canadians who listen to the debates in the House of Commons be reminded of how hypocritical these people are. They are the ultimate in hypocrisy. I just heard one of their members, the member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis) go on for about half an hour, talking about the problems of the country, the problems with the economy. Then he talked about the alternatives. I tried to jot down what the alternatives were.

Mr. Lewis: I will speak slower for you next time.

Mr. Breau: I would like to have people here this evening to share with me what his great program was. I noted, that he said he would do away with the direct job-creation programs. Never mind that there are hundreds of thousands of Canadians in poorer communities, in rural areas, where unemployment is high—

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Breau: —who benefit from these programs. The Tory party, if the member from Sincoe North had anything to say about it, and I am afraid he really would, would do away with these programs.

The second thing that he bragged about was the famous Tory program—that fortunately died in December, 1979—to institute the deductibility of mortgage interest and real property taxes. Mr. Speaker, that was an unjust program when they brought it forward, when they tried to put it into law, and it would be even more unjust today. That is so, first of all, because by permitting the deduction of interest for mortgages and real property taxes, whom would they help? They would help the people who have the higher mortgages. Therefore, that means the more expensive homes.

Mr. McDermid: Nonsense. That is not true at all.

Mr. Breau: That is really the position of the Tory party. Everyone knows that, as it happened in the United States, whenever there would be a mortgage interest deductibility program, people would mortgage their homes as high as they could.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Breau: They do not like to hear the truth over there, they do not like to hear the facts about their phony programs to help the Canadian people. As to real property taxes, they would permit the deductibility of real property taxes, the member for Simcoe North says. Now, look at the facts. Where are the real property taxes the highest in the country? They are the highest in the larger cities, that is where they are high. It is in Ottawa, Toronto, Vancouver. Has anyone in the Tory party asked his Atlantic members how high real property taxes are in Atlantic Canada? They are very low. What they would be doing Mr. Speaker, is to use the federal treasury to help the rich areas of the country.

Mr. McDermid Read the legislation.

Mr. Breau: I did read the legislation, very carefully. I spoke against it in 1979. I voted against it in 1979. I would still vote against it. If you want to come to my constituency to debate it, you are all welcome. Mr. Speaker, on their mortgage interest deductibility in real property taxes, the Canadian people will not be fooled by that. It is a program to help the rich, to use the federal treasury, which the poorer areas of the country need, to help the most expensive areas of the country where real property taxes are high and where you have the most expensive homes.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Breau: If a person has a million dollar home, he would be a fool not to go to the bank and get a mortgage for $200,000.

An hon. Member: $1,500.

Mr. Breau: He would get the interest deducted and reinvest his money somewhere else. That is the kind of policy that you get from the Tory party.

Mr. McDermid: You can do that now.

Mr. Breau: The member says we can do that now. Mr. Speaker, if they are doing it now, there is no incentive for them to do that now, there is no profit in their doing it now, because they cannot deduct the expense of mortgage interest, that the Tories would like them to do.

The Liberal approach, Mr. Speaker, is to use the federal treasury, to use the resources of the country, to help the people.

Mr. McDermid: Will the hon. member accept a question?

Mr. Breau: I will accept a question from the hon. member, later.

The Liberal approach, Mr. Speaker, is to use the resources of the federal treasury on a selective basis to help the sectors, the people and the regions of the country that need assistance the most.

Mr. Reid (St. Catharines): A 10 per cent pay raise.

Mr. Breau: The other day I was in the House and I listened very carefully to the speech of the member for York Peel (Mr. Stevens). I remember quite well when that member became President of the Treasury Board and what happened, what he tried to put forward. I remember the budget of 1979 of the Tories. I remember the months before the budget of 1979. The cancellation of the Canada Works program was one of the first things they did. The second thing they did was the cancellation of the Fishing Vessels Subsidy Program—stamped out. Social housing was going to go down the drain.

Mr. Kempling: Which budget are you talking about? That was two years ago.

Mr. Breau: That was two years ago, the member for Burlington (Mr. Kempling) says. Yes, it was two years ago. But the Canadian people have long memories. There are people in this House who are going to tell the Canadian people how hypocritical you can be. On the one hand, on the same day that the member for York-Peel was speaking—

Mr. Kempling: Let us go to the people now.

Mr. Breau: —the member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) was up, crying tears for people on fixed incomes.

Miss MacDonald: That is more than you would do.

Mr. Breau: She said, "You are going to reduce indexation." Yes, I would for sure. I do not question the hon. member's sincerity. There are a few Tories on the other side who really feel what it is that the Canadian people need, that the needy people need. The problem with the member for Kingston and the Islands and some others is obviously that they have no influence with their party. That is their problem.

Miss MacDonald: That is why you are not a minister.

Mr. Kempling: That is why you never made it to the cabinet.

Mr. Breau: The former President of the Treasury Board told us last Wednesday what the policy of the Tory party was. He said that this $19.6 billion deficit is a strangler, that it should be reduced, that it should be slashed. Why? Because, he said, the market did not like it, there are people obviously in Bay Street who do not like it. Where are you going to slash it, Mr. Speaker, so as to make any kind of difference? Suppose that you slashed it to zero or to $5 billion, or slashed it to $10 billion? If you slashed it to $10 billion, which programs are you going to cut out—so that the member for Kingston and The Islands will not cry for people on fixed incomes?

Miss MacDonald: I have not noticed anyone over there crying.

Mr. Breau: The fact of the matter is that this rhetoric about high deficit, about their caring about people, is a lot of hypocrisy. When they get the reins of power they will try. The first thing they will try to do is reduce the influence of the government.

This budget is a budget that provides leadership in the economy, a budget that says that where the federal government has an influence, and direct power to act immediately in the area of wages, it will act. It will limit increases in wages to the public service to 6 per cent in the first year and to 5 per cent in the second year.

Mr. Speaker, for many people who are receiving social benefits, such as family allowances, old age security, public service pensions and so forth, indexing will be limited, as is the case for personal exemptions under the income tax system, to 6 per cent and then to 5 per cent for the second year. The government is proposing this measure, Mr. Speaker, because it is absolutely necessary to convince Canadians and the country's social and economic agents that it can be done, and that the government truly wants to bring inflation down to 6 per cent, and in order to do so, all Canadians are being asked to make a collective sacrifice.

The Liberal Party's philosophy consists in protecting our country's and our society's resources in order to help those who are most in need of government assistance. Since family allowances have been limited to an increase of 6 per cent, child tax credits will be increased by $50 as of 1982, to compensate for the resulting loss of income to low-income Canadians. This means they would suffer no loss of income as a result of the indexing ceiling on family allowances. Similarly, since old age security pensions will also be subject to a ceiling of 6 per cent, people receiving the guaranteed income supplement and therefore having no other income, will benefit from full indexation, because, although all Canadians are being asked to make sacrifices, the Liberal Party does not want the burden to fall heaviest on low-income groups. That is why people receiving the supplement will benefit from full indexation of both the supplement and the basic old age security pension.

Therefore, when the Progressive Conservative and NDP members are speading stories in the House, in the media and among the public that the government is penalizing pensioners and those whose only income is the supplement and the old age security pension, what they are saying is absolutely false, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Irresponsible!

Mr. Breau: People who receive the supplement—and I say this again because it is very important—senior citizens who are retired and whose only income is the supplement, should understand that their supplement and their basic old age security pension will not be affected. They will benefit from full indexation on January 1st and every three months, as before. Mr. Speaker, the budget contains other measures that are very important. Interest rates are high and have been for about two years. It started in 1979, then there was a slight drop in 1980. Afterwards, rates rose and dropped again in 1981, but they are rising again now. We have high interest rates because the American government has opted for a policy whose objective is to bring back all those American dollars that were financing world business. It is a fact that the American dollar has been financing a large part of the industrialized world for some time. The Americans have decided to bring back those dollars. In addition, in the U.S. budget for 1983 which has been brought before Congress, the deficit, with the approval of Congress, will be over $100 billion. Those are the two major causes of high interest rates in North America today.

Obviously, since Canada is experiencing the same inflationary pressures as the United States, there is the same incentive to keep interest rates high, because when inflation is running at 10 per cent, for instance, it is understandable that people want a higher rate of return than that on their savings, because if they agreed to a lower rate, they would be losing on their investment. The Canadian government cannot resolve this problem alone. And if we decide not to follow the monetary policy being applied by the Americans, the cost to Canada will be very high.

And the cost would be a drop in the value of our dollar even beyond that experienced during the past month. Consequently, since the government was aware that interest rates would remain high, partly because of unacceptably high levels of inflation in Canada and partly because of the monetary and fiscal situation in North America, it opted for bringing in permanent, structural changes to help the groups that are suffering the most from these high interest rates. These groups include first of all, owners of heavily mortgaged homes, a second group includes small businesses and also farmers and fishermen, in other words, people who are productive and are self-employed. The government is proposing to provide direct, tax-free cash grants of $3,000 to all first-time purchasers of new or existing homes. Small businesses wishing to expand or to purchase depreciable property will benefit from an immediate 4 per cent reduction in the rate of interest payable to the bank, which will be in the form of a cheque, a cash payment from the federal government, until this permanent policy, this structural change in the interest rate which I mentioned earlier, has become a part of our system.

The Minister of Finance has proposed a new plan for stimulating investment in residential and commercial construction, which will protect the investor from the effects of inflation. However, since the Minister of Finance wishes to ensure that the concept or philosophy behind his proposal and also the mechanism and the legal means for implementing it are accepted and understood and in order to benefit from the experience of people in the private sector, he has formed a committee of experts that is to report to him by September 30, with a view to setting up a program which, in the long term, will reduce interest rates for residential construction, small businesses, farmers and fishermen from 3 to 6 percentage points.

[English]

The proposal of the Minister of Finance to have a system of term deposits which will be insulated from inflation has not yet been understood by the public. The opposition, of course, is not interested in making sure the public really appreciates this because hon. members opposite realize how appealing and popular it will be.

While the system will be complex in its application, it is a scheme to create a new indexed term certificate which would pay the investors tax-free interest on that part of the interest which only reflects inflation. Funds accumulated in this way would be directed to purchasers of new homes and to small businesses, farmers and fishermen investing in new plant and equipment.

There will also be a new registered shareholder investment plan whereby the investor puts his money into a fund which buys publicly-traded common shares in Canadian companies. The important aspect of this is that the capital gains on the shares would be taxable at half rate as before, but only to the extent they exceed the inflation rate.

Because the Minister of Finance wants to have the knowledge and the wisdom of people in the investment community, and also because he wants this very appealing and innovative approach to be well applied to make sure that the mechanics—if I can use that technocratic word—of the system will be smooth, he has instituted a committee of experts which will report to him by September 30. Today he said that he wants this report as early as possible, but September 30 is the latest date, so that he can attempt to implement these measures in this calendar year. These are measures that the government is taking to help Canadians immediately.

Earlier I said that the Conservatives say on the one hand that the deficit is too high and on the other they propose new spending initiatives every day. When we propose to limit the indexation of some very expensive social programs—all instituted by a Liberal government—some members opposite try to play both sides of the fence while those who have power in that party—whenever they take power—say that there should be a tighter fiscal framework, that the deficit should be reduced, and that borrowing should be reduced because the stock market does not like the government to borrow too much. These members tried to play both sides of the fence. They know that ordinary Canadians need assistance from the government. They know that some regions of the country need attention from the federal government. When that party was in power in 1979, we saw how they tried to slash programs that were essential in some regions of the country.

At this point I should like to deal with an aspect of the economy and public policy which bothers me, Mr. Speaker. I am disturbed when I hear some members of the public and of the Conservative Party talk about the negative effects of the Foreign Investment Review Agency. They say that investment in Canada has decreased because of FIRA; that we should do away with FIRA or that FIRA is a bad thing. It may be a good thing or a bad thing, Mr. Speaker, I will let history decide that, but I know on which side of the issue I stand.

Let us look at the facts of the situation. When it is said that because of FIRA there is no new investment in Canada, attention should be paid to how much new capital was coming into the country before FIRA was established. When the doors were wide open, there were no screening mechanisms that would make sure that Canadians had a chance to bid on the procurement of foreign-owned companies that had their head offices elsewhere. How much new capital was coming into the country at that time? In 1970 only 8 per cent of total business fixed investment was new foreign capital in the country; in 1971 only 7.6 per cent and in 1972, 4.7 per cent. There was no FIRA at that time.

What happened was that foreign owned companies, particularly American companies—because they had a larger market in the United States, because they were larger organizations, because they were modelled on the branch plant economy—would come to Canada, take over a Canadian company and make it into another branch plant. In most cases they were coming to Canada and borrowing money from Canadian banks in order to take over Canadian companies or to start new ones. In 1970 there was 8 per cent new direct investment; in 1971, 7.6 per cent; in 1972, 4.7 per cent; in 1973 5.1 per cent and in 1974 4.2 per cent. The idea that, if FIRA were disbanded, all of a sudden there would be new investment coming to Canada, is not true. Instead, American companies, in particular, would continue to come to Canada, buy companies with money borrowed from our banks, probably because they could convince the banks in those days that they had better management expertise or probably because of the volume of business they had in the United States.

One of the things that FIRA does is assure that, with a new corporation or with a take-over, Canadians will have a chance to bid on the procurement of the company. Formerly a lot of American concerns in particular, would come to Canada and not even give Canadians a chance to bid on Canadian companies. Surely we cannot accept that.

When people talk about the horrors of FIRA I wish they would look at the facts and see how much new investment was coming to Canada as a percentage of Canadian business investment in those days. The figure was not impressive. Foreigners were using their management expertise to convince our banks that they were better than Canadians so that they could borrow Canadian savings from Canadian banks.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, in concluding, I wish to emphasize that the government is determined to move this country from the world of 12 per cent inflation to the world of 6 per cent. To achieve this, we shall all have to make sacrifices. The federal government is acting immediately in an area over which it has direct jurisdiction, namely, the federal public service including federal members, senators and ministers, whose salaries will be increased by only 6 per cent instead of 11 per cent, and by 5 per cent the second year. In the federal public service the same rules will apply. The government also expects the private sector, which since August, September or October, when inflationary pressures started to be felt in Canada, has been telling the government to show some leadership, to show that it is capable of reducing inflation. I hope that these ladies and gentlemen will understand the government's message and realize that the government means what it says. I hope the private sector will follow the government's lead and reduce wage increases to more sensible levels. Of course I expect the New Democratic Party and the unions to protest loudly that it is unfair to set a 6 per cent ceiling on salary increases in the federal public service.

We should, perhaps, remember that the vast majority of federal employees, I would say 90 per cent, have complete job security. Whether the economy is in good shape or bad, these people keep their jobs. It is a different story for people working in the private sector. There, people are laid off—I agree that in some cases, it is for a very short period, but in many cases, these are permanent lay-offs, Mr. Speaker. The New Democratic Party will always say it is unfair. Of course, but whom does the New Democratic Party represent? It represents the big unions. It wants people in the public service and in the private sector who have strong unions to go on having extravagant wage increases of 10, 11, 12 and 13 per cent, and others working in the private sector who are losing their jobs and have to live on unemployment insurance for part of the year, to be satisfied with no increase at all, in some cases. And that is what is happening in the real world today. So, Mr. Speaker, when the New Democratic Party talks about social and economic justice, we must not forget the people it represents. In Ontario for instance, it supports the United Auto Workers, a union that is claiming that despite the fact that there have been wage reductions or ceilings on wage increases in the automotive industry in the United States, in Canada they are not prepared to make such concessions. These people will continue to negotiate for 10, 12, 13, 14 or 15 per cent. Who is going to pay the shot, Mr. Speaker? People working elsewhere in the private sector, who, in some cases, are not unionized and have to live on unemployment benefits for part of the year. They will have to work to pay the wages of people who have jobs—I do not begrudge them that—just because they have big unions and work in safe industries. In fact, they work 35 or 37 hours a week and would scream at working 40 hours, while other Canadians have to pay for their wage increases. So, Mr. Speaker, the federal government must lead the way in this respect, and that is what the government has proposed to do in last week's budget. That is why this budget deserves the support of Canadians and of the House.

[English]

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member said he would entertain a question at the end of his speech, and he is nodding his head affirmatively.

I know he is an honourable gentleman and would not want to mislead the House. He talked about borrowing money on your mortgage and increasing it to $200,000 to get the deductibility under our plan, and then investing it somewhere else. Well, you can do that now and write off the interest up to whatever the amount of the investment is. The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) has changed that to $10,000 of interest, and it comes into effect on January 1, 1983. Does he not admit that that already can happen, that people can borrow on their mortgages, invest the proceeds and write off all the interest?

Mr. Breau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member obviously did not understand my argument. I did not mislead the House nor did I intend to. The record will show that what I said was if you have a mortgage interest and real property taxes deductibility scheme in the system, that would be an incentive to home owners, particularly the richest ones with the most expensive homes in the most expensive areas of the country, to go out and borrow money and deduct that from their ordinary income and invest it elsewhere.

Mr. McDermid: They can do that now.

Mr. Breau: You cannot do that now unless you are doing it for investment purposes only, Mr. Speaker, and you cannot do it on your ordinary mortgage. The Conservative scheme would permit the deductibility of real property taxes and mortgage interest and would be an incentive for people to use that money, not for investment but maybe to go on a trip around the world or perhaps buy some property in Florida. So, Mr. Speaker, the Conservative scheme was designed to help rich people in rich areas of the country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Does the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) rise on a point of order?

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, without intending to cut into my hon. friend's time, would the previous speaker entertain a very short question?

Mr. Breau: Yes.

Mr. Riis: The hon. member during his speech indicated the equity and fairness in the government's guidelines for public service wage settlements. Was my understanding correct that he said he considered it to be fair that a person making $15,000 a year was going to have his or her increase limited to 6 per cent, and similarly the people making $60,000 a year and up were also going to be limited to a 6 per cent increase? Is that what he was referring to as being fair and equitable?

Mr. Breau: Mr. Speaker, I did not use only the figures that the hon. member did, but I said that the system the government had designed was a fair one because in order to start being selective about what increase you would give at what level, as we did with the Anti-Inflation Board—which the hon. member's party opposed in any event—but for this kind of system which applies to the federal public service only and is not intended to be a comprehensive wage and price control program, where there is no Anti-Inflation Board to look at every contract that is negotiated, I say that this is a fair system. I would rather that all government programs and all government initiatives be applied more equitably. Equity is a good and laudable objective, but this kind of program was designed to be administered very simply. It is simply an extension of contract at a given time, and in order to be selective, as the hon. member says, in order to achieve more fairness, it would have meant a bureaucracy such as we had with the Anti-Inflation Board, which would be undesirable.

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, surely what we are debating here this evening, as we have been since the budget and as we will be for the next few days, is more than a question of a budget per se. Rather, it is the whole question of a crisis of confidence that the Canadian people have in this government. It is this total lack of confidence which Canadians feel because the government cannot do anything toward achieving a reasonable solution to the problem of interest rates, or the falling dollar. I have never seen anything in my constituency which has unsettled Canadians as much as seeing and hearing daily about the state of our dollar. While not everyone understands the reason for it, it certainly has had a tremendously destabilizing effect on the confidence of Canadians in our institutions. It was a restoration of confidence, Mr. Speaker, as much as anything else, that most Canadians, along with us on this side of the House, were looking for and hoping for last Monday night. Obviously that has not occurred. Canadians just do not think this Liberal government is managing the economy the way it should. Economists do not think so and most writers of newspaper editorials do not think so.

It is this crisis of confidence, Mr. Speaker, that we should be addressing this evening in our debate because it has the greatest potential to do damage to this country. If Canadians generally start to lose faith in their government, they really have no other place to turn to, and this is what is happening at the present time. We see this crisis of confidence and the fact that it was not addressed in any way in the budget, and we also see little things starting to seep out of the government, the cabinet and the bureaucracy which heighten this crisis. Small things in terms of dollars, but large things in terms of the destabilizing effect they have on the public's view of their politicians. As has been noted before, things like the 10 per cent increase given to political assistants of cabinet ministers shortly before the cabinet brought down its budget limiting pay increases to 6 per cent and 5 per cent. This is the kind of thing which has a damaging effect on the fabric of this country, and it is the kind of thing which people are going to remember for a long time. They feel the government has been hypocritical and is maintaining a double standard. That has had as damaging an effect on ordinary Canadians as anything I can think of.

Certainly, Mr. Speaker, other countries are in trouble. But if you look at the figures, Canada is suffering more than most, and certainly more than it should. We have a fantastically tremendous potential, and it is literally going down the drain because there is absolutely no economic direction from the present government.

We have a great potential and we are not using it in any way, shape or form in the way we should. Personally I think, and more people are thinking this way, that the government has set Canadians up for wage and price controls this fall. In my opinion, there is absolutely no doubt that this is what we will have. The scenario is there. The government has indicated to the public sector, a sector that it can control if it wants to, that it is imposing limits on the public service. The fact that labour unions do not appear to go along with the government will give the government leverage to return in the fall and bring in wage and price controls.

I think literally we will have the worst of all possible worlds if the scenario I have painted takes place. We are beginning very slowly to see the American economy starting to come out of its prolonged recession. Housing starts last month were up just a little, but they were up. Automobile sales were up just a little, but they too were up. There is some indication that items such as copper, which is used extensively, in cars and homes, is starting to increase in price in terms of building its own base-price mechanism on the commodity exchanges. But I fear that we will find ourselves—because the government has no idea where it is going and has no economic direction—in a situation this fall that while the American economy starts to move up and move out of the recessionary period, we on the other hand will find ourselves locked into wage and price controls that will be totally unacceptable.

Traditionally this country has been approximately six to nine months behind the American economy. It is the structure of the economy and the proximity we have in terms of the amount of trade we have with the United States, and they with us, that has put us in that general category. At the present time, we are about 18 months to two years behind the United States with regard to an economic upturn. I am worried that as the American economy comes out of its recession late this fall Canada will go into a wage and price control situation and that when we finally come out of this wage and price control period we will be in such a poor competitive position because the economies of central Canada will literally be in a shambles. The only thing we will have to export in any great amount will be our agricultural products, specifically and primarily grain from western Canada. That is a very bleak scenario. However, I am almost assured that it will take place. I think it will be disastrous for the country. It will be the wrong direction for us to go, but nevertheless it will be something that all Canadians will have to learn to live with in the future.

What are we looking at presently? What are we looking at in terms of the economy? What are we looking at in terms of a fiscal overview? We have heard lots of charges and counter charges in the debate on the budget over the last few days. Revenue projections for this year have fallen from the November forecast, and these are the government's own projections, of $65 billion to $58.6 billion. The expenditure projections have increased from $75.5 billion to $78.1 billion. As a consequence, the projected deficit has jumped from $10.5 billion to $19.6 billion, or just about $20 billion. Those figures have risen in the space of just seven months. These are the projections which the government made at that time.

The projected financial requirements have jumped from $6.6 billion to an astounding $17.1 billion. The worrisome part is that this $19.6 billion deficit is only an estimate. It is based on the fact that the third and fourth quarter figures, which usually fall, will pick up. I do not think this will happen. I would like to see it happen, but there is absolutely no indication that it will. That is why I believe the concept or the scenario of wage and price controls will, unfortunately, become a self-fulfilling prophecy. The deficit will probably be in the neighbourhood of $25.1 billion rather than the $19.6 billion that we have been told will be the case according to the present budget.

Over the past number of months we have seen the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) castigating the United States for the size of its deficit, the handling of its economy and the fact that most of what is happening to us is the fault of the United States. If, however, you take into consideration the size of the projected U.S. deficit of approximately $100 billion and you also take into consideration that the United States economy is about ten times larger than the Canadian economy, and if you project that on top of what we have as a deficit of about $20 billion, and if the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and Liberal cabinet ministers were running the U.S. economy, they would be looking at a deficit of $200 billion plus.

Mr. Regan: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Murta: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will at the end of my remarks.

Because the United States economy is some ten times larger than our economy we would be looking on a per capita basis at a budget deficit of $200 billion if we were operating the American economy. This deficit will have one immediate dramatic effect. It will drive up interest rates. It is another question in terms of a crisis in confidence. Canadians saw interest rates reach all-time highs this past winter. We have seen interest rates drop. They did not drop as much as we had hoped they would but they have eased somewhat. In my opinion, we are about to see interest rates move up again because of the borrowing that will have to take place. This borrowing will have to take place not only because of the Canadian deficit but also because of the U.S. deficit. The demand for money in the marketplace is fuelled basically by governments going to borrow. This borrowing will have a tremendous effect in terms of pushing up interest rates at a time when most Canadians are keeping their fingers crossed hoping that interest rates will ease and drop. We have truly a very bleak picture for our economy. Admittedly, it is bleak for other countries, but in comparison it is probably worse for Canada than for any other country in the world. That is evidenced by the kind of confidence that outside investors have had in this country, for instance, the way the market has discounted the dollar against other currencies and a number of other things that have happened.

We are in for a very long, dark and dismal economic situation at the present time. The budget projections for the economy—and these are the minister's own projections for this fiscal year—indicated in November, a few months ago, that in 1982 the real growth in the economy would be approximately 2.2 per cent and that employment would grow approximately 1.6 per cent. We were told that the unemployment rate would be about 7.8 per cent and that inflation would rise to 11.7 per cent. In less than seven months the Minister of Finance returned and told us that we would have a drop in the real GNP of about 2 per cent, almost exactly what he forecast, the worst record of any OECD country, and that the unemployment rate would be 10 per cent. He also indicated that despite the oil glut and lower than expected food prices, inflation would remain at approximately 11 per cent. In the November budget, inflation in the United States was projected at 8.7 per cent, and it ran at 7.2 per cent in the first five months and at 6.7 per cent in May, compared with 11.8 per cent in Canada. This is one of the main reasons we are seeing our dollar drop, and it will be another reason for seeing interest rate increases. We are not in the same league with most other major producing and exporting countries of the world.

The projected negative growth rate in the economy of minus 2 per cent is the worst since 1946, so no wonder Canadians do not have confidence in the government, in the Prime Minister, and in the Minister of Finance who really do not know the direction in which they are heading.

If one looks at the over-all budget, there are winners and losers as there are in any budget. I suppose the winners, if one wants to call them that, would be low-income couples with children and single parents who would have been receiving the refundable energy tax credit for two years. They will benefit from the $50 increase per child in the child tax credit, but this will be partially offset by the indexing of family allowances and income tax brackets. With somewhere between $12,000 and $15,000 of earned income, even these people end up being net losers.

Another winner would be small businesses which are able to finance scientific research and the purchase of depreciable property. They would benefit from the rebate of up to 4 per cent on interest rates, but basically it is a partial restoration of the Small Business Development Bond that was gutted by the Minister of Finance in his November budget.

Farmers on the verge of bankruptcy can also obtain loans and partial interest rate rebates to help them survive, but most of this money comes from funds which would have gone to farmers in positions to expand production. Even with the small business development bond concept, we will not find at this time many takers.

If one expands one's business, to whom will one sell it? Canadians do not have the confidence right now to purchase appliances, cars or homes. If they have money or any surplus in their disposable income, most of it will go into savings because they are not sure and are concerned about where we are going.

Basically that ends the short list of beneficiaries in this budget. The losers include virtually every taxpayer—all married taxpayers without children and all married taxpayers with children earning more than $12,000 per year. These people will pay more as a result of the partial deindexation of the income tax system. This will mean $1.7 billion in additional personal income taxes to the federal and provincial governments in the remainder of 1982-83 and in 1983-84. That takes in a lot of Canadians, virtually all Canadians.

Another loser will be old age pensioners who are ineligible to receive the guaranteed income supplement. As an example, single people with total incomes above $8,500 per year and married couples with total incomes above $14,300 per year will receive $80 less per person or $160 per couple in 1983-84 because of the 6 per cent cap on indexing in 1983 and the 5 per cent cap in 1984.

They may also have to pay more income tax because of the partial deindexing of the income tax system. Meanwhile upper-income earners, people who earn more than $30,000 per year, continue to enjoy the full benefits of reductions in marginal tax rates in the November 12, 1981, budget. All high-income earners and employers will also likely be hit with a substantial increase in unemployment insurance premium rates. Low-wage federal public sector employees will also be losers. They will be subjected to the same restraints as those in the upper income ranges who will retain the benefits of the November reductions in marginal tax breaks.

Who else will lose? One group is the native people because the spending of government in this regard will be reduced by some $80 million over the next two years. This is spending by government on economic development for native people. It will mean higher social costs in years ahead to meet the needs of this group, perhaps the most economically disadvantaged in the country. While it appears we are saving $40 million a year on one hand, the cost could very well be much greater than that in the next two years.

The huge increase in borrowing requirements will translate into further downward pressure on the dollar and further upward pressure on interest rates. This will mean higher prices and delayed recovery, hurting both consumers and the unemployed. Virtually everyone in the country loses because of the budget. The people who could be considered winners are not really winners because they do not have the confidence they should have in the Minister of Finance, in the Prime Minister and in cabinet.

To sum up, the budget contains no measures to provide job creation or to stimulate lagging consumer demands. There are absolutely no projections in terms of unemployment or what we are to expect in coming months. There are no projections in terms of wages. The budget provides no projections in terms of investment. There are absolutely no economic indicators for 1983 to give Canadians, money markets, stock markets and investors some indication as to where we are going.

The budget is also sadly lacking in that it does not instil confidence in Canadians. Until that takes place we will find ourselves wandering aimlessly as a country, a country which at one time was viewed as one of the centrepins of economic stability with a good standard of living, a country which in the last few months and years has come under a cloud of suspicion as more and more people ask whether Canadians know what they are trying to do, whether they know the economic direction in which they are going, or whether the government really cares. That is the saddest part about the budget. It indicates to all Canadians that the government really does not care.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Trinity (Miss Nicholson), but I also note that it is ten o'clock. Possibly the intent of the hon. member is to ensure that she will be recognized the following day. Whatever may be the case, it is ten o'clock and I will wait to hear from the hon. member for Trinity.

Miss Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, I would be pleased to call it ten o'clock and to continue tomorrow.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing the House that the Senate has passed Bill C-115, an act to establish a national program for occupational training, without amendment.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

AIRPORTS—COSTS OF DORVAL. (B) POSITION OF AIRLINES

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, on May 28, at page 17869 of Hansard, I asked the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) a number of questions relating to the rumours that were then circulating about a transfer of domestic air traffic from Dorval to Mirabel. This question had already been broached in the House by my colleague for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) as well as other members who also raised this very matter.

The matter of concern on both sides of the House was a proposal to shift from a self-operating and self-supporting airport which was actually making money—Dorval—to one which is limping and had been limping along for a number of years. The obvious intent was to spread the blessings somewhat—perhaps not blessings—which may be making them both run into the red, being one of the problems.

There is not enough time to go into the history of Mirabel this evening. I think perhaps you know about it as well as I do, Mr. Speaker, so I will not go into the history. However, some of the related matters are of considerable interest.

One of the questions I put to the minister on that occasion was whether any of the domestic airlines had literally asked to be moved from Dorval to Mirabel. The answer to the question was no, there were none. Not one domestic airline had asked for the privilege of moving from a well operated airport which had all the communications with the rest of Canada very well organized. Not one operating firm asked to be moved to the other airport.

At about that time there was an article in the Gazette following a press conference given by the Minister of Transport. I believe he was in Montreal at a ceremony connected with the port of Montreal at that time.

The press had asked him a few questions about Mirabel. He then outlined that there seemed to him to be only two alternatives. One was to transfer all Dorval flights to Mirabel except for flights within Quebec and flights to Toronto; presumably to and from, but I am not sure about that. The newspapers only say "to". I wonder if it is clear to everyone what this would mean. It would mean that all internal flights in the province of Quebec would go to Dorval and that flights to and from Toronto would go to Dorval. All other flights headed for Montreal and area would land at Mirabel. I do not know whether you have had any experience with Mirabel in landing from overseas flights, for example. I certainly have.

We were delayed on departure from the other side of the ocean and I suspected, because of the forecast arrival time, that when we arrived there would not be any transportation. We were to arrive at approximately 11.30 or twelve o'clock at night. I sent a note to the captain of the aircraft and asked if he would be kind enough when he was in voice contact with Mirabel to arrange for a bus to be waiting to take those of us who were bound for Ottawa from Mirabel back to Ottawa. This was a chartered flight. Happily I did that. When we arrived at Mirabel, there was not a single transport vehicle in sight; not a taxi, not a bus. The parking lot was empty as well. We could not even have stolen an automobile on that occasion. The bus was waiting. The bus driver was not too sure how to get to Ottawa, except by going to Montreal and then on to Ottawa. He could have cut across country, but he was not familiar with that route, and maybe he did not want to cut across country at that time of night. There were eight, ten or twelve of us on that flight who wanted to come to Ottawa. That was two years ago. To this day I do not know how the people got to Montreal. They may still be trying to get to Montreal by their thumbs.

I see, Mr. Speaker, you are signalling that there is a time problem. I can appreciate that.

I made a suggestion as to how to avoid involving the Canadian people in expenses of that sort. The minister strikes me as being very much like Mr. Micawber, the eternal optimist who thinks that something is bound to show up. In his press conference he said it might be possible the resulting increases from Mirabel would bury the issue. He was hoping that the decision could be delayed, primarily because the government was waiting for an upturn in the economy. This is where the "Mr. Micawber" aspect of the minister comes in. The minister might even conform to the G. K. Chesterton definition of Mr. Micawber when he said:

—the preposterous and sublime victory of the human spirit over circumstances.

He felt that perhaps the human spirit was great enough, perhaps a little bit like the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). It is catching because they sit across the aisle from one another. He feels that circumstances will improve matters and it will then be feasible to move the traffic from Dorval to Mirabel.

I would draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that Mirabel stands as the forty-seventh airport in Canada as far as traffic is concerned, while Dorval is in the neighbourhood of fifteenth. It has maintained that position over the last three or four years. By comparison, Vancouver is second or third, and Victoria is twelfth or fourteenth. Victoria still does not have radar.

I suggested to the minister that rather than transferring the traffic and incurring another debt, he might use the funds he was planning to use for the transfer to instal radar at Victoria international airport. The thirteenth or fourteenth airport in Canada could then enjoy the benefits of that facility.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Despite the fact that we have gone well beyond the hon. member's allotted time, I think it is incumbent upon the Chair to suggest that there may be a conflict for the Chair in regard to this subject matter. My interest in the remarks of the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) should perhaps be explained in that way.

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): I guess, Mr. Speaker, that explains why you allowed the hon. member to go a full ten minutes instead of the normal seven.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order. The hon. member is not correct. If he will notice the time, the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich began at 10.01 and completed his remarks at 10.08.

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, I accept the correction. The point the minister made in his answer to the hon. member's question is quite clear. It is very difficult to calculate the economic costs of the proposed transfer of flights from Dorval to Mirabel. Nonetheless the minister committed himself to making public the cost benefit study done by his department when he announces the cabinet's decision on the future of Montreal airport. As the hon. member knows, the minister has now submitted his views to his cabinet colleagues and he expects a decision to be made in the next few weeks.

• (2210)

As to the possibility of installing radar at Victoria airport, using funds not spent at Mirabel, two points should be made here to the hon. member. The first is that radar is already scheduled for installation at Victoria.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): When?

Mr. Flis: As the hon. member is aware, from correspondence with the minister, and I hope he reads his correspondence, Victoria is specifically identified in the department's plans for radar modernization. Until radar is installed, Victoria is adequately covered from Vancouver, and through a dedicated advisory service at Victoria.

The second point I would like to strees is that it is wrong to assume that a pot of money will suddenly become available if the government decides not to transfer flights from Dorval to Mirabel. On the contrary, should the decision be taken to make the transfer, one of the major considerations will be where to find the necessary funds. There is an almost unlimited demand on the limited funds available for airport improvement across the country.

The opposition deplores the great deficit, but, when it comes to a local project of interest in an individual member's riding, there is always great enthusiasm for more spending. The hon. member might recall the expenditure at Victoria airport last year on an instrument landing system amounting to a total of $1,644,600. That was spent right in his own riding, Mr. Speaker. Let us not hear specifically from that member, deploring the great deficit while at the same time wanting millions and billions for his riding.

THE ECONOMY—FOREIGN EXCHANGE CONTROLS—GOVERNMENT POSITION—REQUEST THAT SPECIAL COMMITTEE EXAMINE ESTIMATES

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Mr. Speaker, on June 21 I had an opportunity to put two questions to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin), Acting Prime Minister in the absence of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). One question was with respect to any potential intention of the Government of Canada to impose foreign exchange controls. Another question related to an examination of the estimates by a special committee of the House.

In response to the first question, which I thought had some significance, the minister suggested that I discuss the matter in the debate which was to follow that day. The fact of the matter is that the question was raised because of an unsatisfactory response by the Prime Minister to a similarly worded question by the hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) a week earlier.

Since the date of that initial question and the unsatisfactory response, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian dollar has been consistently bombarded and reduced substantially in level of value vis-à-vis the American dollar, to the extent that it dropped below where it was earlier today. That decline has not been substantially remedied. I would have thought that any Prime Minister, or Minister of the Crown acting as Prime Minister for the day, would have relished the opportunity to dispel any concept that this country had become a banana republic, imposing foreign exchange controls where its own financial control had gone completely awry. That opportunity was not taken, much to my dismay and, I am convinced, to the dismay of many Canadians who might have feared that their opportunity to convert Canadian dollars into other currencies would come to an end very shortly.

In any event, since that time the minister has introduced his budget. Once again, fortunately, there was no provision for foreign exchange controls therein. If we wish to protect the value of the dollar, surely it is incumbent upon government to indicate in a very clear and unequivocal fashion to the general public that it has not sunk to the level of those states which have lost control of their financial affairs.

The second question I asked was a legitimate question, designed to take from this House and submit to a committee of the House the opportunity to examine the estimates. You and I know, Mr. Speaker, that there are members on the government side, just as there are members on this side, who are personally aware of waste and extravagance in government expenditures with which they would very much like to deal in an effective manner. They cannot deal with them in an effective manner in this House; they could have in a committee. Not only are there specific illustrations of waste but there are also circumstances in which, with prudence, expenditures of government may in fact be cut. I would have hoped that process might have got underway.

A multitude of substantial expenditures were approved in the budget of November, 1981, and again confirmed in the most recent budget, which, in my view, are the last vestiges of the days of wine and roses of this government. To spend $1.724 billion on foreign aid, and in the current budget to proclaim that these expenditures should increase by some $36 million—that appears at page 16 of the budget papers filed by the Minister of Finance—is reprehensible, having regard to the fact that those same budget papers make provision for the reduction in old age security payments of $5 million this year and $100 million to our senior citizens next year.

Because of this country's economic circumstances the time has come for the government to recognize that its primary obligation is to the people of Canada. If there are in fact excess funds available, those funds should be allocated to Canadians. We can no longer enjoy the luxury of spending our money in a foolish and reprehensible fashion. The Canadian public is aware of the circumstances which face them daily when they lose their businesses, their homes and their farms. If funds are available, and the government makes up its mind as to what funds are available, I think the funds should be used within Canada.

A closer examination of a variety of projects might be undertaken, but we are denied that opportunity because the government is fearful that if it refers such matters to a standing committee of the House for examination, the committee would produce a report which would be meaningful and result in the reduction of expenditures.

If the government really intends that people should lower their expectations, I submit it is the obligation of the government to do the same. It should not increase taxes; it should not increase expenditures; it should lower its own expectations. The public learns better from example than from exhortation, and that example has not been provided.

Mr. Douglas Fisher (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure for me once again to be able to say that the government has no intention of bringing in foreign exchange controls. We do not intend to adopt that kind of magical solution in any of our economic approaches to Canada's current difficulties. In fact, in our budget we have stressed that we want to take a disciplined, long-term approach to Canada's inflation problems.

If we look at page 3 of the budget papers, we discover what has been happening to currencies all over the world between 1979 and June 24, 1982. In that period the Canadian dollar declined against the American dollar by 7.8 per cent, but other currencies declined against the American dollar as well. Let me give some examples.

The British pound declined 9.6 per cent; German money declined 9.5 per cent; the Japanese yen declined 13.9 per cent; the franc declined 16.7 per cent; and the Swiss franc declined 15 per cent. Currencies all over the world have declined in value against the American dollar. In fact, Canada's currency declined the least during that period.

Why is this decline going on at all? First, it is happening because Americans have come to grips with their domestic inflation, and there is less erosion of money inside their country. Capital from all over the world is attracted by that characteristic. Second, the United States has continued a policy of very high interest rates, and that acts as a second magnet. We ask Canadians to realize that exchange controls and other magical answers will not respond to that. We need the long-term discipline underlined in the budget to battle inflation and to bring down our own interest rates.

CANADIAN RADIO-TELEVISION AND TELECOMMUNICATION COMMISSION—RATE INCREASES GRANTED TO BRITISH COLUMBIA TELEPHONE COMPANY. (B) EFFECT OF COMPANY LAY-OFFS ON UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE FUND

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I want to raise the question of B.C. Tel and its flaunting of both the unemployment insurance program and the CRTC. On June 30 I requested that the government, through the Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox), instruct the CRTC to withdraw a substantial portion of the rate increases granted to B.C. Tel over the past two years. I asked this because B.C. Tel is planning to lay off over 2,000 employees throughout B.C. for up to six months. This will allow its services to customers to deteriorate even more seriously than they have already.

The CRTC has always made as a condition of rate increases the improvement of service to customers. I must criticize the CRTC repeatedly. For example, not very long ago I pointed out to the CRTC that it was taking this company over 30 days to meet the demand for new installations. But the service has not improved, Mr. Speaker, and now it will worsen even further as a result of the lay-offs.

B.C. Tel flaunts the CRTC and makes a mockery of it. It knows that the 2,000 employees are essential if it is to fulfil the charge that the CRTC has made upon it. It has admitted this, but as long as it can get rate increases, why should it worry? It flaunts the CRTC's instructions to improve service and it has been doing so for years. I call upon the government, through the Minister of Communications, to roll back the rate increases to B.C. Tel and I hope to hear that this is exactly what the government is going to do.

The B.C. Tel profit picture bears examination. At the very moment it announces this mammoth lay-off, it declares a dividend to its shareholders of approximately $13 million. Its total dividend payout for 1982 will be about $23.8 million, yet it claims that due to "economic conditions" it must lay off workers and deprive consumers of service.

It is odd that in the July 26 issue of The Financial Post Jack Shriner is quoted as saying, at the Pemberton Securities seminar, that only four B.C. companies are in good health and one of these is B.C. Tel. Yet a rate increase of 15 per cent has just been granted to B.C. Tel and service will become even worse as it short-changes consumers and lays off workers to the tune of a saving in wages of approximately $30 million.

My second question in this regard was directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy), who should be concerned about the whole caper since it is an assault on the UIC as well as on the CRTC.

The other day in the House the minister said that both employers and employees contribute to UIC, so the federal government has no responsibility if it is being abused. What absolute nonsense. The government is always very concerned if an individual abuses the UIC. It is always checking individuals to see if they are abusing the UIC. But a private company can lay off 2,000 or more workers for up to six months and the government says it has no concern. Apparently this is not regarded as an abuse of UIC. The government's only concern is with abuses by individuals, not possible abuses by private companies.

Apparently in the minister's mind, what is good for B.C. Tel is good for Canada. I think it is time the minister woke up to the possibility that by the unnecessary lay-off of workers, private industry is not only depriving consumers of services but is actually abusing the unemployment insurance program.

I hope to have answers to these two questions tonight. Why have rate increases granted by the CRTC over the past two years not been substantially reduced, since B.C. Tel is constantly flouting the CRTC, and why has the Minister of Employment and Immigration not been concerned about the possible abuse caused by this deliberate and unnecessary lay-off of employees at B.C. Tel?

There is a third question I have not yet raised and did not raise in the House. Perhaps the parliamentary secretary cannot reply to it tonight, but in case he has looked into the matter perhaps he could also tell the House whether or not in his view the Canada Labour Code has been circumvented with this minimal six-week notice of lay-off which B.C. Tel gave its employees. Is six weeks the correct length of time or should it not, under the Canada Labour Code, have been substantially longer than that?

Mr. Jack Masters (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the question posed by the hon. member raises two issues: the relationship between the level of service quality and rate increases approved by the CRTC; second, B.C. Tel's recent announcement regarding the lay-off of some 2,200 employees.

As you may know, service quality has been a central issue in the last several rate case-proceedings. Since the CRTC took over the job of regulating the telephone companies, it has spent considerable time and effort to develop suitable service level objectives for all of the carriers it regulates. The commission has been very persistent in encouraging B.C. Tel to improve its performance where necessary to meet these new objectives.

In its decision 81-3 in January, 1981, the commission stated that the approved rates were "predicated upon the expectation that adequate service quality will be available to subscribers while those rates were in effect and that the minimum acceptable level of service quality will have been achieved by the fourth quarter of 1981."

In its next rate decision, 82-5, issued in May, 1982, the CRTC again addressed the issue of service quality. The commission noted that while certain service standards had improved, others had not been met. In considering what action to take regarding rate increases, the commission noted that the company suffered a considerable work stoppage as a result of a strike by the TWU and that this may have delayed some expected improvements. However, since the company has not attained the required level of service quality, the commission granted lower rate increases than would otherwise have been the case.

Miss Jewett: Fifteen per cent.

Mr. Masters: It is clear, then, that the commission in its very recent decision has already held down rate increases as an incentive to improve levels of service quality. I believe that this action by the CRTC is just and reasonable both to the company and its subscribers, and provides the appropriate incentive to company management to work toward raising service quality to levels set by the commission.

With respect to the issue of the proposed lay-offs by B.C. Tel, I must say it is indeed unfortunate that this situation has developed. Certain business sectors, particularly in B.C., are heavily dependent on the U.S. market, and the downturn in these sectors has now severely affected B.C. Telephone as its revenues have suffered a sharp and continuing decline, particularly in the long distance and local service areas. Growth generally has been very slow, but in May the total number of telephones actually declined. Fewer long distance calls were made in May, 1982, than in May of the previous year. This is the first time this has happened since the end of World War II. My understanding is that there is less work for B.C. Tel employees to perform and there are significantly less revenues coming in.

Miss Jewett: That is not true.

Mr. Masters: Company management has explored a number of alternatives in an effort to deal with this situation and maintain the financial stability of the company. As a result, a work-sharing proposal was put forward to all employees, both management and union. The proposal, involving a reduction in the work day, was accepted by management employees but rejected by the TWU. It is now an issue between the company and the union and I sincerely hope it will be resolved to the mutual benefit of all involved.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock in the afternoon.

At 10.29 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

VACANCY IN REPRESENTATION FOR TIMISKAMING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, the riding of Timiskaming in northern Ontario has been without representation in the House of Commons for six months since the tragic accidental death of Bruce Lonsdale. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

That the Prime Minister set a date immediately and call a bye-election so the people of Timiskaming can have a Member of Parliament to represent them.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

BILINGUALISM

SENDING OF PUBLIC OFFICIALS TO FRANCE FOR LANGUAGE TRAINING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo-Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, recently the hon. member for York East (Mr. Collenette) was quoted as saying that Canadians, particularly in the Toronto area, have a cry-baby attitude with regard to the recession and recent budgets. What the hon. member and his colleagues fail to understand is that, if Canadians are crying, they are shedding tears of rage and frustration caused, for example, by such actions as sending the likes of Ed Clark of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources to Paris on a year's sabbatical, and Ms. Janet Smith of the Privy Council Office to the south of France for four months to study French, both at the expense of the taxpayer, at a time when the government is cutting the incomes of old age pensioners. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor):

That the government start listening to what Canadians are really saying and cut wasteful and extravagant spending such as that mentioned in the examples above.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FITNESS AND AMATEUR SPORT

CONGRATULATIONS TO PARTICIPANTS IN ONTARIO GAMES FOR THE PHYSICALLY DISABLED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Bud Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. This week world class athletes will be competing in Sarnia. The Ontario Games for the Physically Disabled will commence July 8. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Don Valley East (Mr. Smith) and, I am sure, by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) and the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans):

That Madam Speaker be directed by this House to forward congratulations to all participating athletes and organizers of this splendid event.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: The House may want to applaud the motion, but I cannot put it to the House.

PETRO-CANADA

LOAN GUARANTEE TO DOME PETROLEUM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas Dome Petroleum has massive debts, which are reported to be up to $7.7 billion, and seems to be selling off assets even in Canada, including ships—one of them from Davie Shipbuilding in Quebec—and whereas it has been suggested that a large Calgary law firm has prepared a bankruptcy proposal for presentation to the federal government, which has probably already been presented, and whereas the federal government has just guaranteed a $100 million loan through Petro-Canada for Dome Petroleum, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Young):

S.O. 43

That this House instructs the government to make public any bankruptcy or bail-out proposals put to it by Dome Petroleum and reminds the government that it is not the objective of Petro-Canada—at least that the Canadian people can see—to guarantee loans to private companies and, finally, that if there is to be a bail-out provision for Dome Petroleum, the Canadian people, through Petro-Canada, get equity in the company.

DOMINION DAY

CELEBRATION EXPENSES—CHEQUE RETURNED BY VILLAGE OF BELLE PLAINE, SASK.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Madam Speaker, on Thursday, July 1, Dominion Day, residents of the village of Belle Plaine, in the constituency of Moose Jaw, handed me a $1,250 Government of Canada cheque which they had received to celebrate Dominion Day and asked me to deliver the cheque and a letter to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), which I intend to do later this afternoon, asking for the government's resignation. In view of the serious concern expressed by the citizens of Belle Plaine with respect to the budgetary deficit of almost $20 billion, and the failure of this government to exercise fiscal restraint, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gustafson):

That the government immediately cancel all give-away programs, work toward a balanced budget and build up a feeling of optimism and confidence in our country so it will not be necessary to bribe citizens to celebrate Canada's birthday in future years.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

FINANCE

CALL FOR REDUCTION IN TAXATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Len Gustafson (Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. As a result of the Devine PC government recently elected in Saskatchewan, the consumers of Saskatchewan now enjoy the cheapest gasoline prices in Canada. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That the Minister of Finance take a positive lead from the Saskatchewan government and begin to reduce non-productive taxation of the consumers of Canada which, in turn, would stimulate the sagging economy of this country.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

TRIBUTE TO AIRMEN WOUNDED BY BURNS IN WORLD WAR II—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, 170 Canadians were among the over 700 Allied airmen who suffered severe burns during World War II and who did thereafter volunteer their assistance and co-operation on a continuing basis to the study of burn treatment methods and techniques. Forty of those 170 Canadians are to be honoured today and tomorrow in Calgary at a special reunion of that Canadian Wing of what is now called the Guinea Pig Club. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for London-Middlesex (Mr. Bloomfield):

That this House join in the tribute honouring those 40 veteran airmen and commend them for their unselfish dedication in the interest of their country and medical science.

PUBLICATION OF NEWS OF GOOD TIDINGS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Hudecki (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, I move the following motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43, seconded by the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Weatherhead):

That the attention of the print media in Canada be directed to the confidence building measures taken by a Canadian magazine called "Today" in publishing 115 best things about Canada judged by world standards, about which Canadians can boast. Such positive factual information is long overdue in order to balance the indifferent reporting so commonly practised.

HIRING OF TEMPORARY EMPLOYEES BY REVENUE CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, I should like to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Recently the Minister of Labour circulated employers across Canada urging them to eliminate overtime for their employees in order to share all the available work and so reduce unemployment. At the same time as the Minister of Labour was making this appeal, Revenue Canada was hiring temporary employees who were told that they would only be employed for 18 weeks even if they had to work overtime to finish their work. The only possible purpose for such a directive was to prevent these employees from qualifying for the unemployment insurance benefits they would be entitled to if they had worked for 20 weeks. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie):

That the Minister of National Revenue be instructed to direct his department to rescind that very unfair decision which is so detrimental to the rights of the employees hired to process income tax returns.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

GRAIN

UNITED STATES PROPOSAL TO LOWER EXPORT PRICES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. There is a threat of a grain price war if the United States government goes ahead with its export credit buy-down program that would subsidize commercial credit rates by up to four percentage points. This move would have, as its ultimate effect, the lowering of grain prices for all grain exporting countries. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That Canada communicate its concerns at once to the United States Department of Agriculture and that Canada, in conjunction with other grain exporting countries, impress upon the U.S. administration that a lowering of grain prices will not necessarily sell more grain but will only sell grain at lower prices, causing hardships for producers in all exporting countries.

THE ROYAL FAMILY

COMMISSIONING OF GIFT TO CELEBRATE BIRTH OF PRINCE WILLIAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, according to a recent media report, as Canada's official gift to Britain on the birth of the Royal baby, Prince William, the Government of Canada commissioned a distinctly Canadian gift, a sculpture of an Indian woman noted for her devotion to motherhood. However, for unknown reasons, this gift was commissioned not from a Canadian artist but one from Trenton, New Jersey, in the United States. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis):

That the government make sure that preference is given to Canadian talent and Canadian expertise when such decisions are made in the future.

TRANSPORT

URBAN TRANSPORTATION ASSISTANCE PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Forty-seven per cent of Canada's total petroleum consumption is in the transportation sector, and 20 per cent of Canada's total petroleum consumption occurs within urban boundaries. Reasonable and significant reduction in petroleum consumption can be achieved through proper urban public transit. The Urban Transportation Assistance Program terminates next year, and if discontinued will seriously affect the ability of provinces and municipalities to provide suitable mobility for their citizens, as well as failing to take advantage of the possible decreases in need for imported oil. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper):

That the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources ensure that the Urban Transportation Assistance Program be continued and strengthened to benefit Canadians who live in urban areas, to benefit the Canadian economy, and to benefit energy self-sufficiency.

EXCHANGE VALUE OF DOLLAR

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, the loss of $2.3 billion in Canada's foreign exchange reserves last month, almost equivalent to our total reserves, demonstrates the total failure of the high interest rate policy of the government in defending the Canadian dollar. Since Canadians cannot afford to lose another $2.3 billion, and we certainly cannot afford the high interest rates which are killing many of our industries, has the Minister of Finance any new proposals for the House to head off the impending fiscal and monetary crisis?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, of course the hon. member again has used false terms in describing this situation when he talked about the loss of currency. That, of course, is an error; it is wrong, a mistake, misleading, and totally false. I have pointed out more than once that when U.S. dollars are spent from our reserves, Canadian dollars are acquired. These dollars become part of our cash balances and are used to finance the requirements of the government. To call them a loss is an error that the hon. member ought to get out of his head.

Mr. Wilson: I suppose the minister is going to tell us that the $2.3 billion spent to support the Canadian dollar was not spent, that it stayed there all on its own, and that the high interest rates which have been kept much higher than they should have been by the minister's policies were not high at all—they were just low, low, low, in comparison to the United States. He knows interest rates in this country are two or three percentage points higher as a result of his policies.

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, since there is some speculation in the markets today to the effect that the government is going to call in the IMF to bail it out, would the minister state whether or not any approaches have been made to the IMF and whether or not this is an option the minister is holding as an ace in the hole?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Absolutely not, Madam Speaker. That allegation is as inaccurate as the hon. member's first question. There is absolutely no intention and there has been absolutely no contemplation of any such action. We have substantial holdings of foreign exchange at the present time in the amount of almost $3 billion. We have access to $7.5 billion U.S. in the form of standby credits. In addition to that we have gold reserves in our foreign exchange holdings with a market value of almost $7 billion U.S. So why go to the IMF, I wonder.

Mr. Wilson: Because it would be the ultimate cop-out on the part of this government, because it does not have policies to deal with the situation.

QUERY RESPECTING POSSIBLE INTRODUCTION OF ALL-EMBRACING CONTROL PROGRAM

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, clearly the budget has been a flop, a disaster, and has done nothing to restore the confidence needed in the marketplace to get the economy turned around. Is the minister considering the possibility, as the President of the Treasury Board and some government backbenchers have indicated, of a full-blown control program for wages, prices, profits and foreign exchange, sometime in the fall when the budget he brought forward has proven to be the disaster that it is?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member was wrong on his first question, he was wrong on his second question, and he is wrong on the third.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

RAILWAY FREIGHT RATES—APPLICATION OF GOVERNMENT GUIDELINE

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In the minister's budget speech last Monday night he said that price increases for services provided under federal jurisdiction would be restricted to the 6 per cent and 5 per cent two-year guideline. Since transportation was specifically mentioned, can the minister tell the House whether railway freight rates will be restrained to that 6 per cent and 5 per cent level, since there is a clear perception in the minds of the public that that is what the minister intended?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, what I intended to say was that the government expected the regulatory agencies, in establishing rates in the various fields mentioned, including transportation and communications, would observe the 6 per cent and 5 per cent rule unless justification existed for a contrary course of action. That is the policy, and it will be implemented in various ways by the government.

ROLE OF CANADIAN RADIO-TELEVISION AND TELECOMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, I am sure the minister knows that the CTC does not regulate freight rates. They are merely filed and published. Is the minister intending to bring in legislation to effect the 6 per cent and 5 per cent guideline?

Furthermore, since public communication was specifically mentioned, can the minister tell the House whether he intends to instruct the CRTC to limit the latest CN-CP Telecommunications application, which is calling for increases at the level of 25 per cent to 30 per cent? Is the minister going to ask the CRTC to restrict those increases to the 6 per cent and 5 per cent guideline level?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, we have already indicated to the regulatory agencies, including the CRTC, that we wanted the 6 per cent and 5 per cent guidelines to be observed. As I mentioned yesterday, in the normal course these boards will examine applications and make their findings. If in their conclusions they exceed the 6 per cent or the 5 per cent rate, then it will be up to the government to determine whether any such abridgement of the rules is justified. If it is not justified, it will be overturned where the law permits the government to do so.

Mr. Mazankowski: Madam Speaker, we would be very interested to know how this will be implemented inasmuch as many of the regulatory agencies do not have that residual power in legislative form to dictate what the rates will be.

REACTION OF PROVINCES TO GUIDELINE

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, I would like to address another supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. Inasmuch as the minister is calling upon the provinces to invoke similar action with services which are provided under provincial jurisdiction, what sort of response did the minister receive from the provinces in the recent meeting held last week as a result of his budget? Are the provinces going to comply with the minister's suggestion that the 6 per cent and 5 per cent guideline should be followed in those services which are provided under provincial and/or federal jurisdiction?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I regret that I cannot throw light on that question because I was not present at the meeting between the Prime Minister and the premiers of the provinces.

INSTRUCTIONS TO REGULATORY AGENCIES

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I want to follow up on the questions which the minister has been dealing with concerning the important matter of prices. Could the minister tell us whether the cabinet has sent quite specific guidelines to all the federal regulatory agencies to ensure that prices will be kept, in terms of increases, within the 6 per cent limit? More specifically, can the people of Canada rest assured that Bell Canada's rates will not go up more than 6 per cent; that CN's and CP's train tickets and Air Canada's plane tickets will not go up more than 6 per cent, and that that institution endeared by every Canadian, the Bank of Canada, will be forced to hold its increases within the prescribed rates laid down by the government?

• (1425)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the general policy was established in the budget speech. The hon. member has asked whether a direct instruction or a direct message has been sent to the regulatory agencies. That is in the process of being done at the present time, with specific indications as to the expectations of the government. I believe the hon. member would agree that where Parliament has provided for due process in establishing prices, that due process ought to be observed in such a case as Bell Canada, for example.

Mr. Broadbent: The government did not wait to see if the men and women who work as public servants in the country would voluntarily negotiate contracts within the 6 per cent limit the government deemed desirable, and it brought in legislation to control those increases.

QUERY RESPECTING INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION GOVERNING PRIVATE SECTOR

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, since we have seen the bill—it has been tabled already—which sets a ceiling on wage and salary increases in the public sector, when can we expect a bill to be introduced which will set the same kind of precise, enforceable ceiling for price increases within federal areas of responsibility?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member spoke about volunteerism, or that the government did not wait for workers to accept voluntarily wage improvements of 6 per cent and 5 per cent, and of course that would be the preferred approach. We will be meeting with representatives of organized labour later this week, and if there is any indication that there would be a voluntary acceptance of 6 per cent and 5 per cent, then of course that would be another matter and a very much preferred option for the government.

REQUEST THAT LEGISLATION BE INTRODUCED TO CURB PRICE INCREASES

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I hope the minister will at least deal with the question this time. We are talking about prices now. No one in the House is under any illusion about what the government intends to do in terms of controlling the incomes of ordinary Canadians, but we would like some fairness when it comes to prices. Will the minister assure the House that the government will bring in a bill which will ensure that price increases within federal jurisdictional authority will be held within the 6 per cent limit?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I believe our approach is to use every possible lever at our disposal to ensure that a 6 per cent and 5 per cent regime will operate in the Canadian government and its agencies with respect to the costs that were mentioned in the budget. It is not intended to introduce legislation to achieve that, because there are considerable ways in which that can be developed within the current system.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF PARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION FROM JAMAICA

Madam Speaker: May I draw the attention of the House to the distinguished presence in our gallery of a delegation of parliamentarians from Jamaica which is led by Mr. Granville Williams, Parliamentary Secretary, Minister of Labour, Public Service.

THE BUDGET

ALLEGED ABSENCE OF ADEQUATE MEASURES TO CURB PRICE INCREASES

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, I also have some questions for the Minister of Finance, since the answers he gave just now were far from clear. If I remember correctly—perhaps the minister will agree that I am right, unlike my colleague whom the minister accused of being wrong three times just now—the November budget was based on the principles of equity and justice. How can the minister invoke these principles today, when he is putting a ceiling of 6 per cent on wage increases for federal employees and is unable to give us the assurance that the same ceiling will apply to price increases, particularly those made by fedeeral agencies? In the circumstances, could the minister inform the House whether he still believes in or supports the principles of equity and justice with respect to people who are being penalized because of a lack of sufficient measures to control price increases?

● (1430)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Yes, Madam Speaker, I take it for granted that the hon. member also subscribes to the principles of equity and justice. I do. Yesterday his leader stated that the proposals which we made with respect to wage restraints, in his view, were a step in the right direction. I wonder if the hon. member shares the view of his leader on that point. I did not hear his leader suggest that we bring in an over-all system of price controls, which seemed to the implication in the hon. member's question.

[Translation]

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT TAKE JUSTIFIABLE SALARY INCREASES INTO ACCOUNT

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary.

This is not the first time the minister has failed to answer a question. He knows perfectly well that Canadians are very worried about the possibility of price increases. Yesterday the minister, in referring to federal agencies and Crown corporations, said that in cases where there was sufficient justification, the matter would go before the regulatory body, which would determine whether or not there would be an increase. If inflation does not go down to 6 per cent next year, could the minister inform the House whether he is willing to justify, before the regulatory body, wage increases that are now subject to restraint and have been reduced by the budget? Is the minister prepared to reconsider wage increases on the same terms as a price increase that would seem to be justified?

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, it is our conviction that if we get the co-operation of all the partners in the economy it will be possible to bring down price increases to 6 per cent. That is a possibility that can be achieved if we do receive the co-operation that is required. Then, of course, the impact of all these changes that have been mentioned, including the wage restraint, will be minimized as we get ourselves into a 6 per cent world of recovery, rather than remain as we are now in a 12 per cent world of stagnation and recession.

Mr. Broadbent: You have really got that phrase down pat.

FISHERIES

NATIVE FOOD FISHERY PROSECUTIONS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo-Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. It concerns the western fishery. On May 10 the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development held hearings in Vancouver, British Columbia. During the testimony we heard from native people that over the last several years the department has had 66 court cases involving the native food fishery and lost 64 out of those 66 cases. Would this not indicate to the minister that there is something dreadfully wrong with his native food fishery policy in British Columbia?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I do not accept the hon. member's arithmetic without checking it very carefully. There is no doubt that these are cases which are very difficult to prove, and in some cases witnesses have been subject to intimidation. However, my feeling is that the Fisheries Act is there to conserve the species and the fishery and also to allow the native food fishery to be pursued properly and legally by those who want to respect the conditions under which the permits are given.

Mr. Greenaway: I am sure that the figures will check out. I do not think that the fact that 64 out of 66 cases have been lost says much about the lawyers in the Department of Fisheries and Oceans.

BAN ON SALMON SPORTS FISHING IN UPPER FRASER AND THOMPSON RIVERS

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo-Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question concerns the freshwater salmon anglers in British Columbia. The minister will know that for the last three years there has been a total ban on salmon fishing in the Upper Fraser River watershed and the Thompson River. Yet, Saltwater fishermen are allowed a bag limit of 30 salmon per year. Why can the minister not allow freshwater anglers—there are only a few of them—to catch a small percentage of salmon, instead of having the whole load of conservation dumped on them? Why can he not take some of the bag limit away from the saltwater fishermen and give some to those who angle in fresh water?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, the problem of allocation between those who use the resource is one which we recognize always has immense difficulty. However, the matter which the hon. member raises is one where the fish have moved beyond the commercial and native food fishery barriers and are practically on the spawning grounds. Of course, when this occurs the requirement of escapement and spawning must be the priority.

We have consistently tried to respect the needs of all groups. There are some cases where this presents a difficulty, and the hon. member has underlined one of them.

PUBLIC WORKS

CONSTRUCTION OF MONTREAL AREA POSTAL DEPOT

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works. I want to thank him for the letter I received about a half hour ago in which he acknowledged that indeed problems had occurred in the Montreal area postal depot but they were in the process of becoming resolved.

Will the minister go a step further and give the House some specifics? Could he inform us whether the cost increase of $210 million for the construction of the postal plant, which is the difference between the $61 million estimated at the time of project approval and the $271 million paid out by March, 1979, was due entirely to inflation, or were there other causes?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, without notice of those specifics which I asked the hon. member for in the letter to him, I have no way of commenting on the accuracy of them this afternoon. But if the hon. member, a minister in the former government which was nine months in office in this country, was interested in that question, why did he not bother himself to talk to his colleagues to find out what those facts were?

Mr. MacKay: I anticipated the minister would give me an answer like that.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE INVESTIGATION

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, would the minister confirm that, as of last November, some time since we left office, there were still some 6,500 change orders of the contract unresolved, that out of these orders 200 cases were subject to criminal investigation, and finally, that the investigation led by Sergeant Whitson of the commercial crime squad of the RCMP was called off by government order?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): No, Madam Speaker, again without request for specific information and without notice of the facts—or supposed facts—introduced by the hon. member, I could not confirm that. Hopefully I will not have to confirm, and hopefully, if the facts as introduced by the hon. member are incorrect, he will apologize.

MIRABEL LAND COMPANY—INQUIRY WHETHER RENT CEILINGS WILL BE APPLIED

Mr. Robert Gourd (Argenteuil-Papineau): Madam Speaker, further to the government's excellent proposal aimed at getting inflation finally under control and keeping it down to 6 per cent, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works, responsible for administering the Canada Lands Company (Mirabel) Limited.

Could the minister inform the House whether he intends to recommend that the company put a 6 per cent ceiling on rent increases at Mirabel?

[English]

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I doubt that the terms of the mandate of the Mirabel Land Corporation, being a subdivision of the Public Works Land Company, falls within the definition of the administrative body in the statement made by the minister. However, in order to follow the spirit of the government initiatives in this area, yes indeed, I have already communicated with the land company and I have confirmed that in the case of commercial and agricultural leases the 6 per cent and 5 per cent rule will be adhered to voluntarily and, as far as residential properties are concerned, of course that corporation in that jurisdiction is governed by provincial legislation, and we will honour the provincial laws as we do in all jurisdictions.

Oral Questions

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PURCHASES FROM CANADIAN COMPANIES—DEPARTMENTAL POLICY

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence, who, I am sure, is not used to receiving questions of an economic nature. Does his department play a part in the government's efforts to stem the flow of capital from Canada during the current recession when unemployment, bankruptcies, and interest rates are at an all-time high and the dollar is at an all-time low? Specifically, does the Department of National Defence, as a matter of policy, buy its goods and services, wherever possible, from Canadian companies?

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, it is always interesting to listen to questions on defence from NDP members, especially since their policy on defence seems to be pretty vague. In any case, as far as this economic question is concerned, I can inform the House that in all defence-related contracts and undertakings that come under our jurisdiction, whether purchasing or contracts, we always try to maximize Canadian content. That is the Canadian government's policy.

INSURANCE CONTRACT WITH UNITED STATES COMPANIES

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the minister why the Department of National Defence contracts the Serviceman's Income Security Insurance Plan, a plan which would involve some 40,000 members and tens of millions of dollars, from American-owned companies? Will the minister commit himself at this time to reopening that contract, and limit the bidding to Canadian companies?

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I was expecting this question, since the matter had been raised by the hon. member in a motion under Standing Order 43 some time ago. I can only say that the contract was awarded a few years ago, under the public tender system, and that although the headquarters of some insurance companies are in the United States, most of these companies have branches in Canada and employ Canadians.

THE ECONOMY

REQUEST THAT TAX INCENTIVES BE INTRODUCED TO INCREASE PRODUCTIVITY

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. As the latest OECD report pointed out, Canada rates fifteenth among industrial nations with regard to annual rate of increase in productivity, a situation which must be very materially improved if we are to be able to sell our manufactured products in competitive world markets, and stop the serious decline in our economy at the present time. Would the Prime Minister and the government give very serious consideration to introducing generous taxation incentives, to be paid in direct proportion to increases in productivity, as a means of persuading Canadian producers that it will be worth their while to invest the very large amounts of money usually necessary to buy the needed machinery, production systems and new plants required to increase productivity, and thereby reduce costs and selling prices and, as a result, increase sales, production and jobs?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, on previous occasions the hon. member has indicated his interest in increased productivity and he will recall some of the answers given by the various ministers and myself to the effect that the problem of productivity is not quite as simple as the suggestion makes it seem. I do not have the list of 15 to which he refers, but I am sure that if he looks at the list he would find some of our strongest and most important competitors way down low on the list, and that relates to the age of the economy and the fact that some economies were rebuilt after the war and they have more updated machinery. There are many explanations for that. As to the suggestion of tax incentives, the hon. member will realize, of course, that there are incentives in the corporate tax structure for companies to invest in equipment, and that is their purpose.

LEVEL OF PRODUCTIVITY

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, one does not have to look around the world to find out that Canada's progress in productivity is a very sorry one indeed, that our rate of increase in productivity, year to year, was formerly relatively good, but it has steadily decreased year by year, until it is now something of which to be thoroughly ashamed, forgetting all other countries, just examining Canada as a country on its own.

Would the Prime Minister not agree that the incentives which he has mentioned, which are very hard to recognize, have been ineffectual in the job that they should have done to increase Canadian productivity, and will he not constructively look at the possibility of doing something a whole lot better, which could be done, and has been done in the past, and can be done by him and his government if they want to do it? Would he please give consideration to that constructive thought?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I point out to the hon. member that in his first question he suggested that we rank fifteenth.

Mr. Hees: We do.

Mr. Trudeau: In his second question he said that we should forget about all other countries and look at Canada on its own.

Mr. Hees: I did not. I said we are bad, no matter what.

Mr. Trudeau: He should make up his mind.

Mr. Hees: Madam Speaker, I said we were disgraceful, no matter what other countries are doing.

EXTERNAL AID

REQUEST THAT PROGRAMS BE REVIEWED

Mr. Ron Stewart (Simcoe South): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance, whose 6 per cent society brings austerity to centre stage in this House, especially on the backs of public servants and pensioners. Concurrently, foreign aid, much of it dubious, such as mega-millions to Algeria for a monument to socialism at a 10 per cent rate, a sweetheart loan to the Soviet Union for a gas pipeline, and loans, grants and gifts to communist-leaning nations, is growing at an alarming rate. Within two years, despite the piddling little bit that was in the budget—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stewart: —the cosmetic cuts announced in his budget, the total program will eclipse $2 billion, and then $2.5 billion by 1985-86.

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Stewart: Yes, I have a question, and it is simply this: will the minister assure this House and the people of Canada that his department will review the so-called aid programs and eliminate all those outside the purview of humanitarian and emergency relief until such time as we Canadians can put our own house in order and then extend charity beyond our borders?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, as I understand the hon. member's question, he is suggesting that we review our total foreign aid program and eliminate all its projects with the exception of humanitarian and emergency assistance. If that were implemented, I gather that it would involve almost the total dismantling of our foreign aid program because a very high proportion of the foreign aid program is not humanitarian nor of an emergency nature. It is intended to assist in the economic and social development of other countries. Therefore, I do not believe that the hon. member's suggestion would be supported, even by hon. members in his own party. I certainly hope it would not be supported by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

Mr. Stewart: May I add economic reasons as well, Mr. Minister, economic and humanitarian, but not wasted money on communist countries.

INCREASE IN AID

Mr. Ron Stewart (Simcoe South): Can the minister justify his nickel and diming of the farmers and home owners of this country? Can he justify the high interest rates? He takes away the indexing from pensioners, yet foreign aid is indexed. It is indexed at .05 per cent of the GNP to .07 per cent of the GNP by 1990. We are wasting $100 million on loans for statues.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Stewart: How about grants of $78 million to Tanzania? Mr. Minister, does the 6 per cent society belong only to Canadians?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, as I understood the hon. member's second question, he began by a special request that we somehow cease our commercial relations with communist countries. I believe that if he thought about it a little bit, he would understand that our commercial relations—

Mr. Lalonde: No wheat sales?

Mr. MacEachen: —with the Soviet Union, for example, are extremely important, that our sales of wheat are of great benefit to farmers, and that all of these aspects would have to be considered before adopting what I would regard as a very irresponsible suggestion by the hon. member. I believe that most of his colleagues are rather embarrassed at his questions this afternoon.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

THE ECONOMY

ROLE OF PROVINCIAL AGENCIES IN CURTAILING PRICES

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister and it is identical to the one directed by my colleague, the hon. member for Vegreville, to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Lalonde: Out of order.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): It is the same subject area.

Mr. Lalonde: It is the same question he says.

Mr. Speyer: What commitments has the Prime Minister received from the provinces with respect to regulatory agencies and the provinces' jurisdiction to curtail prices within their own jurisdictions?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I did not hear the question through all the noise, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Speyer: Since last Wednesday what commitments has the Prime Minister received from the premiers of the provinces to regulate their own agencies with respect to prices within the provincial jurisdictions?

• (1450)

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member and some of his colleagues have missed a little of the thrust of the discussion I had with the premiers. Indeed, the motive of the budget itself is to try to get all Canadians to co-operate in establishing a lower rate of inflation. We have given that example by bringing forth legislation which will be before the House for discussion very soon. I have asked the premiers—as I asked the parties opposite—if they would like to see inflation come down to 6 per cent rather than stay up at 10 per cent or 11 per cent. They are suggesting regulatory means which can be used. The Leader of the New Democratic Party was suggesting controls on prices and so on. The House should understand that we are not attempting to do it that way. We are trying to get Canadians to understand that 6 per cent inflation is better than 12 per cent inflation, and that 6 per cent inflation can only be reached voluntarily if people co-operate. Otherwise, there will have to be legislation. That is the message we are trying to get across.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

POSITION OF PROVINCES ON CONTROLLING PRICES

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, as the Prime Minister knows, the Minister of Finance gave a very specific undertaking that the federal government would ask the provinces to take similar action. What commitments did the Prime Minister receive on Wednesday, or since Wednesday, that action will be taken to control prices within provincial jurisdiction of provincial regulatory bodies? What commitments did he receive?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, several provincial premiers discussed the subject at our meeting last Wednesday. They indicated that in some cases it would be very difficult, because costs of regulated industries are going up very high. Of course, the point I am making is that if we can bring inflation down to 6 per cent then costs will not go up so high. And if we are to bring inflation down to 6 per cent in a voluntary way, it does call for leadership not only from this government but from the provincial governments. The first place to try to do it is in the cost structure, the prices, the salaries, the wages to the public sector. If we can do this, then we will have gone a very long way indeed to bringing prices down. That is the sequence in which you do it. Otherwise, you bring in controls, you forget about voluntary restraint, and you say that it cannot be done because Canadians do not believe in freedom, that they must be regulated.

THE CHARTER OF RIGHTS

APPLICATION TO COLLECTIVE BARGAINING FREEDOM

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): My question is also to the Prime Minister. Madam Speaker, last week the government tabled Bill C-124 which removed the right to strike and bargain collectively from the Public Service for two years.

Last year our party attempted to have these rights included in our new Charter of Rights. At that time we were told by the Acting Minister of Justice that the government's position on the suggestion that there be specific reference in the Constitution to freedom to organize and bargain collectively was that "that is already covered in the freedom of association that is provided already". Could the Prime Minister tell us how he justifies breaking his new Charter of Rights? Or has he celebrated Canada Day by turning our new Charter of Rights into just another piece of scrap paper?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, surely the hon. member in asking his question should reflect on the fact that there are many areas where the right to strike does not exist in Canada, and it does not exist in many other countries. That does not mean that there is not freedom of association. The right to strike is a right which is given in special circumstances. The member's very own party has frequently voted against that right to strike when we take it away in a particular strike, when it is necessary for the common good.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PUBLIC SERVICE

EFFECT OF CONTROLS LEGISLATION ON WOMEN EMPLOYEES

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, I believe it was a question of collective bargaining, not the right to strike, that was the matter in question.

My question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. The minister knows that most lower wage earners are women and therefore they will be the most hard hit by the government's 6 per cent curtailment of the cost of living indexing. These are increases that many single parents need to put food on the table.

Even more serious is the fact that women, through this legislation in Bill C-124, will in effect lose all their bargaining power for equal opportunities in the work force. Does the President of the Treasury Board believe that this bill will curtail their bargaining for affirmative action, for equal pay for work of equal value, for maternity leave benefits, and for health and safety measures essential in these times of high technological change? I want to ask him also is this what the minister wants. Does he want to curtail equal opportunities for women? Will he withdraw this bill in order to enforce the Charter of Rights, which supposedly is to guarantee equal opportunities?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, with respect to the preamble to the question and the reference to the 6 per cent, as the Minister of Finance has said, and as the Prime Minister has just said, the intention is to bring inflation down to 6 per cent next year, in which case no one will suffer. That is the whole thrust of this approach regarding increases, as the hon. member knows.

With respect to the other aspect of the question, as it relates to equal pay for work of equal value, it was certainly not my intention in introducing this legislation to deprive working women—or for that matter, working men—who might be discriminated against under Section 11, of rights that they would have under the Human Rights Act. That is not the intention. The bill, of course, is subject to legal interpretation, but I can assure the hon. member that that is not the purpose of it.

In addition to that, I would hope that during this period when the right to strike is suspended, the National Joint Council will continue its deliberations; that in each department the management-union teams will continue to work out mutually satisfactory solutions in such instances as conditions of health and safety in the workplace, and so on.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

EXTERNAL AID

CONSTRUCTION OF NATURAL GAS PIPELINE FROM SIBERIA TO WESTERN EUROPE

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of International Trade, following on that which was put by my colleague, the member for Simcoe South. Is the Canadian government, or any of its agencies, supplying, directly or indirectly, any financial aid to the Soviet Union for the construction of a natural gas pipeline from Siberia to western Europe? If it is, could the Minister indicate the extent of that aid; and indicate how such aid benefits Canadians?

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of State (International Trade)): Madam Speaker, I am not aware of any Canadian Company bidding on a present contract to supply a natural gas pipeline in Siberia.

REPORT OF FISCAL ASSISTANCE

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, that was not my question. It is my understanding that at least a quarter of a billion dollars of fiscal aid is being supplied to the Soviet Union, to assist the Soviet Union in the construction of that natural gas pipeline. Would the minister look into it and report to the House at the earliest opportunity, as to the details. While he is doing so, would he also look into the circumstance that the Government of North Vietnam has shipped one half million political prisoners from South Vietnam to work on the construction of that pipeline? Would he indicate how that is—

Mr. Lalonde: What would you do about it?

Mr. Nielsen: I hear the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources ask what I would do about it. I know what I would do about shipping one half million, or one half billion, political prisoners from one country to another, assisted by Canadian financing. Would he please look into the matter and report to the House at the earliest opportunity?

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of State (International Trade)): Madam Speaker, as I said in my original answer, I am not aware of any Canadian companies providing assistance, financial or otherwise, for the natural gas pipeline. I am aware, as are hon. members of the House, over five years, a Canadian consortium of western businessmen, Quebec businessmen and Ontario businessmen has been bidding on a sour gas plant which will create about 8,000 or 10,000 jobs in Canada.

THE ECONOMY

SIZE OF GOVERNMENT DEFICIT

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Thunder Bay-Atikokan): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance, and it has nothing to do with the magnificent trade surplus this month—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McRae: —which the opposition has not mentioned. It has to do with the belief of a lot of Canadians that our deficit proportionately will be double the American deficit. Has the minister looked at the OECD figures yesterday, which indicate that the American deficit will be something like $147 billion, and also at the effect of that deficit on the very, very small saving ratio or gross fixed investment that the American government has, as compared to Canadian growth fixed investment or the gross savings ratio?

• (1500)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I have indeed looked at the OECD figures and have seen its estimates of the proposed deficit in the United States. I believe the hon. member is aware that some forecasts of the gross national product in the United States are very optimistic in their magnitude and that that affects many of the comparisons. However, I point out, as the hon. member has mentioned, that the savings rate in Canada is substantially higher than in the United States. It is in excess of 13 per cent, and on any comparison this country can finance its financial requirements and its deficit more easily than can the United States, if one takes the comparison between financial requirements and gross domestic savings. That is a fact that is often overlooked in comparing this country with the United States.

PETITION

MR. McKINNON—CELEBRATION OF CANADA'S 115TH BIRTHDAY

Madam Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has laid upon the Table the two hundred ninety-second report of the Clerk of the Petitions stating that he has examined the petition presented by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) on Monday, July 5, 1982 and finds that it meets the requirements of the Standing Orders as to form.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. SARGEANT—REPLY OF MR. LAMONTAGNE DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order arising out of the answer I received today from the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne). I have information which shows that with respect to the Canadian Forces insurance program the lowest bidder was in fact Confederation Life, which company did not get the contract, contrary to the claim made today by the minister.

Madam Speaker: Order. That is not a point of order. I am sorry, I cannot hear that.

PRESENTATION OF FIRST AND SECOND REPORTS OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. Thomas H. Lefebvre (Pontiac-Gatineau-Labelle): Madam Speaker, I have the honour of tabling the first and second reports of the Special Committee on Standing Orders and Procedure.

PETITIONS

MR. MITGES—EFFECT OF BILL C-103

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to submit a petition today on behalf of a number of residents in the riding of Grey-Simcoe and adjacent areas condemning Bill C-103, as I do, because it allows for a huge ongoing increase in the price of gasoline to consumers. The petitioners do not oppose a modest tax, but it is felt that through Bill C-103 the tax increases proposed place a totally unnecessary burden that is completely unwarranted.

MR. BRADLEY—RECONSIDERATION OF GUN CONTROL LEGISLATION

Mr. Bud Bradley (Haldimand-Norfolk): Madam Speaker, I have the honour and duty to present a petition on behalf of my constituents. The purpose of this petition, signed by 843 constituents of mine and individually submitted to me by groups from the Dunnville, Lowbanks, Port Rowan, St. Williams and Simcoe areas, is to indicate to the government the great concern of the petitioners about the implementation of Bill C-451, which deals with gun control. The nature of the petition is to ask our government's insistence that this bill not be approved, as the petitioners feel it would infringe upon the rights and privileges of law-abiding citizens who own and use guns for legitimate purposes.

The petitioners hope, Madam Speaker, that in your examination of their petition you will find it in order, sense its urgency and allow its reading in the House.

MR. DOMM—PACE OF METRIC CONVERSION

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, it has been brought to my attention that there are a number of federal ridings across Canada collecting petitions and that they have found it increasingly difficult to get hon. members on the government side to present them to the House. So it is my pleasure at this time to present a petition signed by 883 petitioners from ridings across Canada represented by government Members of Parliament in the hope that their plea that the pace, degree and nature of change to System International, metric, should and must be determined voluntarily in the various sectors of trade and industry by the individual firms or industries directly concerned and with minimal government intervention. It is their hope that these petitions will be reviewed, and they wish them to be presented to Your Honour at this time.

MR. FULTON—SALE OF NUCLEAR MATERIAL TO ARGENTINA

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I rise to present a petition to the House. It is signed by residents of the Queen Charlotte Islands including Tlell, Sandspit, Tartu Inlet and Queen Charlotte City. The petition expresses concern about Canada's continued use of nuclear reactors and the sale of nuclear fuel bundles to Argentina. It also calls on the government to stop the testing of weapons on Canadian soil.

In light of the reckless decision of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) yesterday that the Liberal government will allow the nuclear deal with the military dictatorship in Argentina to go ahead, we trust that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) will instruct the Secretary of State for External Affairs to cancel the project immediately. Canada should not be exporting this kind of material to a country which has the record Argentina has and which publicly espouses the use of the Candu reactor for military purposes.

MR. FLIS—POLAND—POSTAGE OF FOOD AND MEDICAL SUPPLIES

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, it is my duty to table on behalf of 956 Canadians the following petition: That the government permit postage-free or postage-reduced deliveries of packages and parcels that contain food and medical supplies to Poland while that country is under martial law. Such an arrangement would speed up delivery and, to some degree, alleviate the hunger and pain experienced by the people of that country.

The petitioners hope Your Honour will find the petition in order and that the appropriate ministers of the Crown will consider this request.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 4,220 and 4,241.

[Text]

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION—CODE OF CONDUCT

Question No. 4,220—Mr. Crosby:

1. Under what specific written legal authority was the code of conduct for employees of the Department of Employment and Immigration prepared, established and enforced?

Order Paper Questions

2. Does the (a) President of the Treasury Board (b) Prime Minister approve and condone the code for employees of the department?

3. Are the employees of the department subject to different rules of conduct than employees of other departments and, if so, for what reason?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): 1. Section 7(1)(f) Financial Administration Act; Section 106 Public Service Terms and Conditions of Employment Regulations.

2. (a) and (b) not applicable since authority lies with deputy head.

3. Generally, Canada Employment and Immigration Commission/Department employees are subject to the same rules of conduct as are employees in other departments; however, under the authorities noted in part (1) above, each deputy head may establish rules of conduct or standards of discipline which more specifically and precisely relate to his/her departmental organization and operations.

QUEBEC STUDENT LOAN PROGRAM

Question No. 4,241—Mr. Herbert:

1. What amount was paid or is estimated to be paid in the fiscal year 1981-82 as alternative payments to Quebec under the student loan program?

2. Are the payments conditional and, if so, what are the conditions?

3. Does the government require that all Quebec students have equal access to the Quebec student loan program and, if not, does any other government initiative attempt to ensure that there is no discrimination by course of study, university of student, residency requirement or language?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Secretary of State): 1. The amount was $17,452,507.63.

2. A province must operate a provincial loan program and so notify the minister in order to qualify for an alternative payment. Section 12(1) of the Canada Student Loans Act specifies this condition.

3. The terms and conditions of a provincial loan program are entirely within the jurisdiction of the province concerned hence the federal government does not require any particular eligibility or mobility conditions. As far as the government is aware, all Quebec students have equal access to the Quebec student loan program for the considerations mentioned in the question. The program would, of course, require that applicants be financially means tested for eligibility.

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered.

Mr. Taylor: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like to ask the parliamentary secretary when we might expect an answer to question No. 2,329. This question was tabled on April 2, 1981. The list surely should have been prepared even at that time. What is the difficulty in getting an answer to question No. 2,329?

Mr. Smith: Madam Speaker, I am not able to assist my friend offhand, but I will be happy to look into that matter on his behalf.

I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed, from Monday, July 5, 1982, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government, and the amendment of Mr. Wilson (p. 18905).

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Madam Speaker, in introducing his budget, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) said:

> The government has pointed the way to recovery, but it alone cannot get Canada on the move. We must tackle this task together.

Canada is one of the most fortunate nations in the world. We have tremendous natural resources. We have well-educated and competent workers, and we are better equipped than many countries to survive the worldwide recession. However, we want to do more than merely survive. We want to work our way out of the present difficulties in a way which leaves us well positioned to take full advantage of the upturn in the world economy when it comes.

• (1510)

The budget measures in themselves are worthy of serious attention, but before addressing them I would like to echo the minister's call for all Canadians to involve themselves in serious consideration of how best we can shoulder our responsibility to work our way out of current difficulties and prepare for better times.

Budget bashing is a traditional Canadian occupation. It is traditional that special interest groups respond with more and more requests to help their particular situation; it is traditional that opposition parties attack and give no credit for positive measures. In our present situation, budget bashing can easily become Canada bashing. Financial markets are skittish and respond in an exaggerated way to any evidence of political division or uncertainty.

But Canadians have a remarkable ability for compromise, for working together to overcome difficulties, for balancing the need of regions, of minorities, of conflicting groups so as to arrive at the common good. This is a time that calls for all our goodwill and all our patriotism and pride in Canada.

Two years ago, on May 21, 1980, this House was united in a way we rarely see. Statesmanlike speeches on the Quebec referendum results were made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), by the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) and by the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent), and it may be useful today to remind ourselves of that spirit and of some of the statements made then.

The Leader of the Official Opposition described the referendum vote as "an expression of pride and belief in this country in which we can all joyfully share" and spoke of uniting Canadians in "a common determination to build a renewed federation which can make this a stronger country, a richer country, and a better country in years ahead".

The Leader of the New Democratic Party said:

> We have . . . reached a level of political maturity of which all civilized nations of the world are envious. . . . last night we showed that we can get along together despite deep differences.

Later in his speech, he said:

> Fishermen in Newfoundland, farmers in Saskatchewan, miners in Sept-Îles and people in every region of Canada must see the federal government as an ally, as their government. This is our objective.

The spirit which animated this House on May 21, 1980 is needed again as we face difficult times to which we can find solutions by working together.

At this time of very delicate balance, it is important that we all play a constructive role—otherwise, to quote the Financial Post, "The extreme and the implacable, egged on by the excitable in the media and unable to see merit in a middle way, may blindly help precipitate" a crisis for Canada.

Canadians are concerned about inflation, about high unemployment, about the deficit, about high interest rates; consumer, business and investor confidence are at a low ebb. To deal with all these problems requires a careful balance and mix of policies.

Most people who talk to me are more concerned about unemployment than about inflation. As long as people are working, they usually can manage in one way or another to deal with increases in the cost of living, but being unemployed takes the heart out of people. Yet we know that if inflation goes unchecked we will lose our competitive position in world markets and the long-term result will, in fact, be more unemployment. Therefore, inflation must be addressed as a high priority.

In inflationary times people try to protect themselves by negotiating higher wages, but when wages and prices chase each other, purchasing power does not increase; a 12 per cent increase does not improve the situation of a family if prices have also gone up 12 per cent.

One measure that the government proposes in the budget is to limit increases for Members of Parliament, civil servants and staff of Crown corporation to 6 per cent next year and 5 per cent the following year. It is hoped that provincial governments and the private sector will follow this example. To be sure, public servants have not caused inflation and have no responsibility for it any more than other Canadian citizens. Those who were expecting increases higher than 6 per cent next year will naturally be disappointed, but this country has been built on sharing and on working for the common good, and if limiting an increase to 6 per cent helps to create jobs for Canadians who are unemployed, helps to protect our future, I think most people will agree to that limit.

Federal regulatory agencies are being asked to restrain prices of the goods and services that they control. The provinces are being asked to do the same in their jurisdictions as part of a two-year national effort to reduce inflation.

Unemployment is at a higher rate than most of us have seen in our lifetime; the expectation that Canadians may find and hold a job and plan their future on that basis is threatened. It is important that we move quickly to deal with unemployment, not only because of the distress to the individual and family but also in terms of the economy as a whole. Unemployed people do not pay taxes as they did when they were employed; businesses which are in difficulties do not pay taxes and contribute to the economy as they do when they are prospering; and in fact, much of the increase in our deficit now is a direct result of the recession. The deficit is not growing because of increased federal spending; expenditures have been held in check, but revenues are down and unemployment payments have greatly increased.

Therefore, the government has to take prudent, selective measures to support the economy and preserve jobs and so, ultimately, help to contain the deficit. The November budget allocated some resources to job creation and the budget before us targets further resources for that purpose.

However, while direct job creation relieves immediate distress, helps people to maintain skills and perhaps acquire new skills, and can have other values in terms of improving communities, for long-term job creation we must look to a dynamic, confident private sector, and particularly to small business which has traditionally played an important role in job creation.

High interest rates, depressed sales, production cost increases and other factors have presented our private sector with difficulties that have challenged all its resources and ingenuity.

To help business cope with the present and prepare for the improvement in world markets which must come, the budget includes a set of tax proposals that lower the tax on interest income and on capital gains on selected investments. The measures proposed will result in significantly lower interest rates in priority areas—the housing sector and borrowings for new investment by small businesses, farmers and fishermen.

• (1520)

The proposals also increase the attractiveness of equity investment for individual Canadians. These proposals have received less attention than they deserve in the discussions on the budget so far. Perhaps they are not regarded as being firm since a committee has been established to examine them. Indeed, some have said that these measures should be put in place immediately. However, since they are quite innovative and involve new financial instruments, surely it is wise to test them with experienced accountants, lawyers, economists and business people before they are actually put in place later this year.

Canadians can feel just pride in our private sector whose enterprise has made possible a standard of living and social security system which is the envy of many countries. Success in revitalizing the private sector will also protect Canada's advanced medicare, unemployment insurance, pension, education and other programs essential to social justice and social progress. Over the past 20 years Canadians put in place a social security system which avoids the excesses or shortfalls of some countries while reaching out in support for all Canadians.

In difficult times there is all the more reason for society to help those in need. That is why, although this budget will hold the increases in old age security to 6 per cent and 5 per cent in the next two years, those senior citizens in need who qualify for the guaranteed income supplement will continue to receive fully indexed increases and they can also receive a supplement in order to offset fully the limitation on indexation of their old age security payment.

Similarly, while family allowances will for the next two years increase by 6 per cent and 5 per cent rather than by the full cost of living, in order to ensure that this limitation does not hurt families with modest incomes the child tax credit will continue to be fully indexed and increased by $50 for the 1982 taxation year.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I say that difficult times always bring with them requests for radical reappraisal of all our economic programs and policies. This is a healthy and constructive exercise. The more one understands of constraints, international and domestic, the better the chances of being able to advance practical solutions. This budget represents a sane middle-of-the-road approach which tries to reduce inflation, increase confidence, create jobs and hold the line on the deficit while protecting social programs.

If all Canadians can work towards those goals, we will survive the present recession, we will be prepared to take advantage of world recovery when it comes and make full use of our great advantages so that we continue to be one of the most prosperous, stable and progressive nations of the world.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, the speech I just listened to reminded me of speeches I used to hear from Buckingham Palace on Christmas Day 25 years ago. Smooth sounding but with very little substance; reassuring, but nothing substantive to prove an argument. The hon. member, in defending the Liberal budget, said that if we remain calm—I am paraphrasing her now—and all segments of the community get together and restrain themselves, then inflation will come down and happy days will be here again. However, she neglected to say—and I hope this does not sound like a cheap shot because we are all in this bag together—that it is a lot easier for her, the Conservatives and myself with incomes around $60,000 to $65,000 gross a year to give that advice to our constituents than it is for them to follow.

So I just hope that the Liberal backbenchers realize that they cannot go home to their constituencies and tell the unemployed, those who are on mother's allowance and welfare, to hang in, tighten their belts, restrain themselves and happy days will return. That is not the way it is done. The Canadian constituency has grown very old and very wise in the last two years. They realize that most of their financial problems, in a personal way, are directly related to the non-thinking which has been going on in the Liberal cabinet since the last election.

Until June 28, Mr. Speaker, the majority of Canadians who were hurting at least had hope. They thought there was some light at the end of the tunnel. But as a result of the June 28 budget most of that hope is gone because most of the light at the end of the tunnel has disappeared.

I am very briefly going to touch on three or four major issues in the budget and then I want to pinpoint three major aspects which are either in or not in the budget.

I think it is absolutely cruel that at a time of tight and expensive money, when consumer demand is down with the resulting massive lay-offs and unemployment of about 1.5 million, the government has decided to constrict consumer spending power even further by taking some $2.6 billion out of circulation, money which is badly needed to stimulate the economy in a recession which is bordering on an absolute depression. For example, tax increases of the order of $1.3 billion; the scapegoating of the public sector by saying that civil servants—and by implication all wage and salary earners—are the major cause of this inflation. That is nothing but patent nonsense and the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and his cohorts opposite know it. Real wages, in terms of purchasing power, have declined by 10 per cent over the last six years. Now the government is saying that purchasing power is going to decline another 5 per cent or 6 per cent in the next year because it admits that inflation is going to remain at 9 per cent or 10 per cent.

Another very cruel aspect of this budget is the partial deindexing of family allowances and deindexing of pensions. I should add here that former government employees now retired paid an extra 1 per cent contribution to their pension plans as a hedge against inflation but now that has arbitrarily, and I think illegally, been withdrawn. And they have no clout and no way in which to fight back.

On the supply side, again we are slavishly following President Reagan. But maybe we should not blame President Reagan; we should go back to Mr. Bouey, Governor of the Bank of Canada, in 1975 when he started it all with this supply side economics. We are going to give tax breaks to business. Well, normally tax breaks do result in an increase in investment in business, but at a time when more than 30 per cent of our plants is underutilized, those tax incentives are going to fall on barren ground. There is no possible way that those small tax incentives will fill that manufacturing and productivity gap of between 69.2 per cent and 100 per cent capacity. There again is another major blunder on the part of the Minister of Finance.

Now we come most certainly to the focal point of the budget and the focal point of our economic woes today. That, of course, is the interest rate in this country which is absolutely outrageous. It is the principal cause, almost the sole cause, of business bankruptcies, farm foreclosures, massive unemployment, a general malaise in the economy and an emotional depression that is spreading across our country. This budget as of June 29 has only exacerbated the problem of high interest rates, about which I will go into detail a little later.

Suffice it to say that high interest rates are strangling our economy and the finance minister has sluffed off the whole problem. He has put it into the hands of so-called experts who often cannot agree among themselves. They are to report back in three months' time, three lost months as businesses slide under, as farms go out of business and as unemployment increases. The Minister of Finance has again sluffed off the whole problem of interest rates for another three months, supposedly to be included in yet another budget next fall.

There are other inequities, such as controls in public sector salaries and later in private sector salaries, as I have mentioned. There is to be a reduction in pension increases, a reduction in family allowances and so on.

This budget lacked a new economic strategy. There is no new economic program in it. Senator Olson came forth with a paper in 1980 in which he outlined a prescription for recovery and prosperity. This was based on resource megaprojects. These projects are all down the tube. They were all highly capital intensive at a time when the cost of money was skyrocketing. They were low labour intensive. They did not create the jobs which the manufacturing sector normally would. The megaprojects are, at least for the time being and for the foreseeable future, finished.

This budget which the Minister of Finance had the nerve to introduce on June 28 makes no reference whatever to an alternative economic strategy to bring us out of our economic doldrums. There is nothing whatever. Again, the minister has used the band-aid, quick-fix approach so characteristic not only of the Minister of Finance but indeed of the government which has ceased to govern. That is why the New Democratic Party has called repeatedly since the budget was introduced for the Liberals to have the common decency to step down from power and hand it over to those who are not only willing to govern but have some intelligence about how to govern this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Speaker, there are three major parts of this budget to which I want to make reference in some detail.

First is the premise on which the budget is based. Repeatedly in the House of Commons during question period the Minister of Finance has said: "Look, fellows, we do not have a high interest rate policy, we have an anti-inflation policy. If we bring down inflation, interest rates will come down, businesses will get turned around, unemployment will drop as the demand for goods and services increases." I say balderdash to that because the Minister of Finance also likes to make reference to things which happen south of the border. The Liberals are great ones to blame others. From the day the Prime Minister was elected, I do not think he has ever admitted he was wrong about anything.

Let us take a look at what is happening in the United States. Inflation in that country on an annual basis has now declined to 6.5 per cent. But where are the interest rates? The prime interest rate in the United States of America is still over 17 per cent. Where is unemployment now that inflation is down in the U.S.? Unemployment in the United States is just under 10 per cent. Yet the Minister of Finance has premised the logic of his budget on the United States model. The U.S. model is not working. Interest rates are remaining high, businesses are remaining strapped financially, and unemployment is high, widespread and causing considerable anguish in that nation. So much for the minister's model and so much for his reference to fighting inflation which in turn will automatically, according to him, bring down interest rates and unemployment, all of which is nonsense.

Mr. Riis: I think he believes in fairies too.

Mr. Blackburn: Second, there is no new economic strategy in the budget. There is nothing to replace the failed resource-based projects which, as I said earlier, were highly capital intensive when money was very expensive. There was no hint of a move to an industrial strategy to end the branch plant approach.

I would like to expand on the branch plant approach right now. I was very gratified last Wednesday evening when our Conservative friends supported us in our subamendment to the budget calling for a stronger FIRA. That was a complete turnaround on the part of the Conservatives. I am overjoyed that members such as the hon. members for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn), York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) and Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson) joined with socialists in this corner and said "Enough is enough: we cannot afford to have our industrial sector bought out any more by loosening up FIRA." We were united on this side of the House to strengthen FIRA. It is the Liberals who now want to loosen FIRA.

An hon. Member: The Tories would vote for anything to dump the Liberals.

Mr. Blackburn: Somebody has just said the Tories would vote for anything to dump the Liberals. That shows how much creative thinking they put forward in the House these days.

On page 7 of the budget we find the following:

> First, the threshold for review under the small business procedures will be raised from $2 million and 100 employees to $5 million and 200 employees for new investment or direct acquisitions in Canada.
> Second, where a foreign-controlled Canadian company is acquired in the course of the acquisition of its parent or another foreign-controlled company, the small business procedures threshold will be $15 million and 600 employees.

FIRA has been greatly abused, but there is one thing FIRA has done. It has reduced the acceleration of a U.S. takeover of our industrial sector here in Canada. The reason we in the New Democratic Party are opposed to loosening FIRA's regulations is because the branch plant economy is not good for Canada.

In the 1950s and 1960s it is true the branch plant economy gave us an accelerated rise in our standard of living. It produced jobs, it built warehouses and distribution centres, and in a limited sense it was beneficial. A recent study has strongly indicated that since 1976 the branch plants in this country have created a net outflow of $1.5 billion in capital. So it has not been beneficial as far as capital intensity and capital investment in this country are concerned.

Second, branch plants are very soft indeed on research and development. Most research and development is done by parent companies back home, and "back home" is usually Indiana, Ohio, Iowa, Chicago or wherever.

Third, when times get tough it is branch plants which shut down first or lay off first or pull in their financial horns and say: "We have to close." There is no way that branch plants will compete with their parent companies back in the United States.

With respect to the Foreign Investment Review Agency, we have heard many Conservatives, some Liberals and many businessmen in the country say that the Americans do not like FIRA and therefore it is shutting out capital investment in Canada. This is more of a perception than a fact or reality. Since FIRA was implemented, 91 per cent of all applications have been accepted. I think it is atrocious, it is sad and it is deplorable; I do not know why we hear all the whining on the Conservative benches, all the whining by their business colleagues and their corporate friends outside the House. It just does not make any sense.

Let us look at the other side of the coin or, more appropriately, the other side of the border. I should like to refer to an article which appeared on page 9 of The Financial Post of March 13 entitled: "U.S. stringent on foreign investment." It was written by Nicholas Patterson and reads in part:

> First a look at some of the federal restrictions.

He was referring to United States federal restrictions with respect to foreign investment in that country. He continued:

> The report says: "There are a number of U.S. restrictions which prohibit direct investment by non-resident aliens in enterprises engaged in intercoastal shipping, domestic radio, television, telegraph, domestic air transport, mining on federal land, hydroelectric power and atomic energy."
> This means that in the U.S. it's illegal for a Canadian company to control a telephone company. In Canada, a U.S. company, General Telephone & Electronic Corp., controls British Columbia Telephone Co. Does that sound like investment reciprocity? In the U.S., the policy is that a foreigner, including a Canadian, can't get an offshore oil or gas exploration licence. In Canada, offshore exploration is dominated by U.S. companies. The same goes for uranium mining. Where is the reciprocity in that?

The article continued and was very enlightening. I hope Conservatives and business people across the country realize that the Americans have even tighter restrictions on foreign investment in their country than FIRA ever had.

The Americans have a Buy America Act which was brought in at the time of the great depression by Franklin Roosevelt. It means that a very large percentage—and I believe it is 50 per cent at the federal level and at the state and municipal levels very often it is higher—of all government procurement of goods, products or whatever it happens to be must be from American companies. We still do not have such a provision in Canada.

We have listened to the Conservatives, who have gone full circle historically. They used to be the protectionists, traditionally and historically. The Conservatives now want to sell out every square foot of factory space in the country for a quick buck to help us out of a time of economic distress. But we in this party are saying we should tighten FIRA laws, otherwise when the recession is over in the next two or three years, if it is over, we will end up with 65 per cent or 68 per cent of our manufacturing sector owned by foreigners, not 57 per cent, as at present. Let us not be foolish at this time of economic restraint.

There are two ways of approaching our major problems as we in the New Democratic Party see them. First, there must be a long-term structural change in the economy, a transfer of emphasis from resource-based megaprojects, most of which are based upon non-renewable resources, to a reindustrialization of the country which is job or labour-intensive and produces jobs at the rate of about $100,000 per job rather than the several millions of dollars per job that it costs in resource industries.

Second, in the short term we are talking about injecting capital into the economy at a time when there is plant underutilization to the tune of 31 per cent and at a time when there is an extreme downturn. On the one hand we are calling for a restructuring of our economic goals or a redirection away from the resource-based megaprojects to the employment-intensive industrial sector. On the other hand, in the short term we are saying, "Let us pump money into the economy now to get it moving again." This is not inflationary. It will not overheat the economy because, as I said a moment ago, we are underutilizing our plants.

The traditional Liberal policy is to gain short-term prosperity by selling off our resources to pay for our imports. That is the historical Liberal approach. But the megaprojects have fallen victim to the recession and the government must recognize the manufacturing sector as the engine of economic growth and recovery. Last year there was a $21 billion deficit in trade and manufactured goods alone. This helped to pressure the dollar down, and the government also failed to create the 200,000 jobs represented by that deficit. In the United States 24 per cent of the work force is in manufacturing; in Canada it is only 19 per cent. Again this is caused by reliance on imported manufactured goods and selling off unprocessed or semi-processed resources to other countries.

Imports also drive down the value of the dollar. Incidentally, at the present time the government is bragging about its positive balance of trade. The reason for the net favourable balance of trade in this quarter and in the previous quarter is that Canadians cannot afford to buy imports. We are not importing the way we were during more prosperous times. This is not because of any great genius sitting on the treasury benches; it is not because of the Minister of Finance or any deliberate plan.

The plight of the country today is that we cannot afford the imports we would normally purchase. In the long run this may be a good thing. If the dollar dropped to 70 cents, we might then have to use our own initiative and creative capacity. We might have to start thinking about a change and we might return some backbone to government which is responsible to the people of Canada. Indeed, we might begin to manufacture goods which over the years we have allowed to slip away because it was easier and for a while cheaper to import them from offshore. I think those days are over.

Also the fact that we have to import so much in the way of manufactured goods drives up interest rates, which is another major cause of the depression that I mentioned at the outset. We would target certain industries where we have the largest deficits, such as the machinery industry. In 1981 Canada had an appalling deficit of $6.9 billion in its trade of machinery, or a loss of 69,000 jobs just in machinery industries alone. I represent the federal riding of Brant where there are two major farm implement manufacturers, Massey-Ferguson and White Farm. The government has made great efforts to try to keep these two companies afloat. I appreciate it personally and on behalf of my constituents. There was an ILAP designation for Brant. There were loan guarantees to Massey-Ferguson and several millions of dollars to White Farm for research and development. There will probably be in excess of $50 million of capital infused into the local economy as a result of ILAP.

The long-term prospects for my constituency are good, but let me look at the two agricultural industries. Last year, 1981, in the agricultural equipment field alone we had a net deficit of $1.3 billion, which represents a loss of 13,000 jobs in Canada despite a trade agreement with the United States. I notice that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) is listening to my remarks at this point. He would be interested to know that when Massey-Ferguson and White Farm were going full steam ahead a few years ago, their combined workforce in Brantford was approximately 5,000. As well, there were approximately another 2,000 workers in Toronto, which made a total of 7,000 workers.

If we did not have this net deficit in trade and agricultural equipment vis-à-vis the United States, we would be employing twice the number of agricultural implement workers than we are just in the City of Brantford, and this was during the good times. Today, Massey-Ferguson is down to about 1,400 workers from a workforce of 3,000 or 3,200. I understand this morning that White Farm is down to approximately 400 from a workforce of 1,200. This is one area where much can be done to return jobs to Canada without being protectionists or economic nationalists. We simply say that during tough times you must look after yourself first and then, if you have enough left, go abroad.

The story of the mining and construction equipment sector is a sad one, too. Finland mines about one-third of what we mine in Canada but our mining companies buy two-thirds of all their heavy underground mining equipment from Finland and Sweden. What a loss and embarrassment that is. What the hell has this government been doing for the last ten years? Not much. It has been plastering one band-aid on to another and pretty soon the whole bag will fall through. In fact, it already has.

There is a $563 million deficit in power generation equipment. There is a $898 million deficit in industrial machines. There is a deficit of $1 billion in machine tools. Last year these deficits were higher than Canada total balance of payments deficit and this is all in the manufacturing sector.

We would target the transportation equipment industry. We would establish Enterprise Canada, a Crown Corporation capitalized initially at $2 billion, to promote research and development in those healthy industries. We would promote those forward-looking, third wave industries in high technology in order to hold on to them, because I very much fear that if the Foreign Investment Review Agency is tampered with as a result of this budget, we will lose those small but up-front, state of the art, third wave high technology industries in Canada, as suggested by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) during question period yesterday. Those businesses are small and vulnerable, and as sure as I am standing here, "Silicone Valley North" will rapidly become "Silicone Valley South", controlled or owned outright by the Americans.

Finally, we would then force agreements on the multinationals if we could not make amicable agreements to make sure that for every dollar of sales that the multinationals enjoy in Canada, we must have a dollar's worth of production here. What is wrong with that?

I see that you are rising, Mr. Speaker, to indicate that my time is up. I could go on but I will not seek the indulgence of the House for extra time. I simply want to say what the classical Greeks said, that those whom the Gods hate, they first make mad. The gods obviously must hate this government.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with dismay to the attacks which have been made against the budget in the past week. I have read Hansard as well as the newspapers. I personally believe that this budget outlines a positive course of action toward economic recovery. This is true whether I look at it from the viewpoint of my constituents in Essex-Windsor, from the viewpoint of the food and agriculture industry or from the viewpoint of the nation as a whole.

My constituency is one that generally represents the content of Canada on a percentage basis. It is approximately 95 per cent urban and 5 per cent rural. I believe that I have a good understanding of what is happening in our country.

As my colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) pointed out last week, the task before us is to bring down inflation and increase productivity in order to get our economy going again. I will reiterate some of the proposal the Government of Canada has made to lead the country toward this very desirable goal. I realize that some of these proposals have already been mentioned but I do not think it hurts to repeat them again.

Some of the proposals involve cutbacks in pay increases to cabinet ministers, MPs and senators; ceilings on pay increases for more than one-half million federal employees; limits on indexation of personal tax exemptions, family allowances and old age security benefits; restraint in price increases regulated by federal agencies; $750 million in spending for job creation and economic development incentives as well as $300 million to help Canadians buy homes. There is an extension of programs to stimulate home renovation.

With respect to co-operative housing, I was very much involved with co-operative housing in a co-op organization I was associated with before I came to this place. It had rough times and tough sledding then. I remember when we allowed people in co-op housing to establish their rent as a downpayment over one year and rent was about $60 a month at that time. Therefore, you know how long ago it was, Mr. Speaker. I was in the Toronto metropolitan area when we were involved in those operations at that time.

Another proposal provides for the construction of new rental units and to offset problems with mortgage renewals. As well, there is $400 million to reduce interest costs for small business undertaking new investment. There is $200 million to be made available through the Farm Credit Corporation for farmers to refinance debts at lower interest rates. Consultations are to take place with the private sector on proposals that could be implemented this fall to reduce taxes on Canadian investment and to reduce interest rates for small business, farmers, fishermen and buyers of new homes.

This is a comprehensive and positive package. A number of these measures are of particular interest and benefit to the agri-food industry and I would like to explain them in a bit more detail.

First, the special farm financial assistance program. The government recognizes the severe economic difficulties facing many farmers in certain sectors of our agricultural community. In the past year interest costs have grown to become the leading input cost in Canadian agriculture, accounting for almost 20 per cent of total production costs. Last November we set aside $50 million to help farmers desperately in need to refinance their total debt load. Under this program, 382 farmers were given much needed interest rate reductions. Now that assistance will be offered to a further 1,600 to 1,800 farmers over the next few years.

This should be measured against bankruptcies. It is said that the maximum you must save from bankruptcy is 261 farmers who needed assistance last year, who did not receive it and went bankrupt. Some of them, no matter how beneficial a program could have been worked out, could not have been assisted anyway because they were that far down the road. Some of the economic plight or conditions they found themselves in took place before high interest rates, as shown if one checks their financial statements. As I said, this measure could help at least 1,800 farmers.

That does not mean that we will not continue with the right of the Farm Credit Corporation to enter the private money sector even in a bigger fashion than it has been involved before. Loans will be made at the going FCC interest rates for this special program to which I have just referred. Now the going rate is 16.5 per cent, but with an interest rate rebate of four percentage points for the first two years of the loan, and loan limits for the individual farmer, he or she will be able to borrow $300,000. Jointly, a farm partnership will be able to borrow $500,000. That is the maximum which will apply under those conditions.

The funding for this program comes from the budget allocation of $100 million and a reallocation of $116 million from existing Farm Credit Corporation funds. That is not all. Farmers will be able to continue to borrow money from other places.

Second, there is the small business investment grant. Both incorporated and unincorporated Canadian businesses, including farmers, are eligible to share in this $400 million federal interest subsidy program. Interest rate reductions under this program of up to four percentage points will be available for loans for new assets, such as farm buildings, machinery and equipment. The program covers loans of $10,000 to $500,000 for purchases made between June 28 this year and March 31, 1983.

One of the very important aspects of this program which has received little publicity so far is the fact that expenditures for scientific research are also eligible for interest rate reductions. I would certainly hope that the agribusiness and food industry firms take advantage of this provision to boost their research efforts in the next few months. The grocery products manufacturers of Canada spend less than one tenth of one percentage point on research. I hope they are listening. I hope they study this legislation. Maybe we can get them up to 1 per cent. Anyhow, they spend very little, so little that one can hardly measure it. They spend the least amount of any group in Canada. I hope they grab on to this incentive and go ahead with it because research in food production is our most important tool.

The small business bond, as set out in the November budget, will remain in place until the end of the year to help farmers and other small businesses refinance debt at reduced interest charges. The federal government is offering tax concessions to commercial lenders which should enable these lenders to make refinancing loans at just a little over half the normal lending rate. We know from experience that these programs can be worked out and be very beneficial for many people in the farming community and in the small business operations of this country.

The new budget also contains a new capital gains reserve provision that answers many of the concerns expressed by farmers following the November budget. Anyone studying the ways and means motion will see what I mean. This provision is more liberal than the one proposed last December 18 and was modified from the November 12 budget. So, I think what is being offered at the present time is pretty darned good and that most in the farm community will be well satisfied with it.

I know that the agricultural community also has a special interest in the proposal to change the tax system to permit significantly reduced interest rates, perhaps three to six percentage points below the prevailing rates, on loans for new capital investment in this country. At the time we were debating the recent amendments to the Farm Credit Act in this House, many members of this House, many members on the agriculture committee and many farm groups indicated their support for special tax concessions to investors in farm mortgages. I am sure this support will again be voiced during the consultations which will take place, as outlined by the Minister of Finance last Monday night.

Wherever possible, the federal government will hold price increases in regulated sectors to 6 per cent in the coming year and 5 per cent in the following year. This could affect industrial milk producers and egg and poultry farmers, but not in the way in which many people think it will. Many think that those who are in regulated agencies or marketing boards will suffer tremendously. Let me tell Your Honour that the people in marketing boards are inflation fighters. They have accepted a form of control that no one else in our society will accept. Through Your Honour, I intend to outline to the House why and how this is taking place.

So many people in our society condemn marketing boards but they do not know anything about them. The only thing they know about them is what someone else said about them. They have never studied them. I recently addressed over 300 people at a meeting in British Columbia. Before the meeting I asked them for their opinions on marketing boards. Nearly everyone condemned them. When I then spoke to them in a forum, I asked: "How many of you have ever studied a marketing board?" Only two out of the whole group had so studied. The remainder were basing their opinions on editorials or radio commentaries. I would say that 99 per cent of the people who make those comments or write those articles have never ever studied marketing boards and what they do.

Let me just go into a few details as to how these price ceilings will be applied. For instance, concerning the regulated agencies, they are still being worked out, but I would offer a few observations on this point. Prices in the regulated sector which we are discussing have been below the general inflation rate in the past year. Therefore, if everything else were in the same category, we would probably be asking people to accept these rates.

I will state some figures. Retail prices for dairy products in May were 10.9 per cent more than a year ago, but that is below the national rate of inflation. Poultry products were only 1.48 per cent more expensive than in May, 1981, and eggs were actually 2.66 per cent cheaper than a year ago. Therefore, how will a regulated agency be affected? Some farm leaders said: "What a terrible thing this will be!" Some of them should check what is going on in the regulated industries because, for instance, whole milk production in Ontario only increased 5 per cent for the whole of last year, and that is below what we are asking them to accept for the first year. We are asking that for the second year. Therefore, if the input costs are down, if everyone is productive and these people will meet some of the production figures, we will be inflation beaters and be very productive at the same time.

Producer prices for eggs have dropped four cents a dozen in the past 12 months. I am referring to producer prices, not retail prices. Producer prices for chicken and turkey have dropped three to five cents per kilogram. Producer prices for industrial milk have increased by $4.01 per hectolitre, or 11 per cent in the last year. That is also below the national rate. Because of the current weakness of feed grain prices, we do not expect the formula prices for eggs and poultry to trigger increases of more than 6 per cent in the coming year.

As I said, many people in our society, even in some farm organizations and some who are going bankrupt, are actually the biggest condemners of marketing boards. Many consumers think that marketing boards lead to higher and higher food prices, but that is just not so. Canadian marketing boards have a good track record as inflation fighters. I do not mind repeating that over and over again. That is because it is contrary to what some of our so-called brilliant economists in the country say. I know that Your Honour is very familiar with brilliant economists. I believe you obtained your economics degree from the University of Wisconsin. For instance, the Ontario vegetable marketing board has many members, some of them from the constituency of the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise) who is present in the House, and some from my own constituency of Essex-Windsor. They have negotiated prices for processing vegetables this year which, on the average, are only about 5 per cent higher than they were in 1981. These farmers are doing that because they recognize some of the problems in our nation. Provincial marketing boards are doing this. How many headlines or commentaries have hon. members seen about what they decided to do this year?

At the same time, Ontario producers are increasing productivity, mainly because an incentive was provided by the federal government and by the Ontario government. For instance, we have placed a tariff on tomato paste to give tomato growers protection of 13.4 per cent, plus a devalued dollar. The province came in and gave outright grants of several million dollars to build tomato paste facilities. That means there will be thousands of acres of tomatoes, hundreds of thousands of dollars will be spent, more jobs will be created in southwestern Ontario, and it will cost less than anyone ever estimated, not a 9 per cent, 10 per cent, 12 per cent or 14 per cent increase but, rather, a 5 per cent increase.

Take the price of pumpkins. Some people get $30.75 per tonne. If any of you ever buy a pumpkin, you will find you will pay $2 or $3 for it. Weigh it and then see how much the farmer receives for that pumpkin. He receives only 3.4 per cent more than last year, that is all.

Carrot prices are $72.30 per tonne. That is 4.8 per cent more than in 1981. The highest increase was for green and wax beans, up 7.5 per cent at $226 per tonne. These are products that are for canning, for processing.

Overall food price increases for 1982 are expected to be less than 10 per cent, and this easing in food price inflation is certainly good news for Canadian consumers. Individuals can keep their own food budgets from rising by even this amount by substituting seasonal Canadian fruits and vegetables and frozen and canned produce for costly imports of fresh produce. For instance, many Canadians think they have to have their head lettuce from Florida, Arizona or California. They might as well just take a good drink of water. There is no food value in head lettuce whatsoever. It has a little cellulose in it. If you want to eat something that is good and nourishing, many people say: "Who are you to tell us what to eat?" Well, we make a study in our department of what people should eat. The scientific evidence is there that cabbage will do you much more good and has many more proteins, vitamins and minerals than the costly head lettuce that you bring into Canada from the deep south about seven months a year. You can store it, you can keep it under controlled temperature storage. The temperature-stored cabbage will last for one year and it will be all Canadian. I see the member from Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman) opposite. He knows that in Agassiz and in Saanichton on Vancouver Island they are growing cauliflower all year round, except for six weeks in the year. If that industry expands, as we think it will, a big part of western Canada can be supplied by cauliflower all year round. It is excellent cauliflower; I have eaten it. They have shipped it here and I have eaten it there. Right in the stores in British Columbia there is Canadian cauliflower for two-thirds the price of American cauliflower, but because people are not used to eating Canadian cauliflower, they do not think it is as good. We know it is better, because those things that grow in the northern climate grow more slowly and it takes more time to take the nutrients out of the soil. Those products are better for you than those products that grow down south very fast. They have more of the things that you and I need to make a healthy living. How do you think I have grown so strong and feel as young as I do as the Minister of Agriculture? And I have been in politics in Canada for 20 years! It is because you are what you eat.

An hon. Member: Right on!

Mr. Whelan: If I last as long as the former member for Prince Albert, that means that perhaps for 26 more years you will have to put up with me!

I am just saying that we have the potential for production here in Canada. Canadian farmers and food processors know first-hand the problems that inflation has caused in our industry. I know that they support the government's effort to bring down the inflation. General Foods, which is one of the largest produces in North America, has sent us a telegram saying: "We are prepared to do that kind of thing; we are prepared to co-operate with the government." That is the kind of thing that you like to hear.

I am sure the hon. member knows full well the potential for productivity in this product. The member for Fraser Valley West and those for some of the other parts of Canada, such as Saint Jean in Quebec and similar areas, know the potential for producing this Canadian food for our own consumption and for export.

The Minister of Finance has called on the provinces, on private industry and on all Canadians to share in the fight on inflation. Canadian farmers, as I said, have already been in the front lines in this fight. Some can say that they are bearing the cost of inflation. They are still surviving, though.

I see here an hon. member from Saskatchewan. Last year in that poor province of Saskatchewan land values went up 25 per cent! That government in Saskatchewan did such a good job of making people so rich they all turned Conservative!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: They left them with a big deficit, but I see that they are not going to get rid of the finance corporation; they have to have that Crown corporation so they will have more money to lower gasoline prices.

Mr. Althouse: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would just point out to the hon. minister that there was not a big deficit left in Saskatchewan. I would prefer that the minister would keep his speech correct.

Mr. Whelan: There was not a big deficit? He knows that I know that they left it in such good financial condition that that is why they turned Tory. Those across the way have not made one suggestion to help the Government of Canada. As good Canadians they should be making some constructive suggestions about what we should be doing. They have not made one that I have heard, and I have checked the record very thoroughly, too.

Mr. Kempling: Stick to the truth. Put it in high gear. You have a big lead.

Mr. Whelan: We are talking about the provinces and what they should be doing. I am told that the provinces are ready to do this. Premier Buchanan of Nova Scotia has already taken a step in the right direction. That is not a rich province; it is a province which has great financial difficulty. But that Premier has recognized the need across the country, to make sure that Canada stays alive.

When we talk about fighting inflation, we find that in the front lines there are the farmers there, and there are many others willing to join them in the front lines. Cost increases have outstripped price increases in many commodity sectors. Farmers not practising supply management have had little protection against the ravages of inflation. They have not had the 10 per cent, 12 per cent or 15 per cent wage increases that public servants, Members of Parliament and private industry employees have had in the past year. And yet, if other sectors of the economy had the same kinds of increases in productivity as the agricultural industry has had, we would have a much stronger economy today. So what is the member talking about? To listen to the member from Brant (Mr. Blackburn), you would think that no one in Canada was increasing productivity.

Just the morning after the budget was brought down, Mr. Speaker, my colleague the minister responsible for Statistics Canada and I announced the findings of the 1981 census of agriculture. We talk about efficiency. You hear some economists and other people talk about inefficiency because they are in a marketing board. Milk production rose by 7 per cent in the last five years, not went down, as some of the figures given by a previous speaker would suggest. Yet Canadian farmers produced that milk with 12 per cent fewer cows! Is that what you call inefficiency? There were 1.77 million dairy cows in 1981 compared with 1.99 million dairy cows in 1976.

In the poultry sector the number of laying hens declined by 12 per cent in the past decade, but the number of eggs rose by 10.5 per cent from an annual average of 209 eggs per bird to 241. Efficiency in agriculture is increasing all the time, Mr. Speaker.

Many words have been spoken and written about the budget in the past eight days. This House has heard a mixture of praise and criticism, statistics and economic theory, political rhetoric and personal opinion. In light of these varied observations, it is easy to be blinded and to fail to see the forest for the trees.

Some of the members opposite are concentrating their vision on the size of the deficit; the deficit should be lowered by massive cuts in government spending, they say. Others are looking at the number of housing starts; there should be a tax cut on construction materials, they say. More? Where? How? Where are the trade-offs these critics would make? Is it easy? It is easy for the opposition to say they would not have a $19.6 billion deficit, but they did not tell the public what increases in taxes and cuts in programs they would have to make to accomplish this. This past Sunday in my constituency in a little village called Comber, a rural community, the Tilbury West council under Reeve Jack Morris decided to give leadership to go ahead and build a senior citizens' complex, self-contained apartments. I do not know why the press did not report it, but at the meeting I said that it had cost $600,000 for these 27 units and that the majority—97 per cent—of the interest rate is subsidized by the federal government; so that the total interest rate a tenant would pay on a subsidized unit was 2 per cent. I knew many Conservatives in the audience. Many Liberals were there. There were probably a few New Democrats, but they did not say they were. However, I asked whether they wanted us to cut that out. Did they want us to stop that expenditure? We were building those homes for senior citizens who had made such a great contribution to our nation. Did they want us to stop that 14.5 per cent or 15 per cent interest subsidy we were giving on these units? I asked them, please, to tell us if they wanted us to stop those government expenditures we are so bad at making.

Do hon. members opposite want me to cut expenditures for the Farm Credit corporation or for beef stabilization? What cuts would they make in Agriculture Canada's program? Many times in recent months hon. members opposite have criticized me for not spending enough on agriculture. The budget for which I am responsible has decreased from 2.4 per cent of the federal budget to about 1.5 per cent of the federal budget, but has agricultural efficiency decreased? No. Agricultural production has increased. The incomes of farmers who have looked after themselves have not suffered very much. Some have said I should have a $1 billion budget for the Farm Credit Corporation, and I have said I would like to have that. It has been said that I should spend hundreds of millions of dollars to help beef producers.

My department is making very good economic use of taxpayers' money. We are improving our services to the agricultural industry every year, yet our share of the federal budget is declining. We are able to do this by being efficient and by having a good economic ship with a good crew. We have an excellent crew in the Department of Agriculture, which is the most decentralized department and knows probably better than any—better than many; that is for sure—what is going on in this country. That is the way it has been since confederation. Agriculture Canada has been spread across the country. There are over 10,520 employees. About 2,500 of them are here in the capital area, and the rest are all over Canada. The people in my department understand what is going on in Canada and report to us what is going on. As I said, we are able to do this by being efficient, and I do not believe hon. members or the public could find much to cut out of my already very lean budget.

It is all very well for another political party to say it would not put a ceiling on civil service wage increases and that it would create more jobs, but it does not tell the public how. What alternatives are hon. members opposite offering? I remember when the right hon. member from High River was Prime Minister. High River is where he was born; I forget the name of his riding.

An hon. Member: Yellowhead.

Mr. Whelan: The Toronto Star of October 20, 1979 said: "Clark backs more interest rate hikes". The other day the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) said, I believe on a hotline program in Montreal, that he has no alternatives. That is what was reported to me. When he was Prime Minister he backed the Governor of the Bank of Canada. I never heard that he sued the Toronto Star or reporting what he said incorrectly.

I see, Mr. Speaker, that you are ready to rise. I want to refer to one other matter, and I will be as brief as I can.

Who is Pierre Bourgault? He was a leading separatist in Quebec. What did he say, as recorded in the Montreal Gazette? He wrote an article in his own hand. It was copied in the Ottawa Citizen. It was not copied in the Windsor Star. Why? The Windsor Star did not copy it because it was too positive for a separatist to say. This is what he said:

> Let's count our blessings.
> Did I say blessings? Yes I did, because by comparison, we are blessed beyond reason.
> I add "in Canada".
>
> A transportation strike? A doctors' strike? Irrelevant. Interest rates? Unemployment? Inflation? The Quebec budget? Insignificant. The fall of the dollar? The economic crisis? Trudeau, Lévesque, Drapeau? Mere incidents.
> Who are we to complain?
> And yet we complain. And not without reason. We're not used to so many problems hitting us at the same time. We're used to being spoiled. We're used to our big and small privileges. And if we're deprived of some of them, we tend to imagine that we're deprived of our most basic needs.
> I'm half-joking. Of course we're in a mess. But, at the same time, we musn't cry too loudly, because the rest of the world has every reason to be envious of our problems.
>
> The kids on the Falkland Islands (British and Argentine alike) would rather suffer a Metro strike. I'm quite sure of that.
> The population of El Salvador would rather go without doctors for a few days—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. minister, but his time has truly expired.

Mr. Whelan: It goes on and on, Mr. Speaker. This was written by a separatist who would have torn this budget apart, and he tells us about our blessings in Canada. Thank God for our blessings.

Mr. Tousignant: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The minister asked what programs should be cut. Hon. members opposite want programs to be cut. They all have the—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Tousignant) is not raising a point of order.

Mr. Kempling: Make a speech. Get into the debate.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Mr. Speaker, I must say I enjoyed the performance of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) here today. He is usually an entertaining speaker. In the farm halls of the nation and across the fields of the nation he can make quite a contribution.

Mr. Kempling: And in the barnyards.

Mr. Nowlan: I am not exactly sure what the minister eats on a day to day basis, but I certainly know what he spreads around in this House. We are supposed to be talking about the budget, not the estimates of the Department of Agriculture, but the minister used most of his speech to discuss the estimates of his department. The estimates of the Department of Agriculture are not before the House.

When it comes to agriculture, I think hon. members on this side of the House would tend to agree with the minister, knowing full well that he has not been able to get the necessary funding for many agricultural programs. I certainly do not want to see any cuts in agricultural programs. The industry is basically a very productive and progressive segment of our economy, but we are not supposed to be talking only about one segment of our economy.

When the minister gets out of the hallowed halls of Ottawa and gets away from the insulation of Ottawa and goes about the country—I admit he does that a little more than many other ministers—and when the country is as perplexed, troubled and sick as it is today, I do not think people would appreciate a speech of buffoonery and faint sarcasm like the speech of the minister here today.

Every segment of our society is sick, but we in this House, whether in the opposition or on the government side, would not underestimate the bounty of Canada. What makes us feel so badly is that in spite of our bounty we have had a government for 14 years under the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)—except for a brief interval of six months—which has put our economy into dire straits, to coin the Prime Minister's own words.

I do not intend to belabour the Department of Agriculture estimates reviewed by the minister. There is little in the budget for the farm community except, to use the minister's own words, a reallocation.

I listened to the minister, and I wish he would stop grumbling and belching now. As I said, I do not know what he eats, but it certainly produces a lot of gas. I would just as soon he spread what he is spreading here across the fields of the nation. Farm productivity would certainly be enhanced.

The fact is that the little help in the budget for the farm community is mainly a reallocation of existing funds. In order to qualify for the small amount of assistance in the budget, a farmer would have to be in dire straits. If what the minister was talking about today is so good, why was it not in the November 12 budget or even in the first budget of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen)? No matter how sincere the Minister of Agriculture is—and I give him credit for being sincere in the interests of the farm community—the fact is that in the cabinet of which he is a member he does not have enough clout to get the funds necessary for agriculture.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Nowlan: What is the problem?

Mr. Whelan: I have a point of order. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is trying to tell the House I have done nothing. In his own riding we built a research centre at a cost of some $20 million. And the hon. member is not even on the government side of the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The minister is not making a point of order.

Mr. Fisher: But it is an important point.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, the minister knows well—and he is now making his exit—the history of that research centre. It took about 11 years from the time it was first conceived in the Department of Agriculture to the time it was finally built. It was on stream in 1957, 1958 and 1962 when a former member from that riding who happened to be of the same political stripe as I am had it finalized. It was the change of government in 1962-63 that deprived the farm community of Atlantic Canada of the much needed research station at Kentville, Nova Scotia. It became entangled in the political cross-currents in the land and it was only after two other research stations were built, due to the concerted efforts of the people, that the station was finally built. And I am proud it was, Mr. Speaker.

But enough of this distraction and diversion. The agricultural budget is not the subject of this debate. Today we are talking about the budget—the third confessional of the Minister of Finance of Monday, June 28. It may be appropriate that this is the ball season because I liken the Minister of Finance to that eminent batter of old called Casey, who swung three times. When he swung and missed the third time there was gloom in Mudville. What we heard from the minister on Monday, June 28 was certainly a message that cast gloom right across the country. It did not live up to the expectation that the minister stimulated when he announced the budget in a hurried fashion in the House not so long ago. Because of those expectations of a budget that was supposed to address some of the fundamental problems of the country, the dollar, the stock market and the buoyancy of the Canadian economy are all much worse today than before the budget.

If we need an example of the reason for this crisis of confidence, it was illustrated in the answer that the Minister of Finance gave to a question put by the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson) in question period today, who referred to yesterday's headline to the effect that Ottawa borrow $2.3 billion to prop up the dollar. The minister gave the most amazing answer and tried to suggest that this was an unusual thing and that it was not a loss when you had to borrow $2.3 billion to prop up a dollar that was sagging. If he could have given a full answer I suppose he might have tried to turn the loss incurred by the interest payment on that $2.3 billion into a profit by his figuring. Most of us cannot begin to appreciate sums of such magnitude and this is part of the problem.

The minister reminds me of the character in Alice in Wonderland. Alice was talking to Humpty-Dumpty who told her that when he used a word it meant just what he chose it to mean and nothing more or less. Alice said that the question was whether he could make a word mean so many different things but Humpty-Dumpty replied that the question was which was to be master, that was all.

A headline in the business section of the Montreal Gazette today refers to the $2.3 billion that is needed to prop up the dollar. We must also consider the run there has been on the dollar since January and the money we have had to borrow to prop it up. Since January the government has taken action in the financial markets to defend the dollar by selling off $1.5 billion in foreign reserves, by borrowing almost $1 billion in standby credits from Canadian banks; by arranging standby borrowing from foreign banks of $1.5 billion; and by arranging for a new bond issue of $500 million, a total of $4.347 billion U.S. since January in order to try to keep our dollar at an artificial level.

Notwithstanding that massive injection of billions of dollars which cost our taxpayers a lot of money, our dollar has fallen three cents in that period. Of the $2.9 billion that there were in foreign reserves at the end of June, $2.4 billion or 82 per cent is represented by funds borrowed from abroad.

We are in dire straits with regard to our foreign reserves and that affects interest rates. This question was not addressed in the budget the other night. The Minister of Agriculture, who has left the House, can talk about stop-gap programs, but I agree with him that it is interest rates that is killing the economy, not this hocus-pocus of band-aid and postage stamp solutions.

I want to come back to the matter of foreign reserves and put in simple terms what that $4.3 billion represents.

In his first budget the minister struck at the oil companies and at the energy program. In the next budget on November 12 he struck at foreign investment. I suggest that in this budget, as my leader suggested earlier in this debate, he struck at the people of Canada. By removing the indexing, in effect he is imposing a $1.3 billion tax increase.

As has been repeated ad infinitum in the House, senior citizens will find that their old age pension is capped. Anyone who suggests that a senior citizen whose income is just above the GIS qualifying level does not need help, does not understand the plight of our senior citizens. Not only will the old age security payment be partially indexed, but pensioners will be paying more tax due to the deindexing of income tax. Old age pensioners not eligible to receive the guaranteed income supplement, that is single people with total incomes above $8,500 and married couples with total incomes of about $14,300, will receive $80 less per person or $160 less per couple in 1983-84 because of the 6 per cent cap on indexing in 1983 and the 5 per cent cap in 1984. They may also have to pay more income tax because of the partial deindexation of the tax system. Meanwhile, upper-income taxpayers earning more than $30,000 per year continue to enjoy the full benefits of the reduction in marginal tax rates in the budget of November 12, 1981.

I suggest that the coach of this team that has the Minister of Finance throwing the pitches had better start finding a substitute for the world series in the fall. This capping of old age pension payments will come home to haunt the Minister of Finance and every member of the government as they go around their constituencies, if and when we ever have a summer adjournment.

It is not just senior citizens who are affected, of course, but those who receive family allowances with a 6 per cent cap. Anyone bringing up a family is faced with escalating food prices. The Minister of Agriculture may talk about some kind of program to maintain the price of food and may extol the virtues of marketing boards, but I should like to know how he will try to control the cost of the imported commodities that go into our food.

The question of unemployment was really not touched upon in the budget. We all know that very soon unemployment insurance premiums are to be revised. A story in The Globe and Mail of July 2 dealt with the sad state of the unemployment insurance fund. Last month payments from the fund showed a 41 per cent increase over the same period last year. More than $2.75 billion was paid out. I will read the whole story because it was tucked in to the back pages of the financial section of a lot of Canadian newspapers which were still trying to digest the budget. The Canadian Press story, which has not been refuted, reads:

• (1640)

The federal Government paid out more than $2.75 billion to unemployed people from January to April this year, a 41 per cent increase over the same period last year, Statistics Canada said yesterday.

Preliminary figures show that for the week ended April 17, claimants qualifying for benefits totalled 1.16 million, a record number.

The count was also 3 per cent more than for the previous month—when a drop is usually recorded—and 45 per cent more than for April, 1981.

That follows release of federal budget figures on Monday that forecast a $2.2 billion deficit for the unemployment insurance fund for 1982 instead of the $218 million shortfall predicted last November.

I will come to the deficit, Mr. Speaker. In fact, there is so much to say about this budget that time really becomes of the essence. The article goes on:

Employment Minister Lloyd Axworthy also confirmed on Tuesday that unemployment insurance premiums will have to be increased because of the soaring jobless rate which now stands at 1.25 million or 10.2 per cent. Mr. Axworthy said the Government would not announce the new premiums until the fall when more complete figures become available.

But Finance Department officials say premiums could rise to $2.50 next year for each $100 of insurable earnings, up from $1.65 this year. Rates for employers, currently $2.31, could rise to $3 or more, the officials said.

That is certainly an increase far above the 6 per cent that the minister is trying to get us to swallow. Then we have the really staggering punchline, because I was in this House when the unemployment bill went through and we warned about some of these problems. It says:

Earlier this year, StatsCan reported that Ottawa paid a record $4.8 billion in unemployment insurance benefits in 1981, a 10 per cent jump over 1980. The fund registered a $360 million surplus last year.

Payments this April amounted to $691 million, down 12 per cent from March but up 51 per cent from the $458 million disbursed in April, 1981.

The previous prediction of a $218 million deficit was based on Finance Department forecasts last November estimating average unemployment in 1982 would be 7.8 per cent.

There are estimates that up to three million people could be unemployed at some time during the year.

We all know, Mr. Speaker, that the minister predicted just seven months ago a deficit of $10.2 billion and then came into the House on June 28 and admitted—and goodness knows what it is going to be at the end of the fiscal year—that it is going to be close to $20 billion. Then we have a prediction for the unemployment insurance fund, which is a special account and not part of the total deficit, of a $218 million deficit; but in fact it is going to be more than $2.5 billion. Anyone in private industry or carrying on business by himself who was so out of kilter in his projections would have gracefully resigned, let alone be fired, for making such irresponsible projections.

I want to come to the point of just what is a billion and how you can relate to the billions the minister talks about in the deficit and the UIC fund. I went back and did a little research on Canada's budgets. There was a minister of the Crown who used to say "What's a million?" That was the Hon. C. D. Howe when he was being chastised for being so loose with public money. Now, of course, it is easier to say "What's a billion?", since we are into that realm. The billions just boggle the mind.

When I first came here as a member in 1965 the total budget was $6.5 billion. With supplementary estimates it got up to $7 billion. When the present Prime Minister took over, the total budget—not the deficit—was $10.2 billion. They were horrendous figures then, yet now we are talking about a deficit of some $20 billion. That is equivalent to someone overspending by almost 30 per cent. No wonder we are in difficulty; interest charges on the debt will be $45 million a day, which is equal to 9,000 taxpayers paying $5,000 in taxes every day.

This budget deficit is more than the total of all federal budgets for the first 74 years of this country's existence. We did not go over $16 billion in total budgets until the 75th year, the war year of 1942, when it went over $18 billion in total. That is the type of monstrosity we are talking about in terms of deficits and debt that this country is carrying. In effect, the debt represents 22 per cent of the budget, or $700 per person, $1,800 per taxpayer. When you stop to think that the average taxpayer pays approximately $4,000 in federal and provincial taxes, then almost 45 per cent of those taxes goes to service the debt. Is it any wonder that we have real problems in this country today when spending has gotten so out of control? We did not have a budget in excess of $2 billion until the fourth year of World War II, 1943, when we had a $4.3 billion budget. And all this money spent to service the debt does not provide one pension, make one medical payment, or help post-secondary education. It is, in effect, money out the window.

I know my time is running out, Mr. Speaker, but one has to stop and look at the fact that it takes 75 years to exceed the $18 billion figure in total budgets, and then in one seven-month miscalculation the Minister of Finance comes into this House to report a $20 billion deficit and then has the nerve to stay on as Minister of Finance. That just shows the enormity of the problem, one that is not going to go away with a waving of the wand like Merlin the Magician.

If things were not so serious, one might call this Minister of Finance the court jester of the finance ministers of the world. He likes to pretend that he is King Canute and can hold back the waves. For years, especially the last two or three, we have heard every possible answer to the problem of interest rates. Up until June 28 the minister has said there is nothing he can do about interest rates in this country. The problem is caused by other countries or the ugly Americans to the south. That was his answer month after month and year after year to the dilemma of high interest rates, certainly since the Liberals took power after the last election. The minister always said it was factors offshore that affected interest rates. Now out of the blue, realizing the deficit has risen to $20 billion in seven months from a $10 billion prediction—a 100 per cent miscalculation—let alone the run on the dollar of $2.75 billion, and the over $4 billion since January, those two factors most likely forced the minister to come into this House with a budget. Then he tried to bamboozle the people. But the people will not be bamboozled when the minister's answers for two years have been that interest rates were always a result of offshore events.

When we look around we see that interest rates in the United States are still 16.5 per cent. In Germany interest rates are 13 per cent and Japan is the only one with an interest rate of 6 per cent. France's interest rate is 14 per cent, as is Great Britain's. Switzerland's interest rate is 9 per cent and Italy's rate is 22 per cent. Canada's interest rate is anywhere from 17 per cent to 18 per cent to 19 per cent, depending on how preferred a customer you are. Some people pay over 20 per cent on their bank borrowings. Yet the minister brought in this 6 and 5 per cent tangle, about which he is supposed to excite Canadians and perhaps have them believe in him when Canadians have no reason to believe in him in view of the fact that he has struck out on two previous occasions. I suggest the way the stock market has reacted and the way the dollar has reacted since the Monday night budget means that the minister has also struck out again.

The only way this crisis of confidence in Canada can be resolved is to have a cleansing of this government. If this government is so proud of everything it has done, then it should go to the people with an election. The motion we are voting on tonight is that the government resign. Certainly if the Minister of Finance had any political integrity at all after he has led the Canadian people for two years down this dead-end street of high interest rates which are crippling the economy, he would resign.

You can talk about all the billions of dollars worth of programs you want, Mr. Speaker, but there is one item which really focuses attention on the mentality which affects this place in terms of spending other people's money, that is, spending taxpayers' money. The other day my colleague, the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm), gave an example of this. It is almost impossible for the public to appreciate what billions of dollars are. Even we cannot appreciate billions of dollars. But when you get some human story involving dollars misspent perhaps the figure can be multiplied and someone can understand what is meant when you talk about billions of dollars. The hon. member for Peterborough moved a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on June 29, 1982. It was not approved, of course. He discussed the case of one Janet Smith, an economic adviser in the Privy Council Office. An article was written about Janet Smith in the Peterborough Examiner on June 28, 1982. This was the same day as the budget. The article is entitled "Stop Janet Smith". It reads:

> Public criticism of government's excessive spending has been less effective than it should have been. The reason in our view is that it lacked focus.
> No more.
> Last week the Privy Council Office announced that it will send Janet Smith to the Riviera to learn French. She will be there for four months. The bill to the Canadian taxpayer will be $11,800, plus her full salary.
> Now, Ms. Smith is an economic adviser to the Privy Council. She is paid a salary of $75,000 a year. She is not, however, bilingual, as the job requires. Not for want of trying. She has tried and failed, a number of times.
>
> The government felt that sending Smith to the federal language school in Quebec City would not work. She would be aware there of the issues of the day, and that would detract from her ability to learn.
> Four months in the South of France, at public expense, was the obvious alternative. No issues, no money worries to distract her at Nice or Cannes or St. Tropez or whatever.
> We make this suggestion with no tongue in cheek:
> Every Canadian capable of writing a letter in either official language, or telephoning a government office or a Member of Parliament, should do so and issue the order clearly understandable in either English or French: STOP.
> We should make it our business to see to it that Janet Smith, no matter what her difficulties with French, no matter what contribution she has made as an economic adviser to the present economic mess, does not get four months holiday in France at public expense.
> We should make it our business to stop these gross abuses of public money.

I will not read any more, Mr. Speaker, because I see you have indicated that my time is up. But it is an interesting, ironic twist that on the very day of the budget this story breaks of an economic adviser in the Privy Council Office, well paid by any standard, going at taxpayers' expense, in the amount of almost $12,000, to France to try and develop a facility in French, for which we all commend her, when we have language schools in Canada that certainly should be able to do the job. That is absolutely symptomatic of the waste of taxpayers' money.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nowlan: The situation will not be changed until we are able to change this government. The sooner we have that opportunity, the better it will be for the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Renfrew-Nipissing-Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, at times such as these when we have several areas of international tension, pressures from international economic difficulties and dislocations in the marketplace, high unemployment which has become the mark of industrialized countries, and high interest rates accompanied by high inflation, governments must have underlying, long-term goals to overcome these enemies of man and management. While we talk about long-term goals, governments must also be flexible in their policies to make sure that they arrive at those goals to recovery. If a policy does not work, then it should be changed and adjusted and no finance minister or any government should be hidebound or glued to interim policies that are not contributing to the long-term goals of recovery for the economy and smoother times for people in all walks of life. The major aims of the June 28 budget are to lower inflation and interest rates. In my view, interest rates are one of the biggest curses of all times. The budget is designed to help Canadians who are most in need of lower interest rates and the complimentary reduction in the Canadian rate of inflation. People buying new homes, whether they be existing ones or new ones, will get outright grants. Parents will receive a bigger child credit cheque. Business people will get significant relief from the high cost of money at the bank. Government tax revenues will be reallocated this year and next to activities that create jobs now and encourage new investment now. The thrust of this budget is to restore confidence, confidence in a future where inflation is reduced, and a future where new investment creates the jobs we need. If that confidence is not restored, you will not have money going into the economy and into development.

The size of the deficit is not due to massive government expenditures as some would have everyone believe. It is due to a lessening of revenues at the bottom and inflationary costs at the top. Therefore, unless inflation can be decreased the deficit will continue to increase at the top, and unless interest rates decline, the deficit will continue to grow at the bottom because there will be fewer taxpayers to provide for revenue.

It is important, then, that the June 28 budget set out to achieve the following: an attack on high interest rates; an attack on inflation; reallocation of funds to create jobs; a new housing package and new tax proposals. As a result, buyers of new homes will get a $3,000 grant on their purchases which will lessen interest charges. I am sure that other member's offices, like my own, have had many calls about this $3,000 grant. The forms will not be ready for ten days to two weeks but people will apply for the grants in the normal way through Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

Small business people will be able to get money at an interest rate 4 per cent less than the going rate for investment in plant and equipment. Farmers and fishermen, too, will be able to get money at this lower interest rate.

Long-term planning by any government is not complete unless we take into account some of the obvious issues or problems that lie ahead. We cannot always look at tomorrow morning. Whether or not we recognize it, we are in the middle of another industrial revolution. We are rapidly moving along in the change-over from manpower to the fast-moving era of high technology. Computerization is simply a household term. We are rearing children today who may have to be retrained two or three times during their lives. Education systems across Canada must be upgraded to meet the requirements of the times, or they will be guilty of contributing to future unemployment, an unsettled work force and more costly production because many will have to continue to be trained on the job.

What about security? There will be very little security in many areas of employment unless we revamp and reform the diversity and the plethora of private pension plans across the country. Right now there are private pension plans in Canada from which a person cannot collect even in part until he or she has served the full required number of years. There are pension plans which do not pay the spouse a cent if the employee dies in the last year of service. The use of the survivor option must be put into practice even for surviving spouses to collect as little as 40 per cent. Some plans pay a flat rate benefit or so much for each year of service. There are other plans where an employee can work for 20 years, but if she or he is not 45 years of age, the person is deemed not to have a vested right in the plan and therefore, if laid off permanently, walks away from the job with nothing. This is true in plans where the employer contributes 100 per cent to the plan, but surely employees must feel that they have earned that money. Portable pension plans are a must if we are to look in a realistic way at the future which our children will face. Some provinces and the federal government have made minor moves in pension reform at their levels, but a major overhaul by the two senior levels of government is a necessity.

At the beginning of 1980 there were 14,600 private pension plans in Canada, covering 48 per cent of paid employed workers or 4.5 million employees. This coverage ratio remained virtually unchanged from 1978. The figures indicate that 54 per cent of males were covered by these plans and 38 per cent of females. For almost 60 per cent of private sector plan members pensions were based upon average earnings over the entire period of employment, even though it might be 35 or 40 years, or they were on a flat rate amount per year of service. By comparison, 95 per cent of public sector plans were based upon the higher earnings in the years just prior to retirement, for example the last six years. Two thirds of public sector plans had indexing provisions, while less than 5 per cent of private sector plans had automatic indexing which was generally limited to less than 3 per cent annually or a fixed dollar amount.

In 1979, $3.3 billion in private pension or superannuation benefits was paid to 829,000 beneficiaries, for an average of $3,930 per person. That is not a very big income, but $4,516 was the average for males and $2,929 was the average for females. An additional $8.2 billion was paid by old age security, guaranteed income supplement and the Canada and Quebec pension plans. Employee and employer contributions to all employer-sponsored pension plans amounted to $7.6 billion during 1979. Nearly two thirds of this amount was paid into trusteed pension plans with funds amounting to $52 billion at book value at the end of 1980. There is no danger of those pension plans going broke. This $52 billion in trusteed pension plans means cheap borrowing for governments and others who borrow from them. It is no secret that governments borrow from them. In Ontario the provincial government borrows heavily from them. The CNR is known to borrow funds from its unions' pension plan. Other Crown corporations and provincial governments across Canada do it. As a result they are able to roll over their debt at very cheap rates of interest.

One does not need to be a great mathematician to realize that pension plans are wealthy and will continue to become wealthier if only a little more than $1 out of every $3 taken in on average is paid out in benefits. A Department of National Health and Welfare study entitled "Pension Plan Coverage by Level of Earnings and Age, 1978 and 1979" confirms that private pension plan coverage is low, although it increases with level of earnings. While 48 per cent of Canada and Quebec pension plan contributors are members of employer-sponsored pension plans, only 11 per cent of those people at the lowest income levels are covered by an employer-sponsored pension plan. However, 84 per cent of those with earnings in excess of $30,000 are protected by employer-sponsored pension plans.

Reform of pension plans across Canada will mean more money in circulation and less sitting in pension funds. In the long run it could also mean less demand on public funded pension plans and greater justice and fairness in pension plans themselves. Therefore it is incumbent upon us to move quickly in meeting the challenges of pension reform. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) listed four main goals of pension reform—all people should be able to belong to pension plans, private pensions must be portable, all pensioners should be protected from inflation, and women must be treated more equally.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare has stated on many occasions that one top priority of government is to increase the guaranteed income supplement for single pensioners. She stated that this would be done as soon as resources permitted. This point now made, I must state that the most fundamental pension reform issue facing us is the continuing lack of adequate pension coverage. Without significant improvements in this area, other reforms will be meaningless for many Canadians. This kind of reform is in the true tradition of the Liberal Party of Canada, and we should act.

Some time ago a "W5" program on CTV gave a rather warped view of the activities of the Department of National Defence. It is important that the updating of defence equipment be placed clearly on the record. Because the Department of National Defence is very important in relation to any budget, I would like to turn my attention to a subject which is not often given the attention it merits. Of course, I refer to the Department of National Defence and the work of the Canadian military.

It must be greatly apparent to all hon. members that the current international environment is fraught with conflict—tensions in the Middle East, the Russian invasion of Afghanistan, tensions in Eastern Europe and in the Americas are rising, and there is renewed mutual suspicion in East-West relations. Although the SALT or START process, Strategic Arms Reduction Talks, is continuing and the UNSSOD II is still in session at the United Nations, there remains an uneasiness in the western alliance. This uneasiness has been translated into a new awareness of the needs of national military requirements.

I am happy to note that the Canadian government acted responsibly in recognition of the changing strategic setting and has allocated substantially increased financial allotments to the Department of National Defence over the past two years. The minister told me that he is confident that when the strategic overview is presented to cabinet his department will continue to receive a substantially larger share of the federal budget than in previous years.

This year, the share of the federal budget to be devoted to defence expenditures is 9.6 per cent, which is not a bad share when considering there are approximately 32 government departments and many Crown corporations. This will allow the Department of National Defence to pursue its re-equipment program with vigour. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne) is to be complimented for his efforts to re-equip the Canadian Armed Forces. It is obvious that he has some clout in cabinet and that is important to the members of our armed forces wherever they may be in the world.

The CF-18 Hornet fighter aircraft project is on schedule. The first of the 138 aircraft is due for delivery in October of this year. The final aircraft delivery is scheduled for late 1988 and the cost in today's dollars is expected to be about $5.2 billion.

The Canadian patrol frigate project is moving ahead. The two consortia involved in the design drawings for these are Saint John drydock in New Brunswick and Scan Marine in Longueuil, Quebec. All proposals will be presented to the department for approval and for a decision to award the contract. Some of the lessons learned by the British navy in the Falklands will be taken into consideration. New defence mechanisms to combat missile warfare will be included.

The next real milestone is in October of this fall, at which time proposals from the two contractors will be considered and the cost of these six frigates is expected to be approximately $2.6 billion in 1981 dollar value.

The Canadian Armed Forces and the militia units now have their full complement of general purpose armoured vehicles, such as the Grizzly, Cougar and the Husky. Those yet to come are for the logistics reserve. To date, 475 of the 491 vehicles contracted for have been delivered at a cost of $317.9 million.

As everyone knows, the Canadian Armed Forces have had an aging fleet of trucks to work with for some time. I am sure that no one was more pleased than defence personnel when they heard that a total of 2,767 of these vehicles have been ordered and the project is on schedule. The first one came off the assembly line on April 30 this year. The last one is to be delivered by mid-1985. The cost of this order will be $234 million in 1980 Canadian dollars.

All 128 Leopard tanks which were ordered some time ago have long since been delivered but a small quantity of support spares are to be delivered by December, 1983. Most of these tanks are now in Europe and the total cost was $261.5 million in 1980 dollar value.

All 18 long-range patrol aircraft, well known as the Aurora, have been delievered and are operating very successfully. Support spares are expected to be received until December, 1984 at which time the project will be completed. To date $450 million has been paid out for these out of a total cost of $582.6 million to 1984.

The present authorized military person-years for the Department of National Defence is 81,148 in the regular forces and 21,372 in the reserve forces. The authorized civilian person-years is 36,893. The Department of National Defence budget provides for a military personnel payroll of $2.168 billion or 31 per cent of the total budget. The civilian payroll is $834 million, or 12 per cent of the total. Operating costs are $1.789 billion. The capital cost program for the department is $1.511 billion. Grants for contributions come to $196 million. Statutory government contributions to benefit plans amount to $543 million, for a total budget in 1982-83 of $7,041 million.

This year's budget represents a 19.6 per cent increase over lat year's budget. During the 1983-84 and 1984-85 fiscal years, the budget for national defence in Canada will increase by 37 per cent over those two years. The department is quite confident that it will be able to live up to the 3 per cent commitment that NATO ministers agreed to and that their home governments agreed to some time ago. That is a real increase in budget in terms of new equipment for NATO forces.

There has been considerable speculation with regard to the announced reduction in departmental spending estimates of $100 million over each of the next two years. I would like to repeat what the Minister of National Defence said last week on this subject. The reduction of $100 million per year will not be a loss to DND in strict terms. More to the point, there will be a saving. This year the DND budget is 7.041 billion. Included in this was a projected 13 per cent increase for military pay. The final agreement with Treasury Board that was negotiated ended up at an 11 per cent increase. Therefore, there will be a 2 per cent savings which amounts to some $40 million. Next year the military will be held to a 6 per cent increase and 5 per cent the following year, as outlined by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). Therefore, the savings to DND will be in the area of $120 million to $140 million each year based on the fact that there is a saving of about $20 million for every 1 per cent increase in pay allocation. There will be no negative impact on any of the department's operational, maintenance or personnel requirements and none of the current capital euqipment programs referred to already will be affected.

The main thrust of the June 28 budget of the Minister of Finance is to reduce inflationary pressures. The Department of National Defence and the Canadian military have accepted their share of the collective Canadian burden. As they demonstrate their commitment to the economic battle ahead, I hope that other Canadian employers will follow suit so that it will be fair to all.

Before leaving the subject of defence, I would like to mention the work of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence during recent months, especially the excellent report on the reserves in Canada. Reserve allocations were again increased this year and improvements to equipment and support for our reserve units are proceeding. Improvements, however, must be made in concert with our over-all defence needs and the question in this regard is not simply one of funding, even though implementation of the major recommendations of the committee would require fairly large doses of additional funds to be allocated to defence. It is rather a question of how Canada, as a member of the North Atlantic Alliance, is to respond to the still emerging security requirements of a changing and far from encouraging strategic setting. I am encouraged that we will meet this challenge and the government will continue to provide the defence department with the resources to do so.

There is one item I want to mention before I close the subject. It is a matter which I would like to bring to the attention of the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy). It concerns the fact that members of the armed forces can be posted in Canada for 10 or 12 years and then suddenly be posted overseas. The member's spouse may have been in the labour market for the course of those years, but the moment the spouse leaves Canada to be with the partner overseas they have no claim for unemployment insurance benefits whatsoever. There should at least be an adjustment payment to such people when they leave the country. This is because their chances of employment at the locations they are going to are very slim indeed. As I said before, the Minister of Finance mentioned in his previous budget that the 3 per cent real increase in the NATO budget, our contribution to NATO as agreed to by NATO defence ministers and their respective governments, will be met.

I now want to turn to how farmers benefit from the budget of June 28. The budget provides numerous measures of interest to farmers, including financial assistance, investment incentives and other measures which will benefit farmers through their effect on the economy. Special farm financial assistance is a new loan program under the Farm Credit Corporation which provides $100 million in 1982-83, and a further $100 million in 1984-85 for farmers in financial distress. Through an interest rate rebate these loans, which should benefit some 1,600 to 1,800 farmers, will be provided at four percentage points below the regular FCC lending rate in those first two years.

The small business investment grant is an interest subsidy program for both incorporated and unincorporated small businesses, including farms, and it provides $400 million over two years to reduce interest costs by up to four percentage points on loans for new investment. The loans are limited to $500,000 and exclude financing of land, leased property and automobiles. Subject to such limitations, loans under the Farm Credit Corporation could qualify.

The small business bond program, introduced in the November, 1981 budget, is continued in its present form to refinance small businesses, including farms in financial difficulty. The taxation of investment income and interest rates is an important subject. Proposals have been made to reduce the taxation of the inflationary component of interest income and capital gains earned on new investments. Such approaches, if implemented, would reduce the cost of borrowing to farmers and other small businessmen as well as home buyers. The 12.5 per cent tax on dividends paid by small corporations, including farm corporations, is postponed to January, 1983 and clarification is provided on the application of the reserve and forward averaging provisions.

The general thrust of the budget is to bring down inflation by wage and price restraint and stimulate investment and job creation while containing the deficit. This will hopefully help economic recovery, and thus the prosperity of agriculture. When agriculture does not prosper, neither does the implement dealer, nor the car dealer, nor the small business operator in that area. There are many offshoots.

How many farms will be assisted by the $100 million provided to the Farm Credit Corporation in the June 28 budget? The program is expected to last for a period of two years with loan approvals of $100 million expected in 1982-83 and $100 million in 1983-84. This should assist about 700 farmers. What are the benefits of the program to the farmer? The farmer receives an interest rebate of four percentage points for two years to reduce his effective cost of credit. Loans approved under the FCC's current interest rate of 16.5 per cent would actually cost the farmer 12.5 per cent for two years.

On the matter of the road to recovery, in these times of international, political and economic instability, we as Canadians must face harsh realities. We must all join in to fight inflation, to boost confidence, to take steps to create jobs and to deal squarely with the deficit. The government has outlined a viable and functional program of recovery. It has set specific guidelines to deal with every facet of the economy, both short term and long term. As I said initially, those short-term policies must be flexible and the government and the Minister of Finance must be prepared to change if the long-term goals are not seen in the light in which they should be seen. Co-operation is the keynote of this schedule of recovery and only co-operation will lead to its successful implementation.

Canadians have responded positively to many other emergencies or crises in the past and I have faith that they will do so again as long as they perceive that all is being done fairly, and this word is the key. The government has identified factors which have combined to make Canadian businesses reluctant to expand. They include idle capacity of equipment, falling profits, heavy interest costs and expanding debt.

In order to boost confidence in the marketplace, the government has presented the following proposals: Canadians investing funds in a new form of term deposit would not be taxed on that part of interest which reflects only the rate of inflation. Canadians investing funds in new plans for purchase of common shares of Canadian corporations would not be taxed on that part of the capital gain on such shares that reflect only inflation.

I have others listed which I would like to put on the record, but I see that my allotted time has expired, and I want to thank hon. members of this House for their attention.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Does the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) rise on a point of order?

Mr. McKinnon: I only want to take a moment or so of the time of the House. I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question?

Mr. Hopkins: Yes, I will permit a question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member said that the minister had promised there would be no change in that 3 per cent commitment to NATO because of any cuts made in the budget. I know that he is chairman of the NATO Parliamentarians Association, but he is not a member of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence, and perhaps he does not know that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne) has already admitted in committee that it would not make it, even before the budget cut. With $100 million taken out of the budget, it is bound to fall 1.5 per cent lower, and it is down around a 1 per cent increase in real terms. I know that he would not want to misinform the House and the country.

Mr. Hopkins: Mr. Speaker, in my speech I already mentioned that the $100 million taken out of the budget did not, in fact, affect equipment purchases. I know the hon. member knows, as we know, that one of the last witnesses we heard in the defence committee said that it was something like 2.95 per cent. But if the hon. member looks at the over-all budget from now through to 1987, the 19.6 per cent in the budget this year and an additional 37 per cent over the next two years is built into it, so that the average will come out to 3 per cent over that period of time. Therefore, we will be able to pay for all the equipment purchases I have listed in my speech here today.

Again, I think the Minister of National Defence has done an excellent job in lobbying with the cabinet for the necessary funds. We know that all departments like to be well financed, but he has been fortunate in seeing to it that the defence department is finally coming into its own and that Canada may stand proud with all of the new equipment that is coming on stream.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. Before I recognize the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Patterson), I should attempt to convey to the House that some difficulty has arisen with respect to the number of hon. members who will speak for each of the parties. I do not think it is necessary, unless hon. members wish to do so, to proceed by way of points of order to settle the matter. The Chair will be pleased to hear from those hon. members who may have a comment to make in this regard, but in the meantime, because of the order of hon. members who have spoken thus far, it would now be the disposition of the Chair to allow the hon. member for Fraser Valley East to speak. Then, whether it be this evening or before six o'clock, I would proceed again to recognize an hon. member to my left in the Conservative Party. Unless the Chair is informed differently during the course of the evening, I will still be looking to my left later on.

• (1730)

There has been some disorganization of the order of members who have been speaking. I certainly will be pleased, as I indicated, to hear hon. members who may be able to assist the Chair in this regard. This is not to be seen as a ruling of the Chair.

I also suggest that it is not necessary to proceed by means of points of order. I will be pleased to hear those members who wish to make a point to me, in my ear, so to speak.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I believe that the first speaker today was the hon. member for Trinity (Miss Nicholson) followed by the member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn), followed by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), followed by the distinguished member from Nouvelle-Écosse, the hon. member for Annapolis Valley-Hants (Mr. Nowlan), and then the hon. member for Renfrew-Nipissing-Pembroke (Mr. Hopkins). That seems to be the normal rotation. I am sorry, I do not understand what the difficulty is that has arisen.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I will be pleased to discuss it with the hon. member or any other hon. member. May I say again that the Chair has not made a ruling as to the order in which speakers will be recognized. I have indicated that there is some disproportion that has occurred in terms of the usual procedure in the recognition of speakers. That is not an order of the Chair. There is no difficulty. The Chair can be corrected and educated at any time. In the meantime, I did want to indicate to the House that the disposition at the moment will be to recognize several speakers from the Conservative Party, because it appears to the Chair that there has been an imbalance. But it is not final and I would be pleased to be educated as we move along.

The hon. member for Fraser Valley East.

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, the motion which provides the launching pad for this debate was introduced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) in the following words:

> That this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

The minister then proceeded with a litany of serious and growing problems confronting the people of Canada, which I believe have resulted in large measure from the government's ill-conceived economic policy over the past number of years. He was absolutely right in stating:

> Canadians want to know how we can get our economy growing again, how we can get industry to invest, expand and provide the jobs our people need. A million two hundred thousand among us are unemployed. Still more are struggling to make ends meet in the face of high inflation and high interest rates. We are still suffering, one way or another, from the recession that is battering our economy. We are all searching for a way out of it.

The minister's gloomy assessment is certainly well-founded. As one scans the picture of the past few months of this year, it will be noted that every indicator underlines the serious condition in which we find ourselves, and predictions for the future are anything but encouraging. The Canadian economy is in a tailspin. The gross national product fell by 2 per cent in the first quarter, the third consecutive quarter of negative growth, and the largest quarterly decline in 28 years. The Statistics Canada leading indicator has fallen for nine consecutive months. Corporate profits in the first quarter of 1982 were only 41 per cent of the level recorded in the same period in 1981. Manufacturing output in the first quarter of 1982 was only at 70 per cent of capacity—the lowest level of capacity utilization since records were first kept in 1961.

The transportation industry was operating only at 51 per cent of capacity. According to the Conference Board, consumer confidence is at the lowest level in the 20 year history of the consumer attitude index. Business confidence is at the lowest level in the five-year history of the business opinion service. In the past five months of 1982, 4,429 businesses have declared bankruptcy—up 36 per cent from the same period in 1981, and up 55 per cent from the same period in 1980. Farm bankruptcies are up by 61 per cent from last year's level and up 111 per cent from 1980. The unemployment rate in May was 10.2 per cent. A record 1,241,000 Canadians were unemployed. I believe that in effect it was greater than that. There has been a net loss of 320,000 jobs since August and 157,000 in manufacturing alone.

This would indicate, Mr. Speaker, that the minister's gloomy statement has been very well proven. Of course, when the members of the opposition are charged with being prophets of gloom, then, I guess, that will have to tie in the Minister of Finance as well, because that was the statement, those were the indications, that he gave to us in the outline that I present.

Interest rates have started to climb again as the government attempts to support the dollar. The chartered banks' prime rate is now 18.25 per cent compared to 16.5 per cent in the United States. At the time of the 1980 election, the Canadian chartered bank prime rate was 14.75 per cent. Ten years ago, it was 6 per cent. Consumer prices in 1982 were 11.8 per cent higher than in 1981. In contrast, the United States inflation rate is only 6.7 per cent. The main factors behind the May inflation rate were housing, up 13.4 per cent, and transportation up 16.1 per cent on a year over year basis. On a month to month basis, meat prices were 7.5 per cent higher in May than in April. The Canadian dollar is trading for about 78 cents, U.S., and has been as low as 76.86, U.S., in recent days. In October, 1976, the dollar was worth $1.03 U.S. At the time of the November budget the dollar was worth 0.85 U.S.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me continue to support the statement of the minister. I would not like to disappoint him and take exception to what he said, because these figures do point out the very serious condition that the minister outlined in his introductory presentation.

Since the election, gasoline prices have risen by 86 cents per gallon. Since the October, 1980 budget, 270 drilling and service rigs, worth a total of $1.1 billion, have left Canada. The Alsands project was shelved. The recession has made a shambles of the spending and revenue forecast made in the November budget. Spending will be more than the forecast $75.5 billion and revenues will be significantly less than the forecast $65 billion. As a consequence, Mr. Speaker, it is expected that the deficit originally forecast to be $10.5 billion this year will be somewhere in the range of $18 to $20 billion, and possibly higher.

This is the picture, Mr. Speaker, that has brought us to the present time. This is the backdrop to the picture and the presentation that the minister made just a few nights ago. Now, what are the projections for the future? In November, the Minister of Finance told us that in 1982 there would be real growth in the economy of 2.2 per cent, that the unemployment rate would be 7.8 per cent and that inflation would rise to 11.7 per cent. Now, less than seven months later, he tells us that we will have to endure a drop in the real gross national product of 2 per cent—the worst record of any OECD country—that the unemployment rate will be 10 per cent and that despite the oil glut and lower than expected food prices, inflation will remain at 11 per cent. The projected negative growth rate of the economy, minus 2 per cent, is the worst since 1962.

The government does not tell the Canadian people or the financial markets what it dares to project for the future. This is the same Minister of Finance who told us that between the second quarter of 1981 and the second quarter of 1982 real output would increase by about 1.5 per cent, yet during the first months of that period it had fallen 4 per cent.

I could go on with this litany of problems and the steps downward and backward as far as the economy is concerned, but I do not think it is necessary to do so at the present time. Those Canadians who have been speaking out regarding the budget provisions have been very disappointed and very pessimistic. Articles appearing in foreign periodicals have also indicated that there is little hope for the Canadian economy.

On the evening of Monday, June 28 the minister brought down another budget which failed dismally to present any policy that will in any way solve our major problems.

Mr. Paproski: Disaster.

Mr. Patterson: Perhaps some of the provisions in the budget have some value, but in the over-all picture it is difficult to understand how the minister has the gall to ask the House to approve in general the budgetary policies of the government when the response from the public is that the budget is a compounding of our problems rather than a cure and when the answers to questions directed to the government are devoid of any real hope and confidence.

I would like to place on the record one or two statements which have appeared in newspapers. An article in the Ottawa Citizen of July 3 states that the Canadian Chamber of Commerce has backed off from its initial acceptance of the federal budget by saying that the measures introduced will not bring down inflation or boost sagging investor confidence. The chamber also repeated the statement made by the president that the chamber is concerned about the anticipated $19.6 billion deficit this coming year. The article says that the magnitude of the deficit is alarming and that the mere existence of such a large deficit will continue to fuel inflationary expectations and erode investor confidence. That was one statement. Mr. Charles Lynch, who is rather well known in media circles, stated that it now seems clear that the budget is two and a half years ahead of its time and that the Minister of Finance is trying to catch up, having fiddled while the economy was burning and the deficit was eating up everything in sight.

Mr. Paproski: Brutal, brutal government.

Mr. Parent: Don't listen to the guy behind you.

Mr. Patterson: I heard a comment. I am not quite sure what was said.

As I said, many commentators have expressed the very same views and launched the same criticisms regarding the present budget as those which were launched against the budget of last November.

As I indicated, there are several components of this budget which warrant some degree of support. Such components are retraining programs and assistance to home owners, small business, agriculture, fisheries and so forth. These are good, but in the over-all picture they will do little to ease the feeling of disillusionment and distrust with which Canadians view the policies and actions of this government. I say there is some degree of support, but a close analysis of even the seemingly more worthwhile proposals demonstrates that they are so fraught with uncertainty and vagueness that even now the result is skepticism and anger across the nation.

We all remember that the leader of my party appointed a task force to go across the country and give the people an opportunity to express their views in connection with the previous budget. Of course, to a large extent the philosophy of the previous budget and also many of the policies of the government are being carried on with the present budget. The people who appeared before our task force came to some conclusions, and one of them was that the November budget—and I say possibly the present budget—was completely inappropriate for the then current state of the economy, and indicated clearly that the government had embarked on a course designed to remove incentives for the achievement of economic and social goals from the taxation system and to replace them with direct government grants and subsidies. It seems to me that the direction in which we are going is to make everybody more and more dependent upon government not only for their livelihood through being employed by governments but also through being dependent upon governments for those assistance programs of which they are desperately in need because of the economic conditions in which we find ourselves.

In the course of the hearings of our task force certain individuals and groups requested that their identities be not revealed because they were afraid grants or contracts would not be forthcoming. Although they were critical of the government, they said, "We have to work with these fellows." They also pointed out that in connection with applications under various programs they were afraid their applications would be denied because of the criticism they were launching. Is this the kind of society we want in Canada? Are our people to be brought to heel by the fear that the political system might be used to destroy them unless they bow submissively at the feet of a dictatorial government? There is real fear across the country that our society will become so regimented, regulated and dominated by government that political and economic freedoms will soon be things of the past.

I mentioned the fact that some views were gleaned at the hearings held by the task force. The task force listened to Canadians expressing their views on the situation with which they were confronted. There was and is a growing feeling that the government has closed its ears to the voice of the people and has closed its ears to the needs of the various areas of the country. This committee provided a vehicle by which citizens could be heard and their views on the November 1981 budget considered. I want to tie all that in with the budget that is now before us which, while it gives assistance to a few people in several different sectors, does absolutely nothing to meet the challenge of the major problems facing the country at the present time which are making the programs which the government has proposed necessary.

The spokesmen for the government have said a number of times, and it was repeated by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) today, that they have never heard a positive suggestion come from members on this side of the House. Someone across the aisle says that that is right, Mr. Speaker, but that must be someone who is not often in the House.

Just the other day the leader of this party outlined some of the basic principles that would be necessary if we are to turn the economy around. Certainly this is what the Minister of Finance said must be done—that we have to change and improve conditions, that we have to improve employment and investment and a lot of other things. My leader stated categorically what the steps and the important principles were that must be underlined in any program to achieve these objectives.

Apparently hon. members opposite who are chiming in today did not hear the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) when he spoke the other day and presented some of the changes that would be brought in under the direction of a Progressive Conservative government. I will enumerate some of them. We would eliminate the provisions of the November budget. The Minister of Finance has not done this; he has skirted around it and changed certain things. What he should have done was to say that the budget was a disaster, as the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) said, and that it is to be changed and the government will start all over again.

The hon. member for Mississauga South said that if we were the government we would change the National Energy Program, and he outlined some of those changes. This is one of the things that has caused havoc in the business community of the nation. It has brought untold hardship and unemployment to thousands of workers; it has scared off investment and has been a disaster in total. My colleague also said that we would attack government spending and that an all-party committee would be appointed to consider priorities in government spending. He enumerated some of the things that are in question and suggested the elimination of the capital gains tax and of many other things.

I suggest that we on this side of the House have made many positive suggestions to the government, but it has not listened. Once in a while it takes up one of our suggestions and brings it forward in another guise but it has not repudiated this disastrous budget although my leader and my colleagues have pointed out what should be done to bring about a readjustment in the economy.

One of the recommendations of this committee of which I spoke was to restore individual and investor confidence by establishing a climate for careful development and expansion. This recommendation was the result of discussions held across the nation. Another recommendation was that we should get moving with major projects to stimulate the economy, to create jobs and to meet urgent national and regional needs. It was recommended that the November 12 budget be withdrawn and replaced with an economic plan to provide job creation and economic development to the private sector. Instead of that, the government depends more and more upon the public sector to bring people under its control where they are robbed of the opportunity of making their own decisions and living their own lives.

Now the government asks what should be done? The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) pleaded with the opposition to help the government. Time and time again the government says that we must work together to beat the demons of inflation and unemployment. In November of 1979 it never thought of co-operation or working together. It had only one thing on its mind and that was to get back into office. Now it is back and it pleads for us to work together for the good of the nation. I wish there was more consistency in the government benches.

The government has failed to keep its promises to wrestle inflation to the ground, to beat unemployment, to bring interest rates down and to introduce equity and fairness in taxation and housing. It has failed, Mr. Speaker. A few changes have been made, but nothing substantial enough to meet the challenge.

The minister lacks confidence in his own declaration to the extent that he would not make any projections in his budget. He was ashamed to do that because he has been wrong so often and did not want to risk being wrong again.

The policies of the government have been disastrous and there is no confidence in the economy, in the government or in our ability to pull ourselves up. That has been reflected in the value of the Canadian dollar. The government is borrowing billions of dollars to try to bolster our dollar. Surely there is a positive way to meet these challenges and solve national problems, that is through the competent management of our affairs that Canadians have a right to expect.

This government cannot do it, so it should resign and let someone else take over.

Mr. Fisher: It may be completely unnecessary, Mr. Speaker, but in light of the current confusion, can we call it six o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At 6 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): When the House rose at six o'clock the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Patterson) had completed his remarks. I am given to understand that over the dinner hour the matter of the speakers on the floor during the evening has been settled. If that is not the case, then of course the Chair is prepared to assist in any way. The hon. member for Welland (Mr. Parent).

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I just cannot refuse the thunderous applause which invites me to speak. You were correct, Mr. Speaker, when you said the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Patterson) had just finished speaking at the break. He quoted a number of facts and figures, which I agree with for the most part. If I may say so, there are a few things which merit our looking at as members and, hopefully with our eyes open, as Canadians. I say that in the hope that the debate tonight will not be as partisan as it was earlier and that we can look at some of the problems and some of the solutions we on this side have to offer.

Today in Canada, Mr. Speaker, over 1.2 million Canadians are without jobs. That is a fact. Throughout the industrial world some 30 million people are unemployed. These numbers are not mere statistics. Each of them represents a personal tragedy of immense human costs.

• (2010)

About three months ago I had the occasion to speak to an audience at Centennial High School in Welland. There a young gentleman, who was the leader of a group called Coalition of the Unemployed, said, "Look at us, we are not mere statistics. We are humans. We have families. We want to work." I believe that this young gentleman was saying precisely what the 1.2 million unemployed Canadians would be saying if they were here.

Earlier this month the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) attended the economic summit with the other leaders of the leading industrial nations of the free world. At the Versailles Summit, the Prime Minister used the word "crisis" to describe the state of the world's economy. Surely that description is no exaggeration. All of our summit partners hope for a recovery. All of the leaders came away from Versailles determined to work within their own countries for that recovery. But they left with little assurance that there will be the kind of concerted economic action the world situation so desperately demands. Realizing that the beginning of recovery would therefore be further delayed, the Government of Canada concluded that it must act, and it must act at once. To that end a new budget has been brought down.

The Prime Minister, just last Wednesday, asked all the premiers to join as full partners in the battle for economic renewal.

The road back to recovery must begin with a realistic assessment of what this country can control and what we cannot control. Canada cannot deal with its economic problems in isolation; we can ease, if not eliminate, the impact of some problems, but the solutions to other difficulties depend on events beyond our borders. I do not think there are many members here who would disagree with these statements. We must know what we can realistically change and what is beyond our power to change by ourselves.

Canada is a trading nation. If our partners are suffering from a worldwide recession, then the international market for our products will be weak. That is an economic fact of life we cannot change by ourselves.

Canada is a resource exporting nation, and commodity prices have experienced their steepest decline in decades. At 58 cents a pound, for example, copper is at its lowest price since the 1930s. Lead, zinc and other minerals are not far behind. There is little that the government can do about the fall in worldwide commodity prices.

Finally, interest rates in the United States are hurting the whole world economy, and that is what the Prime Minister told President Reagan at Versailles. We all know that. The Canadian dollar, like every other western currency, is captive to the extraordinarily high real rate of interest in the U.S. These are the hard realities of a worldwide economic interdependence.

Yet, while recognizing the force of world conditions, we must acknowledge too that many of our problems originate here at home. Our inflation rate of 11.8 per cent is far too high. Our cost structure is becoming prohibitively expensive. To put it simply, we are pricing ourselves out of world markets. We are losing our competitive edge. All this we have done to ourselves. And what we have done, we can reverse.

I believe that expectations are at the heart of our inflation problem. In the past decade, it was natural for us to believe that our prosperity would continue to spiral upwards. We never questioned the roots of our prosperity. We did not look at the world situation and our impending vulnerability, but once again Canada is a trading nation and is affected by the ups and downs of the world economy. For a long while, a few Canadians—the poor, the aged, the helpless, the weakest, paid the price of those inflationary demands. Today only a few groups can pursue their expectations—the powerful, the protected and the privileged. It is the many who pay the cost in unemployment, in bankruptcy and in lost opportunity, not the few I have mentioned.

The charge of having excessive expectations can no longer be laid at the door of the unemployed logger in B.C., the struggling small-business man in Welland or the young homeowner renewing his mortgage in Newfoundland. The expectations of the 1.2 million unemployed have certainly been shattered.

To overcome the twin problems of uncertainty abroad and recession at home, the government has introduced an economic recovery plan in Parliament. We do not believe that everyone in the House is going to agree with it, but we do hope that all members will consider what we have put forward before passing final judgment on it. Three principles are central to that plan. These principles formed the foundation of the budget and the proposals the Prime Minister made to the premiers.

Our first principle is that every Canadian must play his or her part. To deal with our economic difficulties we need the support and co-operation of all. Government can provide leadership, but it is only through the individual decisions of many thousands of Canadians that progress will be made.

It is in times of national challenge and crisis that the mettle and magnitude of our national will is truly tested. I respectfully suggest that this is such a time.

Our second principle is that if we all have a stake in the outcome, we all must share in the effort, each according to his or her ability. Canadians are willing to make sacrifices so that others can be helped. Nobody wants to see his neighbour without a job, nor does any Canadian want to see his neighbour without hope and confidence for surely herein lies the greatest sickness, the greatest disease, because when a nation is without hope and without confidence it atrophies. It pulls back and it is unwilling to reach out to help those who cannot help themselves. We must ask those who are secure to help those who are not as secure. We must ask those who are working to assist the jobless. We must continue to protect the weak, the aged and the helpless. That is a commitment of the Government of Canada. I dare say that that is a commitment of every Member of Parliament who has been elected to come here and represent his or her constituents. But more than that, the commitment of the Government of Canada is a fundamental tenet of our society. We will not fight our economic problems at the expense of the aged, the poor or the unemployed. That would not be right. That would not be acceptable to us as Canadians.

Our third principle is the firm conviction that if we have the will we can win this battle. It would be naive, even dangerous, to try to pretend that we are experiencing only a minor disruption. We are in a deep recession. We are in a crisis, as was stated by the Prime Minister at Versailles. But it would be equally wrong and equally dangerous to throw up our hands and say that all is lost, that we must sit helplessly by while inflation rages and unemployment grows. Despite our problems and despite all of the setbacks that we face now as a nation, Canada remains a land more blessed than most. It is true that it is probably in vogue today to knock one another here in the House. It is probably in vogue to try to dwell upon our ills. But in dwelling upon our ills we feed the sickness inside of us which says, "We cannot do anything." I for one, and I am sure many other members here, totally discard that assumption.

If we, Canadians, worked together, we could do more than simply preserve our economy. We could turn it around to upward growth. The three principles of responsibility, sharing and hope shaped the budget message. In it we proposed a four-part action plan designed, first, to bring inflation down to at least 6 per cent through a nationwide collective effort; second, to reduce the impact of high interest rates, especially for home owners, small-business men and farmers; third, to create over 300,000 jobs through direct government action and indirectly through improvements in the investment climate; fourth, to maintain the integrity of our social security system. The immediate objective of our society must be to cut inflation nearly in half, down to 6 per cent. We must move, as the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) said, from 12 per cent inflation to 6 per cent recovery. This seems reasonable, and the Government of Canada will lead the way by limiting to 6 per cent the indexing of income taxes and social programs such as family allowances.

With regard to income taxes, it should be noted that this is the first time since 1974 that there have been any increases in personal income taxes. Also, the Government of Canada will lead the way by cutting the salary increases of cabinet ministers and of Members of Parliament from 11 per cent to 6 per cent. I am talking about a cut, I am not talking about a freeze. That is in place now and will continue for the rest of the year. We will do this cutting while limiting the annual increase in public service pensions to the same figure. We know that these are drastic measures, but these measures must be taken.

Also, we will lead the way by ensuring that public service pay increases rise by no more than 6 per cent. It must be said that we realize public servants will be making a sacrifice. We acknowledge that sacrifice by them, but it does not in any way take away from the fact that they are doing good work for Canadians. That we ask them to share with us in carrying the burden is normal. They are at the forefront of the battle, as we are here in the House.

Finally, we will lead the way by holding regulated prices under federal jurisdiction to a 6 per cent increase. Through measures such as limiting the indexation of the tax system, every taxpayer will be making a contribution to the inflation fight. If the 6 per cent figure we have imposed throughout the federal government becomes the norm in Canada, we will have made a great stride in restoring our international competitiveness.

The second part of our recovery plan is to provide relief from high interest rates. Again I refer to the meeting which I attended where groups representing ten different unions presented briefs at Centennial High School in Welland. The point stressed by all of them again and again—and especially by the Welland and District Labour Council—was that we must bring down interest rates. We must control interest rates or, in the end, they will control us; they will run our lives rather than our controlling them. Alexandre Dumas said in one of his speeches:

[Translation]

He said that like anything else, money is a good servant but a bad master. The same applies here to interest rates. If we let interest rates become our master, we are going to be the servants, we will lose our independence and finally, we will lose everything we have in this beloved country of ours, Canada.

[English]

A new and innovative indexed bond instrument will cut interest rates from between 3 per cent to 6 per cent for home owners, farmers, fishermen, small businessmen, home purchasers and investors in Canadian equities. To ensure that this major proposal is implemented properly, consultations will begin immediately with the private sector, and to bridge the gap until this measure becomes law, the Government of Canada will make available grants of up to $3,000 to help home owners with mortgage renewals costing more than 30 per cent of their income. The Government of Canada will now give relief to small business by reducing its borrowing rate by 4 per cent. Also it will provide more assistance for Canadian farmers by reducing their interest rate by 4 per cent through the Farm Credit Corporation.

I should like to quote from a news release of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce concerning Canadian small businesses. It reads:

> Small businesses in Canada will benefit greatly as a result of Monday's budget ... "The new budget has measures for dealing with the specific needs of Canada's small businesses"—

How will we do this? We will do it with reduced interest rate costs. It continues:

> Direct grants will be made available to small businesses over the next two years to cover 4 per cent of interest costs on depreciable property, research and development. Incorporated and unincorporated small businesses as well as farmers and fishermen are eligible.
> This new $400 million small business investment grant program is in addition to the ongoing small business bond program which provides interest relief in cases of financial difficulty.
> Direct employment and economic programs will receive half a billion dollars of new money to provide jobs for Canadians. Of this $500 million, $300 million will expand programs such as the Enterprise Development Program, the Defence Industry Productivity Program, the Regional Fund, and the Industry and Labour Adjustment Program.

My riding of Welland has benefited on three different occasions by way of the industry and labour adjustment program. Many in Canada's small business community will benefit as Canadians move to take advantage of the new five-point housing package which was announced. Building trades will receive a major boost as housing programs begin to generate some 65,000 new jobs over the next two years. An additional 54,000 jobs are expected from the Canada rental support plan for the construction of new rental units. In total, 119,000 new jobs are expected. But perhaps what is the most exciting are the potential measures we will be taking to help small businesses and home owners.

The Minister of Finance tabled a consultative document containing proposals which, if implemented, would have the following effects. Canadians investing funds in a new form of term deposit would not be taxed on that part of interest which only reflects the rate of inflation. Canadians investing funds in new plans for the purchase of common shares of Canadian corporations would not be taxed on that part of the capital gain or on shares that only reflect inflation. Buyers of new homes will be able to secure mortgages from 3 per cent to 6 per cent below prevailing rates. Small businesses, farmers and fishermen will be able to secure loans for new capital investment at similarly reduced interest rates.

We are determined—and when I say "we" I mean hon. members on both sides of the House—to lower interest rates in the long term and to reduce their present impact upon the groups affected most. Lowering inflation and lessening the impact of interest rates will start the process of economic recovery, but to create the jobs Canada needs we must do even more. In my opinion jobs must come first. To that end we have ordered government departments to cut and reallocate their spending so that money can be freed for job creation. We will not add to the deficit through these measures, but the reallocation will be substantial. Our goal is to create more than 300,000 jobs over two years, many of them in the construction industry. We want this country to start building again. Through measures introduced this spring as well as in the budget our programs will create 150,000 jobs in the housing industry. Our goal is to put this country back to work.

Last week we protected our system of social benefits. Lower and middle-income Canadians who would lose because of cuts in family allowance indexation will gain a $50 increase in the child tax credit. For families making less than $25,000 a year there will be no loss of income. Similarly, those senior citizens who are receiving the guaranteed income supplement, the GIS, to the old age pension, will not have their benefits cut in any way. That point must be noted and repeated again and again so that we do not foster this type of anxiety among our pensioners. Indeed, the GIS will be fully indexed to the rate of inflation.

Our program of action does not end with consultation with the provinces. In the weeks ahead the Minister of Finance and other ministers will ask leaders of business and labour to meet. Specific proposals will be made to them. As well, specific plans will be put before them. It is clear that we do not seek to use these discussions to identify culprits, to attach blame or to single out groups in Canada to bear the burden. Enough of that. We have had enough of trying to put the finger on someone else.

Mr. La Salle: Who is it?

Mr. Parent: Surely we should look at ourselves. The hon. member thinks that it is funny enough to make jokes when we have 1.2 million unemployed in Canada. I do not think it is a joke.

Mr. La Salle: It is your fault.

Mr. Parent: We have all been touched by economic adversity. Even the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) who is the one who dares to make jokes on such a situation should realize that we have all been hurt. We are hurting now. If we do not act together, we will hurt more.

The interest of organized labour is the wellbeing of Canadian working men and women. That must be our interest also. The interest of business is the willingness of the investor to put his money to productive use in Canada. That is our interest as well.

Surely when factories are closing, when jobs are disappearing, when worldwide recession has reduced our export sales, individual Canadians should be able to rely on the leaders of the great institutions in their society to act together. I call upon all members here to do just that.

That is the message and the challenge we bring to Canadians. It is a message of hope and a challenge to share. We are confident that we can overcome our difficulties and return to better times.

Canada is like a family. In a time of personal tragedy the family can join together, stay together and either solve their problems or fall apart. This, then, is a challenge to us all as Canadians, to share in the sacrifices and join in the collective effort that will turn our goals into realities.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I hasten to take part in this debate which we owe to the government's bringing down its third budget in a matter of months, and I also hasten to comment on the remarks made by the member for Welland (Mr. Parent) before he sat down, when he implied that the member for Joliette was joking when he asked a simple question. Mr. Speaker, he said we should not try to find the culprit. I think we have every reason to ask who is responsible for this tragic situation. In fact, the hon. member admits the situation exists and that we are in the middle of a serious recession. He said, and it is perhaps the ultimate paradox I have heard in these several days of budget debate: when a nation is without hope and without confidence, it atrophies.

Unfortunately, the member for Welland fails to realize that he is one of the members of the team that put us in this situation in the first place. He also pointed out that after 15 years, the time has come to build this country. After 15 years, Mr. Speaker, I have heard and seen quite a bit in my time here in the House, and I am one of those Canadians who have deplored in every possible way the situation we happen to find ourselves in at the present time. And now members on the government side are telling us today that they are determined to put Canada on the road to progress!

How can Canadians as a whole believe such a statement when the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) has shown such unprecedented incompetence? How can the Minister of Finance, who was speaking about a deficit of about $9 to $10 million two or three months ago, confess publicly—and I can understand how embarrassing this must have been—this monumental deficit which quite legitimately frightens Canadian businessmen? Mr. Speaker, I have been sitting in this House for 15 years, if we exclude the few weeks when I was absent because I had the courage to offer something and to share the problems which were affecting all of Quebec. Nearly all businessmen and editorial writers consider this new budget the disaster of the century. I could quote a series of articles written by various English-speaking and French-speaking editorial writers. Everyone agrees on this point. The Canadian Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is worsening the crisis of confidence and the new budget can only lead the country to depression and disaster. This is the type of comment made by nearly all editorial writers, and I find this rather exceptional.

I believe that it is important to note that Mr. Ivan Guay wrote in La Presse:

> The federal Minister of Finance, Mr. Allan McEachen, confirmed the predictions of all serious observers. He remained true to himself by bringing down a third budget which does not take our economy out of the rut where his two previous budgets have put it. He has indeed confirmed this—
> To understand the situation, Mr. MacEachen did not bring down a new budget seven and a half months after the previous one to change the economic policy of his government, but rather to change the image of his government, which has been accused of a lack of leadership and whose credibility is rapidly going downhill. He has therefore attempted to give the people new confidence in his government and at the same time in the economy. However, as could be expected, he has failed on both counts.
> Why do politicians keep on telling people just about anything as though we were all morons?

These are some of the comments made by this editorial writer about this government. He also adds, and I quote:

> The federal government will inject $2.3 billion in the economy, but will take back $3 billion from your pockets.

This is the type of hypocrisy we are now witnessing. The hon. member for Welland (Mr. Parent) and many others are asking us to cooperate. In his budget, the Minister of Finance talked of sharing and said that the time had come to share the concerns and the problems of this government, this same government which has put the country in the situation we are now facing. The Minister of Finance asked us to share his mistakes and his incompetence! This is too much, Mr. Speaker! I do not believe that the Canadian people would respect us or allow us—

An hon. Member: Or forgive us—

Mr. La Salle: —or forgive us if we were to cooperate with a government which has shown such incompetence in the last 15 years, and especially in the last three. Mr. Speaker, this debate on a second budget in less than six months is justified by the unprecedented failure of this government. The residents of the Joliette constituency are worried too and they live in a climate of uncertainty.

• (2040)

I share their concern, of course, and I submit that this government's wrong decisions, especially these last three years, have led Canada to bankruptcy. While the Canadian people was being deceived with constitutional reform, which anyway satisfies nobody and for Quebecers is a source of genuine indignation, the government, following the instructions of the current Minister of Finance, had deficits on top of deficits and increased government expenditures at staggering rates. Of course this put Canada in the situation we now have, the worst recession this country has ever known. And this with the complicity of his colleagues, including the Right Hon. Prime Minister and at least six dozen members from my province, and almost as many from outside. Being too weak to get the Minister of Finance or the Prime Minister out of their errors, they preferred through their weakness to share the errors of that government that led Canada into our current difficulties.

Not so long ago, Mr. Speaker, and it is important that Canadians remember this, this Prime Minister in his own province was boasting everywhere of the beauty of the land, its potential for development thanks to its territories and their resources.

How is it, Mr. Speaker, that those legitimate hopes faded so quickly? I will tell you, Mr. Speaker. From the solemn commitment of this Prime Minister in 1968 to a just society until the principle of fairness promised by the Minister of Finance in November last, is there any other term for this government than impostor in the current situation? Arrogance and hypocrisy replace co-operation between the provincial partners and compassion for this country's citizens.

I referred to the government's wrong choices over these last three years. I am thinking for instance of the government's excessive involvement in the energy area. The socializing attitude deep down in the Prime Minister's heart for more than 35 years was espoused by his party, unwittingly of course, because they are implementing the policies of the New Democratic Party which the Prime Minister was supporting before he joined the Liberal ranks. That government intervention, Mr. Speaker, equates to the loss of the megaprojects, which is tremendously costly to Canada at this point, which cost billions of dollars of investments and the loss of thousands of jobs, with the direct complicity of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde). And they say they are capable of re-establishing a climate that is favourable to investment. The proof is there, Mr. Speaker. Those people have no respect whatsoever for free enterprise. By refusing to so admit publicly, they are forcing even the New Democratic Party to vote against the budget. I referred to the failure of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It is unbelievable the situation we are in, especially since these last three years. I listened today to the Minister in charge of Housing. He referred to something new, he would have us believe in new hopes, a recovery, when we know perfectly well he is responsible for the current housing situation.

Not so long ago, this government raked us over the coals because we had the intention of promoting the housing sector which is so vitally important for the economic development of our country. This minister is now talking about boosting the construction industry, but he is mainly responsible for the loss of 400,000 jobs in Canada because he refused to act and upgrade the major sector of construction. It is the same minister who even turned down ten of his own colleagues and a few ministers, failing to meet the emergency and to act quickly in that field. I was listening to him today when he spoke with the hyprocrisy which is the hallmark of that group of ministers, trying to raise the hopes of Canadians by telling them that the situation is not really as bad as we describe it. Mr. Speaker, we know full well that if we had primed the construction sector, the small and medium-sized businesses would not be in the mess they are in now. Small and medium-size businesses would have made profits and maintained a large number of jobs if the government had been attuned and had grasped the significance of giving a shot in the arm of the construction industry three years ago. Here again, the minister shirked his responsibilities and he is party to a bankrupt situation the likes of which Canada has never seen.

I heard the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) who keeps on claiming that we have the best agricultural legislation, the best agricultural products and the best agricultural system. How can anyone explain, for instance, that farmers have never been as deep in debt as they have in the past five or six years as a result of policies which call for huge investments and unacceptable interest rates? Never have so many farmers been pushed to the brink of bankruptcy. But the Minister of Agriculture does not say one word about that. I might also refer to the Minister of State for International Trade (Mr. Lumley) who, as I am speaking to you this evening, has yet to solve the issue of shoes and footwear. The footwear industry is still waiting for an answer, but the Minister of State for International Trade makes it cool its heels. Along with his colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray), he is responsible for the loss of nearly 10,000 jobs in that leading sector and he is still preaching patience to that industry which employs between 10,000 and 15,000 workers and yet does not ask for handouts. It is not a question of going begging, we simply want the government to show respect for an industry which has proven itself and to have some regard for all businesses which operate in Canada.

For a number of months now, the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) has been announcing programs worth millions of dollars and members opposite keep repeating that the government is investing millions in such and such fields. Why did they let the situation deteriorate to such an extent that the Minister of Employment and Immigration alone will probably have to spend close to $1 million this year? Mr. Speaker, all those programs are just another form of social welfare. They talk about occupational training programs for jobs which exist only on paper, and about retirement pensions at age 50, as if that was the end of life for a man or a woman. That is nothing more and nothing less than hidden welfare. And then, Mr. Speaker, they want us to cooperate and praise the efforts of the Minister of Finance and the appeal that the Prime Minister made to his provincial colleagues last week. How interesting to see the pathetic attitude of the Prime Minister today before the provincial premiers. Having shown such arrogance towards them, he must now ask them and beg them on his knees to be party to his monumental failure.

How is it that the Right Hon. Prime Minister never felt the need to call a meeting of the premiers before this budget was tabled? Is it necessary for the federal government to impose again its will at all cost? And now the Right Hon. Prime Minister, relying on public opinion, feels that the provincial premiers would never dare refuse publicly to work toward the economic recovery of Canada. If so many businessmen, economists and knowledgeable people find it difficult to support this policy it is because they feel such a disastrous budget is not likely to put the economy on the way to recovery. Businessmen in particular and the Canadian people in general cannot depend on promises of this kind from the Liberal Party, because they were disappointed so many times in the past. Under these circumstances, it is clear that most Canadians want a new government. Why? Because this deceitful government is unable to ensure the private sector and free enterprise their proper places. All the Right Hon. Prime Minister has told the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources on the role of private enterprise is an unforgivable falsehood. All the economic projections which the Minister of Finance has made were proven entirely wrong. So the Minister of Finance has lost his credibility, something he and all other members on the government's side are perfectly aware of.

I see the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) who is about to tell us once again that we do not know how to read the budget, we do not understand the budget. If there is something that we do understand, however, it is the fact that there were only 300,000 unemployed in Canada 15 years ago, compared with 1,500,000 now. We know also that come December 31, Canadians by the thousands will no longer collect their scanty pittance, or rather, their unemployment insurance benefits. And these ministers have neither the courage nor the honesty to admit it. That is the predicament in which we find ourselves now! And we are being asked to co-operate with such an utterly incompetent government! It is impossible, Mr. Speaker! And if the government is truly convinced that Canadians are willing to trust them after a budget as disastrous as that which was tabled six months ago and another one last week, let them have the decency to go to the people and ask them if they can trust a government which has deceived them so often and so long. Such is our government and we are going to denounce it! The time to do it is right now! I cannot tolerate the hypocrisy of my hon. friends opposite who are perfectly aware of the situation and who feign surprise.

Yesterday and again today, I heard people say: we are indeed in an impossible situation. Should the Canadian people help us? Should the provinces help us? This government is mostly responsible for this abysmal failure. How can this government and the Minister of Finance who have lost their credibility in the eyes of business, create again a climate of trust? It is unthinkable, Mr. Speaker. And these people know that it is unthinkable. They will play with time at the expense of the Canadian people. And they claim they want to help Canadians! These people have destroyed Canada, have split the country with their Constitutional scheme and have placed it in a state of economic dependency. And in a while the Minister of State for Finance will make his little speech, claiming that we do not understand, what it means for thousands and millions of unemployed not to know whether they will be able to find a job tomorrow morning. And the housing minister would like us to believe that with his $3,000 grant, he will get the housing industry moving again, when Canadians can no longer afford to borrow at the current high interest rates. Why did the government deliberately create unemployment? Listen to this one! Last week, the Minister of Finance said in connection with his $20 billion deficit that he had not foreseen that he would be faced with a revenue loss, due to the 1,200,000 unemployed who, with all the others, are about 1,500,000! He had not realized that by deliberately creating unemployment, there would be a loss of income tax and the unemployment insurance fund would be depleted. Yet the Minister of Finance has the nerve to ask members of this House and Canadians in general to trust him. It is a disaster, Mr. Speaker, and his cohorts are supporting and commending him. I think that Canadians must realize the extent of their hypocrisy. Last week, I was surprised to hear the Minister of Finance announce a reduction in our salaries. Well, of course it is quite fine, because we are showing some leadership. We ask Canadians to tighten their belts while the Minister of Finance is increasing his electoral expenditures by some 20 per cent each year. Now they are going to play the game and reduce the members' salaries with Liberal members applauding Mr. Speaker. It is the height of hypocrisy as though they were pleased and were going to make up the deficit of the Minister of Finance. Of course, if the deficit were made up, we would be delighted, but this will not be the case, Mr. Speaker. Under the circumstances, I have the impression that the time allotted to me is running out, but this government cannot rely on this speaker to support a pitiful budget, such a deplorable administration. I hope that enough members on that side are sufficiently scrupulous and honest to get rid of a minister who is bringing this country to the verge of bankruptcy and to invite Canadians to let us know what kind of government they want. I would like to know as soon as possible if Canadians really want to give their confidence to such a seedy and pitiable team.

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, in his speech, the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) referred to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who appealed to the spirit of solidarity of all Canadians, to their willingness to share and to their courage, urging them to work together in a common resolve to get through this recession. However, instead of urging Canadians to join in this common effort, the hon. member prefers to denigrate such appeals and makes cynical remarks instead of taking a responsible view, instead of showing the facts as they are and offering a more balanced picture of the present situation. To hear the hon. member talk, the Canadian government is to blame for the problem being experienced by Western economies. The hon. member for Joliette has quite a reputation for his simplistic analyses, and, true to form, in his speech tonight he showed his usual capacity for logic and his usual simplistic approach to the facts. In any case, I am not going to waste any more time on his rhetoric, and I know Canadians will judge what he said as they judged in the past the way he defended his party's policies.

Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes I have been allowed, I intend to discuss a document that was tabled by the Minister of Finance when he made his budget statement, a document that deals with inflation and the taxation of personal investment income. It is a relatively lengthy and complex piece of work, and I shall try to summarize it in simple terms, to give Canadians who may not have had an opportunity to read it for themselves, a general idea of the content and help them understand how these proposals can benefit Canadians by providing mechanisms that will help reduce interest rates.

It is widely recognized, Mr. Speaker, that inflation causes a number of distortions in the economy's various markets, distortions which lead to an inappropriate allocation of both financial and human resources and finally are instrumental in slowing down the economy. Although it is not always easy to visualize the real impact of inflation on the economy, we are all aware of the element of uncertainty that inflation has brought into our lives. In the present situation, where we are experiencing galloping inflation, it has become practically impossible to plan medium and long-term financial commitments. In fact, how can we save money for a rainy day, how can we borrow money to buy a house, how can we buy life insurance, if we realize that the value of our dollar is going to be constantly eroded year after year because inflation rates are going to continue at their present high levels or will even increase, so that we no longer know what the dollar we are investing today will be worth in five, ten, fifteen or twenty-five years?

Rising interest rates as a result of inflation can create serious cash-flow problems for borrowers and also disrupt the proper functioning of the financial markets. These problems have become particularly acute at the present time for people buying homes and for small businesses, and are thus contributing to the severity of the present recession. In the housing industry, inflation-related increases in interest rates have caused monthly payments of interest and principal on a mortgage amortized over twenty-five years to rise by 80 to 90 per cent. In the case of a long-term, fixed-rate mortgage, homeowners have to tighten their belts during the first few years and can subsequently benefit from a rapid decline in the real value of monthly payments as a result of the time they have gained. In the more frequent case of short-term mortgages, home owners must live with the fact that they may be faced with a sudden rise in interest rates, and as a result, prospective home buyers postpone the purchase of a first home to avoid this uncertainty and the need to cope with all these problems.

Cash-flow problems are even more serious in the case of businesses which borrow funds at a floating interest rate which subsequently rises due to an unanticipated increase in inflation. They are then required to increase their cash payments to lenders immediately by the full amount of the increase in interest rates, thus leading to serious cash-flow problems which may lead a business to bankruptcy. On the financial markets, the uncertainty caused by inflation makes long-term loans less attractive, both for borrowers and lenders. If inflation is higher than expected, the borrower will gain at the expense of the lender, while if inflation is lower than expected, the lender will gain at the borrower's expense. The effect of this uncertainty is currently seen in the shortening of the term of fixed rate mortgages and other loans and by the increased use of floating-rate term loans. The increase in the proportion of term deposits held in maturities of under one year reflects a similar reluctance for long- and medium-term commitments by lenders. Finally, the lack of long-term capital has brought about a decline in investment, thus contributing to the general decline in productivity and especially to the erosion of our competitive edge on international markets.

These are some of the reasons, Mr. Speaker, why the government has made a firm resolve to tackle the problem of inflation by announcing its objective in the present budget to bring down the inflation rate to 6 per cent and by appealing to the solidarity of all Canadians and all economic partners to work together to achieve this objective. Inflation also creates more specific problems in the tax system by introducing the distortions I mentioned earlier in the taxation of investment income. During an inflationary period, the investor makes a real profit on an investment only if the total return exceeds compensation for the decline in the real purchasing power of the money which he has invested, a decline in purchasing power as a result of high inflation rates. In fact, the rate of return on an investment could, and can, in fact, be divided into two components. The first component is the real interest that would be paid if there were no inflation, if the inflation rate were nil, and the return on an investment would be a real return, a real interest. The second part, the second element in an investment income is part of the interest or the return equivalent to inflation or compensation for the reduction in the purchasing power of my savings or investments.

In our present system, taxes are levied on both the return ascribable to inflation and the real return which I suggested was the first constituent or the first element of the total return on investments. In our taxation system, all surplus on the first outlay of capital is considered as directly taxable regardless of the reduced real value of the capital, a reduction which is ascribable to inflation. It involves reporting interest income as well as capital gain income and corporate income. The effective increased taxation rates on those incomes discourage savings and investments. In fact, in many cases, not only do investors get no return after taxation but actually lose money. This is what economists call in contradictory terms a rate of negative return. How can we illustrate such a negative yield rate or, to put it in clearer terms, an actual loss on an investment? Let us say, for example, that I have invested $1,000 of my savings at 12 per cent. After one year the investment income would be $120 and if I am in the 35 per cent tax bracket I will have to pay $42 on that $120 income. In other words, the net income on my original investment of $1,000 in savings will be $120 less $42 in taxes, or $78. If inflation is running at 10 per cent, anyone investing $1,000 of his savings will have to earn at least $100 in income if he does not want to lose to inflation, because $1,000 at 10 per cent yields a minimum of $100. So if I want an investment which offsets inflation, I need an income of $100 on an investment of $1,000. In the example I gave earlier, the net income after taxes was $78, therefore an actual loss of $22 for the investor who should get an income of $100 if he wants to keep up with the inflation rate. So he ends up with an actual loss of 2.2 per cent and he is said to have had a negative yield of 2.2 per cent on his investment even though he was given an interest rate of 12 per cent on his $1,000 investment. This difference between real and apparent income causes distortions in the decisions of investors and a rather ineffective allocation of economic and financial resources, which are extremely limited at the present time.

All these problems are considered in the paper for consultation I mentioned earlier which is entitled "Inflation and the Taxation of Personal Investment Income". To eliminate the effects of inflation on the taxation of investment income, this paper proposes two schemes of limited indexation concerning interest income and capital gains to protect the amounts invested or the real investment income of individuals. The first would be the creation of indexed term deposit certificates. These certificates would offer the depositor a tax-free interest on the portion of the investment income which absorbs inflation. These savings would then be made available to homebuyers, small-business men, farmers and fishermen, in the form of indexed term loans by the financial institutions offering term deposit certificates. There would therefore be indexed term deposit certificates which would raise funds and provide the depositor with an attractive real return since it would be indexed, and the funds raised would be put at the disposal of the groups I mentioned earlier in the form of indexed term loans.

The second scheme proposed in the paper for consultation would take the form of a new registered shareholder investment plan, under which capital gains on shares purchased for the registered fund would only be taxed on the portion exceeding the rate of inflation. Mr. Speaker, if I may, I would like to take a few minutes to explain and illustrate these two proposed schemes which are now under review. First, I shall deal with the indexed term deposits and term loans which aim at reducing substantially, or up to 6 per cent, the interest rates for potential home owners, small businesses, farmers and fishermen.

What will an indexed term deposit consist of? Canadian financial institutions will be allowed to offer their depositors residing in Canada term deposit certificates for a minimum of one year, which deposit will be indexed. The principal of the term deposit will be adjusted periodically according to CPI variations. Interest will be calculated on the indexed principal at a real rate that would be fixed over the term of the deposit. This rate will be set by each financial institution administering the deposit in the same way as interest rates on conventional term deposits are now set. However, the fact that the deposit itself is indexed will be taken into account. The depositor will be taxed only on the real interest income and only the real interest will be deductible for the financial institution. Since only the real interest, in other words, the interest less the compensation for inflation, will be taxable, this will make the investment yield much more attractive for the depositor. Moreover, since the financial institution will be able to deduct only real interest, it will be able to minimize its profit margin and reduce the interest offered borrowers on the loans for which the funds raised from these indexed term deposits would be made.

Since only the real interest income would be taxable, the depositor will be able to accept lower interest rates, as I noted earlier. Let us try to visualize or to get a better idea of how this system could work. For instance, let us take an ordinary deposit and a hypothetical inflation rate of 10 per cent. To come back to the situation mentioned earlier, let us take a conventional deposit or savings of $1,000. At the present time, with an interest rate of 16 per cent, the investment or interest income would be $160. Under the Income Tax Act at the present time, the taxable investment income would also be $160. At a tax rate of 40 per cent, the tax payable on this income would be $64, and the net investment income after taxes would therefore be $26. The minimal after-tax rate of return on an amount of $1,000 would therefore be 9.6 per cent and the real after-tax rate of return, if we consider the taxes of $64 to be paid, is of 0.4 per cent plus 0.4 per cent of real yield on a deposit of $1,000.

Now, if the deposit were indexed, by how much would my real income increase? I still have the same initial deposit or saving of $1,000. The inflation rate is still 10 per cent. The interest rate on my deposit would be 10 per cent for inflation, in addition to a real interest rate of 2 per cent, for a total of 12 per cent. What would be my income? My interest income would be $1000 to compensate for inflation, since the inflation rate is basically supposed to be 10 per cent, my real interest income would be $20, since the real interest on the $1,000 investment was 2 per cent, the tax to be paid, still with a 40 per cent taxation rate applicable to the $20 of real income, since my real interest is 2 per cent, would be $8, my income after taxes is therefore $1000 to compensate for inflation, 10 per cent of $1,000 in addition to $12 and $20 less $8 of income tax, the real intest income of $20 less $8 would therefore give me an income of $112 after taxes. My nominal return rate after taxes is therefore 11.2 per cent compared to the previous 9.6 per cent and contrary to the previous real return to 4/10 per cent, I will have a real return of 1.2 per cent on the same $1000 investment with that indexation proposal for the term deposit. It can clearly be seen, Mr. Speaker, how the real return on that $1,000 investment when the deposit is indexed to account for inflation allows me to reduce the interest rate on my savings while ensuring me a higher direct return, since the compensatory factor for inflation is subtracted from the amount charged.

So, that system should attract a large number of investors and enable financial institutions to set up a sizeable reserve of funds which they will obtain at low cost, because, as I indicated earlier, instead of paying 16 per cent interest on $1,000, that rate will be reduced to 12 per cent and even though it is lower, the yield will be higher without the compensation for inflation set at 10 per cent for the purposes of our example.

As mentioned earlier by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Parent), these funds will be made available to homebuyers, small-business men, farmers and fishermen in the form of term loans. And we now come to the second face of Janus, if I may say so, Mr. Speaker, because these indexed term deposits generate indexed term loans, thereby making money available to lend at interest rates up to 6 percentage points lower than market rates. On an indexed term loan, the real interest rate only would be deductible by the borrower as expense for income tax purposes. The same amount would be taxable in the hands of the lending institution. As in the case of indexed term loans, the initial principal would be adjusted periodically, based on consumer price index variations. Since interest rates are now wholly deductible, the people who will benefit the most from this initiative are firms with very little or no taxable income, and finally home owners who cannot deduct interest rates or loan charges on their mortgages from their taxable income. I would like to attempt once more to illustrate how these loans will be of benefit to all citizens. Assuming that the current interest rate is 19 per cent, the inflation rate 10 per cent and also that financial institutions are ready to lend at a 5 per cent real interest rate, they would have a 3 per cent real margin on the 2 per cent real interest paid on indexed deposits.

Well, for instance, on a loan to a home owner—I do not want to go into the details of loans that could be made to businesses with variable tax rates and I will only deal with home mortgages. To simplify, let us take a $100 loan. The nominal interest at current market rates would be 19 per cent. The real cost after taxes of the borrowed funds would be $19. Now, let us return to our indexed loan; according to our original hypothesis, the amount of the loan is $100 and the inflation rate is 10 per cent. Included in the interest charged, there is as a first component in the inflation compensation of 10 per cent, as was seen in the previous example, the 5 per cent true interest rate of 5 per cent charged by the lending institution. The after-tax cost of the funds thus borrowed is therefore $15, that is, on $100, the equivalent of 4 per cent lower than the current rates allowed, due to the fact that the term deposit is indexed and that all the moneys collected this way are put again on the market as term loans which are also indexed.

Therefore, it can be seen that reducing the inflation part of investment incomes makes it possible to have a system whereby interest rates on loans are reduced from 0 to 6 per cent, depending on which income tax bracket the borrower is in. It can also be seen that the lower the income tax bracket, the more advantageous the measure is, particularly if your are unable to deduct interests from your income, which is the case for a home owner. Home owners just like small-business men, farmers, fishermen, would see a major reduction in their interest rates, which would be inversely proportional to their income tax bracket. At the current level of inflation, the tax on the inflation component of investment income may be from 3 to 6 per cent, depending on the tax bracket the lender is in, as I have just indicated.

That amount would be eliminated from funds invested in indexed term deposits. This reduction would benefit investors as well as borrowers. This system also has the advantage of reducing uncertainties on the real cost of financing, since it will remain fixed over the life of the contract, whatever the inflation rate.

I would like also, Mr. Speaker, to refer briefly to the second proposal in that consultation paper on inflation and taxation of Personal Income, which deals with a registered shareholder investment plan. Canadians could contribute funds to a registered shareholder investment plan with an investment dealer or a financial institution. These funds could then be used to purchase common shares of Canadian corporation taxable shares listed on a Canadian stock market. The sums contributed to the plan would be neither deductible in computing income tax purposes nor taxable when withdrawn. The moneys contributed to the plan would be defined as being the cost of the aggregate of shares held in a registered shareholder investment plan. At the end of each year, the amount contributed would be multiplied by the rate of inflation over the year or since the date of contribution to the plan. The shares would be valued at the end of the year and the inflation adjusted value would be determine the taxable amount. By applying the technique I explained earlier for term deposits, we would have on shareholder investments a real yield that would be higher than the current one. I see, Mr. Speaker, that you are getting impatient and I do not want to abuse the time of the House. I appreciate your patience and honourable members' kindness.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Miss Carney). Is the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) rising on a point of order?

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I have noticed, in looking at my calculations, that since my party last had a speaker in this budget debate, and if you recognize the hon. member whom you obviously intend to recognize, there will be eight speakers from other parties between speakers for the New Democratic Party.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The debate is on an amendment standing in the name of the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson). At 9.45 p.m. the bells will interrupt the debate, which will end the debate on the amendment, and any hon. member having the floor at that time will have to terminate his or her remarks. On resumption of the debate on the main motion tomorrow, the speeches will go back to the full 30 minutes.

Mr. Riis: I am quite aware, Mr. Speaker, that shortly there will be a termination of this debate. I guess what I am asking for is some explanation of the fact that this will be the fourth Progressive Conservative speaking—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With all due respect to the hon. member, the Chair has exercised its discretion in regard to an amendment standing in the name of a member of the Official Opposition. The hon. member has a perfectly valid point, but I am calling his attention to the fact that there is only 15 minutes left for the next speaker at this point, and tomorrow the hon. member's party will be recognized first for a full 30 minutes.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, since we began discussing the budget today at three o'clock it has been our understanding that our speaker would be asked to rise at 9.30 p.m. this evening. That has been a clear understanding. It follows the records. It follows the numbers.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With due respect to the hon. member, the recognition of speakers is at the discretion of the Chair. At this point the Chair is exercising a discretion in recognizing the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Miss Carney), having made careful note of the remarks of the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis).

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member cannot rise on the same point of order. The Chair has ruled in regard to that. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Miss Carney).

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak to this amendment calling for the resignation of the government at a time of economic crisis in this country, a crisis which, judging by the tone of its debate, the government does not seem to recognize. I listened to the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) talk about an illusion, talk about rates of return, talk about savings plans and budget measures and I find he does not seem to have any understanding—in fact, he does not even have the courtesy to give me attention on this matter—that many sectors of our economy are going bankrupt. A financial fire storm is sweeping the country, consuming our jobs, our energies, our savings and our businesses. Yet the government refuses to recognize the seriousness of the situation. It refuses to act. It refuses to move in a positive and realistic way to lay any basis for positive economic recovery.

The problem is very simple. It has not been addressed by this government. The country is simply running out of cash. Our capital is being dangerously eroded. The reason is very clear. The cause of this critical situation, which is forcing the collapse of companies and the loss of jobs, is the failure of the Liberal government to deal with the problems of high interest rates by abandoning the anti-investment tax measures of the last three budgets, and also the Liberal government's failure to introduce tax policies that are firmly and forcefully redirected toward incentive-based savings programs.

The minister has outlined tonight one tentative step in that direction which is a series of tax proposals in the new budget. They have been circulated for study in the investment community. Further study of incentives for investment is like consulting a man whose house is burning to see if he would like a pail of water. The clearest evidence of this economic catastrophe—and for the people affected, it is a catastrophe—are the revised statistics showing the impact of high interest payments on cash flow, the lifeblood of the Canadian economy.

• (2130)

In the first quarter of 1982, all companies in Canada, large and small, paid on average 45.4 per cent of their cash flow on interest costs. One year ago these companies devoted only a quarter of their cash flow to these costs. The impact of interest costs on cash flow has doubled in a year. Smaller companies are hardest hit. This year they are paying on average about half of their cash flow on interest charges, compared to only one-third last year. That is on average, which meant that an awful lot of companies paid up to 100 per cent of their cash flow on interest rates. If you look at the ratio of the percentage of interest rates to entire pre-tax earnings for larger companies it rose to 83.3 per cent in the first quarter of this year. That means companies simply do not have the money to keep going. That is why William Mulholland, chairman of the Bank of Montreal, before the committee hearings on bank profits said the following:

> The rolling impact of high interest rates on business must spell more bankruptcies and worse unemployment to come unless some action is taken.

That is why Cal Knudson, Chairman of MacMillan Bloedel, the largest forest company in Canada warns of:

> Widespread bankruptcies, a weakening of our financial base and a major collapse that will imperil the financial structure of our country.

That is if the government persists with its policies.

Further evidence of this crisis that we face is the rate of bankruptcies. They are up 40 per cent over last year. The liabilities associated with those bankruptcies are up 100 per cent. Many major corporations, and I include Chrysler Canada, International Harvester, Dome Petroleum, MacMillan Bloedel, Inco and Falconbridge, are barely hanging on. At the same time some of the banks are dangerously overextended in executing some of this government's highly unrealistic policies. The government is going to be called upon to guarantee more loans like that of Dome Canada. Yet it refuses to recognize the peril facing the country.

One critical symptom of the crumbling economy is the emergence of hidden bankruptcies. These are a relatively new phenomenon which is surfacing in the B.C. business community. It serves to hide the fact that thousands of British Columbians are going to lose their jobs because their employers are secretly bankrupt.

During this recession these companies have not been declared legally bankrupt. They have been placed in a status called "soft receivership". No statistics are kept and the firms are never identified. Their status is often known to senior management and often unknown to their employees.

In British Columbia firms in soft receivership include real estate companies, forest companies, property developers and retail companies. When a company faces bankruptcy and has no hope of operating profitably the banks instal a licensed trustee. In the case of soft receiverships, he is often called a management consultant or something which hides the purpose of his duties. He effectively takes control of the business. The management is retained to maintain the appearance that nothing is wrong and to sell off the assets in an orderly fashion. The aim of soft receivership is to avoid selling assets at fire sale prices, and thus secrecy is essential.

The incentive for the banks is to recover their loans. The incentive for business is to keep operating for as long as possible in the hope that enough money may be recovered from the sale of assets to pay off the debt load and to continue the company in a different form. But the fact remains that these companies are bankrupt, that these employees are losing their jobs, and that in the coming months these companies will be quietly, silently and secretly liquidated.

The reasons for this crisis, as I discussed earlier, are the high interest rates which have led to the cash crunch that I have already described. Another major reason is the government's spending which is at a post-war high of 25.3 per cent of GNP. This government has not lived up to the promises made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to restrain spending to no more than the growth of the economy.

As a matter of fact, if the government had followed that criteria, it would have to reduce its spending this year to match the drop in GNP. This government's policies have also led to the enormous deficit. It is now $19.6 billion instead of $11 billion which was forecast in November. It has led to the situation where one tax dollar in four goes to service the public debt. This has resulted in financial cash requirements this year in the market of $17.5 billion, which has led to the danger of crowding out in capital markets as government borrowing this year will exceed 50 per cent of net new securities placed in Canada. This pressure on the market will keep interest rates high and may send them even higher.

At the same time the government is stripping the savings of Canadians through its tax policies. One leading economist for Pitfield MacKay Ross has pointed out that corporate profits are actually exaggerated by inflation. They are actually at a post-war low, and the effective corporate tax rate is 75 per cent. In some companies, such as those in the forest industry, it exceeds 100 per cent. This profit squeeze is prolonging the recession. The result is the Canadian economy is dangerously under-capitalized because of a lack of adequate common equity and because of capital outflows which have followed this government's policy.

Because my time is limited, I want to refer to what this kind of policy is doing for British Columbia, and in this connection refer to letters I have received from some of my constituents about the impact of these policies on B.C. I have a letter here from an owner of a dance shop on West Broadway. This is a small shop serving the cultural industry. He writes, referring to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), as follows:

> He is leading not only business but individuals into bankruptcy. He is sucking not only those of us who work for ourlselves dry, but is gobbling up the savings of many working people. People who lose their homes through job loss or high interest rates lose their savings and their pride.

I have another letter from a person in my riding who wrote to the Minister of Finance and sent a copy to me. This person writes:

> Dear Mr. MacEachen:
> This week I got the bad news from the bank that they are not going to lend me any more money and that they would force the sale of my house to pay off a loan. With market and interest rates where they are, the price I will get will completely wipe out everything I have managed to save since I graduated 15 years ago from university.

That is the kind of impact we are receiving as a result of this government's economic policies.

• (2140)

I have another letter here from a woman in my riding who writes:

> Young couples today simply cannot afford to have children . . . I have been married for ten years. For ten years my husband and I have struggled to get into a position where we can afford to raise a family. Yet the economic reality is that each year the situation gets worse.

She closes her letter to me by asking, "What is happening to our country?" I can tell her what is happening to British Columbia. Its two biggest industries, forestry and mining, are having the worse summmer since the depression of the 1930s. Already some 19,000 IWA workers are out of work, with more to come. Pulp and paper mills are closing and reducing their capacity. The interior forest industry, which is already running at 70 per cent of capacity, is anticipating dropping to 30 per cent or 40 per cent this summer. Peter Bentley, the head of Canadian Forest Products, says:

> I see nothing positive for the second half of this year, nor the first half of 1983, even if interest rates were to go down because of the time lag before it gets to us. Prices might be marginally better but to me a turnaround means when you stop bleeding and start operating with positive cash flow.

Most companies in British Columbia are certainly not in that position. At the same time, its second industry, mining, is closing down. This summer there will be an estimated 10,000 workers affected by mines closing down on a temporary or permanent basis. At Cominco in Trail and in Kimberley, 6,300 workers have been affected. Craigmont in Merritt is closing down. Amax, the molymine, has closed down, throwing 432 people out of work. Noranda at Babine Lake is shut for a year. This copper producer will be shut from July 1982 to July 28, 1983. All along Highway 16, all through the interior of British Columbia and on the upper coast, mines which have been major employers have been shut down.

We know that the problem is not entirely domestically created, that it is partly due to falling metal markets and the lack of housing demand in the United States. These industries were looking to the budget as the last hope for some help, particularly with their cash flow. There has been no help for mines. IWA indicates that the housing assistance program will be of "minimal benefit" to employment in British Columbia. As a matter of fact, the housing program will barely take the production of one of our major mills.

Recently in Prince George I visited a machine shop of a metal fabricator who employed 220 workers last year. This year he has laid off everyone except his core people. This man has been in business for 20 years. He has had no orders for two months, no orders at all. Of course this means that he has not been able to order steel from eastern Canadian mills. I told him that if he obtained an order he was to call us. I asked him to call us because he was our leading indicator, and if we knew that he was obtaining orders, we would know that the economy was starting to be revived. That was two weeks ago and we have not received a telephone call. He still has not obtained any orders. This man cannot believe what is happening to him. He did everything right. He spent 20 years of his life and 20 years of his energies, and he is going down the tubes. That kind of situation is developing all over B.C.

What was the Liberal response in the current budget to this kind of economic tragedy? It was mostly the same measures as last time, with a few changes. The measures were the same as those in the catastrophic budget which created many problems for the Canadian economy. This budget keeps the half-year rule for capital cost allowance, which is a measure that seriously affects many, many companies. It retains the taxation of employee benefits and northern allowances, which in British Columbia amount to $3 per hour in extra tax. No wonder we in British Columbia cannot be competitive when we have to bear that amount of extra tax load. There has been no resurrection of the MURB program. As a matter of fact, the budget measures are forcing the cancellation of many MURBs and the actual bulldozing over the MURB sites, with a loss of housing stocks and investor savings. Some measures were postponed, such as the insurance measure and the restricted interest expense which my colleague outlined. Many measures were referred to this new committee for study before implementation. The result is more uncertainty, more confusion and more delay.

There is still no leadership, no help for the economy and no direction. There has been merely a reaffirmation of damaging Liberal policies and the spreading by Liberals of false assumptions and misinformation. One false assumption is that Canadians will practise restraint when government spending soars. How can they? Another piece of misinformation and false assumption is that a recovery will occur in the third or fourth quarter.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being 9.45 p.m., it is my duty pursuant to Standing Order 60(7) to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith the question necessary to dispose of the amendment now before the House.

The question is on the amendment (Mr. Wilson). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Wilson) which was negatived on the following division:

CANADA POST CORPORATION

PROPOSAL TO CLOSE RURAL POST OFFICES ON SATURDAYS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, the new postal regulations being brought into effect by the Canada Post Corporation will cause the closing of rural post offices across Canada on Saturdays. It is apparent that absolutely no thought was given to the rural and farming communities of Canada or their lifestyle, because they rely on the post offices being open on Saturday to conduct their business. Saturday is farmers' day in the small communities across our country as is evident by the resurgence of Saturday farmers' markets. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight):

That this House direct the minister responsible for the Post Office to direct Canada Post to provide service on Saturdays for rural Canadians according to their needs.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ELIMINATION OF SATURDAY RURAL DELIVERIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mel Gass (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, the new Canada Post Corporation is now seriously considering cutting 2,831 Saturday rural delivery routes throughout the country. The fact that this is even being considered shows that the government has no idea of the importance of Saturday delivery of weekend newspapers and other mail for rural customers. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hastings-Frontenac (Mr. Vankoughnet):

That this House instruct the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to guarantee rural customers that rural post offices will remain open on Saturday and that Saturday delivery will continue in rural areas.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE ECONOMY

CALL FOR STEPS TO RESTORE CONFIDENCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, the Mitterrand government of France is now reaping the bitter harvest of its socialist ideas. France has devalued its currency and imposed wage controls on its citizens. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid):

That the Government of Canada now cease its blind following of French socialist policies of devaluation and wage controls and take immediate steps to restore confidence in our currency and allow market forces to establish the true value of Canadian labour.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

VANCOUVER REGIONAL OFFICE—DEMAND FOR INQUIRY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Fred King (Okanagan-Similkameen): Madam Speaker, this House is aware that the fifth report of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development, by unanimous motion of the entire committee, made recommendation that the minister appoint an independent inquiry into certain activities of the B.C. regional office. The House may not be aware that the minister has not put in place any type of review despite the recommendation of officials of the department which he heads. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cariboo-Chilcotin (Mr. Greenaway):

That this House require the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to take steps immediately to provide the independent inquiry into the activities of the regional office in Vancouver specific to the affairs of the West Bank Indian Band as well as other economic development ventures, which was demanded by the standing committee.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

NUCLEAR ENERGY

PROPOSED URANIUM REFINERY AT BLIND RIVER, ONT.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Madam Speaker, the Minister of National Health and Welfare has consistently rejected the requests of the concerned citizens of Algoma-Manitoulin to look into the safety of the proposed uranium trioxide refinery in Blind River, Ontario. The uranium refinery in Port Hope, Ontario, has been found releasing radioactive waste into the atmosphere exceeding permissible concentrations; AECL has acted irresponsibly in issuing licences and inadequately monitoring radioactive emissions at the Port Hope refinery, and AECL is now allowing another uranium refinery to be built at Blind River, Ontario. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Young):

That the Minister of National Health and Welfare advise the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to discharge the AECL of its duties and responsibilities in the proposed Blind River refinery immediately, and that an independent team of inspectors be established with the mandate to enter the Port Hope refinery to undertake an independent base line health study and decide whether the Blind River refinery should proceed.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

REQUEST THAT HOUSE SIT BEYOND NORMAL HOURS TO PASS BILL C-109—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jean-Guy Dubois (Lotbinière): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Whereas Bill C-109 which concerns victims of urea formaldehyde foam insulation must be passed before UFFI victims who qualify can obtain the $5,000 federal grant; whereas many victims have been making representations to a number of members of this House in order to have the bill passed; and whereas the New Democratic Party has been refusing to end the debate on second reading, thereby ignoring the urgency of this legislation, I move, seconded by the member for Beauce (Mr. Lapointe):

That this House should consider the bill without delay, in order to give it second and third reading, and that it should sit outside its ordinary sitting hours so that the bill may receive royal assent before the summer recess.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

[English]

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I understand there have been discussions between the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) and our spokesman, the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Scott), with respect to the disposition of this bill.

It is my understanding that the minister has said the government would be amenable to setting up a special subcommittee of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs to refer the subject matter of the bill to that committee for inquiry by the special subcommittee so set up. In return for that, it is my understanding that the proposal is that the bill go through all three stages, including committee of the whole. If the government is prepared to confirm that proposal, as well as confirm the ability of the subcommittee to examine the report of the board of inquiry into the effects of UFFI, we entirely agree to that proposal. If the government is prepared to make that commitment, we are prepared to put the bill through on Friday.

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, the first thing is that the matter of expediting passage of the bill is extremely important. Certainly the general feeling in this House is that that bill should pass quickly through the House on second reading, move from second reading to committee study, and certainly it should come back. But there are several items that would be conditional there, I am sure.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Skelly: All members of the House would accept the following principles, I am sure. Discussions have been going on between the Conservative critic responsible for this matter, the New Democratic Party member responsible for this matter, and the minister. What has come to pass over a period of time is that there has been confusion, and the minister has been working hard with those members and other critics to resolve that confusion.

If I might just make another few quick statements as to where the confusion arises—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Right there.

Mr. Skelly: —it starts from the following.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): You are talking it out.

Mr. Skelly: First of all, the minister was requested to meet with home owners to discuss, to their satisfaction, the necessary conditions. At those meetings the minister made commitments but he never submitted them or committed them to writing. The second thing is that he was asked if he would produce the report of the board of review, Madam Speaker. Since last January that board of review, which has vital information, has not delivered its report. Beyond that—

Some hon. Members: Time!

Mr. Skelly: Beyond that, he has given an indication that he would produce a reference to his House leader asking for a special subcommittee, since there is not time remaining, to consider this matter and facts that were not allowed to come out in front of the board of review, such as who approved this substance. That information is vitally important in the legal action which will result.

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Skelly: Madam Speaker, the minister, myself, and the critic for the Conservative Party have been working vigorously to resolve this. There are some conditions which will expedite passage of this bill quickly through the House, and I am certain that we know them. Deliver us the board of review report; give us the reference to the subcommittee to carry out this study—

Some hon. Members: Question, question.

Mr. Skelly: Have the minister call another meeting with the home owners and deliver to them his commitments in writing so that there are a set of minutes which express the minister's—

• (1415)

Madam Speaker: Order, please. It being 2.15 p.m., I must interrupt the debate. Oral questions.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Madam Speaker: The Chair cannot entertain points of order at this time.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, yes, you can.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Yes, Madam Speaker, you can. We would understand.

FINANCE

INCREASED TAX EXEMPTION SOUGHT FOR CHILD CARE EXPENSES

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. The minister will know that over 1.5 million working mothers in Canada who must pay child care expenses have been victimized once again by the minister's latest budget which has left unchanged the child care expense deduction. Child care costs have soared. The minister, by deindexing personal exemptions, will force these working mothers to bear a portion of the $1.3 billion extra tax to be generated by this measure.

I want to ask the minister again why this injustice was not changed despite repeated demands from this side of the House, despite representations by women's groups to the minister, and despite recommendations of the federal task force on domestic workers, which recommendations were released by the Department of Employment and Immigration in 1981. The task force said that child care expenses are as legitimate as other business expenses.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I disagree with the hon. member when he states that the budget has victimized persons raising families. In fact the capping of the indexation on family allowances has been more than compensated. For families receiving the child tax credit there is an increase for this year of $50. The hon. member ought to know that the most needy families, I believe those with incomes of less than $30,000, have been more than fully protected as a result of the capping of indexation on family allowances.

The hon. member raises, of course, another question, namely, the over-all matter of how child care expenses are treated under the Income Tax Act. As I have had occasion to tell the House on previous occasions, the matter is the subject of a review by an interdepartmental committee under the leadership of the minister responsible for the status of women.

PLIGHT OF SINGLE-PARENT FAMILIES

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Madam Speaker, does the minister not realize that the $50 extra child tax credit is a small token when compared to the extra burden of the $1.3 billion tax increase which these women are going to have to pay and the extra tax that they are having to pay because of the child care expenses. These average about $4,000 a year while the minister allows them a deduction of only $1,000 per year per child. This is way in excess of the $50. According to the report of the National Welfare Council, 41.5 per cent of families headed by women were below the poverty line in 1980. These women desperately need the relief that this side of the House and these groups are requesting.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I think it is important to keep separate the issues which the hon. member has raised in his two questions. The first issue that has to be examined is the impact of indexation of family allowances on recipients of the child tax credit, namely, those families most in need in the country. For those particular families whose family allowance indexation will be capped there will be a more than compensating payment in the child tax credit. As I recollect, the loss per annum per child is about $17, and again for this year the child tax credit is $50 per child. For those families the result of the budget is to make them better off. That is one aspect that has to be clarified.

The hon. member has also drawn in quite a separate issue, and that is how the whole question of child care expense is treated under the Income Tax Act. That has not been dealt with or affected in any way in the budget, nor was it intended to be affected, because the matter is worthy of very serious attention. It is a matter of concern. Many groups have expressed an interest, with the result that at present it is under the interdepartmental examination I have mentioned, with a view to having some conclusions and recommendations which might be dealt with at a later date. I would ask the hon. member please not to mix up quite separate issues in the way he has done in his two questions.

• (1420)

Mr. Clarke: I think it is this minister who is mixed up.

INTERDEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE REPORT

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the minister of state responsible for the status of women. Some four months ago in the House, and again today, the Minister of Finance said that he cannot act on child care expense deductions because the interdepartmental committee, which I understand the minister of state heads, has not found it possible to reach a conclusion. Will the minister of state tell the House when this committee will be reporting, so that some action could be taken on behalf of these people?

Hon. Judy Erola (Minister of State (Mines)): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Finance was completely correct when he said that it is a very complex question which requires a great deal of study. I should like to assure the hon. member that we have been studying it for the past six months, and that we will be making a report shortly to the Minister of Finance.

AUTHORITY FOR CAPPING INDEXATION OF PENSIONS

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Finance. It involves about 120,000 retired public servants, 30,000 retired Armed Forces people, and 5,000 retired members of the RCMP. Given that former public servants who worked from 30 years to 50 years for the federal government contributed 6.5 per cent of their earnings for basic pensions plus one per cent for indexing in order to secure a full pension when they retired—this was not only a condition of their employment; it was confirmed by law in the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act—and given that the June budget has capped the indexing of these pensions at 6 per cent, under what authority is the government doing this? Why is the government breaking its promise to former employees who are in the sunset years of their lives, by cutting off part of their pensions when many of these people are barely making both ends meet now?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member referred to the full pensions which are being received and will be received by retired public servants. Obviously there is no intention to affect the pension rights of retired public servants. What is intended is to cap the indexation at 6 per cent. Public servants will obviously receive increases in subsequent years, but the increases will be 6 per cent and 5 per cent. The impact, of course, of that capping of indexation can be minimized, and will undoubtedly be minimized as we make progress toward the 6 per cent target for inflation.

The hon. member should join us in the campaign to bring about a 6 per cent inflation rate because, in so doing, he will be coming to the aid of these retired public servants. The hon. member asked under what authority. Obviously that authority will be sought from Parliament by way of legislation in order to achieve the objectives of the government.

Mr. Taylor: Changing the law might make it legally right, but it will not make it morally right. This is actually a double cross of people who worked from 30 years to 50 years to build up pensions and who are not now in the $30,000 bracket which the minister mentioned but are having a hard time making both ends meet; and the minister will now take some of that away from them.

FUNDING OF INDEXING

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, will this not really make every public servant of the federal government today wary of the fact that they are now contributing toward pensions and make them worry about the future when some future government may suddenly cut their pensions in half? This is not playing the game with former employees. The act makes present employees wary of this particular thing. I suggest to the minister that this is confiscation of something that does not belong to the government. Is not the index fund already able to carry full indexing?

Madam Speaker: Order, order!

• (1425)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I am not quite sure what the question was because I did not hear the peroration of the hon. member. However, I would tell him that I do not believe that public servants will be wary of this action because I think that retired public servants will understand the reasons for this change, and the reasons why a sacrifice is asked of them. If the hon. member has read some newspapers he will have noticed that a number of retired public servants were quite prepared to accept this policy and not accept the rather defeatist attitude of the hon. member.

I would remind the hon. member that while the pensions of the public servants are indexed and will continue to be indexed, the pensions of most retired persons from the private sector are not indexed at all.

THE ECONOMY

WAGE AND PRICE CONTROLS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. It concerns both the consistency and the credibility of the government's so-called war on inflation. Yesterday in the House, the Prime Minister said, in response to a question, that no matter how high inflation goes, workers would be expected to hold their wage demands down to 6 per cent or, in his words, legislation would have to be considered.

Just a week ago the Minister of Finance said in the House, when dealing with the same question, that the question of comprehensive wage and price controls was not in the cards. Will the Prime Minister clarify this uncertainty? Are wage and price controls a possibility that will be inflicted upon the people of Canada this fall, or are they not?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I am very grateful to the leader of the NDP for giving me this occasion to clarify my answer which, I agree, if taken out of context, could mean that I was advocating the introduction of over-all controls. That is not what I meant.

If I may refer the hon. member to the context in which I gave the answer, there had been a series of questions, including some asked by members of his own party, concerning regulated prices of commodities. My answer should be added to the answers given by the Minister of Finance in that sense, that we are trying to control regulated prices. We are going to try to do it by—

Mr. Crosbie: Osmosis.

Mr. Broadbent: Smoke signals.

Mr. Trudeau: —by the word of the budget. There may be some cases where prices may have to be controlled by legislation. That is all that I wanted to indicate. There was no other intention on my part, and I apologize if there was confusion. But I once again refer the hon. member and other commentators to the context. I was not referring to over-all price and wage controls.

I repeat what I have said previously, and what the hon. member has quoted the minister as saying, that we have no plan and no intention to introduce over-all price and wage controls. We have confidence that the Canadian people, if appealed to, and if they think it is fair, will co-operate, as some members opposite are hesitant to do. They will co-operate in reducing inflation from 11 per cent to 6 per cent so that we can remain in the competitive game with the United States and other societies which have reduced their inflation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FUTURE RATE OF INFLATION

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I would like clarification on a second question concerning the efficacy of the government's approach to holding down prices. It is quite clear what it plans to do—in an unfair way in our view—with wages in this country. In terms of the price approach I would ask the Prime Minister, given the answers he provided today on this question and that the Minister of Finance and others provided yesterday, which clearly indicated we will not get legislation to control prices, even within federal jurisdiction, like we are in controlling wages, is there any good reason for the working person in this country to believe that inflation will be held down to 6 per cent in the coming year.

• (1430)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I would imagine that that answer could only be given from the point of view or the perspective one holds of the willingness of the Canadian people to co-operate voluntarily to reduce the plague of inflation. I must point out that in his preamble the hon. member seemed to indicate that he did not quite understand my answer.

Mr. Broadbent: No, I did not. I thanked you.

Mr. Trudeau: I indicated that, in the case of public service wage guidelines, we are introducing them so that the rates will be 6 per cent and 5 per cent over the next two years. I indicated, repeating what the Minister of Finance said yesterday, that we intended to see prices operate in the same way, reaching levels of 6 per cent and 5 per cent. In some cases, and that is the matter of legislation to which I was referring yesterday, it might have to be legislated, as in the case of special prices which cannot be brought down otherwise. But, as a general rule, the Minister of Finance indicated in the budget and in subsequent answers that we intend to have the various boards and those who administer prices implement the 6 per cent and 5 per cent prices, with the exceptions explained by the minister.

INCREASE IN GOVERNMENT REVENUE

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): I am sure, Madam Speaker, I appreciate the answer, but I frankly say that I do not believe inflation can be held down to 6 per cent this year. I do not believe the people of Canada believe it and, most seriously, in—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: —the context of government policy, I do not believe the government does. I pin my assertion on this question: if the government genuinely believes that inflation will be held down to 6 per cent in the coming year, how could it make budget forecasts that would provide almost $1.5 billion in additional revenue from those who pay taxes, from family allowance recipients and from pensioners? The whole assumption of the budget is that the government will get additional revenue, about $1.5 billion, which can only come in if inflation is well beyond 6 per cent. I would like the Prime Minister to respond to that.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has complained several times in this House because expenditures and revenue projections had to be revised. This is obviously one case where we will have to revise the projections when inflation comes down to 6 per cent this year or next year.

The hon. member quite unequivocally states that he does not believe that a 6 per cent rate of inflation can be reached this year. I think he is right, and we are not attempting to do that this year; we are attempting to do it next year, and that is what the budget states. That is why the 6 per cent cap on the indexing of pensions and so on will be affected as of next year, not this year. Whether the hon. member believes that it can be reached next year or not, I say that this government does, if we have the co-operation of the Canadian people.

The question the hon. member should be asking is: should we be bringing inflation down to 6 per cent? Since we see that our main competitor and trading partner, the United States, is in the 6 per cent or 7 per cent range, is it not important and imperative that we bring inflation down to 6 per cent?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andre: Wrestle it to the ground!

Mr. Trudeau: Therefore, it is not just a figure picked out of a hat. It is an imperative figure if we want to remain competitive. The only question we must then ask is: can Canadians reach that by force of will, co-operation and sharing, or must they be legislated, forced into doing that? We on this side, because we are small and big "l" liberals, believe that we can appeal to the Canadian people to have this kind of co-operation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PRIME MINISTER'S COMMENT ON POSSIBLE INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is also directed to the Prime Minister. As reported in yesterday's Hansard at page 19044, he said:

—6 per cent inflation can only be reached voluntarily if people co-operate. Otherwise, there will have to be legislation.

The reference was clearly with regard to legislation affecting people. That is the unquestionable interpretation of the language that he used. He was referring to people, not agencies. Will he tell the House of Commons exactly what is the kind of legislation affecting people, to which he referred yesterday?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I thought I had explained that in an answer to the question of the Leader of the New Democratic Party. I can only refer the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition to that answer. I do admit that there was some confusion since the interpretation given far and wide was that I was referring to over-all controls. I can give the Leader of the Opposition the assurance that I did not refer to over-all controls. The reference to people concerned people in the private sector who are asking for increases higher than 6 per cent, for instance, from regulating boards, those who would apply to the CRTC and to the CTC, and the people on the boards themselves.

What I am saying is that people in the opposition, as well as the opposition collectively, must accept that 6 per cent is an imperative goal that we must reach. They must also accept that it can only be reached voluntarily or by the force of legislation. And people will do it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: What people will do if they are given the chance, either nationally or in the three byelections which have not been called, will be to throw this government out.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

APPLICATION OF CONTEMPLATED CONTROLS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): I am interested in knowing precisely what kind of legislation the Prime Minister was threatening in his reply yesterday. Was he saying then, or is he saying now, that the legislation respecting controls being contemplated by the government will affect only regulatory and other agencies?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the answer is that in that question and answer exchange, yes, I was referring to regulated prices, and that was the question I was attempting to answer. When the Leader of the Opposition says that the only interest of the people is in throwing this government out, that may or may not be true, but I do think that it explains the attitude of the Leader of the Opposition and of his whole party. He does not want inflation to come down to 6 per cent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andre: Wrestle it to the ground!

Mr. Trudeau: He wants this appeal to the free co-operation of the Canadian people to fail so that, not having reached 6 per cent inflation, he will be able to brag that the budget failed. He will not be concerned about the failure of the Canadian people to compete with others.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I trust that when the Prime Minister is prepared to tell us to what other fields he intends to apply legislative controls, he will advise the House.

REQUEST THAT SPECIAL COMMITTEE REVIEW GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, let me come to another question which will deal with the problem of inflation in the country. It relates to government spending. The Prime Minister will know that on several occasions I have proposed the establishment of a special committee of this House of Commons to inquire once again, in an exhaustive way, into the spending estimates of the Government of Canada to find where we can save millions and perhaps hundreds of millions of dollars. We know that the government is spending $110,000 to teach Madam Benoit how to cook in metric.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: We know that the Government of Canada is spending $500,000 to buy free briefcases for public servants. We want to know what other savings we can make. We want this Parliament to be effective in finding and saving hundreds of millions of dollars in government spending that need not be spent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Will the Prime Minister, in the interest of fighting inflation, let the people who sit in this Parliament conduct that kind of inquiry? Will he agree right now to make a reference which will establish a special committee, or allow a standing committee to review the estimates, to save hundreds of millions of dollars in spending which the government need not be spending?

• (1440)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, just as the first question indicated the will of the opposition, which is to ensure that we fail in bringing inflation down to 6 per cent, the second question indicates how he intends that that failure be achieved, because he talks about Madame Benoit rather than facing the issue as to whether inflation can be brought down in Canada voluntarily through co-operation by the opinion leaders, the political leaders, whether they be the premiers or the leaders in this House. That is the first question—can it be done voluntarily or must it be done by legislation? In answer to the question, I have indicated that I do not intend to legislate it. The legislated means are already before the House as they apply to the public servants and to members of this Parliament. The other possibility I indicated had to do with regulated prices, but I had not intended, nor do I intend to indicate that there is any form of over-all controls contemplated.

The hon. member made a suggestion about controlling expenses. There is such a thing as a Public Accounts, expenditures and estimates committee of the House of Commons. If the opposition wants to do its job in this committee, it can search out expenditures that can be cut. If it does that, it will be doing a service to us all. I do not say that some expenditures cannot be cut. I am saying that you cannot attack the thrust of this budget and evade it by talking about Madam Benoit or Mr. Gerussi. The question is: do we want inflation to come down or not, and are we prepared to co-operate?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

POWER OF PARLIAMENT

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, the fact is that you do not get inflation down when you run $20 billion deficits. A way to reduce a $20 billion deficit is to eliminate spending on unnecessary projects and undertakings. The Parliament of Canada is the only agency which has the authority and the power to identify and eliminate that spending, if the government gives its permission to a committee to look for those savings. Why will the Prime Minister not give Parliament the power to look for those savings and save hundreds of millions of dollars of spending that we do not need to be wasting?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition asks why we do not give Parliament the power. The answer is very simple. Parliament has that power. The Public Accounts Committee is there. The estimates committees are there. Department after department can be looked at, and suggestions made. They can do that just as easily as any special committee set up by the hon. member. The right hon. member's question suggests that the way in which we can reduce the $20 billion deficit is to make such cuts. I put to him that probably we can bring down the deficit so much by making some cuts, and we are happy to have him find and state areas where we can make savings. I just want to remind the House that the percentage of total spending by government in the area of goods and services is the same today as it has been for the last ten years. The real way in which we can bring down the $20 billion deficit is by getting this society to grow economically, and to grow economically—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: If the path of economic recovery can be followed, the way in which it can be followed is by bringing inflation down to 6 per cent or below. That is the way to reduce the deficit.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

LEBANON—POSSIBLE PARTICIPATION IN PEACEKEEPING FORCE

Mr. Ian Watson (Châteauguay): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Has Canada been invited to participate in the most recently announced international peacekeeping force in Lebanon? If not, does the Prime Minister envisage any circumstance whereby Canada could take part in an international effort such as a peacekeeping shield, which would relieve the pressure on the suffering civilian population of Beirut and would permit Canada a role in the ultimate goal of a larger, permanent, Middle East settlement?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I believe it is fair to say that Canada has an unblemished record in so far as peacekeeping operations are concerned. I believe we participated in every such operation, barring one, set up by the United Nations since its inception. Therefore, we certainly would be happy to assist in ways in which we could.

As the Secretary of State for External Affairs said very recently, and to my knowledge, we have not been approached to participate in any such operation. If we were approached, we would bring the same kind of consideration to the matter that we have in the case of previous requests, whether that participation would be in line with the desire of the various parties to the conflict. Perhaps even more important, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs said, would it be under the aegis of the United Nations? If these two conditions were not forthcoming, we would obviously be much less interested in such participation.

MINES AND MINING

GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Mines. The minister knows that the mining industry is in a severe state of depression; 10,000 of 25,000 miners in Quebec are laid off, 10,000 out of 19,000 in British Columbia, and 40,000 more in Ontario, the Yukon and Newfoundland, meaning that over half of the work force in the mining industry in Canada is out of work at this time. In Calgary on June 3 the minister promised incentives to the industry, particularly the juniors. Can the minister explain, in light of the recent budget, why there were absolutely no specific initiatives to help the mining industry get going again?

Hon. Judy Erola (Minister of State (Mines)): Madam Speaker, as I have stated on a number of occasions in this House, the problems with the mining industry are due to the fact of world prices. Last evening I met with the chief executive officers of most of the major mining companies. They reinforced that statement by saying that the Government of Canada had no effect on mineral prices. The fact is that these prices are a world market situation that will not improve until the world economy, particularly that of the European Common Market and the American market, improves.

In the meantime, this government is taking every measure possible to alleviate the suffering of those who are out of work, through the use of such things as Section 38. I have stated on a number of occasions in this House that I am dismayed at the lack of appreciation of Section 38. I would urge members on the other side, particularly in those areas where there is a heavy mining industry, such as British Columbia, to inform the companies and the people of those communities of Section 38 and its possibilities.

LOANS TO MINES IN OTHER COUNTRIES

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Finance. I am sure he is aware that earlier this week the United States Senate announced that it would stockpile about one million tonnes of copper in that country to keep its sagging copper mining industry going. The government's much touted mining task force, which was supposed to travel around this country, has not done any travelling except once to Newfoundland.

With nothing in the budget, can the minister explain why the government just gave $200 million at 10 per cent interest to the El Cerrejon coal mine in Columbia, and $100 million at 10 per cent to the Rio Tintaya coppero mine in Peru? Does the minister not think that money at 10 per cent to some of the Canadian mining operations would help to keep the more than 60,000 miners in Canada at work?

• (1450)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, would the hon. member suggest that we not engage in these international transactions?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. MacEachen: Does he suggest that we not engage in these projects in other countries, that provide very substantial job opportunities in Canada? Is he suggesting that we add to our unemployment by refusing to participate in opportunities that are available to Canadian firms abroad? Is that his view?

THE ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE TO MAJOR COMPANIES

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, since the Prime Minister is unable to explain how he can achieve a 6 per cent rate of inflation when his government has increased its spending by 20 per cent, my question is addressed to the Minister of Finance. Madam Speaker, thousands of Canadians are in danger of losing their jobs because their employers are so crushed by interest rates that they are in secret bankruptcy; they are in a state of soft receivership. The only reason they keep going is so that they can quietly dispose of their assets and retire their debts, rather than unload them at firesale prices. And, Madam Speaker, I am talking about forestry companies—

Madam Speaker: Order. Hon. members will notice that questions and answers have been quite long and that there have been exchanges that have very much resembled debate during the question period. I would urge hon. members, during the time that is left, to be very brief in their questions, and other members to be very brief in their answers.

Miss Carney: Madam Speaker, since the government is prepared to stand aside and see small and medium-size companies go broke, why is it willing to bail out the big companies like Massey-Ferguson, Dome Canada, and possibly Maislin Industries?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I will be brief and say that the premise of the hon. member's question is wrong. In the budget we have provided several hundred millions of dollars to ensure that small business will survive.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SIZE OF GOVERNMENT DEFICIT

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is also addressed to the Minister of Finance. I refer to his inability to understand how bad economic conditions are in western Canada. This is the reason his government cannot elect any members west of the Red River valley.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Miss Carney: My second question has to do with the minister's projection of a $20 billion deficit. His ministers and his deputies tell us this is based on a third quarter and fourth quarter recovery.

Since the Maritime fishing industry is depressed, since Quebec companies are going bankrupt, and B.C. companies are shut down in forestry, and the mining industry is shut down across the country, where is this miraculous third quarter and fourth quarter recovery going to take place? How can he justify the $20 billion deficit on a third quarter and fourth quarter recovery? What is the real size of the deficit going to be?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, in the interest of brevity, the real size of the deficit is the size projected in the budget statement.

INDUSTRY

SUPPORT REQUESTED FOR COMPUTER SECTOR

Mr. Gordon Gilchrist (Scarborough East): Madam Speaker, the rhetoric and recovery are astonishing here in this exchange regarding this budget.

Madam Speaker: Order. For the rest of the question period, briefly, questions.

Mr. Gilchrist: The communications industry has become prominent in microelectronics and it has raised many millions of dollars and has created jobs. The imported computers, on the other hand—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Gilchrist: May I base my question, Madam Speaker—

Madam Speaker: That is a preamble, obviously, if the hon. member knows what a preamble is. If he would go directly to the question, it would be very helpful.

Mr. Gilchrist: I am trying to arrive at a conclusion, Madam Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Arrive at a question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gilchrist: Will the Minister of Finance consider amending the budget further to enhance the opportunities of the computer section of our high technology industry, which is suffering a $1.75 billion deficit for last year, in contrast to the communications industry which generated a profit last year, and vitally needed dollars, and jobs?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I think that the last two questions from the two members of the official opposition show how confused their policies are.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: The first hon. member belaboured me in several questions about the size of the deficit, and how terrible it was. Then, the next questioner got up and said, "Add to the deficit." That is their economic policy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT INVEST IN HIGH TECHNOLOGY

Mr. Gordon Gilchrist (Scarborough East): Madam Speaker, I would ask this supplementary. Would the minister be prepared to amend the budget to invest in high technology, not add to cost, to create the $4.5 billion worth of jobs which were lost to Canadians last year while we spent the money keeping foreigners employed, and help the vitally needed job-creation sector and the wealth-generating sector of Canada through support for high technology in the budget?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, we have already been giving extensive support to research and development and to high technology—

Mr. Clark: Out of the country.

Mr. MacEachen: —in Canada. That has been evident in many of the firms that are participating effectively in high technology industries, including Mitel. The hon. member is asking for enriched tax incentives. The effect of that would be to reduce revenues and add to the deficit. That is the deficit which his right hon. leader said a few moments ago was too high. When are you going to get your act together? Why do you not take your Wednesday mornings to discuss economic policy instead of the leadership of the party.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PUBLIC SERVICE

CAP PLACED ON INDEXATION OF PENSIONS

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Madam Speaker, in the last reported year, former civil servants received an average pension of only $7,915 per year, and surviving spouses a magnificent total of $2,171 per year. My question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. How can the government justify robbing former employees of the indexing factor when they have already paid 1 per cent of their income to cover inflation? Will the government be asking private pension plans to follow this method of fighting inflation by robbing former employees?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, as has already been pointed out, most of the private pension plans do not have the indexation benefit. The hon. member overlooks this completely in that inflation next year, with the help of all Canadians, and with the help of members in this House, will be at 6 per cent, and accordingly no one will suffer.

An hon. Member: Will you resign when it goes beyond 6 per cent?

PENSIONS

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT GUARANTEE INFLATION COMPENSATION

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Madam Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Minister of Finance. The minister knows that any reduction in the purchasing power of pensioners has to come from food, shelter and clothing. If the minister cannot guarantee that inflation will come down to 6 per cent in 1983 for pensioners, will the minister give pensioners a guarantee that he will retroactively make up the difference between 6 per cent and the actual rate of inflation in 1983?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I would be in a better position to provide that guarantee if the hon. member and members of his party decided to get behind the government and reach the objective of 6 per cent inflation.

CHARTER OF RIGHTS

REQUEST THAT LEGISLATION BE AMENDED TO REMOVE CONFUSION

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Lincoln): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the President of the Treasury Board as the minister responsible for Bill C-124. The minister indicated in question period that it was not his intention that Bill C-124 would in any way supersede the provisions of the Charter of Human Rights or the provisions of the Canadian Human Rights Act. The question is whether or not he is prepared to introduce an amendment to that Bill C-124 to remove confusion and ambiguity, particularly in Clause 9 which does leave the impression that legal interpretation could mean that Bill C-124 does to some degree minimize, negate or offset the provisions of the Human Rights Act.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, indeed I would not read Clause 9 that way, but if there is any ambiguity in that section, and I believe that there may be, I will move to ensure certain provisions of the Canadian Human Rights Act are enforced with respect to people getting equal pay for work of equal value, as was raised by the member for Vancouver East yesterday, that will be taken care of and those rights will not be affected.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. NIELSEN—RAISING OF POINTS OF ORDER DURING PROCEEDINGS UNDER STANDING ORDER 43 MOTIONS

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I rise on a brief point of order arising out of the conduct of the proceedings under Standing Order 43.

You will recall that at the end of the 15-minute period normally allotted for motions under Standing Order 43, I attempted to raise a point of order. The Chair commented at that time that it was impossible to do so, undoubtedly thinking that the proper time was at the end of the question period.

I submit to you, Madam Speaker, that it was never the intention behind the rule changes to confine the raising of points of order and questions of privilege strictly to the end of the question period. Today's proceedings is evidence of how the strict application of that sense of the rules is very wrong.

It was my intention to raise the point of order and to suggest that the Chair seek the unanimous consent of the House not to see the clock and to put the question on the motion under Standing Order 43 that was before the Chair. It does no good for me to raise the point of order at this time because we are 45 minutes beyond the event.

Probably all members on the government side, and certainly all members in the official opposition, would have liked to have seen that question put.

I would suggest, Madam Speaker, that in the future the Chair entertain points of order of that nature. It will be necessary for the Chair to hear a line or two at least in order to establish whether a valid point has been raised. Perhaps the Chair might take that into consideration in the event that similar occasions might arise in the future. I merely raise it for that purpose at the present time.

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, certainly the Chair was correct in handling the matter the way it did. If a clever stunt is about to be pulled, the correct procedure would be that there be consultation on an important process such as this. The assumption that this took place in conjunction with the Conservative and Liberal members on this is not quite correct. There are serious matters to be criticized, and I think Your Honour was absolutely correct in the procedure followed.

Madam Speaker: My knowledge of the rules is that points of order may not be entertained in the course of hearing motions under Standing Orders 43 or in the question period. That is not in the Standing Orders of course, but it is my understanding of the way this particular matter was to be interpreted so as not to take away from the period normally devoted to motions under Standing Order 43 or to question period. It is my understanding that the whole House came to an agreement on this particular point.

I might point out to the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) that at the time he raised his point of order—now that the Chair is aware of what his point of order was—there would not have been much point anyway, because I had already interrupted the hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly). It was 2.15, and the motion could not be put to the House at that time because it was past the time at which those motions can be entertained.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, I am sure you would be the first to agree that the House, collectively, is the master if its own processes, and the House would be the first to insist upon the application of that fundamental principle.

Since the rule changes, both of your predecessors allowed both points of order and questions of privilege to be raised during that one hour period and, indeed, during the 15 minute period preceding it.

I would suggest that before coming to any conclusion and basing that on the record—something which would be very difficult for the House to live with—it might be prudent to examine the occasions in the past upon which your immediate predecessor and your predecessor once removed allowed such questions to be raised in the period in question. I certainly would not want to see a precedent set here different from the precedents set by your predecessors.

Madam Speaker: I understand that this agreement had been reached in the course of the time when my predecessor was in the chair. However, I can check the time at which that decision was reached. I would be the last one to disagree with the hon. member that the House is master of its own proceedings. I am entirely in the hands of the House, and it is because I am entirely in the hands of the House—although I might have liked to entertain the point of order the hon. member wanted to raise—that I had to abide by what is the practice. As far as my knowledge can take me, the practice is that points of order may not be entertained at the time at which the hon. member raised it.

If the House wants to change this, that is perfectly all right with me. I will abide by it when I get instructions from the leaders of the different parties that they want to change the proceedings.

[Translation]

Mr. Jacques Olivier (Longueuil): Madam Speaker, I rise on the point of order raised with regard to a motion presented under Standing Order 43 this afternoon. I should like to point out that the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) resorts increasingly to his privilege as House leader of the official opposition in an attempt to alter the Standing Orders of the House, while on the other hand constantly refusing to bring them into the twentieth century. Madam Speaker, he, himself, resorts increasingly to points of order to waste the time of the House, while we know full well that the decision reached by both sides of the House—

Madam Speaker: I am afraid the hon. member is starting a debate, which is legitimate although not at this time.

[English]

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge-Foothills): Madam Speaker, I have never heard such nonsense in my life. I sit on a special committee to change the rules of the House—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. That too, is debate I am afraid.

PETITION

MR. FULTON—APPOINTMENT OF CHAIRPERSON TO THE INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I rise to present a petition signed by 25 Members of Parliament from the New Democratic Party caucus regarding the government's delay in appointing a Canadian chairperson to the International Joint Commission. This important bilateral body deals with such issues as acid rain, the flooding of the Skagit Valley and the pollution of the Niagara River and Great Lakes. It is in dire need of a chairperson so that these important issues, such as the Garrison, can be dealt with.

Canadians are fed up with this government and its lack of concern for anything but its own survival. Since the Prime Minister is not capable of calling byelections or selecting someone for the IJC position, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) should refer the matter to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence so that an appointment can be made expeditiously and without more Liberal pork-barrel politics.

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It seems to me it is without precedent for members of this House to be permitted to avail themselves of the Standing Orders in orders of the day to petition the House. I have never seen that happen before. I wonder if it is within the rules.

Madam Speaker: I must say that I was surprised. I have not checked that, but the Clerk tells me that members may petition the House. I hope I am right.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, there is something I should like to clarify for the House. On June 17, 1982, and I am referring to page 18551 of Hansard, I gave an answer to a member of the New Democratic Party concerning Bill C-60 and said to him then that the bill would be proclaimed before the end of June. Before giving him that answer, I had consulted the minister sponsoring the bill, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who had told me that it was entirely possible and in fact had confirmed that the bill would be proclaimed before the end of June. After my answer of June 17 to the hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources advised me that, owing to certain events, it would not be possible to proclaim that bill before the end of June.

Under the circumstances, with a view to setting the record straight and explaining the answer I gave to the hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke, I should like to say to him that when I gave my answer I did so on the strength of the information provided to me by the minister responsible for the bill and that subsequently, owing to certain events, the minister told me that it could not be done. I would therefore urge the hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke to ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources why the bill could not be proclaimed before the end of June. I wanted to put these remarks on the record so that in all fairness the hon. member be given an opportunity to ask for an explanation which the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is quite prepared to give.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, I believe the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields) has also taken an interest in this matter and had also addressed questions in the House with respect to the proclamation of that bill. The government House leader has indicated that there were certain events causing this delay. I wonder if he has an explanation of just what those events are that are causing the delay in proclaiming the bill?

Mr. Pinard: I have just indicated, Madam Speaker, that I was inviting the hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke, and to that extent any other member in the House, including the colleague of the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), to ask those questions of the minister responsible for Bill C-60, the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources who is prepared to give the proper explanations.

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed, from Tuesday, July 6, 1982, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased with this opportunity to take part in the debate on this very important budget brought down by our colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) on June 28. My concern will, of course, be mainly with measures affecting small and medium-sized businesses in Canada. However, before I go any further, Mr. Speaker, I shall first take a few moments to outline what, I feel, should be the attitude of the various economic partners in Canada. Mr. Speaker, it is this attitude that is proving to be a prime factor in our struggle to get this country out of its present problematic situation.

Only last week, I had an opportunity to speak in Toronto at a conference on small- and medium-sized businesses organized by the Financial Times, and the theme of this special conference was: Private enterprise—How to make it survive and prosper. The theme was very apt, in view of the recession that is affecting industrialized countries the world over. Falling growth rates, rising prices and continuing unemployment, that is the general situation today, to a greater or lesser extent.

As the Minister of Finance said in his budget speech, the present recession is affecting both developed and developing countries, and the tragic part is that some of the causes of this recession are beyond our control. This was more or less the point that the Chairman of the Economic Council of Canada was trying to get across when he said two weeks ago that we should not expect Canada to get the world out of this recession on its own. A recession, Mr. Speaker, has a number of causes. Whoever is in government, in business or in the labour sector will be quick to blame one of the other sectors or economic partners and make them out to be the cause of all the ills besetting us today. Some people feel that the unions have made life too easy for workers, whose productivity has gone down while wage demands have become excessive. Another view is that businessmen and women should reduce their profit margins and thus slow down price increases. And it seems that everyone, Mr. Speaker, feels that governments at all levels should reduce their spending. Granted all these statements have some truth to them, and there are things to be criticized in every group. But I also feel, Mr. Speaker, that this is part of the problem. So many of our economic partners in society today tend to look only to their own interests, and as a result, it is too often overlooked that any action taken by unions or business or government will inevitably have an impact on the other groups. Because of our isolationism, we cannot forget that society consists of a number of groups that are interrelated and that any action by one will have an impact on the others. A union trying to obtain wage increases for its members that are equal to or in excess of the inflation rate often forgets that in doing so, it is actually feeding inflation. On the other hand, businessmen or women who regularly decide to increase prices in order to compensate for falling incomes, are also giving inflation another nudge upwards. The fact is that we are just like the dog that is chasing its tail. Everyone knows he will never catch up with it.

To get out of our inflationary spiral and create a sound economic climate, we must make the necessary sacrifices now. Of course, in this network of relations between the main economic partners, governments are also part of the solution. They have often been described as organizations that try to please everyone and succeed in pleasing no one. There is some truth in this as well. All the members of this House and the members of the government have a duty to strike a sometimes very fragile balance between often conflicting demands by the various groups that constitute our society. This situation often leads to results that may or may not be very popular. For instance, establishing social programs or protective measures to help people cope with economic problems will be seen as socialism by some, while to others, granting tax rebates to business is tantamount to helping the rich become richer. In fact, Mr. Speaker, there are a number of politicians opposite who do very little to correct the latter impression. However, before we can break the inflationary spiral which is the principal cause of our economic problems, we shall, whatever our activity sector may be, have to look beyond our immediate surroundings and get out of our isolation. We must try to understand the needs and aspirations of others. And before getting together, we must get rid of our prejudices. It will not be easy, especially if demands are made in anger, whether through the media or in this House. Some major steps in this direction have been made during the last few months, for instance, by the Minister of Finance, who with some of his cabinet colleagues went on a Canadian tour of consultations with business and labour. I read in yesterday's Toronto Star that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Finance will be meeting the President of the Canadian Labour Congress, Mr. McDermott, some time on Friday, and Friday afternoon, the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister are having a special meeting with prominent businessmen.

Personally, since I became responsible for the portfolio for small businesses, I have tried to maintain frequent contacts with directors of small and medium-sized businesses in Canada, and I shall continue to do so. My point is that I shall continue to present to my cabinet colleagues the views of Canadian businessmen and women. Mr. Speaker, such contacts or discussions, as I said before, must be positive, because the task before us is overwhelming. This is what the Minister of Finance referred to in his budget speech, when he spoke of solidarity. Regular discussions between the major economic partners in Canada are therefore necessary, but we also need strong leadership. That is why, in his budget, the Minister of Finance asked parliamentarians to set an example to other Canadians. I therefore am fully supportive of the measure aimed at reducing salary increases of members, senators and ministers. As the House is aware, the measure consists of a rollback of the increases we obtained at the beginning of this year. Furthermore, all public servants, and there are more than 500,000 men and women in this category working for Crown corporations, the Armed Forces and the public service, will receive salary increases of not more than 6 and 5 per cent over the next two years. With my colleagues, I am convinced that the responsibility of the public service with respect to inflation is not any greater than that of other sectors in Canada. However, the rest of society must understand that legislated restraint at the federal level must be followed very soon by voluntary restraint in other sectors. As pointed out in the budget speech, the alternatives, namely, increased inflation and recession or more extensive controls, do not afford a very attractive prospect. Although the indexing factor for pensions and income tax will also be limited in 1983 and 1984, namely, to 6 per cent and 5 per cent, the government has given those least able to protect themselves the assurance that they will not be destitute. The child tax credit has been increased by $50 and will continue to be fully indexed to help families with modest incomes. Everyone receiving the guaranteed income supplement in addition to the old age security pension will get a supplement to the GIS payment offsetting fully the limitation on indexation of old age security payments. As the minister announced in his speech, veterans' pensions will continue to be fully indexed.

As the Minister responsible for small businesses, Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to be able to support the forceful measures announced in the June 28 budget. Although some small businesses are experiencing problems, like most of my colleagues in this House I have been receiving a tremendous amount of mail from entrepreneurs who want to expand their businesses or set up new ones. The $400 million assistance program to reduce interest costs for small businesses undertaking new investment is a new program that is being added to the many existing programs that are helping small businesses in Canada.

Speaking about these other existing measures, Mr. Speaker, I would like to urge my colleagues on the other side to agree to extend the application of the Small Businesses Loans Act, which expired on June 30, 1982, as proposed in a bill tabled two weeks ago, so that financial institutions, caisses populaires and credit unions can continue to guarantee loans to small businesses. Everyone supports this legislation, Mr. Speaker, starting with small businesses, financial institutions and all the members of this House. Members opposite tell me that they need two days of debate. I find it strange that they would jeopardize the interests of small businesses for the vainglory of being able to say that they had two days of debate in this House. I therefore hope that hon. members opposite will agree to extend the application of the Small Businesses Loans Act to give small businesses access to the capital which they so badly need.

However, to come back to the $400 million announced in the budget to help small businesses undertaking new investment, this means that, over a period of two years, small businesses eligible for the program will be able to reduce by 4 per cent their interest costs on certain investments made between June 29, 1982, and March 31, 1983. This 4 per cent reduction in interest rates will apply to loans of a minimum of $10,000 and a maximum of $500,000. Small-business men, fishermen and farmers who purchase goods subject to depreciation or who finance research and development projects will receive as an incentive grants totalling $200 million this year and $200 million next year. If we add this up quickly, Mr. Speaker, we see that $400 million in grants at an interest rate 4 per cent lower than current rates means that small businesses, fishermen and farmers in Canada will have access to loans totalling $5 billion. This means that there will be an opportunity for small-business men, fishermen and farmers to demonstrate their dynamism, as they have always done in the past, and to prove that they are truly the backbone or the basic fabric of the Canadian economy. I am convinced that entrepreneurs, Canadian businessmen and women will take advantage of this measure which will help them gain access to capital at reduced interest rates for investment purposes.

It should be noted that this program does not replace the Small Business Bonds Program announced in the budget of last November. Small businesses, fishermen and farmers in financial difficulty remain eligible for the bond program for refinancing purposes.

In response to the wishes of hundreds of small businesses, in its budget of June 28, the government has also postponed to January 1, 1983, the 12.5 per cent tax on small business dividends. The purpose of this measure was to encourage small businesses to reinvest funds which could otherwise have been paid out as dividends. As this tax has been further postponed I hope that small businesses will continue to reinvest these funds in view of the cash flow problem which they are facing because of high interest rates and the present recession.

In another area, Mr. Speaker, since 98 per cent of building companies in Canada are small businesses, the grants totalling $300 million for the purchasers of new houses and the first-time buyers of existing houses should stimulate substantially the building industry. Contractors owning small businesses represent 52 per cent of the building activity in Canada. Those engaged in house or apartment building should therefore be responsible for creating a large part of the 118,000 new jobs resulting from these grants. The initial $30 million allocation to the home renovation plan will be increased to $60 million, adding new stimulus to the housing industry. These direct grants under the small business investment assitance programs and the housing programs will have a snowballing effect on a whole range of other small businesses, from the mobile canteens visiting the construction sites, from hardware stores like we all have in our areas to building materials firms, sawmills, furniture manufacturers, etc. Mr. Speaker, the new jobs and economic activity generated by these two initiatives will contribute significantly to economic recovery.

The government had a rather narrow margin for manoeuvre between reducing expenditures on the one hand and the need for stimulating the economy on the other. In my view, the areas that will benefit from this stimulus, namely small businesses, housing, farmers and fishermen, were the optimal target for such stimulative action.

Some years ago, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Dennis McDermott, the then president of the United Auto Workers was asked what was in his view the best way to stimulate the automobile industry. His answer was interesting. He answered at the time, and I quote:

> Put the housing industry back to work, and my workers will get their jobs back.

So, Mr. Speaker, it is my view that the new housing program coming on top of all the programs announced in the November budget will not only help create 118,000 new jobs in the housing area, it will in turn give a shot in the arm to the automobile industry among many others.

Along with his June 28 budget, the Minister of Finance, tabled a discussion paper on possible investment measures, in order to stimulate discussion on how to ensure access to capital to small businesses. As indicated in the budget, a committee of prominent Canadian economists and tax experts has been given the responsibility for studying the feasability of various proposals. What is the purpose of the white paper tabled and the committee that started meeting on Monday, Mr. Speaker? It is to study measures intended to tax interest earned only to the extent where it exceeds the current inflation rate for Canadians investing funds in a new form of term deposit. Second, to tax capital gains on that part only that exceeds the inflation rate, in the case of Canadians purchasing common shares of Canadian corporations. Third, to provide a 3 to 6 percentage point reduction on mortgage rates for new homes. Fourth, the possibility for small businesses, farmers and fishermen to secure loans for new capital investment at interest rates lower by 3 to 6 percentage points than prevailing rates.

The committee shall table its report by the end of September on the feasibility of those measures. It is important that the committee table the report soon, in order that the approved initiatives can be implemented as soon as possible.

It is also important to note, however, that the need for these initiatives and others to reduce government expenditures is dictated by inflation. Were it not for the specter of inflation, the confidence in our Canadian economy under normal conditions would be enough to encourage investments and job creation.

Such is the budget message. We must fight inflation together, while ensuring that jobs will be created and that no one among the less fortunate will suffer.

As I said, at the beginning of my remarks, I urge our economic partners to better co-operation. We cannot go on bickering from opposing positions. Prejudice and sour comments can do no more than hide the real problem. Mr. Speaker, we all belong to a country with a tremendous potential but going through difficult times. With our vast human, intellectual and physical resources, we can get out of this predicament.

I should like to conclude by quoting in part remarks which the Business Council on National Issues directed three weeks ago at my colleagues of the Cabinet:

> This is clearly a time when productive discussion is most likely to flow from considering prospects for the future rather than recriminations related to the past. The occucpants of a lifeboat at sea are not likely to improve their chances of survival by arguing over how they got there. However, it is useful to know where lies the nearest shore.

Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance is showing us this shore by setting up a recovery course of 6 per cent instead of maintaining a recession course of 12 per cent.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I was wondering whether the minister would accept a question.

Mr. Lapointe (Charlevoix): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McDermid: The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) announced in his budget a small business investment grant which would reduce interest costs by 4 per cent to a small business financing the purchase of a new depreciable property. In view of the amount of vacant space which is available due to plant closings and bankruptcies, would the minister consider asking the Minister of Finance to extend that grant to businesses that are willing to purchase existing vacant properties so that these may be taken up and these small Canadian businesses can in fact expand?

[Translation]

Mr. Lapointe (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I find the hon. member's suggestion interesting. At the present time, I think, however, that the development or expansion aspect of the grant program to reduce interest rates by as much as 4 percentage points must be implemented. After being in effect for eight or 12 months if we realize these $400 million were not used quickly enough, we could still adjust the program, and it is in this connection that I find the hon. member's suggestion most interesting.

[English]

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I think I understand why the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism (Mr. Lapointe) is having such difficulty explaining the situation to the hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid). Basically his understanding is that it is pointless to quarrel in a lifeboat about how one got there. Certainly some consensus on where the boat is going is the important part, but the minister missed the point, that is, that the lifeboat is absolutely full of holes at this point, and it is every man for himself. That is a true description of the state of affairs in Canada today. Of course, the lifeboat is the Government of Canada and its budget.

I approach this debate with some trepidation. I feel almost like a novice because this is the first opportunity I have had to speak in a budget debate on economic matters. I am almost a maiden in the lifeboat. I am confused. I have heard government members across the floor make some excellent, spellbinding speeches. I listened to an individual for whom I have tremendous respect, namely, the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières), give a very learned and detailed speech. He gave percentages, facts and figures on complicated investment programs, but when I talk to people in my riding I realize that he might as well have been speaking Latin. In some instances our function as communicators fail.

The speech by the Minister of State for Small Businesses was excellent in terms of the detail and the concepts involved, as well as his explanations, but he might as well have been speaking Latin. His speech was excellent until the lifeboat analogy at the end. When we listen to government members we hear that they have identified the problems all by themselves, that they have developed the programs all by themselves and that they are better than sliced bread. But in reality that is not the perception of people outside the House. They are confused; they are wondering what is happening. I am confused.

I listened to the member of the official opposition from the province of Quebec when he made his speech last night. His speech was typical of those of many of the members of the official opposition. When he talked about the budget document I heard him say that it must have been put together by hypocrites, brigands and incompetents. I am confused because I know many of the members opposite and they do not fall within that category. They are individuals who work very hard and are very conscientious. I know that individuals in the official opposition share the same sentiments about those members because they certainly are those kinds of people. Therefore, I am confused and I think that confusion extends to most people in the country.

We have been given many figures, which in most cases are quite accurate. Hon. members have talked about unemployment running at 11 per cent and inflation running at 11.5 per cent. They have talked about increasing bankruptcies of farmers, fishermen and small businesses, as well as the plight of home owners. They talked about the rising deficit and the incredible government spending. There is no point in repeating those facts and figures now because they are well known to the House and the people throughout Canada.

While we have gone into great detail in attempting to be technicians manipulating the finances of Canada, I suggest that we may have forgotten one small but important aspect of our function, and that is our job of being communicators. I believe that the people of Canada are completely confused about the budget. They do not understand the budget process or its purpose. I believe that Canadians are becoming even more confused when they sit down to try to rationalize the cost of running this place, which is somewhere between $100 million and $120 million a year. It must be very confusing for them to figure out a balanced cost-benefit analysis of the operation of this entire place. As communicators, I suggest that it is our job to attempt to clarify that confusion for Canadians. In fact, I am hard pressed, and certainly other members are hard pressed, to attempt to understand what we have done in a constructive manner for Canadians when we see this document put before us today.

I have concluded that there are five steps to this budget process. While it certainly cannot be examined in a simplistic way since it is such a complex document with many supporting assumptions and facts, it might help me and hopefully some others to attempt to do that. I think the budget is mainly concerned with the identification and priorization of problems. In order to identify what those problems are, a consensus and co-operation are required at the outset.

It is interesting to note that we have profound disagreements with the government. It says that inflation is the major problem, while we have said that it is not the exclusive problem. We believe there are a combination of problems, such as high interest rates, unemployment and high inflation. As well, these are symptoms of much deeper problems, which the budget itself does not address and which the entire budget process has ignored. It is important to note, however, that there has been great confusion in the country and a loss of confidence in the government which, through the process of osmosis, has led to a great loss of confidence in the operation of this place. If our economic recovery begins with the identification and priorization of our problems and we cannot even agree on what those problems are, how can we communicate to the people what our principal difficulties are?

Once these problems are identified by whoever is responsible for that, the next step is to develop programs which address those problems. Hopefully these programs will prove beneficial in the long run. While the government talks about sharing the burden and tightening our belts, surely these programs can only be developed with consensus and co-operation and a commitment to sacrifice and share. Unfortunately, there are widely varying points of view on this subject in the House.

It is interesting to note that these splits occur in different ways. The government sees high inflation rates as the problem and therefore takes a monetarist approach which involves the application of restrictive and repressive restraint programs as a cure. This approach, when reduced to its final form, will result in the strangulation of the economy in order to kill demand and expectations, which unfortunately lead into a recession when they occur in the prevailing circumstances in the country today. We do not agree that this is the main problem. However, it is interesting that it appears that this is the program which has been designed and preferred by the official opposition as well. Therefore, there is consensus, in spite of the inflammatory terms that have been used. The definition of the program and the identification of the problems by the Conservatives are the same as the government's, but I think the government has outflanked the official opposition to our right. This policy brought in higher interest rates than the Conservatives were willing to bring in and higher energy rates than the Conservatives were willing to bring in. It is surprising that the government has seemed to have outflanked the Conservatives on our right.

The next step in the budget process seems to be an analysis and explanation of the costs of those programs. People seem to be confused about this aspect as well. While the government attempts to fulfil its role as communicator, with the Minister of State for Finance speaking Latin last night and the Minister of State for Small Businesses speaking Latin today very effectively, it has not really communicated the essential message to Canadians. The government appears to want to spend about $78 billion this year in the execution of its programs. In order to spend this money it wants to create a $20 billion deficit. It is telling Canadians that its programs will not stop high unemployment, the bankruptcies of small businesses, farmers and fishermen, and it will not prevent home owners from losing their homes, nor will it reduce the deficit or improve the efficiency of its spending in Canada. It essentially wants to spend $78 billion and run up a $20 billion deficit in implementing programs in which the people do not have confidence. Canadians still anticipate that the economy will continue to sink. I have not heard one member of the government stand up and say that the economy will turn around and improve. This anxiety is a result of a failure of communication at the first level as well as a failure in the entire concept of presenting these facts.

The fourth step in the budget process involves an explanation of how revenues will be raised. Certainly these programs must be developed. The costs have to be assessed and then an explanation given to the people of how these revenues will be raised. The government's explanation was fairly clear, I suggest. It was that these revenues have to be collected from non-tax sources and through taxation. The government listed a number of those sources.

The fifth step concerns the matter of taxation. This is one aspect of the budget in which individuals responsible for promoting this document must be scrupulous and work carefully to explain two particular reasons for taking money from the pockets of the taxpayers. One is that the money is needed and will be well spent, and the second is that the burden or liability for tax is spread fairly. However, this is not what the government has done. It has indicated more clearly than in any of the other steps in the process that the money will come out of the pockets of civil servants. This money which is to fight its anti-inflation program will come out of the pockets of senior citizens and people on fixed incomes and from a rather clever increase in the taxes of middle and lower-income Canadians. Ultimately this will reduce the spending power of that group of Canadians who might have been able to help reverse the trend which is occurring in some parts of Canada, had they received some modest stimulation.

So it strikes me that the budget process has five steps in it, and that it is very confusing for people. I think the government has missed the point in the whole exercise. When one observes how those five steps work, one finds that the government is telling people that it wants to spend $78 billion and incur a $20 billion deficit, mortgaging the future of Canadians on programs which no one really believes will resolve the problems that seriously affect Canadians.

The budget and the process through which the government has gone over the last few months is really communicating a message to people, and they are beginning to react and to respond. It is interesting to find that in a budget such as this, which attacks civil servants or the public service and which encourages the provinces to attack their civil servants, and which reduces already abysmally low pensions in this country by reducing the ability of the fund to keep up with the inflation rate, one is communicating one message. But certainly when the government turns around and, no strings attached, hands $2 billion to the oil companies which are being pressed, but not as pressed as the small businesses in the 16 communities in my riding which are going bankrupt, bang, the government is communicating its message, which is, "Goodbye and good luck." But when the oil companies begin to squawk, our old buddies like Imperial Oil and the others we have mentioned in the House, the government whips out the cheque book and writes a cheque for $2 billion, no questions asked, no strings attached. My colleague points out that under the petroleum incentives program they will be handed another $6 billion, but that will occur in time, of course. However, the government is communicating a message, and that message is being translated into an attitude and a reaction in the minds of people.

The Minister of State for Small Businesses developed the appropriate analogy. The people are getting the message that the government and the country are similar to a lifeboat full of holes, and maybe it is every man for himself. Look at Olds-Didsbury. Look at my riding. When the Western Canada Concept, which I guess is the equivalent of separatism in the west, arrived in my riding a year ago, it managed to draw six people to a meeting. But now there is such a turnout that it cannot hold meetings in the rooms which have been booked, and the meetings are held in shifts. There are signs throughout my constituency, "We have had enough". "Let's free the west", as the bumper sticker says. One should compare a lifeboat full of holes with writing a $2 billion cheque for the oil companies with no strings attached and then wishing the businesses, home owners, fishermen and forestry workers who are out of work, "Goodbye and good luck". These programs do nothing for forestry and nothing for fisheries. They are essentially left on their own. Even a recovery, because of poor economic planning, will not assist them.

The other matter is the bail-out of Dome. Again, we in this House are quite prepared to look at a set of companies which develop because of the lack of a competition policy. There is a lack of any sense of control involving the question of whether the development of these megacorporations would be in the interests of Canada, yet we develop them. They ran into enormous problems, but now the government whips out its cheque book and says, "We will help to bail you out", and the bank is behind them. That communicates the message, "Goodbye and good luck" to small businessmen, fishermen, farmers, those who are out of work, those who do not have any chance of employment. But when Dome comes to the door or the trough, when the banks come to the door or the trough, or when the oil companies come to the trough, they are paid off, bang. Maybe it is just poor communication and maybe I do not understand what the government is doing although, on the other hand, maybe I have a good idea. But my impression is that the government has really failed in its job as a communicator because I do not understand it, the people in my riding do not understand it, and the people of western Canada do not understand it. I bet that when we go to the polls the next time—and a change of government will not resolve this—the people will not understand it, and it will be, "Goodbye and good luck" to the present government.

So, where are we? In this sort of sad state of affairs there seem to be three problems. I would like to share my insight for whatever benefit it may be to the members of the House of Commons and the people I represent because, being confused, I can only try to develop some kind of empirical observations and try to interpret them. The government has forgotten the purpose of the government process. It is really an accountability process by which the people who represent Canadians stand up and say, "These are what we see as the problems, these are what we see as the programs that will solve our problems, and these are the costs and how you have to share them." It is not a small triumvirate sitting at the front desks on the other side of the House with an all-seeing eye that perceives the problems in isolation, develops the programs in isolation and then randomly imposes the costs on Canadian society without consideration of fairness or equity. It is a shared process, or there is no support.

One of the main problems is that that organization, the government, has failed to understand what the budget is. It is an accountability process. We had better get back quickly to that fact.

Concerning accountability, remember that the people to whom we must communicate are hon. members of the House who directly represent the millions of people in this country. If that communication fails, then everything done will be a failure.

The second main problem is the process of consensus and co-operation. This is a very complex nation with different accessibility to benefits. Ultimately, what we have is a problem.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga) rises on a point of order.

Mr. Elzinga: I regret to interrupt the hon. member's comments, as important as they are. We on this side of the House find it despicable that hon. members opposite, in the government, cannot maintain a quorum in the House of Commons when we are discussing a budget that they supposedly feel is so important. We just want to put you on notice, my friends, that this budget will not be passed if you do not maintain a quorum.

Mr. Skelly: The point I was making is that there are basically three main problems in this process. One is that the government has forgotten that a budget process is one of accountability, and that is vitally important. The second is that the programs developed and the costs shared must be determined by co-operation and consensus. Essentially, the government has destroyed the sense of community within this country because it is made up of a small group of people who make the decisions, which ultimately exclude everyone else. There is one federal government but ten provincial governments. The federal government is but one player, yet it conducts a budget exercise without inviting them to participate. There are municipalities in this country whose budgets are larger and whose effect is greater than those of some of the provinces. However, they are not brought into the process. Large businesses, and in fact small businesses, are certainly a factor, as well as organized labour and those who have no power, basically those people living on fixed incomes without organizations to represent them. If they are not part of this process of consensus and commitment, then we will all be in serious trouble and we will ultimately see the destruction of the sense of community in this country. We hear, for instance, from the province across the river which says, "Our objectives and ambitions are not being fulfilled and we would like to separate." We see the development of the Western Canada Concept, which now has firm roots in Alberta and Saskatchewan and is growing in Manitoba. Therefore, the destruction of the sense of community in this country is a serious problem which lies in the way this budget and other programs in the House are constructed.

I would point out one other factor, namely, the operation of the Thirty-second Parliament, which has two basic characteristics. One is an incompetent government. When one steps outside this House, one finds no hesitation in saying that it is a fact that the government is incompetent. Many of the people who have prime control have been here too long and have lost their sense of commitment and their belief in the potential of this country. They have said, "We have tried it all before and we cannot do anything. We must weather the storm." But there are people behind that government, behind those front benches, who seem to have ideas but are being held back. Maybe as the change occurs, maybe as we remove the leader, maybe as we remove the Minister of Finance and Governor Bouey, the symbols of this repression, something new will come forward. But basically, the government is tired and incompetent. It is a tough bullet to bite, but the other characteristic is that the official opposition is unscrupulous in its operation. I am not referring to individuals, because I know that some are sincere and honest, but certainly at the leadership end of that organization there is a group of people who confine themselves on the floor of this House to screaming and yelling at the Speaker, essentially showing contempt for parliamentary democracy and the foundation of government in this country. That has happened too many times, my friends and colleagues. The ultimate result is that they are not here to fulfil a responsibility to provide constructive alternatives to what has been suggested. They are here basically to disrupt for the basest of political reasons, a grab for power. I suggest that this can be rectified. It is the basic policy of a small group of individuals and it is a function of leadership. When you attack people over there and destroy them personally rather than attack the government with alternatives and constructive criticisms, you are doing a tremendous disservice to the entire operation of democracy in Canada.

• (1600)

Basically the government has failed in its understanding of the budget process and the need for accountability. Basically they have failed to understand the need for consensus and cooperation in the entire process. Ultimately, they are incompetent, tired and in need of change within their own organization. Survival is what is at stake.

Unfortunately, the official opposition in providing a service to Canadians has been basically dishonest. They have attacked and eroded the strength of parliamentary democracy in Canada. They have failed in this intellectually honest process of providing constructive criticism by attacking personalities. It is much like the trick of the ancient Roman emperors who preferred to bait bears and shed blood to distract people. They do this rather than provide constructive alternatives and state the policies they would put in place if they were in government. Believe me, it is obvious and lacking in their operation in the House.

What is the answer? There are four short points. Parliamentary reform will not make the House work better. Good faith and a commitment to an effective operation will. If we combine those two, parliamentary reform to make the process more efficient and to allow for greater integrity and personal performance based on supporting this institution, we will find more confidence and understanding of what we are doing. The second is government policy. Basically we are not talking about high interest rates, high inflation and high rates of unemployment. We are talking about a real disease in this country, the lack of a long-term industrial strategy to develop this economy. I am talking about the long term, the long haul commitment, the kinds of things people in this country can identify with.

The government has studiously avoided that. Why? I do not understand. Many Canadian sask for an indication of where we are going in the long haul so that they can make the sacrifices and work together. They want to know at least where they are going. All that most of them know is that fishermen and many businesses are going down the drain, and the budget will not help. It has been stated before that if we are going to establish and strengthen the sense of community in this country, we cannot suddenly drop a bomb in this chamber like the bomb that was dropped the other day, and hope that anyone will support it. There has to be more effective cooperation and consensus in developing those documents.

I now come to my fourth point or resolution. Certainly there are many more. Others will put forward more constructive ones. My final point is that there have to be some symbols of good faith. The operations of this House since the beginning of the Thirty-second Parliament have created confusion and a lack of commitment in this country, especially in the economic sphere. I ask other members of the House what kinds of symbols of good faith and sincere interest do we really have? I suggest you cannot do what this budget purports to do without a mandate. I know that the government will never resign and call an election. The Conservatives know that. Everyone knows it. That is impossible. However, that should be done as a result of a mandate, not just an ad hoc, off-the-wall arrangement.

If they were to offer to people Bouey's head or the head of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), basically it would indicate a change. It would be a symbol of good faith. Maybe we should have a replacement. Somebody new from the back benches might help.

Miss Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak in this debate on the budget brought down by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) last Monday evening, a budget which in my view responds to the economic circumstances of the country at this time.

This budget offers Canadians a way to put an end to the recession and to speed our progress toward recovery. In this effort, it calls on all Canadians to join in the solution and creates a climate where other governments, business, labour and individual Canadians will be able to work collectively toward bringing inflation down, which in turn will bring recovery within the interdependent context of our international economic relationships.

The policy of this government in its June 28 budget, while maintaining the framework of current monetary and fiscal policy, is to intensify its efforts to lead Canada out of economic recession. The thrust of the Minister of Finance's budget is to restore confidence, confidence in the future where inflation is reduced.

To do this the budget has a four-part action plan: first, bring inflation down to at least 6 per cent through a nationwide collective effort; second, reduce the impact of high interest rates, especially for small businesses, farmers, fishermen and home owners; third, create over 300,000 jobs through direct government action and indirectly through improvement in the investment climate; and fourth, maintain the integrity of our social security system.

Our social security system is a comprehensive system and one of the best in the world. It provides for the cost of bringing up children, for complete medical and hospital services for everybody, for retired people and for elderly people with no or very little income.

How will the June 28 budget bring about this four-part action plan? It will do it by attacking inflation, attacking high interest rates, reallocating funds to create jobs, housing incentives and tax proposals. I would now like to deal in greater detail with each one of these.

The first goal is to attack inflation. The immediate objective for all Canadians must be to cut inflation nearly in half. We must move from a close to 12 per cent inflation to a 6 per cent recovery. There are many forces acting on the Canadian economy which are outside of Canada's control. The high interest policy in the United States is a good example. Another example is that Canada is a trading nation and partners with whom we deal are also suffering from the effects of the worldwide recession and, as a result, international markets for our products are weak.

However, there are areas which we can control and which are within our control. One is our inflation rate. If we are to be competitive on the world market once the recession is over, then our cost structure will have to be lowered or we will be priced out of the world market on which we depend to market our resources.

Therefore, the government wants to reduce our inflation rate to 6 per cent over the next two years. To do this the government is asking all Canadians to share in the effort. The indexing factor applied to personal exemptions and tax brackets for the 1983 taxation year will be 6 per cent, and in the 1984 taxation year it will be 5 per cent.

The pay raises in the public service, which includes the Armed Forces, the RCMP and Crown corporations, will be limited to 6 per cent next year and 5 per cent the year after. Salary increases made in January, 1982, for Members of Parliament, cabinet ministers and Senators will be affected immediately by being reduced to 6 per cent for the rest of the year and next year and 5 per cent the year after that. All regulating prices under federal jurisdiction will be monitored. This will affect such areas as public transportation, communications and foodstuffs.

Effective January 1, 1983, increases in indexed social payments will be limited to 6 per cent and in 1984 to 5 per cent. These limits will apply to old age pensions, family allowances and public service pensions. However, they will not apply to people who receive guaranteed income supplements, which will be double-indexed to account for the reduction in the old age security; nor will these provisions apply to veterans. Those families who receive a child tax credit will see an increase of $50 in 1983 when they file their 1982 child tax return. This increase of $50 will offset the reduced indexation of the family allowance which will start in January, 1983.

What does this mean for old age security and family allowance recipients? In July of 1982 persons receiving old age security received $235.17. They would have received in January, 1983, $251.73. However, with the 6 per cent indexation introduced in the budget, they will now receive $249.23 in January, 1983. Those receiving family allowances would have received next January 1, $29.87, but with the 6 per cent indexation they will receive $28.87. As can be seen, indexation will continue but is being reduced to 6 per cent in 1983 and to 5 per cent in 1984.

The federal government wants to show Canadians that the fight to reduce inflation is serious and that all areas which the government controls will be working to see that inflation is cut in half over the next two years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Campbell: The government is offering the challenge to all sectors of Canadian life to help reduce inflation. My own premier has accepted this challenge, and I hope all Nova Scotians, both in the public and private sectors, will see that by reducing inflation to 6 per cent the over-all buying power of their money will be enhanced.

Without the central theme of the budget committing us to restraint, there is no doubt that we would be caught in the vicious spiral which the Minister of Finance spoke of in his budget speech, when he said that this vicious spiral means that inevitably incomes chase prices, which in turn chase incomes and, he added, no one wants to be the first to accept a lower increase in pay. The government has now moved to face this challenge head on, calling on all Canadians to help the nation achieve its goal of recovery by lowering our demands on the economy.

I would now like to deal with the attack on high interest rates, the reallocation of funds to create jobs and funds for housing incentives. The government will not add to the present deficit but rather will reallocate the funds which will result from the 6 per cent and 5 per cent indexation. Some of these funds will be directed immediately to provide relief from high interest rates for small-business men, farmers, fishermen and home owners. It will do this by making available grants of up to $3,000 to help home owners with mortgage renewals costing more than 30 per cent of their gross family income. It will give relief to small businesses—and this includes fishermen—now, immediately, by reducing their borrowing rate by 4 per cent. It will provide more assistance for Canadian farmers by reducing their interest rate by 4 per cent, through the Farm Credit Corporation.

With the reallocation of funds the government plans to create jobs. Along with lowering inflation and lessening the impact of interest rates, we must also find and create jobs for the many unemployed. The goal of the budget is to create over 300,000 jobs over the next two years. The budget provides an immediate $1.4 billion for direct jobcreation and other initiatives. A sum of $300 million will go to existing programs that stimulate job creation in the private sector. Another $200 million will be added to direct job creation. This will bring this fiscal year's direct job creation to $657 million. This is over and above the new national training program financed at a level of $1 billion to modernize Canada's training system and prepare workers for the jobs of tomorrow.

Another $400 million will go to the housing industry. Furthermore, $400 million will go toward reducing the interest costs by up to 4 percentage points for two years on borrowings by small businesses and fishermen—both incorporated and unincorporated—to finance new investment in research and development. The program here will apply to loans to small businesses by financial institutions which will qualify for the new assistance program. These loans must be used toward financing purchases after June 28, 1982, and before March 31, 1983, of new depreciable property to be used in an active business in Canada. This will include government guaranteed loans to small businesses under the existing Small Businesses Loans Act. The program will also finance the expenditure on scientific research after June 28, 1982, and before March 31, 1983. It is important to note that loans which would go toward the purchase of land, automobiles or property for lease, will not qualify. This interest relief program should benefit businessmen who must borrow to make new job-creating investments.

Another $100 million will go to the interest assistance program for farmers in distressed financial conditions who require a loan and associated interest rebate to survive over the short term. This program will be administered under the Farm Credit Corporation for the next two years. The loans will be made at the regular Farm Credit Corporation interest rate, but a rebate of 4 percentage points will be provided for the first two years of the loan. Over the longer term, the new proposal for the indexed term deposit certificate will be in place to provide assistance on high interest rates for businessmen, fishermen, farmers and home owners.

I want to turn now, Mr. Speaker, to the matter of housing incentives. To start the recovery of the housing construction industry, the government offers a dynamic five-point program. First, the Canadian home ownership stimulation plan will provide a $3,000 grant to all buyers of a new home and first-time buyers of an existing home. The program is effective as of June 28, the night of the budget. Buyers must first make a down payment of at least 10 per cent, over and above the $3,000 grant. An existing home is a unit that has already been occupied and must be purchased before December 31, 1982, in order to qualify for the $3,000 grant. A new unit is a home which has never been occupied, or it is one that must be started before December 31, 1982 and purchased before December 31, 1983. The program is limited to homes with a value of up to $100,000 for most areas of Canada and in all areas of Nova Scotia.

People who want to build their own homes are also eligible for the plan. The grant will be available to owner-builders when the interest adjustment date is set on the mortgage by the financing institution. The next plan had been in existence but has been changed. Under the budget, the Canada mortgage renewal plan allows home owners who have to spend more than 30 per cent of their gross family income as a result of renewing their mortgage to be eligible for a grant of up to $3,000 to help offset the higher interest rates on their mortgage renewal. This plan will be in operation until the end of 1983.

The third proposal provides increased funding for the Canada home renovation plan, which makes available a 30 per cent grant for home renovations on contract work of a minimum of $2,500 and up to $10,000. The $10,000 contract would qualify for the maximum grant $3,000. The 30 per cent grant applies to home owners whose gross family income is $30,000 or less; above $30,000 there is a decreasing grant available up to gross family income of $48,000. This program will be in existence until the funds of $60 million are exhausted, and it has been very well received in South West Nova and elsewhere in Nova Scotia.

The fourth incentive to the housing industry is the non-profit and co-operative housing 1982 allocation which has been increased by 2,500 units. This will be of interest to many areas in Nova Scotia where people have built new homes under the co-operative housing program of CMHC.

Finally, the federal government's commitment to available rental housing was reaffirmed under the Canada rental supply plan for new rental units in a tight market.

The tax proposals contained in the budget are also interesting, and all Canadians will be able to take advantage of them. The Minister of Finance has set up a committee of prominent Canadian businessmen, accountants and economists to advise on the new tax proposals in the budget. The committee has already met with the Minister of Finance and will meet again. Their recommendations on the implementation of the investment initiatives should be forthcoming over the next few weeks.

The two new proposals of the budget are, first, the creation of the new indexed term deposit that would pay the investor tax-free interest on that part of the interest earned that reflects inflation. Funds accumulated in this way would be directed by the financial institution to purchasers of new homes and to small businesses, farmers and fishermen investing in new plant and equipment at interest rates from 3 per cent to 6 per cent lower than market.

The second proposal is for a new registered shareholder investment plan where the investor puts his money in a fund that buys publicly-traded common shares in Canadian companies. The capital gains on the shares would be taxable at half rate as before, but only to the extent that they exceed the inflation rate.

Mr. Speaker, I have tried to speak on the many areas of the budget which are of interest to my constituents as well as other Nova Scotians and Canadians. The member who spoke ahead of me talked about communications. I challenge members opposite to read the budget papers. They will be effective if all Canadians are to fight the present recession and high inflation rates.

The economic situation facing the country is serious. Most of the industrial world shares the twin burdens of high unemployment and high inflation. There are no quick fixes, no easy solutions, but the budget now before the House offers a combination of proposals and a course that will, I am sure, lead to recovery. It is in this spirit that the Minister of Finance called on Canadians for their collective effort in overcoming our difficulties. I am confident that we can overcome these difficulties and return to better times.

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for South West Nova (Miss Campbell) has admonished the whole country and asked us to read the budget. I must tell her that one of the problems the country has is that people have read the budget and that they have been affected by the last two budgets brought in by the same Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), so they are not really willing to take him at his word or take the Liberal Party at its word any longer.

When the Minister of Finance announced on June 22 that he would introduce a new budget to the House the following Monday, we in the opposition had some reason to believe that, after weeks and months of argument and debate and our telling the minister about the paucity of his economic programs, all this was finally beginning to have an impact.

The almost daily deterioration of all the economic indicators in this country, triggered by the minister's first budget and greviously aggravated by his second budget—that downward slide had at last, so we thought, brought this hear no evil, see no evil government to its senses.

Statistics have been used again and again in this chamber and across the country—statistics on unemployment, bankruptcies, foreclosures. We thought they had become so horrifying that not even this remote and autocratic government could ignore them any longer. Finally, the minister indicated on June 22 that there was to be a change. Finally there was to be a response to the calamity taking place in the country. Finally there was to be a new budget, tinkering here and changes there—call it what you will but at least there was to be some action.

On June 28, budget night, we got that action. This time the Minister of Finance surpassed himself. Given a third chance at budget-making—although why he should have merited a third chance after all the damage he has done to the country only the Liberal caucus knows—he again managed to swing and miss. Not for him a comprehensive plan to relieve high mortgage rates and thus provide a widespread and permanent boost to our housing industry. Instead, he offers a one-time freebie that will do nothing to alleviate the 20 per cent mortgages that have to be paid year after year. Then he includes a vague proposal to reduce mortgage rates that will be examined and studied until late this year, even thought 70 per cent of all mortgages up for renewal this year will become due between June and October, in other words, before that committee has a chance to report and have its recommendations implemented.

Not for the Minister of Finance measures that would stimulate the private sector or increase productivity or tackle head on the appalling cost to this country of 1.5 million Canadians who are unemployed. That cost will be reduced only as job opportunities open up.

Instead, in the face of an additional $2 billion pay-out from the unemployment insurance fund since last November, the minister increases direct job creation by a measly $100 million this year. With 1.5 million unemployed, that measly $100 million will produce jobs for perhaps 30,000 Canadians. What about the other million-plus Canadians who are unemployed? What all about all of those others who are going to be facing lay-offs between now and the end of the year? Oh, yes, he did promise to create jobs through something he calls "levered investment incentives". I wish he would explain to the business people of my riding what he means by levered investment incentives. Better still, would he just spell it out in plain English?

There was a time, it would seem, a time like this, that the minister would be called upon to take bold measures. Instead, what he does is raise his head up out of his bunker, survey the state of disaster all around him, and then duck down again. He ignores the crippling damage of high interest rates. He ignores the fact that government spending will increase 20 per cent this year over last year—no restraint on government spending. He ignores his own miscalculation of the deficit; it has gone from $10 billion to $20 billion in a period of seven months. Obviously simple mathematics is not one of the strong points of the Minister of Finance. He ignores all these calamities as he prepares to hunker down again. Instead, he selects and sends out the front line troops to fight off the onslaught that his previous budgets have triggered. Who are they? Well, he shields himself behind the elderly, the unemployed, and the people with lower and middle incomes. In one last vain attempt the minister tries to shield himself and his government from the havoc that he and his colleagues have created year after year as they piled up deficit after deficit. It is not working, Mr. Speaker, and it is not going to work because the people of Canada have had to pay for the government's mistakes and the mistakes of the Liberal Party for just too long. They have had to pay in terms of lost jobs, lost homes, high interest rates, spiralling fuel costs and, ultimately, in lost hopes, shattered dreams, insecurity and anxiety, and they are just unable to take any more.

What the people of Canada have to say to this government, Mr. Speaker, simply and clearly is this: we do not believe you. We do not believe the deficit is all due to the deterioration of the economy. We do not believe that $20 billion is all for unemployment insurance claims. We do not believe that every man, woman and child in Canada has cost this government $1,000 more than they have contributed in tax upon tax upon tax. They are saying: we do not believe our economic nightmare is the fault of American interest rates or Arab oil. They are saying: we believe it is the fault of an arrogant bunch of callous, cynical and cold-hearted incompetents who should not be trusted to run a parish bingo, let alone the finances of one of the most richly endowed countries in the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: If there is one single thing that Canadians from coast to coast can agree upon, it is their lack of confidence in this government. This above all is the problem in Canada. The present budget has done nothing to alleviate the situation. However, Mr. Speaker, I honestly believe that no matter what this government would do at this point, it simply would not work because they have eroded the faith of ordinary Canadians. They have destroyed the trust that must exist between the government and the people. They have spent their substance in riotous living and now they are asking ordinary Canadians to pay for it. Is it any wonder that Canadians have become cynical, disheartened and frustrated?

Meanwhile, the government casts around looking for a solution to its problems. When will the Liberals realize that they cannot provide the solution because they are the problem? They are the problem because of the deception that they practise on the Canadian people. They are the problem because they fail to keep their word and because they say one thing and do another. How often have we heard from the Liberal Party the words "the just society", or "social justice and equity"? How often have we heard those words being mouthed? The November budget laid great emphasis on that word "equity". What a hollow mockery this present budget makes of the concepts of equity, fairness and compassion! Nowhere, sir, is this more blatant than in the harsh measures the government is taking to partially deindex personal income tax and partially deindex old age pensions and family allowances.

I would like to direct the attention of hon. members, Mr. Speaker, to that question of deindexation for a few minutes. Ten years ago the former leader of the Progressive Conservative Party, the hon. Robert Stanfield, began advancing a long overdue change in government policy. He said that people should not be bumped into higher personal income tax brackets unless their real incomes increased. He said it was wrong to have a tax system which took a larger and larger share of people's incomes as inflation rose, without governments ever having to come back to Parliament to openly raise taxes. He said this was a deceitful way of going about increasing the government's revenue. He said that such a system not only defrauded the taxpayer but made government irresponsible and less accountable to the people's representatives.

When Mr. Stanfield first put that idea forward, it was spurned by the government of the day. During the 1972 election the then minister of finance, John Turner, argued that such a system would cost the treasury too much money, it was unnecessary because he said inflation was just a temporary problem, and the Americans did not do it so why should we? Then in October of 1972 the government lost its majority, barely holding on to a plurality in the House of Commons. Mr. Turner decided that a flip-flop might be in order and on February 19, 1973, he brought in a budget which pledged to index personal income tax brackets and exemptions fully to the rate of inflation beginning in the 1974 tax year.

Nor was this to be a short-term experiment. Speaking for the government, a government led by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and including the present Minister of Finance and the present Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin), Mr. Turner described his policy as "a lasting solution to this problem should inflation continue". He noted that a worker whose wages had risen only enough to maintain purchasing power in the face of rising inflation could be worse off under the then existing tax system because his higher nominal income would push him into a higher tax bracket. The government's stated intention, according to Mr. Turner, was to eliminate that unfair and unintended result from our tax system. Mr. Turner bragged that through his policy Canada was joining a very select group of countries which have eliminated the hidden revenues accruing to governments through the effect of inflation on a progressive tax system. His words leave no doubt that the policy shift was to be a permanent one in his words "a lasting solution should inflation continue".

In light of what happened on June 28, there is an echo of the poetic worthless pledge of some of the treaties with the native peoples where we find these words: "As long as the grass grows and the rivers flow." Because, Mr. Speaker, lasting solutions in the Liberal dictionary turn out to last nine years. So fundamental and so permanent did Mr. Turner consider this policy that he described it as "a major innovation in tax philosophy and practice" which though not complex would "take some time for people and governments to adjust to". Consequently, he concluded that it should come into effect only the following year.

When Mr. Turner brought in this measure back in 1973, inflation was 5.8 per cent. That is when he decided that the Liberal government should index the tax system up to 6 per cent. The step was so momentous that it was going to take a year for the country to adjust to it. Now with inflation at the rate of 11.8 per cent, double what it was in 1973, the Liberal government is taking the first opportunity to deindex it to 6 per cent.

What will be the result of this reversal of policy of the Liberal government? People not now paying taxes will join the tax rolls even though they have had no real increase in income, and people now paying taxes will pay more. The real hyprocrisy of the government's position is revealed in the government's own tables in its Budget Papers. These are found on pages 13 and 29. There the government projects that it will take in $1.3 billion between January 1, 1983 and March 31, 1984 as a result of this deindexing of personal income tax. In the process, the government will increase the tax burden on every group of taxpayers, except married couples with children earning less than $12,000 a year. Let me repeat that. The tax burden will be increased for every group of taxpayers except one.

Such a projected revenue increase of $1.3 billion is an admission by this government that it does not expect the program announced in the budget to reduce inflation to the 6 per cent and 5 per cent levels for 1983 and 1984. If it did, there would be no revenue gain for the government from partial deindexation. Yet the government said it is going to make $1.3 billion on the move. The government itself does not believe that it is going to be able to wrestle inflation down to 6 per cent. Otherwise, the government would not have put forward those revenue projections.

Similarly, an expenditure reduction of $260 million is forecast between January 1, 1983 and March 31, 1984 because of the partial deindexation of the family allowance and old age security pensions. Again, this assumes inflation will rise faster than 6 per cent in 1983 and faster than 5 per cent in 1984. In effect, the government is asking the beneficiaries of these programs, the beneficiaries of old age pensions and family allowances, to take significant cuts in both 1983 and 1984.

True, a few low-income families—with children receiving the child tax credit will come out ahead initially because the enriched tax credit more than offsets the reduction in family allowance due to partial deindexing. But by the end of 1984, according to the program, almost all families will lose because of the cumulative impact of partial deindexing for the 1983 and 1984 tax years. That is something the Minister of National Health and Welfare does not talk about. She does not mention the cumulative effect of deindexation.

Old age pensioners fare even worse. True, the poorest of them, those who qualify for the guaranteed income supplement and the spouses' allowance, do not gain; they merely do not lose under the new arrangements. But those who do not qualify for the guaranteed income supplement—the more than one million pensioners in this country, and here we are talking about many single people with total incomes starting at less than $8,500 a year and couples with total incomes starting at less than $14,500—will lose $80 in 1983-1984 and an additional sum of money in 1984-1985. That is what will happen to them.

The income of these people was indexed to inflation in the first place according to the policies of the Liberal government, copied and borrowed from Mr. Stanfield. But we gladly gave it to them because it was recognized that the elderly have no levers to bargain effectively for higher incomes to offset the ravages of inflation. They do not have the levers other groups in society have. Thus it was felt that the purchasing power of their incomes should be protected. That protection, and the principle of equity it embodied, is now to be eroded for at least two years; or should I say, until the Liberal government meets its long overdue accountng with the voters of this country.

The erosion of equity this government is smugly presiding over hits you again, Mr. Speaker, when you examine the partial deindexation of the personal income tax on various income groups. Let me give the analysis of one economic consultant. Patrick Grady of Ottawa, in making his calculations, assumed an indexation factor of 11.7 per cent for the 1983 tax year and 9 per cent for the 1984 tax year. His findings show that the single taxpayer's partial deindexation will raise the effective tax rate for those earning $7,500 by 1.5 per cent in 1983, while those earning $100,000 will see their tax rate rise by only 0.9 per cent.

Now, that is equity? Where is the equity in this? A 1.5 per cent tax increase for those at the lower end of the salary scale but a less than 1 per cent tax increase for those who are well off, those in the $100,000 bracket. How can any member opposite justify that? Have they no conscience at all? Particularly, how can members opposite justify that after the budget of last November when the government cut tax rates for those earning $30,000 or more per year, with the biggest cuts coming for those making $50,000 a year? The social reformers in the Liberal Party, if there are any left—and I am looking at my friend, the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Mackasey)—should hang their heads in shame at meekly accepting such regressive measures. Yet I would say that far from wearing sackcloth and ashes this government has the audacity, in the same budget in which it is socking it to the working poor, to publish a paper entitled "Inflation and the Taxation of Personal Investment Income", in which we find this statement:

> The current indexing system has protected Canadians from large tax increases . . . It operates well for income from wages and salaries, pensions, social security receipts and other transfer payments.

That is what the government says about the current indexing system. But then it goes on to gut that system for the next two years. How inconsistent, how inequitable, can a government be within the confines of a single budget? The government seems determined to plumb the depths of both those qualities—inconsistency and inequity. At the same time it becomes the profiteer, the chief beneficiary from deindexing the tax system. It is the one agency which makes money out of inflation. It is in the government's interest to keep inflation high.

• (1650)

The Minister of Finance who once prided himself on his social conscience now seeks to rectify his mistakes, to correct his past blunders by going after the pensioner whose income is $700 per month. He is the new Ebenezer Scrooge but he now has an accomplice—the Minister of National Health and Welfare. She has not only rejected universality and equity by allowing the Minister of Finance to deindex those pensioners receiving only old age security, but she has casually turned her back as if she had no responsibility for them whatsoever. She said on budget night: "I can live with it and they, the pensioners, can live with it too." That is a very callous remark coming from anyone, but particularly from someone who does not have to live on $8,000, $9,000 or $10,000 per year.

She may indeed have battled for the cause of pensioners in cabinet. I would hope and trust that she did, but she lost out. She is losing out in another battle as well. Indeed, I am afraid that she is losing out in the major war which must be waged in the name of pension reform.

What has happened to the much publicized pension reform which the minister has been enthusiastically promising us for over a year now? She promised it last summer, she promised it last fall, she promised it this spring, she promised it this summer. Now, once again she has said that this much-trumpeted green paper on pension reform has been postponed until next fall. By the time we see the paper, I fear it will no longer be green but grey from old age, from being postponed for so very long.

What is clear is that pension reform is no longer, if indeed it ever was, a priority of the government. Poor people who are living below the poverty line are no longer a priority of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Why is it that essential social programs always have to be the first to be cut? The minister's promises of the past year now seem very hollow indeed. She accepts a cutback of $100 million in payments to pensioners as a result of the budget.

Instead, she could have argued for a cut of $100 million from the $670 million spent on the rental of premises by the government in the national capital region. It could have been cut if renting were carried out at the cost of average rental space throughout the national capital region. But it did not come from cutbacks in government rental. She could have argued for a reduction of $100 million in the amount spent on professional and consultants' fees which comes to more than $1 billion in the budget this year. That amount could have been cut back by $100 million. She could have asked that $100 million be taken from the $1.6 billion spent on the personal costs of ministers, such as motor car allowances and other personal expenses. That $100 million could have come out of that $1.6 billion. She could have argued that the $250 million spent on information and advertising by government be reduced to provide additional revenue. She could have argued for a reduction in the $2.2 billion spent on utilities, materials and supplies this year. She could have argued for a reduction in any of those areas but obviously she did not, so pensioners have to bear the brunt of a $100 million cutback as a result of the budget.

I said at the outset that there is a deep and fundamental loss of confidence all across Canada in the government. It comes about as a result of measures such as the ones about which I have been talking. There is no sector of our economy, no group of our people, no region of our country which is not affected by that loss of confidence. This House may divide as it did last night 144 to 130 on the question of confidence, but make no mistake, Mr. Speaker, the country, our Canada, does not divide that way. The country is united in its rejection of any confidence in the government. I dare hon. members on the government benches, the Prime Minister, his cabinet and all Liberal backbenchers to have the courage to go to the country to find out what the people think.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Guy Dubois (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, in fact—and I am reacting to the words spoken by my colleague—after June 28, or to be more specific, after the House adjourned on June 30, I did go to my riding and I certainly was not afraid to ask what people were saying about the budget. Naturally, many people who listened to the budget speech by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) on Monday, June 28, were wondering which measures applied to which economic sectors and which individuals, and many of my constituents in Lotbinière made the following comment, more or less: the budget seems to have some very good provisions, and according to the minister's speech, it seems we have the mechanisms to deal with the present situation, with inflation and with the recession, and that Canadians are being given the means to face up to the situation through the various programs announced in the June budget.

When I hear members of the opposition talk about the status of the Canada Pension Plan and family allowances and the problems in these two areas that come under the jurisdiction of the Department of National Health and Welfare—when I hear them say, for the sake of making political capital, that the people receiving these payments will be penalized and will have problems and that they are the ones who are going to suffer real hardship as a result of the June budget—Mr. Speaker, when I hear them speak this way, I have to protest, and I want to tell these people on the other side of the House that they are just indulging in petty politicking and trying to make the public and senior citizens believe they are going to suffer as a result of the budget. As far as the old age pension is concerned, the base payment is $239.73 in July, in October it will be indexed, and on January 1, 1983, it will be $249.23, as a result of the 6 per cent ceiling, otherwise it would be $251.73. However, these payments will continue to be indexed every three months. About 47 per cent of 2,368,569 Canadian pensioners are receiving the base pension. If they have the base pension, Mr. Speaker, this means they have other sources of income to live on, they have other income to make ends meet, and that income could be $15,000, $25,000 or $30,000. But whatever the pension system, old age security is a universal system and whether you have an income of $30,000 or $40,000, you get the base pension.

I think Canadians are aware of this situation, namely, that payments will continue as before until January 1, and then they will be $2 less, but what is really important to Canadians is that nothing has changed for the remaining 53 per cent who are receiving the entire GIS or part of the supplement. In fact, the slightly lower indexation of the base pension will be entirely compensated for by double indexation of the GIS every three months, starting January 1, 1983. As far as the GIS is concerned, I think senior citizens in this country should know that a person who receives the guaranteed income supplement does not have sufficient income, statistically speaking, to live on the base pension alone. In fact, it means that the individual has no further sources of income. On the other hand, people receiving the base pension only have other sources of income which enable them to cope.

I would like to explain to Canadians and to the people in the riding of Lotbinière what the situation is regarding double indexation, and what happens to those who will only receive the base pension. Double indexation will be applied to the GIS every three months, starting January 1, 1983. The July 1982 GIS payment will be as announced a few days ago, that is, a maximum of $240.67 for a single person and $185.55 for each spouse. Next January, these figures would normally be $252.61 for a single person and $194.75 for each spouse, but with double indexation, the cheque will be $255.11 for a single person and $197 for each spouse. In fact, people receiving GIS payments will be receiving more according to the measures in the June 28 budget. In any event, I think that trying to make political points on a subject like this is in very poor political taste. Earlier in the House, there were references to the status of people receiving the base pension only, and in fact, over 1983, people receiving the base pension will be receiving $55 less, and indexation will be 6 per cent instead of 11 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, as far as the base pension is concerned and the $55 per pensioner that the 6 per cent ceiling has made available for other uses, does the House think that these pensioners would not be happy to see that money spent on community development programs that will help people work and help the children and grandchildren of these senior citizens to find work? I am referring to senior citizens who are receiving only the base pension and who have other sources of income. I am sure they would have no objection, because I met senior citizens who are receiving only the base pension and considering the other sources of income they have, I think the $55 in question would be very usefully spent on job creation. I must protest most energetically against the insinuation that we are trying to make political points with senior citizens, and I can assure our senior citizens that job creation is very important for young people who are having trouble finding work. This money will be spent on putting them to work. That is the real situation, Mr. Speaker, and the important thing to remember in connection with what I said earlier is that starting January 1, 1983, GIS payments will be increased. People receiving GIS will be better off than they were before the budget. So there is no reason to act like alarmists and indulge in petty politicking on the subject of senior citizens. And now, how does the budget affect family allowances? At the present time, family allowance, which is now $26.91 per child unless there is a different rate in Quebec and Alberta would normally go up to $29.87 by next January, but with the 6 per cent ceiling, it will only go up to $28.52, $1 and a few cents. Over 1982, the total allowance for one child will therefore be $322.92. In 1983, this figure would normally be $358.44 but will now be $342.24.

The rate of indexation will be 5 per cent in 1984. However, what is important with regard to family allowances is that of the 3,636,851 mothers who receive the allowance in Canada, 2.5 million are also entitled to the child care tax credit. These women will not be affected by the budget. The important thing to tell the Canadian people, Mr. Speaker, is that if the spouse's income is less than a certain amount—I believe it is now something over $20,000—the child care tax credit can be claimed. Those who need it most will therefore benefit from the budget of June 28, 1982.

In this regard, I want to point out that the child care tax credit, which amounted to $261 non-taxable per child this year and should have gone up to $293 in 1982, will be increased by another $50 as compensation and will therefore amount to $343 non-taxable per child in 1983. This will compensate for the capping of family allowances for the next two years. Once again, this is what happens in the case of a universal allowance system. Does the person with children and a family income of $50,000 or $40,000 a year need the child care tax credit more than someone with an income of $20,000 or less? That is why, as concerns the child care tax credit, deductions are made from a taxpayer's income, since those who are more hard-pressed need more money. This is what the budget of June 28 does. It provides $50 more and increases the amount from $293 to $343. Therefore, all Canadian mothers who are entitled to the child care tax credit because their spouse's or their own income is less than a designated amount will receive $50 more. These are the facts Mr. Speaker. This is not the proper time to play politics concerning family allowances and the pension system in Canada. This is important since, out of 3,636,851 mothers, 2.5 million are entitled to the child care tax credit, and they are the ones who will benefit and receive $50 more. This is the important thing to tell the Canadian people instead of trying to indulge in petty politics about this issue. That is why I wanted to begin my intervention by speaking about these two issues, the old age security pension and family allowances.

Mr. Speaker, other programs announced in our budget were received enthusiastically, at least in my own constituency. These programs deal with housing and concern the renovation of Canadian homes. This program will benefit construction workers, contractors, of course, and also realtors. Since June 28, many realtors in the major city of my constituency, Victoriaville, have telephoned me about this $3,000 grant to find out how it would be paid, and I must say that they were very happy to learn the facts. How many homes have been built by contractors who unfortunately cannot find a buyer? A great many! And how many contractors who could have started building new homes are not doing so because of the mortgage payments potential buyers would have to pay? The program which was announced on June 28 in the budget will benefit these people, Mr. Speaker. What I am trying to do is to explain these programs so that the Canadian people will know what we have done following the representations made by realtors, builders and representatives of the housing industry to help this sector, because it is often said that if the building industry is running smoothly, the wheels turn by themselves. The $3,000 grant will apply to the purchase of new homes, whether condominiums, duplexes, triplexes, row housing or single family units. The important thing is that a prospective buyer may opt for either a new home or an existing home. And if a person has never owned a home and wishes to buy an existing home and if that person is a first-time purchaser, he will be eligible for the $3,000 grant. There are, of course, certain conditions to be met.

So, two possibilities are covered. The situation where we have a new home on which construction has started by a certain date, a new home that has already been built but has never been lived in and, what is important to many couples, homes that are several years old. This is an opportunity for people, including young couples or even older couples who have never owned a home, to pay less for an existing home which may be 10, 12, 15, 25 or 30 years old and qualify for the $3,000 grant.

There is, of course, the 10 per cent down payment which must be considered, but even so, $3,000 is still quite substantial, considering the present interest rates. I also think that, to people who are trying to cope with the present situation in the construction industry, this program will be very important, especially those who were laid off for several months last year, because obviously, contractors—and quite a few have already called my riding office—are aware of the situation and are going to start building houses, and even with the present uncertainty regarding interest rates, a person who qualifies for the $3,000 grant has at least that, and in my view and not only in mine, Mr. Speaker, but also according to many of the people in my riding, it is a real incentive for this sector to get back on its feet.

What about other programs that already exists and that were well received when they were announced and even more so when we decided to allocate additional funds I am thinking of the Canadian home renovation plan. One of the existing programs is the RRAP for rural areas. To qualify for the program, a municipality had to have a certain number of inhabitants, and many Canadians had been asking their members for programs for municipalities that did not have the requisite population for the RRAP.

That is why the Canadian government introduced the Canadian home renovation plan under which people would receive up to a certain percentage, namely, 30 per cent, which in many cases could amount to $3,000. Many contractors and people involved in home improvement were very pleased with this program to which $30 million was allocated. On June 28, 1982, the Minister of Finance added another $30 million, thus enabling people whether they lived in a municipality, whatever the population—except for the RRAP program in rural areas—whether they lived in a municipality, a town of 50,000, 100,000 or 200,000 inhabitants, and provided they met the income requirement, to qualify for the renovation plan. I see my colleague for Quebec East (Mr. Duquet) and I am sure that people in Quebec East will be taking advantage of this program. In fact, they have already started to do so, and now more people will be able to benefit as a result of the additional funds that have been allocated. Another important aspect that was well received and which has not been given much attention by the official opposition is the last program I am going to discuss. There is also the Canada Mortgage Renewal Plan. It has been extended from November 12, 1982 to December 31 1983. And there is a provision under which homeowners who must allocate more than 30 per cent of their gross income to mortgage payments will be eligible, after June 28, for a non-taxable cash grant of up to $3,000. The significant aspect is that interest deferment will no longer be required before someone becomes eligible for a grant.

Those are the programs announced in the budget which have been acclaimed by contractors, construction workers and realtors who represent a sector of economic activity which is vitally important in my riding and in my province. After those announcements by the Minister of Finance, a good many people were so enthusiastic that they made a series of phone calls in the ridings of Quebec—in mine, certainly—to let my colleagues know how pleased they were about this new housing policy.

I also read a few Toronto area newspaper articles stating just how relieved the construction industry was about this. I think it was in The Toronto Sun, and there was also an article along the same lines in The Globe and Mail. During the few minutes I have left, Mr. Speaker, I would like to mention the job creation budgets of the Department of Employment and Immigration. One thing I find very important in that department is the Canada community development Program. Over a period of two years, $300 million will be earmarked for community development projects and other direct job-creation programs. Community development projects create employment through local organizations which are responsible for launching and supervising the projects. It is a major undertaking which has been a source of employment for many Canadians. Quite true, such projects or programs provide work for periods lasting ten, 15, 20 or 25 weeks, but a lot of people who joined those programs were able to gain experience and then join the regular labour force. Still in the same vein, it has been said that $150 million will be spent on construction activities related to federal projects including, among other things, marinas and regional airports.

While I am on the subject of marinas, I might mention that not long ago I attended the opening ceremonies of a marina in Lotbinière which had been built partly under a community development program and partly with the assistance of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, with grants of $25,000 and $30,000 respectively. The people who worked on that project were very proud of their achievement on opening day, because they had played a part in the tourism development of the municipality of Lotbinière and were able to acquire skills in a specific field. Since the work was done in a shop, they gained good experience and with their new skills they were able to offer their services in other fields. My riding was allotted $680,000 last year under the community development program, and I did not hear any negative remarks. On the contrary, I heard nothing but praise about that program and all the people in my riding expressed the hope that such programs would be maintained so that they could undertake new projects which could hardly be launched if it were not for those programs.

Quite a number of municipalities are seeking financial assistance to develop tourism and similar projects, and one of the very important programs of the Canadian government is the community development program. I want, therefore, to congratulate the Minister of Finance for allowing his colleague the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) to allocate additional funds to these job-creation programs. I should like to return briefly to the housing programs; because I dealt with the housing industry, I must also mention other categories of people who will benefit, namely the dealers who sell lumber, hardware, iron, wrought iron and—I have in mind some people who play a very important role in my constituency of Lotbinière and the Bois-Franc région—furniture makers. As I said a while ago, if the construction industry is indeed at a standstill, there are some industries which may be worse off financially and employmentwise. So, if the building industry gets going again, it being the wheel I mentioned earlier, furniture manufacturers will sell their products to furniture stores, who will sell them to young couples buying homes. This means that three or four more building related industries will take on a new lease of life. I am sure those people too will welcome the impact of the housing programs.

Much has been done for small businesses. My colleague, the hon. member for Charlevoix and Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism (Mr. Lapointe) had the opportunity this afternoon to deal with his Department programs: $400 million will be made available to small-business men, farmers and fishermen; interest rates will be reduced for them and also—I shall close on that point—quite a few people made representations to their MPs concerning the plight of farmers. Well, in his budget, the Minister of Finance, as stated more specifically on page 25 of the budget papers, declared that additional amounts of money, namely $100 million would be allocated over the next two years, in addition to which farmers in dire straits will be able to avail themselves of loans totalling $200 million, under the program. There again a 4 per cent interest rate rebate is available. It will also be possible for farmers to obtain Small Business Bond financing.

There then, Mr. Speaker, you have some of the components of the budget I wanted to mention; when I heard the motion of the opposition about the situation of pensioners, and family allowances, and after hearing allegations made previously which would have people believe that money will be saved on the backs of pensioners and mothers, the main point I wanted to make is this: adjustments have been made and benefits will result despite the fact that some pensioners on the basic pension rate may have to pay the Government of Canada taxes which will help the Canadian people as a whole through job creation: to my mind, that is important, Mr. Speaker.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate have passed the following bills, without amendment: Bill C-105, an act to amend the Canada Business Corporations Act; and Bill C-108, an act to amend the National Energy Board Act (No. 3).

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to participate in this budget debate today. I wonder whether some hon. members, possibly the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Mackasey), the hon. member for Scarborough Centre (Mr. Kelly) or the minister from Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Rompkey), could tell me how they could support a budget brought into this House which claims it is going to attack inflation and justify a $20 billion deficit. How in God's name is that going to fight inflation? That $20 billion deficit contributes to inflation. That one single item should point out to members of this House the idiocy of the budget and what it is doing. In seven months, November to June, the deficit has doubled. This is not only contributing to inflation but is eroding the savings of people and causing a loss of jobs.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) did not know what he was doing with his November budget. It stifled investment in this country from coast to coast. He said he was going to plug some loopholes and soak the rich, but the rich got away scot-free. The minister aimed for the rich but hit the middle-income families, the mainstay in our society. It is they who were hit with his November budget. The minister stifled investment across this country, absolutely killing the resource industry and the oil industry in the western provinces, causing the loss of a great many jobs.

What are the problems facing Canada today? Basically there are three; unemployment, high interest rates and inflation.

Let me deal first with unemployment. People across this country are frightened. They are frightened that they will lose their jobs and not be able to get another. They are frightened about what would happen if their unemployment insurance ran out. Would they have to go on welfare? Let me deal with some of the problems in my area of northeastern Alberta. Unemployment there is at an all-time high. Certainly there is a recession in the world, but of all countries, Canada was better equipped to face a downturn in the economy than any other country in the western world.

What did the June 28 budget do for the millions of Canadians affected as a result of high unemployment? In one part of the budget it was indicated that $800 million, close to a billion dollars, will be spent on make-work projects. However, when you really go through the document and begin to analyse it, you see that the total amount earmarked for job creation in Canada is about $150 million. Talk about misrepresentation!

Go with me for a moment to the pre-National Energy Program days and the first budget. Go with me for a moment to the second budget of last November. Let us remember what the climate of the economy was then. Let us remember the investment that was waiting to develop the oil sands in northeastern Alberta. Let us remember that Imperial Oil was ready to go ahead with the Cold Lake project, a direct capital investment of some $13 billion creating right across this country, from coast to coast, in virtually every province, 200,000 jobs.

Do you remember the Alsands consortium at the point they were two years ago before this government came to power, ready to invest $13 billion and create jobs virtually in every province from coast to coast? That project was right in the very heart of my riding. It did not affect only northeastern Alberta and the Athabasca riding; it would affect the riding of the member for Lincoln. It would also affect the riding of the member from Scarborough Centre. Both he and the member from Lincoln recognize this fully.

Instead, what happened was a disaster. We hear excuses from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), consistently saying: "We were ready to go ahead and we still are; they could go ahead but it is not economically viable any more." He compares these two megaprojects in northern Alberta with the one in the Colorado oil shales that Exxon decided not to go ahead with in the United States. He always fails to point out that in the Exxon project and the Colorado oil shales, the recovery cost per barrel of oil in that project was in the neighbourhood of $80 to $85 per barrel. It was a form of hard rock mining. The oil was in shale, and they do not know how to handle it yet. The technology is in place today to produce oil by the in situ process in the Cold Lake area and by the mining process in northeastern Alberta at Fort McMurray, the Alsands project. The technology is in place to produce it at close to world price.

I agree that there is not much margin for error. I agree that there is a possibility that world oil prices could drop, causing some hardship. But think for a moment of what is happening today. We are importing energy at world prices, paying in American dollars what we must buy on the foreign exchange with Canadian dollars. We are buying 400,000 barrels of oil per day from Mexico, from Saudi Arabia, from Venezuela, using American funds for which we must exchange Canadian funds. That means putting pressure on our Canadian dollar, an outflow of capital.

What would have happened, and what could happen if this government came to its senses, is that it could have gone to Germany and Japan and said: "Gentlemen, we know that you people are starving for oil. We know that over in Germany security of supply is the main and paramount thing you want for the next century or for the next two or three decades. We invite you to invest in a massive project to develop the oil sands, because locked in those oil sands is an amount of reserves every bit as much as now exists in the Middle East in the Arab countries." Hon. members may not know this, but the total reserves in the Athabasca, Alberta oil sands exceed the reserves that are presently in the Middle East. I am talking about known reserves.

To me, Germany would be happy to invest, Japan would be happy to invest, the United States would be happy to invest, if we said to them: "Help us develop, help us produce from these oil sands; and when we reach oil self-sufficiency, we will sell you the surplus." We would be protecting ourselves at the same time as we would be helping ourselves and helping those countries in the western world.

There is a precedent for this. Why do you think, Mr. Speaker, that Japan went in with Dome Petroleum and loaned them money for development in the Beaufort Sea? Do you not think that Japan recognized an opportunity where we might find in the Beaufort developments or in the offshore enough oil for our needs and that we may then sell to them? Do you not think that the Japanese government did not realize at that point in time—we can go back three years now—that Canada is a country they can have a secure supply of energy from? Those countries that do not have the necessary oil to keep their economy rolling would be happy to invest in this country? But not under the present national energy policy as it was implemented. That is because this Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, when he introduced through the Minister of Finance the first budget that became the national energy policy told the world that we are thieves in this country. He said, in effect: "We will enter into a deal with you, but believe me, we will steal from you down the way because we are going to change the rules." That is outright theft of assets of foreign investors. My head hangs in shame when I think of it.

Do you not think, Mr. Speaker, that we would not have the megaprojects going and employment at an all-time high, that we would be looking right across this country, that we would be looking to other parts of the world for skilled labour? We would be saying that we need so many welders, that we need technical people. We would be encouraging our young people to go to universities and to technical schools. Instead, what is happening now is that those young people are telephoning my office, as I am sure they are phoning the offices of other members, and are asking where are the jobs that this government promised to them. They ask: "Where are the jobs for which I enrolled in university four or five years ago?" They ask: "Where are the jobs in the oil industry that I was promised when I enrolled in petroleum engineering?" They ask: "Where are the jobs in accounting that I was promised when I enrolled in commerce?" Indeed, they ask: "Where are the jobs for teachers; I was told they would be needing teachers in 1982?" And then they ask: "Indeed, where can I get a job—period—nothing else, I just want a job. I went to university for three or four years", or "I went to technical school", or "I am graduating from high school and I cannot get a job." That is what we are doing to our country. That is what we are going to continue to do to our country as long as we allow this Liberal government with its present policies to exist in Canada.

I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I was home on the weekend at Fort McMurray. I received a call from a gentleman I have known for ten years. This man is a qualified tradesman. He said he had an emergency and would like to talk with me. I am telling this House now something I hope all members will listen to, including the member from Scarborough Centre. I want them to think about this for a minute. I went to his home. His wife and family disappeared into the bedroom because he wanted to talk to me privately. He said: "Mr. Shields, Jack, I have a problem; I have no money and I have no food in the house, and we have not had anything since lunch." The children ate the last of the cereal. He took me to his fridge; there was nothing in it. He had run out of unemployment insurance and he was too damned proud to walk down to the social development agency and ask for welfare. That is what we are facing in this country and it is getting worse. I hear one of those cheeky members opposite saying "We told you."

Mr. Speaker, in the pre-national energy policy days investment was begging to come into this country to develop some of our resources. We should not be importing 400,000 barrels of oil a day at a cost which is loaded on that very taxpayer who cannot feed his family and himself and who must now go on welfare. When that man was employed he was paying taxes and we were importing oil from offshore. Is that reasonable and intelligent? I do not think it is and I do not think that most Canadians think so either.

I have spoken to lawyers in my riding who tell me that in 10 or 15 years of practice they have never experienced a year with more divorce applications. A milestone was reached last month in Fort McMurray when there were more divorce actions before the courts than in any prior month. One reason for this was desertion, because men could not bear to go home day after day and tell their wives they could not get a job. Put yourself in the place of the man who cannot feed his children or that man who saw his children eat the last of the food that was in the house and was too proud to go on welfare or call a neighbour and say he was broke. That is the sort of situation people are facing. As a result, many men just leave because they cannot face their wives and family day after day.

Unemployment is not just a figure that shows 1.5 million or two million people out of work. It means the breakup of families, desertion and in some cases suicide, wife beating and child abuse. Funny things happen to people when they lose their self-respect and that is what is taking place today.

The government can do something about all this, Mr. Speaker. Instead of introducing massive job-training programs it could enter into long-term deals with countries like Japan and Germany. It would be simple and straightforward and those countries would develop our resources and create jobs. They would invest their money if they were guaranteed security of supply. We need only consider what is happening with that gas line that is going into Europe from Siberia. Some of the member NATO countries are telling Germany and France not to buy gas from Siberia as that will make them subject to the economic whims of Russia.

There is gas everywhere in this country, Mr. Speaker. It is a saleable commodity that we should develop. We should encourage investment from offshore because we do not have the money to invest in the tar sands megaprojects ourselves. We must rely on outside capital and we all know that. It is just common sense. We should go ahead with these projects and contribute to the security supply of our NATO allies and various friendly trading nations like Japan. Instead, we find that Japan is going to ship us ten more cars this month than last month. Of course, the government realizes that does not look good politically so the entry of the cars is delayed. At the same time, however, the Russian Lada, which sells here for $6,000, is being dumped on our market. The whole situation is crazy, Mr. Speaker, and I have to sit here and listen to hon. members opposite attempt to justify this so-called budget.

We still depend on the Middle East for security of supply of oil. Our purchases from that area are draining our dollar reserve because we must buy U.S. dollars to pay for it. That puts pressure on the Canadian dollar and so, in order to attract more dollars, interest rates must be raised. With just one megaproject, interest rates would drop by at least 2 per cent. It would be a signal to the world that we realize we made a mistake and that we intend to get the oil industry back on stream to lead us out of this economic mess.

We want and need foreign investment in this country, Mr. Speaker, but the government does not seem to realize that. It is concerned with getting after the civil servants and nailing them with a 6 per cent increase. It will become known as the 6 per cent government. It was going to wrestle inflation to the ground two years ago but now it will wrestle it to 6 per cent.

What can be done about high interest rates, Mr. Speaker? The deficit can be reduced. If the government was responsible to an annual meeting of shareholders it would be doing something about that today. The Minister of Finance brought in a budget in November and seven months later he admits he was 100 per cent wrong. Having said there would be a $10 billion deficit, he now says it will be a $20 billion deficit. He may be a nice man, kind with admirable qualities, but he should not be allowed to remain in the job. He made the fundamental error of forecasting a deficit that was 100 per cent wrong. In any other line of business he would lose his job.

How can the deficit be reduced? One way would be for the government to admit that it does not need a $150 million or $200 million budget to run advertising programs in all its departments. We are going to cut back to $50 million at a direct saving to the taxpayer of $100 million. I say that you do not commit to capital projects when you do not have the money. You do not build a new embassy in Washington when the facilities that our embassy staff now occupy will do them for two, three, four years, or however long it takes until we have the money and can afford to build. When I questioned the Prime Minister about whether he would cut back in those areas, he said, "Well, I am sure the hon. member could find lots of areas to cut back, lots of building projects." What building projects do we want to cut back? I say, Mr. Speaker, that every project on the books right now which is not deemed an emergency should be stopped.

We talk about irresponsible corporations and so on. I am sure all hon. members read the paper, but let me point out what happens to Imperial Oil when they feel the pinch. They have shareholders that they have to report to, so what are they doing? They are laying off and cutting back their staff by 500 people. They have curtailed all capital expenditure and are retiring the president of their company three years early. I am sure that many hon. members would agree with me that it is too bad we could not retire the present leader of this great corporation of Canada three years early. However, maybe if they think hard enough, work hard enough at it and listen to what their constituents are telling them, they just may find enough courage to do it.

I want to turn for a moment to the leader of the NDP, Mr. Speaker. I listened with real attention to his remarks on the first day of the budget debate. He said we do not want less government, we want more government. That was his message. We want lower taxes, lower interest rates but more government. How in God's name do you pay for more government without taxes or higher interest rates? You cannot, it is ridiculous, but again that is the NDP. We hear the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) repeatedly saying that government should get more involved, that it should go out and buy not little oil companies but big ones. What is the matter with Imperial? He fails to recognize that if the government does not have the money to do it, the taxpayer is going to be whipped again to pay for these astronomical bills and debts which the NDP would build up. That is totally and absolutely irresponsible.

In closing, Madam Speaker, I would just like to say that the biggest problem facing our country is unemployment, which problem could be addressed very quickly if we were to encourage investment from offshore. As I said, Germany and Japan, countries which do not have an oil supply, could come in and start developing the oil sands where there are massive reserves on the condition that, once we reach self-sufficiency here in Canada, we will then sell them the surplus. We will have lots of takers because in five years it is going to be security of supply once again that is most important. We will have those takers, and once that happens, Madam Speaker, we will have jobs right across the country. We are a sparsely populated country and we could be selling some of the abundance of reserves we have in oil, coal and minerals to countries that do not have them but who do want security of supply.

Madam Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I believe his time has expired.

IMMIGRATION

RESPONSIBILITY FOR SPONSORED IMMIGRANTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, whereas those who sponsored immigrants prior to 1967 remain responsible for the immigrants for life, and whereas those who sponsored family members between 1967 and 1978 remain responsible for them for life, and whereas those sponsored after 1978 remain the responsibility of their sponsor for ten years, it is obvious that a great discrepancy has been created for new Canadians and their sponsors prior to 1978 who are not being treated equally before the law. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton North (Mr. Paproski):

That the government give immediate consideration to making the ten-year responsibility period retroactive for all immigrants sponsored prior to 1978.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

DEMAND THAT THREE BYELECTIONS BE HELD—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has a double standard regarding the calling of byelections, to wit, two minutes for his friends and as long as 16 months for everyone else. In contrast, the government of Ontario has followed the sterling example set by the Clark government and speedily called the byelection in York South, an opposition-held riding. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer):

That the House demand that the Prime Minister today follow the example set by the Clark and Davis governments and announce dates for byelections in Timiskaming, Leeds-Grenville, and Broadview-Greenwood. And further, that, should the Prime Minister refuse to do so, the Liberal associations in those ridings be urged to ensure speedy elections by nominating Martin Goldfarb, Michael Pitfield, and Arthur Erickson.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POLITICAL PARTIES

VOTING RECORD OF OFFICIAL OPPOSITION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Liberal and Conservative popularity has dropped again this week due to their common policies of protecting banks, oil companies, and high interest rates. It is a well-known fact in Canada—except amongst the media and a few Tories—that the Conservatives support the policies put forward by the Liberals in Ottawa. There can be no clearer indication of this support than in the actual voting record on legislation which stands as of this date: Conservatives with the Liberals 33 times, NDP with the Liberals only 19 times.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fulton: They do not like the truth, Madam Speaker.

Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle):

That the great pretender, the Leader of the Tory Party, rise in his place today with the unanimous consent of this House and explain to the people of Canada why the Tories have voted to keep the Liberals in office on 33 occasions this session alone.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUEST THAT HOUSE SIT BEYOND NORMAL HOURS TO PASS BILL C-109—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jean-Guy Dubois (Lotbinière): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Whereas Bill C-109 which concerns victims of urea formaldehyde foam insulation must be passed before UFFI victims who qualify can obtain the $5,000 federal grant; whereas many victims have been making representations to a number of members of this House in order to have the bill passed; and whereas the New Democratic Party has been refusing to allow the debate on second reading and yesterday refused to support a motion concerning this bill and is therefore still ignoring the urgency of this legislation, although it will probably give its consent today, I therefore move, seconded by the member for Beauce (Mr. Lapointe):

That the House, at its next sitting, consider and adopt Bill C-109 at all stages with one speaker per party, and that to do so, the House sit outside its normal hours, namely, during the lunch or dinner hour.

POLAND—CALL FOR RELEASE OF SOLIDARITY LEADER, LECH WALESA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, Lech Walesa has been held in internment since the military takeover in Poland last December when martial law was proclaimed and the Solidarity movement suspended. About 3,000 Poles demonstrated peacefully in Poznan on the anniversary of the 1956 disturbances, requesting his release and thereby showing that Solidarity in Poland is still alive. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. MacBain) and the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans):

That in the interest of the greater peace and security of Poland, this House urge the Polish authorities to release and restore freedom of movement to Solidarity leader, Lech Walesa.

Madam Speaker: This motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

TRIBUTE TO SASKATOON POLICE ON DEALING WITH HOSTAGE-TAKING INCIDENTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, during the past few weeks there have been two hostage-taking incidents in the city of Saskatoon which have been successfully resolved by the courageous and efficient efforts of a dedicated Saskatoon city police force. In light of the alarming growth of hostage-taking incidents across Canada recently, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight):

• (1410)

That this House express its appreciation to the Saskatoon city police for its effective handling of the recent hostage-taking incidents, and voice its endorsation of appropriate and continued support by governments of the specialized training required by the police forces of Canada in this delicate area.

HUDAC RESPONSE TO BUDGET INITIATIVES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Roger Simmons (Burin-St. George's): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The Housing and Urban Development Association of Canada has recently responded positively to the initiatives contained in the budget to stimulate housing throughout Canada, an attitude which clearly exemplifies the sort of positive approach necessary for all Canadians to take in order to ensure that inflation in Canada is brought under control. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys (Mr. MacLellan):

That this House commend HUDAC for its positive response and express the hope that this public statement will encourage others to work together in cooperation with all levels of government in order to bring down the rate of inflation.

THE PRIME MINISTER

MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Vince Dantzer (Okanagan North): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. During the last election the Prime Minister promised to keep the growth of government spending to less than the growth rate of the Gross National Product. The Prime Minister broke this promise when his first budget increased government spending by 24 per cent. The Prime Minister again broke his promise this year when government spending increased 20 per cent, for a two-year staggering total of 44 per cent, twice the rate of increase of the Gross National Product. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Okanagan-Similkameen (Mr. King):

That this House demand the Prime Minister stop the flim-flam and start acting with reason, with responsibility, and even with sanity, and immediately reduce this uncontrolled spending growth to an increase of 6 per cent as he is asking the poor and elderly of this country to do.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous support for this motion?

UREA FORMALDEHYDE FOAM INSULATION—PASSAGE OF LEGISLATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, I rise on matter of urgent and pressing necessity and seek unanimous consent under the provisions of Standing Order 43 for the following motion. The NDP and the UFFI home owners in Canada favour setting up a special parliamentary committee to investigate outstanding questions on the UFFI issue. The NDP and the UFFI home owners in Canada support clarification of the sources of additional funding and commitments that will be used to tap those sources. The NDP and the UFFI home owners in Canada support the calling of one or more meetings of the advisory council to clarify commitments. The NDP and UFFI home owners in Canada recognize that there is sufficient time left in this session to clarify the government's position on additional funding. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton):

S.O. 43

That the government and the official opposition recognize their responsibilities to home owners with UFFI insulation and that the government and official opposition stop trying to stampede the UFFI bill through the House until the minister's position on extra funding and on the special parliamentary committee is made abundantly clear.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

LABOUR RELATIONS

ROLE OF NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Evans (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas the Prime Minister will be meeting with senior labour officials and members of the Canadian Labour Congress tomorrow to discuss economic matters, and whereas the Leader of the New Democratic Party has already indicated to the House his very negative attitude toward this meeting and its outcome, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Burin-St. George's (Mr. Simmons):

That this House advise the hon. member for Oshawa that, rather than continually sow the seeds of discontent and dissension, the NDP should show some responsibility to the Canadian people and use their good offices to encourage the labour leaders to meet and discuss the government's initiatives in good faith.

LAYING OF CHARGES IN WIFE ASSAULT CASES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Madam Speaker, my motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 is not partisan, and I am sure it will receive the support of all members. Since many police forces are hesitant to lay charges of assault in instances where women have been beaten by their husbands, and their frequent failure to lay charges places a heinous burden on a wife who has to ascertain whether or not it is prudent for her to have charges laid, and since the all-party parliamentary committee on wife battering recommends "that police regularly lay charges in wife assault cases", and because the police department of the City of London, Ontario, has adopted a very commendable policy of laying assault charges in all wife battering cases where they have "reasonable and probable grounds", I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger):

• (1415)

That this Parliament encourage all Canadian police forces to establish a practice of having the police regularly lay charges in instances of wife beating, as they are inclined to do with any other case of common assault.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

ASSISTANCE FOR DOME PETROLEUM

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Would the minister indicate to the House whether the government, or any agency of government, has received a request from the Dome Petroleum group with respect to additional financing assistance, additional to the $100 million which it has already received? If they have received this request, would the minister indicate in what form the government might respond to the request? Would it be a loan guarantee, a straight loan, or further equity financing?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the government was approached some time ago both by Dome and by the banks financing some of the loans to Dome Petroleum, which have asked that there be consultations. These consultations have been going on at the official level for several weeks, but I have nothing further to announce in that regard.

SMALL BUSINESS

CRITERIA FOR RECEIPT OF GOVERNMENT AID

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism. In view of the fact that there are some 900 small businesses going bankrupt in the country every month, would the minister indicate what exactly are the criteria used by government in deciding who does get aid and who does not get aid? Bearing in mind the bail-out of Consolidated Computer to the tune of $125 million, the Massey-Ferguson like amount, and the possible giving of hundreds of millions of dollars of assistance to Dome Petroleum, it would appear that if you are big enough you get some help from the government, but if you are too small it does not want to hear from you; you just go bankrupt.

[Translation]

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, I can see why the hon. member is asking this question, because when the government gives loan guarantees to large corporations such as Massey-Ferguson or Chrysler, these transactions get the headlines. However, I can inform the hon. member that the Small Business Development Bond program, which has a loan guarantee mechanism or component, applies in most cases to small businesses, and this goes for both the grant and the loan guarantee components. Thus, the same mechanisms apply to small and large businesses, with this difference, that loan guarantees given under the Small Business Development Bond program to small businesses do not get the headlines.

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

CONSOLIDATED COMPUTERS INCORPORATED

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, if the government is interested in making headlines, perhaps I could direct my next question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Consolidated Computers has cost the government $125 million to date. It has now been announced that there will be no legal proceedings taken with respect to that fiasco. Would the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs indicate when there will be a full disclosure to the House of what actually transpired, and perhaps a reference to an appropriate committee, so that the Canadian public can see what, in fact, is the mismanagement in which the government engaged?

• (1420)

[Translation]

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is aware that this matter has been referred to the Minister of Justice, who asked a private law firm to review the case. The law firm has advised the minister that there were no grounds for legal action. Now, as the hon. member is also aware, the President of the Treasury Board appeared before the committee of the House to answer questions regarding Consolidated Computer.

TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE TO MAISLIN TRUCKING COMPANY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance my question is for the Minister of Transport. In the cabinet committee this morning was there consideration of the Maislin request for assistance to the tune of $35 million to $50 million? If so, has a decision been made, and will the minister please assure the House, contrary to what the Minister of State for Small Business said, that there will be amendments to include all trucking firms and/or service industries for such help when they are in dire straits?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): No, Madam Speaker, a decision has not been made in the Maislin case. I am aware that a decision is to be made in the coming days, or approximately a week. When a decision is made, my hon. friend will be informed.

ECONOMIC CONSIDERATIONS

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, in the consideration of the Maislin request for assistance which will break new ground for government loan guarantees to service industries or trucking companies, will the minister assure the House that economic factors will be the deciding issue rather than Liberal political fortunes in and around Montreal?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the answer is obviously yes. Economic matters will be the only ones considered.

FINANCE

INCOME TAX PAID BY LOW-WAGE EARNERS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, my question concerns the government's 6 per cent dream and is therefore directed to the Acting Prime Minister. In his budget speech the Minister of Finance stated very clearly that the government's measures to bring down inflation were not directed at any one particular group. However, using the government's own figures, we find that low-income earners will see their taxes increased by as much as 50 per cent, whereas those earning $100,000 will see only a 3 per cent increase, and if you are earning $200,000 you will actually have a decrease in taxes. Is this the government's idea of fairness and equity?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Acting Prime Minister and Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the budget papers contain on page 26, if my memory serves me correctly, an analysis of the effects of the budget on different groups of people. For example, for married individuals with two dependants under age 18, who are earning $10,000, increase disposable income as a result of the budget by $41, which is 0.4 per cent of their disposable income. If the income is $25,000, the charge of the budget to such people is $72, which represents a decrease of 0.3 per cent of their disposable income. It seems to me, and to all of us here, that this is a relatively low price to pay for getting out of the recession and inflation in which we are now.

The answer is in the budget papers if my hon. friend would like to consult them. I am sure he could find the page himself.

Mr. Riis: The facts actually speak for themselves. If an individual earns more than $200,000, he or she will actually receive a $10,000 decrease in taxes as a result of this particular budget.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

CALCULATION OF GOVERNMENT REVENUE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister again refers to the budget which points out that if the limits to indexation are at 6 per cent the government will receive an extra $1.3 billion in revenue. That assumes, of course, that inflation will be higher than that in order to make that revenue possible. Is that not admitting that the 6 per cent world will not be achieved if the government is actually counting on making $1.3 billion because of it?

• (1425)

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I would say to the hon. member that the objective of the government is to ensure the economic recovery by bringing the rate of inflation down to 6 per cent. In my opinion, the hon. member ought to carry on with his calculations and he would realize indeed that if we do manage to lower the inflation rate to 6 per cent or even less, there would then be a significant upturn of the economy, higher government revenues, lower interest rates as well as a reduced deficit. That is the appeal for solidarity and economic recovery which the Minister of Finance made in his budget speech and which the government is now promoting.

[English]

BUDGET FORECAST OF INFLATION RATES

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, it is probably because of this kind of rhetoric, as opposed to addressing the serious economic ills of the country, that we find the headlines today predicting an economic collapse in Canada. My supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister is with regard to the 6 per cent guideline. The budget presumes that an 11 per cent inflation rate will occur in 1983 and a 9 per cent rate in 1984. Is this not in itself an admission that the 6 per cent goal will not be achieved and that it will therefore permit the Prime Minister the opportunity to bring in complete wage controls?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I would suggest that the hon. member refer to yesterday's oral question period and heed the appeal made by the government to all economic agents instead of attempting to create or aggravate the climate of uncertainty or to spread fear. All together we need to show courage, energy and determination to prove to the people that we can present a common front to restore a favourable economic climate. We will do that if we succeed in lowering the rate of inflation, if we show solidarity, a spirit of sharing and especially courage, instead of hiding our heads in the sand and withdrawing before false fears, as the hon. member is doing.

TRANSPORT

ACTIONS OF LAKESPAN CORPORATION

Mr. Scott Fennell (Ontario): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport with regard to the Lakespan Corporation which is 50 per cent owned by CN Marine and 50 per cent by Rideau Shipping. They discontinued operation on April 20 on the basis that this was a suspension for review. Subsequent to that date they fired their employees, abandoned their office, and cancelled their telephones. Madam Speaker, I have to get to my question. There are nearly 100 small creditors out there with $700,000 of debt owed by this corporation. The shareholders who own the corporation are trying to sell the boat before July 23 to recoup their investment before looking after the small business people. This leaves them out in the cold.

Madam Speaker: Order. Does the hon. member really think it is reasonable to have such a long preamble?

Mr. Fennell: I will ask my question, Madam Speaker. Is the minister aware of the action taken by one of the Crown corporations for which he is responsible?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I am not aware of the case, but I shall immediately get in touch with my hon. friend and he will have the opportunity to complete his exposé.

POSITION OF MINISTER

Mr. Scott Fennell (Ontario): Madam Speaker, that shocks me. The minister should be aware of the fact that there is an admiralty writ on a boat owned by the Crown corporation. Does he encourage Crown corporations to be so blatantly unethical in transactions with small business?

• (1430)

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I sincerely believe that if the hon. member had wanted to get a full answer from me on this question, with his knowledge of the scope of the Department of Transport, he would have had the generosity, the kindness and the civility to give me notice of the question he intended to ask.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: What nonsense! What cowardly nonsense!

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR PACIFIC REGION OFFICE INQUIRY

Mr. Fred King (Okanagan-Similkameen): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. What immediate and effective action is the minister undertaking in direct response to the urgency noted, first, in the unanimous recommendation of the standing committee for an independent inquiry into the affairs of the Westbank Indian Band and of the Pacific Region office in Vancouver, second, in the many grievances expressed in letters and briefs to the minister concerning the same, third, in the recommendation of his own departmental officials for an immediate and thorough four-point investigation and, fourth, in the interest and urgings of the premier of British Columbia?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I am fully aware of the concern of the hon. member and of many of his colleagues from British Columbia with respect to the actions of Chief Derrickson and the band council of that reserve. There is no question but that it has aroused great concern. We are now conducting an investigation, concerning which I have already spoken with the hon. member yesterday, and I will apprise him of the full details of that investigation as it proceeds.

As I have already told the hon. member, I am inviting Chief Ron Derrickson down here to go over some of the allegations which have been made with respect to the way he and the band council handle matters there. I have also indicated to the hon. member that I will be pleased to consult with him with respect to that particular meeting with Chief Derrickson.

Mr. King: I would like to say that there are aspects of this review that could be ongoing right now, before the meeting with the chief.

REQUEST THAT BRITISH COLUMBIA AND MANITOBA REGIONAL OFFICES BE AUDITED

Mr. Fred King (Okanagan-Similkameen): My supplementary question is for the same minister, Madam Speaker. Is the minister willing to follow the recommendations of the officials in his department, namely, to close the B.C. and Manitoba regional offices for three months for the purpose of conducting an external audit?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I will have to raise that particular matter further with the hon. member a little later. If he is asking us to do something about the Westbank situation, I do not know whether the resolution of that matter pertains to closing all the offices of the department in the Province of British Columbia. I will be pleased to look into it.

EMPLOYMENT

HIRING OF SHIPS OFFICERS AND ENGINEERS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. With some million and a half Canadians unemployed, Canadian registered ships are still operating out of Canadian ports, with licensed engineers and other senior officer personnel coming from outside Canada. I therefore wish to ask the minister is there a shortage of properly certified engineering and navigation officers in Canada and, if so, is the minister giving any thought to designing a program whereby unemployed Canadian ships officers, many of them living in my riding, would be placed as observers on supply vessels, oil rigs, tankers, icebreakers and bulk carriers, giving them experience and requiring companies to hire them when openings exist following their certification?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I would like to point out to the hon. member that last December we announced, as part of a general program of measures to deal with the current economic situation, the basic restriction on the application of foreign workers who want to come to Canada, and there is no longer the possibility of foreign workers coming into Canada on open applications. They must now have job validations demonstrating that there is absolutely no Canadian available for those jobs anywhere across the country. That particular program has been in place since early December. I would be very pleased to send the hon. member details of it because I think it is a direct answer to the question about which he is concerned.

TRAINING OF OFFICERS TO COMMAND SHIPS AND MARINE DRILLING RIGS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. Since Petro-Can and Bow Valley Resources are presently building oil rigs and a supply vessel in Marystown, Ranger Oil plans to charter an oil rig for five years, Husky Oil is constructing six supply vessels for 1983, Gulf Canada is bringing a fleet into the Arctic during 1983-84, and Balder offshore and K. D. Marine of Halifax are planning to bring in more supply vessels during the next year, I would like the minister to tell me what steps he is taking to make certain that Canadians are trained to command these rigs and ships.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for that supplementary question. It gives me the opportunity to point out to him and to other hon. members of the House that the legislation establishing a new National Training Program was given Royal Assent last evening. That means that we can now put over $1 billion into new training programs across Canada. Part of that program is specifically designed to aid the whole area involving the development of highly trained engineers and technicians in the marine industry. We have already held discussions with a number of marine colleges, both out west and on the east coast, to help them buy new equipment and facilities so that we can ensure that Canadians will be trained for those jobs of the future.

ASSISTANCE TO EASTERN REFINERIES

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Restigouche): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. On May 31 of this year the minister announced that the Canadian government would be willing to consider providing financial assistance to eastern refineries in order to increase the market for western crude oil which would otherwise be shut in. Today, can the hon. gentleman officially inform this House and all Canadians whether such arrangements have been finalized with the eastern refineries and what the benefits will be to Canada in terms of oil costs and our balance of payments?

Mr. Clark: Order!

Mr. Harquail: Exactly how much will it represent to the Canadian economy?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the government recently announced a number of steps to reduce the quantity of shut-in oil in Canada. In May and June there has already been a very, very substantial reduction in shut-in oil. As a matter of fact, at the end of June the quantity of shut-in oil was well below historical levels. We have reason or good cause to believe that the problem of shut-in oil will be very substantially taken care of by the latter part of this year. We are holding discussions with the refiners in eastern Montreal to ensure that they will take more Canadian oil. We have already reached an agreement with Irving Oil whereby Irving Oil will purchase 31,000 barrels per day of Canadian oil, the net result being a savings of about $500 million in the petroleum importation payments, benefits of about a quarter million dollars a day in royalties to the government of Alberta and about a million and a quarter dollars a day in benefits to Canadians, particularly in western Canada, in terms of additional revenue and work.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PENSIONS

PURCHASING POWER OF INDEXED BENEFITS

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Last week the minister told the House that, as a result of the deindexation of old age security benefits, pensioners would lose a mere $55 in 1983. Now that the minister has had an opportunity to examine and study the budget in detail, would the minister confirm for this House that the net loss of purchasing power of pensioners over the next two years will, in fact, be four times what the minister told the House last week—

Mr. Lalonde: Nothing, if inflation is at 6 per cent.

Mr. Young: —and that the 6 per cent dream world that the government is trying to promote will actually be an economic nightmare for those pensioners?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I do not recall having said this in the House, but I said last week, and I will repeat it here, that in 1983 pensioners not in need, those who receive only the basic old age pension, less than half the pensioners in Canada, will receive increases in their pensions, but not as much as anticipated. That will be equal to a loss of anticipated increase of $55. In a few days they will get $239 for this month, and next January they will get $249. So, I cannot answer the question of the hon. member positively.

• (1440)

QUERY RESPECTING PENSION REFORM

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. Anyone who has studied the budget knows that it is not $55; these people's real incomes will be reduced by over $230.

For the last 18 months the minister and other members of the cabinet have been touring the country raising expectations among seniors about pension reform. If pension reform means cutting incomes for seniors, that indicates the minister has no clout in the cabinet and should resign.

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, the cabinet is fully committed to pension reform. The hon. member does not seem to realize that the budget is proof of that. The majority of pensioners in Canada will get double indexing. All those who receive the supplement will get double indexing to make sure they do not lose a penny. They will see the full value of their dollar protected. We have always said that we would target for those most in need, and we will continue to do so.

FINANCE

REQUEST THAT COMMITTEE BE APPOINTED TO DETERMINE GOVERNMENT SPENDING PRIORITIES

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. The Acting Prime Minister will know that both the current Auditor General and the former auditor general have said that the country faces imminent economic collapse unless the government takes decisive action with respect to its deficits. Indeed, the former auditor general has suggested that government expenses be priorized into essential expenses, desirable expenses, and non-essential expenses. Would the Acting Prime Minister, together with the President of the Privy Council, appoint a special committee of this House to priorize government expenses?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the position the ex-auditor general has taken is exactly the same position as the one the government has taken. We agreed that the present situation is serious, and we presented to Canadians a real challenge in the budget which the Minister of Finance introduced the other day.

On the subject of selectivity of federal government expenditures, I have been in committees regularly in recent years. I have regularly listened in the House, and I have not heard anyone suggesting to me as Minister of Transport that there should be cuts. As a matter of fact, each time I come out with something dramatic, be it with regard to VIA, coastal services in Newfoundland, or some other matter, hon. members are extremely reluctant to agree with this approach. If we all were more responsive to the message of reducing federal government expenditures, I suggest that would make life easier, at least for the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Stevens: What about Mirabel?

PROCEDURE IN DETERMINING PRIORITIES

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, I am pleased the Acting Prime Minister at least recognizes the problem. Yesterday the Prime Minister suggested that the Public Accounts Committee could inquire into this matter, but the Acting Prime Minister will know that the Public Accounts Committee is limited in its inquiries to past expenditures and past deficits. I wonder what can be done with respect to current expenses.

The situation has changed dramatically in the last eight months with respect to the deficit figures in the previous budget. What proposals do the Acting Prime Minister and the government have with respect to going over existing expenditures approved in the estimates already with respect to this year, and priorizing those expenditures so that when changes have to be made in the expenditure program this House will have real input into those changes?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Speaking as a minister, Madam Speaker, the process of priorization is with us with a vengeance at this moment. We have limited resources and, obviously, choice is paramount in our minds.

On the subject of the committee work of the House of Commons, every budget of every department goes before a committee, and it is really the responsibility of the committees to force members of cabinet to justify their expenditures.

RAILWAYS

CROWSNEST PASS RATES—APPLICATION OF INFLATION GUIDELINES TO GILSON REPORT RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Acting Prime Minister. The Gilson report on grain transportation recommends increasing costs to grain producers in western Canada by 15 per cent a year, a total of 45 per cent in the next three years. Could the minister inform producers and members of this House whether 6 per cent and 5 per cent will apply to the movement of grain in western Canada, or is that an exemption because he feels producers have more money than his department?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, my hon. friend has not read the fine print of the Gilson report. If he had done so, he would know that in the first year of implementation there is no increase to the farmer at all. He would also know that in the second year the increase is at a level of 14 per cent for transportation costs, which represent 2.5 per cent of the cost of production of a bushel of wheat. In due course we will have to address the problem of the second year.

GRAINS

TWO-PRICE WHEAT SYSTEM

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, with respect to the costs which will have to be borne by the producers of grain in western Canada, can the Acting Prime Minister, who is responsible in this House for the Canadian Wheat Board, inform the House whether he has had an opportunity to review the two-price wheat system, which will expire at the end of this year, which provides a minimum of $5 and a maximum of $7 a bushel? If he has had an opportunity to review that, would he inform the House whether this will be increased to keep pace with increasing costs or whether it will be dropped and the producers made to suffer?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, we have not reviewed the two-price wheat system yet.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

UREA FORMALDEHYDE FOAM INSULATION—DELAY IN PASSAGE OF LEGISLATION

Mr. Jack Burghardt (London West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In light of the refusal on the part of the NDP on two occasions to agree to passage of Bill C-109, I wonder what the minister can do to facilitate the operation of the program to provide funds to UFFI home owners who are experiencing difficulty.

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Madam Speaker, it is clear that it is urgent that we pass the bill, which in fact would provide for three things. First, it would authorize the government to pay home owners a certain amount of money. Second, the money they receive would be non-taxable. Third, the home owner who receives this money would retain the right to sue the government if he wanted to sue the government at a later date.

I hope through consultations among House leaders, and with my critic in the official opposition, the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth, and the hon. member for Comox-Powell River, we will be able to arrive at an agreement for speedy passage of the bill. Indeed, the Conservatives have already indicated that they have no more speakers to discuss the bill at second reading, and I hope the NDP will have no more than one or two speakers and then that we could take the bill to committee, where I am prepared to sit morning, afternoon and night so that we could report the bill and allow home owners to receive the money they certainly deserve.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

TELECOMMUNICATIONS

BELL CANADA APPLICATION FOR RATE INCREASE

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, I would like to return to the wonderful world of 6 per cent and address a question to whichever minister is apologizing for the Minister of Finance today. The Minister of Finance has repeatedly sent smoke signals to regulatory bodies such as the CRTC that they should hold the line at 6 per cent, yet the Minister of Communications is quoted as backing Ma Bell's application for a whopping 25 per cent increase in residential telephone service. To whose signals should the CRTC listen?

Hon. Francis Fox (Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, since my name was taken in vain by the hon. member, I would like an opportunity to reply. At no point have I endorsed an increase for Bell Canada of that nature. My response in answer to questions is to the effect that the Minister of Finance in his budget indicated quite clearly that in the area of public communications the regulatory organizations responsible to Parliament would be expected to follow the 5 per cent and 6 per cent guidelines unless there were "exceptional circumstances". That was indicated in the budget. I would fully expect that that guideline, which is in the budget, would be followed by the various regulatory agencies of the governments.

• (1450)

Mr. Rose: Madam Speaker, I am glad that the minister has had the chance to clarify his remarks because they seem to contradict what I read in the press.

GOVERNMENT POLICY ON REGULATED PRICES

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): The minister defended the Bell hike, on the grounds that no company could be held to 6 per cent when it could get 16 per cent by investing in bonds. Given that rationale, there appears to be no authority and no ceiling on any price regulated by the federal government.

I should like to ask whichever minister will respond, how we can really believe that the government is serious or that it intends it own regulatory bodies to hold the line. Who is going to believe that in the country? No one.

Hon. Francis Fox (Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, once again, it is quite clear that under its statutory obligation the CRTC must receive rate applications from Bell Canada, must hold hearings on those applications, and must come to a decision on what rate of return ought to be allowed to the company. It is also clear that there is an appeal from the decision of the CRTC to the federal cabinet. If the cabinet feels that the rate increase awarded by the CRTC is not justified, it can return the matter to the CRTC or indicate which way the decision ought to go.

IMMIGRATION

RESPONSIBILITY FOR SPONSORED IMMIGRANTS

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The sponsors of immigrants before 1967 have to be accountable for them for life. The same applies to people who came in under the family sponsorship program before the new act went into effect in 1978. Sponsors of immigrants after 1978 are only responsible for them for ten years. Would the minister consider making such sponsorship retroactive so that all sponsors are accountable for immigrants for a ten-year period?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's question which obviously relates to a case which has come to light recently in the Toronto area, regarding an application for welfare under provincial rules. I would point out to the House, first of all, that eligibility for welfare is a provincial decision and has very little to do with any decision being made under the federal jurisdiction. It is within provincial rights and responsibilities.

The Immigration Act provides that sponsorship is very much a moral obligation for those who have undertaken to sponsor a relative. In effect, it is a special privilege to come into this country under relaxed criteria, but sponsor responsibility is not legally enforceable under the old act. It is enforceable under the 1978 act. A judgment has to be made by the municipality as to whether it will consider the provisions of the 1978 act as part of the criterion for eligibility.

GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, the provincial governments and municipalities are hanging their decisions in this particular case and, I understand, in other cases, on the agreement that was signed by the sponsors pre-1967 and pre-1978. Is the minister telling the municipalities that they should not hang their decision on that, and that the ten-year sponsorship applies to everyone in Canada at the present time?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I am indicating that the whole question of the enforcement of the sponsorship provisions is only legally enforceable under the provisions of the 1978 Immigration Act. It was not established in any statutory form under the previous immigration legislation. We do not therefore have the power to enforce it, other than by whatever persuasion or moral suasion that can be applied. We are saying to the municipalities that in this case their judgment on who is eligible for welfare benefits should be based upon the usual criteria applied. There is, however, obviously a moral obligation on the part of those families that undertook sponsorship to adhere to their undertaking.

PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT OF VETERINARY COLLEGE AT CHARLOTTETOWN, P.E.I.

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, may I put a question to the Minister of Agriculture. The minister has consistently told this House and the country that the federal government was totally committed to meeting its share of the cost of a veterinary college in the Atlantic provinces, provided that the four premiers could get their act together and decide among themselves on a site.

Now that all four provinces have finally agreed on Charlottetown as the site for the veterinary college, following sensitive negotiations and diplomacy, why has the federal government reneged on its promise by recently announcing that it will not have anything to do with funding this veterinary college which is so badly needed?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, what the hon. member says is not true because the facts are different. I received no confirmation and no authority. I sent a telegram, and I hope to meet Premier Buchanan next week at the provincial ministers' meeting in Halifax. I could find nothing on record that is different from what he said before, that he is going to have tuition, etc. I am waiting for him to say something firm that will be placed here, the same as the Premier of Prince Edward Island, the Premier of New Brunswick and the Premier of Newfoundland have done, but there is nothing like that before us at the present time.

REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT COMMITMENT

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, if the premier of Nova Scotia places a firm commitment on the minister's desk next week, to the effect that he will support a veterinary college for the Atlantic colleges in Charlottetown as agreed by the other Atlantic provinces, will the minister in the House today give a firm commitment that the federal government will meet its share of the cost of this facility?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has stated that things are different from what they really are, or as I have stated them. He said that I said emphatically that when they got agreement, we would go ahead. I have repeatedly said that I had the money in the blue book. We withdrew it from the budget when they could not agree. That is what was said, Madam Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: I said we would have to find new funds for it. It was delayed for how many years? They were five years without making up their minds. We had the money in the blue book. We know that a veterinary college is needed. We said it was needed, but they could not agree amongst themselves on how it should be funded.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FISHERIES

BAY OF FUNDY HERRING FISHERY

Miss Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. In view of the fact that the herring fishery in the Bay of Fundy should be well under way but is not, because the parties have not been able to negotiate a price, would the minister appoint an independent person to see if a solution can be found to the problem as soon as possible?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I would hesitate to give an affirmative answer to the hon. member because the fishermen and the processors are engaged in a normal negotiation. I hope they find a solution. I would hesitate to move between the processors and the fishermen who, I think, are seriously negotiating for the first time to my knowledge.

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

CONSOLIDATED COMPUTERS INCORPORATED—REQUEST FOR REFERRAL TO COMMITTEE

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister related to the case of Consolidated Computers where the Canadian public lost $125 million. A Department of Justice study has been conducted into the narrow question of legal culpability. There has not, however, been a public study into the question of how the Parliament of Canada can prevent future $125 million losses or other multimillion dollar losses as a result of circumstances similar to those which pertain to Consolidated Computers.

Would the Acting Prime Minister give us an undertaking that the government is prepared to consider a reference to an appropriate committee to allow Parliament to study the Consolidated Computers case with a view to ensuring that we put safeguards in place to guarantee that the public will not be forced to lose or risk millions of dollars of public money because of errors made by the bureaucracy?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, it is my understanding that the President of the Treasury Board has already appeared before a committee of the House to account for what went on in this particular instance. I do not see why another committee could do better.

• (1500)

REQUEST THAT ANDERSON REPORT BE TABLED

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, the reason why another committee would have the opportunity to go further is that the minister was reporting briefly on information brought to his attention. I may say in passing that he has not yet tabled the Anderson report into the Consolidated Computers matter, and the House would like to have that. I am sure the minister would not want us to have a situation existing where the people of Canada run the risk of losing another $125 million as a result of another Consolidated Computers case.

The inquiries to date have not been adequate. Will the minister give us an undertaking at least to consider giving Parliament the opportunity to inquire into Consolidated Computers with an eye to establishing safeguards to stop future multimillion dollar losses to the Canadian taxpayer, and will he undertake that the full Anderson report will be tabled and not hidden from Parliament?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, obviously I cannot give this undertaking before I have spoken to the minister responsible. I will do so and report.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I have one question for the Acting Prime Minsiter. Why did Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation increase the price of homes it had listed for sale in Hamilton by almost $3,000 two days after the budget was introduced?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, I would like to address the usual Thursday question to the government House leader. The question of Bill C-109 was the subject of an exchange three times today during question period and motions under Standing Order 43. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is in the House and I presume the government House leader has had the opportunity of conferring with the minister. As he knows, we said yesterday that we were prepared to deal with C-109 through all of its stages tomorrow provided that, as the minister stated to our critic, the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth, the subject matter of the bill would be referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, including the reference of the board of inquiry into the hazards of UFFI.

Can the government House leader say that we will see that bill tomorrow so that we can deal with it on that basis expeditiously? Having disposed of that, will we be passing to Bill C-124 and, if so, what will follow into next week as far as the government House leader can take us, please?

Mr. Deans: Madam Speaker, the House leader for the official opposition raises an interesting point with regard to the UFFI bill. I do, however, want to point out that we have received communication—myself as late as today in a telegram—from representatives of home owners with UFFI from across the country asking that the bill not be proceeded with immediately. Therefore, in the face of these home owners' request, we cannot give unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Shame, shame!

Mr. Deans: However, like the minister and the Conservative Party, we want to see the matter resolved and I am hoping that the minister will sit down in earnest with our critic and discuss the serious problems and deficiencies.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, surely the government House leader is going to answer my general question, which is the normal practice on Thursday. What will be the business tomorrow and next week in light of the obvious absence of the co-operation of the NDP?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, tomorrow and in the following days, we will study Bill C-124, an Act respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada, and after that Bill C-125, an Act to provide supplementary borrowing authority.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, does the government House leader intend to deal with C-124 until second reading is complete and then pass to C-125?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: For the time being, yes, Madam Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Skelly: Madam Speaker, I wonder if I might addres a few short remarks to the government House leader—

Some hon. Members: No!

Mr. Skelly: —on the matter of C-109?

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. member may ask a question about government business but this is not the time to negotiate any arrangements which might be made among the leaders of the different parties on the passage of certain bills.

Mr. Skelly: Madam Speaker, I recognize the requirement but I would like to know for my edification whether the government intends to continue with this absolutely back door approach, or whether Bill C-109 will be dealt with once the minister has clarified the outstanding issues. Since we recognize that this bill will not be proceeded with and this session will continue for some time, there is certainly time to clarify the outstanding matters.

The question of a special parliamentary committee is vitally important, as well as identifying the sources of funding. Is it the government House leader's intention to have those matters clarified so that we can then bring forward the bill and deal with it as expeditiously as we would like to?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, the situation is very simple and very clear. All Canadians know by now that the New Democratic Party is against the speedy adoption of the bill on houses insulated with urea formaldehyde and it will have to shoulder that responsibility. As to whether it is common practice in the House to use a motion under Standing Order 43 to score political points, I must say that the example is set by members opposite.

All registered architectural firms in Canada were notified, by their provincial associations, of the government's intent to select an architectural consultant for the proposed new Canadian Chancery in Washington. Questionnaires were sent to them, and 71 firms responded providing additional data on their experience and capabilities. The names of the 71 firms are contained on the list below.

4. (a) All interested firms were provided with a plot plan, photograph and map locating the site in Washington together with other data sufficient to allow each applicant to prepare and present a submission suitable for an evaluation of their experience, design philosophy, managerial capabilities and cost and budget control procedures. (b) All firms registered in Canada were eligible to enter this stage of the competition and 71 decided to do so.

5. The terms of the qualification competition do not refer specifically to how the final decision was to be made.

document by the department and involves more detail particularly on sites which have since been rejected and therefore was not presented to architects submitting proposals.

7. (a) There are preliminary estimates of the cost of constructing a new Canadian embassy. The preliminary estimates have been prepared by the technical staff of the Department of External Affairs with no cost supplementary to those associated with staff salaries. (b) The estimates take into account the cost in both Canadian and American funds.

8. The Embassy project will be a charge to the budget of the Department of External Affairs.

Mr. Smith: I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, I wonder whether the parliamentary secretary might tell the House what procedures he follows on points of order on written questions on the Order Paper which are brought to his attention. It was some weeks ago that I brought to the attention of the parliamentary secretary question No. 4,041, which deals with the reports of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, of the Economic Council of Canada and of the Task Force on Regulatory Reform. I have been informed they were supplied to the President of the Privy Council's office some weeks previous to that by the President of the Treasury Board, but for some reason they have never emerged to see the light of day. Does the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council in fact make any inquiries as a result of these points of order raised in the House? If so, can he tell me what he has done in the past month or so with regard to this particular question?

Mr. Smith: Madam Speaker, when I undertake to look into a matter on behalf of a certain member of Parliament as a result of an inquiry, I do follow it up; the appropriate ministers' offices are contacted, and the matter is pursued.

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed, from Wednesday, July 7, 1982, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

Mr. Yves Demers (Duvernay): Madam Speaker, thank you for giving me this opportunity to speak to a subject as important as this budget. As everyone in this House is aware, for several years, and especially during the last year or year and a half, industrialized countries have been faced with very serious problems. What happened to our economy, which had been doing so well in the years from 1970 to 1974? Well, we all know that around 1973 or 1974, oil prices increased by an incredible 700 or 800 per cent. Inevitably, the increased price of oil was reflected in production and transportation costs, and oil consuming countries have all had to raise their prices tremendously in order to continue to make a profit or just to break even. With the oil crisis came inflation, which started in 1974-75 at between 6 and 7 per cent and now, in 1982, in Canada, has risen to nearly 12 per cent. Because of inflation, in every collective agreement negotiated subsequently, employees have demanded wage increases at least equivalent to the rate of inflation, in other words, between 8 and 12 per cent. Producers had to pass on these increases in the prices for their products and we have been in this inflationary spiral for a number of years, which is one of the reasons we are now in a recession.

Furthermore, a few months ago the powerful United States decided to raise interest rates to previously unheard-of levels, namely 18, 19 and even 20 per cent. The reason: the U.S. wants to bring back petro-dollars invested throughout the world. Petro-dollars are invested in Canada and also in France, Great Britain and Italy, and it is a fact that people with money to invest, whether it is $100,000, $10,000 or $10 million, are going to invest it in countries where they can get the best return on their investment. In this case, they are taking their money to the United States which is paying the highest rates in the world. That is why millions of dollars have been pouring in to the United States. Here in Canada, if we do not want our economy to be bled dry for the benefit of the U.S., like many other countries we must raise our interest rates to compete with U.S. rates.

One often wonders why the United States is trying to bring home all those petro-dollars. I am not sure about the reasons, but I do have a question. As we all know, a number of European countries, including Germany and France, are negotiating with the U.S.S.R. for the construction of a pipeline from Siberia to Europe, which will carry Siberian natural gas to energy-hungry Europeans. Obviously, the United States is not very happy about this, because in the event of a serious conflict between the U.S.S.R. and our countries, the first thing the U.S.S.R. will do is cut off the supply of natural gas to our allies, namely Germany, Italy, France and Great Britain. Is this why the U.S. wants to repatriate its petro dollars, to prevent the financing of a megaproject that is going to cost several billion dollars? I am not sure but it might be one of the reasons. What I do know, however, is that in the short term, the U.S. economy will certainly benefit from the situation, because with all this money, the Americans will be able to build a lot of factories, and subsequently provide jobs for their people. Even if in the U.S. unemployment is also running at about 10 per cent, an increase in the number of jobs may be expected in the short term. I am not so sure about the long-term effects, however, because the U.S. dollar is already worth 25 or 28 per cent more than the Canadian dollar, and European currencies have fallen about 50 per cent, in terms of the American dollar, from where they were about two years ago. This means that as time goes on, the U.S. will find it increasingly difficult to export its products and, conversely, other countries will find it much easier to export their goods to the U.S. Nevertheless, I am not too worried about the U.S. I am sure they realize what is involved, and they had reasons for taking the action they did.

Where does Canada stand in these difficult times of very high interest rates? As I said earlier, we have almost matched U.S. rates, while our Canadian dollar has fallen. Today, our dollar is worth about 78 cents in terms of the U.S. dollar, which does not look too good. However, if we compare the performance of our Canadian government with that of all other industrialized countries, including economically strong countries such as France, Germany and Japan, we realize that our dollar is very strong, because although it is worth 78 cents in U.S. terms, currencies in European countries have fallen by 50 per cent compared with the American dollar. And if we draw a comparison with the Canadian dollar, two years ago, one franc was worth 28 or 29 cents, while today, in 1982, although our dollar is down to 78 cents in U.S. terms, one French franc is worth only 17 or 18 cents in Canadian money. So we can say that Canada's policies have still been quite satisfactory, and that today, although our dollar may be weaker than the American dollar, it is much stronger than the currencies of all other industrialized countries.

People tell us that paying 18 per cent interest is outrageous, and I agree. If here in Canada we wanted to have a 12 per cent rate, while U.S. rates are as high as 18 per cent, on the face of it, it might make things easier for our industries, but we all know that investors in Canada would transfer their Canadian funds to the United States, and there would be no capital left in Canada to finance our Canadian industries. In fact, the initial improvement would be followed in a few months by a definite worsening of the situation. It would not be impossible to reduce interest rates, but if we were to do so, we would have to prevent an outflow of Canadian capital toward the United States and other countries. The procedure to be followed in this regard would be the adoption of an exchange control law. With such legislation Canadians could not take money out of Canada to invest it in other countries at their will. I must admit that, in the short term, this could solve the problem for a few months. However, we know quite well that, in Canada, we not only need money from Canadians, but also, from foreigners in order to develop our country, whether it be the tar sands projects which are now facing problems, the James Bay project, which has cost us $18 billion, or other major Canadian projects. If we did implement exchange controls, no foreign company would be interested in investing in Canada since it could not get back the profits to its own country, and the situation would be even worse.

Compared with what is happening in the United States, our economy is at a standstill. In addition to interest rates, there are certainly several reasons for our economic ills. I do not want to describe them all today, because some of them are obvious, others are apparent and others are more subtle. However, I would like to mention a few of them because I believe that we, the elected representatives of the people, on all sides of the House, have a duty to make suggestions so that all Canadians may discuss them and gain the best possible understanding of the problems. One important problem is the fact that wages have increased more quickly in Canada than in the United States, which means that our production costs are often higher than in the United States. This is a problem, but it is not the worst one because I agree that Canadian workers should earn a good living. However, Canada is dangerously and obviously lagging behind in the area of productivity. If we compare Canadian and American productivity, we find that ours is about 20 per cent lower. Who is responsible? The various government levels are partially responsible. Because of their abusive wage demands and working conditions, labour unions heavily share that responsibility. Consequently, the workers who make up the membership of these unions are also responsible. I would like to give a few examples. In Quebec, for instance—and I suppose that the situation is similar in many Canadian provinces—if you are a carpenter working on construction sites, you have a certain territory where you can work, let us say the area of Montreal. If your contractor accepts a building contract in Trois-Rivières, for each employee he hires in Montreal to work in Trois-Rivières, he will have to hire a certain number of local workers. This means that if a Montreal contractor needs 100 employees for a job in Trois-Rivières and hires 50 employees in the Montreal area, he will have to hire 50 workers in the Trois-Rivières region. As everyone must realize, the best workers from these regions already have a job because the best workers in any field can always find a job. This contractor will therefore have to hire workers who are not as good, and therefore not as productive. When he makes his submission, he takes this fact into account and increases his prices by 10, 15 or 20 per cent to compensate for a lower productivity.

We are now going through a public transport strike in Montreal. Those who sell tickets have been asked to give change to the public. This is part of their job, they must collect the money and give change to the public. They believe that this is not their job, that they do not have to do the work, and they are even talking about going on strike. This would not give them any more money, but they are putting obstacles in the way. I went to the hospital very recently because my youngest son had an operation, and I witnessed something which surprised me. A nurse dropped a bottle on the terrazzo floor. Two and three-year-old toddlers were playing around the glass. The nurse had no right to pick up the shattered glass, she must make a call because the union says a cleaning attendant must pick up the glass. So, according to union instructions, the nurse called the cleaning attendants. Fifteen minutes later, for some reason, the glass was still on the floor, with the children around. I took a sheet of paper and picked up the glass; because I am not unionized, nobody can stop me from doing it. Such situations are utterly stupid. First of all, children could have been harmed, and this is very important; second, the nurse could have picked up all the glass in two minutes. Just imagine! She called somebody that started from the other end of the building, who may have walked half an hour or fifteen minutes to get there, then he took five or ten minutes to pick up the glass and had to walk another quarter of an hour to get back to work.

It is because of such nonsense that no salary increases are granted, but productivitywise, each one of us Canadians has to pay for these mistakes with our taxes. In that context, I feel that we Canadians all have to start thinking, because we must understand that today we are in competition with the United States, Japan and every other nation. If we are to protect our jobs, we will not do so by asking Canadians to put in terrific hours, to work on the double, but simply by requesting that within those eight or seven and a half hours people work, they give a full day's work, and I am convinced that with the level of education in Canada and our mining potential, this country can make for very pleasant living and can compete very easily with any other nation.

Workers are not the only ones at fault. Our businessmen also share the responsibility. Quite recently the Canadian government had to guarantee several million dollars to Chrysler because that corporation was in serious difficulty. We guaranteed several million dollars to protect those jobs. But how come that since 1973, since the oil crisis, when we all realized that automobiles should be smaller, the Chrysler Corporation kept on producing cars that were exceedingly large, exceedingly heavy, and that guzzled a lot of gas? Consumers, of course, were aware of this and sales went down. Therefore, that corporation was clearly at fault. I could refer to other cases, of which there are several. This points to the responsibility of management, especially in the case of large corporations and, amazingly, in the case of that corporation.

I mentioned earlier that governments have a goal, the federal government, provincial governments, municipal governments. We have so many regulations and paperwork that we require businessmen and employees to spend part of their working hours completing forms, complying with regulations and all kinds of things. This is hindering productivity. We, as government, realized this and, some time ago we set up a committee to look into all these demands on industry, with a view to reducing them as much as possible. An industry that must use 5 per cent of its time completing forms has a 5 per cent productivity loss. As I said, all governments are guilty to some extent. These include provincial governments, and I should like to state a few facts which affect me most as a Quebecer. Our province of Quebec is making mistakes, tremendous mistakes. Very recently, it bought the Asbestos Corporation. Everybody has been aware for several years that asbestos will face great difficulties in the future, that asbestos will become difficult to sell, that it has been banned in several countries because some studies have demonstrated a direct link between its use and cancer. Sales have been going down for several years. Yet, the Quebec government stuck to its idea of spending several millions of Quebecers' money to purchase this corporation. Now, it has bought it, paying top dollar for it, and the directors of this corporation, who in my opinion are very clever businessmen, played their cards extremely well. They behaved as though they did not want to sell to push the price upward, as though they felt very badly about it. But I suggest that, when they sold their company, they were the happiest directors in the world. As a matter of fact, Quebec has had to lay off several hundreds of its asbestos workers. Quebec is the new owner of the corporation, but its workers are no longer working, something which had been foreseen! Quebec residents pay between 20 and 25 per cent more income tax than their Ontario counterparts because of mistakes such as this one and because of a lack of restraint in their economy. The Quebec government has just bought, as I said, the Asbestos corporation, just as it had bought the Sidbec steel plant a few years previously, the Sidbec steel plant which is accumulating millions of dollars in deficits every year; now, it is anxious to get rid of it, even at a loss. It would have been better advised not to buy Asbestos and to keep the Sidbec steel plant.

If you compare the budget of Quebec with that of Ontario, you can come up with interesting findings. In 1974-75, Quebec spent $7.9 billion and Ontario $9.6 billion. Ontario clearly spent more than Quebec, but Ontario has a population of approximately 9 million and Quebec 6 million. In 1980-81, Quebec spent $19 billion and Ontario $17 billion. If there are some of you who could explain to me how Quebec with a population of 6 million could spend $19 billion, while Ontario with a population of 9 million managed to spend only $17 billion, that is, less than Quebec with 9 million population I would be pleased to hear them!

Comparing totals is always difficult. But if you determine the spending on an individual basis, you will find that in 1980-81, the per capita spending in Quebec was $3,018, and when I say on an individual basis, I include pensioners, children, handicapped people, everybody who is not working. The per capita spending in Ontario was $2,071. Quebec, therefore, for every person living on its territory spent $947 more than Ontario did for its own people, while it spent only $109 more in 1974-75. An increase of 900 per cent over six or seven years. If this keeps up, Quebec residents, needless to say, will continue to pay more taxes than their Ontario counterparts, not only during this generation, but during many generations to come.

To continue in the same vein, I would point out that since the present government came to power in the province of Quebec, civil servants have been hired by the ton. A slew of new departments were set up to accommodate friends of the party and, naturally, the bill is now being paid which makes things pretty rough. Now, to come back to the over-all situation in Canada, Canadians lack certain things, of course; but despite our weaknesses, and we must speak of them too—it is a good thing to speak of them—we must not become overly pessimistic. Canada and Canadians should feel confident that we will soon have worked our way out of this crisis.

Still, the fact is that when we compare the potential of Canada with that of other countries, we realize that all in all we are privileged. Canada is a country where the level of education is just about the highest in the whole world, and therefore where science and technology are also extremely advanced. We are lucky, not because we are Canadians, but because we have been lucky! We live in a country where there is an abundance of oil, part of which is in oil sands and hence very costly to extract; but it is still there. It gives us a measure of security, and considering those countries which have none at all, that is an asset. In addition to oil, we all know we have natural resources such as forests, water, both salt and fresh, iron, zinc in fantastic quantities. In light of those factors, we can look to a very promising future and as Canadians, we should stop being pessimistic and look to the future with confidence. Indeed, the last budget brought down by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) demonstrated vividly that the country is now going through difficult times over the short term and that steps must be taken to help our industry.

This year of course, we know that the inflation rate in Canada will reach 11.8 per cent while south of the border it will be 6 or 7 per cent. We can easily understand that if those conditions were allowed to prevail for two or three years, we would no longer be competitive. Canada must therefore bring its inflation rate down so that it is roughly the same as that in the United States. Accordingly, the matter which came under consideration was not a salary freeze, but a 6 per cent reduction in the forthcoming year and a 5 per cent reduction the year after, which would contribute to reducing our own inflation rate to a level comparable to the American one. And why are the United States so important? They are impotant because 75 per cent of our national trade is done with the Americans. Our companies are experiencing difficulties and this is understandable when we have to pay 18, 19 per cent interest rates. It is quite difficult for those companies to make profits and quite often they incur losses which are serious enough to bring them to the verge of bankruptcy.

Well, the government and the Minister of Finance have decided that the federal government would pay 4 per cent of those interest rates to reduce them by 4 points and this will first of all help the construction industry. The construction industry is the most Canadian of all industries because all its employees are necessarily Canadians. All building materials are manufactured in Canada whether it is lumber, gyproc, asphalt shingles, cement, electric wire, or plumbing equipment. This economic sector is entirely Canadian and I think it is the first one which should be assisted. Well, buyers of new homes will be eligible for a $3,000 grant, but they actually will get more than $3,000, because $3,000 is not a very high amount compared with the prices of houses today. What is more significant is the fact that the mortgage rates on houses will be reduced by 4 per cent and this is a lot, because it means 4 per cent this year, next year, the following year and every year as long as the same individual remains the mortgagor of his house.

We know quite well that in the near future, maybe in an unforseeable but near future, the interest rates should stabilize and become much more normal. To a prospective buyer of a new house concerned about economic restrictions, we say: You will pay 4 per cent less interest than the normal rate throughout the period when it will remain high and we know that to own a home has been for several years the best investment that can still be made in Canada.

• (1540)

I think that those measures will stimulate the construction industry and help Canadians become home owners. We will also help all small and medium-size businesses by reducing their interest rates by 4 per cent. Of course that will make a big hole in the Canadian budget. The deficit had to be increased to meet those requirements. But there is one thing to be said, namely that a government is administered exactly the opposite of the way a family budget is administered. In a crisis when everything is going very badly, a government must spend more to help create jobs and to help businesses invest, expand and hire people. With the creation of those jobs, there will be lots of work in two or three years and practically all the unemployed will have found work. By then the government will collect many taxes from the labour force and from businesses that will be making profits, so we should do the contrary and pull in the purse strings because full employment often fuels inflation. I said it was exactly the opposite of a family budget because a family has to tighten its belt when things go badly and it must immediately act with caution. But the government must spend money for a specific purpose, and that is to create jobs for Canadian workers.

Another innovation in the budget is aimed at encouraging all Canadians to invest—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I must inform him that his time has run out. However, he may continue if there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Duvernay may continue his remarks.

Mr. Demers: Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take up too much of the time of the House, so I will say in conclusion that even if we are going through difficult times, I think that all members of the House have a message for Canadians. We must tell them to work hard because Canada is experiencing difficulties, but we have to tell them as well that Canada has a tremendous potential and that if we all pull together the situation will be back to normal in the very near future.

[English]

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I feel privileged to participate in this debate. I wish first to speak briefly about the domestic economic climate and perhaps, if I have not been too windy, to touch on the international economic situation if time permits. I do not wish to abuse the privileges of the House, so I will try to limit my remarks to less than 20 minutes.

Canada today is in the midst of cost-push inflation, sustained primarily by high cost money, the high cost of governments and the very high costs of overhead, management salaries and skilled labour in the private sector.

Our nation is living beyond its means and adjustments are desperately needed. The brutal force of inflation is the result of living beyond our means. The nation has two choices: to continue to live beyond its means and thereby live on debt and an accelerating cycle of inflation, eventually resulting in the short-term collapse of the economic cycle, or by self-imposed restraint and Draconian government measures to lower temporarily the expectations of all Canadians, cut the inflationary cycle and then follow with a cycle of confidence and growth.

It is easy to heap the blame upon the federal government or a successive number of governments for the economic disaster facing Canadians today. Although the federal government must shoulder much of the blame, it is not the only culprit. All present provincial governments are living on debt, meeting their obligations with borrowings, as are most Canadians. All governments in Canada, regardless of political persuasion, have simply become too big, not necessarily in the economic planning sector but certainly in the administration of a massive variety of programs which people often could and would much rather do for themselves.

All governments in Canada are taxing away for redistribution some 45 per cent of the gross national product of this nation, and this figure is going up. The federal government accounts for one-third and the provinces and municipalities the other two-thirds.

All governments are redistributing borrowed wealth. As the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) told us in his recent budget, the federal government deficit in this fiscal year will be $19.6 billion. The budgetary deficits of all the provinces together this fiscal year are projected to be $9.4 billion. I suspect that the actual figure will be more like $12 billion.

At the end of the current fiscal year, the debt structure of the federal government will reach about $145 billion and that of the provinces about $70 billion. This is a debt load of about $9,000 for every woman, man and child in Canada. With interest rates in the region of 20 per cent, this is just too much for the Canadian people and the Canadian economy to sustain for too long. Therefore, the first order of a federal budget and indeed every provincial budget is fiscal restraint. Governments simply must restrain themselves. The alternative is economic collapse and chaos and a long drawn out cycle of recovery. It is the next 12 to 24 months that are critical. Some of us have seen clearly this economic scenario that was developing over the last several years and indeed the last several months.

During the last few months I have tried to be constructive. I introduced a series of motions and made several speeches in this House with regard to needed economic policies and strategies. Permit me, Mr. Speaker, just to review a few of the motions I introduced under Standing Order 43. On May 6 I moved a motion stating that I felt certain that the Minister of Finance may wish to second it, and the Speaker actually put the motion. At that time I said:

> Madam Speaker, the federal government's fiscal and economic policy cannot expect solely the private sector to cure the inflationary ills of the nation. The public sector must bear its share of the burden as it takes some 45 per cent of the GNP with little or no positive influence on productivity. Therefore I move:
> That the government immediately adjust its economic strategy to:
> (1) allow the dollar to drop by at least 5 per cent of its value and then maintain a new level through the appropriate fiscal and monetary policy;
>
> (2) immediately call a federal, provincial and municipal conference to stabilize for at least two years the salaries and benefits of all public servants whose income is greater than $25,000 per year;
>
> (3) cut government expenses in a Draconian fashion and introduce a new budget incorporating the necessary incentives for growth;
>
> (4) restructure the National Energy Program immediately;
> (5) undertake with the provinces a massive public works program on a national basis to create jobs.

I moved that motion on May 6. It is interesting that the dollar since then has dropped by 5 per cent, wages in the public sector are being stabilized for two years, a new budget has been introduced, the National Energy Program has been significantly and beneficially changed and construction programs are being undertaken.

• (1550)

On February 17 I gave a speech in this House asking for selective stimulation of the housing industry for job creation. In the same speech, I asked "that a task force be put together at the earliest opportunity to come forth with a whole series of programs by governments for selectively stimulating the Canadian economy and creating jobs without necessarily increasing inflation". All of this is being done in the new budget. I was certainly pleased to hear HUDAC's recent response to the stimulative housing initiatives in the budget.

On May 11 and again on May 20, I moved a motion "that all Members of Parliament voluntarily accept a 10 per cent cut in their basic salaries", to show leadership in this House and to the nation. I followed these motions by a private members' bill to limit MP's increases to a maximum of 6 per cent. Some opposition members accused me of grandstanding and all sorts of insincere motives. Well, this budget has both an MP salary reduction and a limitation on increases to 6 per cent and 5 per cent in the next two years. I have heard no one scream against these budgetary provisions.

Again on June 9 I introduced a motion. I stated:

> —equity investment pessimism is pervasive in Canada. Canadians are investing their money outside Canada and in high-interest-bearing bonds and certificates. This has substantively curtailed the ability to generate equity capital in Canada and has jeopardized the survival of small business in Canada because of the high cost of debt capital. A new budget is necessary to create confidence in the Canadian economy, and it must contain incentives for equity investment. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor):
> That any new budget abolish capital gains taxation on all equity investment in Canadian registered companies.

We recognized, as so many of us have, the massive transfer of equity capital to debt capital in the nation, also imported capital. Effectively, the Minister of Finance has basically introduced such measures in the budget. He proposed indexing the gains to inflation for equity investment in Canadian owned companies, but he might just as well have gone the full mile and totally removed capital gains on investments in Canadian companies. He increased the amount of paperwork which is becoming extensive in the area of capital gains taxation.

I am asked what is my position on the June 28 budget. First, let me say that it was desperately needed. Second, its intent and purpose is short term. It cannot be otherwise in this very turbulent economic cycle. Third, its goals are to cut inflation, hopefully to 6 per cent in two years, bottom out the recession cycle, sustain a short-term economic holding action and, finally, initiate the beginning of a new and dynamic growth cycle, and to do this without massive and sweeping government legislative action across the entire society. Voluntary restraint is still partially our choice. The government has finally whipped up enough courage to provide some desperately needed economic leadership to the nation.

It is my intention to support the restraint measures embodied in Bill C-124 and vote for the principles in that bill. Rounded out, the budget has three basic elements. First, public sector restraint; second, investment stimulation through equity incentive financing and lower debt financing; third, job creation through a variety of fiscal juggling. In the first element, the budget goes as far as the government dare go on wage restraints, but this must surely be looked upon only as the beginning of public sector restraint, both at the federal and provincial levels. Surely it must be followed by employment reduction through early retirement, as the Imperial Oil Company did so adequately in the last few days, and a reduction in the unproductive expenditures in all areas of government.

In the second element, which is investment stimulation, the government could have gone even further, although I expect that the special advisors committee will be pushing like hell.

In my estimation, the third element of job-creation is marginal and much help is needed from the provinces in this area. I hope that the government will continue discussions with the provinces to initiate an increasing variety of job-creation programs, particularly in the construction industry.

I know that it is easy, as has been done by many, to say that the budget measures are not enough that some elements are inequitable, that some elements are missing, that the emphasis is misplaced and that it may be tricky or deceptive. I listened to the speeches of the leaders of the two opposition parties with mixed emotions. I was particularly impressed with some of the thoughts of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton). Much wailing and gnashing of teeth was directed toward the government's over-enthusiasm at fiscal restraint in some areas, particularly in areas like reducing the indexing of old age pensions to 6 per cent and 5 per cent in the next two years. On Canada Day, or Dominion Day, I had the occasion to meet two groups of senior citizens in Edmonton, all of whose members were pioneers, totalling some 600. Not a single one of these hardy pioneers complained that 6 per cent and 5 per cent increases in the next two years was too little. In fact, they were more concerned about the young men and women who are unemployed and they wished they could somehow help.

There are many other aspects of this budget that one could debate positively or negatively, but allow me to look backward a little bit. During the decade of the sixties, I worked mostly out of New York and also Arizona in the United States. What a decade the sixties was for North America! The sixties was an era of magic, when we of the technologically trained society held the world in our hands, when technology and the world economy exploded in a decade of development and growth, and human interaction and peace. There seemed to be no limits to our imagination or to our dreams as scientists, engineers and politicians. We were certain that we could change the world in but a few decades and build a paradise on earth.

Then we left the sixties behind and cautiously entered the seventies. I remember writing the following for a speech that I gave to the Man and Resources Conference in Toronto in 1974. In that speech I said:

> This century has fostered revolution in science and technology, in the generation and use of energy, in industrial productivity, in population growth, in urbanization and in destructive potential which have buffeted humanity at a rate too quick for the human mind to adequately comprehend and absorb. The spiritual, social and intellectual consequences of these revolutions are profound and not entirely determinable. Our present day cultures are increasingly beset by an oppressive sense of fragmentation and instability. We are beginning to question and even doubt our own continuity as a progressing civilization. We derive from our awesome technological complexity both a confidence of power and a sharp premonition of vulnerability.

● (1600)

Yes, the seventies became a decade of doubt and readjustment both worldwide and in Canada. The western world built a mobile society based on cheap oil. The oil then became expensive, and this triggered a world economic whirlwind which brought inflation, a halt to world economic growth, protectionism and pessimism. In retrospect, Canada would perhaps have been far better off today if we had gone quickly to world energy prices, as the United States did. However, that is wishful thinking.

This pessimism and inwardness catapulted into the eighties with disruptive force and affected Canada so much that today one must ask what has happened to us as Canadians. What has happened to our dreams? What has happened to our ideals? What has happened to our will to be in the forefront of world nations in productivity, in sharing and in helping each other and all the less endowed people of the earth? The great idealism of the sixties and early seventies has crashed, trampled in the wake of our own riches. We lost our initiative, our drive, our determination and even our will to excel both nationally and internationally. We have exchanged political co-operation for political intransigence. Federal-provincial co-operation has given way to upmanship and gamesmanship, although I am encouraged by the posture and attitude of the ten Premiers since the recent first ministers' conference. In particular, I am encouraged by the actions of the Progressive Conservative Premier of Nova Scotia who accepted the federal restraint guidelines.

We have traded productivity and pride of accomplishment for slothfulness and laziness, and now I see labour leaders publicly advocating more of the same as a strategy for fighting restraint. The figures on lost time in the Canadian work force released today are alarming. At times we seem to have become a people without purpose, without compassion and with dubious honesty, and this House is a representative microcosm of the Canadian fabric today. Here we bicker like children and throw verbal frisbees back and forth. We distort, we delay and we belittle each other. The intent is to be destructive and disruptive rather than constructive and efficient. This House has become a place of negativism and pessimism. Through television we provide a daily diet of our characteristics in this House to the nation, and people often ask me when I go back to my constituency if we will ever agree on anything again, as we agreed when we debated the Quebec referendum in this House. "Can you people down there not agree on some direction or on some few things which should be done in this nation?" That is what I am asked.

We must agree, and we must develop a new optimism and a new perspective with regard to the magnificent country we have. So few of us enjoy this wealth like no other peoples of the world. I know every Member of Parliament deals with immigration problems in his constituency because there is not a soul anywhere in the world who does not want to emigrate to this country which has such vast potential. We must find the enthusiasm, the desire and the optimism necessary to build this nation again. We must agree to work together to solve the economic malaise facing and punishing all Canadians, and I know we can do better from here on than we have done in the past.

[Translation]

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, I may say it is a pleasure and a privilege to be taking part in this budget debate. I would like to take a few minutes to talk about those of us who were expecting miracles and those Canadians who are convinced that all the problems our country is facing today are the result of errors, past and present, of the Government of Canada. I also have some comments on the state of the economy in the riding of Gaspé and I shall explain how weak international markets are responsible for the shutdown of several factories, and that the world economic situation must improve if we are to revive our copper, paper and seafood industries.

First of all, Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote from an editorial by Claude LeVergne, published on July 4 under the heading: "The budget as a reminder of reality". It says, and I quote:

> In fact, the Finance Minister, who, it is generally conceded, had very little room to manoeuvre, opted for an economic sermon rather than radical corrective measures. To that extent, his speech may prove to have been worth while provided it was understood. Without wishing to overestimate this last budget, the fact is that opposing factions both inside and outside Parliament have been extrapolating the proposed measures in a very negative manner, without actually suggesting any real alternative solutions. It is always easy to say too little too late, but it would seem to be incumbent on the critics to come up with real guidelines for corrective action, which they have failed to do. If Mr. MacEachen succeeds in making Canadians aware of the present crisis situation, his speech will not have been in vain.

Mr. Speaker, all around us today, we see signs of great upheaval which have been characteristic of the North American scene during the last twenty years. We have seen the spectacular growth of an economy with an almost limitless capacity for expanding production suddenly turn into an inflationary monster gone completely out of control. The goal of the June budget is to restore public confidence in a future when inflation will subside and new investment will create the jobs we so urgently need. Mr. Speaker, the appeal for national solidarity made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) must be heard by all Canadians. Many, far too many people, including politicians, businessmen, labour leaders and educators, are claiming that any system of government that has failed to get rid of unemployment, exploitation and inflation is a failure and should be eliminated.

According to this kind of reasoning, we should destroy all our hospitals and shoot all the doctors because they have failed to wipe out disease. Mr. Speaker, before destroying one system, I think they should suggest another that will be able to resolve the problems of unemployment, exploitation, undue profits and inflation. As Leo Rosten said: "Anyone can promise Utopia if he does not specify a program." Our system of government is ideal, and the objective of the Minister of Finance will be achieved and our way of life preserved, provided enough Canadians show sufficient concern for the national interest in their daily decisions. In the years to come, Canadians will have to spend more time and energy on resolving the nation's problems. Excessive wage demands and unreasonable profits increase the cost of goods, and consumers will have to pay the bill. Canadians must condemn every purely egotistical decision. Indifference to poverty is inexcusable in a society that is dedicated to the dignity of the individual.

Mr. Speaker, I would now like to discuss the economic situation in the riding of Gaspé and the distributive justice we are asking for, which is the philosophy of the Liberal Party but is too often ignored by certain departments. The needs of each community and its individual members are multiple and complex. They include basic requirements such as survival, as well as more complex psychological aspirations such as personal development. These needs truly represent the basic goals of individual Canadians. Socially, they correspond to two essential goals, namely well-being and equity. All the intermediate goals help toward meeting these basic aspirations. Well-being is measured by the extent to which material, sociocultural and other needs are met. On the other hand, equity consists in the fair redistribution of the assets of society. It is probably the idea of equal opportunities which best illustrates the most significant and universally accepted concept of equity at the present time. Its aim is to provide everyone with the same opportunities to achieve well-being. Another aspect of equity is the equality of results.

In the Gaspé area, and especially in my constituency of Gaspé, we have neither equal opportunities nor equal results. The standard of living in a country or a region depends on the income of the population, the cost of living and the economic benefits. We are well aware that we have many non-economic benefits in the Gaspé area. However, the average salary is 40 per cent lower in that area than in Quebec as a whole. In the Gaspé region, the majority of the experienced labour force works at unskilled jobs in the resource sector, for instance, in the mining and forest industries. In fact, the Gaspé region has proportionately twice as many workers in these industries as the Quebec average.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, the present world recession is felt more badly in economically weak and disadvantaged regions where the economy is supported by the resource industries. In my constituency of Gaspé, the regional unemployment rate is 40 per cent, among the highest in Canada. To make the situation even more confused, many industries are now experiencing financial problems. On June 30, Mines Madeleine Ltée closed down their mining operations in Sainte-Anne-des-Monts. This is a permanent closure which has thrown 110 people out of work. The Marsoui sawmill has been closed for 18 months. Over 100 workers are now unemployed, in addition to 125 forest workers. Gaspesia Ltée of Chandler and Mines Gaspé Ltée of Murdochville are closing down temporarily because of newspaper and copper stock surpluses. A total of over 4,000 workers are directly affected by these temporary shutdowns.

• (1610)

In view of the economic situation, manpower centres do not find it advisable to set up relocation committees for workers who have lost their jobs since mines and plants are closing down everywhere. The tourist industry is also very important in the Gaspé region. I am told that there were 25 per cent fewer tourists in June 1982 than in June 1981. Mr. Speaker, I urge all Canadians to visit the Gaspé area this summer because prices are very reasonable there and, as you know, the people are very hospitable. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, even though the Gaspé constituency is economically depressed, the people there still enjoy life and are eager to work. The job creation and economic development initiatives announced by the Minister of Finance will certainly improve the situation for the Gaspé people, but more than stopgap measures are needed. The Industry Development and Industry and Labour Adjustment Programs are two initiatives which could help our regional economy to recover if the required infrastructures were in place. The people of the Gaspé area agree that they have to share the burden and the responsibility of getting Canada out of the recession, slowing down inflation and increasing productivity. Many economists have explained that the lack of social capital, that is the infrastructures, is the main reason behind the lagging economic development in Gaspé and other similar regions. Here is how I would sum up my proposal: there can never be equity among individuals and a truly just society unless the Government of Canada implements measures which are better tailored to meet regional needs and peculiarities.

It is of the utmost importance that governments set up mechanisms and infrastructures in regions such as the riding of Gaspé so that Canadians not be exclusively consumers, but producers as well. The people of Gaspé want a place under the sun in our beautiful and great country and they urge the governments to subsidize employment rather than unemployment.

The budget refers to a program aimed at boosting the building industry. I dare hope that it is only the first of many more stages. We in the riding of Gaspé have to cope with inflation like everybody else and, as I said at the outset, we have to think in terms of adequate infrastructures to spur the economic recovery of our region and encourage investors to set up shop there.

We have nothing against massive investments in such designated centres as Montreal and Quebec City. Still, the products of Gaspé must find their way to those centres and that is why we urgently need adequate infrastructures. Right now, I have in mind the improvements that will have to be made to the airports of Sainte-Anne-des-Monts, Pabos and Gaspé so as to promote the industrial expansion of those regions and centres. I also have in mind the construction of a multiple purpose harbour in the Sainte-Anne-des-Monts and Cap-Chat region, as well as the improvement and upgrading of harbour facilities in Gaspé. Finally, what can I say about the small marinas along the coast of the Gaspé Peninsula? A cursory examination of existing facilities and the lack of infrastructures throughout the region vividly reflect the fact that fishermen are so hard pressed to earn a living at their trade.

Mr. Speaker, I do not want to ask the government for more money than we can rightfully expect. However, within the scope of the programs mentioned in the June 28 budget and others already implemented, I would like that very careful consideration be given to the reallocation of available funds while keeping in mind the particular needs of the people of Gaspé and especially the needs of the whole electoral riding of Gaspé which I represent. That is what is called distributive justice. A good many citizens of the Gaspé area look favourably upon the budget proposals aimed at appreciably lowering the interest rates. Whether buying a new house or beginning construction before next December 31, the first-time home buyer will be eligible for a $3,000 grant. Small businesses as well will be able to get working capital for development and construction at 4 percentage points under the prevailing rate, and fishermen will also qualify for the reduced rate to finance new capital equipment. All those people greatly appreciate the effort of the government and will certainly benefit from those budget measures. As far as I know, two businesses in the riding of Gaspé have already applied to avail themselves of the rates at 4 percentage points lower than prevailing rates. Those measures will certainly give a boost to businessmen, fishermen and farmers anxious to run a sound operation, and they will dispel their fears about risks and overly high investment costs.

Mr. Speaker, we all know the major cause of unemployment—the idling construction industry.

The construction industry's multiplier is 3.5. This means that for each dollar invested in the building industry, we are expending $3.50 in other industries such as logging, mining, furniture, textiles, appliances, etc. I am therefore happy that the budget includes various types of proposals to help to stimulate housing. The five-point package may not have in the Gaspé Peninsula the social and economic impact they will have in other areas. However, it will help the lumber industry to recover and provide jobs in sawmills and logging operations.

There is also a $30 million funding increase for the Canada Home Renovation Plan (CHRP), a program that certainly will have a very significant impact in the Gaspé Peninsula as soon as people in that area are aware of the terms.

And of course, Mr. Speaker, the needs are great. People are willing, but there must also be a political will for the whole of Gaspé rather than just one or two cities east of Quebec to experience harmonious development. This is the distributive justice of the Liberal Party, Mr. Speaker.

Recently, I was reminded of Hamlet's monologue that goes like this:

To be, or not to be: that is the question:

Whether 'tis nobler in the mind to suffer
The slings and arrows of outrageous fortune,
Or to take arms against a sea of troubles,
And by opposing end them?

People in Gaspé have always had to fight to earn their living. I feel I am speaking on their behalf when I say that once more they would be ready to go all out to get the most from the prevailing situation to ensure the welfare of their community. However, they want to make sure that government authorities, under the budget tabled June 28, will ensure that the maximum available funds are used for a consistent economic recovery and reallocation of funds, based on the particular conditions that make Gaspé an area where resource development is slow because of a blatant lack of infrastrutures in various fields. Mr. Speaker, once more we are faced with a challenge. It is the duty of every Canadian to do his part to obtain the security we all are looking for. This budget is a call to reality that every Canadian should answer.

[English]

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have not taken part in some of the major debates in this House recently, for a number of reasons. The debate on the National Energy Program was skilfully handled by some of my colleagues who have a particular expertise in that area. In addition, I found it necessary to spend a great deal of my time working with individuals and companies in my constituency in an attempt to shield them from the vagaries of this government. Even then I was unsuccessful in my attempt to commit the government to buying better quality, Canadian-built and lower-priced equipment, rather than Japanese.

As for the debate now taking place on this excuse for a budget presented to us on June 28, there have been a number of speakers from my party who have very capably covered the major points and it would be quite easy for me to sit back and allow them to speak on this occasion. Indeed, I would be quite comfortable with most of what has been said to date by my colleagues. There is, however, a facet of this budget which has not, to my knowledge, been dealt with.

My colleagues, by and large, have dealt with the over-all impact of the budget on Canadians. Let me deal for a few moments with its impact on individuals and attempt to add a human scale to this latest travesty by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). Let me attempt to break it down and point out what it means to individuals in the riding of Prince Edward-Hastings, a small but I expect typical riding in eastern Ontario.

We have been told that the budget deficit for 1982-83 is a figure of $19.6 billion. That is just a number, Mr. Speaker, one which is very hard for the majority of my constituents to reconcile. I know that I cannot think of it in terms of real dollars. However, when you break it down to an amount of $840 for every man, woman and child, newborn or centenarian, it is a number I can relate to.

Prior to this budget the national debt incurred by the Liberal government was $135 billion, another figure which is just as difficult to understand. It is more manageable when broken down to $5,700 for each person. For people living in the city of Belleville, where I live, this means that the deficit the federal government will incur this year in their name alone amounts to $29.5 million. It is interesting to note that that is exactly the same amount that the entire city administration will spend this year.

Let us look at that figure again, Mr. Speaker. All of the money collected by the city of Belleville this year to pay for the entire administration—the city council, staff, police and firemen, snowplowing, garbage collection, road repairs, street cleaning and maintenance, and the myriad of services provided by the city—will be equalled by that part of the federal deficit owed by the citizens of Belleville. Does anyone really believe there is any comparison between the services received by the people from the municipalities and those from the federal government? I am confident that most would agree they get a far better deal from their city.

Over the years the city of Belleville, like most municipalities, has spent money on capital projects on which in their wisdom they have deferred payment. These include major roads, bridges and other large capital expenditures. This means the city has a debt, and it is roughly $13 million. The federal government has also not paid its way over the past few years and the consequences are, as I said a few moments ago, a debt of $135 billion. In terms of the people in the city of Belleville, that works out to $200 million, or 15 times the debt Belleville has incurred for its own capital works budget. Once again, does anyone really think that there is any benefit to the people of Belleville from that particular debt?

Let me take a moment, Mr. Speaker, to relate the figures to those rural parts of the Quinte district which I represent. If you apply this year's federal deficit to the residents of Prince Edward County, they owe $19 million on top of the $131 million already incurred by the federal government. Compare that to the total Prince Edward County budget for this year of less than $4 million. For Hastings County, if the current deficit were going to be paid this year, it would amount to $88 million. The debt incurred by the Liberal government on their behalf before this budget was some $600 million, and that is still unpaid. These are astronomical figures, very difficult to understand, and even more difficult when you consider that the entire Hastings County budget for 1982 is only $14.5 million. In all of these cases that I have outlined, these are just the deficits. These are just the amounts which the federal government has spent but has not collected.

The federal government spends money at the rate of $214 million a day, $9 million an hour or $150,000 a minute. Thus, when the federal government spends, it spends in two hours and eight minutes as much as the whole of the city of Belleville spends in one year. In 17 minutes and 20 seconds the federal government spends all that Picton will spend in one year. In five minutes and 15 seconds the federal government spends the entire budget of Deseronto. The federal government would spend the entire budget of the little village of Tweed, through which many members from Ontario drive on their way to Ottawa, in four minutes. The federal government would gobble up the budget of the pretty village of Wellington located on the south shore overlooking Lake Ontario in Prince Edward County in two minutes and 28 seconds.

How does the federal government spend this money? Some of it goes to items such as Mirabel airport. Mirabel airport has cost the taxpayers of Canada some $700 million to date. That is equivalent to the budget for the whole of the city of Belleville, the whole of Prince Edward County and the whole of Hastings County, not just that portion I represent. It includes the portions represented by my colleague the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Hees) as well as by my colleague the hon. member for Hastings-Frontenac-Lennox-Addington (Mr. Vankoughnet). The cost of operating Mirabel airport would be the equivalent of covering all of Hastings County budgets for 15 years.

The federal government has an advertising budget of nearly $235 million. In other words, the federal government spends on advertising alone more than the city of Belleville spends in its whole budget for eight years. Perhaps it is better to leave those figures in the impersonal billions of dollars, because when I get them down to real terms it frightens the hell out of me.

Let me try to relate some of the major items in the budget in more human terms that would apply to the people of a riding such as Prince Edward-Hastings. Many of my colleagues have made the point that senior citizens have been hit hard, in fact hit twice by this budget, once by having their pensions deindexed and second by having their income tax deindexed, resulting in their having to pay higher income taxes. I suppose the Minister of Finance knew that those people in their sixties, seventies and eighties were those who came through the dirty thirties; they know what a real depression is like and would probably not complain as much as some younger ones would.

Let me tell the Minister of Finance that these are the same people who have watched this Liberal government over the years, have watched its wasteful spending, have seen the lack of responsibility, have heard the disparaging remarks made about the Parliament of Canada by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), and have seen cabinet minister after cabinet minister show favouritism to one part of Canada over another. They know how much a $20 million contract to a Belleville firm would mean, or what $30 million in assistance would mean to a Windsor factory. Those things would provide jobs. Our senior citizens also know there was no chance of those things happening because the businesses are located in Ontario.

Yes, the senior citizens are the ones who know how to tighten their belts better than most Canadians. But also better than most Canadians, they probably appreciate that it would not have been necessary had it not been for the action of this government.

When it comes to restraint, this government has long since forgotten what the word means. I want to go on record as being quite prepared to see cuts made in the salaries of Members of Parliament and senior civil servants. As far as Members of Parliament are concerned, since there are so few it is a token gesture in any event. Senior civil servants, many of whom make twice as much as Members of Parliament and who are fully protected against inflation, could stand a cut both in salary and in real numbers.

How can there be any credibility left for a government whose projections could be so wrong? We have all heard that projections made in the November 12 budget are now admitted by the Minister of Finance to be in error. The authors of those projections should have been fired. Instead, they received major raises.

Why would any businessman want to invest in Canada? Whether it is a Canadian businessman or one from offshore—who would first of all have to fight all of the FIRA regulations—these businessmen have no idea what the tax climate is going to be from day to day. Businessmen who were operating under one set of rules prior to November 12 had those rules changed, even though the legislation was never brought in. In June of this year another change came about. It is doubtful whether that legislation will be passed before another budget is brought in later this year in the fall.

Let me return again to the city of Belleville. When I was mayor of that city I had to prepare a five-year budget for its citizens. I know that my successors continue to do the same thing. Thus it is that if someone wished to know what the city of Belleville is going to spend over the next few years, he or she need only go to the city hall and ask a competent civil servant or a dedicated member of council to get an answer. With over 500,000 civil servants, should the Government of Canada be allowed to do less?

The federal government spends a lot of time advertising what it is going to do and spends a lot of money on programs to provide jobs. What the federal government should do is emulate one young farmer in Prince Edward County who last week alone had nearly 400 students on his payroll on a part-time basis. He had no help from the federal government. He and his wife had to stay up nearly all of Thursday night to make out the pay cheques for his employees. These cheques were in payment for work ranging from a few hours to a full week. The total payroll was over $10,000. If the federal government would spend only a portion of the money it wastes in helping farmers and small-business men do their jobs, there would be far less unemployment.

And how about a small successful businessman in Belleville, who by supplying merchandise at fair prices and excellent service has built a good business over the past 25 years? Even now with a much weakened economy his sales this year will probably equal those of last year. The problem is that with the extra costs imposed on him by all levels of government he will show a loss in his operations this year. He must cut back his staff. He must take advantage of work-sharing programs in order to stay alive, and he will stay alive only with no profit and little incentive to continue. Is this any way to treat a businessman who has dedicated his entire life to building his business, to hiring and training people and to providing benefits for a number of employees? Is this how to provide incentives for prospective businessmen?

This government has lied to the people of Canada in so many different ways that it is difficult to enumerate them all. Can one really believe that the budget deficit will be only $19.6 billion, given the track record of ministers of finance to date? Would a person really start a new business knowing that he has to compete with the federal government for available dollars in order to run that business? Could one plan one's retirement knowing that one's pension is at the whim of this government? Would you even buy a car, Mr. Speaker, knowing that this government two years ago said that an 18-cent increase in the price of gasoline was too high? The answer, of course, to all of those questions is a flat no.

The few stop-gap measures in this budget that are of some value may well be turned around before the end of this year. Nowhere in the budget does it say that the statements in it are the policy of the federal government and will remain so. There is really only one answer that taxpayers can give this government. It is very simple. For the sake of Canada, for the sake of all Canadians, and in the name of God, this government should go. It should get out and let someone else do the job.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I suspect that by this time in the budget debate Canadians will be reacting with dismay to the kind of rhetoric which we have been hearing from hon. members opposite. While I realize that we refer to hon. members opposite as the opposition, it seems in this case that "opposition" has meant anything but the constructive alternatives which one expects in our parliamentary system. Instead, members of the opposition are like artists who use only black paint; an unusual concept, perhaps, but difficult even to know when the work is completed, let alone what it is meant to convey.

Certainly Canada, along with the rest of the industrialized world, has serious economic problems. Equally obvious was that for these difficulties to be overcome, a course for Canadians to follow had to be charted. An example of leadership had to be given, and the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) certainly described that course and set out that example of leadership in his budget.

Now, we do not claim that pointing the way to the solution of our country's problems in the budget presented last week immediately solves those problems, as some opposition members wish Canadians to believe is possible. As the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) said in his recent interview with La Presse of Montreal before the budget, he has no alternatives. In his speech in this debate he certainly proved this to be absolutely true. In reviewing the remarks of opposition members in this debate, there have been the usual kinds of contradictions—at one and the same time calling for increased expenditures and urging a reduction in the deficit.

The budget proposes a balanced route to full recovery, one that calls on Canadians to work together. It calls on those in a better position to do so to aid those most in need, as Canadians have done on so many occasions in our past history. The government in the budget is pointing the way by setting an example for others which I believe must and will be followed. The budget outlined the basic choice—working together for economic recovery or having to continue on a course of high costs, high inflation and lack of international competitiveness, efficiency and productivity.

In a world in which Canada would be isolated from all around us, we might well see our problems dramatically reduced without action by government and the private sector working together; but we do not live in such a world. We are part of the global economy and, as such, we suffer to a substantial degree from the problems of others. Within these kinds of constraints, the government has presented a program in the budget aimed at restoring the Canadian economy while protecting those most in need.

One could say that one of our country's problems is that our successes—and there are many—are obscured by the more strident, the more fearful and the less confident among us, especially those on the other side of the House. Certainly the budget does not ignore the general problems of our economy. The program proposed by the Minister of Finance directs help to those most seriously affected, and it urges everyone to contribute to the solution through government, business and labour working together. The budget could not and did not try to do everything for everyone, but it has asked that everyone do their part. This was in the firm belief that Canada's success is based upon all of us working together in a sense of solidarity and sharing.

I believe that request to be a positive aspect. There are those who speak only of the restraint which is required while ignoring that the reasons the restraint has been requested are to increase assistance and support for those in need, particularly those seeking employment, and to help get the entire economy back on a track of productivity and growth.

Much has been said in this debate about the deficit. We recognize the deficit to be a serious matter. We have not agreed with those who say that the deficit should be increased even further. Also we have not agreed with those who call for steps to lower substantially the deficit at this time, because to do so would only mean pulling substantial purchasing power out of an economy where market demand is already far too weak. It would mean putting even tighter restraint on an economy in which growth of gross national product has already stalled and needs to be encouraged.

Our deficit increase came from the operation of automatic stabilizers in our government expenditure and revenue system. Government tax revenues fell as corporate profits and personal incomes fell. The government spent more but mainly on programs such as unemployment insurance and job creation. Without the operation of automatic stabilizers, the effects of the recession would be worse, the hardship even more severe. The funds provided in the budget will be spent on productive activities to create jobs, to combine with private sector initiatives and investment, and to provide needed assistance to sectors like small businesses, farms and fisheries. As an economic recovery comes about, the basis for correction of our deficit situation will be there as well. As profits and incomes improve, government tax revenues will also improve. As more people get off the unemployment rolls, expenditures on programs like unemployment insurance will decrease.

We have in this budget a number of measures aimed at directly assisting the recovery of the economy. Thus the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove) set out measures described generally in the budget aimed at greatly improving the housing sector. These measures will have a tremendous multiplier effect, encouraging not only the construction of houses but also activating sectors such as appliances, furniture, textiles and forest products. These measures will be the source of more than 100,000 jobs. They will also provide additional help to those who could be spending an excessive amount of their income on home renovations or on renewal of their mortgages and the interest costs involved therein.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) has given details of the measures generally set out in the budget aimed at direct job creation through government programs which will have the effect of maintaining incomes while the economy recovers and permanent jobs are created through private sector activity.

In addition, the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism (Mr. Lapointe) has provided a more detailed description of the budget measures to provide new assistance to small businessmen, fishermen and farmers through the new program of direct grants aimed at reducing the interest costs of money borrowed for new capital expenditure by up to four percentage points.

The measures to help the housing sector, to help home owners deal with high mortgage costs and to help workers maintain income through participation in government job creation programs are aimed at bridging the gap before implementation can take place of the far-reaching and very innovative proposals for new kinds of measures for all lenders of savings and purchasers of shares in Canadian companies to help them be free of tax on the portion of their interest or their gain represented by inflation. These new measures would make it possible for small business people, farmers and fishermen to obtain funds at interest rates several percentage points lower than prevailing market rates. I am confident the government will want to implement these measures as soon as their feasibility and design are confirmed by the special private sector committee headed by Pierre Lortie, president of the Montreal Stock Exchange.

I want to ask the House to give special attention to the programs in the budget which add some $300 million to the economic and regional development envelope to assist the private sector in the creation of long term, permanent jobs through existing programs like the enterprise development program, the defence industry productivity program, the regional development fund and the program in support of technology-enhanced productivity.

There are a number of good examples that can help to demonstrate why this funding has been added and to illustrate the potential of such funding. Just look back, Mr. Speaker, at some of the announcements I have made over the past five or six weeks. I announced that Control Data of Montreal, with the assistance of the enterprise development program, would be developing a new super mini-main frame computer with a world product mandate for its production in Canada, and this is expected to create some 600 jobs.

Then, not long afterward, I announced that again with the support of the enterprise development program of my department Mitel of Ottawa would be developing and marketing a new advanced private automatic branch exchange system, the SX-2000. This could well be providing more than 1,000 jobs both in the Ottawa area and Quebec for people making this new advanced product which would provide the nerve centre for equipment in the new offices of the future.

Not long after that I announced that, again with the support of one of my department's programs. the defence industry productivity program, Litton Industries of Toronto would be manufacturing, once again on a world product mandate basis, a new type of inertial guidance system for commercial aircraft using the new ring laser gyro technology, and this is expected to provide some 1,000 jobs. I was happy to take part in the ceremony marking the delivery of the first such system to Aerospatiale of France. Incidentially, this indicates how we already have the potential for leadership and competitive access to world markets for equipment like those connected with aerospace, electronics and the telecommunications sector.

Just a few days ago I announced that Leigh Instruments of Carleton Place, not far from Ottawa, would be making some very important new components for the new CF-18 fighter plane in association with Lear Siegler of the United States, again with the help of the defence industry productivity program of my department. This is also expected to create a substantial number of new jobs.

What we are talking about here is assistance to lever high-quality additional jobs and advanced technology activity in ways that support new Canadian-controlled advanced technology firms and, yes, foreign-controlled firms operating here on a world product mandate basis which are bringing substantial benefits in terms of jobs, technology and exports to the Canadian economy.

When I refer to developing our own economy I think it important to refer to the role of the Foreign Investment Review Agency. There are those who continuously and perhaps—although I hope not—even deliberately misunderstand or misrepresent the agency and its function. I want the House to remember that FIRA has served to ensure that the limited areas of foreign investment it deals with are of significant benefit to Canada. That is its basic mandate. I would hope that there is no one in the House or in the country who would wish foreign investment to be otherwise for the Canadian economy.

The recent changes announced in the budget, changes of an administrative nature, are based on the work of an interdepartmental committee under my direction, in a process of administrative review that was announced in the economic development document tabled with the last budget. I have long believed that administrative improvement in FIRA was essential to the efficient and effective functioning of the FIRA process. My work as minister has certainly strengthened this belief I held before I assumed this present responsibility.

As the Minister of Finance said in his budget:

> The Foreign Investment Review Act must be administered to adhere to the objectives established by Parliament. Its procedures must be timely and efficient. In particular, efforts must be made to avoid red tape and extended delays.

The measures announced have been developed to deal with these issues. We do not want to have administrative impediments making it difficult for FIRA promptly and efficiently to help the government on behalf of the Canadian people to ensure that, to the extent it is needed, investment from abroad is in fact of significant benefit to Canada. We certainly welcome such investment, but we want to encourage and ensure that it is of significant benefit for Canadians. I suggest that the rhetoric about FIRA somehow frightening off that investment is simply that, just empty rhetoric not based on fact because the number of applications to FIRA has been steadily rising. The United States department of commerce said in a recent survey that affiliates of U.S. parent firms in Canada intend to invest more in this country than in any other country in which subsidiaries of U.S. parent companies operate.

As many have said, businesses operate best when they have confidence. However, I believe the essential element to business confidence is confidence that they will be able to make a profit. The Foreign Investment Review Act is certainly not intended to be a roadblock to investment aimed at creating employment which does not simply operate to perpetuate the branch plant environment that has been of so much concern to so many people.

We have a responsibility to Canadians to ensure that the Canadian economy is vibrant and growing and certainly, as in the past, the Foreign Investment Review Act which was a mandate created by Parliament will play a very important and positive role in that regard in the future.

I want to conclude by reminding the House of the basic concepts of the very important budget presented by the Minister of Finance a few days ago. First, the minister pointed out that we must work together in order to enter an era of growth based upon 6 per cent increases in costs in Canada. We must move away from the present 12 per cent world of inflation and into a 6 per cent world of growth. We must operate on a basis of government leadership and example. We are certainly doing this. We must operate on the basis of government, labour and business working together in a co-operative and consultative way. As well, we are certainly doing this. We must make major efforts not only in support simply of direct job creation, important as that is, but in support of efforts by the private sector to create permanent, long-term jobs. We are making a major commitment of government funds toward this purpose.

I think it has been clearly demonstrated during this debate that the budget presented by the Minister of Finance a few days ago is a courageous and much needed effort to chart a course of leadership to bring the Canadian economy back on a path of full growth and development and all that this means for Canadians and their families. Therefore, in order to help Canadians achieve this goal, I ask the House to vote conclusively and overwhelmingly in support of this budget in the interests of all Canadians and future generations.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, would the minister allow one brief question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is that agreed?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, if there is time I would be happy to do so.

Mr. Ellis: I will be very brief. My question has two parts. Could the minister who spoke so glowingly about the new programs and concepts tell me first—since it was not indicated in the budget speech—if this is the policy of the federal government; and second, can I tell businessmen in my riding that these new concepts and policies will be in place a year from now so that they can count on them?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, if my hon. friend will have the common sense to speak, work and vote for the budget, they will be. I hope he will have that common sense.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, would the minister entertain a second question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): That can be done with unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

• (1700)

Mr. Beatty: The minister spoke of the deficit. Could he indicate to what extent he accepts personal responsibility for the deficit because of the Consolidated Computer fiasco, where he urged the continuation of spending on Consolidated Computer which cost Canadian taxpayers $125 million?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I would ask my hon. friend why he did nothing for the nine long months the Clark government was in office to correct the situation. That situation had built up for ten years before I became minister. He let the problem go on. I brought it to an end, while preserving the technology base and the 300 jobs involved. If anybody has to take responsibility, it is my hon. friend and his government for their negligence which I had to correct.

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge-Foothills): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak to the June budget. It never ceases to amaze me how the Liberal cabinet would put the entire blame for the nation's problems today on the nine months that the Progressive Conservative Party was in power. One would think that the whole nation collapsed during that nine-month period whereas in actual fact it took nine months to find out all of the graft, corruption and evil that they had hidden away in the closets. They were so numerous it took nine months to count the skeletons in the closet before we could even start to address the problem. Fortunately for them they were able, in coalition with the New Democratic Party, to bring down the Clark government, and once again the cloak of secrecy has fallen over the affairs of the nation. They can continue to add skeletons where the others lie.

I want to speak to the Canadian people and other members of this House about the underlying philosophy of this budget. Canadians have now come to realize that there is an economic philosophy in this country. The great Liberal Party of years past has now become really a party like the NDP. It is really a philosophy of socialization.

There is a difference between the parties, and I want to discuss that. Regretfully, Canadians now have to pay the price for having elected successive Liberal-NDP coalition governments. It is a truism that the sins of the fathers are visited upon their children. That is what the Canadian people are suffering today.

It is my thesis that the Liberal Party has changed fundamentally from that party of reform of the early forties and fifties, a party that many people fell in love with because it was going to redistribute and create genuine justice and equity. It no longer is that. It is merely a centralist, socialist and nationalist party. I will show how that has not worked to the benefit of individual working Canadians.

Ordinary working Canadians are now injured and in a position where they are worse off then they were in 1968. That should always be where we start because the true test of any government should be the condition of ordinary Canadians.

I challenge any member of the Liberal Party or the NDP to name even one socialist state where the ordinary people are better off than the Canadian people were in 1968 but not today. In 1968 we had a very low unemployment rate. There was basically full employment. The unemployment at that time of 3 per cent to 4 per cent was the ordinary case of people moving to new jobs. Youth unemployment was low. Inflation was 4.2 per cent. The bank rate was 7.5 per cent. Government spending totalled about $12 billion compared to financial requirements today of over $17 billion. The government deficit was small.

However, at that time we had a solid country. This was an exciting nation. I graduated in 1968. All the young people had jobs to go to. This was truly a dynamic nation. There was the unity of Expo '67. We had a health insurance program and a medicare program that was sound. We had post-secondary education that was expanding. It was really a treat to be part of it. We had old age security, the Canada Pension Plan and a solid private entrepreneurship base that was creating wealth, bringing in technology and developing modern ways to search for oil in the west.

We had a research and development component that was adding new cereals, grains and alfalfas. For example, canola has returned billions of dollars to this country. We had all of that in 1968. We were respected internationally and we were clearly charging ahead.

Then this Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was elected who, by his own admission, is a socialist. The Prime Minister has never denied that. Members on the government side try to deny that, but not once has the Prime Minister. He has always been straight up and honest with Canadians. He honestly believes that a small cabinet and a bureaucracy around it can make decisions that are far wiser than having millions of individual entrepreneurs make those decisions. One need only review his writings at university to find that. He has never denied it. Not once has the Prime Minister denied any of his writings, and nor should he because he has never tried to deceive the Canadian people. He has always told them the situation exactly.

Since that date we have a steady march toward government involvement. That is what socialism is. It is the taking over of the marketplace where millions and millions of decisions are made and reducing it so that the decisions are made by one group. That is a government in power. They have done that by way of Crown corporations. Over the last 14 years the number of Crown corporations has increased by well over 200 so that the total now is over 400 Crown corporations in the country.

One need only look at Bill C-124, the government restraint bill, which lists all of the Crown corporations, all of the regulatory agencies and other agencies that respond to government, to find that the bulk of them came in during the last ten to 14 years. During that period the nation has seen a steady decline in vitality. I do not believe it is an accident that Canada faces the problems it does today. It is the direct result of the centralization of power and the nationalization of decision making in this nation.

At the same time, the tax system has changed dramatically. Under the old system, if a person started a business and incurred an expense in the process, it was automatically deductible against whatever income the business earned. That is not the case today. Today all of the money goes into the centre. We must come to Ottawa with hat in hand and on one knee. The government will decide whether you get a grant. That is a different system from what we had before.

Previously in the oil industry you would bring together a skilled group of engineers and scientists that would do the seismic work. They decided where to drill based on the scientific data. When they drilled they would deduct the cost from the revenue if they found oil. Now they first have to come to Ottawa. Depending on where they are going to drill and depending on their rate of Canadian ownership, they might get a grant that goes from 90 per cent if they drill where the governments wants them to, down to less than 50 per cent if they drill where they decide. We are going to have wells being drilled in areas where the government wants them drilled, not necessarily where the oil is. When you drill a dry hole, which averages about $5 million, that money is gone. There is no recovery from a dry well. The billions of dollars that will be lost to this nation as a result of that process is a tragedy. It makes anyone who knows the oil industry weep.

The ordinary Canadian citizen is always at the end of the whip. No matter how the government tries to say they can pull money out of the air, that money basically comes from Canadian citizens. If you look at the statistics on the amount of money that is put up by citizens, Mr. Speaker, you realize that we truly are back to the days of feudalism and that we are all serfs. A slave is really just someone who is taxed 100 per cent. Therefore, as an economic creature, all of his economic rent goes into the hands of another person who decides how to spend it. The slave has no decision-making powers.

• (1710)

That is what is happening today. If one adds up municipal, provincial and federal taxes, one will find that well over 50 per cent of one's economic rent goes into the hands of other people who decide how it should be spent rather than you. That is the difference between the parties. The Liberal Party, which is clearly with the NDP, very much wants that economic power to come into the centre and then the cabinet will decide how it will be distributed, as compared to our party which would leave it with millions and millions of individual people. We believe that the collective result of millions and millions of decisions is far wiser than one made in the middle.

Then there is the deficit. Clearly, $20 billion is almost intolerable. We then find Bill C-125, which the government wants us to approve, a bill which would let it borrow $11 billion. Just a few days ago I stood up to oppose a previous bill which would have allowed the government to borrow $6 billion. I suppose that in another three months it will be up to another $15 billion, because the government now must go out into the marketplace. Over and above all the billions of dollars it collects from people through income tax and other direct taxes, whether sales taxes or corporate taxes, the government must go out and raise an additional $17 billion. It is no wonder that interest rates are high, because the government needs the money. Therefore it jacks up interest rates. If we did not have the deficit we would not be paying the interest. That is the lesson that people have to learn in their own lives. If one does not get into debt, one does not have to pay the interest.

Where are we? As a result of this administration, we now find, in 1982, that health insurance is in real trouble. We find that the medicare system is failing. We find that post-secondary education is weak and getting weaker when at this time it should be stronger. In terms of the international sphere, never have we more needed trained, high technology people, yet in the last fiscal agreement the federal government cut its contributions.

We are losing indexing of old age security payments. People receiving benefits under the Canada Pension Plan are in real jeopardy because their premiums came into Ottawa, but did Ottawa put that money into a fund which would generate wealth for them? No. It lent the money out to the provinces and at a very low rate of interest, the theory being that when more people were taking out than putting in, the provinces would pay back the loans to the federal government which would then distribute it under the Canada Pension Plan. But seven provinces east of Saskatchewan all have enormous deficits. They took the money, spent it on programs and do not have it now. They are in a deficit position. Therefore, we are in the absurd position that when the pay-out from the Canada Pension Plan is greater than the premium income, the provinces will be called to pay the debt back. Where will they get the money? They will have to increase taxes on the very same people who in earlier years paid their premiums. So they will be doubly taxed. It is incredible but that is the burden the Liberal administration has put on this nation.

Again, in 1982 unemployment affects 1.3 million people. Canada is no longer an exciting, dynamic place for young people to come out to as it was in 1968 when I was graduating along with many other members. There is a real uncertainty among our youth because their unemployment rate is 17.5 per cent nationally. It is over 40 per cent in some specific provinces.

We then get back to the National Energy Program which single-handedly destroyed the most exciting and dynamic industry in the west, one which would have carried this whole nation through these tough times because thousands and thousands of young people were coming from across the country to take jobs in Alberta. Had that Alsands plant gone ahead and had the Cold Lake plant gone ahead, with the petro-chemical upgrading plants they could all have had jobs. Now there are no jobs. Interestingly enough, it is the young people from Ontario and Quebec who are having to go back to their homes and say that they do not have jobs, although there is still enough economic development in Alberta to absorb the Alberta graduates. So ironically it is not hurting the very people whose province the energy program has hurt.

Of course, from a narrow, selfish point of view, Albertans would be entitled to say: "The longer the oil stays in the ground, the better it will be for our children and for our grandchildren". The only reason they were producing that oil in the first place was for the good of the nation, not for any selfish need on their part. Inflation is now at 11.8 per cent. The deficit is at $20 billion. What does that do? Governments operate around balanced budgets. Therefore, in bad times they would go into debt in order to make the capital investments that would make capital available for industry to create jobs and then, in the good times, the tax revenue would flow and they would pay back the debt so that they could go around that zero line. Sometimes there is a deficit in good years; it is paid back and a surplus may even be built up. Then in bad years it goes down. What happens when one gets into a deficit position is that one will always go around the line.

Now the Liberals are going around the line of annual deficits of about $20 billion and a net deficit of about $20 billion and a net deficit of something over $100 billion. The problem is that one is still going around that line, but out of the revenue one must pay interest on that deficit. Therefore, something like 25 per cent or 26 per cent of every revenue dollar is simply servicing the debt. What that does is to concentrate wealth. People who have money in the bank were doing just fine. I have invested my cash. Some people have even sold assets and put the money in the bank because that wealth is concentrating the interest on $100 billion. What that does is create a class society. It simply means that the rich become incredibly rich, the poor have no chance of getting out and the middle class is being eroded from the bottom. It is becoming smaller and smaller. Pretty soon we will be in a situation similar to that found in India and all the other Third World countries where there is either a fascist dictatorship on the top or a socialist-communist dictatorship. There will be incredibly rich people and incredibly poor people. Well, that is not what Canada is all about. If one speaks to ordinary citizens, one finds that that is not what they want; but that is exactly what is happening to this nation and it is happening because of deficits.

I can say to hon. members opposite that the parents of those of us from the west learned that lesson, because during the thirties the province of Alberta had to default on provincial bonds and that was such a humiliation to the people of Alberta at that time that they put in a Social Credit government, and British Columbia very quickly followed. There is a public populist feeling that they will not tolerate government deficits. I come from that milieu, I can see the history of it and I believe that to be correct.

I will be presenting a private member's bill to change the Constitution so that governments cannot take us into deficit positions. For years, the Liberal government has been able to offer programs like this, good programs, but with a low capitalist tax. It says, for example: "Relax; here is the program and your taxes will not change. We will then borrow it all at the same time." First at 10 per cent, then at 15 per cent and then at 20 per cent. Now, over 25 per cent of our revenue services that debt, so we are now getting socialist taxes to meet the socialist programs. But in the meantime people have gone out and bought houses that are too big, they have huge mortgages, they have paid too much for land and they have paid too much for businesses. With the combination of high taxes to meet these programs, they are just falling like flies. There are tens of thousands of bankruptcies in this nation, and that is unnecessary. When a government offers a program, it should be forced to say to the people: "Here is the program, here is the tax. What do you think? Do you want it?" If that were done, people would give their views and governments would not get themselves into such trouble.

• (1720)

It is no accident that we are where we are. It is not the fault of the United States of America; it is not the fault of the European Economic Community; it is not the fault of the Premiers. We are in trouble because the Canadian people elected a Liberal-NDP coalition. They had the right to do that and that is what they did. That coalition is governing with its majority. I am naturally hopeful that in the next election the people will realize that in the long term the nation should not permit a concentration of power. It does not matter to me whether it is a Liberal government, a Conservative government or an NDP government; any time a nation permits the concentration of power into too few hands, there will be trouble. That is exactly what the battle for Parliament was about. Kings had absolute power. The power of those kings is now exercised by the executive—the cabinet—and the cabinet is supposed to be responsible to all of us. That is the part of our form of government which has failed. Because of party discipline, individual government backbenchers have not stood with sufficient vigour against the tendency of the cabinet to concentrate power.

The alternative thesis is that they agree. Perhaps Liberal backbenchers agree with everything the Cabinet has done. Perhaps they agree with the National Energy Program in total. Perhaps they agree with the budget and its deficit. If that is so, the only solution for the Canadian people is to turf them out on an individual basis. I suppose that is exactly the solution.

What is this socialism about which we talk? Some people laugh and hoot, as if socialists were communist in the sense of Brezhnev and his crew. That is not the model of socialism about which I speak. I speak about socialism as the economic system whereby there is public ownership and control of the means of production. That is exactly what has been happening in this country.

I explained earlier the operation of the oil industry and that prior to the National Energy Program entrepreneurs made decisions about where they would drill. Now it is government which decides. It is government and bureaucracy which decide where driling will take place. Bill C-85 is legislation to establish a corporation called Canagrex to promote, facilitate and engage in the export of agriculture and agricultural food products. This legislation is in exactly the same position as the Petroleum Administration Act some years ago when the government decided it wanted to move into the oil industry. This Canagrex legislation will mean the ultimate takeover of food production in this country. When we have powerful government, what happens is that it causes problems, and the solution is not to have less government but more. As we get more problems, we get more government.

It becomes a circle, and ultimately we end up with a country like Russia. The classic example is eastern Europe, where they used to export food but people now stand in food lines. Bureaucrats and politicians in Russia decide that there will be so many million hectares of wheat, so many million hectares of barley, oats and so on. A mechanism has been put into place whereby seed is distributed to farms at the "right time". But they always forget that mother nature plays a hand. Sometimes there are late rains. On July 15 when farmers should be sowing barley, because some bureaucrat has said they should sow wheat, in goes wheat. Farmers at the state farm level know it will freeze off, and it does. Under our system, if it rains here or hails there, the individual farmer can make the instantaneous decision to change his crop. Therefore, we invariably have a huge surplus, which contributes some $6 billion to our trade balance.

To the extent that Canagrex takes decision-making away from individual farmers we will be in trouble, and I have no doubt at all but that Canadians could be standing in food lines too, because when we get beyond the export of cereal grains, Canada is a massive importer of food. It is not at all beyond the realm of possibility that Canadians could be standing in food lines. If there ever is a blockage of that line of trucks coming in from the United States of America, Canadians could be standing in food lines within three days.

Somehow we think we can kick the United States around all the time. We live under its nuclear umbrella, yet we stand up and say we are nuclear free. We forget that we are involved in guidance systems and testing of Cruise missiles. We seem to think we can kick the Americans and still live under their protection. We are going to learn a hard lesson.

The prime vehicle on the road to socialism has been Crown corporations, of which I said there are over 400. In Bill C-124 we can see the details. I explained how we are using the tax system to make us more socialist. Unfortunately, the defect is that socialism simply does not work because the government causes problems and then creates more government to solve them. The classic example I mentioned on an earlier occasion is Petro-Canada. Some years ago it started with $300 million or $400 million. Every year since then it has come back, and the Liberal government has procured hundreds of millions more into it. Direct total investment was some $2 billion cash, but Petro-Canada still was not working so we gave it a 25 per cent back-in provision respecting oil lands in the north. That was not working, so we just outright confiscated 25 per cent of the oil lands from other companies and gave them to Petro-Canada. It is still not working, so now we have the ultimate provision. Every time any citizen drives up to the gas pump, he pays approximately four cents per gallon off the top, which goes to Petro-Canada. Petro-Canada will succeed if it takes every penny out of every Canadian's pocket. It cannot fail because it was created by a political cabinet; it has to succeed. It does not matter whether the cabinet is Liberal, Conservative or NDP; their reputation is at stake, so Petro-Canada will succeed no matter what. As the years go by, we will see more and more money being poured into Petro-Canada, and it simply will not work.

Another way governments hurt people is by reneging on agreements. The classic example is the treatment of federal superannuates by this budget. There are approximately 120,000 retired federal public servants who have average incomes of just over $7,000. The surviving spouses of retired civil servants have average incomes of about $2,100. Those men and women worked 20 or 30 years and paid premiums in order to be entitled to their pensions. That is fair enough; private industry does the same thing. However, federal public servants paid an extra 1 per cent in order to have their pensions indexed. Throughout the course of their lives they gave up an extra 1 per cent of their incomes in order to have protection from inflation in the future.

Mr. Kristiansen: You opposed it.

Mr. Thacker: The most recent budget did away with all that. We have confiscated 1 per cent from our retired federal civil servants. It is just gone. There was no point in their having paid it at all. They might as well have paid just the ordinary premium. One might think a government truly committed to equity and fairness would at least say to federal public servants at this time, "We will not collect the 1 per cent from you", but the government will continue to collect the extra 1 per cent during this two-year restraint period. Alternatively, one might think the government would feel some obligation to pay the 1 per cent back. It could say, "Look folks, we cannot honour our part of the agreement; therefore, we will at least give you back your money". If I sign a contract with somebody who does not perform his part of it, surely I am entitled to damages or at least to get my investment back. The government stopped that. There is no shame on the government benches, Mr. Speaker.

• (1730)

I have examined what happens with other nations because I was interested in the extent of centralization of power and socialism that there has to be before a system breaks down.

We all know that in Poland people have to stand in line to get food. Some people may think that this is because the government took over the farms, but that is not so; over 90 per cent of the farmland in Poland is owned by individuals. The government has taken over all the support services, however, such as the distribution of fertilizer and seeds as well as the processing of crops. So even if ownership of land is left in the hands of individuals, they will still have to stand in food lines if there has been nationalization of the infrastructure of farming. That is what happened in Poland.

We have an example of this in Canada that members of the New Democratic Party should be glad to—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but I have to inform him that his allotted time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. J.-Roland Comtois (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, it is a real pleasure for me to take part in the budget debate this afternoon. I would like to remind my colleagues that in the last few days, all the media have been saying that while the November budget was prepared by public servants, the latest budget was prepared by politicians. That reminds me of a saying that is rather popular in my area: The experts are always right except when things go wrong, and then we call in the politicians. Let me give you an example. In October 1981, I wrote to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) to submit a proposal for a Canadian interest rate policy. I thought he might find it useful in preparing the November budget, but coming from a member and a politician—and since the budget was apparently prepared by public servants—obviously my proposal was not accepted.

It is some consolation to me today that the Minister of Finance probably decided, this time around, to put his hand in, and I see that the budget contains most of my recommendations. This is rather interesting because, at the time, I told him how important the interest rate issue was to Canadians, and I also told him about the uncertainty caused both by inflation and high interest rates, especially for farmers, the housing industry and small and medium-sized businesses. I tried to draft a policy statement, in very simple terms, that would deal with inflation and interest rates while at the same time protecting investor profits. I knew my concept could be further refined but, in any case, the important thing was to propose a truly Canadian policy on interest rates that would apply to very specific areas such as agriculture, housing and small and medium-sized businesses.

I therefore proposed a formula that dealt both with the rate of inflation and investor returns, and I told the minister that interest rates should never be in excess of 75 per cent of the market rate. I submitted a series of tables, and this is all in line with what the minister put into his budget. For instance, with an inflation rate of 3 per cent we have an interest rate of 9 per cent, and an inflation rate of 12 per cent could raise the interest rate to 18 per cent. The minister is proposing more or less the same thing, although with a different formula. And that is why this evening I am very pleased, Mr. Speaker, with this opportunity to inform the House that the June 28 budget meets my expectations, especially in the areas I mentioned.

I should like to go over what the budget means to the average Canadian citizen. I believe that the budget is made for Canadians as a whole. It will help those who most need lower interest rates. Parents who have trouble making both ends meet will receive higher tax credits. Purchasers of new houses will receive a grant. Businesses will pay less to borrow from the banks. Of course, government tax revenues will be reallocated during the next two years to activities that will create jobs and promote investment immediately. This budget aims at restoring confidence, which was on the decline, as everyone agrees, confidence in a future when inflation will be lower and new investments will create the jobs needed. With this budget, the government is taking the lead in a two-year national effort. It wants to join with the other levels of government, businesses and workers to reduce inflation and promote economic recovery.

What are we doing exactly? Instead of letting wage settlements attempt to catch up with inflation, the government has decided to limit salary increases in the public service to 6 per cent this year and 5 per cent next year. What does this mean exactly? It means that the 500,000 people who work for the government and Crown corporations will get a maximum increase of 6 per cent. This will represent a saving of $250 million this year and $550 million next year for allocation to programs designed to stimulate the economy and create much needed jobs. Who will be affected by this initiative? Everyone who works for the government and for most Crown corporations, ministers, Members of Parliament, Senators, deputy ministers and senior public servants, or about 500,000 people.

It is to be hoped that this decision will make provincial and municipal governments reflect on their own approach. Let us hope also that big companies, utility companies and labour unions will consider this suggestion carefully. If all sectors of society could agree voluntarily on a ceiling of 6 per cent, inflation would be reduced and more jobs would be created before long. What is the government trying to achieve in the June 28 budget? First, to tackle high interest rates—the highest priority, of course—at the same time to tackle inflation, to reallocate funds in order to create jobs, to help the housing industry and to introduce tax proposals. These are the five important points to remember. How does the budget tackle high interest rates? In order to promote the housing industry, the purchasers of new homes will receive a $3,000 grant on purchase. This is a positive measure since we know that housing is the prime industry to get the economy moving. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that in my constituency of Terrebonne, contractors used to be able to build from 2,500 to 3,000 new homes a year. Last year, only 400 to 500 homes were built. This year, only a few hundred homes have been built to date. Thanks to this measure and others, it will be possible to boost residential construction without delay, and this will create thousands of jobs and generate economic benefits throughout Canada.

Second, small businesses will be able to secure loans at interest rates 4 percentage points lower than prevailing rates to invest in new plants and equipment. As you can see, Mr. Speaker, this is very much like the proposals I submitted to the minister last year. Farmers will also be able to secure loans at interest rates 4 percentage points lower than prevailing rates to finance new equipment. As for fishermen, they will also be able to secure loans at lower interest rates to finance new equipment.

Another way of fighting high interest rates will be the creation of a new type of indexed term deposit certificate with a competitive interest rate. Income tax will be paid only on that part of interest income that exceeds the inflation rate, and here again I could give examples. If for instance a person bought a $1,000 indexed term deposit certificate with a 16 per cent interest rate while the inflation rate is 11 per cent, his or her interest income would be $160 but he or she would be taxed only on $50, the difference between the inflation rate and the interest rate. Again, it can be seen that these factors are taken into account, as I had suggested.

These new indexed term deposit certificates should attract $3 billion a year that will be available for reduced interest rate loans, through that tax relief, to new home buyers because the big problem for buyers is high interest rate and the unavailability of long-term loans. Currently, this is the real cause of the slump in residential construction. When the proposed plan matures, small businesses, farmers and fishermen will be in a position to borrow some $12 billion to $15 billion a year at reduced interest rates, through that tax relief, to invest in new plants and equipment.

Second, while stimulating employment, residential construction, the expansion of small and medium businesses, farming and fishing, we must try to reduce inflation, and to that end, we have decided to place a 6 per cent ceiling on the indexation of deductions and personal income tax brackets for the 1983 tax year, and of 5 per cent for 1984. In order to set the example for provinces and private industry, the government is putting a limit on pay increases throughout the Civil Service. Mr. Speaker, it is my view that examples will be followed, and hopefully other sectors in this country will follow suit and fight inflation also. Therefore, these specific measures on public servants, salaries, transfer payments and administered prices show that the government is embarking on a two-year fight on inflation. This, in my view, is the message we must put across to our people.

There is also the $1.4 billion funding for direct job creation and other programs. Much criticism is being levelled at the government deficit that will total $19.6 billion. That criticism borders on obsession. If we can reduce our expenditures generally, instead of directly reducing the deficit, let us invest those expenditure reductions into the most dynamic areas. I feel there should be a review every two or three months, following which the most buoyant industries in our economy would receive more assistance in order to stimulate job creation while those which are lagging behind should of necessity receive less. This is the right way, in my view, to promote economic growth efficiently in this country. I believe that the best way to reduce the deficit is to generate higher revenues instead of cutting left and right through our often essential programs, in social services for instance. Therefore let us generate more economic activity, more revenues for the government, and the deficit will reduce itself, without making cuts that are too harsh for most Canadians. We should encourage competition between the most aggressive businessmen in this country. For this reason, I wholeheartedly support direct job-creation programs in some specific sectors. We have allotted, among others, $300 million to existing incentive programs to create employment in private industry. Two hundred million dollars more will be allotted to direct job-creation and $400 million to housing. As I said earlier, this plan can be very quickly and very easily carried out. Mr. Speaker, there are many builders in my area. Last week I met one who told me that in Canada we have all we need. We have concrete, steel, lumber, all kinds of materials and trained labour, nevertheless the construction industry is in trouble. Why is that? The problem is uncertainty, excessively high interest rates, inflation, the investor's reluctance to get involved in development programs and buyers' fear. But I think that the steps included in the budget will succeed in restoring confidence, which is vital to economic recovery.

In addition, $400 million will be earmarked for the reduction of interests charged to small businessmen who are borrowing to make new investments in job creation and $100 million for the reduction of interests charged to farmers who are experiencing financial problems. I feel that it is an excellent measure. Our farmers need those funds to survive the recession.

Housing assistance is divided into five specific points. First, buyers of a new house, the construction of which started before December 31, 1982 will receive a $3,000 grant. Any first buyer of a house is eligible for the $3,000 grant. That is absolutely essential in our program. In addition, the Canada Home Renovation Program has been given an additional $30 million. Once again, such a program can easily be implemented.

To meet the special needs of low-income families, the Non-Profit Housing Assistance will be increased from 25,000 to 27,500 units this year. There will also be more flexibility in the interest-free loans made available under the Canada Assisted Rental Program which has been experiencing some problems; but with more flexibility, I am sure the program will quickly receive a new impetus. Lastly, the Canada Mortgage Renewal Plan is extended to December 31, 1983 and owners who have to pay more than 30 per cent of their gross income on their mortgage as a result of a mortgage renewal after the tabling of the budget will be eligible for a $3,000 grant. They will no longer have to defer their interests to become eligible.

In addition, tax proposals, if implemented, would allow Canadians who invest in a new form of term deposit to pay tax only on that part of the interest that exceeds the rate of inflation. The money could be channelled, at rates from 3 to 6 percentage points lower than prevailing rates, to buyers of new houses as well as to small businesses, farmers and fishermen who invest in new plants and equipment. A new registered investment plan is proposed providing for the purchase of publicly traded common shares of Canadian corporations. Half the capital gains would be taxable each year as in the past, but only to the extent where gains exceeds the rate of inflation.

So, Mr. Speaker, the public is invited to study those proposals and make their comments known as soon as possible. A committee of prominent financiers, accountants and economists has also been set up to look into the feasibility of the various proposals. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that this advisory committee on inflation and the taxation of personal investments is to report at the latest next September 30.

I think we should insist that this committee table its report as soon as possible, on the 15th of August if at all possible, to do away with the uncertainty that will once again exist about this new program during coming weeks. I am sure the committee could meet every day, if need be, for two or three weeks, then report on August 15, so that the government and the Minister of Finance can announce their decisions with regard to the new program that will be implemented.

Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to keep my hon. colleagues any longer. In closing I should like to say that Canadians expected the Minister of Finance to take rather drastic measures. All in all, this budget meets their hopes. I am convinced that if each and every Canadian wants to co-operate by lowering his or her expectations, we can not only get the economy back on track but also reduce our deficit, create thousands of jobs and once again give our fellow-citizens all the services they can rightly expect. In a society such as ours, a society built on sharing, which is what Canada is, to be shared goods must first be generated. I believe the budget sets us on the right track. I am convinced its effects will soon start to be felt and that as early as next September and October, statistics and reports will tell that the budget has achieved its goal allowing the economy to gather steam for a major recovery.

[English]

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the budget we got from the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) last November deepened the recession that this country was experiencing at that time. The budget we got a few days ago from the same Minister of Finance guarantees that we will have a continuing and an even more serious recession to come.

When the minister delivered his budget last November we had 891,000 people unemployed, which represented 7.5 per cent of the labour force. He forecast then that in 1982 we would have 946,000 people or 7.8 per cent of the labour force unemployed. Instead, when he presented his budget a few days ago, we had 1,241,000 people or 10.4 per cent of the labour force unemployed. Members of Parliament know that the figure of 1,241,000 does not reflect accurately the number of unemployed. Members of Parliament know that there are in many parts of this country tens of thousands, indeed, hundreds of thousands of Canadians who have given up looking for work. They have given up looking because in their one-industry towns there simply is no work. we not only have 10.4 per cent of our labour force unemployed but we have almost double that percentage of our young people who are unemployed. A whole generation of young Canadians, the best educated and the best trained that we have ever produced, are being consigned to the scrap heap by the mistaken policies of the government.

When the Minister of Finance delivered his budget last November the cost of living was rising at 12.7 per cent per year. When he delivered his most recent budget, the cost of living was 11.8 per cent and is still rising. Wages are rising by 11.2 per cent. In other words, wages are rising by less than the increase in the cost of living. That situation has been going on for five years. The real income of ordinary Canadians has gone down, yet we are told by the government that the way to stop inflation is to cap by law the wages of public servants. The government hopes that other employers in the public and private sector will follow suit despite the fact that real earnings, the real living standard of ordinary Canadians, has gone down in recent years rather than up. To blame ordinary Canadians for inflation is patent nonsense.

Business bankruptcies were running at 642 a month last November at the time when the Minister of Finance presented his budget. Business bankruptcies are now running at 886 a month. That is an increase of 38 per cent, and it is continuing to increase.

We are told that the deficit which the Minister of Finance estimated would be $10 billion last November is now estimated to be $19 million. We should ask ourselves, and the minister should ask himself, why the deficit has almost doubled in a period of just a few months. The reasons are not very difficult to find. It is not because of poor management, although there is poor management according to members of the official opposition. The deficit is up because of the recession we are in, because of the 1.25 million people who are unemployed, who by virtue of not working are not paying income tax and are not purchasing the goods and services which they need and on which they would be paying sales tax. Companies are not making profits, therefore they are not paying the amount of corporation tax they used to pay. Government revenues are way down. At the same time that government revenues are way down, expenditures are rising. Of course, they are rising because if you have more people unemployed than ever before unemployment insurance benefits will escalate. Unemployment insurance benefits are up over 40 per cent, I believe, over last year. When the unemployed run out of unemployment insurance benefits they go on welfare, and costs to the federal government, the provinces and municipalities go up. Of course, the deficit is up.

I predict that in the fall we will get another borrowing bill which will be even bigger than the one we are going to have to deal with in the next week or so. Last November when the Minister of Finance presented his then budget, manufacturing capacity utilization was running at over 73 per cent. In other words, Canadian plants were running at over 73 per cent of their ability to produce. When the minister presented his budget a few days ago plant capacity was running at less than 70 per cent. Obviously, when plants are running at less than 70 per cent capacity what is needed to get them working at a higher capacity and what is needed to get Canadians back to work is to increase the purchasing power of Canadians. If the people had more purchasing power they could buy the goods and services they need produced by other Canadians. As a result there would be a reduction in the number of people unemployed. But instead of following policies which would increase the ability of Canadians to buy the goods and services we can produce, ordinary Canadians get a tax increase. The partial deindexation of income tax would take $1.3 billion, that is $1,300 million, out of the pockets of Canadians. If you add wage controls in the public sector, about which I will speak later, and the partial deindexation of family allowances and pensions, you add another $1.3 billion which the government proposes to take out of the pockets of Canadians in the next 20 months.

That is the wrong policy to follow if we want to get people back to work.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At 6 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, in the few moments in which I spoke before the supper break I made the point that as a result of the deindexing of income taxes, of the capping of the indexation of pensions and of the restraint put on public service wages and salaries, Canadians will have a reduction in their take-home income in the next two years of $2.6 billion. However, not all Canadians will suffer as a result of the last two budgets brought forward by the present Minister of Finance. The people at the top will pay substantially less in income tax than they paid before last November's budget because of the sharp reduction in their marginal tax rate which the Minister of Finance put into effect; it was reduced from over 60 per cent to 50 per cent.

According to this week's edition of The Financial Post, a taxpayer with a wife and two children and a taxable income of $20,000 would have paid, before last November's budget, $2,502 in income tax. After the November budget and after the budget of a few days ago, he will have to pay $2,434, a reduction of less than $100. Before last November's budget, the taxpayer with a $200,000 income would have paid $98,000 in income tax. After the November budget that tax would have been reduced to $87,276. After this last budget it was increased to $87,860. Therefore, the taxpayer with an income of $200,000 received a reduction of over $10,000. That is typical of the Liberals, "To those who have shall be given".

I would like to make a few remarks about what the government is doing to our old age pensioners. I say this with great regret because we in our party had great respect for the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin). We applauded the speeches she made all across Canada when she talked about the tens of thousands of pensioners, particularly women pensioners, who are living on old age pensions and GIS. She pointed out that many of them live in poverty. Now she has caved in and given up the fight. She has agreed to the disastrous decision of the Minister of Finance.

We should study what will happen to our pensioners and consider for a few moments the history of pensions in Canada. It has taken generations to develop pension plans. I believe our first pension plans began in 1926. It has taken all these years to lay the foundation for a pension system which would permit our retired people to live in some dignity and comfort. In 1926 we started with a pension of $20 a month for people 70 years old. In order to receive that pension they had to pass a means test. Gradually over the years the age for pension eligibility was reduced.

A few years ago indexing was introduced. I know that our Conservative friends did not like indexing and thought it was detrimental. But where would our pensioners be now if indexing was not implemented during what the Conservatives felt was the terrible minority Parliament of 1972 and 1973? At the present time, pensioners who receive old age security benefits receive $239 a month. Until the capping of indexation in last week's budget they were receiving the full indexation. The cost of living will rise by more than 11 per cent this year. The government has indicated that old age pensioners will receive an increase of only 6 per cent in the coming year, regardless of what rise occurs in the cost of living, and they will receive 5 per cent the following year, regardless of how much the cost of living will go up for that year. If the quarterly increases in 1983 for old age pensioners with full indexation was worked out at an annual rate of 10 per cent—we must remember that we have inflation of 11.5 per cent—rather than cap it at 6 per cent, at which it is now, the loss will be $77 in the next year, rather than the $55 the minister is talking about. But in the second year, with a 5 per cent ceiling on old age security payments, the real loss will be $218. Therefore, over the next two years, old age security pensioners will lose approximately $300, or $12 a month.

However, this is not the most serious effect. The fact is that if full indexing starts two years from now—one must ask oneself if we will ever see full indexing again once it has been taken away—but if full indexing starts in 1984, it will start at the lower amount. The pensioners will never catch up to what they would have received if indexation had not been capped as is proposed by the minister.

If we had the actuaries calculate the loss to pensioners over their whole lives—as I say, they will never make up that $300 which is to be taken away from them by the government in the next two years—I have been told that over the whole of their lives they will be shortchanged by several billion dollars. In view of the views which the Minister of National Health and Welfare has expressed so frequently, she should never have accepted this. I suggest that she should have resigned rather than accept it.

The government has put a 6 per cent limit on increases permitted to public servants in the coming year. The government implies that they will not lose too much because the cost of living will be brought down to 6 per cent. There is no evidence that can be given by the government that the 11 per cent cost of living today can be reduced to 6 per cent. The government cannot reduce the cost of living because it continues to follow the monetarist policy of high interest, anti-intervention, anti-full employment and anti-demand and management policies which have been endorsed by this government for many years and unfortunately endorsed by the short-lived Conservative government. That government kept following the same course. It retained the same head of the Bank of Canada and brought in a deputy minister whose views must be similar to those of the Liberals since he is one of the so-called experts on that team which advises the Minister of Finance.

There will be no substantial decrease in interest rates. The budget does nothing to end the strangulation of the economy which has been caused by high interest rates. This is due to the government's insisting on following the advice of the Bank of Canada in tying our dollar to the American dollar. We must keep in mind that, on the advice of the Governor of the Bank of Canada, the government made desperate efforts to keep the dollar at 85 cents U.S. When that did not work it made strenuous efforts to keep the dollar at 80 cents U.S. Now it is making the same kind of efforts—probably just as futile—to keep the dollar above 75 cents, U.S.

In order to do this, interest rates for Canadians have to be kept high. Therefore, individual Canadians such as farmers, home owners and small-business men now have to pay interest rates at 20 per cent or higher. Farmers, businessmen and home owners have repeatedly told the government and other members when they appeared before the finance committee which was looking into bank profits that they cannot live with interest rates which are 20 per cent or more.

Bankruptcies are at an all time high. Farmers are going out of production. Home construction is now at an all-time low. There are less than 120,000 units per year being built. This is half of the number of units being built a few years ago.

Given the interest rates which we have today there can be little, if any, reduction in the cost of living. How can interest rates be lowered and how can people be encouraged to invest in productive ways when they can do so much better by simply depositing their money in the bank or purchasing Canada Savings Bonds? Although many companies need to be modernized, expanded or computerized, what Canadian who has some savings will invest his money in the stocks of some company or buy long-term bonds when he can get 14 per cent or 15 per cent from term deposits? A year ago Canadians were able to get 19.5 per cent interest on Canada savings bonds. The result is that investment in Canadian companies has dried up. We now see Canadian companies which used to be able to sell shares or long term bonds being forced to go to the banks to borrow hundreds of millions of dollars, indeed billions of dollars, from the bank on short-term loans.

A couple of weeks ago The Financial Post listed approximately 15 of the largest companies in Canada which are paying anywhere from 75 per cent to 150 per cent of their entire cash flow in interest payments. Those companies are hanging on for dear life. Many of those companies would now be bankrupt if it were not for the banks carrying them.

Let me give hon. members another reason that it is ridiculous to talk about bringing the rate of inflation down to 6 per cent. The government said that it could not honour the contracts which it had signed with its employees in good faith, which gave the employees more than 6 per cent in wage and salary increases. It must bring in special legislation to restrict wage and salary increases to 6 per cent in the coming year and to 5 per cent the next, but the Government of Canada made an agreement with the producing provinces about the price of oil. On July 1, a few days ago, the price of a barrel of oil went up $2.25. On January 1 of 1983 it will go up $4 a barrel, and on July 1, 1983 it will go up another $4 a barrel. That is $10.25 in one year. Every increase of a dollar in the price of a barrel of oil adds half a percentage point to the cost of living. So, when we are speaking of a $10 increase in the price of a barrel of oil, we are looking at a 5 per cent increase in the cost of living in the next year, just because of the increased cost of energy. When the leader of our party suggested to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) that he should go to the producing provinces and ask them to give up some or all of that price increase to help keep the cost of living from rising, the Prime Minister said, "We have an agreement. We cannot vary it". So it obviously depends upon whom one has the agreement with. An agreement with our employees can be ignored, can be overruled, however, can that be done with an agreement with the producing provinces or the oil companies? It cannot be done.

Let us look for a moment at the limits put on the salaries of public servants. The government will limit them to 6 per cent in the coming year and to 5 per cent in the following year. As I have said, the cost of living will go up much more than 6 per cent. I have a friend who likes to do some modest wagering, and he has asked me to ask Liberal Members of Parliament who really believe the government will get the rate of inflation down to 6 per cent to contact me. He will cover all the money they would like to bet that the cost of living will come down by that amount. But let us look at what 6 per cent limit means. For the civil servant who is making $90,000, of whom there are some, it means an increase of between $5,000 and $6,000, but for the hundreds of thousands who make between $11,000 and $12,000 it means an increase limited to between $600 and $700. That is the Liberal idea of equity.

We are told that this budget will help create new jobs. Keep in mind that we have over 1.25 million unemployed. So what does the government propose in the way of job creation? It will give a $3,000 grant to purchasers of new homes under certain conditions, but it has put a limit of $300 million on the amount of money allocated for that purpose. The government itself estimates that this will provide 50,000 jobs in two years; in other words, 25,000 jobs will be created in each of the two years. The $3,000 grant can, of course, be passed along in the form of higher prices, and we have already seen some evidence that that is happening.

The problem of the prospective home purchasers is not, and has never really been, his inability to make the downpayment. The problem of the home purchaser is that he cannot afford the monthly mortgage payments with the present interest rates of 20 per cent or more. Therefore, the incomes of 90 per cent of Canadians are below what is necessary to be able to afford a house. We have the home renovation plan to which $30 million has been allocated. Again, it is hoped that it will create 10,000 jobs in the next two years.

Mr. Deans: Not a chance.

Mr. Orlikow: Then we have the Canada mortgage renewal plan which makes it possible for people who formerly qualified only for interest deferrals to get grants now of up to $3,000 or whatever is required to keep their mortgage payments at 30 per cent of their gross income. That will not help much because only $25 million to $50 million has been allocated to the program. When that money runs out, they will be back in the same box they were before, as they will not be able to afford the monthly payments. Then, of course, we heard the announcement by the minister in charge of housing that we will have 2,500 more non-profit or co-operative housing units. That will not meet the need in one of the big cities in Canada, let alone all across the country. All together, if all these housing proposals work, and that is very doubtful, we will provide 57,000 jobs in the next year and 61,000 in the following year.

What are the other job-creation programs proposed by the government? The Canada community development projects have been allocated $200 million, which will provide 23,000 jobs this year and 23,000 jobs next year. Then $300 million is supposedly to be allocated for economic development initiatives. We have heard this song before.

Let us look at one which is supposed to be a jewel in the government's arsenal, the ILAP program, announced a year and a half ago, to which $350 million was allocated. It was set up supposedly to help those communities devastated by layoffs and initiate economic resurgence. In a year and a half, less than 10 per cent of the $350 million allocated to this program has been used and only 10 per cent of the workers in some of the designated communities, which were supposed to benefit from the adjustment measures, are eligible.

Let us look at the total package the government is proposing. All of its programs together will provide 80,000 jobs this year and 84,500 jobs next year. That comes at a time when we have more than 1.25 million unemployed. What we need are real programs to put people back to work, not temporary jobs. We have 165,000 unemployed construction workers, sitting at home drawing unemployment insurance, when they want to be out working. We need a real housing program. We need to set ourselves the objective of doubling the number of houses we are building right now and building 225,000 homes in the next year. But to do this, the government would have to allocate the money or tell the banks to set aside from their investment portfolios the money required, the $2 billion required for this kind of program, at interest rates which the Canadian people can afford to pay, and that is not 20 per cent plus.

The government and the experts have spoken about the tremendous increase in our exports: 50 per cent more wheat, 100 per cent more potash and 350 per cent more coal. Our transportation system barely meets its present shipments. We need to modernize the system. We need to double track, a promise the Prime Minister has forgotten. We need to bring the signal system into the twentieth century. We will not be able to achieve those objectives we discussed because our transportation system cannot do it. We need to start now, but the railways, instead of hiring new people and buying new equipment, have major lay-offs. The government needs to be serious. It needs to deal with unemployment as the first objective on which it will go to work. It needs to stop conning the Canadian people that this program or any other program it has enunciated will really bring down the cost of living. That will not happen, and I think hon. members on the government side know it; but, of course, they cannot afford to admit it because they cannot take the political consequences. Therefore, we say to the government, be serious. Do the things which need to be done. The people in this country want to work. We have the manpower and the natural resources. We can put the people of Canada to work at meaningful jobs if we have the desire.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Ottawa Centre.

Mr. Blaikie: Just turn off the mike!

• (2030)

Mr. John Evans (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a contribution to this debate on the budget, if the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie) would pipe down. I will get to him in a minute.

I would like to talk about the budget, the thrust of the budget, what it does, what we are attempting to do with it and why I think it is the appropriate budget for the times, one that will set us on the track back to recovery.

The budget was intended to do a number of things. First, it was intended to intensify the anti-inflation fight. I just heard the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) say that we should effectively forget all other economic goals except unemployment. That just will not work. How are you going to get unemployment down? You will not beat the unemployment problem if you give up on the fight against inflation.

The hon. member talked about investment. He said that we need to have more investment. Why in the world would any Canadian invest money in this country with the kind of uncertainty that would be facing us if we allowed inflation to run to 20 per cent or 30 per cent? Countries that have followed a strategy such as the one outlined by that hon. member for Winnipeg North have reaped the whirlwind. They have had declining investment, declining growth and a declining standard of living. That policy is a bankrupt policy by a bankrupt party.

The budget was intended to intensify the fight against inflation, to bring inflation down to 6 per cent, to give a positive target as to where this government believes we can bring inflation over the next year. I think we can do it, but it will take the co-operation of all parties in our economic system. The government put forward a program that shows the leadership from the government sector. We are asking the provincial governments, the provincial public sectors, to join with us.

The federal government has put forward a program. Federal public servants, federal Crown corporations, federal regulated agencies as well as parliamentarians and senators will participate in that program. We are asking the provinces and municipalities to join with us. The public sector can show leadership. The people of Canada want leadership. They want to see action. This government has put forward a program which indicates that leadership. We are intensifying the fight against inflation. We are bringing forward more meaningful policies.

The second purpose of the budget is to try to restore some confidence, to put forward some programs that will lead to enhanced savings and investment in this country. If we are going to have increased productivity and an increased standard of living, we need to have increased investment. In order to have increased investment, we need increased savings.

There have been some innovative and creative proposals put forward that will be dealt with early in the fall when the House reconvenes and the committee reports back with regard to those programs for indexation of certain investment incomes.

Those are innovative ideas that are being well received by the investment community. The community indicates that when implemented, they will have a high chance of success. In addition, we have a program of restraint, a program to try to improve the investment climate so that we will have growth and development.

At the same time we have programs that were brought forward in the budget for specific assistance to those in greatest need. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in the Speech from the Throne in 1980 indicated that one of the prime motivating forces underlying this government's policy would be to provide aid and assistance to those in greatest need. We are running a very large deficit. There can be no doubt about that. I will come to a more complete discussion of the deficit shortly.

With that situation facing us and the very real need for assistance to those suffering the greatest losses during this period of recession, moneys had to be freed elsewhere. That is the reason for the restraint program in the public sector. That is the reason for freeing funds from sources available to us in order to provide assistance.

That assistance is being provided by some $450 million in direct employment programs and $300 million in economic development assistance. The hon. member for Winnipeg North talked about the area of housing. I gained the impression that he thought these programs are frivolous. Last night the housing industry indicated that the housing package put forward in this budget will create upward of 65,000 new homes in Canada this year alone.

On the average, for every home built two to two and a half man-years of employment are created. Therefore, if you build 65,000 new homes, you create 130,000 to 150,000 jobs. Those are jobs in the area of home building. The housing industry, which will have to take the risks in building those new houses, has assessed those programs as being effective, having great potential for success, saying they will stimulate home building, home purchases by first-time buyers and the real estate and building sectors.

The other major area of assistance is the interest rate assistance, an increase of some $400 million to small businesses and some $200 million increase for farmers. Those are the basic areas to intensify the anti-inflation fight through pay restraints, changes to the indexing system and restrictions for the areas of administered pricing that fall within federal jurisdiction, through the program of restraint, 6 per cent restraint next year, and 5 per cent the year after. Through that program funds will be freed to be used to help those in greatest need in this country.

That is the Liberal tradition of sharing. That is the principle by which this government operates.

Mr. Blaikie: You share with yourselves.

Mr. Evans: The hon. member says we share with ourselves. Sharing has been traditional in this country. Canadians have shared in times of difficulty. We are in a difficult period. The government is saying that if we share, the burden can be spread broadly. No one will have to give up much. As the burden is spread broadly, it will ensure that no individual suffers extreme damage during this period.

We heard a great deal of discussion about the deficit. We should look at what the increase is in the deficit and how it was caused. Is it, as some members opposite have said, an increase in government expenditure, an increase in program expenditures, a permanent increase in the level of the federal deficit? I will answer unequivocally, no, it is not.

Successive governments in the past have put in place programs to protect those in greatest need of assistance. From the forties to the fifties to the sixties, with the great depression in their memories, they have put in place programs so that when times are tough, those who are hardest hit by the economic downturns are cushioned. Liberal and Conservative governments of the sixties—primarily Liberal governments—put in place programs to ensure that there would be a social safety net under Canadians. That is the source of the increase in the deficit. When we go into an economic downturn, these automatic stabilizers, as they are called—expenditures for unemployment insurance, for social assistance, for the Canada Assistance Plan and expenses of that kind—increase automatically because more people are out of work. Those expenditures indeed increase. At the same time as the economy goes into a recession the revenues of the government drop. Tax revenues drop because profits go down. Fewer people are working and, as a result, tax revenues fall.

Let us look at those factors alone. The budget deficit in the 1981 budget was forecast to be $10.5 billion and the financial requirements were to be $6.6 billion. We have heard that the government is a terrible forecaster. I defy anyone in this House to bring forward a forecast made in October or November of 1981 which shows numbers different from those forecast by the Department of Finance at that time. There were none because no one, not in this country or in any other country, had any notion that the western economic world would go into the deep and prolonged recession we have gone into. The numbers were $10.5 billion for the deficit and $6.6 billion for financial requirements.

Let us look at what happened to revenues. Revenues declined because of the recession. Expenditures increased because of the automatic stabilizers, which transferred money to people in greatest need. The deficit is up to $19.6 billion because tax revenues have been reduced by $6.5 billion as a direct result of the recession. Because of automatic stabilizers expenditures have increased $2.5 billion. If we put those together, we find the explanation for the difference between the deficit forecast in November and the deficit we forecast for this year. It is not a matter of an increase in permanent program expenditures which would cause a permanent increase in the deficit. Indeed, if we do not consider interest payments on the debt as a part of this, we find that program expenditures by this government are forecast to increase this year by 10.7 per cent, which is less than the current rate of inflation. That has been the case in the past. Program expenditures over which government have direct control have increased by less than the rate of inflation over the last three or four years. There has indeed been restraint. However, as a result of rapidly rising interest rates, because of the automatic stabilizers and as a result of the decline in output and productivity—and therefore tax revenue—we have had what I would call—and I think I am correct in this—a temporary increase in the deficit during this period of recession. As we come out of this period of recession and go back to a period of restored growth, tax revenues will flow back in, people will be going back to work, payments by the Unemployment Insurance Commission will decline automatic stabilizer payments will diminish, revenues will increase and the temporary increase in the deficit will be eliminated.

I contrast this with the situation in the United States, because it is different. The United States deficit is not a temporary deficit. It is a forecast deficit which will increase year after year. We are talking about perhaps $145 billion this year and perhaps $200 billion the year after. That deficit is the direct result of increases in program expenditures by the Reagan administration and especially increases in defence expenditures and direct tax cuts. Those two programs will mean that the deficit in the United States will be a chronic deficit. It will not disappear as the U.S. economy comes out of recession. Indeed, it will continue to grow.

There is a very large difference between the deficit situation in Canada and that in the United States. One is an increase in the deficit caused by increases in permanent program expenditures—structural changes in the expenditure patterns of the government—and the Canadian situation is a temporary increase in the deficit caused by a reduction in revenues due to the recession and increases in automatic stabilizer payments caused, again, by the recession. That is the difference.

We are very concerned about our deficit. There is no way anyone could be anything but concerned about the deficit, unless he was a New Democrat. New Democrats really do not care at all about deficits. We have to be concerned, but I think we also have to understand what we are talking about. We must understand the nature of our deficit and why our country can handle it. We must understand why our capital markets can handle the kind of deficit situation we are facing.

I would like to talk about the restraint program because it is a very important aspect of the policy of the government. It is especially important to the people in my riding. There are two aspects of the restraint program. The first is the restraint of wages and salaries of public servants, Members of Parliament and Crown corporation employees as well as the control of administered prices to the levels of 6 per cent and 5 per cent. I support that. There is another aspect of the program, and that is deindexation. I support certain elements of that deindexation as well, but there is one element of deindexation about which I have serious questions. I intend to pursue those questions. I know you intend to pursue them as well, Mr. Speaker. The element to which I refer is the element of deindexation of public service superannuation. The reason I have questions about that is that contractual payments are made to individuals who made contributions during their working lives to fund indexation. If it could be shown that the fund which has been built up by public servants to fund the indexation of their pensions is inadequate or insufficient, then I could see justification for saying, "Yes, restraint". I have not seen that evidence. I have not seen anyone put forward evidence or indicate to me that there is evidence which indicates that the funding of that indexation program is inadequate. I will have to see that evidence before I can support this particular element of the deindexation program. If public servants in our ridings, Mr. Speaker, and all across the country made contributions to that fund which are adequate to cover the indexation of their superannuation payments, then I do not think that should be part of the restraint program.

I do support the over-all restraint program, but I put forward the caveat that I do intend to pursue that one element of the program.

Mr. Blaikie: The one that affects your riding.

Mr. Evans: I think the government had to show leadership. Public servants, ourselves and employees of Crown corporations are all employees of the people. We work for the taxpayer, and if the taxpayer is suffering under an increasing burden and if the taxpayer is suffering as a result of the recession, it certainly seems to me to be fair and equitable that the employees of those taxpayers should be willing to share some of that burden. The request is not for a large sharing. We are not saying jobs will be eliminated or that people will be thrown out onto the streets. Indeed, there is job security in the public service. Instead of full indexation of the salaries of public servants, Members of Parliament and Crown corporation employees, we are saying there will be increases, but the increase in the first year will be limited to 6 per cent and in the second year to 5 per cent. After all, if we are successful and bring inflation down to 6 per cent, there will be no suffering by anyone as a result of that program. Even if we do not succeed in bringing inflation down to 6 per cent, I think it is only fair that those of us who work for the people of this country share the burden they carry. It is only fair, when 1.2 million people in the private sector are unemployed, that those of us in the public sector paid by the private sector, share, and that we free money to put those people back to gainful employment.

I find nothing wrong with asking that the public sector, the employees of the people, share the burden. I think it is totally sensible, equitable and honest for the public sector at the federal, provincial and municipal level to share the burden carried by the private sector. I think it is fair and equitable and I support that request.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): You would!

Mr. Evans: I hear the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) indicating that this is a terrible thing. It was not this government that proposed to cut 60,000 jobs from the public service; it was the government of the party opposite that proposed to cut 20,000 jobs a year. It was not a matter of asking for restraint in wage demands with job security; it was a matter of eliminating 60,000 jobs. One out of every five jobs in the federal public service would have gone. Today it is not just a matter of restraint, it is not a matter of having a job at all. The hypocrisy of hon. members opposite is totally incredible, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Would the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans) accept a question?

Mr. Evans: I will when I complete my remarks, Mr. Speaker.

I think that the program must be national in scope. The Prime Minister made an extremely important point in question period just the other day and—and I am not talking out of place here—in caucus as well. He indicated that we are going to try to achieve that national restraint in a Liberal way; that is, voluntarily. We will show leadership at the federal level and we will ask for restraint in the private sector.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Evans: Now members of the NDP are getting up on their hind legs. They talk about restraint in the private sector, restraint on business firms, restraint on bank profits and restraint on private sector profits, but what about restraint on union demands? We do not hear about that. We hear about restraint on everything else but not on union demands because the CLC funds the NDP.

An hon. Member: You are showing your true colours now.

Mr. Evans: I think we must have restraint at all levels; the public sector and the private sector.

Mr. Blaikie: You are union bashing now.

Mr. Evans: That is not union bashing. That is not what I am saying at all. Restraint is being imposed on all parts of the private sector. Just tonight we heard that corporate profits declined by 44 per cent in the first quarter of this year and by 51 per cent over the last year. That is restraint. That is imposing a burden on the private sector. We have heard that time and time again.

Mr. Blaikie: Is that voluntary?

Mr. Evans: White collar workers and management are taking 10 and 15 per cent cuts in their salaries.

Mr. Blaikie: Is that voluntary?

Mr. Evans: Yes, they are voluntary cuts in salaries. I wonder if there was restraint in the demands made by Mr. McDermott and his colleagues in the union leadership when the INCO workers were put out of jobs? I did not hear about any restraint there. I think it is important that we look at the situation in the labour market if Canada is to restore prosperity and growth. If we are to have an increase in employment—

Mr. Blaikie: You guys would have to resign.

Mr. Evans: —we must have restraint in wage demands because they impose costs on business firms that cannot be passed on. As a result, profits are down by 44 per cent in the first quarter of this year and 51 per cent over last year. That corporate profit burden must be shared by owners and workers alike if this country is to see renewed growth, an increase in productivity and an increase in the number of jobs.

It is fine for workers or for leaders of the union movement to say that they will not give concessions. As they are saying that, the membership of their unions is becoming smaller and smaller. The people on the edges are being thrown out of work. Does that sound fair and equitable? It is not in the interests of the workers.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words about the prices charged by regulated industries. We have a regulated sector in this country. Bell Canada, for instance, is asking for a rather substantial increase in rates; Consumers Gas is asking for a rather substantial increase in rates, and so is Ontario Hydro. I do not think that can be allowed. Firms in the private sector are facing a decline in demand for their goods and thus, a massive decline in profitability. They are unable to raise prices and indeed, in some cases, prices have been falling. But in the regulated sector prices have been increasing in the last two years by about 18 per cent per year when inflation was running at 11 or 12 per cent. That means that the private sector price increases were going up far less than 12 per cent. That is not fair, Mr. Speaker. The regulated sector has been granted virtual monopolies on various services because they are essential in the public interest.

We cannot have one sector of the economy operating on a cost plus basis. No matter what the cost increases are, they go to the CTC or the CRCT and say that costs have increased and therefore they must have an increase in price. That must not occur in the regulated sector because it does not occur in the unregulated sector, the private sector. What is fair for the unregulated sector must be imposed on the regulated sector. The 6 and 5 per cent must be imposed on the regulated sector not only at the federal level but also on the regulated industries at the provincial level. They must operate under the same conditions as the private sector.

It is not fair to ask the unregulated private sector employees to suffer unemployment and suffer bankruptcies when the public sector and the regulated sector go on imposing ever higher costs on the people of the country. We must restrain ourselves.

The government has introduced a program to spread the burden equitably and ensure that all of us share it. By doing so we will bring inflation down and set the stage for renewed economic growth in the country.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a very short question?

Mr. Evans: Certainly, Mr. Speaker. He is harmless.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans) had a couple of children old enough to buy a new home today, would he advise them to buy a new house at present interest rates, even with the grants the government proposes to give?

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, I would advise my children to buy homes because I have great faith in the future of this country. I know we are going to recover and it is going to be a good buy for them.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Grey-Simcoe (Mr. Mitges).

Mr. McDermid: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The time of the hon. member for Ottawa Centre has been exhausted.

An hon. Member: He has exhausted our patience!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Grey-Simcoe.

• (2100)

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to take part in this budget debate. The hon. member who just spoke has shown by the desperate tone of his voice and his delivery that he is not quite sure whether he believes in what he was saying but desperately wants us to believe him. It reminds me of the story, Mr. Speaker, of the church janitor whose job it was to clean up after the minister had finished his sermon and the congregation had left. When the janitor approached the pulpit he came across the minister's sermon notes which the minister had forgotten. He observed that the minister had bracketed a couple of paragraphs and noted this on the side of the page: "Argument weak here. Shout like hell". I believe that is what the hon. member was trying to do to us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mitges: Mr. Speaker, I was under the impression that, because the November budget proved to be such a nonsensical fiasco, this new budget would have indicated that the government did indeed see the error of its ways and consequently would bring forth a budget which would have indeed clearly focused itself on the myriad problems facing all Canadians, that it would come forth with the needed solutions to help negate the anxiety and unemployment in the country, our gloomy economy and, above all, effectively reduce interest rates which are causing such great havoc, untold misery and fear among all Canadians, including the business, agricultural and industrial areas of our country.

This budget, Mr. Speaker, utterly fails to address itself to the real problems facing our country. It shows that the government has learned very little indeed since the November 12 budget. Nothing has been done to bring down the interest rates which are slowly but surely squeezing the life out of our economy and destroying the hopes and dreams of millions of Canadians. How high interest rates will go is anyone's guess. Neither the government nor the Bank of Canada have shown leadership in this regard. As far as I can see they are both floating as badly as our dollar, which is now facing an unprecedented devaluation, and which in turn has dumped Canada from the position of the third highest standard of living to fifteenth. The state of being low man on the totem pole has been exacerbated as well by our very high budget deficit of some $20 billion and our million-plus unemployment.

These are the real causes of our problems, Mr. Speaker, but the government, instead of directly addressing itself to those causes, is content to treat the symptoms with band-aid medication—nothing but short-term band-aid policies—hoping against hope that the economy might, just might have an upswing so that it can be bailed out. Better still, the government hopes that the American economy will improve so that it can snatch at the Americans' coattails like a drowning man going down for the third time, grasping wildly at anything to save himself.

Canadians are being told that this budget is one of restraint. How gullible does this government think Canadians are? How can a government ask for restraint from taxpayers when it refuses to get its own house in order? How can people be expected to show restraint when this budget will increase government spending by some 20 per cent and double the size of the deficit compared to last November? It is quite obvious, Mr. Speaker, that the government does not intend to practise what it preaches. There is no question that Canadians are still in shock over the large deficit. Not only that, the bottom line of the budget indicates quite clearly that the government has totally abdicated responsibility in carrying out its mandate to govern.

The budget, Mr. Speaker, has been described as a flog, a dud, a wet blanket thrown over a dying patient. One businessman put it this way: "We have been holding on by the skin of our teeth waiting for Ottawa to do something, and now this. In another few months it won't matter any more. We will all be done like our over-cooked dinner." There is no question that since 1970 federal governments have borrowed their way to the very brink of disaster, and that the dam on federal spending has finally burst. Government debt as of the 1982-83 fiscal year will amount of $132 billion. Twenty-five per cent of the 1982-83 budget of $78 billion will be needed just to pay interest on the national debt. Behind all this borrowing, there has been an unlimited growth in the size of the government. To be fair, this also reflects the growth of provincial and municipal governments. That is why Canada is mired in the depths of high interest rates and a deep recession. The Bank of Canada's decision to restrict the money supply should have had the effect of bringing interest rates down, but as long as it refuses to reduce the deficit and continues to borrow, we will have high interest rates and high inflation. As long as governments compete with private enterprise for the limited supply of investment capital, there will not be economic renewal.

Massive government borrowing has put tremendous pressure on the money markets, Mr. Speaker, which only increases interest rates. The government's cash requirement this year is over $17 billion, which makes it the largest single competitor for the limited dollars in the money markets. Given this situation, no wonder interest rates are going up and up. The irony is that although this budget will raise an additional $1.3 billion in revenue, none of it will be spent to reduce the deficit. Nothing this government has done has convinced the international money markets that it is serious about reducing the deficit.

The saddest part of the budget, Mr. Speaker, is that the government has singled out those Canadians who are on spouses' allowance, disability pensions and old age pensions to help pay for its mistakes.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Absolutely shameful.

Mr. Mitges: The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) is asking those Canadians who paid their dues, and who now deserve support, to shoulder the burden by deindexing their pensions to 6 per cent. Their pensions are no longer inflation-proof, so their income will now dwindle away. Also distressing is the deindexing of personal income tax, which is nothing short of an under the table tax increase of $1.3 billion. As we all know, by doing this the government is admitting that it has a vested interest in inflation because as incomes increase due to inflation, tax revenues rise. For this reason alone, any attempt to deindex should be condemned outright and withdrawn.

One of the most nagging concerns of the Canadian business world, Mr. Speaker, is the government's apparent indifference to foreign investment. It is doing practically everything it can to discourage foreign investment in our country, investment which is badly needed to reawaken our slumbering economy and get us back on track again. The result is that we are seen by other countries as presenting a schizophrenic image in our negative attitude to foreign investment. The Foreign Investment Review Agency is of great concern to foreign investors. Despite eight years of operation there is still no clear understanding of what is meant by the term "significant benefit to Canada". Foreign investors still do not know what the ground rules of FIRA are. When it was set up it was originally intended that 60 days would be a sufficient period for the examination of a proposal, and that extensions would only be used in extraordinary circumstances. However, at the present time over 50 per cent of applications to FIRA take more than five months before they receive a definite answer. The lack of clarity and the long waiting period, do nothing but create an unhealthy element of uncertainty that distracts foreign investors. The bottom line on Canada's treatment of foreign investment is that we are being perceived as an inhospitable place in which to invest. Such an image once entrenched is not easy to change and would be very harmful to our long-term interests.

I would like to turn for a moment to the Canadian dollar. The breaking of the Canadian dollar to below its 1931 level brought forth the usual government excuse, the strength of the American dollar. The strength of the U.S. dollar is just a convenient whipping boy for the government. The real problem goes much deeper. Canada's inflation rate is higher than the U.S. rate because the government has done practically nothing to reduce its deficits, thereby leading to "counterfeiting" more money each year. Government deficits and out-of-line union demands have eroded our dollar since the 1970s. But now we have a new force to reckon with which threatens to pull our dollar down toward the 70-cent level. Per capita, Canada is among the richest countries in raw materials. There is no question that our economy depends more on raw materials than do those of most other countries. However, the depressed economic situation has caused a slump in prices of many of the commodities we sell abroad. Grain, copper, nickel, and lumber are going at give-away prices. There is no question that years of high living by all governments beyond their means, and intrusions and interference into the free enterprise system on a scale that Canada simply cannot afford are now exacting their toll. They only aggravate the impact of weak commodity prices; no wonder "short sellers", sellers of the Canadian dollar, have a constant field day.

As I mentioned earlier, although this budget has totally failed to address itself to the underlying causes of our problems, it has offered some band-aid remedies which may bring forth some short-term assistance to a few taxpayers, to a few prospective home buyers and to a few farmers and businesses.

I refer to the proposal to subsidize interest rates for farmers over the next two years to 4 per cent below the 16.5 per cent currently offered through the Farm Credit Corporation. Although it may be a case of too litttle too late, it is a start, and for that reason it is welcome. Offering a $3,000 grant to first-time home owners and new home buyers also merits some support. One drawback is that the program is effective only until December 31 of this year. I believe that to help stimulate the housing industry the program should be extended. I hope that this proposal will nevertheless stimulate demand for new homes so that more jobs to build those homes will be created.

Also welcome is the $750 million that has been earmarked for direct job creation. Reducing interest rates by 4 per cent to small businesses is welcome news. The Small Business Development Bond in a new form will, I hope, help out this depressed sector of the economy to a certain extent. It goes without saying, Mr. Speaker, that this aid to farmers, to small businesses, and to home owners should be put into effect as soon as possible. There should be no more delays like the kind we saw over the last seven months since the November budget. Delays only result in more uncertainty, more bankruptcies, more businesses going belly up and more farmers losing their farms and livelihood, so I urge the government to make all haste in getting their programs in place as soon as possible.

The unfortunate part of these programs is that only a small percentage of Canadians, a handful—those who are in desperate need of assistance—will benefit from these programs. The rest will be left to their fate, to sink or swim, caught in this terrible situation through no fault of their own, brought on by forces over which they had no control, and now they have to suffer because of the mistakes of others. They have to suffer because of economic judgment from those advisers who should have known better, governments, the banking community and others whose advice and guidance proved totally wrong and totally inaccurate.

There is no justice when people have to suffer because of the gross mistakes of others. As I have mentioned, the government has borrowed a tremendous amount of money over the last ten years or so. We have seen an unlimited growth in the size of government and in the size of the government payroll. If the federal government does not wind down its own size and get its own house in order, if it does not curb borrowing and leave more disposable income in private hands for investment purposes then, Mr. Speaker, I am very much afraid that this government will be heading for total disaster, dragging all Canadians down with it.

Mr. Douglas Fisher (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this chance to rise to speak and to offer my full support to a very good budget. It is a pleasure for me to take part in this debate tonight because some very notable speeches have been made over the last six days by members from all parties. I would like to extend my congratulations and thanks particularly to my colleagues who have been so helpful in the debate over the last few days.

I believe this is a budget which attacks the worst economic ills that we are currently experiencing in our economy.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): You made them.

Mr. Fisher: This is a budget which attacks inflation, the basis of it all.

An hon. Member: It does?

Mr. Fisher: It reminds us that a 6 per cent world will restore our strength, but the 12 per cent world we are currently experiencing will continue to sap that strength.

Mr. Epp: Who created it?

Mr. Fisher: This is a budget which attacks unemployment, the worst and most direct punishment that we experience from inflation.

Mr. Beatty: You caused it.

Mr. Fisher: This budget offers $500 million right away for short-term job creation. This is a budget that offers interest rate relief.

Mr. Beatty: How does it reduce inflation?

Mr. Fisher: This is a budget which offers almost $900 million for housing, for small business and for farms for short-term interest rate relief.

This is a budget which offers a long-term answer to the horrors and the continued effects of high interest rates.

Mr. Wilson: How?

Mr. Paproski: It is a hoax.

Mr. Fisher: We have a bold new tax proposal in this budget that will help both the lender and the borrower to enjoy security and some reasonable level of interest on his borrowings.

This budget attacks the most basic economic ills that we are currently experiencing. I believe that this is a budget which has been well received across our country.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fisher: People need the 6 per cent target that we have offered them, and they welcome getting it from us. They welcome this leadership.

An hon. Member: What leadership?

Mr. Fisher: People need the new jobs that were created and they welcome the new spending that we have directed into job creation.

Mr. Beatty: They welcome the $20 billion deficit?

Mr. Fisher: People need the interest rate relief now. They support the grants that we are extending to business, to housing and to farmers. People need the long-term hopes that we are extending to our new tax incentives.

Let us take a look at what some of the people have said about the budget since we issued it a week ago. Let us go to the newspapers. For example, the Citizen on June 29 had an article which reads in part:

John Bulloch, head of the 68,000-member Canadian Federation of Independent Business and outspoken critic of the ill-fated November budget, said Finance Minister Allan MacEachen "deserves full marks" for attempting to restrain federal public service wages.

Mr. McDermid: What did he say on the thirtieth?

Mr. Fisher: The article continues:

John Kyle, chairman of the economic policy committee of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce . . . applauded the "signal to the rest of us" contained in the measures designed to hold the line on federal public service wages.

Mr. Epp: Then what did he say?

Mr. Fisher: The same article continued:

But Alasdair McKichan, president of the Retail Council of Canada, said he expected Finance Minister Allan MacEachen's proposals to have an immediate beneficial effect on the level of employment and the Canadian dollar.

"It may also be the turning point in the breaking of the inflation psychology," he said. "My first reaction is that it was a pretty intelligent approach to a very difficult situation. He should get marks for ingenuity."

McKichan said he was particularly impressed by the proposals to partially abandon indexation of benefits.

"This showed the public sector they weren't the only ones getting hit."

Let me turn to the Canadian Press of June 29, as well, to see some of the comments which people have made. Jim Webber, deputy chief economist of the Toronto-Dominion Bank agreed by saying, "MacEachen has made all the right sort of moves". In the same report, Lloyd McGinnis, president of the Winnipeg Chamber of Commerce, said that the imposition of wage restraints on the public sector showed good leadership. He said that the move will provide a realistic position for wage negotiations in the private sector. This is an important piece of information.

Now I should like to turn to what Jack McArthur had to say in The Toronto Star on June 29. He said:

MacEachen is dead right about this: Inflation is the Number One enemy. Not so much because it means that prices rise for consumers as because:

Fast-rising prices result in high interest rates, which kill both economic growth and the new investment that creates it.

Further on in the same article he said:

Fast-inflating costs make us less competitive with producers in nations where costs are going up more slowly.

Also in the same article he said:

Short-term job creation—as promised by the finance minister—is meaningless unless the prices of the goods produced by the workers become attractive in the long run.

This reality is recognized in the MacEachen budget.

He went on to say:

MacEachen's objective of 6 per cent or less in annual inflation is right on.

He concluded the article by noting:

In the end, inflation will write the story. If it can be brought down, other good things will follow. If it can't, even a budget a month won't help.

There are other people across the country who have had things to say about the budget, and I should like to quote them. Turning to the Telegraph Journal of June 30, an article appeared entitled, "Saint John Budget Reaction—Labour Official 'Sickened'; Businessmen 'Optimistic'". In part it read:

Patrick Darrah, president of the Saint John Construction Association . . . and Keith Bowman, a tax consultant with Clarkson Gordon, both said they were gratified to see that the government is setting up an advisory board to consult on a number of economic proposals put forth last night. They said it was a sign the government is listening to what people are saying.

According to the articles, Mr. Bowman said:

Mr. MacEachen "did pretty well almost as much as he could do" considering the confines in which he was working. He said the public sector wage restraint program was good, but would need to filter over into the private sector—

Ronald Anderson wrote in The Globe and Mail under the heading, "Indexed loan plan is urgently needed" about our attack on interest rates. He said:

—Finance Minister Allan MacEachen has put forward one proposal that cuts to the heart of Canada's economic problems.

The single overriding constraint that is throttling the economy is the extraordinarily high level of interest rates.

The answer to this problem is, not to abandon the fight against inflation, and not for Ottawa to seal off the borders to keep money in the country while it orders a reduction in Canadian interest rates. But a practical and rational approach to the issue of high interest rates is offered by Mr. MacEachen's proposal for a system of new financing instruments that would be indexed to the rate of inflation.

He went on to note:

The important point to be noted is that the rising monthly payments under a fully indexed plan would not become more onerous if the borrower's income rises at the rate of inflation.

Finally at the end of the article he said:

The five or six percentage point relief that would come from exempting the illusionary inflation component of interest from taxation might, when it reaches the borrower, be just enough to save some major corporations from bankruptcy.

My last quotation is from The Gazette of Montreal dated June 29, 1982 under the heading, "Housing spokesmen see hope in MacEachen's grants plans". It reads:

The combination of measures in last night's federal budget looked "positive" for the future of the depressed housing industry, says John Sandusky, vice-president of the Housing and Urban Development Association of Canada.

The article continued:

But he said a whole package of measures means "we've got a pretty good shot at renewed activity in our business."

Further on it indicated:

According to MacEachen, all home owners having to spend more than 30 per cent of their gross income as a result of renewals taking place from now on will be eligible for a grant of up to $3,000.

Sandusky said the grant will ease the worry for many home owners whose mortgages come up for renewal soon.

A final comment in the article read:

An official of the Quebec Provincial Home Builders Association predicted "things will move very fast" in the industry following MacEachen's announcement of grants to home buyers.

I think this is a very positive and a very representative sampling of reactions to the budget which we announced a week ago.

Now I should like to take a look at some of the details. Earlier I said that the budget sets out as its basis an attack on inflation. We regard inflation, as we have said regularly to Canadian people, as the basic disease from which our economy is suffering. We have gone after that by providing for Canadian people a measure of leadership by restraining government wage costs to the 6 per cent and the 5 per cent indexing levels. In addition, we have asked Canadians to join in this effort by restraining indexing growth on some of our major costs and some of our programs. Then we can reallocate the funds from those programs into the stimulation of our economy so that other Canadians can have jobs and have relief from the heavy burden of interest rates on their businesses, farms and fishing efforts.

The major stimulation in the second part of the budget is a short-term piece of relief for those people most deeply hit by the impact of inflation, high interest rates and unemployment. Let me look at the way we have reallocated money inside our savings. We put $100 million into farming programs through the Farm Credit Corporation. Small businesses are getting $400 million through the small business investment grant, money which they can use to buy new equipment for research and development and for the all-important expansion we need to get our economy going again.

The housing package is one of the most exciting. Earlier I read a few comments from spokesmen in the housing industry. The renovation plan which was announced a few months ago has been so successful that we have found room to expand it and to double our contribution. We have given more flexibility and more leeway in the Canadian rental supply program so that developers can get involved and build the units which we consider so vital to take pressure off the rental housing market. Current home owners who are suffering under the difficulty of high mortgage costs can now obtain direct grants of $3,000.

Under the Canada mortgage renewal plan, people who spend more than 30 per cent of their gross family income can get the cost of their mortgages written down to a more intelligent and more bearable level. For new home buyers, for people coming into the home buying market in the first place, we are able to give an additional $3,000 grant to write down the cost of interest rates to encourage these people to come out into housing markets. First-time buyers are encouraged to buy older or new homes. Current home owners are asked to go out and buy new homes altogether. This gives us the double benefit of giving relief to Canadians who need the relief and of creating jobs for people who need the jobs.

Mr. McDermid: Nonsense.

Mr. Fisher: One member opposite expresses his admiration for high levels of employment by saying that any job-creation program is nonsense, obviously his high regard for any effort to take pressure off people who need some help.

• (2130)

The final proposal we are attempting to implement along this line is to throw another $3 million into our job-creation program and $200 million into direct job-creation programs. All of this—$1.5 billion of expenditures—is short-term relief for our economy.

We do not pretend that this figure, massive though it is, is a permanent relief for the economy.

Mr. Skelly: Let us go to the polls.

Mr. Fisher: We offer this relief to help Canadians who need that help now. These programs are now available. People can get the application forms. Businesses can receive the money and begin again now. This money is circulated inside the current level of government spending. This is how we have tried to take the sharing about which my colleague, the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans) spoke so eloquently a few moments ago by asking people to share through giving small amounts themselves to create a large amount which we can use for those people who are most in need.

Mr. Paproski: There is nothing left to share.

Mr. Fisher: The hon. member for Edmonton North (Mr. Paproski) says that there is nothing left to share. I would think that $1.5 billion is a lot of money to share. It is a small amount from each individual but it is a large pot.

Mr. Paproski: One big deficit.

Mr. Fisher: The jobs which will be created will indeed be welcomed by the people who obtain them. Small businesses will welcome the grants they receive. The housing which will be created will be welcomed by the people who get it. Farmers who receive relief from interest rates will welcome that. These are measures which the hon. member for Edmonton North believes are not welcomed. He thinks they are indeed insignificant. Perhaps he should go out to the country to talk to some of those people who will benefit.

Once this short-term relief is finished this budget makes a proposal which will help businessmen to index their capital gains in order to stimulate investment in Canadian companies. We see in this budget an exciting new plan which will offer lower interest rates at first to people with mortgages, at first to farmers—

Mr. Huntington: No one can make the payments.

Mr. Fisher: It is a plan that will allow people to lend their money with a great deal of security knowing that they will get a safe return. It will equally give security to those people who need to borrow money. It will help people who need to know how much interest rates will be for the next few years in order to make their long-term plans. They will be able to take advantage of this new proposal in the white paper. That proposal has been very well received indeed by the business community.

What is equally important is that the proposal has been put out for consultation to the business community, a process that has been welcomed in itself. The proposal of a major tax change has been submitted to the business community for the first time for its detailed study and scrutiny so that it may have public imput and allow the public to have a part to play in forming future tax policy. I believe this speaks well of the government and of the deep concern that we have for reform in the tax process as announced in the minister's green paper.

Mr. McDermid: You are stealing that from Bob Stanfield. Be honest!

Mr. Fisher: Let us review what some of our hon. friends in the House have had to say about the budget in the last six days.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fisher: We can hear the enthusiasm they have expressed for it. In my judgment, the debate has taken a strange and false turn. I think it is time for some of us to come back to earth.

Mr. Epp: Right on!

Mr. Fisher: Let us look for a moment at the position taken by our friends on the left.

Mr. Kempling: There is no one further to the left than you.

Mr. Fisher: To my thinking they represent the all or nothing school of thought. Nothing could have illustrated that philosophy more clearly than the position taken by that party yesterday when they were given an opportunity to extend real relief on the UFFI problem.

Some hon. Members: Louder!

Mr. Fisher: They stonewalled. Why did they do that? Because they said that relief was not enough. It was either an all or nothing proposition. If they did not get their way, no home owner or anyone suffering would get any relief. It was not enough, so no one would get help.

Mr. Kempling: Let us go to the people.

Mr. Fisher: That is the situation with this budget as well. They are predicting failure and thereby encouraging everyone to continue this game of all or nothing. They are saying over and over again that no one needs to take 6 per cent because the government will fail.

Mr. Skelly: Because the government has forced it down their throats.

Mr. Fisher: This may be a great bargaining tool during prosperous times. Let us remember, however, that when times are tough and the game is all or nothing, the answer is far too often "nothing".

An hon. Member: Tell that to the oil companies.

Mr. Fisher: The pie today is too small. It is neither compassionate nor sensitive to urge people to take more and more when the real answer will be less and less until it becomes nothing.

With the UFFI issue yesterday, they demonstrated the falsehood of their argument.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fisher: They said they will take nothing unless they have it their way, and they are saying the same thing today when they talk about wage levels and the fight against inflation. They are urging people to go for the moon—

An hon. Member: We want you to go to the moon.

Mr. Fisher: —but instead people are going broke. I would welcome the kind of sanity and good judgment that was reflected by a union leader who is currently under great stress. The president of Inco workers, local 6500 Ron MacDonald who urged rejection of the earlier offer, reluctantly recommended acceptance of the new pact. Why? The answer is in The Globe and Mail issue of July 5, if members want to look it up. It reads:

> 'But after the company announced a four-month production shutdown on June 23, I had to start thinking we weren't hurting them, that maybe it was better to pick another time and another place to take the company on.

That man expressed very clearly and practically that you cannot always go for all or nothing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blaikie: We do not feel that way. We will take you on any time.

Mr. Fisher: That reality is forcing itself on us. I thank that union leader for being much more realistic than my hon. friends here.

This government is not saying all or nothing. We are saying that everyone is in this together. We are saying that from the lowest to the highest pay scale, from the youngest to the oldest, companies and unions, the public sector and private sector, whether it is wages or prices, we are all in this together and we must break the 12 per cent cycle and restore health to our economy.

As a last warning to my all or nothing friends, I am reminded of an example I saw in the Caribbean during the winter where I visited a small country with limited resources. I was at a forestry station which the Canadian government was supporting. I was told that the forestry station was an utter failure that year. I asked why and was told that they were unable to bring the crops in. When I asked why this occurred, I was told that the previous government of just a few months earlier had given their workers a 100 per cent pay raise out of a deep sense of compassion. The government had run out of money and fired half of the workers. That is not compassion, it is not practical but it is a very good example of what happens when you ask for too much from a limited pie. Not only do the workers lose, the whole economy fails. The management and the whole country fails.

Let us now consider the position of the hon. members across from us. If the NDP are offering "all or nothing", then the Conservatives are offering us "divide and conquer". Again, they do it in the name of compassion. Again, they do it by error. One by one, they drag out the groups. One by one, they try to tell us how each group will suffer if they take only 6 per cent. One by one, we are told that the government's plans will not work.

Mr. McDermid: Why do you not move back to your riding?

Mr. Fisher: They say that the government's plans will not work and that inflation will triumph. They are telling us that, one by one, individual groups will fall behind or suffer a crushing extra load, or be left at the side of the road to wither and die. One by one, they are dividing people in our economy. One by one, they are hoping to conquer. They are hoping to conquer because they know that without co-operation the government will fail. They know that if they continue that kind of division, then inflation will indeed continue and will run wild.

• (2140)

However, not everyone in our economy has gone along with them. They have offered their divide and conquer rule on behalf of some senior citizens and some former civil servants. Yet they only have to open the Ottawa Citizen to note the reaction of some of those very people. Let me quote from the Ottawa Citizen of June 30. This is not what I say, this is what the people themselves say. On June 30 page 31 of the Ottawa Citizen, under the title "We are citizens . . . we'll cut back", Mr. George Wagdin, past president of the Senior Citizens' Council of Ottawa, stated:

—I think we all have to share the burden that MacEachen faces.

The article goes on to state:

Bert Hanmer, vice-chairman of the Ottawa-Carleton Council on Aging, is pleased those at the lowest end of the income scale eligible for guaranteed income supplements won't be affected . . .

He feels everyone who can afford to cut back, including seniors, should.

"We're citizens as well as seniors."

Dorothy Milligan, of the Senior Citizens Council and a retired public servant, said the changes may mean she has to give up a few luxuries, but they won't mean hardship.

Milligan said she would have been very concerned about the budget changes had the government not protected the lowest income seniors. But since they've been looked after, "I think the rest of us ought to tighten our belts a little bit and get this thing licked."

We have all or nothing, we have divide and conquer, but this government will not take either course.

Mr. Paproski: We have a big hoax and a big con job over there.

Mr. Fisher: This government is taking a middle of the road course which was best described by the advice given to us in The Financial Post—

Mr. Paproski: It is Karl Marx's socialism over there.

Mr. Fisher: —the very pinnacle of business advice. Let me give some advice from The Financial Post to my hon. friends across the way.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fisher: The Financial Post of July 3, 1982, states:

The opposition, sensing weakness, may go for the jugular and forget that they, too, have a constructive role to play at times of very delicate balance.

The extreme and the implacable, egged on by the excitable in the media and unable to see merit in a middle way, may blindly help precipitate an even deeper crisis for Canada.

There are great risks facing us. And because they are so large, the minister's attempt to make a new start—and to make us all face the realities of the worldwide recession—should be treated seriously and dissected with restraint . . .

In these circumstances, there should be a pause for cool consideration of what is a very wide ranging budget, a thoughtful moment to examine where best interests do in fact lie over the longer term, and exactly how best Canadians can work their way out of the present crunch.

That is important advice for all of us from the July 3 edition of The Financial Post.

We are not asking Canadians to carry a huge burden. We are asking Canadians to contribute a small amount each. Why? It is so that they can share some of that with people in great need, people who need jobs, people who need houses, people whose businesses need some help. Those are the people whom we are anxious to help. If senior citizens and if ordinary people can go along with it, then surely it is not too much to ask that some of our colleagues here in the House go along with it.

I close on this advice, that all of us here should begin, perhaps, to make fewer of the gestures and comments which have been so eloquently directed to me tonight and, instead, we should lift our eyes and see that this country—

Mr. Epp: To the hills.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fisher: —has need of unity and has need of some constructive advice.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fisher: Surely, if we can get the kind of enthusiasm and see the kind of assistance that ordinary retired citizens can give us, it is not too much to ask that all of us in this House, together, seriously consider the problems facing our economy and contribute as much as each of us can to their solution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being 9.45 p.m., it is my duty pursuant to Standing Order 60(8) to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith the question necessary to dispose of the motion now before the House.

[English]

Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question!

Some hon. Members: No!

Mr. Nielsen: On division!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Mr. Nielsen: On division! I rise on a point of order. We are prepared to adopt the measure on division.

Some hon. Members: No, no!

An hon. Member: Record your vote!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

• (2210)

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I do not want to appear as if I do not understand the rules, but I wonder if you might explain to me exactly what is happening at the moment?

Madam Speaker: There was a misunderstanding, apparently, about whether the Speaker would wait beyond the 15-minute bell. There was a misunderstanding as to whether or not it was a 15-minute bell. There was some confusion about the information that was given at the time. However, I am told that the members are now coming to the chamber to vote and I will wait a few minutes more.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Denis Ethier (Glengarry-Prescott-Russell): Madam Speaker, as an official of the chair I might be breaking with long-standing tradition when I ask to be recognized, but I have to dissociate myself from what is happening right now. We have long-standing practices here, and rules of procedure that we all obey. This is a 15-minute bell, and I cannot continue in my responsibilities if members are not going to obey the rules and procedures. Therefore, I am telling my Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the members of my caucus that I cannot serve as an officer of the chair because those members not present do not comport themselves according to the rules and procedures. They are not acting as true representatives of this country. I am very sorry I have to announce that now, but if the vote is not taken now, I am sorry, I cannot put up with that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: I can assure the hon. member that the vote will be taken momentarily.

Some hon. Members: Now.

Madam Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to reconsider his decision. Perhaps he is not aware of what had transpired previously. I was informed just as I occupied the chair, that apparently there was some confusion concerning information given about the length of time the bells could ring. That is why some members are meeting and did not come down at the appropriate time. I will be taking the vote momentarily. I would very much regret the hon. member not wanting to serve again in the capacity in which the Chair has given him full confidence. I would ask him to reconsider his decision in light of what happened just before I occupied the chair.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, if I may, I would like to speak to the matter raised by the hon. member for Glengarry-Prescott-Russell (Mr. Ethier). I hope that, before he gives any finality to what he has indicated to the House today, he would consult very carefully with his seatmate, the Deputy Speaker, with the officers of the Table, with Madam Speaker and with one member in particular from my party, the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens). By doing that he will understand exactly what occurred tonight. I do not want to make any point. Others will argue about it perhaps. But I wanted to say that to my hon. friend who, in the sense of my riding, is almost a neighbour. I hope the hon. member will reconsider the matter.

Mr. Ethier: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the kind words of the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker). I meant what I said before; I do not speak with a forked tongue, and I stand by what I said. When an order of this House is given for a 15-minute bell and members are called to vote, if that order is not going to be obeyed, I cannot be an officer of the chair. I stand by what I said a while ago. I will not be an officer of the chair any further if members do not live by the rules and procedures that were given by them to the Chair. Therefore, I stand by what I said a while ago. Please accept my resignation, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: I would like to think about that, and before I accept the hon. member's resignation I would like to have a chance to discuss the matter with him to make him aware of the facts that preceded this particular circumstance. The question is the following—

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, I simply rise to suggest that the question be put on the assumption that the whips have appeared.

Mr. MacEachen: There is no assumption.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member has the knack of asking the Chair to do precisely what the Chair was doing.

The question is on the main motion.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. MacEachen) which was agreed to on the following division:

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

LABOUR CONDITIONS

INCREASE IN UNEMPLOYMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. A record 1,303,000 Canadians were out of work in June. This represents a rise of 0.7 per cent from the month previous, and is 10.9 per cent of the work force. For the tenth month in a row there was an increase in the number of jobs lost in the country. In one year 435,000 have disappeared, 121,000 of them last month. Ontario was hardest hit with a loss of 50,000 jobs. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson):

That the Prime Minister, whose disastrous economic policies and continued deficit spending have caused this tragic unemployment situation, immediately call a general election so Canadians, including those out of work, can pass judgment on how he is doing his job and whether he should be allowed to keep it. The only people who deserve to be unemployed in this country are the ones who are running it into the ground.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW AGENCY

CALL FOR RELAXATION OF RULES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Scott Fennell (Ontario): Madam Speaker, in view of the current crisis in job losses in Canada, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I move, seconded by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone):

That the government today relax its rules on FIRA and make a positive effort to encourage foreign investment in Canadian industry which in turn will create jobs and alleviate the current unemployment crisis.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

LOSS OF JOBS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Madam Speaker, in light of the loss of 19,000 more jobs in British Columbia, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That this House direct the Minister of Finance to visit British Columbia to experience the unemployment situation personally and to return forthwith to Ottawa to prepare a new budget which will give Canadians some confidence in their government.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EMPLOYMENT

MANPOWER MOBILITY ASSISTANCE PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Unemployed industrial workers in and around the hard hit West Kootenay community of Salmo, B.C., are angry and cannot understand why taxpayers' dollars have been spent to fill scarce local jobs with applicants from across the country. While the company involved has now agreed to hire local people first, this does not change the fact that such government subsidy of cross-country moving costs, shuffling unemployed Canadians from one jobless area to another, is not only wasteful and unproductive but aggravates already strong feelings of regional resentment and anger. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton):

That the House urge the Minister of Employment and Immigration to review immediately the administration of the Manpower mobility assistance program, instruct his officials at the sending end to consult his officials at the receiving end before the fact of approval, and stop playing musical chairs with the livelihoods and tax dollars of Canadians.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

CONSTRUCTION PROJECTS IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The unemployment problem in Atlantic Canada would be helped significantly if the federal government were to accelerate a number of major projects with which there have been avoidable delays and for which money has long ago been budgeted. In Prince Edward Island, for example, the national headquarters for the Department of Veterans Affairs and the new Charlottetown airport terminal building have been stalled through sheer federal inertia. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bruce-Grey (Mr. Gurbin):

• (1110)

That the cabinet establish a special ad hoc committee to identify such projects throughout the Atlantic provinces with an eye to speeding them up to create jobs in the current period of mass unemployment.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CALL FOR EXPANDED RELATIONS WITH LATIN AMERICA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, some of us believe that the continent of South and Central America is at the beginning of an extended growth cycle and that it will be looking increasingly to Canada for expanding trade and technical assistance, and for expanded diplomatic relationships. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Dupras):

That the government give serious study and consideration to expanding Canada's relations with Latin America, and review fully the Canadian government's participation in the Organization of American States.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE ADMINISTRATION

CALL FOR HOLDING OF GENERAL ELECTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Madam Speaker, since the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) came to power in 1968, Liberal economic policies have been to spend massive amounts of taxpayers' money on questionable programs until they achieve the highest annual debt in the history of the country. At the same time they adopted a socialist, left-wing, centralist mentality which allowed for no flexibility in the Foreign Investment Review Agency, and in general they have reflected an attitude that discouraged foreign investment, coupled with the stubborn fixation of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) with his new energy program which has caused the destruction of the oil industry in Canada, moved 60 per cent of our oil rigs out of our country, terminated the progress of two tar sands plants and therefore negatively affected both the energy industry of western Canada and the manufacturing basin of Ontario and Quebec. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Fennell):

That the Liberal government, which is causing massive unemployment throughout Canada, take a sabbatical by calling a federal election so that members of the Liberal Party can learn from first-hand experience what unemployment is all about.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PUBLIC SERVICE

DE-INDEXATION OF PENSIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the government has deindexed public service pensions which have been paid for by public servants through a 1 per cent pay levy, and that the Liberal members for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis), Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier), Hull (Mr. Isabelle), Gatineau (Mr. Cousineau), and Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans), have described this budgetary measure as "unacceptable", I move, seconded by the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy):

That this House calls on the Liberal members I have named to stand by their convictions and join the New Democratic Party in voting against legislation to implement the Liberal Party's 6 per cent dream world.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NORTHERN PIPELINES

DEMAND THAT COMMITTEE COMPLY WITH STANDING ORDERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, whereas Standing Order 65(1)(t) of the House of Commons requires that the Standing Committee on Northern Pipelines study all reports, orders, agreements, regulations, directions and approvals mentioned in Section 12, 13, 14, 15 and 22 of the Northern Pipeline Act and report thereon to Parliament at least three times each session, and whereas during the current session the chairman of the committee has neglected and refused to call a meeting of the said standing committee for that purpose, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Reid):

That this House orders its Standing Committee on Northern Pipelines to comply with Standing Order 65(1)(t).

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FISHERIES

AVAILABILITY OF ASSISTANCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the depressed state of the fishing industry on both the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, involving bankruptcies and unemployment; in view of the urgent need to provide low interest assistance to fishermen and processors; and in view of the confused and inconclusive answers from both the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) regarding the availability of the $400 million budget allocation to fishermen and processors to meet past debts and ongoing operating capital requirements, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

• (1115)

That the House direct the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to publish immediately precise details of what portion of the $400 million budget allocation for small business will be available to fishermen and processors, under what conditions, and to clarify what part of the $400 million will be available through the Small Business Development Bond.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

LABOUR CONDITIONS

INCREASE IN UNEMPLOYMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, in view of the very regrettable absence of the Minister of Finance this morning, I direct my question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. I might say in passing that the Minister of Finance has his priorities mixed up. The unemployment figures this morning are staggering, and he ought to be in the House to listen to questions.

I am sure that the Minister of Employment and Immigration will recall that last January the unemployment rate in this country stood at 8.6 per cent. By April it had climbed to 9 per cent, and by June, last month, it was up to 10.2 per cent. This morning the published figures put the unemployment level in this country at 10.9 per cent.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Crombie: It is the highest in recorded history. We have an increase of 52 per cent in unemployment in Canada in one year. We have 435,000 jobs lost in one year alone, and 62,000 of them in just the last month.

Clearly the government's programs are not working and it has instilled absolutely no confidence that it can manage the economy. What will the Minister of Employment and Immigration do about this situation?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, this morning's figures on unemployment only underline the case that we have been making, that this is a very serious situation in Canada.

Mr. Nowlan: You created it.

Mr. Broadbent: You did create it.

Mr. Axworthy: I wish the members in that corner would take it seriously.

Mr. Deans: We have been trying to get you to do something about it for years.

Mr. Axworthy: It is a serious problem which we must do something about. I want to point out to the hon. member, since he raised the issue, that the Minister of Finance is meeting this morning with a delegation from the labour movement in Canada in an attempt to engage them in part of a co-operative effort and a coalition to come to grips with the economic problems.

The figures this morning show that this is an issue which must be addressed by all Canadians, whether business, labour or in government, in a concerted and co-operative way. It is not a time for fractious dispute. It is time for Canadians to pull together to beat the problem and come to grips with it. It is not the fault or blame of any one group or sector; it is a problem which must be attacked by all Canadians.

IMPLEMENTATION OF JOB-CREATION PROGRAMS

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, I think that probably the most devastating impact shown in the statistics this morning comes in those towns, villages and small cities across the country which have been affected, particularly those one industry towns where unemployment is so great that those communities find themselves worrying about their very survival.

The statistics are worth considering. This morning Kamloops has an unemployment rate of 19.6 per cent. It was 8.9 per cent last year. Prince George has an unemployment level this morning of 17.7 per cent. Last year it was 3.8 per cent. Chicoutimi has a 16.1 per cent unemployment level. Hamilton is 12.3 per cent.

These programs which the minister keeps talking about are not being delivered on the street—real jobs to real people who have real needs. When will the Minister of Employment and Immigration look at those programs and ensure that they are implemented?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I am not sure exactly what the hon. member is talking about.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: That is obvious. It is unemployment.

Mr. Axworthy: The fact of the matter is that in many of those communities that the hon. member has mentioned this government is applying special programs—

An hon. Member: They are not working.

Mr. Axworthy: —dealing with employment development. In this year's budget alone we have doubled the amount of money going into direct employment creation so that we can provide special responses, as we are now providing in over 30 communities.

• (1120)

In my department alone this year, because of the additions in the budget, we are spending over $650 million in direct job-creation programs which will provide employment opportunities for close to 200,000 Canadians. Those programs are directed at the very communities mentioned by the hon. member, those that are hardest hit by lay-offs or by the downturn in the economy.

In Prince George and in Alberni, where the lumber industry has had a serious downturn because of the decline in the international housing market, we are presently implementing special employment programs, and the Canada community development project that we have announced will provide additional resources to those communities to try to provide transition and bridging in what we all admit is a very difficult, very serious and very tragic time for many of these workers.

MINISTER'S ROLE

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, if the minister is wondering what we are talking about this morning, what we are talking about is the fact that unemployment has gone up 52 per cent in one year. Day after day and week after week this minister and this government keep inventing programs out of whole cloth, inventing them from thin air, quoting figures, quoting statistics, and quoting programs that have no reality. These are statistics which are real, and behind those statistics are real people being hurt, and not being helped by the minister's programs. He can quote figures all he likes, but they are not being helped. When will the minister take that department of his and do something with it in order to create jobs for people and, at the same time, help the Minister of Finance gain some confidence among the Canadian people that this government can manage the economy?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is seriously mistaken when he says that these programs are not helping people. Under our work-sharing program, we have averted close to 52,000 lay-offs in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: Over 115,000 workers are involved in that program. We have provided employment for 55,000 students.

Mr. Deans: You kept interest rates too high.

Mr. Axworthy: Under these programs of direct job creation we will provide employment for over 100,000 Canadians right across Canada. So, when the hon. member and the opposition attempt to say that the people are not being helped, they are simply flying in the face of reality. I would say to them that they should get their act together. We just heard from the hon. member for Crowfoot that we should cut the deficit and programs, and now we are hearing from this hon. member who said we should add to them. When will they get their act straight so that Canadians will have a sense that there is a united approach to these programs in Canada and not the kind of flim-flam that we get from members of the opposition?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

THE ECONOMY

INTEREST RATE LEVELS

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, I expected that the Minister of Finance or the Prime Minister would be present in the House today to report on the meeting they held yesterday with the business leaders of the country. These companies with which they met yesterday are the major hope for job creation in the country because they are the ones which create the work for the people who are unemployed today. I understand that at the meeting yesterday the participants presented the government with a very, very pessimistic outlook of more bankruptcies, more lay-offs, no hope at the end of the tunnel, in fact the most pessimistic outlook that has been presented in meetings of this sort with the government.

My question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, in the absence of the Minister of Finance and of the Prime Minister. Since the recent budget has done nothing to turn around the level of confidence of the people who were present at the meeting yesterday, is the government giving any consideration at all to the serious suggestions which were made at the meeting yesterday, in particular the suggestion to reduce the level of interest rates by getting the level of the budget deficit under some degree of control? Interest rates are the most serious problem in the country today.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, the meeting yesterday with business leaders was a very positive one. The chief point coming out of it was the very strong degree of support expressed by business leaders for the new budget and its approach. That was the basic point.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson: I do not think that the minister was at the meeting, because if he had been at the meeting—

Some hon. Members: Were you?

Mr. Wilson: —he would have known. I have been speaking with a number of the gentlemen who were at that meeting and I was specifically told that while they agreed with the 5 per cent and 6 per cent wage restraint, they were very upset over the level of the government deficit.

PROPOSALS MADE BY BUSINESS LEADERS

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I ask the minister a specific question: is the government giving any thought whatsoever to the very serious proposals made at the meeting yesterday to reduce the size of the government deficit so that interest rates can be reduced and so that we can get some level of confidence? Are the political and philosophical obstacles that the government has put in their way the main reason why it is not responding to the serious proposals made by these businessmen yesterday?

• (1125)

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, in the budget, which was strongly supported publicly by a number of the business leaders who went to that meeting, we said that we were concerned about the deficit and that we had rejected advice to allow it to increase. Our basic approach is that, bringing about recovery by the means set out in the budget, we will be on the path to reducing the deficit. That is why we are calling for people in this country to work together to achieve the objectives of the budget. I suggest to my hon. friend he adopt the same positive spirit as those business leaders. If that were the case, we would have a much better result than we are getting now in terms of the response from the opposition to our very constructive budget.

GOVERNMENT APPEAL TO BUSINESS AND LABOUR FOR CO-OPERATION AND CONSENSUS

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. It concerns the very important question of co-operation in Canada right now. Two ministers just referred to the need for that. Yesterday the Prime Minister received support from the business community for a wage control policy, which is hardly surprising because it will increase their profitability. We should not be surprised at that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: I am not criticizing them for that. I am saying it is hardly new. The business community supports a program that will hold down inflation. My question concerns the other side of the economic ledger.

The government has acknowledged that unemployment will remain at the present level for the rest of the year. The government said there will be no legislation that will effectively control prices. Considering that a moral approach asking for co-operation in Canada requires fairness in all sections of the community, is it surprising that total support has not been forthcoming from all sectors? Is it surprising that there is not consensus when there is no fairness?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I would like first to point out to the Leader of the New Democratic Party that the emphasis in those discussions yesterday, as it is in discussions today with leaders of the trade union movement, is on how we can co-operate to deal with the fundamental problem of inflation so that we can bring the inflation rate down and thereby bring interest rates down, stimulate the economy and create jobs. That is the fundamental formula for the co-operation we must establish for all Canadians, to recognize that each sector of the economy must play a part. In some cases it is a restraint on prices and incomes, in others on wages, and in others on the kind of activities that we have in government.

The basic signal put forward in the budget last week is that we in the federal government are trying to lead by example, to show what we can do in our sector, asking public servants to join us in that effort and asking Members of Parliament and members of cabinet to try to regulate prices that are under our control, but we do not want to impose a control system that is legislated. We want one that is based on the consensus and agreement of society, one that does not impose controls.

EFFECT OF JOB-CREATION MEASURES

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, you cannot have consensus and co-operation across this country if you are not prepared to be fair to the vast majority of the people, the ordinary working Canadians. That is clear. The minister talked of the need to do something about inflation. Workers have some concern about prices and some real concern about job security. Will the minister confirm that the job-creating provisions in the budget will, in the coming year, create fewer jobs than we lost in the last four weeks in this country?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, the provisions of the budget, if you look at the incentives established for direct job creation, will add a minimum of 68,000 jobs. Leverage will be established through housing initiatives. HUDAC estimated this will provide over 150,000 jobs in the construction area. The stimulus will come through the economic development portions of the program. This will in itself add up to 300,000 or 400,000 new jobs that we can provide through direct initiatives by this government.

• (1130)

Far more important than that is to establish the basic environment that will provide for the long-term development of permanent jobs. To do that, we must bring the inflation rate down and get the economy in order. The budget's purpose is the basic establishment of that goal to stabilize the economic turbulence that we are in so that we can have a long-term job-creation program that will be equally shared by all Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

GOVERNMENT POLICIES

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, if the government wanted tc bring inflation down it would have had the courage and fairness to bring in effective legislation controlling prices. The minister knows that the government has not done that at all.

As a preamble to my final question I would like to say that the parts of the budget which stipulate specific job-creation programs forecast a total for the coming year of 53,000 jobs, and in the past four weeks we have lost 62,000 jobs. That, I suggest, is a lamentable record and program for a Liberal government. I would ask, in that context, does the government have in the summer coming weeks one new policy, one new program that will provide some ray of hope to all those Canadians who either would like to have a job or would like to remain confident that they will retain the jobs they now have.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, let me first point out that the hon. member's figures are wrong. I do not know who is doing his calculations but they should obviously enrol in one of our retraining programs in order to get upgrading in mathematics. They simply cannot add very well.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Axworthy: The fact of the matter is that through the direct—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, if they do not want to speak the truth, then there is not much point in having a question period. We are trying to provide honest answers for them.

The fact of the matter is that the direct employment job-creation provision was a $450 million addition which will create at minimum 68,000 jobs—which is even more than the minister said himself. In addition to that, there is a stimulus provided under the housing portions which will provide an additional 100,000 plus jobs. There is additional money that is going to the economic development envelope which will provide more stimulus in research and development, in export development, and in industrial incentives. Those add up to far more jobs. I would say, Madam Speaker, that the opposition could be far more helpful in this difficult period if rather than engaging in talking about fictitious programs and fictitious figures, they themselves would provide much more assistance to Canadians if they joined in with far more co-operation in order to help to get the economy going, instead of trying to create fear and hysteria by using the question period to propagate false figures.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FINANCE

TAX ON JOB-CREATION INCENTIVES

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is also addressed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration who fails to recognize that our workers tell us that by the time the red tape is cut on those programs they are all going to be out of work. In British Columbia conditions are so bad that D8 tractors are going at auction for $18,000 or $16,000, when they are worth about $100,000. People are burning the forests in order to create jobs?

An hon. Member: What is the question?

Miss Carney: If the minister is aware of the unemployment problems in British Columbia, how can he have the audacity to ask union leaders to settle for a 6 per cent cap on wages when he has twice voted for a budget measure which places an unfair and inequitable tax on job-related expenses, a tax which makes our workers uncompetitive and keeps them off their jobs. How can he ask the union leaders to restrict themselves to a 6 per cent increase and then vote for a tax that, in British Columbia, amounts to $3 an hour on workers?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I would first like to point out to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre that I visited British Columbia recently, and I will be there again on Monday to talk to employers and unions about job creation and labour market programs. It was clear in those discussions, when you talked with both employers and members of the unions that the greatest danger to the competitive position of the lumber industry in British Columbia in disposing of its product is the fact that our wage settlements are running substantially ahead of those in the United States.

Mr. Kristiansen: That is a lie.

Mr. Skelly: It is absolutely wrong; it is the truth we need in here.

Mr. Axworthy: We must bring them down. That is the great danger we face in terms of establishing a program in this country, to make sure that we can compete. In the meantime, Madam Speaker, we are attempting to provide for bridging programs in the forestry industry, in the mining industry and in the fishing industry, to ensure that those workers are able to maintain their employment. We have signed co-operative arrangements with the provincial government, with unions, and with the employers of those areas, to keep those people at work during this period of time.

Madam Speaker: Did I hear an hon. member in one corner of the House say "That is a lie"?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Madam Speaker: Would that hon. member, whoever he is, withdraw those words which are considered to be unparliamentary?

Mr. Kristiansen: No, I will not, Madam Speaker, because it is exactly true. The industry has said it, the union has said it, everyone has said it, the ITC has said it. If the minister can admit that he was wrong, then I will withdraw my accusation. Other than that it will stand, and thousands of people will stand behind it.

Madam Speaker: I do not want to delay the question period unduly but I am afraid I cannot let that go by. The hon. member knows that this is unparliamentary language and that he should not be using it in regard to another member's statement. I ask him again to co-operate with the House, to conform with the usages of this House and to withdraw those words.

The hon. member for Kootenay West.

Mr. Kristiansen: As a courtesy to the House and to yourself, Madam Speaker, I will withdraw the terminology.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: I thank the hon. member.

PENSIONS

QUERY RESPECTING INDEXATION

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, I would like to address my supplementary question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. She assured the House yesterday that Canadians who are most in need will be protected and will not have to face the 6 per cent limit on their income announced for pensioners and civil servants in the budget. Since ministerial aides and the Justice department lawyers have just been awarded salary increases of 10 per cent to 11 per cent, does the minister consider these federal government employees to be more in need than pensioners?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I do not see why that question was addressed to me. I never spoke of course of a comparison with employees. I am talking of Canadians on fixed incomes and those most in need. They make up 55 per cent of all the pensioners in Canada. They will receive, for all the coming months, the full indexation of their pensions. In fact their supplements will be doubly indexed to make sure that they do not lose a penny. They will be fully covered for actual inflation. That is extremely important, and we will stick to that policy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

LABOUR CONDITIONS

JOB-CREATION MEASURES

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. As he is playing fast and loose with the figures I want to remind him, by quoting from Senate Hansard, page 4491, June 30, 1982, that the government House leader in the Senate, speaking for the government, said:

> There are therefore no new allocations for employment programs.

Now, who speaks for the government? If you take into account the hidden unemployment, there are today over 1.5 million Canadians unemployed. The minister says he has jobs for 200,000. What is he going to do for the other 1,300,000?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, in relation to the first part of the question I will also have to check Hansard. There is no ambiguity whatsoever. The budget document is there to be seen. There are very specific new allocations of substantial amounts of money for alternative job-creation programs.

Madam Speaker, we will readily admit that one cannot put all the people back to work in direct government employment programs of the government. It must be done through a combination of efforts of the private sector, getting business investment started, getting companies back on an even keel. That is the most healthy way to put people back to work. That is why this budget has as its fundamental message the need to provide for a coalition of interest between business and labour and the government at all levels to combine our efforts to provide for the stabilization of this economy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

GOVERNMENT INITIATIVES

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, it is not difficult to understand why the country has lost confidence in the government when you hear that minister getting up and mouthing these insignificant statements which he cannot support.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Watch your blood pressure!

Mr. McGrath: If my blood pressure is up, Madam Speaker, it is because we have a tragedy in this country. Behind every one of these 1.5 million unemployed there is a potential for human tragedy. He can account for jobs only for 200,000 of them. The government leader in the Senate said there are no new programs. I ask the minister who has the responsibility, what initiatives can we expect from this government to address this tragedy of unprecedented proportions facing 1.5 million Canadians who have to suffer, by the way, the same consequences of inflation as those who are lucky enough to have jobs?

• (1140)

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows, in the short time allowed in question period it is impossible to describe the full range of initiatives which have been taken. This morning we established a new program for the footwear industry to provide for additional employment protection for workers in that sector.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: In previous weeks the minister who sits beside me also provided for additional job creation through major sales abroad in relation to Bombardier and other companies. The Minister of Transport has taken an initiative which will provide close to 50,000 or 60,000 new jobs in western Canada through a major modernization of the transportation system. The list is far longer than I have time in the question period to give, but there is no question that the budget sets a basic framework for providing initiatives to the private sector while at the same time providing transitional assistance for those who are seasonally unemployed or being laid off.

We have provided protection from lay-offs for close to 52,000 workers through work sharing. We have a billion dollar new training bill which was given Royal Assent two nights ago which will allow for the retraining of a quarter of a million Canadians in new training projects.

The list could go on, but the point is that we cannot do it ourselves. We need the co-operation of hon. members opposite. We would like them to go to their ridings and recruit the co-operation of unions and businessmen to get the economy working again.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ONE HUNDRED PER CENT UNEMPLOYMENT IN YUKON TOWNS

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Employment and Immigration a question concerning unemployment in Yukon. It has reached 100 per cent in Elsa; the whole town is closing down. It has reached 100 per cent in Faro; 600 families are affected by lay-offs. Whitehorse Copper is closing down completely at the end of December. The entire mining industry in Yukon is shutting down. What programs is the minister going to create?

Mr. Rossi: Change the MP.

Mr. Nielsen: The hon. member might think unemployment in Yukon is funny. I can tell him it is far more serious there than the figures which have been bandied about here.

Mr. Cousineau: Question.

Mr. Nielsen: I see the minister consulting the Minister of State for Mines. The total industry is shutting down. What is he going to do to provide jobs for those workers and relieve the hardship of those families?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, we are fully aware of the problems faced by the mining industry due to the international downturn in commodity prices. The Minister of State for Mines has been meeting this week—in fact this morning—with members of the mining industry to see what remedial measures might be undertaken during this period of time.

This government does not have the capacity by itself to reconstruct totally the entire mining industry around the world. Difficulties are being faced in Canada as well as at every mine around the world. In the meantime we are sensitive to the problem. We have put forward offers respecting work-sharing programs and are providing alternative employment programs through Section 38. The Minister of State for Mines is discussing those programs. Similar programs are being implemented now in the province of Ontario. We will do as much as we can, working with the industry, to provide help, but we have to come to grips with the over-all economic situation, which is international as well as national in its scope.

I repeat that that is something which really requires a total national effort. That is the kind of basic leadership being provided through the budget, and we are trying to engage the co-operation of hon. members opposite so that we can move toward recovery.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg-St. James.

YOUTH UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg-St. James): Madam Speaker, the government has just brought in a budget with no specific program for youth unemployment, yet Statistics Canada tells us today that fully one quarter of the young people of this country are unemployed. In Quebec some 37.6 per cent of the young people are unemployed. In Ontario 24.4 per cent are unemployed. In British Columbia, where 29.8 per cent of the youth are unemployed, that number is double the level of last year.

Just how can the Minister of Employment and Immigration leave fully one quarter of the youth of this country without jobs, without any hope for the future and no opportunity to contribute in a positive way to the development of the country?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, again I point out, for the interest and attention of the hon. member for Winnipeg-St. James, that in fact a substantial proportion of the funds which are allocated under the new direct job-creation programs are directed toward providing help and assistance for young people to get employment. We have allocated $120 million for a summer youth employment program which is providing employment right now for over 55,000 young people across the country. Over 40 per cent of the people enrolled in direct job-creation programs under the community development program are under 24 years of age.

We will be having discussions in the next several weeks with a number of groups in the social sector and in the employment sector to talk about how we can establish a specific youth employment strategy and apply our programs in a more targeted and directed way.

We are fully aware of the problem and are trying to direct our programs as best we can. When the hon. member for Winnipeg-St. James goes back to his riding this weekend, I hope he will talk to employers in his riding so that they will provide employment for young people in that city.

WOMEN APPLICANTS FOR WELDING COURSE IN MONTREAL

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The minister should be speaking more frequently with women workers who are facing an extremely high rate of unemployment. With the microtechnology revolution the minister knows they are also being phased out of a whole field of traditional jobs.

I want to ask the minister whether he is aware of a situation in Montreal in which a group of 15 women who are preparing themselves for affirmative action in the CNR were refused a welding course by the Canada Employment Centre. Surely the minister knows that during times of high unemployment affirmative action is more important to women workers than ever.

In other parts of Canada women complain that only two or three women—if that many—are allowed to enrol for apprenticeship training, and the minister has cut off pre-apprenticeship training programs. Is it the policy of the minister's department to discriminate against women who want to get into training for non-traditional jobs? Does he oppose affirmative action, which surely should provide equal access to women for trade training for non-traditional jobs?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I point out to the hon. member that one of the basic objectives of the new national training program we introduced last January and on which this House has just passed legislation, is to provide for a broadening of access for women to all kinds of new training opportunities.

The situation in Montreal is very clear. Those people were enrolling in a course for which there were already surplus workers. There is no point in having equal opportunity for unemployment. We want to develop training programs for jobs which are available and to put people into training which will lead to direct employment. To that end we have established special incentives in the training program to provide up to 75 per cent incentives to private employers for on-the-job training for women.

I point out, for the interest of the House, that my parliamentary secretary has been meeting for the last two months with that particular group in Montreal in order to find solutions to their problems. Unfortunately, they did not have the good grace to wait for the answers my parliamentary secretary was going to provide. They went to the press first. The way to get co-operation is not by playing to the press like these people did, or, unfortunately, like the hon. member is doing.

ENERGY

FUNDING FOR OIL EXPLORATION IN SENEGAL

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. As I am sure the minister is aware, there are a very large number of bankruptcies and business failures in the exploration, servicing and drilling sectors of Canada's oil industry, caused in large part by the National Energy Program and the economic policies of this government which are contributing to the over-all unemployment crisis.

This past month Canada announced it would provide some $16.9 million to Senegal to search for oil. I would like to ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources if he could explain to the industry, and particularly to the unemployed, why Canadian taxpayers' dollars are being used to look for oil in Senegal while our Canadian industry is going down the drain. Could he explain how this is helping our Canadian industry, and particularly the unemployed?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, first I would like to remind my hon. friend that the people of Canada and the Government of Canada are providing help to Canadian firms to explore and work in Canada to the tune of well over $1 billion a year. As a matter of fact, Parliament just passed a law which allows the government to pay out to the Canadian oil and gas industry this year close to $1 billion in petroleum incentive grants only. That goes to companies doing exploration work all over the country. That is only one of the programs to help the Canadian oil and gas industry.

• (1150)

In addition, as the hon. member knows, as part of our aid program to developing countries we have set up Petro-Can International which will help developing countries which do not have enough money to explore for potential reserves. As we do in all other kinds of areas, this will help them to find resources to make them self-sufficient or less dependent on OPEC oil. That is part of the Canadian aid program and part of our international responsibility.

I would like to remind my hon. friend that most of that money is going to be used to hire Canadian engineers, geologists and technicians to help those countries meet their future needs. That is part of our international commitment.

MACHINERY AUCTION SALE

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, surely it is time that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources started extending some sympathy to Canada's small business sector of the energy exploration and service industry which is going down the drain. Just this week in Lloydminster another gigantic auction sale liquidated the firms of Midway Oilfield Services and Weldex Machine, along with 150 jobs in that community. This sale saw trucks, tractors, cranes and oilfield equipment selling for 30 cents on the dollar.

How long is this minister going to stand idly by and allow this man-made disaster to continue? Or is he prepared to see that once viable energy sector absolutely and totally go down the drain?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I would like to remind my hon. friend that the Governments of Alberta and Canada in the last three months have set up programs whereby the industry is going to receive over $7 billion of tax breaks and help, over the next five years. There is not one other industry in the country which has been made the beneficiary of such a large tax break like this. Not a single other industry has been put in that comparatively advantageous situation.

Mr. Stevens: But you took the money first.

Mr. Lalonde: My hon. friend should also know that similar problems are being faced by the oil and gas industry in the United States at the present time, in fact by the industry all over the world. My hon. friend need only read an article published in Fortune magazine in the U.S. as recently as three weeks ago.

Mr. Mazankowski: You are wiping out a once viable industry.

Mr. Lalonde: It shows with specific figures and facts that the oil and gas industry in the U.S. is facing similar difficulties. This is the prevailing situation, unfortunately, around the world, and my hon. friend would like Canada to be living in a kind of dream world or on its own. Unfortunately, we are all part of this problem at the present time, but we are trying to resolve this issue. As a matter of fact I had a meeting this morning with the Minister of Energy for Alberta to discuss those very issues—

Madam Speaker: Order.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND CONSTRUCTION PROJECTS

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Throughout the Atlantic provinces urgently needed federal projects, for which funds have already been committed—I am not talking about new funding—are at a standstill. On Prince Edward Island, for example, the construction of the new headquarters of the Department of Veterans Affairs and of the Charlottetown airport have been unexplainably stalled.

Has the federal government decided to halt such projects across the country to hide the true extent of the federal deficit, which many experts say is not $20 billion, but $25 billion, $26 billion or even more—

Madam Speaker: Order.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, again I want to correct the impression the hon. member is trying to leave, that somehow there are going to be hidden deficit figures. There is no such intention at all. The budget clearly stated the situation as it stands. It is serious enough as it is without the hon. member trying to make it worse. As far as the projects being developed in the Atlantic provinces are concerned, there is a wide variety of them and the contracts for the two that he mentions in Prince Edward Island have already been let.

Just by way of interest, I would also point out to him that my department is prepared to move ahead with a number of substantial new training programs in that province as soon as the provincial government is prepared to sign an agreement. Again, I would ask the hon. member to go back and talk to his colleagues in the Conservative government of that province so that they will sign the agreement and we can get busy working on the marine college there, to start training people of that province for new jobs and occupations.

GOVERNMENT COMMITMENTS

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, the minister mentioned the marine college in his reply. Yesterday in the House his colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, made it very clear that the federal government is going to renege on its firm commitment to share in the cost of a veterinary college in the Atlantic provinces. Would the minister tell the House how many other such projects across the country, for which the federal government has made a firm commitment to municipalities or provinces, it has decided to renege on at the expense of jobs and other economic opportunities for the Atlantic region and the whole of Canada?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I am surprised at the hon. member's comments because, as we know full well, the Minister of Agriculture never reneges on a commitment. He is a man of his word. I think you will see that that is fully justified. However, I want to point out to the hon. member that under the new training program we will have a special fund set aside to modernize provincial facilities and buy new equipment in the area of training. The only condition which now must be met is that the provincial government, which will have jurisdiction over those community colleges, must sign a new agreement so that we can put the money in place. I would also point out that the government of his province has not yet signed an agreement, and that is the only thing preventing the program from going ahead in Prince Edward Island.

THE ECONOMY

INFLATION LEVELS IN CANADA AND UNITED STATES

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, every Canadian knows that the unemployment situation will worsen and the economic downturn will continue until the policies of this government are changed to result in lower interest rates. The government keeps telling us that its program to reduce interest rates is based on inflation fighting; with a reduction in inflation, interest rates will come down. That is based on the American model. I ask the Acting Prime Minister, in light of the fact that the U.S. inflation rate has come down but their interest rate remains at a very high level, why should anyone in Canada have faith in this government when it says the same thing will happen in Canada?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, all the previous answers this morning lead to the realization—and we hope it will sink into the minds of opposition members who have been asking the questions—that the situation which Canada is in at this time is not exclusive to Canada. If you look at the United States, in the last year unemployment has gone up from 7.6 per cent to 9.1 per cent, real growth in the GNP has dropped from 2.9 per cent to .9 per cent. The U.S. budget deficit has gone from $29 billion to some say $109 billion, and some say $160 billion. That is what we are saying.

Mr Deans: That is what we are saying!

Mr. Pepin: The hon. member who asked the question says we have to bring down inflation. The whole of our policy on this side and the whole of the budget is dedicated to that, but at the same time creating employment for categories of people in a variety of sectors in which it is particularly needed.

INTEREST RATE LEVELS IN CANADA AND UNITED STATES

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I apologize for the inappropriate question I have raised. I will repeat it in a different way. We understand that the government is following the U.S. policy to fight inflation, which policy is to keep interest rates high. The assumption was that, when inflation fell, interest rates would fall. That has not happened in the U.S. Since this government's policy is based on that policy, why should Canadians have faith that will happen in Canada when it has not happened in the U.S.?

Mr. Broadbent: Try again, Jean-Luc.

• (1200)

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, that is what we have been saying all along, here, at Versailles, and elsewhere. The Canadian government has denounced that American policy of keeping interest rates too high.

Mr. Broadbent: You have been following it.

Mr. Pepin: We are not following it. We are taking it into account.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Pepin: Yes, we are taking it into account because we know that interest rates in the United States have a direct effect on the situation in Canada. It is just witnessing that reality in the United States and trying to cope with it the best way we can.

INDUSTRY

DECLINE IN JOBS AND PROFITS IN MANUFACTURING SECTOR

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, as we witness more and more that Grit times are indeed grim times—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: —I would like to address my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. He perhaps has to share as much as any minister in the total inadequacy of the government's policies. Would the minister indicate why his department has allowed 200,000 jobs to disappear in the manufacturing sector alone; why that sector has experienced profit declines of 51 per cent after the minister's pompous statements that somehow if elected he would get interest rates down in this country or resign?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, we have been taking action that is aimed at creating very substantial numbers of new jobs now and in the coming months.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gray: We have supported, for example, new development projects at the Mitel corporation, a Canadian-controlled and Canadian-based company to create several thousand new jobs. I announced support for that type of project just a few weeks ago. I announced support for a new computer development project at Control Data in Toronto.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: Just like Consolidated Computers?

Mr. Gray: It will create hundreds of new jobs. I announced support for a new project to create a new inertial guidance system for commercial aircraft.

Mr. Beatty: Don't forget Consolidated Computers, Herb.

Mr. Gray: This project will create 1,000 new jobs at Litton Industries. If time in the question period permitted, I could give example after example, indicating the definite decisions and actions through programs in my department which have created and are creating tens of thousands of new jobs in this country. But I want to say, Madam Speaker, no matter how effective our programs are, we cannot create jobs, nor can we stimulate the marketplace in all the other countries in the world that buy our products. They have a major recession, and it is a factor which—

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Kempling: Your time is up.

PETITIONS

MR. GAMBLE—COMMISSIONER OF OFFICIAL LANGUAGES MAP

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present to this House a petition signed by 85 residents of the metropolitan area complaining about the existence of a language map prepared under the direction of the Commissioner of Official Languages, wherein to the delight of the imperialist government of the Soviet Union, the language shown on the map for the Baltic states is Russian rather than Latvian, Lithuanian and Estonian, as is the case.

MR. JOE REID—DIRECT TAXATION OF HOME OWNERS

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, I have a petition that I am duty bound to present on behalf of some 125 citizens in the city of St. Catharines. They signed this petition to impress upon this government and any succeeding government their objection to any form of direct taxation of home owners by way of imputed rent or otherwise.

And as in duty bound your petitioners will ever pray.

AMENDMENT RESPECTING DEPOSITING OF INSTRUMENT AFFECTING ROLLING STOCK

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-659, to amend the Railway Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Mazankowski: Madam Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to provide an amendment to Section 86 of the act, which would permit instruments affecting railway rolling stock located, moving or running on or over the lines or tracks of a railway company to be deposited with the Registrar General of Canada, whether or not the rolling stock is owned by or leased by a railway company.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

COST OF TAXIS TO GOVERNMENT

Question No. 2,669—Mr. Beatty:

From March 1, 1980 to May 31, 1981, what was the total amount paid by the government for taxis?

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): These figures do not include the cost of taxis used by employees on travel status. To obtain that information would entail a detailed examination of every travel claim for the period referred to, the cost of which would be inordinate.

COST OF TELEGRAMS

Question No. 2,680—Mr. Beatty:

From March 1980 to June 1981, what was the cost to the taxpayer for telegrams sent by the government?

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): The cost of "telegrams" alone is not readily available as the government does not have a cost accumulator solely for that item of expense. However, we do have a cost accumulator for "messages and data communications services—common carriers including telegraphs, cable and wireless communications."

CMHC—LOANS TO EMPLOYEES

Question No. 4,191—Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton):

Were loans made to any employee of Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation or its subsidiaries since March 1980 and, if so, in each case (a) what is the name and title of the employee (b) on what date was the loan taken out and on what date is it due (c) what was the amount of the loan (d) what interest rate is being charged (e) what was the purpose of the loan?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): I am informed by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation as follows: (a), (b), (c), (d) and (e) As an adjunct to its transfer policy, CMHC makes financial assistance available for housing purposes to employees on relocation. Financial assistance is provided on request, and within set guidelines, in the form of bridge financing and registered second mortgages. Interest is charged at the prevailing market rate on the date of loan approval.

CMHC transfers an average of 145 employees per year. In 1980, 75 transferred employees availed themselves of the financial assistancce described above, while 64 did so in 1981. All the bridge financing loans have been repaid. There are 43 second mortgages under repayment. The amortization periods vary from 5 to 25 years and the rates of interest range from 10 per cent to 20.5 per cent.

Other specific information requested is considered of a personal nature.

CBC—LOANS TO EMPLOYEES

Question No. 4,192—Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton):

Were loans made to any employee of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation or its subsidiaries since March, 1980 and, if so, in each case (a) what is the name and title of the employee (b) on what date was the loan taken out and on what date is it due (c) what was the amount of the loan (d) what interest rate is being charged (e) what was the purpose of the loan?

Mr. Jack Masters (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: Yes, loans have been made to CBC employees since March 1980. (a), (b), (c), (d) It has not been customary to require the CBC to supply such details of its internal management and administration as the names of individual staff members and the corporation's dealings with them. The background to this custom is explained in detail in the reply to question No. 2,530 answered November 6, 1975.

(e) The CBC's policies in this regard, limit the granting of loans to employees to two circumstances:

(i) Where the corporation requires an employee to relocate to an area where the cost of housing of comparable standard is significantly higher, assistance in meeting this additional cost may be provided in the form of an interest free loan for a limited period of time. These loans are limited to $25,000 and five years.

(ii) Where the corporation requires an employee to relocate to a foreign posting, assistance may be provided in the form of loans, to meet obligations which must be retired before leaving Canada or obligations relating to cost factors peculiar to the foreign country. These loans, which are not interest free, must be repaid within three years.

Mr. Smith: I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Siddon: Madam Speaker, may I ask the parliamentary secretary when we might expect an answer to question No. 4,053 which I entered on the Order Paper on February 23, 1982? This question deals with the shipment of uranium hexafluoride through the Soviet Union for enrichment to other destination countries. I would like to have an accounting of where the isotopes U235 and U238 ultimately end up and how much residue is retained by the Soviet Union. This is a very urgent and pressing question. Can the parliamentary secretary tell us how soon we might expect an answer?

Mr. Smith: Madam Speaker, I am not in a position to answer that today. However, I will be glad to look into the matter on behalf of the hon. member.

Mr. Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, I have a query for the parliamentary secretary with respect to question No. 3,488 which I placed on the Order Paper on November 26, 1981, to which I have not yet had a response.

Mr. Smith: Madam Speaker, I will look into that matter as well.

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PUBLIC SECTOR COMPENSATION RESTRAINT ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING COMPENSATION IN THE PUBLIC SECTOR OF CANADA

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board) moved that Bill C-124, respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

He said: Madam Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I open the debate on Bill C-124, which concerns the establishment of a compensation restraint program in the federal public service.

Canada is in the middle of an acute recession. One quarter of our production capacity remains idle. There has been an alarming drop in commercial investment and profits. The demand for goods has diminished, both on the domestic market and on our foreign markets. One million two hundred and fifty thousand Canadians are unemployed. Industry and consumers are suffering as a result of high interest rates which are a by-product of inflation. We must improve our poor performance on the production side. Our trade surplus is the only ray of hope in an economic situation that is otherwise somber and disappointing.

• (1210)

[English]

More to the point, we run the risk of seriously jeopardizing our long-term competitive position if we are unable to bring our costs under control. Our inflation performance is worse than that of our key trading partners. At present, Canada's consumer price index is increasing at a rate of more than 11 per cent as compared with one year ago. This is four to five percentage points higher than in the United States and about 6 per cent higher than increases in Germany and Japan. Wage settlements in Canada were in excess of 12 per cent in the first quarter of this year. Our wage settlements are, therefore, running about five percentage points higher than those of our major trading partner, the United States.

In its recently released study, which hon. members undoubtedly saw a few days ago, the OECD identified Canada as having the poorest record among the seven largest member countries in moderating its level of wage increases. To date Canadians by and large have failed to align their wage adjustments to the realities of both the Canadian and world economies. Wage rate settlements are so high as to be in fundamental conflict with reducing inflation, bringing down interest rates and creating employment.

If Canada's economic vitality was less dependent upon its ability to sell goods abroad or upon competition with foreign goods here, it would be much less important how our costs compared with those of our trading competitors. We simply cannot expect to compete once the world recession abates unless we align the increases in our costs of production and our rate of inflation with those of other western trading nations.

[Translation]

During the last few weeks before the last budget was brought down, many informed and concerned Canadians in all professions repeatedly asked the federal government to initiate a wage adjustment standard that would be compatible with the country's present economic capacity and its future well-being. All realized that it was imperative for the federal government to accentuate the anti-inflationary impact of its economic policies by taking a more determined stand on wage rates. The federal public sector compensation restraint program alone cannot resolve all the economic problems Canadians are wrestling with today. It should be seen as a serious and striking example that all Canadians, employers and employees, individually and collectively, must follow if they are the least bit concerned with maintaining their competitive position abroad and their standard of living at home.

Wage expectations of Canadian workers can no longer exceed national production without increasing both inflation and unemployment. If the vast majority of Canadians do not agree to wage increases below the expectations they seem to have, inflation will not be reduced either substantially or permanently.

[English]

In the federal public service the collective bargaining system during its relatively short 15-year history has worked well. Those who have played a part in operating that system deserve to be commended for the responsible way in which they have conducted their affairs. But in the economic times we have been experiencing and are likely to continue to experience for some time, we simply have to do better. The economy can no longer afford wage increases that match the rate of inflation because they ensure the continuation of inflation at that rate or even higher.

I have heard the suggestion from some commentators and union leaders that this bill singles out the public service for harsh treatment. I reject that charge. Across the country in recent months almost every large employer in the private sector has been forced to take action to curtail wage costs. Employees have been laid off at every level up to top management. Pay increases have been deferred, holidays cut, promotions delayed and hours of work extended. These cuts have not been reflected in figures which purport to compare public and private pay levels. Indeed, public employees have been largely exempted from such restraints or adverse changes in their own working conditions. To this extent they represent a privileged community within the country.

What we are saying in our approach to wage restraint is that leadership, like charity, begins at home. We are not asking others to do what we are not prepared to do ourselves. The restraints also apply to Members of Parliament, to senators, to members of the judiciary, to Crown corporations, to the RCMP and to the Armed Forces. Other than for Members of Parliament, ministers and senators, there will be no reduction in wages or salaries being paid as of June 28, 1982.

The program will apply to employees for a duration of two years from their date of entry into the program, which will be determined by the expiry dates of their current compensation plans or the next scheduled wage rate increase in current compensation plans. The maximum permissible increase in wage rates will be 6 per cent in the first year of application and 5 per cent in the second year. These are not unreasonable increases. The advice tendered to the government from innumerable and varied sources ranges from doing nothing, allowing the existing systems to continue to apply, to freezing or to even rolling back wages already being paid. The program's increases at 6 per cent and 5 per cent are very much in keeping with the inclination of Canadians to seek a moderate approach.

Collective agreements and compensation plans will be extended and continue in force in the two-year period during which the program will apply to employees. In consequence, all compensation conditions and many terms and conditions of employment will remain unchanged for the duration of the program.

The bill provides that the Treasury Board may authorize changes to the terms and conditions of compensation plans other than wage rates, but only in cases where a plan has expired and has not been renewed as of last June 28. This provision will allow the terms and conditions of such expired plans to be brought up to current standards; this provision will not allow terms and conditions to be rolled back. Wage rate increases in such plans will be limited to no more than 9 per cent for the one-year period from the expiry date. Tentative agreements signed by the parties and subsequently implemented without any change will be honoured as part of these transitional arrangements. In such cases, entry into the program will be on the day following the termination date of the compensation plan or on the effective date of the second wage rate increase provided for in the agreement or the plan.

[Translation]

To be successful, a compensation restraint program must be administered as simply as possible and applied across the board; it should contain only a minimum of exemptions or exceptions, require no new administrative organization or hardly any, and affect as little as possible compensation management practices and pay relationships. The proposed program meets all these requirements. In fact, rather than establishing a new governmental organization, the administration of the compensation restraint program in the federal public service will be the responsibility of the Treasury Board, supported in the performance of this duty by its secretariat. The uniform wage rate increases provided under the program will help avoid the complications that would arise from the application of progressive rate increases at various income levels. The applicaton of a uniform rate increase to all compensation plans provides that, as far as possible, present pay scales are maintained. It prevents complex problems arising from the compression and transposition of wages and finally, will provide for an orderly resumption of the collective bargaining process at the end of the program. Wage rates at the bottom of the pay scale in the federal public service compare favourably with those in the private sector. However, there are serious inequities, compared with the private sector, starting at the second management level in the public service. In fact, instead of creating injustice, a uniform rate of increase will prevent existing inequities from getting worse.

• (1220)

[English]

It is not the intention of the government to use the wage restraint program to alter the normal structure of pay relationships within the public service, a structure that has been developed so assiduously through the collective bargaining process. Any change in that structure is the proper function of the tax system.

Employees who are at less than job rates will continue to receive increments; those who are subject to performance pay plans will continue to receive awards based upon the results of performance appraisals. As a result, employees will continue to progress in their wage or salary ranges as they gain experience and improve performance. This is an important point upon which there is already some misunderstanding and I would remind all hon. members that adjustments are possible in accordance with existing compensation plans. These plans, similar to those which operate in other areas of our economy, including the private sector, will not be changed nor should they be by this particular bill.

Some questions have been raised concerning the propriety of the government continuing to approve or negotiate wage increases for its employees in the days and weeks immediately prior to June 28. Let me set the record straight once again. Hon. members will appreciate that in a collective bargaining regime, once a notice to bargain has been given the parties are obliged to bargain in good faith with a view to concluding a collective agreement. Would it have been good faith on the part of the government to refuse to bargain with its employees or to have deliberately stalled negotiations on the strength of the imminent introduction of the proposed legislation? In my view, the answer is a definite and unequivocable no. Increases were negotiated for the groups concerned on the basis of what was fair and equitable relative to the private sector. As far as those employees are concerned, where the government unilaterally determines the terms of employment, for the groups which we heard of in the House, we saw no reason at all to want to treat them in a manner substantially different from those who are subject to collective bargaining. Their salary reviews were carried out according to the normal schedules. Groups such as Justice department lawyers received the same level of salary increase as those lawyers who are members of the bargaining unit and work in other departments and are not excluded. The unionized lawyers negotiated an 11 per cent increase in April of this year. In short, the government was anxious to treat both their unionized and non-unionized lawyers in a fair and consistent manner.

I should point out, however, that the government is asking the senior executives in the public service to make an additional sacrifice in that the recommendations of the select group of business leaders who advise the government on compensation levels for public service executives will not be approved. The advisory group, as members will recall, recommended a 9.5 per cent increase effective April 1, 1982. Instead, the review date has been brought forward to July 1, 1982, and deputy ministers and other senior executives will have their pay scales adjusted by 6 per cent as of that date. In other words, the 1981 salaries of the most senior public servants will have remained in place for 15 months.

One point I wish to emphasize is that all these groups, those determined unilaterally and those determined by the collective bargaining process prior to the implementation of this program, come under the program at 6 per cent and 5 per cent like everyone else in accordance with the terms of this particular provision of the law.

It is a measure of the serious economic problems facing the country that a proposal to restrain the rate of growth in wage and salary increases in the public sector is necessary. It is necessary because the devastation that inflation brings and has brought must be stopped. This can be done only if all of us, all employed Canadians, make a concerted effort, and indeed a sacrifice, to break the spiralling cost increases in which wages play so important a part. The program that the government has introduced requires a modest sacrifice from public service employees in order to provide benefits and greater opportunities to those Canadians who have been especially hard hit by the ravages of inflation.

The phenomenon of inflation and its impact on countries and individuals today throughout the entire industrialized world is there for all to see. No one is immune from it. Much as a particularly virulent virus, it continues to spread with increasing intensity to claim its victims. Canada cannot contract out of the world in which we rank so high as a trading nation. We cannot permit our economic future to be jeopardized by cost and productivity performance which simply prices us out of markets. If this is allowed to happen, our foreign trade surpluses will disappear, our standard of living will drop dramatically and we will be left behind when our trading partners commence the next surge of world economic growth.

Mr. Domm: It has already happened.

Mr. Johnston: Inflation is the enemy. It feeds on our human desires to protect ourselves and it grows on our expectations that we, as individuals and groups, can somehow have more than we earn. We cannot.

[Translation]

The mechanisms we have developed in this country to distribute wealth and revenue, establish the relative value of work and define conditions of employment are numerous and complex. They have been extremely helpful and will continue to be, in my view.

Canadians often speak in disparaging terms about federal public servants and are not always capable of understanding or appreciating their work. These public servants, however, are doing their utmost to serve their fellow citizens. Furthermore, relations between the government and its employees and their representatives are good. We must, therefore, go on working together if we want our country to come through this very difficult period, for the greater benefit of all concerned.

[English]

Public servants are no more responsible for inflation than any other group of Canadians.

Mr. Rose: Or any other group of workers.

Mr. Johnston: But the whole purpose of the program is much more than simply to restrain wage increases. It signals the start of a national crusade—une croisade nationale—against the crippling effects of inflation, high interest rates and unemployment.

Mr. Rose: Read the history of the Crusades.

Mr. Johnston: If other sectors follow our leadership and we are successful in this crusade, then everyone will gain from the reduction of inflation that will inevitably ensue. We are challenging the people of Canada to adopt our 6 per cent and 5 per cent target. These are targets that are achievable and which will set our economy back on the track to renewed growth and prosperity. That challenge which I have underlined begins with this bill.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I want to begin the debate by saying that I believe it is essential to the recovery of this country that we increase its productivity, lessen the demands of its citizens and that the responsibility to accomplish this falls on all Canadians. If there is the crisis of which the minister spoke during his speech, I hope that he will recognize today, as we begin what he calls a national crusade, where the responsibility lies for a great deal of it.

I believe that the problem during the last little while in Canada is that somehow governments which provide leadership have forgotten the biblical injunction that in good years one should store up against the bad years. What has happened, as one finds today as one looks over the devastation which has occurred in the country, is that rather than storing up for the bad years, we have unwisely utilized the tremendous resources, promise and potential that Sir Wilfrid Laurier said was Canada's in the twentieth century. One cannot blame Americans for that and one cannot blame Canadians for that. One does not blame old age pensioners or public servants for that. If governments are prepared to accept the credit when programs and policies work well, then they must equally accept the responsibility when it all collapses. What the minister says is right. The whole thing is close to falling apart. It may apply to the minister, but he is right as it applies to the economy.

As we begin this debate, it is well for every one of us to put it in the appropriate context. It does not matter where we sit in the House of Commons. I would like to put it in this context, because what I am about to say to the House is the bottom line, the balance sheet of years and years of neglect, of virtual dereliction of duty by successive ministers of finance, beginning with the great white hope who practises law on Bay Street and ending with the great white loss who sits in the House of Commons as Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) today.

This is the balance sheet of their stewardship as the Government of Canada. Their agency, Statistics Canada, used the words "The economy is in a tailspin". The gross national product, it told us, fell by 2 per cent in the first quarter, the third consecutive quarter of negative growth in Canada and the largest quarterly decline in 28 years in Canada.

Corporations employ people in Canada. Corporate profits in the first quarter of 1982 were only 41 per cent of the level recorded in the same period in 1981. Manufacturing output in the first quarter of 1982 was only 70 per cent of capacity, the lowest level of capacity utilization since records were first kept in 1961. The transportation industry, which has been the arteries, the lifeblood and the heart of the industrialization and development of the country heretofore, is only operating at 51 per cent of capacity. The Conference Board of Canada says that consumer confidence is at the lowest level in 20 years.

In the first five months of 1982 alone, 4,429 business declared bankruptcy in Canada, up 36 per cent from the same period in 1981 and up 55 per cent from the same period in 1980. When did we ever hear of farm bankruptcies before? They are up by 61 per cent from last year's level and up 111 per cent from 1980. Today, there is 10.9 per cent unemployment in Canada. That statistic, 10 per cent, does not mean much any more, but one must consider it in human terms. There are 1,300,000 Canadians who want to work but cannot find work. Therefore, many dreams have been shattered.

It has been the policy of this government to keep interest rates high, to depress the economy and, boy, has it been successful in doing that! Interest rates have started to climb again as the government attempts to support the dollar. The chartered bank rate is now 18.25 per cent. At least, it was on the eve of the budget. That compares to the rate of 16.5 per cent in the Unites States. At the time of the 1980 election when all those promises for success were made, the Canadian chartered bank rate was 14.75 per cent. It was at that time that then finance critic of the then opposition, who is now the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray), said that if it did not go down, he would resign. Well, the bank rates went up, but, unfortunately for Canada, that minister did not go down. Ten years ago the bank rate was 6 per cent. I thought I should say that, because that is the testament of failure. We must remember that this debate is being carried out in the context of the budget of November 12, 1981, which was condemned by the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan), condemned by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin), and condemned by ten colleagues, private members of the Liberal Party, as one of the worst disasters in history, and which was abandoned by the Minister of Finance. That is the situation in which we find ourselves.

In the context of the budget of June 28, 1982 I do not know of any sector of the Canadian economy which has taken the terms and conditions of the budget of 1982 and said: "That will put the wheels on the vehicle for this national crusade." There has been none. When businessmen were in Ottawa yesterday and met with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), they were there to support the country. I am one of those Members of Parliament who hopes that the consultation with the labour leaders of Canada will be successful. The meeting is probably being held right now, or if it is over, it was held this morning. I say to the minister that I am one of those who hopes that the consultation is successful because I think this country is sick and tired of non-productive confrontation. There is a duty on the government—not just today, it has been there for years—to have this kind of consultation. The minister knows full well that that consultation has not taken place. The result of it is that he must begin, as he puts it, a national crusade.

I want the crusade the minister talks about to succeed. However, I tell him there is some doubt in the country about the efficacy, the strength, ability and credibility of some of the crusaders opposite. The Sir Galahad of 1968 in the shining armour on the white charger is now the leader of a decrepit gang and a degenerated government that is devoid of imagination. They have proven it. Sir Galahad's armour is rusting. The horse's head is bowed. It is old and weak. The sword is broken.

I worry about the leadership of this crusade. I have reason to because I sit every day in this House of Commons and I look at the crusaders. One of the problems in Canada is that we suffer from an economic crisis and a crisis in leadership. It is the crisis that has brought us here. For the sake of this country, I hope and pray that that decrepit gang will take some part in sharing with others the opportunity of bringing this country back to the promise that was made about it by a former Liberal Prime Minister who distinguished himself a long time ago.

I say to the government that theirs is a record of destruction. What has happened to Canada is this. This great country of promise has had a government that is not worthy of the country. The country is worth more than the worth of this government. That is apparent wherever one goes.

Yesterday I received calls from a senior executive, a person working in the public service and a retired public servant. As well, I spoke to a housewife in my office. I met a relatively young person, of voting age, on the steps of the House of Commons as I was coming in. The question on the lips of all these people was: "When are you going to get rid of them?" Would that question be asked if there was not the crisis of which I speak? I am convinced that the government is finished. Its mandate has run out. It makes promises but does not deliver. I do not want the potential of this country to run out. I have to say to those people that I regret our system. I have lived in it for ten years. I regret that it requires us to put up with a government of this nature, but that is the system.

I say to the government that there are millions and millions of Canadians asking the same question. They are saying: "Watch out, members of the government, we are millions strong and we won't forget." Some of them are in the public service of Canada. In the minister's speeches in Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver, he made veiled threats about the public service and the fact that they would have to cut back. He spoke as if public servants were some kind of second-class citizens who somehow did not understand the necessity to be, along with other Canadians, part of a national recovery program.

Some of the rhetoric in this country has done a great disservice to the public service of Canada. I have represented public servants for ten years. They are as much concerned about this country and this government as anyone else. They have more reason to know the shortcomings of this government because they have worked for it for over 14 years. They have seen the promise dissipate.

It is not because there is a problem with the public service that they are being asked to share in what the minister calls the great crusade and what I hope will be a national recovery program. That is not the problem. They are prepared to share in that. Their concern is that they be joined by others in the crusade. Who are those others? There are the members of the House of Commons, the senators and judges who are joined in that crusade by this bill. However, they want to see others join in the crusade. Yesterday a blue ribbon committee met with the Prime Minister. Public servants want to be assured that the members of that committee join them and that they too, in terms of salary increases, endure the same levels. They want to be sure of that.

Public servants want to be assured that there is some responsibility, and I am sure there is, in the labour movement of Canada to share with the public sector. They put some responsibility on the government. They have noted that while their salaries are being fixed by this bill, the goods and services being delivered by federally-controlled monopolies, agencies and boards are not so confined. Those services are only to be monitored. They have heard the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox) waffle a bit on how tough that monitoring will be. The public servant notices this when he goes to pay his telephone bill, gas bill or for some kind of service which is under federal responsibility. When he notices that kind of thing and he says: "They are treating me just a shade differently than others even within their own jurisdiction", he is going to demand performance on that promise. If that performance does not come through, then he or she is going to wonder down the road what point there was in being on the cutting edge or the leading edge of the national crusade. He is going to ask all of those questions and for answers.

The public service of Canada knows that there is very little difference between living in a house that is overmortgaged and living in a country that is overmortgaged. Canada is mortgaged to the hilt—$20 billion of mortgage, higher per capita than the United States. The public service knows, like everyone else, that it has been the stupidity of the government that has got it there. But he or she is still a citizen of the country. They are going to take part not only in getting the country out of that mess, if that is possible; they are going to take their part, too, in getting that government off the backs of the country. That is something we are looking forward to, Mr. Speaker.

The minister dealt with the bill in some detail. I do not propose to go into that kind of detail. The government is prepared to have the working man and woman in the public service lay their cards on the table. I believe the time has come when everyone had better lay their cards on the table. The public knows what you receive as a salary, Mr. Speaker, as they should; it is a public salary. They know what the ministers receive, they know what Members of Parliament receive, what judges receive. But a strange thing about this government is that its order in council appointments and the salaries that are paid to order in council appointments are kept secret. I think the time has come for us all to lay the cards on the table.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I believe that part of this bill should be a requirement that those order in council payments, wherever they are made, wherever they come from and whatever job the people concerned do, that are paid out of the public purse of Canada should become public.

If my friend from the New Democratic Party asks a question, I would tell him that if he was in the House from time to time he would read the Order Paper. He would see a bill in my name which, if it were adopted by the government, would do exactly the same thing. But it is time that they came clean, that they disclosed, so that we know who the players are and what the players are paid.

Take, for instance, the post office, that corporation that is supposed to revolutionize delivery in the postal service in Canada. If it does not, the head of that corporation is called to account for it. It may be a measure of his failure, of the people's judgment, to find out how much he is paid. The same thing applies to the new chairman of the CNR. He used to be a member of this House. They all receive a public salary. I do not know how I as a member of the House of Commons or the Canadian public can judge their performance if we do not know what those salaries are.

I have tried honestly to find some justification in my mind and in my heart for the failure to disclose, but all of the reasons that I have had are facile. The big reason is that maybe they would not want to come to work for the public if the public knew. I do not believe that, because I asked Michael Warren in a committee one time if he would tell his salary and he said, "Of course I would; I have no personal objection to that, but it is government policy that that not be done." Well, I think it is just about time that we reversed that policy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Let us lay the cards on the table. The government is asking public servants to lay a portion of their increases on the table; lay the cards on the table.

With respect to other matters, I think there has to be some real political leadership. I was disturbed the other day when I found out that some people within the broad public sector have received in this year salary increases of 21 per cent. Here is what they are. I am quoting from a clipping:

> As Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau was telling the Commons how the government was leading the way in wage controls, a Tory MP was trying to find why ministerial aides got a 21 per cent raise this year. June 17, Treasury Board President Don Johnston gave the aides a 10 per cent raise—bringing their total raise so far this year to 21 per cent. The budget, brought down June 28, limited civil service raises to 6 per cent this year and 5 per cent next.

Now, leadership is a good thing. Let that leadership begin at the anterooms of the ministers. Get them back to the status quo ante. Roll it back. Be direct, be honest, treat everyone the same, as my friend from Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) says. That is the thesis of the minister's discussion, his little homily today: let us treat everyone the same. It might be a good idea. It might show leadership and it might help bear the pain a little bit that goes with a cutback if that were done. The minister smiles. He knows he should do this, and I hope over the weekend he will reconsider what they have done with respect to these appointments.

There is another matter which I would like the government to consider, in this sense of fairness, as we begin this crusade together. I see the member for Hamilton West (Mr. Hudecki) is sitting in the House. He is an upright man, a physician of good standing. Let him go, as a physician, as a friend, as a colleague, to the minister and ask him to examine what was done, to see if it is not better that there be that change in attitude—that leadership does start at the top, that leadership does start at ministers' offices. It would be helpful. I think it would lead to some credibility with respect to this national program.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to tell the minister that all the public service is prepared to go with it, if they see it works, and they are prepared to go with it in the hope that it will work. Some of them said to me that they want to do their part, and I honestly believe that. Let nobody mistake the situation. Controls of any kind are unfair; they break unfairly and they affect people unevenly. Someone called them rough justice, and that is rough justice.

The minister will have received, I know, a letter from the Professional Institute of the Public Service of Canada, dated July 7, 1982, dealing with the agriculture group. They set forth their concern about Bill C-124, but they do talk about the unique circumstances of the negotiation.

I notice, Mr. Speaker, that it is now one o'clock. I would like to take up the matter at this point after the recess.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When the House rose at one o'clock, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) had the floor.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, without reflection on your colleagues in the chair, let me say I am very pleased you are in the chair for this debate because we share in common many of the problems we are discussing. I do not think it is inappropriate for me to say that because under our system an incumbent of the chair, whether the Speaker or not, is also a member of the House of Commons.

I am sorry the minister is not here. There might be some legitimate reason for his not being here. I am not reflecting on his absence; his parliamentary secretary is here, and I am pleased to note that.

At one o'clock I was expressing some grave concerns—concerns which have been expressed to me—about the unevenness and the bumpiness of any kind of control program. We had an anti-inflation program during the period 1975-76, and at that time there was a great deal of what might be called rough-justice under that program. Well, there is rough justice here, if I can use that phrase. I think 6 per cent and 5 per cent limits have to be a concern to anyone who is interested in equity.

I see the minister is here now. I welcome him back. Depending on one's income in the public service there is a certain roughness involved in the 6 per cent and 5 per cent guidelines.

The interpretations which will be put on some of the provisions of the bill will create problems as well. At one o'clock I was referring to a copy of a letter I received from the Professional Institute of the Public Service of Canada over the signature of its president, Mr. Jack Donegani, dated July 7, 1982 and directed to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston). The letter dealt with the problem of an agricultural group within the public service of Canada comprising some 265 employees.

• (1410)

This is the first example which has come to my attention, Mr. Speaker. I am satisfied that there will be many examples which come to our attention during the next two or three years in which this program is in place, because to some it is by its terms going to apply a lot longer than just two years. As we reach the straggered end of the program, the examples will become even more apparent and it is my prediction that if there is some regret among members of the House that we ever had to venture into this program because of the roughness of its application, the regret will be multiplied towards the end of the program.

In any event, this is what Mr. Donegani wrote to the President of the Treasury Board about this memorandum of agreement for 265 employees:

> This memorandum of agreement was signed at approximately 11 a.m. on June 28, 1982—

As an aside, I will call it a date which will live in infamy. It goes on:

> —and thereby in accordance with the proposed section 4(2) of Bill C-124 which states in part " . . . a compensation plan shall be deemed to be in effect on June 28, 1982 if parties to the plan have, prior to that date, agreed in writing to establish the plan to have effect on the expiration of the previous compensation plan . . . ", the Agriculture Group Memorandum of Agreement will not be honoured.

That is the position and the allegation set out in the letter. It continues:

> The Agriculture Group collective agreement expiring July 6, 1982 will be extended without change, save for the wage rate increases provided in Section 9 of the Bill.

It goes on, and this is the important paragraph:

> The unique circumstances surrounding the negotiations for the Agriculture Group make the application of Section 4(2) most distressing. The parties met on Friday, June 25, and agreed in principle on many issues. The historical, close relationship with the Biological Sciences Group, which was scheduled to bargain on Saturday, June 26, prompted a pause in the Agriculture negotiations. With the settlement of the Biological Sciences Agreement on June 26, the Institute presented a position for settlement of the Agriculture Agreement at the first opportunity—

That happened to be Monday, June 28, budget day. It continues:

> The Treasury Board accepted the settlement which now appears in jeopardy.

That seems to be unfair. If the minister went out of his way to say something should apply to lawyers in the Department of Justice, I think it should apply to the people in the Department of Agriculture covered by this agreement. I raise this as an indication of this rough justice which is going to prevail. The minister is going to have to look into this kind of thing, and I hope he will do so.

There was a very sober and serious letter sent to the President of the Treasury Board on July 5, 1982, from Mr. W. J. Robertson, President of the Canadian Air Traffic Controllers Association. They have been much in the news recently. In fact, they have been the subject of a Supreme Court case which I believe has changed the balance in collective bargaining in the public service of Canada quite dramatically, at least for those who think collective bargaining relates only to strikes. It has affected the rights of the government quite dramatically in terms of the provision of services which are important for safety and security, so much so that I now wonder about Clause 6 and Clause 7 of this particular bill, and I am going to deal with them a little later. The writer of the letter pointed to the inequity which can develop in a control situation; said this:

> What more pointed dichotomy of the effect of selective controls could be illustrative than one of the examples we face here in Ottawa. The government is allowing oil companies (including PetroCan) in Ontario to sell gasoline in the Ottawa area at six cents per litre more than anywhere else in the province, despite the fact that the only motive of the operators is to reap windfall profits. This one example perfectly illustrates the advantage industry will be able to take of a controlled public service and consumer.

That statement is true and illustrates how important it is that the monitoring of those goods and services to be delivered under the aegis of the federal government must be strict indeed. Nothing will strike at the heart of the good faith—reluctant, angry, but good faith—which will be exhibited, I believe, by the vast majority of public servants to its elements, at least as they affect compensation, than to see those same public servants on the cutting edge of controls, on the cutting edge of the crusade led by the jaded crusaders I talked about earlier, and then find no other crusaders in business, labour, or elsewhere behind them. The government will have to prove that when it said monitoring, it did not mean a wave of the hand at increases. I do not think the case could have been put any more eloquently than it was last night by the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans) when he talked about regulated industries and suppliers of goods and services. I hope the government will not forget that.

There is one other area I would like to deal with, Mr. Speaker, in terms of a possible inequity with which the government must cope. It is interesting, is it not, that the government has decided to monitor the production and cost of goods and services over which it has some jurisdiction. It has decided to cap the compensation of its public servants, but when it comes to the professional consultants it hires, there is not a word in the budget. Not a word. I think there is a demonstrated and patent unfairness in that, and I believe the bill is deficient to the degree it does not apply to consultants' fees. With respect to public relations consultants, ministers can make any deal they want, and we know they make deals. When I was in government I used to make deals with consultants.

Since the government is entering into this régime, if it is good for the public service, then it should be good for the consultants and those who work on behalf of the government under contract. What happens in the public service, unfortunately, is that a great deal of the work they could do is contracted out, and there is little opportunity for public servants to test themselves. The régime should apply to contracted professionals such as lawyers, accountants, management and advertising consultants, reporters, architects and others who perform work on behalf of the federal government. It is patently unfair to deal with the public service one way, and deal another way with those people who supplant or work beside the public servants. I think that is an inequity which the government must look into and deal with.

The government has a duty as well to look at all of its programs, those expensive programs which are discretionary. The government has a duty to look at the decentralization program. You have had some interest, I understand, Mr. Speaker, in the decentralization program. Some difference of opinion seems to have developed with respect to the decentralization program. The minister blushes. If I were the architect of such a program I would blush too.

I am looking at a clipping from the Ottawa Citizen for July 8, 1982. It is a story written by Citizen staff writer Peter Maser. I will read part of it because it is most illustrative:

> The federal government will not carry through with plans to move 750 jobs in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources to Sherbrooke, Que. Or will it?
>
> Ottawa MP Lloyd Francis—

I am quoting from the article, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a point of order and not a point of debate. The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) is deliberately involving the Speaker in this debate, which he knows is not proper according to the rules of the House. He must know that the Speaker does not have a chance to answer in a debate; therefore, the hon. member should not drag the occupant of the chair into the debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), who is an experienced member of the House and an old personal friend, I am sure will use discretion in the circumstances.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I have always tried to do that, Mr. Speaker, and I want to assure the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne) that I will. I am not angry or upset at all with the intervention of the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi. I think we should be reminded that the occupant of the Chair at all times is deserving of special respect in the House of Commons.

I shall continue now with the article as follows:

> Ottawa MP Lloyd Francis took many of his Liberal colleagues by surprise Wednesday by announcing that the $140 million move was dead, a victim of tough economic times and government restraint.

The article then goes on to say that the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier) did not agree, that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) had said no decision had been taken, and that even a recommendation on the move would not be going to cabinet for another five or six weeks.

At a period of time when we are asking the public service for restraint, I think it is incumbent upon every member of this House of Commons to ask for a review of that kind of program, which is really an excuse for regional development. I think it is incumbent on every member of this House of Commons to ask what is the cost in loss of efficiency, the length of time in the delivery of service and in the operation and administration of the public service of Canada. That is the question I want to put. I am sure that no member of the House, whether an incumbent of the Chair or otherwise, would not agree that at a time of restraint a program like that should be examined. That is what I meant when I said that it is within the context of a restraint bill—and that is the purpose of it—that some programs be looked at. Decentralization is one of them.

We do not have a bucketful of money in Canada. I think it is important the matter was raised and that a definitive statement be made by the President of the Treasury Board. When he asks for restraint and acceptance of restraint by the public service of Canada, he should say: "I have gone to all members of the House who would be potential beneficiaries of these moves in the decentralization program and I have told them that it is necessary, because it is expensive and because we do not have the money, that I ask the same of you and that all of those moves be cancelled".

Perhaps a move like that could be looked at some day in a better time, but cancelled now. I think that would add to the element of fairness that the government must have toward its employees and within the government to the private sector, because the thrust of the program that was outlined by the President of the Treasury Board was this: "We are restraining ourselves; we want you to restrain yourselves."

That is the leadership that has to be shown and I expect an announcement to that effect from the President of the Treasury Board next week. When he comes before the committee with his bill, which I hope will be soon, I hope that he will make that announcement. I will put him on notice now that I will be asking that question because I believe it is important.

I have mentioned the disclosure of salaries, I have mentioned consulting fees and I have mentioned the subject of ministerial staff. I want the President of the Treasury Board to take a look at Bill C-123, the bill on government reorganization. Do you know what is in that bill, Mr. Speaker? One of the provisions in that bill is the appointment of four more parliamentary secretaries. It is interesting that the government has found a way to increase the salaries of some backbenchers of the government party by creating more part-time work. Under this bill parliamentary secretaries are to be appointed to ministers of state who have no portfolio responsibilities. I have to ask my friends in the Liberal Party whether that is the right thing to do in a time of restraint. I hope they will recognize that it is wrong. We ought not to be creating new positions in Parliament if we are asking the public service to join in what has been described as this crusade to national recovery.

If it is right that public servants be part of that crusade—and I think it is—is it not equally right that government backbenchers, the potential parliamentary secretaries who are to be appointed to ministers of state, should say: "We do not need that to be done, Mr. Prime Minister and Mr. President of the Treasury Board. Change Bill C-123. Do not give us that extra perk. Do not put a further drain on the public purse." I think that is the least they could ask.

I want to deal with one matter quickly since the hon. member for Rosedale will also be dealing with it later on today. I am speaking of the effect Bill C-124 will have. In particular I am referring to clauses 6 and 7. I have to confess that, while I approve generally of the matter of restraint, I really question the wisdom and judgment of this part of the bill. Clause 6 provides as follows:

> Notwithstanding any other Act of Parliament, but subject to subsection (2), the terms and conditions of every compensation plan that is extended under Section 4 or 5, other than wage rates, shall continue in force without change for the period for which the compensation plan is extended.

Then there is the exception in subclause (2) which I believe the President of the Treasury Board has mentioned. It reads as follows:

> The Treasury Board may, where it deems it appropriate, authorize any change to any terms and conditions, other than wage rates, of a compensation plan that would, but for Section 5, have expired before June 28, 1982.

• (1430)

Then Clause 7 provides:

> Every collective agreement or arbitral award that includes a compensation plan that is extended under Section 4 or 5 shall, subject to this Part, continue in force without change for the period for which the compensation plan is extended.

I believe that the effect of this clause is to drive a horse and cart through the collective bargaining process in the public service of Canada. Why is that so important? I for one happen to believe that there is more to collective bargaining than the ultimate weapon, the strike. In fact, it was Tommy Douglas, a former premier of Saskatchewan, a former member of the House and a former leader of the New Democratic Party with vast experience in Parliament over the years, who said that the strike as a weapon was obsolete. If the collective bargaining process means anything at all, it means that there is more to it than just that ultimate weapon.

Why do we collectively bargain? In an enlightened society we collectively bargain so that working conditions can be reasonable, so that there can be understanding through consultation between employers and employees, so that when there are wrongs to be righted they will be pointed out and righted, so that when there are balances to be adjusted they will be adjusted consultatively.

Employer-employee relations in Canada have moved a long way from the coal pits of England. In the 15 years or so of collective bargaining in the public service of Canada there has been a pretty good record. The fact of the matter is that, on whatever basis one wants to measure it, there have been fewer strikes in the public service than anywhere else in Canada. I am told that in 90 years of collective bargaining in the transportation industry there have been only three general strikes, and they were on the railroads. That is a tremendous record of achievement by management, employers and employees. Actually it is a magnificent achievement when we consider the complications, the number of unions and the number of companies. Somehow or other they have used their heads and have managed to settle matters.

The government, for reasons that I cannot comprehend and that the minister did not explain except in terms of restraint, has decided to take a step which must be described as a blunt instrument. I give the President of the Treasury Board and his officials their just due. This bill was prepared in a hurry. It may be that as a result of the speed with which the bill was prepared the question of restraint was approached with a certain sense of crudeness, if I may put it that way, and that upon reflection in time—and there still is some time—they could consider some possible changes to accomplish the restraint they want to accomplish.

I want them to listen carefully to the remarks of the hon. member for Rosedale, but generally speaking I want to ask the President of the Treasury Board a rhetorical question about which he can think over the weekend. Why was it not possible to devise a means by which collective bargaining could carry on and ensure that in terms of compensation, no matter how the parties or the folks would like to distribute it, the compensation would not exceed the limits in the bill? In other words, is this the only way the government could act? Did it have to drive a horse and cart through collective bargaining in order to achieve restraint? Was there not sufficient imagination, foresight and faith in the collective bargaining system that something other than that crude instrument could have been used?

I hope the government will reflect upon these questions because they are important to us and to peace and stability in the country. I hope the government will reflect upon whether or not it could adopt the experience of other jurisdictions in this regard. Also I hope it decides that the bargaining process can continue within the bounds of restraint. If the government does not do this, then many things will be lost which have been fruitful over the last 15 years. There is a danger that the good work and potential of the National Joint Council could be damaged to a great degree. I do not think anyone in the House would want to see that happen. The areas within which legitimate bargaining can take place on a non-monetary, non-pay or non-compensation basis can be affected very badly if this is allowed to continue.

I have in my hand a collective agreement, which is just one of hundreds between the Treasury Board and the Professional Institute of the Public Service of Canada and others, but these are deals with nurses. It covers a number of things which are unique to that group. I could spend the afternoon going over them item by item. They are unique in that group and many are non-monetary. In the circumstances as they exist now, there cannot be that face-to-face sense of collective bargaining where people meet in good faith to discuss mutual problems. I do not believe that it is beyond the wisdom of officials of the Government of Canada to substitute the blunt instrument of Clause 7 for good sense and reason.

While we have the time I want to say to the minister it is important, with respect to nurses, engineers and every other bargaining group within the public service, whether it is the Professional Institute of the Public Service, the PSAC or whatever, that we not lose what I believe is a reasonably good record of bargaining. There are some people who may think the opposite, but I believe the record has been sound in terms of negotiation.

There is more to negotiation than strike. In fact, many people do not know that public servants can make a choice; they can choose whether to go the conciliation-strike route or the arbitration route. There are many things wrong with arbitration. There is a limitation on things which may be dealt with by arbitration. I have some sympathy when they use the conciliation-strike route because they can bargain more broadly. I wonder whether we could fix up that system and whether the wisdom and energy which went into developing Clause 7 of the bill could be used positively to ensure that the system is workable. That is one problem.

There is another deeper problem which is just as significant to negotiating. It concerns a very fundamental industry in the country about which I spoke earlier—the transportation industry. In Canada there are publicly-owned railroads as well as privately owned railroads. The most important are the CNR and the CPR. One is private and one is public. Somehow this vast industry has been able to find the way, through enlightenment and experience, to achieve a certain amount—in fact a remarkable record—of industrial peace, given the complexity of the industry and its size.

• (1440)

The railway unions have divided into four separate bargaining groups. There is the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers which represents the men who actually operate the trains. There is the United Transportation Union, an amalgamation of former smaller unions representing a range of employees involved in the operation of trains. These employees include conductors, brakemen and yardmen. The fourth division is the railway employees department, the AFL-CIO of the shop crafts, as they are usually referred to, which is a coalition of skilled trade unions whose members' main function is the maintenance of equipment. There is the Associated Non-Operating Railways Unions Non-Ops, which is a coalition of unions representing the largest and most diverse range of railway employees, including office staff, train dispatchers, track maintenance employees, signalmen and more.

The Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) is in the House and he knows how large it is. There are 90,000 employees represented on one side of the bargaining table. It is my understanding that the opposite side is represented by 11 railway companies.

Mr. Pepin: They sign separate contracts.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): They do sign separate contracts. However, they do not bargain separately and that is the interesting point. The minister has said that they sign separate contracts, but the point is that they do not bargain separately. What is interesting is that good sense has managed to prevail and they have been able to work at bargaining together. There is a report of an inquiry commission on wider-based collective bargaining. This commission discussed the experience of the railway industry.

The reason this experience is important is that if the bill goes through as it is now framed, considering that the industry involves the private and public sector and that this bill deals generally with one jurisdiction, one of the segments, namely the public sector, will be subject to these compensation guidelines while the private sector will be subject to a different set of rules. This affects the transport industry with respect to road transport as well. The danger of this is that we will move away from that wider based bargaining to the experience that some of my colleagues have seen in British Columbia. It is the situation where a vast group of separate unions bargain separately, negotiate separately and have contracts expire at different times. The result of this is that there is, at least, a tendency toward problems in that industry.

I suggest to the minister, due to the importance of the transportation system to the life blood of this country, that he not only meet with the union people—the ones I have mentioned and those others whom he would wish to meet with—but that he also meet with the leadership in those companies to determine whether or not they are satisfied with this crude weapon, as I have called it. Surely we do not want this legislation to cause problems between employers and employees. We want to promote and augment wherever possible peace, harmony and understanding. Why do I say that? It is because that is what the country needs. We have suffered immeasurably in Canada because prime ministers and federal governments could not get along with provincial governments, employers and employees could not get along with each other and one region of Canada distrusts another region of Canada.

If there is the depth of concern that was expressed by the former auditor general that the country is on its economic knees, then every resource which we have must be gathered together. Every minute that is lost in a strike is a minute that will not be recovered. Every effort that is not undertaken to avoid trouble in these spheres will be a nail in the coffin of increased productivity which is so important to the country.

There must be leadership by the government, to be sure. But there must be leadership from other sectors in Canada as well. The employers and the unions of Canada have to show leadership. There is no rhyme or reason to the nonsensical rhetoric which was becoming obsolete in this country at the beginning of the twentieth century. Now we are at the end of the twentieth century, we must have that leadership.

In conclusion, since suggestions have been made on how to clarify and improve this bill, I suggest the government use its time over the weekend to have those consultations, so that when the bill goes to committee improvements can be made to it. With respect to the length of time for second reading in this debate, I apologize to the House for the length of time I have taken up to now, but while the debate in the House is short, I think it is important that the work in the committee be intense. It is very important that we have a piece of legislation which people may not favour but which they can live with reasonably. I hope this will be the result of the bill.

What we have before us now, if the minister is right—and I believe he is right in terms of the condition the country is in—is the challenge ahead of us which will require the best from all of us, no matter where we sit in the House or where we are in the economic spectrum. I do not believe that we should answer any siren songs except to say that if our plight is as bad as we say it is, which I believe it is, and if we are losing opportunities for young people as the statistics indicate, I think it is time to put the interests of the country first. I hope that will be the view of the government when it looks at this bill and the suggested changes to it.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, it has been very interesting to listen to the last two speakers in this very important debate. After listening to the minister speak for 22 minutes and the spokesman for the official opposition party speak for an hour and 20 minutes, I still have a question which I hope one of the members of the opposition party can answer later. It relates to something said by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) after the budget came down on June 28. As reported in Macleans magazine:

• (1450)

But when asked what he would do in MacEachen's place, Crosbie demurred. "If I told you what I would do, we'd never get elected".

After listening to the previous hon. member, it makes me wonder, as I often do, what the Conservative Party really thinks concerning this particular legislation. What would the Conservative Party really do if it were the government at this time?

Mr. Siddon: You will find out.

Mr. Murphy: In the past we have heard the Conservative Party talk about slashing 60,000 jobs. We heard talk about federal employees. We heard all that conversation in the past. But today, because the Conservatives recognize that there is a tide running against the government, they are hiding. They do not want any more trips to Jerusalem. They do not want any more talk about slashing 60,000 federal jobs.

Mr. Siddon: Let us hear your good ideas.

Mr. Murphy: They are keeping quiet.

Now let me turn to the minister. He has called for a crusade. As a former history teacher, I know, and his parliamentary secretary should know, that crusades are usually against someone. They are not for someone. There are crusades against the Moslems, against the Catholics, against Protestants, against Jews, and now we have a crusade against federal government employees.

Mr. Johnston: Inflation!

Mr. Murphy: In the speech of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) we did not hear any mention of high interest rates. We did not hear of a crusade against high interest rates. We did not hear of a crusade against high energy costs. For that matter, just last week we heard the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) state in this House that he will not do anything to roll back the 30 per cent increase in energy costs which will be occurring over the next 18 months. So the crusade is not against inflation; the crusade is against workers.

In the speech given by the President of the Treasury Board we heard remarks to the effect that government workers are not laid off. Let me tell the hon. gentleman and this House that Crown corporation workers have been laid off. workers have been laid off from CN and from VIA Rail. So there are lay-offs.

Mr. Lewycky: Big lay-offs.

Mr. Murphy: There are very large lay-offs in the Crown corporations, as the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Lewycky) has said, and those people are affected by this legislation. Therefore, I hope that when this crusade goes rolling along, the Liberals and their supporters will tell the whole truth.

Bill C-124 has been presented to the House in many guises. The main guise is as an anti-inflation measure. It is being paraded as the primary measure that this Liberal government will be employing in order to bring the economy of Canada back on its feet again. In addition, it has been implied that Bill C-124 would somehow increase our competitive edge in international markets.

The Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) have asked Canadians to accept sanctions similar to those listed in this legislation in a spirit of sharing and solidarity and as part of a co-operative approach to solving the problems Canada now faces. These problems are very serious. Our dollar is worth approximately six bits American. Yet there is no indication that this lower value of the dollar will result in more exports abroad or in economic recovery.

Mr. Pepin: It could. You have not seen the figures for last month.

Mr. Murphy: Inflation continues to plague Canadians.

Mr. Pepin: We are now $6 billion ahead of last year, a $6 billion trade surplus in the first five months of this year!

Mr. Murphy: If the minister who is in charge of cutting back rail services for most Canadians wishes to speak, I think he should rise when it is his turn.

Inflation continues to plague Canadians. The consumer price index went up 11.8 per cent in the month of May, year over year.

Mr. Pepin: Need some research.

Mr. Murphy: Unemployment in this country, if the hidden unemployed are included, is not approaching 1.3 million people but, rather, two million people.

Mr. Deans: Maybe more.

Mr. Murphy: High interest rates are making a mockery of our economy and of the dreams of many Canadians. High interest rates have hurt pensioners who wish to take out small loans to go on vacations. It has hurt couples who wish to buy or to keep their houses. It has hurt the businessmen and businesswomen who want to be their own bosses and who wish to contribute to Canada's economy in their own way. Lay-offs, both temporary and permanent, are occurring almost every day. If I had the time I would go through the list of our difficulties, but it is very extensive. I do not have the time in my speech to list all the problems facing our economy.

We understand that it is natural for this government to ask Canadians to share the burden, to express their solidarity and to co-operate in this time of serious adversity. In fact, I believe that the senior members of this government know that the economic situation is even more drastic and our economy is in much more peril than they would dare admit. Was that not the message of the Prime Minister to the Premiers behind closed doors last week? Did he not admit that even the gloomy pictures given to us by the President of the Treasury Board and by the Minister of Finance last week were actually rosy compared to the true situation that Canada faces?

We in the New Democratic Party have been willing to admit the reality of our situation. For that matter, throughout the last two years of the Liberal government and of the Clark Conservative regime that preceded it, we have said that we faced an economic calamity more serious than either of those two governments would admit. We recognized that the international situation was worsening, as was the situation in Canada, with its decaying manufacturing sector, its branch plant economy, its limited investment in research and development, while its government, whether Liberal or Conservative, was rushing to increase energy prices to world levels at a time when most countries would take advantage of their natural resources. If those countries had cheap labour, they would take advantage of it to produce goods. Countries with cheap gas or oil would be using it to their advantage to ensure that their economies were strong. But that is not the philosophy of the Liberal government and it was not the philosophy of the Conservative government which preceded it.

With all those conditions involving the international situation and with our own decaying manufacturing sector, there was this quick rush to get energy prices up to almost world levels. We knew that Canada would be in worse shape than most other nations.

We agree that it is now a time for sharing, for solidarity, for co-operation by Canadians. We believe that there must be a national strategy to help both individual Canadians and the Canadian economy, but that is not what this bill provides. This bill is an ill-conceived attempt to shift the blame, to take the heat off the government and to make Canadians forget that the Liberal Party has no economic plan, no national strategy and no sense of Canada's future.

Mr. Pepin: A lot of rhetoric.

Mr. Murphy: The Liberal government campaigned in 1980 to strengthen the Foreign Investment Review Agency. Why was that done? Senator Davey admitted that it was done to take New Democratic votes. That was the purpose of that promise in the 1980 election campaign. It was not an economic plan to control our own economy. But what has happened just in the last week? We have seen a Liberal government which has gutted the Foreign Investment Review Agency, not to improve the prospects of Canada's economy but, rather, in a cynical move to play up to the multinationals and to undercut the Tory policy of dismantling FIRA. That is the cynical, non-planning, devious action brought forward by the government in this particular bill. It is the type of thing it has done in many other cases, but again we do not have the time to mention them during this debate.

• (1500)

This legislation before us now is both cynical and devious. It is cynical in that it seeks to find a scapegoat for our economic waste. It is devious in that it not only denies federal employees the right to negotiate wage increases but rolls back wage increases this government has already agreed to with its employees.

Even worse than that, it denies federal employees the right to negotiate any other items, regardless of whether or not they are monetary. In other words, most federal employees have lost the right to negotiate because of this legislation. Under the guise of a wage restraint program, the government has revoked the right of government employees to seek paid maternity leave, to negotiate technological change clauses, to negotiate occupational health and safety protection and to negotiate security against unfair disciplinary actions and any other non-wage item that a group of government workers would like to negotiate.

This has been sneaked in on a program which the minister has called a crusade against inflation. Why have these underhanded measures been introduced? Certainly it is not to fight inflation, unemployment or high interest rates. This government must have a reason for its deviousness. Is it because it has become so anti-union, so opposed to the rights of workers or so in need of creating a diversion that it has deliberately denied government workers the right to negotiate and destroy the collective bargaining process?

Why? Is it that this government has deliberately created a confrontation with labour and thereby hopes to ease the Liberal Party out of the plight it is in at the present time, or is it one of a number of devious steps taken by this government to destroy the right of the public service to collective bargaining? The government has never believed in collective bargaining. Certainly the actions of the President of the Treasury Board as well as his speeches over the past year have indicated that he wishes to diminish that power in the public service.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): That's garbage.

Mr. Murphy: It may be garbage in the hon. member's mind, but he should look at the actions. He has hurt air traffic controllers by preventing them from being able to strike. He has designated so many controllers that any strike would be ineffective. More nurses have been designated than employees. The five members in the Liberal Party presently in the chamber know what the government is doing, but certainly will not admit to the public, especially the federal employees, what they are up to.

Mr. Pepin: You need a researcher.

Mr. Murphy: My researcher was with the public service. She understands what the government is doing. Unfortunately, the minister does not have a researcher who understands transportation.

I would like to know what message the government is trying to give to Canadians. Why is it saying that these federal employees cannot negotiate items such as paid maternity leave, occupational health and safety programs or security against unfair disciplinary actions? Most of these are not monetary items. Most do not have anything to do with the supposed fight against inflation by the government. It is one of the most anti-union acts I have ever seen.

Where the government is failing to act through progressive legislation, perhaps it does not want either the private or the public sectors to negotiate clauses for paid maternity leave, dental plans or adequate health and safety legislation. Maybe that is the message it is trying to get out. I suspect that, with the deviousness of this government, we will never know.

The clause of this legislation which denies any collective bargaining at all to many government employees is completely unacceptable. It has nothing to do with wage controls. It is nothing less than the most blatant attempt to destroy the rights of workers. It is a move that not even the AIP program, which the minister should be familiar with, or the legislation which invoked that program came close to matching this program in that respect.

The reason for this bill is to fight inflation by controlling wages in the public sector. The government expects the private sector to follow its example. That is garbage. No employee or group of lower-middle-income employees is going to accept voluntarily pay increases limited to 6 per cent as long as the cost of living is 12 per cent.

As a result of this legislation, federal government employees will lose protection against increases in the cost of living. If the cost of living continues to escalate to 12, 14 or 15 per cent next year, they will still be restricted to a 6 per cent increase. This government has pretended that limiting senators, judges, cabinet ministers, Members of Parliament and senior officials to 6 per cent will somehow make this legislation fair. That is ridiculous. It is untrue.

Let us examine the unfairness of this 6 per cent salary provision. A cabinet minister earning $102,000 a year will be entitled to a pay raise of $6,000. A senior official with a salary of $80,000 will be entitled to a pay increase of $4,800. A low paid employee earning $12,000 will be entitled to a pay increase of $720. In other words, it will take the low paid employee 102 work days to earn the increase granted to somebody earning $80,000. That worker has to work for two fifths of the year to earn as much as the increase given to somebody earning $80,000.

That employee will have to work half a year to earn as much as the increase that will be granted to a cabinet minister under this legislation. Is that fair? Is that justice?

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): It will be fair if they work the same hours.

Mr. Murphy: I have never heard such crap in my life and I have heard a hell of a lot of it. Is the hon. member telling me that someone who earns $12,000 only works one twelfth as hard as a cabinet minister or one fifth as hard as a senior official? That is not true.

Mr. Rose: Tell him to go stick his head in the Miramichi.

Mr. Murphy: Perhaps the hon. member should find another shovel to open another prison in his riding. I understand they had four sod-turning ceremonies for the same prison by the same government in his riding. Perhaps that is the make-work project of the government.

• (1510)

To get back to the very serious matter before us, this legislation prentends to be fair, but it certainly is not fair. Does this legislation provide protection against cost of living increases? No, it does not. Of course not.

Can we expect the private sector to follow this ridiculous legislation? For the most part, no, but to some degree, yes, because last night the Prime Minister met with representatives of Canada's largest businesses, and these people said they are willing to accept 6 per cent for their employees, and even for themselves.

I would like to discuss their salaries to show why they are willing to accept 6 per cent increases. I am referring to an article in The Financial Post of May 15, 1982 which includes a list of the cash and cash equivalent remunerations of a number of senior officials in Canadian industry. As the House knows, we cannot get this information in Canada. We have to go down to the United States to find out what our captains of industry are earning. Let me refer to the salaries and cash equivalent remunerations of just a few of these people. C. F. Baird, chairman of Inco Limited, receives $425,645 a year. D. M. Culver, president of Alcan Aluminium, receives $532,941 a year. Ian D. Sinclair, chairman of Canadian Pacific Enterprises, receives $556,228 a year. A. J. de Grandpré, chairman of Bell Canada, receives $626,000 a year. J. A. Armstrong, chairman of Imperial Oil, receives $736,741 a year.

Mr. Deans: How does anyone spend that?

Mr. Murphy: E. M. Bronfman, chairman of the Seagram Company, receives $1,064,288.

Mr. Deans: And he feels hard done by.

Mr. Murphy: He also receives $1.3 million in contingent remuneration for benefit and profit-sharing plans. He is the $2 million man.

I am not surprised these people feel they can survive under a restraint program which would allow them 6 per cent increases, but these barefoot boys from Bay Street are volunteering to restrain their workers' wages. We are not surprised by that. Even the anti-inflation program put some limits on increases. There was a $600 minimum increase and a $2,400 maximum increase. This program does not have that. It is an old story. The same law applies to the poor as to the rich except that it only affects the poor.

I am not surprised that after the meeting yesterday with the Prime Minister the presidents and chairmen of various corporations, who have earnings in excess of $500,000 a year each in wages alone, support the program of the government. They can survive on increases of $30,000 plus a year because most Canadians do not even earn that much. These high priests of the government's crusade will be receiving more by way of increases next year than any government worker.

Mr. Cullen: How many jobs have they created?

Mr. Deans: Not one. Personally, not one.

Mr. Murphy: Of course, there are no strong unions in these operations. These high priests of restraint will force bank clerks, cleaning staffs, maintenance help and sales clerks to accept 6 per cent in order to support the government's fight against inflation. What bloody hypocrisy!

The government is calling for co-operation in all sectors of the Canadian economy. It has called the premiers, business leaders and worker representatives in for consultations and, as often is the case with this government, the consultations occurred after the decision was made. Because some union leaders have been reluctant to meet with the government to discuss the Liberal concept of sharing, solidarity—

Mr. Rose: Caring.

Mr. Murphy: —caring—

Mr. Rose: Co-operation.

Mr. Murphy: —and co-operation, some Liberals in this House have been upset, but the actions of the government are very much like those of a rapist. After the deed is done, he talks to his victim and says, "We must meet and discuss this matter". The government has stripped public service employees of any right to bargain monetary or non-monetary items. It has deprived workers of protection against the increased cost of living, and now it wants to meet with those workers to discuss the plan. The government is completely unwilling to control energy prices, which will increase 30 per cent next year. The government is completely unwilling to control high interest rates, which approach 20 per cent for some loans and much more for most personal loans. But now it wants one sector of the economy to co-operate and somehow provide a demonstration for other sectors. If the government really wanted a program designed to fight inflation and redevelop our economy, it would be a program which attacks the enemies of our economy. Those enemies are quick increases in energy prices and the high interest rates most Canadians are facing and because of which they are suffering.

I am glad most union leaders have agreed to meet with the Prime Minister and senior cabinet ministers to discuss what can be done. I know their concern is real, and I hope their meetings with the government will be fruitful and result in some action that is acceptable to Canadians.

Mr. Cullen: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pepin: Hear, hear!

Mr. Murphy: However, I must say that the scheme we have before us today will only increase the problems Canadians face. It will only increase income disparity in this country. The "highly paid pencil pushers who will be hurt" in reality are the people in government hospitals who earn $11,055 a year. They are the teacher aides in Atlantic Canada who earn $9,631 a year, the typists in Winnipeg who earn $11,353 a year and office equipment workers in Vancouver who earn $11,379 a year. These people do not earn the great salaries many people think public servants earn. These are the people who, because of this program, will receive very small increases in their salaries. With this increase of only 6 per cent the clerk with two children to support will find that his or her salary increase will bring his or her salary to just over $12,000, which means that his or her family is condemned to continue living below the poverty line and to fall even further behind in the years following. The poverty line in Ottawa for a family of three persons is $12,448. This person will be earning just over $12,000. He or she qualifies to be considered poor.

We heard earlier in this debate that last year in Sherbrooke, Quebec, a federal civil servant applied for welfare because his salary was so low. In Winnipeg, Rhonda Gordon worked for the army but had to quit her work for the army and go on welfare to support her single-parent family. People like these are the people who will be hurt by this legislation, and it is time we stopped pretending we are hurting the rich. It is time we stopped talking about the sacrifices of those who are living comfortably. Let us talk about those people who are really making the sacrifices. Let us talk about those who earn $9,000, $10,000, $11,000 or $12,000. They will be making sacrifices so that cabinet ministers can receive $102,000. They will be making the sacrifice so the Bronfmans can make a million dollars. Do you know how many people could be employed if the Bronfmans would accept a meagre $150,000 a year? How many more jobs would be created if that happened?

• (1520)

This program is only going to increase the disparity between those with and those without. The last anti-inflation program redistributed income upward. In other words, the government played Robin Hood in reverse; it stole from the poor to give to the well off. This program will be even worse. For women who fill most of the low paying jobs in the federal civil service the 6 per cent and 5 per cent formula will mean that their incomes will fall even further behind. The differential between male and female salaries will increase. The talk of an amendment to allow the Human Rights Commission to investigate discrimination will do little to help most low paid female government employees, or those in the private sector whose employers will force them to accept increases of only 6 per cent.

The truth is there for all to see, Mr. Speaker. This government and this legislation will hurt women and the families they support. No public relations job, no national crusade, no speech by the minister responsible for the status of women can camouflage the real effect of this bill. Women fill only 4.3 per cent of senior management positions, but they comprise 82 per cent of the low paid administrative support positions. They are the cleaning ladies, teachers' aides, clerks and office equipment workers who receive salaries from $9,000 to $12,000 a year. It is obviously they who will be hurt by this legislation. The problem is that this program is really not out to fight inflation. In a document leaked to my party leader last year the reason for this program was exposed as follows:

—a program of consultation and public relations aimed at changing public attitudes and expectations would be useful—even though 'the main advantage of the program would be that it would enable the government to be seen doing something about inflation and to lay part of the blame for inflation on the private sector.'

This same document also indicates this:

—"we are not currently facing a wage-driven inflation such as we were in 1975"—instead real wages have fallen for 4 (now 5) consecutive years—

So the government has admitted in its documentation that inflation is not caused by wages. That is a government document I am quoting, not an NDP document, and it admits that the main advantage would be in PR and shifting the blame away from the government. So how can the government—and in this I agree with the spokesman of the official opposition—expect Canadians to believe that members opposite, cabinet ministers and the Prime Minister are the real crusaders? They have not been, Mr. Speaker.

If you check the wage increases of federal civil servants, you will find that they have not kept pace with the cost of living increases in the last five years. In the first quarter of 1978, wage increases in the federal public service were 6.6 per cent. The increase in the consumer price index was 8.8 per cent. In the first quarter of 1970, public service wages increased 6.4 per cent; the CPI went up 9.1 per cent. In 1980, wages increased 6.6 per cent, and the CPI went up 9.4 per cent. In the first quarter of 1981, federal civil service wages increased by 8.8 per cent, and the CPI went up 12.2 per cent. What does this indicate? It indicates that at the present time, even with the right to collective bargaining, federal employees are not keeping up with the cost of living. This bill means that federal civil servants will get only half as much as the increase in the cost of living, assuming that it only increases at the present rate of 12 per cent. If it goes up 15 per cent or 16 per cent, and increases are limited to 6 per cent, then we can see that the federal employees are the real scapegoats of this government program.

We have heard, from some ministers, Mr. Speaker, that somehow this program is going to help the unemployed. Let me point out again that according to the Conference Board study of the AIB, those controls resulted in the loss of several thousands of jobs. I repeat: several thousands of jobs. This program will do the same because Canadians who are having a tough time now making their mortgage payments or paying for their heat will have less money to spend on other goods. In other words, there will be less need for Canadians to produce goods and therefore fewer jobs for Canadians. That is what is happening. You can look at government documentation, at the Conference Board, and you can look at our history and know that is the case, but this government has a very cynical motive and it does not care what happens to Canadian jobs. So we have a program which is both cynical and devious. It will do nothing for the economy but it will meet the stated Liberal objective of "to be seen to be doing something about inflation".

As part of that same government document I referred to earlier, Mr. Speaker, the decision that public servants take the heat is part of a coherent plan which has been laid out and part of which has been already implemented. It is a deliberate plan by this government to take the heat off itself, and just as we have seen a public relations budget, we are seeing a public relations wage control legislation to rescue not the faltering Canadian economy, but simply to rescue the faltering Liberal Party. Surely this government, which can no longer be trusted by Canadians, must resign. Surely this government, which is asking for the co-operation of Canadians, must recognize that it does not have the trust of Canadians. If Canadians are to have any trust in or co-operate with government, they must believe in the integrity of that government, and they do not believe in the integrity of this government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired. He may, of course, continue with unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

• (1530)

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, I thank the House for allowing me to conclude. I have almost come to the end of my remarks on this bill. However, I would like to say that this bill is going to hurt Canadians and the Canadian economy. It has the potential to make federal employees the scapegoats of federal action. If that is the case, it will poison the relationship between government and its employees for years to come.

Bill C-124 is an unfortunate bill. Not only that, it will not help Canadians overcome the problems they face. This bill will do nothing about inflation. It will do nothing about high interest rates. It will do nothing about the high price of energy. It will do nothing about unemployment.

The bill should be withdrawn. The government should consult with the different sectors of the Canadian economy before introducing a comprehensive package, whatever that might include. But if the government cannot do that, and if it cannot show some economic wisdom rather than political connivance, then the government should resign.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Bud Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I must say I listened with some disappointment to the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy). I think it is appropriate that members of the New Democratic Party stand up and take their traditional roles or make their traditional speeches but when they have finished their ten or fifteen minute introductions, we should hear alternatives from them. We should hear some indication about how this bill might be improved. If they think we should withdraw this bill, we should hear what kind of a bill they would introduce.

The hon. member for Churchill talks pretty glibly about who will be hurt by this legislation. People are not being asked to take a cut; we are asking Canadians, particularly those in the civil service, not to take as large an increase as they had anticipated. There is no cut. I must say that following the opportunity I have had to talk with civil servants, particularly in the Ottawa area, it seems to me they are prepared to make that sacrifice, if that is the appropriate word—but to take that particular cut—

Mr. Deans: You said it is not a cut.

Mr. Cullen: —because they see it as their role and part of their responsibility to the Canadian economy. There are 500,000 civil servants who are in a position to make a significant impact and show some leadership in this field.

I compliment the government and the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) for having the courage to bring forward this particular bill as the cutting edge against inflation. As the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) said, the people who will take the leadership are the civil servants at the federal level. They are the ones who will set a pattern, and if they are followed by other segments of the economy at the provincial and municipal level, and certainly in the private sector, we will have a 6 per cent inflation factor in Canada.

The hon. member who preceded me from Churchill spoke very glibly about who will be hurt. I ask him who will be hurt if no action is taken? Will it not be the women in those low paying categories that he was talking about who will suffer? What about the pensioner on a fixed income? They are the people who will be hurt, because if we do not take action of this nature we will very soon we be looking at a 20 per cent inflation factor. Then those people would really have something to complain about because no action was taken by the federal government.

The hon. member says those who will be hurt will be the people earning $9,000 or $11,000 a year. But those people are fortunate to have a job. Today we heard the atrocious unemployment figures. The invidious nature of inflation is that it impacts on the unemployed, particularly, because it is very difficult for them to get back into the job market; even more so if we had an inflation rate of 20 per cent, which I am sure would come to pass if we did not show some leadership at this time.

If the hon. member has a genuine concern for people, and knowing the hon. member personally, I know he has, I do not think he should lose sight of the fact that there are many people unemployed who are looking for some help, guidance and hope. If you listen to the hon. member for Churchill, it would seem that the only light the New Democratic Party sees at the end of the tunnel is that of an oncoming train. That seems to be the kind of hope which the NDP would hold out for our young people and those who are unemployed.

I am satisfied that this was not an easy decision for the government to take. It was not easy to ask the government's employees, although the government asks itself, members of its party and Members of Parliament, to take a 6 per cent and a 5 per cent increase. The government is saying to its employees, "We are looking to you to help us in this particular fight and in this particular attempt to buoy up the economy and bring down the inflation rate to 6 per cent." I think civil servants, those working out there in the field, the front line troops, are prepared to make that particular move. I think they want to know that when they look around, as the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton said, they will see that they are not alone. I think they want to see employees of provincial governments, the municipal governments and those working in the private sector behind them. If the federal civil servants take this leadership and they are followed, they will feel very good about the role they have been called upon to play. When the inflation rate comes down to 6 per cent, I hope people will not forget that it was the federal civil servants who led the way to that victory. Certainly I will mention it over and over again in my riding.

The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton mentioned collective bargaining in the civil service. I do not think too many people have to be reminded that it was a Liberal government which gave that particular right to civil servants.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): No. It was by unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. Cullen: I have to say that the record has been good. I agree with the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton about that.

I think over all there is something in excess of 200 bargaining units. When you look at the fact that this legislation has been in place over 15 years the record has been excellent. I think the hon. member mentioned one exception, where he thought the settlement was too high. Perhaps it was a caving in, or it might have been more appropriate had the government been a little tougher, but in looking at an excess of 200 collective bargaining units, all operating at different levels with different areas of responsibility, the record has been excellent.

Nobody should kid the civil servants. Nobody should kid people who want to come and work for the federal civil service, that there is free collective bargaining. There is not free collective bargaining. There comes a time when the federal government must take its responsibility and say, "We have to end this strike. We have to pass legislation ordering people back to work because it is inappropriate for the strike to continue beyond a particular time." That is not a problem that the private sector or unions in the private sector face. People in the civil service, whether they are in the federal or the provincial civil service, must face the ultimate reality that when their actions begin to impinge on the Canadian economy and the good of all Canadians then the government or Parliament must take its responsibility. That has been the experience, and I must say to the credit of the unions that it has not been necessary to do it very often.

When the NDP looks at this place of legislation, it has a tendency to forget what has taken place in the past. What about the progressive legislation that has been put in place; not as a result of efforts of the New Democratic Party, though maybe there was some prodding from that party, and not at the initiative of the Progressive Conservative Party, but there was also some prodding from them? The progressive legislation was put in place by consistent and continuing Liberal governments.

If we did not have these in place, what would be the real impact on the unemployed on those who had not made plans for pensions at retirement? This is why we have put in place programs such as unemployment insurance.

• (1540)

Today I received a telephone call from a radio station which was being very critical of the fact that the union in Sudbury decided to strike, then recognized the dilemma and the difficulties being faced by International Nickel because of current nickel markets, and accepted a settlement that moved the employees from strike pay to unemployment insurance. Thank God for unemployment insurance and that these people have such an opportunity. This not only helps workers who are no longer on strike, who no longer have jobs and face lay-offs until October, because they will be receiving that income, but the whole community of Sudbury—the people selling groceries, the people cutting hair or the people selling clothers. Those moneys are not going into any socks, into deposit certificates or bank accounts; they are going into the economy to the benefit of the workers and certainly to the benefit of the community at large. It was the Liberal government which put that system into place at a time when the economy was in better shape.

I do not need to catalogue all the programs which have been put in place such as an indexed Canada Pension Plan, old age pension, the guaranteed income supplement, the registered retirement savings plan and medicare. All these progressive moves were put in place so that Canadians would be better able to survive in difficult times than those in other countries who do not have the benefit of these particular protections.

I looked at the percentage at which we were aiming. The 6 per cent figure was not just picked out of the air. After careful study it was determined that when a recovery takes place it would be more devastating than ever if Canadians were not in a position to compete and to participate in the recovery. If they were slowed down in the recovery, then we would really see unemployment and the devastating effects of high inflation. As I said earlier, it would be much higher than the 11.5 per cent or 12 per cent of today.

I understand that some members of the New Democratic Party may be participating in this debate on Monday. Perhaps they will come up with something positive concerning what could be done. The only suggestion I heard so far was that we should increase the size of the deficit and use that money for job creation. If that does not have a stimulative impact upon the economy, then all we would have is a larger deficit.

Also they recommended exchange controls, but when it was pointed out to them that many ordinary Canadians took trips around the world despite present economic conditions in Canada—and I understand it is at record rates even this year—they changed their tune. When hon. members of the NDP recognized that exchange controls would impact upon Canadian travellers going to the United States, abroad or elsewhere, they suggested selective exchange controls and gradually slipped out of their nomenclature. I do not think we will hear very much about exchange controls because everytime they come up with an idea, if it has any practicality, it is adopted and improved upon. God knows, the Liberal Party in the past has not been hesitant to pick up on ideas, to improve upon them and to include them in legislation. But I say to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and others, "Please do not bring in exchange controls or selective exchange controls", whatever they might mean in the nomenclature of the New Democratic Party.

Also it was suggested that nothing is being done at the present time. We know that there is tragically high unemployment. We all know that British Columbia's revenue or source of strength for its economy is the sale of timber and lumber and that approximately 90 per cent of its market is in the United States. If Americans are not buying, it is no wonder that the catalogue of small communities mentioned today by a member of the NDP are in difficulty. If they cannot sell their products, the plants close down; of course this causes unemployment. I am not blaming it upon the United States. It is simply an indicator that that is where the markets are and if the Americans are not buying, the Canadian community of 20 to 25 million people is not large enough to absorb the commodity; thus the economy of British Columbia suffers.

Earlier I mentioned the situation faced by International Nickel. Nickel and copper prices are at an all-time low, so this company cannot make a profit. In fact, the market is not out there, to the point where it has to close down shops. I guess it could be producing to some extent to build up massive inventories, but this would be counterproductive in the long run because it may extend the length of the lay-off rather than have any beneficial effect. Thus, a business economic decision has been made in that particular industry.

Getting closer to home, I represent an area which is the petrochemical centre of Canada. The situation last year was that corporations in the United States were saying that they would take X amount of this particular product and that their prospective purchases would be X amount. Then six months later they came back and said that their inventories were too high and that they could not keep up that size of purchase. As a result, a corporation as large as Polysar had to close down for a month. It told its employees to take their holidays and tried to work out some system whereby the impact of the closure was limited as much as possible. It faced the ultimate reality that those purchasers or those markets were telling them that their inventories were too high and that until their economy picks up they would not be of much assistance.

I suppose it is fair ball for the NDP to take a crack at the large salaries which are being paid to the heads of many of these corporations. I had envisioned their salaries to be somewhere around $200,000 or $300,000. Perhaps I was thinking back to the 1970 era, but I knew they also had stock options and certainly opportunities as heads of these corporations. The brains, the intelligence and the ability which these people put into these large industries create many of the jobs in Canada. Frankly, the vast majority of Canadian jobs are provided by small business people, but we would ignore at our peril the talent and ability that these giants of industry bring to our economy because they are in positions to know nationally and internationally what is needed to make them successful and competitive. Unless they move around the world to seek out markets and to work hand in glove with the Export Development Corporation and our excellent Minister of State for International Trade (Mr. Lumley), we will be in very difficult economic circumstances because we will not have the advantage of those particular people. It may be fair game to say that they are overpaid, but frankly I do not know how anyone could say so. I should like to know the situations with which their companies are faced, how much money they make and how much the economy benefits from the decisions made by these corporate giants. I have seen them fired when appropriation decisions were not made. I have seen them looking elsewhere because they were unable to produce or to live up to the expectations which were held out for them in the first instance.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, as the poem indicates, I am in high flight right now and I do not want to be shot down in midstream. Perhaps when I complete my remarks I will entertain a question.

I should like to deal with another issue which was raised by the hon. member for Churchill. I was surprised to learn that at least he was reading The Financial Post or the Financial Times. He quoted statistics from one of those two publications. He was being very selective because he did not refer to the increase in salaries from 1970 to 1980 shown in the particular issue from which he quoted. More important, he did not point out the productivity to which reference was made in the article. If we do not get our productivity up, no corporation will be able to succeed, no corporation in Canada will be able to compete in international markets; this is what the article indicated. I commend the hon. member. I am not saying that he should have read it aloud in the House of Commons, but I hope he will have a look at The Financial Post or the Financial Times to see what are the difficulties and what the business community is endeavouring to do. It is the business community, in the final analysis, which provides jobs for the people about whom he and I are both concerned.

There is another group in the community upon which we must depend more and more—the individual entrepreneur. I am proud to say that when I was the former minister of immigration we looked with great favour on the billions—not millions—of dollars that entrepreneurs were bringing into Canada. Immigrants were bringing that money into the country and investing in Canada. They would say to us that this is a great country in which to invest.

Sometimes I wonder, when I hear people being critical of the economy, saying there is no future here, while at the same time I see people moving hundreds of millions of dollars of investment into this country. They do that because they have seen the world and have decided this is the place which provides the greatest opportunity, the place where they want to work, invest and have their children educated. They want their children to have the quality of life which is available in Canada.

There is not just a small group of people that applies to come to Canada. People can select almost any country in the world, other than their own, in which to live. Anywhere from 800,000 to a million people apply each year to come to Canada. Therefore, when I hear people say there is no hope that their children will never own a home or receive the education which they deserve, and that there will be no jobs for them, I say that is nonsense. The record does not indicate that, and the record in the future will certainly show that this is not the case.

The call for leadership has gone out, and I believe it has been heeded by this government. I believe this particular bill is a step in the right direction. I believe that the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton was correct to point out that when we are dealing with the two bargaining units involving 500 thousand people, there will be some inequities. There is no question about that. If some of these inequities can be corrected, with people still being required to participate in what is sometimes called a "crusade", but what I say is a fight against inflation to bring it down to 6 per cent, I have enough faith and confidence in the President of the Treasury Board that they will be corrected.

The over-all leadership position of the government is clearly correct in this instance. It is never easy to call upon your employees, particularly one half million of them, to take the lead and make the sacrifice. Frankly, I am a little disappointed in what I have heard so far. I hope that the meeting with the labour groups will produce more positive reaction than what I have heard some labour leaders espouse.

I am less than optimistic about the leader of the Canadian Labour Congress. For the life of me I cannot see this long time Liberal hater and NDP supporter doing anything which will be of any help in this particular instance. For once I would like to see him take a positive stance, not only on behalf of union people but on behalf of the 1.3 million who are now unemployed. If we can get the inflation rate down to 6 per cent, with his co-operation, then his contribution will be phenomenal. He has an opportunity to be a great Canadian, to take a great lead and, at long last, say something tough to the unions.

The union workers are prepared to make the sacrifice, but if they are given a con job by the leaders of the unions, that this is inappropriate and unworkable and that the unions will not participate, I suggest he will be doing a disservice to the union workers, all those who work and the union movement itself.

I recently heard Mr. Samson, the head of the public service union, talking about a war measures act on the economy and a war measures act against civil servants. Hyperbole will not get us anywhere. I ask him to spend some time, not just talking to the leaders or speaking rhetoric to the union leadership but talking to the grassroots members of the civil service. He will discover that they are prepared to make a sacrifice. Admittedly, we must get the message across that others will have to participate in this fight, but if he begins by talking in a negative way, such as Jean Claude Parrot has done, he will be doing a disservice to his union and his country.

I ask union leaders to accept their responsibility. I ask them to cross the lines of management and labour, government and labour confrontation. I ask them in this instance to get on side, for once, with the economy to help lower our inflation rate to 6 per cent.

They should not come out with rhetoric such as that of Dennis McDermott. He said that "if we get 6 per cent instead of 12 per cent we will give them a 6 per cent effort". What kind of garbage is that? What kind of leadership is that? He has access to vast amounts of talent and skill at the Canadian Labour Congress headquarters. He has an obligation to consult with those experts in order to determine how Canada can be helped by the union movement. He had better not let the union movement down at this time because I can honestly tell him that Canadians are just waiting to take a knock at the union members. I do think that is inappropriate because union members have been very responsible and responsive in this country. They have not pursued exorbitant increases in wages. If someone like Dennis McDermott gets them riled up, uses hyperbole and becomes "Dennis the Demagogue", his actions will be a great detriment to Canada, the union movement and, most importantly, to the people who are unemployed at the present time.

As I have said, there will be some inequities in this legislation. Some will suffer and be more disadvantaged than others. That will be the extended role they will be called upon to play. I am old enough to remember one world war. I did not participate in it, but I know that many people in the military went out prepared to do their part, whatever they were called upon to do. There was unfairness at that time as well.

In the First World War, some had to go over the top while others were sitting back in Canada repairing trucks. However, everyone was prepared to do his part and play his role within the limits of his God-given abilities. People were prepared to make the sacrifice and play the role they were asked to play even if it was not fair. War is never fair. There is always someone who is not doing his job or not prepared to take the risk or responsibility. There are those who have to take the responsibility of leadership because others do not want it. That was unfair; some were disadvantaged and suffered as a result. Many gave their lives to that cause.

When Canadians begin to think of unfairness, I ask them to remember that this is the greatest country in the world. This is a country which has and will give them the greatest opportunities. Canadians can be confident that their children will grow up in a free country where they will have benefits never dreamed of. This is truly a land of opportunity, but if we kiss it away now through inaction, not following the lead, we will be shirking our responsibilities.

We cannot allow inflation to rise to somewhere between 30 per cent and 40 per cent and then brag about reducing it. We have an obligation to the Canadian people and the generation of Canadians who made sacrifices in the two wars and the Korean War; we have an obligation to the future generation not to let this opportunity slip away.

As Members of Parliament we have an obligation to make recommendations. I have recommended that we should establish a Canada fund. People should be able to have money deducted from their wages to be deposited in this Canada fund. This fund should pay 6 per cent, 7 per cent or 8 per cent of non-taxable interest. This money could be loaned to farmers, and small-business men. I can assure the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) that Canadians would rally around that fund. They would take their money out of their socks and their bank accounts if they knew that they were contributing to the well-being of Canada. This recommendation has not been accepted in its entirety, but it is the germ of an idea which we have an obligation to propose.

As Members of Parliament, we have an obligation to point out to the government and the treasury benches what can be done in our own particular ridings which could help the economy. If this involves asking for a better airport in Sarnia or Calgary, or getting a better port in St. John's, we have that obligation. If we do not perform our functions properly we are doing a disservice to our constituents. While our job entails several responsibilities, our greatest responsibility is not to fail the Canadian public at a time when it is crying for our leadership. The leadership is there. We are prepared to make the move. The civil servant is prepared to make the move. I ask my fellow Canadians not to let the civil servants down, and not to let the country down.

WORLD CUP SOCCER CHAMPIONSHIP

CONGRATULATIONS ON VICTORY BY ITALY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Evans (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas yesterday in Madrid, Spain, the Italian soccer team won the World Cup in a decisive 3-1 match, and whereas their tremendous team spirit in this event captured the enthusiasm of sports fans throughout the world, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bourassa (Mr. Rossi):

THE ECONOMY

CALL FOR REVERSAL OF GOVERNMENT POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Madam Speaker, a constituent in my riding of Erie, who has invested in the lift truck sales and services business, has once again written to me concerning the rising prime interest rates. His letter reads in part, "The government apparently really does not want to help the small businessmen survive this terrible crisis in which they find themselves." His letter concludes, "So, why do we write? It is merely to let you know that we are still out here bleeding and hoping against hope that somebody will be able to do something."

In light of the desperation that lies behind these words of my constituent, words which are being repeated all over Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Reid):

That the government reverse its policy of "state intervention" and "government ownership", and introduce policies to restore investor confidence in the Canadian private sector.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AID

DEMAND THAT PROGRAMS BE REVIEWED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I rise to protest CIDA's recent boner in providing $21 million of Canadian taxpayers' hard earned dollars for a useless silo project and other unwarranted expenditures in Haiti which, according to W5, was totally unnecessary. The sad irony of the matter is that it might never have been brought to light save for the diligent spade work by CTV's W5. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga):

That all agencies of the federal government be required (a), to justify the need for individual projects; (b) report full disclosure of intended spending projects to Parliament, and that the government immediately embark on a review of all aid programs in order to weed out dubious ventures.

PUBLIC SERVICE

CALL FOR CANCELLATION OF TRAVELLING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I also rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the government, supported by the Conservatives, intends to limit the wages of the public servants in Canada to 6 per cent next year and 5 per cent in 1984, and in view of the fact that 1,340 public servants travelled by air out of Ottawa every working day between May 3 and June 10 of this year, and that 58 public servants travelled by air out of Ottawa internationally every working day of that period, that being an entire planeload of international, five-mile high junketeers en route to the Caribbean, Las Vegas, the Riviera and Katmandu, every single day, making a total of 36,180 in 27 days, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans):

That the Treasury Board immediately cancel all travel of public servants until such time as an evaluation of the cost effectiveness of that travel can be weighed against the cutting of wages in the public sector and tabled in the House.

I am also providing, in French and in English, copies of the Bell publication, "Today's Way to Operate", to the President of the Treasury Board.

REVENUE LOST BY WESTERN TOURIST INDUSTRY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, in view of the government's decisions to terminate VIA Rail's Super Continental, to restrict group accommodation severely on the only remaining Rocky Mountain train, the Canadian, and to frustrate Japanese industrial workers by using childish delaying tactics against the Japanese auto industry, which have all contributed to a severe reduction in the number of Japanese tourists visiting western Canada this year, and will next year as well, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor):

That the federal government accept full responsibility for the damage caused to the tourist industry of western Canada which has lost millions in tourist revenue and hundreds of jobs this year because of misguided federal policies which openly discourage visitors from abroad while causing severe hardships to many resort centres such as Banff and Jasper, Alberta.

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, the June budget of the finance minister marked the third time that he and the government attempted to infuse some life into the economy of the country and instill some confidence in people over its financial and business acumen. It marked the third time such an attempt failed. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

That the finance minister and the government follow the advice of the late W. C. Fields when he advised, "If at first you don't succeed, try again. And then if you don't succeed, quit!"

PAYMENT OF INCOME TAX BY NEWLY RETIRED PERSONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, it is considered regular accounting procedure for businesses to file income tax on a quarterly basis. However, when people retire it is not necessarily known that National Revenue requires those with additional income to file tax on a quarterly rather than on an annual basis. When those senior citizens fail to do so, they are made to pay a penalty for late payment. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Okanagan-Similkameen (Mr. King):

That the government, when it issues the first OAS cheque to a newly retired person with additional income, give that person the choice of paying income tax annually or quarterly.

SEARCH AND RESCUE

EAST COAST SERVICE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, I also rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. The motion relates to the sinking of the Arctic Explorer and the subsequent loss of 13 lives. Whereas DOC has failed to implement and enforce regulations of the operation of on-board ship auto alarms, whereas there are continuing conflicts between the Department of National Defence, the Canadian Coastguard, and vessel traffic management, and whereas there is no in-service training program for refreshing and upgrading Coastguard radio operators and no effective operational plans for delivery of search and rescue services on either the east or the west coast, I move:

That this House regrets the attempt by the Government of Canada to scapegoat the Coastguard operators instead of developing and enforcing a complete and effective operational plan for the delivery of search and rescue services on the east coast of Canada.

I would like to support one resolution presented this weekend by the federal Liberals of Ontario. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis):

PEACEFUL RESOLUTION OF DIFFERENCES BETWEEN CANADA AND UNITED STATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, 170 years ago the Village of Sandwich in Upper Canada was the centre of North American attention. After months of indecision, it was on July 12, 1812, that General Hull ordered his American troops to cross that water boundary which separated our two young and growing nations. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Erie (Mr. Fretz):

That, whereas the border separating Canada from the United States of America is the longest undefended border in the world; and whereas disputes, incidents and irritations have arisen between our two countries from time to time since the cessation of the 1812-1814 war, the governments and the peoples of our two nations are to be commended for their fine example to the world in the resolution of those differences by peaceful means, keeping the border open at all times for regular business.

LABOUR RELATIONS

POSITION OF CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS EMPLOYEES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Madam Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the public sector compensation restraint legislation, which is now being debated in the House, treats Canadian National Railways employees as public servants, yet excludes Canadian Pacific employees, and in view of the fact that, as a consequence of joint bargaining in the rail transportation industry, Canadian National employees will lose the benefit of the second-year increases in their contract while Canadian Pacific employees, with whom they bargain jointly, will receive the benefit of their contract, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle):

• (1415)

That this House direct the Minister of Transport to meet immediately with the President of the Treasury Board and advise that the president's statement that public employees are exempt from lay-offs does not apply to Canadian National employees and that Canadian National employees are not "a privileged community within the country" and that immediate steps be taken to amend Bill C-124 which in its present form will destroy joint bargaining on the railways.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

SIZE OF GOVERNMENT DEFICIT

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. It is no surprise that last week business leaders supported the government's position on wage restraint in the public sector. It was also clear, as a result of those meetings and arising out of those meetings, that they in no way supported the other elements of the recent federal government budget. In fact they expressed shock at the size of the federal government deficit. They indicated that their greatest single disappointment was the fact that nothing had been done to change the National Energy Program in a fundamental way. What action is the Prime Minister planning to take to respond to these deeply held concerns of the business community leaders? In particular, what action is he proposing to take to reduce the size of the federal government deficit and to reduce the size of the increase in government spending which this year will have a second consecutive increase of 20 per cent?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I am somewhat puzzled at the report that the hon. member has been given of that meeting. It is true that some of the participants expressed surprise at the size of the deficit, but others pointed out to them that they should not have been surprised if they had looked at the slowdown in the economy and had done their calculations. Some of the participants, and indeed some of the premiers the week before, indicated that they had anticipated a deficit of that size basing it on their own deficits which had almost doubled from one year to the next.

If my memory is correct, just a few weeks before the budget the hon. member was predicting a deficit of something between $16 billion and $20 billion. Therefore, why would he now think they were surprised unless they had been very much misinformed?

INQUIRY RESPECTING GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister has again totally ignored the question that I asked him. I asked him what he was proposing to do to reduce the size of the federal government deficit which is keeping upward pressure on interest rates, and in the words of the Minister of Finance, high deficits and high increases in government spending, running at 20 per cent per annum two years running, will increase inflation and increase the level of interest rates. What is he going to do to meet those concerns?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is arguing economic policy. The answer to his question was given by the Minister of Finance, that this deficit is one which is essentially due to the automatic stabilizers. It is due to the fact that the economy has slowed down, as everyone knows. Therefore, the revenues of the government on one hand have been reduced, and its expenditures have been increased in order once again to pay for the automatic stabilizers. Therefore, as the Minister of Finance has indicated, and I have not heard the hon. member gainsay it yet, when the economy recovers, this deficit will be automatically reduced.

It is not a deficit which is planned, such as in other countries which are cutting their taxes and increasing their expenses. It is a deficit which came in spite of the fact that we did not increase our expenditures in any substantive way.

• (1420)

REPORT OF PROJECTED INCREASE IN DEFICIT

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister is dealing in probably the worst flim-flam we have heard in the House in months. The government is increasing its spending by 20 per cent. That was the shock to business people. They thought there would be a program of restraint in the face of the size of the government deficit, which is bound to increase interest rates. They were also surprised that again the government increased taxes—in the second budget in the row—at a time of deep recession in the country, which is bound to deepen that recession further and therefore increase the size of the budget deficit.

What is the government going to do about the size of the budget deficit? Last week Maclean's magazine reported the projection of Department of Finance officials that the budget deficit would be $22 billion next year. What is the government going to do to reduce that deficit?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member would like me to repeat my previous answer. I answered him about our approach to the deficit. He talks about increased government expenditures. I point out to him that it is true that in the last budget expenditures of some $2.3 billion were forecast for this year and next year in order to create direct jobs and in order to increase assistance to housing, small businesses, fishermen, farmers and others. It is true that such expenditures were announced in the budget.

However, if the hon. member looks at the other side of the budget, he will see that that money is not increasing the deficit. As the hon. member himself says, there is a redistributive effect, and that money is the result.

Mr. Clark: Cutting old age pensions.

Mr. Trudeau: The Leader of the Opposition wants to get into this. I hope, Madam Speaker, you will recognize him before three o'clock, because we generally do not see him before three o'clock.

The reasoning behind the budget is not a Conservative reasoning. That is why hon. members opposite do not understand it. What we are doing is saying to those who have jobs, security and incomes, that they should share with those who do not have jobs, security and incomes. That is the philosophy behind the budget, and Canadians are open to that kind of thinking, even though it is foreign to the Tory Party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

DEFINITION OF NATIONAL EMERGENCY

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Madam Speaker, my question is also directed to the Prime Minister. The question really is what proportion of the economy of the country the government is taking, and it is clear the government is taking an increasing share at the expense of all Canadians, pensioners included.

The Prime Minister has indicated he would like Canadians voluntarily to follow the wage control program he has imposed on employees within the federal jurisdiction. In answer to a question during a news conference following the first ministers' meeting several weeks ago, he indicated he did not have the power to impose general controls except in the event that, and I quote:

—we would have to use our emergency powers and in order to have those emergency powers stick in front of the courts there has to be a recognized emergency.

Would the Prime Minister classify a failure by his government to achieve the co-operation of the provinces and the business and labour sectors as a failure which constitutes a national emergency?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member prefaced his question by indicating that the federal government was increasing its share of the gross national product by its spending. I point out to him that the share spent by the government directly on goods and services has fallen slightly over the past ten years. What has increased enormously is transfers to the provinces and, of course, service of the public debt. Perhaps the hon. member would like to refer to those statistics before misleading himself into believing that the federal government is suddenly occupying a larger part of the economic spectrum. It is not.

As to the question about recognizing an emergency, the hon. member knows the Constitution. He knows the judgment of the Supreme Court on the price and wage control program adopted in 1975. He will recall that that decision was that it is only in a national emergency that the federal government is constitutionally able to impose over-all wage and price controls. The definition of that emergency, according to some judges, depended very much on the attitude of the provinces. If the provinces themselves are not in any sense urging the federal government to use those powers, what I indicated at the press conference and in this House in response to the Leader of the New Democratic Party, is that it would probably be quite difficult to make it stick in the courts.

• (1425)

POSITION OF PRIME MINISTER

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is also for the Prime Minister. In 1974 when the Prime Minister felt there was a national emergency, interest rates were about 11 per cent, the inflation rate was about 11 per cent, the national deficit was about $1.6 billion, and 514,000 people were unemployed. Today interest rates and the prime rate are around 18 per cent, the inflation rate is around 11 per cent, the national debt is $20 billion, and 1,300,000 people are unemployed. And there is a liquidity crisis today in business. During all but nine months of the last eight years the Prime Minister has been the leader of this country. Would he tell the House what his bottom line is for economic indicators before he considers that there is an emergency? What are his options, except for the complete control of the Canadian economy?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, after arguing that there is a kind of emergency that would justify complete controls, the hon. member then asks what my options are except complete controls. I think he is like certain chickens that lay beautiful eggs, but then turn around and eat them. He should review his question.

I am not sure if he is arguing for controls or if he is arguing that there is a kind of emergency now which gives us constitutional power to impose controls. If it is the latter, then I would refer him to my previous answer and to the fact that in 1975 when this Parliament adopted over-all price and wage controls there had been two meetings of the premiers in August, 1974, and August, 1975, when they had urged the federal government to take its responsibility to bring inflation down. They have not done that in the recent meetings or in recent public statements. Perhaps they will at their August meeting; I do not know. They have not taken that point of view to date. That is the difference between 1975 and 1982.

HOUSING

MORTGAGE REDUCTION SCHEME

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister which concerns a new confusion in government policy which affects both would-be home owners and the building industry. In his budget speech the Minister of Finance announced the appointment of a blue ribbon committee which would examine the feasibility of a mortgage reduction scheme which, to use his words, if implemented would bring down mortgages by 3 to 6 per cent. On the weekend the minister responsible for housing took an entirely different approach. He said categorically that there would be such a scheme. In fact he urged Canadians to buy new homes now.

Will the Prime Minister clear up this confusion? Is the government certain that it will proceed with the 3 to 6 per cent mortgage reduction scheme, or is it still up in the air?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I have not read the speech of the hon. minister responsible for housing but, knowing him as I do, I suspect the confusion is probably in the questioner rather than in the minister. The Leader of the New Democratic Party knows that the new credit instrument the minister talked about is only to be reported on some time in late September. Consideration of implementing it would follow that. That is known to every minister and every member of the House, and certainly to the minister responsible for housing. The Minister of Finance brought in bridging financing which would make it profitable for people to buy a house now rather than wait for the report of the blue ribbon committee.

The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition shakes his head negatively, Madam Speaker. He is misinformed. The Minister of Finance announced a $3,000 grant for first-time home buyers or buyers of new homes. That is available now. The other measure, if implemented, would presumably take place much later this year.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, I say to the Prime Minister that it is he who is confused in his facts, not I.

REQUEST FOR GUARANTEE TO HOME PURCHASERS

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, this is important in light of what the minister responsible for housing said on television last night to the people of the country, when he urged them to go out and buy a home now. He was talking about the mortgage reduction scheme, not the $3,000 grant in this instance.

• (1430)

A difference of between 3 per cent to 6 per cent in the price of a home, as the Prime Minister should know, could mean hundreds of dollars per month in terms of payments. Therefore I should like the Prime Minister to speak in terms of government policy now. Is the government committed in principle to the scheme which will reduce mortgages by 3 per cent to 6 per cent, in line with what the minister told people in the country to do yesterday—to go out and buy on that assumption? If so, is he, as Prime Minister, prepared to guarantee to home purchasers that their mortgages will come down by 3 per cent to 6 per cent?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member calculated quickly that 3 per cent to 6 per cent would mean hundreds of dollars per month. Well, if he calculates quickly he will find that a couple of hundred dollars per month is something like $3,000.

Some hon. Members: Oh, come on!

Mr. McDermid: You have never had a mortgage, I can tell you that.

Mr. Trudeau: They have not found that over there. The $3,000, it is stated quite clearly in the budget, is something which goes into effect here and now.

Mr. McGrath: It is a one-time payment.

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, it is a one-time payment, because the expectation is that the other measure will be recommended and implemented. But until it is, the House can give no guarantee.

The minister deliberately set up a consultative mechanism partially in response to the criticism after the November budget that he had not consulted enough. In this particular case he set up this mechanism to ensure that he would have the support of the financial community and of other interested parties. But, in the meantime, he gave this offer of a one-time $3,000 grant. The two are distinct, but both are meant to help home owners.

MINISTER'S STATEMENT ON PROPOSED SCHEME

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I ask the Prime Minister to listen with care to the question. There are two different schemes. The Prime Minister is talking about one. I am talking about the one the minister discussed on television last night and discussed in an interview with The Toronto Star, namely, the mortgage reduction scheme. In Saturday's Toronto Star the minister is quoted as saying, "There is no question of chance. The plan will be implemented. The government is committed to it". That scheme is the mortgage reduction scheme. Will the Prime Minister, and therefore the government, not simply the minister, guarantee to Canadians who purchase homes now that they will benefit from the 3 per cent to 6 per cent reduction mortgage scheme which the minister promised?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is again referring to a speech which I have not read or heard. Therefore, what I answered in response to the first question is subject to me verifying it. But the hon. member knows that I could not give the guarantee which he is seeking. I do not think the minister himself would have given it.

Mr. Epp: He did on television last night.

Mr. Trudeau: Certainly it is the hope and the policy of government that it will be found acceptable and that it will be implemented. If this is what the minister was saying, certainly he was stating government policy. But if it was a guarantee that such and such a project will be adopted by this blue ribbon committee and then voted by the House, the hon. member is presuming on both the decision of the committee and on the decision of the House, which I know he would not do.

Mr. Broadbent: That is what Cosgrove did.

VIA RAIL

POSSIBLE FUTURE CUTBACKS—REQUEST FOR COMMITMENT TO PUBLIC HEARINGS

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Undoubtedly he has now had time to have perused the very comprehensive and constructive Senate report on the unilateral action of the minister last year to cut VIA Rail by 20 per cent. Since we are in the summer period again, would the minister give an unequivocal assurance and commitment to the House, following along recommendation No. 2 of the Senate report, that there will be no further cutbacks to VIA Rail operations or rail line abandonments unless and until the public forum route is followed?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, strangely enough the negative aspects of the Senate report have been emphasized, but I would say that I agree with 75 per cent of what the Senate report indicates. When it talks about fixed costs, for example, I would agree. When it talks about the need for legislation, I agree. It is really on the assessment of the capacity of the government to increase the subsidies going to VIA that the agreement between the Senate and myself breaks down. I simply do not think that it is possible for the government to go on adding to those subsidies until they reach $1 billion or more. That is why the government took the action that it took last year. I am also a bit surprised that the Senate report seems to imply that I was acting illegally when I took that action, as it was taken under Section 64 of the National Transportation Act. With respect to future cuts, I can say very simply that this is not the intention of the government at this time.

PRESENTATION OF DISCUSSION PAPER

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, coming to the last part of the answer in terms of future cuts at this time, we are talking possibly of another summer, or autumn, adjournment, whenever the House adjourns. Can the minister not give an assurance that there will be no cuts until the public forum route is followed?

I will not get into a debate on the substance of subsidies. Obviously if subsidies have to be paid out and the traffic is not there, one has to be responsible and to take action after a public discussion. That was part of the central theme of the Senate report, it being critical of the minister being able to discontinue unilaterally the passenger train service of the country. Perhaps that is the minister's wish; I do not know.

If the minister cannot give an assurance about any future cuts regardless of public discussion, when will the minister bring in the VIA Rail act and/or the discussion paper which he said would precede the VIA Rail act? Could we at least have that on the Table of the House before we get out of here?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I already said to the Standing Committee on Transport that I would be submitting a VIA paper. I was hoping to do so during the summer, but I can assure the hon. member that it will be there awaiting him to study it in committee in the fall. That is on the first point.

On the second point, I can only repeat that the National Transportation Act under Section 64 gives the government the right to do what it did. There are circumstances when it can be justified. I explained myself 100 times on that subject last summer. I cannot say that Section 64 of the National Transportation Act will never be used. I can only say, as I did a moment ago, that this is not the intention of government at this time.

QUERY RESPECTING THE HOLDING OF PUBLIC HEARINGS

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the same minister. It flows out of the conversations, press releases and press stories over the past two or three days. Is the minister leading the House to believe that he has no intention of going to the public hearing process before termination of VIA Rail services in the future, or is the minister agreeing with the all-party Senate report that there should be public hearings before the implementation of future rail cuts?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I have already indicated my intention, the intention of the government, but under the law it is possible for government to take either one of those two avenues. One is to proceed through hearings through the Canadian Transport Commission; the other one under Section 64 is to proceed by order in council. This is the law. The law has a purpose. The purpose is that when something concerns more than a single line it is proper for the government to use Section 64. I will repeat that it is not the intention of government at this time to go the massive way, the way we did under Section 64 last July.

HAVELOCK-PETERBOROUGH-TORONTO SERVICE

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, since it is the minister's intention not to go the route of unilateral action, and where possible to review it before committee and have hearings, would he at least give some credibility to that statement by agreeing not to terminate the VIA Rail service slated for September 6 from Havelock to Peterborough to Toronto, until he has at least fairly assessed the situation before proper hearings and has allowed those hearings to take place, in support of the Senate committee decision and recommendation that that process be followed, or will the minister continue on with unilateral action on September 6?

• (1440)

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I do not intend to give such an assurance. In the statement issued last July we said specifically that the three routes in the Toronto area were essentially commuter routes. The Government of Ontario has taken over responsibility for the Barrie and Stouffville routes. The Havelock route, which goes through Peterborough, has been the subject of a mixed approach. Some of it will become part of the metropolitan commuter service, the other part will disappear because there is not enough traffic of an inter-city nature to justify its existence. But the Government of Ontario, I am quite sure, will very responsibly make sure that travellers in the area are served by other modes of transportation, for example, buses.

LAW REFORM COMMISSION OF CANADA

OBSERVANCE OF SUNDAYS AND HOLIDAYS—PROVINCIAL RIGHT TO LEGISLATE

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. In March 1976, the Law Reform Commission of Canada submitted a report on the Lord's Day Act, in which it concluded that the federal government should repeal this legislation and transfer responsibility for legislating on the observance of the Lord's Day and other holidays to the provinces. I would like to ask the Minister of Justice whether, after the summer recess, he intends to table a bill to repeal the Lord's Day Act and transfer the right to legislate in this area to the provinces and the territories?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, we received a recommendation from the Law Reform Commission a few years ago, and we are discussing the matter with the provinces, because we cannot repeal the legislation until the provinces have formally decided to pass their own legislation. Our discussions with the provinces are continuing, and if they wish to take over this jurisdiction, we are willing to withdraw from this area.

HOUSING

APPLICATION OF CONTROL GUIDELINES TO CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister who indicated last week that the government was sending instructions to federal agencies to hold the line within the general framework of 6 per cent and 5 per cent on any increases they approve. Did the Prime Minister include Canada Mortgage and Housing in the list of agencies which received those instructions, and does he condone CMHC, over the last two weeks, increasing the prices of homes it has available for sale in many parts of Canada by $2,000, $3,000, and sometimes more than $4,000 per unit, in spite of the fact we are trying to put downward pressure on the inflationary spiral?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, there are two questions, the first on the government's directive. I did indeed write to all ministers and instruct them to the effect that regulatory bodies under their jurisdiction should be urged to stay at the 6 per cent and 5 per cent limits, with the exceptions which were indicated by the minister in the House.

In the particular case of Canada Mortgage and Housing, I would have to take the question as notice in order to deal with it. However, this is obviously a case where we are dealing with the cost of money to CMHC, which is just as high for that corporation as for anyone else. If it is attempting to—the hon. member looks puzzled. CMHC has to obtain its money from the government or the private sector, and that will bear on the price at which it can resell houses in its possession. The hon. member may be rightly puzzled; I would have to take notice of his question and see if I misunderstood it, and obtain an answer for it.

INCREASE IN SELLING PRICES

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, while the Prime Minister is looking into the matter he might consider whether it does not seem rather ridiculous to raise the price on a home, which could not be sold at the lower price, in an effort to move it in the marketplace? Does he feel it is reasonable to increase the price, first, by approximately the amount of the government grant for the purchase of homes, new or old; second, to do this on homes which have been on the market for six or eight months in some cases, at a time when we are trying to put downward pressure on inflation, not upward pressure as CMHC is doing?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The hon. member asks me if it seems reasonable. The way he puts the question, Madam Speaker, it does not seem reasonable to hope—

Mr. Deans: That is what I thought.

Mr. Trudeau: —that a house which will not be bought at a certain price will suddenly be bought at a higher price. But this is a theoretical question as far as I am concerned.

Mr. Deans: No, it is real.

Mr. Trudeau: Well, if the hon. member assures me it is real, I will look into the matter. It is perhaps something we should review. But the hon. member will understand that unless I get notice of the questions, I cannot possibly know everything which is done by everyone, everywhere, all the time, on everything.

Mr. Broadbent: Some of the time!

NATIONAL DEFENCE

DEFENCE SPENDING REPROFILING

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. The budget papers contain a reference to expenditure savings resulting in part from "defence spending reprofiling". Would the minister tell the House what exactly is meant by that phrase, and particularly the curious word "reprofiling"?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, the definition of "reprofiling" is, I suggest, using your judgment to see how you can save $100 million each year on the defence budget.

I know the second question of the hon. member is probably going to be how are we going to save $100 million on the defence budget, and I will answer it right away. I think this will be done through savings between the projected increase in remuneration paid to the forces, and the actual amount paid. I would like to mention too that the pay increase given last April to the forces remains in effect until next April. However, the projection was around 13 per cent, and we gave about 11 per cent, which means a saving of about $20 million for each percentage point.

Next year we have projected something like 10 per cent or 11 per cent, and according to the policy of the government, which we intend to abide by, we will give 6 per cent. We will save 5 per cent or 6 per cent, and this saving does not affect procurements or result in the cutting of personnel. It does not affect anything in the defence budget itself; it is strictly a saving.

OBSERVANCE OF RESPONSIBILITY TO NATO

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, the minister knows full well that the budget referred to military pay savings and defence spending reprofiling, and he has spoken only about the pay savings. He also knows full well that there will be no cuts in pay for the forces this year, yet the budget papers call for a $100 million reduction in the defence budget. Has the minister pointed out to our NATO allies that we are not going to be able even to come close to the 3 per cent increase in defence spending that we promised them and, for the fourth time in five years, Canada will not be living up to its promises?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I do not think the allegation of the hon. member for Victoria is exact. I think the 3 per cent has always been taken by all our NATO allies as an objective, on the condition that economic conditions prevail so that we can reach it. You have a good example in West Germany which is probably going to have a negative increase in defence spending this year because it cannot afford it. However, I can assure the hon. member that for the last seven years, as I have mentioned before, we have averaged about a 2.7 per cent or 2.8 per cent increase in the defence budget, which I think is a good performance on the part of this government.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

REPORTED SALES DEAL WITH RUSSIA

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. It has been reported for some time that there has been a multimillion dollar wheat deal consummated with Russia, but it would appear that the government is keeping the wraps on this deal. Has the deal been consummated, and is the government keeping the wraps on it?

• (1450)

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, there is nothing particularly secret about this deal. We gave advance notice of it to the United States and, although it is for a short-term credit, it is at market rates. In fact, according to its terms, it is considered by the OECD international rules to be a cash transaction. It is entirely a benefit to Canada. There is nothing shady, suspicious, or reprehensible about it.

Mr. Towers: I am somewhat mystified about the new spokesman for the Canadian Wheat Board.

EXTENSION OF CREDIT TERMS

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, would the minister be in a position to tell us whether or not there are credit terms being given to Russia, whether or not this is the first time this has ever happened, and what those terms are?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I believe this is the first time that any form of credit has been given to the Soviet Union. As I pointed out, it is on terms which are considered by international rules to be equivalent to cash. It is on the same kind of terms as are given by the Australian Wheat Board and also by private dealers in the United States itself.

Mr. Nielsen: What are they?

Oral Questions

INDUSTRIAL AND LABOUR ADJUSTMENT PROGRAM

APPROVAL OF LOANS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, would the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce tell us why the ILAP program has approved $17 million of loans for his own city and less than $1 million in loans for the whole province of Quebec?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): Madam Speaker, the program responds to demands from business people. The decisions are made by a panel of the Enterprise Development Board which is composed of a majority of private sector businessmen. I am sure they would be happy to respond to demands from firms in any of the designated communities, and there are a number in various provinces, including Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, as the applications come forward.

EMPLOYMENT OF OFFICIALS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Will the minister explain to the House of Commons why, since solicitation of inquiries is a fundamental part of the success of this program, there are two full-time officials soliciting projects in his own city and only two part-time employees of his department soliciting proposals in all of the province of Quebec which is the province where the phenomenon of job loss has been most acute?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): Madam Speaker, there are three communities designated in Quebec. The officials that he has mentioned—I think that one of them is full-time—are working not on soliciting proposals but on facilitating the analysis and presentation of the cases to the board. The two officials based in Windsor also deal with proposals from Chatham and a number of communities in the general Windsor area. So the balance, I think, is about the same.

REPORTED STATEMENT BY OFFICIAL

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, the minister would have read the report in La Presse which cites a public servant in his department as saying——that businesses in Ontario are being treated differently under the program.

[Translation]

[English]

The public servant went on to say that there is an old boy's network that works in Ontario to get grants for Ontario but does not work in Quebec to create jobs in Quebec. Will the minister tell us why that is the case?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): Madam Speaker, the suggestion in the La Presse report has a number of inaccuracies. What my hon. friend has mentioned is not attributed to anybody identified.

[Translation]

And I can assure my hon. colleague and the members of this House that the program is as active in the province of Quebec as it is in other provinces where communities have been designated. If he cares to check up on this, he will realize that most of the programs of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce are very well represented in the province of Quebec, in relation to its population. All I can say is that the article in La Presse is full of inaccuracies, and I am rather surprised the hon. member should have based his question on this inaccurate source.

[English]

Mr. Clark: One of the statements in that article was to quote the Liberal Member of Parliament for Shefford as saying that the government should stop blaming public servants and should put the blame on ministers where blame belongs for the failure to deal adequately with unemployment in that province.

FUNDING OF HOTEL CONSTRUCTION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, since we have now changed the provisions of the ILAP program to allow the federal government to fund hotel construction in the minister's home city, will the minister indicate to us whether the government is now prepared to fund hotel construction in other cities, and when will he be laying before the House of Commons a change in the terms of reference of the ILAP program?

An hon. Member: Gray is in!

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): Madam Speaker, my hon. friend, the Leader of the Opposition, is dealing with matters that were actually discussed in question period here some months ago. It must indicate that he is very pleased and satisfied with the budget policy of the government since, instead of basing his questions on matters of that sort, he is dealing with a matter that was fully discussed and explained in the House some time ago.

The provisions of the ILAP program have not been changed. The rules as announced at the time the program was announced said that, while the focus was on manufacturing and processing, commercial projects could be considered and decided on by the special panel of the Enterprise Development Board if the minister indicated they were of a commercial nature of such importance that they could be considered. This has always been the case. There have been projects other than in Windsor that have been the subject of the same exercise of discretion. In any event, the final decisions are made by the panel, not by the minister.

If there are hotel projects elsewhere that meet the same criteria as the one in Windsor I would be happy to exercise my discretion to make sure they are considered by the Enterprise Development Board. Once again, I hope the House will recognize that my right hon. friend is completely satisfied with our budget and our economic policy because he chose not even to raise a question about that over-all economic subject.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

HIRING OF UNEMPLOYED BRITISH COLUMBIA FORESTRY WORKERS

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, I understand that, in the absence of the Minister of Employment and Immigration, I am to direct my question to the Minister of Labour. There are 19,000 forestry workers in British Columbia out of work. That is 37 per cent of the work force. After numerous delays, the bridging program which is to provide emergency tree planting and the like, finally came about with federal and provincial agreement. Of the 19,000 who are out of work, only 117 have been employed through the bridging program. Is the government satisfied with this progress and, if not, what will the government do about it?

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member should know, the Minister of Employment and Immigration is never satisfied with the progress that he can make.

Mr. Nielsen: Neither is anyone else.

Mr. Caccia: He has repeatedly asked the members of the NDP to co-operate with him in improving the programs he is making available, particularly in the forest industry in British Columbia. We are very grateful that the hon. member has raised this matter today. I will certainly bring it to the attention of the minister so that he can personally reply to the hon. member.

Mr. Rose: I am interested to know that the minister of unemployment is never satisfied with his progress. I think he joins a cast of thousands in that.

Mr. Nielsen: Millions.

Mr. Rose: Perhaps even millions.

REQUEST FOR ADDITIONAL ASSISTANCE FOR UNEMPLOYED WORKERS

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, since my riding has 22 per cent of its work force down, and the city of Port Alberni has only 500 people working out of a work force out of 6,000, what will the minister do? When will he announce further emergency programs or announce extended benefits for UIC so that thousands of British Columbia forest workers will not be forced into the indignity—when they would prefer, need, and want to work—of accepting welfare?

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, the hon. member's question implies that emergency programs have already been announced. The hon. member is asking for further programs. I would urge him first to take advantage of the existing programs that the Minister of Employment and Immigration has already made available.

MINES AND MINING

LENGTH OF SHUTDOWNS

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of State for Mines. The minister will know that in the last two weeks we have seen shut-downs in most major mining communities across Canada, affecting over 40,000 workers. Last week she claimed that she was meeting with senior mining company officials. Is she prepared to tell the House today that those officials told her that those shutdowns which have taken effect in recent days will now likely be projected through the fall because of the first quarter losses of those mining companies and the major downturn in the economy since Easter, and that it will be, in fact, a very bleak Christmas for more than 40,000 mine workers in many mining communities from one end of Canada to the other?

Hon. Judy Erola (Minister of State (Mines)): Madam Speaker, since the hon. member was obviously not present at the meeting he will not know that this is not what we talked about although we recognized the difficult situation of the mining industry in this country. We had a far more positive approach to the problems we face here and the possibility and probability of designing programs that would put men to work and, perhaps, allow the industry to respond more quickly to an upturn in the market when it does come. They were most helpful.

• (1500)

JOB-CREATION FUNDING

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, it is interesting that the minister is wearing blue today. Last week it was green, and then pale green. It looks like it will be a very blue, blue Christmas for the mineworkers of Canada because she has once again failed to present to this House one positive initiative. I am surprised that she did not raise Section 38.

I want to ask the minister why it is that there is no designated relief for mineworkers in the approximately $500 million worth of job creation funding announced two weeks ago by the Minister of Finance, and why it is, in fact, that there is only a pittance going toward general relief in those resource sectors, which will create, as we heard a few moments ago, a few hundred or a few thousand jobs here and there. There is nothing to alleviate the $600 million worth of income loss which will occur in the mining sector alone because mineworkers will not be employed between now and Christmas.

Hon. Judy Erola (Minister of State (Mines)): Madam Speaker, the colour of my clothes is better than the egg all over the hon. member's face.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Erola: If the hon. member understood Section 38, he would be making for better use of it in the area of the country from which he comes. This section requires a great deal of co-operation from the industry, from the labour unions and from the communities. I urge all those hon. members who have mining communities within their jurisdiction to come forward to ask us about Section 38, and make it work in their communities.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

VIA RAIL

REPLY OF MR. PEPIN DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Ron Stewart (Simcoe South): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin), the minister in charge of destroying rail commuter service to the City of Barrie, stated in answer to a question by my colleague, the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm), that the province of Ontario was terminating the Barrie to Toronto train. I know that the minister would not want to mislead the House. There is no longer any such thing as a provincial Barrie to Toronto train. It is a Toronto to Bradford train.

Madam Speaker: That is obviously not a point of order. Statements by ministers or by hon. members may be corrected only by themselves, not by other hon. members.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. TAYLOR—DISPOSITION OF BILL C-201

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, my point of order involves another example of the sloppy, sneaky, arrogant way in which the Liberal government governs our country. Today I received a notice advising that Bill C-201, an act to amend the Holidays Act, would be before the House during private members' hour on Friday last, July 9. The notice said that second reading would be resumed, but the notice has not yet been posted on the members' bulletin board. I found that this bill received second reading, went through Committee of the Whole and received third reading on Friday last, all in a matter of five minutes without a quorum in the House.

Mr. Cousineau: You were not here! You would not know!

Mr. Taylor: I take exception to that. This is an improper way in which to pass legislation. I question the propriety and the legality of a law passed by fewer than 12 members out of 282. It is a sneaky, arrogant way of governing the country.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Madam Speaker, on this point of order, I would just like to say that as for the debate lasting only five minutes, we can assume that this is because the members of this House realized it was high time we took action. When hon. members are really determined, they can show the Canadian people that this House is able to proceed expeditiously with the passage of a bill that has been under discussion for some time, especially since no objections were raised by the Progressive Conservative members who were in the House.

Madam Speaker: As far as I know, all the proceedings which took place Friday afternoon were entirely in line with the procedure of the House of Commons, and unless the hon. member can show me that mistakes were actually made and that there was a breach of parliamentary procedure, I do not think the House will want to reconsider the action it took Friday afternoon.

[English]

Mr. Taylor: Madam Speaker, I suggest that hon. members should be notified in ample time when these bills are to be debated so that they can prepare to be here. This is simply another attempt to take everything that is biblical, and everything that is Anglo-Saxon, out of the laws of this country.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, on the last point of order, first of all, it is true, unfortunately, that I was not aware of what happened Friday, although I was very happy to hear the excellent news that our colleagues who were present in the House had the very good judgment to realize that the time had come, that Canada was sufficiently mature to want to call the first of July Canada Day.

Regarding the comment by the hon. member that members did not receive advance notice of the bill presented by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert), I can say that this is absolutely false. The hon. member must know that the list of bills to be debated during private members' hour is distributed in advance, and that Thursday, the day before, notice had been given to the representatives of his party, the whip and the deputy leader in the House, and the same applies to the New Democratic Party as is customary. Again, personally, I did not know about this, since I delegate private members' business to my parliamentary secretary (Mr. Smith), but once again, I was very pleased the bill was passed. In fact, we had hoped the bill would be passed during one of our very late nights but, unfortunately, the members present at the time were not yet mature enough; now, a few days later, it seems a miracle has happened and we have results at last. Therefore, Madam Speaker, there was not trickery involved. Hon. members received proper notice, parliamentary procedure was strictly followed, as you yourself indicated, and I think we should all be happy that from now on, we can celebrate the first of July as Canada Day.

[English]

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, I would like to point out two things concerning the business that came before the House during private members' hour last Friday afternoon. I did not see any bars on the doors to keep hon. members out.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rose: I do not think anyone was prevented from coming in here. If anyone suggests that there was a linguistic or racist motivation behind this matter, I think a question of privilege should be raised on the other side. Such francophone names as "Rose", "Baker", "Knowles", "Herbert" and "Smith" were among the people who were present.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: In reply to the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor), I must say that if he or anyone on that side did have objections of this nature, they should have been raised at the time the business was proceeding through the House. If proper notice had not been given concerning the business of the House, I am sure that some hon. member of the House would have thought of raising it. Furthermore, the hon. member said there was not a quorum. Having looked at the record of the proceedings, I do not know of anyone who called for a quorum. Therefore, the quorum did exist and unless anything to the contrary was recorded in Hansard, the House must accept the fact that there was a quorum when that particular bill was passed in the House. I am sorry, but there is no point of order.

PETITIONS

MR. JOE REID—PROPOSED TAXATION OF CERTAIN HEALTH CARE PLANS

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, this afternoon I have the pleasure of presenting a petition on behalf of 111 Niagara residents who are incensed with the November 12 budget and the proposal to tax employer-sponsored health, dental and vision care plans. They feel that this is an unfair tax at the expense of the ordinary working people of Canada and seek some rectification of this wrongdoing.

MR. FRETZ—RECONSIDERATION OF BILL C-10

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Madam Speaker, it is my duty to present a petition signed by 25 members of the Pentecostal Tabernacle in Port Colborne. The purpose of this petition is to protest the government's proposed changes in Bill C-10, which will allow a court of law to interfere in the affairs of the church body. The nature of the petition is to urge the government to drop the provisions in Bill C-10 which would infringe on the rights and privileges of the church to take a moral stand on matters concerning membership of that church body.

The petitioners hope that in your examination of the petition you will find the petition in order, and that you will exercise the discretionary powers vested in the office of Speaker of the House to allow discussion and referral to committee at the earliest possible time in order that the sanctity of the church in Canadian society can be preserved.

WARRANTS ISSUED UNDER OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT

Question No. 4,172—Mr. Robinson (Burnaby):

1. Since August 1, 1978, what was the number of requests from members of the RCMP to the Solicitor General for warrants under Section 16 of the Official Secrets Act?

2. How many of the requests were rejected?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): 1. The provisions of Section 16(5) of the Official Secrets Act require the Solicitor General of Canada to table annually a report to Parliament which identifies the numbers of warrants issued pursuant to the provisions of Section 16(2), Official Secrets Act in the immediately preceding year. As previously reported to Parliament, the numbers of warrants issued pursuant to Section 16(2), Official Secrets Act for the following years were:

1978 — 372 warrants
1979 — 299 warrants
1980 — 340 warrants
1981 — 380 warrants

2 and 3. It is not considered to be in the public interest to amplify information already contained in the parliamentary reports on Security Service operations involving the utilization of the provisions of Section 16 of the Official Secrets Act.

OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT

Question No. 4,307—Mr. Robinson (Burnaby):

Does the Solicitor General (a) agree (b) disagree with the McDonald commission's criticism that the annual reports to Parliament required by Section 16(5) of the Official Secrets Act, regarding the use of warrants issued pursuant to Section 16 of the act, are inadequate because they provide only a bare minimum of information and, if so, for what reason?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): The matters referred to in this question will be given consideration in the context of the government's review of the relevant portions of the reports of the McDonald Commission of Inquiry.

"HOW THE PEOPLE OF SASKATCHEWAN CAN MAKE MORE USE OF THE GOVERNMENT OF CANADA"

Question No. 4,335—Mr. Neil:

1. How many issues of the publication "How The People of Saskatchewan Can Make More Use Of The Government of Canada" were published?

2. What is the (a) circulation (b) cost of publishing of each issue?

3. Is it the intention of the government to circulate similar publications in other provinces and, if so, what is the estimated cost?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): 1. 285,000 copies were published.

2. (a) 250,000 copies were circulated. (b) approximately 50 cents per issue which includes all production costs.

3. The Canadian Unity Information Office has produced this publication as a pilot project and is presently considering the feasibility of producing similar publications for other provinces. It is difficult to calculate the estimated cost as cost per copy declines according to the number circulated.

Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): (a) A contract in the amount of $109,913 was awarded to Canadian Canners Limited for testing a new low energy mechanical system for peeling tomatoes to determine its suitability for processing tomato varieties grown in Canada and to compare the energy requirements of this system with other peeling systems such as caustic and steam. PUBLIC SECTOR COMPENSATION RESTRAINT ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING COMPENSATION IN THE PUBLIC SECTOR OF CANADA

The House resumed from Friday, July 9, 1982, consideration of the motion of Mr. Johnston that Bill C-124, respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Lincoln): Madam Speaker, I am more than happy to participate in the debate.

Mr. Nielsen: Filibuster!

Mr. Mackasey: The opposition House leader says filibuster. I suspect I had just fallen asleep for a few moments. I had intended to participate, but anticipated it would be much later in the day.

The other day I spoke on the budget noting, as I am sure most people have, that the budget was directed primarily to the problem of inflation. I suggested, and I repeat very briefly, that noted economists such as Thurow and others have always pointed out that in the case of inflationary trends there are winners and losers. These winners and losers achieve that status more often than not by misfortune rather than by good management. Winners are very obvious among Canadians fortunate enough to have savings in the banks and earning remarkably high interest. They are considered as winners. A company that can indiscriminately pass on its high interest rates as a cost of doing business to an element of captive consumers does not suffer abnormally from inflation. People whose salaries are totally indexed do not bear a fair burden of inflation. Nor do Canadians who for one reason or another find their income to be relatively insulated from the effects of inflation.

The losers are much more evident. They include many business people who for one reason or another have to borrow at rates considered usurious two years ago in order to meet the payroll and provide a cash flow to stave off a recession in their plant for whatever reason. Also, the farm community must borrow money to buy seed. The fishermen must borrow either to repair or buy new nets. Then there is the home owner who innocently and in good faith bought a home one, two or three years ago and is now faced with the problem of mortgage renewal.

There are no winners and losers in unemployment. Everybody loses in periods of high unemployment. That is what is happening in this country. We now have close to a million and a half people out of work, people who for the most part would prefer to work. They cannot quite understand why in the space of 24 months a healthy, wealthy country finds itself with the type of economic problems we have before us.

As I mentioned last week, there are some areas in which nothing can be done by the Canadian government. We cannot control the price of commodities. We cannot restore the price of $1.20 per pound for copper rather than the present world price of 60 cents. We cannot do anything about the price of lumber, lead, zinc, gold or silver. Those prices will be increased and improved as the general economy of our trading partners improves. Our problem is that when their recovery begins, we must be in a competitive position to take advantage of their resurgence.

I do not think anyone considers an inflation rate of 12 per cent to be very competitive compared with that of the Americans, our largest trading partner. Therefore, it is imperative that all of us look at the problem of inflation to see what we can do both as a collective society and as individual Canadians.

Having suggested in the budget the other evening that there are winners and losers, we have tried to do something about the plight of the losers by deindexing our income, providing more money for the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) to allocate and distribute. He was able to indicate an increase in housing starts, giving financial help to that industry, which is one of our traditional ways to recover in this country. He was able to indicate some interest relief from high mortgage rates for people facing mortgage renewals as well as those who want to buy a home.

The minister was able to allocate funds to the business community, the farm community and the fishermen. He was able to do that because he asked other Canadians more fortunate, those who have an income that can be taxed, to share the burden with these less fortunate people. He asked us to do that by paying increased taxes and reducing to some extent our total protection against inflation through indexing in order to provide moneys to the government to help these people in such a way that we do not increase the deficit, which is of concern to some people.

Thurow and other economists quite often remind us that inflation has been an issue, a phenomenon if you like, which goes back thousands of years. In pure economic terms, the solution is fairly simple. Thurow pointed out four or five ways that inflation can be controlled. He quite properly points out that each and everyone of them requires a political decision. As one man's income is increased, another man's income must be reduced. The problem that all of us face is whose incomes are to be curtailed and whose are to be protected? How do we help the less fortunate? The budget has gone a long way toward doing that.

Thurow points out that not too many years ago Germany and Switzerland were able to curtail dramatically expansion money in those countries. This drove their unemployment levels very high, brought their inflation rates down and protected their currencies. They exported their unemployed back to their countries of origin, which were Portugal, Spain and others. He pointed out that the tight monetary policy in vogue now in industrial nations will in time produce the effect of reducing inflation, but he also pointed out that because of the time factor there will be damage, harm, stigmatization and unemployment. Those are the byproducts of this policy of absurdly tight money. When combined with the selfish attitude of the Americans with their high interest rates, which bear little or no relationship to their level of inflation, the problem is compounded for Canadians in all walks of life.

Thurow pointed out, quite logically, that voluntary controls are as effective and fair a way of controlling inflation as anything else devised. He also pointed out that this is not a perfect society and that everybody is in favour of restraint, provided they do not have to practise it.

In its budget this government has asked Canadians to restrain their demands and expectations voluntarily. Parliamentarians from all parties have answered that challenge, and that is reflected in the bill we are discussing, Bill C-124. Members of Parliament and members of the Senate have voluntarily agreed to reduce their pay increases to 6 per cent and 5 per cent over the next two years, recognizing that if this spirit of voluntary restraint can be extended across the nation to other public servants and other groups in society, this can go a long way to bringing inflation down.

No one has suggested, least of all the Minister of Finance or the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston), that the movement toward this voluntary restraint is something that is being accepted without question. However, it is encouraging to note that Thursday and Friday leaders of the business community and leaders of the labour movement gave some support—in fact, more than just a little support—to the concept. There is growing evidence on hot lines and radio programs and from the feedback we are getting that yes, Canadians are prepared to put a little water into their wine, as French-speaking Canadians are apt to put it, to restrain their demands and to accept less than full compensation for inflation in their pay increases, if they can be convinced that that money will be used to help the less fortunate, to stimulate the economy, to get the housing market back on track and to recreate jobs rather than add to unemployment.

One point raised by some labour leaders—and with justification—is that they want some evidence that they will not be the only group making a sacrifice. They want some evidence that, if they curtail their demands, the business community will curtail prices. It is significant that as inflation drops 3 per cent or 4 per cent over the next year, there will be less and less rationale or reason for regulated industries and services to plead before regulatory bodies for increases in their rates to offset inflation.

The concept of sharing and voluntary restraint is something I think Canadians can live with. They are in fact a little intrigued with it and are prepared to adopt and support it. Nobody should attempt to tell the Canadian public that this is much more than rough justice, that there will not be some imperfections in the concept and that there will not be some people who will have to bear a different burden—unintentionally—from others. However, let us weigh the alternative. A million and a half Canadians are out of work, many for the first time. Many people have never known the need to restrain. Many have never lived in a period of recession or depression. What we are starting here could very well bring an end to growing unemployment and stimulate the economy. Slowly but surely it could create more jobs over the next six months and reduce unemployment.

I think people will respond. The challenge of the front benches is to make that message clear and with some passion and conviction. It is very, very hard to ask Canadians to join in a crusade against inflation if for some reason they think we are not fully behind it ourselves or if we do not think it can work. It can work.

In one of his later books, "Five Economic Challenges", Thurow drew the analogy between voluntary restraint and attending a football or baseball game. In the excitement of the game or a play people in the first ten rows inevitably stand, blocking the view of the people behind them. The people behind say, "If only they would restrain themselves, we could all see." In many ways this situation is the same. If we all restrain our demands over the next year or two, inflation will come down and we will all be in the same relative position. It will be painless but effective.

Are Canadians prepared to take this step? I think so. The alternatives are price and wage controls at some time—always difficult in a federal system—and more unemployment, until finally inflation drops with a thud and we start all over again the laborious, time-consuming and difficult job of restimulating the economy, reducing unemployment and putting people back to work.

I do not intend to get into the specifics of Bill C-124. I am not sure to what extent the President of the Treasury Board will want to amend certain provisions of the bill in committee. It seems to me that rather than deny collective bargaining in its entirety he might want to look at the arbitration route for settling not only grievances but also other provisions in collective agreements dealing with safety, health and other conditions, which in many collective agreements are more important than money.

I suppose the one thing that motivated me to participate in this debate was that I have been somewhat appalled and concerned about some of the things I have been reading and hearing, both in the House and on radio and on television, which reflect total ignorance of the competence, sensitivity and humanity of our public servants. Perhaps I grew up in an era when no one challenged the fact that the Canadian public service was the best in the world. I still have that view because I have dealt with the Canadian public service for the last 20 years both as a minister and as a backbencher. Perhaps it is because I am a former minister of labour that I know the components of the public service. Public servants are not all Ph.Ds earning $75,000. They include the messenger and the cleaner—we used to call her the charlady—the jitney driver, the printer in the printing plant, the clerk and the stenographer. These are people we take for granted. They are fellow Canadians. They are decent people, but their earnings come closer to $10,000 than to $20,000 or $30,000.

It is unfortunate that somehow we think we have to stigmatize our public servants. I hear from people who should know better, in my own party and in the House, people who fail to understand that if you treat the public service as an equal, which it is, if you put your problems to them in a fair way, if you say that Canadians are not doing their jobs and remind them of it, you will find that they will respond in a very positive way.

When I first joined the Department of Labour, Mr. Speaker, it was a pretty rundown, demoralized department that was given to me. I found within weeks that the senior officials in that department could be stimulated, could respond if challenged and were prepared to participate in decision-making and in policy-making. I found to my surprise that 40 or 50 of them at least held a Ph. D. in economics, particularly in the research field. More than once I tried to probe as to why they had remained silent and why they were not participants. Sooner or later it came out that they tried in the past but found that nobody really cared, so why should they, they said.

We are bringing forward a bill to limit the salary increases of our employees, for very good reasons—because our employees are the people of Canada. There are employees, too, in the House, and the people of Canada, the taxpayers, pay them salaries as public servants, in increasing numbers. There are well over a million persons at the moment who have no income from jobs, so it is only logical and normal that those employees who have job security in the public service should restrain their demands and accept the provisions of Bill C-124.

I would hope that, in rationalizing the provisions of Bill C-124, the reasons for it, somehow we do not give the impression that we should reduce the salaries of public servants because generally they are overpaid and underworked and making a mess of it. Nothing is further from the truth. If you go into the unemployment insurance office at the moment or into the Department of Manpower or into any of the places where people are dealt with, you will find tired, weary, polite, efficient people, whose workload increases as our population grows and as we demand more and more. I would be very upset if, somehow, at the end of all this exercise, we were left with the mistaken impression that somehow our public service is second to that of any other country in the world.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would plead with workers across the country to realize that voluntary restraint can be justified if for no other reason than that it works. Hundreds of thousands of unfortunate Canadians, fellow workers, want to get back to work sooner rather than later.

I mentioned this to a friend on the weekend who promptly referred to some labour leaders in a rather derogatory form. It is vital that the politicians should understand that there is a great similarity between Members of Parliament and union leaders. Union leaders must get elected too. They have to say some things sometimes in a rather harsh way. They have to generalize in their statements. They have to satisfy the majority of their members. They are elected by employed people, not by unemployed people. So when they appear selfish sometimes in their statements, they are speaking for their constituents, who are the employed, not the unemployed. That does not mean that they must not take into consideration the problems of the less fortunate. Probably many thousands of those who are out of work now would not have been so if this government had not been forced into a very tight monetary position. When people say there must be a better way, the better way is that we as Canadians agree to restrain our demands a little and bear some of the burden of the less fortunate.

Like everyone else, Mr. Speaker, I want to see some visible evidence of co-operation on the part of the business community. We want to see that this is not a one-way exercise but that they fully intend to restrain prices, that they fully intend to get behind the concept. Fortunately, their balance sheets or their profit and loss statements taken in the first three months indicate that the business community are very anxious and will have to be anxious about their falling profits and will co-operate with government and labour.

I would recommend, Mr. Speaker, that Bill C-124 be adopted as quickly as possible, so that it can go to committee stage. The minister may want to look at some of the clauses that appear to make the bill a little more difficult than it has to be. He may want to explore the possibility of referring certain matters during the life of a collective agreement to arbitration rather than freeze them entirely.

Mr. Fraser: Would the hon. member permit a question, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Mackasey: Yes.

Mr. Fraser: I ask the question of the hon. member because his experience in labour matters is well known to all members of this House and he served in that capacity with some distinction in the past. I wonder whether the hon. member has considered the effect of Bill C-124 on the joint bargaining tradition which has existed now for many years within the railway transportation business in Canada, in the industry. As the hon. member will know, Canadian National employees bargain jointly with Canadian Pacific employees. The result of that is that they have for all practical purposes the same contract.

Under this particular bill—and I will be very short, Mr. Speaker—on January 1, 1983, Canadian Pacific employees will take the benefit of the second year contract—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member will have an opportunity to participate in the debate. If he wants to put a question, he should put his question.

Mr. Fraser: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I am in your hands. I appreciate that I have been overly long. The effect will be that Canadian National employees will be under the limits proposed by this bill. I am asking the hon. member if he is including that particular anomaly as one of the things that he thinks should be referred for special consideration.

Mr. Mackasey: I have no hesitation in answering that, Mr. Speaker. The member's facts are quite accurate. However, although the parties bargain jointly it would be wrong to think that the collective agreements are identical. In fact, it came as a surprise one year when I was negotiating a settlement in the railways to find that the CNR collective agreement was different in the west than in the east.

It was due to tradition, to particular problems, to problems of geography and the Fraser canyon, and many other things. As a general rule, as the hon. member said, the bargaining sessions are collective. In hard agreements such as of wages particularly, and things of that nature, they are always identical. In fact, the railways have always insisted that one group should be the same as the other rather than be different. This is a very valid issue to be raised at the appropriate moment with the minister in the hope that it can be resolved. The hon. member will appreciate, I am sure, as a former postmaster, that the same thing occurs in the post office. We try to have the same wages and the same basic conditions.

The whole point is that this bill cannot be expected to be introduced—and I said this earlier—at such short notice, as it had to be, and be totally equitable across the board. It cannot be. There will be winners and there will be losers. We have an obligation to minimize that negative impact or imbalance, but the situation which the hon. member has mentioned is certainly deserving of some deeper thought on the part of the minister.

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to speak on Bill C-124 today. I agree with the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Mackasey) that it would be wise to get the bill into committee as soon as we can. There are some specific amendments which should be helpful to those affected and which indeed may be instructive to those who may be affected down the road.

At this stage, however, on second reading we are dealing with the principles behind the bill. I will not take the time of the House today to deal with some of the specifics that we will be dealing with in committee. I want to spend my time, Mr. Speaker, looking at what I think are the significant principles involved and some of the problems that arise from those principles.

I think the principles are three in number. Obviously, the first principle of the bill involves the question of restraint; second, the bill involves the principle of collective bargaining; third, the bill involves the principle of equity and fairness. I wish to deal with these three principles as expeditiously as I can. It might be helpful to spend more time on the principle of restraint than hon. members opposite have.

• (1540)

These days, restraint is in the air. Just the other day the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) indicated that he thinks restraint is so important that he is calling for a national crusade for the government's restraint program. The new banner line of the government has become sharing and co-operation. We hear those words daily from ministers of the Crown. All of those things are considered to be important in what the government and many people in the country regard as the problem of what to do about restraint.

Restraint is not a word or a concept that we have spent much time considering in the past 35 years. There is one simple, sole reason for dwelling on the question of restraint in the past year or two and perhaps for the next few years. Obviously we are concerned about restraint because of inflation.

Inflation is the problem of the eighties in the same sense that the depression was the problem of the thirties. There are some people who, for whatever reason, paid little enough attention to it. Inflation is the one economic category that steals from everyone, that destroys our ability to protect our future; it is the one economic category that hurts poor people and middle-income people far more than it does rich people. It is absolutely essential, if Canadians are asked by the government to join some national crusade, that they understand what causes inflation and that they see whether the proper remedies for it are being proposed.

Inflation is not new, we have had it for centuries. It was caused by wars, by bad harvests, by the infusion of gold and silver into the marketplace, by waste and mismanagement of governments and enterprises. We have always had inflation and the classic pattern was always the same. In good times, economic boom times, production went up, employment went up and prices went up. In bad times, in times of economic recession, prices went down, production went down and employment went down. What was new in the latter part of the seventies and the early part of the eighties was that employment is down, production is down and prices are up. That is the essential dilemma. Economists have no clear answer for dealing with it.

In this part of the twentieth century we have arrived at a time when we can no longer make clear sense of our economic situation. Employment is down, production is down and prices are up, so we have met the essential economic dilemma of our time. Moreover, inflation of that order is worldwide. Indeed, inflation throughout the western world and in many other parts of the world has become chronic, endemic, escalating and uncontrollable.

If it has become all of those things, then why do we not understand it better? If it hurts us so much and it has become so difficult to deal with and to root out and cure, why do we not understand it better? I am no economist but I know that, if we look back over the past 35 years since World War II, we see some changes which have taken place which would lead us to see what steps could be taken to curb inflation.

There are a number of reasons for inflation, Mr. Speaker. The first, and I think the most important, is our attitude to growth after the war. We felt that we should always have growth and that everyone should enjoy growth. The idea of growth became important. Everyone wanted it and for the first time in our history government assumed responsibility for it.

In 1949 the Government of Canada took responsibility for the level of employment in this country. Up to that time it had been left to the normal changes of the business cycle.

Why did this change take place? It was in part because of the depression in the thirties and in part because of the war. People wanted good times, not bad times. They wanted never-ending growth. During the latter part of the depression, during World War II and the late forties, we felt that through the economic theories of Lord Keynes we could control the business cycle and get rid of the chronic economic problem of boom and bust. As well, we were interested in never-ending growth because of the cold war. There was competition between economic systems. The result was that our attitude toward growth and our demand that the government deliver it was such that as the size and importance of government increased, its share of public spending and of the gross national product escalated.

By the mid-fifties we had established the essential link that the government was responsible for growth. At the same time we began to see the emergence of inflation as a chronic problem. That is the first reason for inflation, the attitude toward growth and the demand that the government deliver it at all times to all people.

The second reason is less clear but is perhaps more important in the long run. In the last 35 years we saw a new climate of expectation created. We established the idea of more, that everyone should have more. Everyone's family, friends and neighbours should have more. The idea of more began to be the significant attitude, the predominant attitude of most people. It began to replace some older virtues. We began to drop them off during the fifties, sixties and seventies. Hard work, thrift and frugality began to be submerged by the need for more, to the extent that even if we could not pay for more we sought ways to borrow in order to get more. That was true not only for people but for institutions as well—banks, for example.

I remember going into a bank when I was a lad. It was a very formidable institution with a high oak table and a little cage. Behind that cage and looking very severe was the teller. I was taking the money earned on my paper route to put it in the bank. I was taught that if I put it in the bank and saved it, I would learn the magic of 5 per cent. I would learn that if I worked hard and saved my money, I would get money in return. I knew that if I put it into that bank they would do the same thing, invest it. I went back to that bank about 20 years later, in the early sixties, and I noticed that all the oak tables had gone. The very severe teller had gone and the cage had gone. It was all very colourful. They had colour on the walls, people were happy and cheerful; but what really caught my eye was that there was a boat right in the middle of the bank floor. The bank was running a raffle, and the bank said that if I bought a ticket for $1 I could win the boat. I could get something for nothing. All I had to do was get the right number. I did not have to work for it, I did not have to guess, I just had to buy the right ticket. Our institutions and our people, Mr. Speaker, over 35 years slowly changed the traditional economic attitude that we had and moved into the concept of "more".

• (1550)

The third reason for inflation, Mr. Speaker, is that we began to feel we could control the imponderables of economics. We could control the business cycle. The war and the post-war period taught us that. We were unable to accept the proposition that bad times might come, that busts for businesses might come. We decided that was not acceptable and that we could control the business cycle.

Fourth, businesses learned that it was essential to control prices and stabilize markets; competition was not a good thing and was to be avoided by whatever method within the law. In short, the government began to provide a net not only for people but for business enterprise as well, and slowly the concentration of economic power by large corporations and large unions began to make a mockery out of the fact that you could manipulate prices by the simple mechanism of the market.

The fifth reason for inflation, Mr. Speaker, was that in order to have the other four grow, governments had to expand liquidity. They had to create money. The grease for "more" was money. So they began to expand the money supply.

All of those factors established the reality of inflation. It is worthwhile mentioning them again so it is clear, because I find very few of these addressed in the bill before us. Maybe there is more coming, but very few of these causes of inflation are reflected in this bill. First is the attitude towards growth and government responsibility for it, and therefore government's growth. Second is the philosophy of "more". Third is the assumption we can control the business cycle to suit our purposes. Fourth is the concentration of power, by both business and labour. Fifth is the constant increase in the money supply to keep the rest going.

That, I think, is the shortest way I can point out what has happened, and the result of it all, I repeat, has been that inflation in the early 1980s has become chronic, endemic, accelerating and uncontrollable. Anyone not willing to face that fact is neither serving themselves nor indeed the people they represent.

We began in the late seventies and now in the early eighties, Mr. Speaker, to look at policies which might fix it up. These were policies which were used in various countries, more in some than in others, and different in some places than in others. Squeezing the money supply was used in a number of countries. There was cutting back on government spending, and raising taxes to limit consumption. Wage or price controls were imposed, or guidelines given. Economic co-operation was sought through an incomes policy. We lived, if I can describe it this way, and are living now in a world of stop and go. We have stop policies and go policies. The stop policies are to bring inflation down, but what they do is increase inequities and frustrations in people. When those inequities and frustrations get too high, we quit the stop policies and put in the go policies which allow us to deal a little more with the inequities and frustrations; but they, of course, cause inflation to go back up to where it was before. So we have gone around and around on the merry-go-round. That is our basic dilemma, Mr. Speaker, which we have not yet been able to deal with.

So the government has announced it is going to have a program of restraint, a national crusade. In order for it to work, Mr. Speaker, the government, like anyone else, has to answer the ancient economic problem posed in these two questions: Who gets to work? Who gets how much? Those are the fundamentals of economics.

As for who gets to work, in a period of growth we do not have to worry too much about it because new entrants and those displaced by technological change can get jobs. So the question of who gets to work is answered by growth.

As for who gets how much, when the pie is increasing and everyone's slice is increasing, that question is not a big problem. But when we have slow growth or no growth, when we have restraint, then we have to figure out what will be just and fair in terms of who gets how much. A program of restraint, therefore, requires the inclusion of two principles: one, that we have freedom of choice; two, that it be fair and equitable. A program of restraint which does not offer freedom of choice and fairness and equity will not succeed.

That brings me to the second principle, Mr. Speaker. This bill not only deals with the principle of restraint, it deals with collective bargaining. Since 1872 collective bargaining has been the way in which we in this country have solved the economic problem of who gets how much. This is not a happy time for the principle of collective bargaining because people have found it an easy scapegoat, aided somewhat by the abuse of the right to strike and confrontation tactics between labour and management.

Interestingly enough, however, most of the great successes in collective bargaining go unreported and unheralded. Year after year tens of thousands of collective agreements are signed and they become the way in which we decide who gets how much. In a free society it is the mechanism of collective bargaining which we have used to determine that question. I hope we never underestimate the value of the principle of collective bargaining. It struck me that those who have never been great supporters of that principle fail to understand that at the root of the whole question of Poland some months ago—let Poland be Poland—was the desire on the part of Solidarity to have the collective bargaining rights and privileges which Canadians have enjoyed for decades.

I want to know why the government wants to throw out the principle of collective bargaining or why it wants to freeze collective bargaining. I am not talking about the right to strike here; I am talking about the way in which collective bargaining was used traditionally in the country so that people were able to see it as fair and equitable. For example, the government is saying that it wants to restrain compensation by 6 per cent in the first year and by 5 per cent in the second year. At the same time it is saying that that restraint will be applied to everyone, whether one happens to be a corporate president or a charperson, whether one happens to be earning $9,000, $10,000 or $109,000. It assumes rather sloppily that the progressive income tax system will take care of the inequities. It will not, and the government knows it.

Why does the government not add up the total amount which the 6 per cent and 5 per cent restraints give and then let the collective bargaining system distribute it, rather than impose it? The government will not obtain co-operation by imposing it. It could have exactly the same effect but allow the collective bargaining system to work so that it can be distributed fairly to people.

The collective bargaining system has allowed for stability in our industries. Anyone can obtain stability without freedom, anyone can obtain freedom without stability, but it takes years of learning, co-operation and tradition to create a system which allows both stability and freedom to exist side by side. For example, the country has benefited immensely for the past 90 years in the railway industry beause there has been the growth of the tradition of collective bargaining. In the railway industry there are 16 unions, 11 railroads, and 90,000 people. We have industrywide bargaining in the railway business, so there is one joint agreement.

I have here a number of agreements current over the next two years. They involve Canadian Pacific Railway, Canadian National Railways, Dominion Atlantic, Ontario Northland, Quebec Central, Algoma Central, Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway, Esquimalt and Nanaimo, Toronto Terminals, Grand River Railway Company, Northern Rail, Shawinigan Falls and VIA Rail. Those agreements are with non-operating unions. I have another agreement involving the Shop Crafts and Locomotive Engineers. All railway agreements work toward a joint agreement. That fact developed by railways and unions has given us stability over these many years. We should not underestimate this because the country is built on the railroads. We need for normal commerce, both internal and external, a transportation system which provides stability at prices we can afford. It has been worked out over the years by management and by labour. Indeed, there have only been three strikes in this century in the railway business.

Unless this bill is changed, it will bring to an end industry-wide bargaining in the railway industry because it requires that CN operate under the 6 per cent and 5 per cent wage restraints, while CP and all other railroads do not. It not only affects the wages of employees, but it affects their benefits, their health and welfare schemes and their pensions. We will have people working side by side in the same job in the same shop and on the same locomotive for years at different prices and with different benefits, because different unions will be negotiating with different railroads for different workers at different times. They will never get it back.

When the bill goes to committee it is absolutely essential for the government to listen to what railway unions, management and the railroads have to say. Collective bargaining is a principle that is not only a nice one, it gives freedom and stability. At the same time it gives the economic stability we require for the normal operation of the commerce of the country.

My friend has just given me a telegram which is testimony to the points I have made with respect to the railroads. It is from the Vancouver Board of Trade and concerns the situation faced by railroads. It reads:

> We fear that, if inequities develop in compensation paid by the two railways, there could be critical rail service disruptions. We ask your assurance that legislation will provide safeguards against this serious threat.

We must bear in mind that we are talking about unions which are the most responsible in the country. Unless there is a change in the bill, we are heading for short-term instability and long-term chaos in the transportation industry. The bill not only affects railroads, including CNR affiliates and wholly-owned subsidiaries, but the trucking industry as well.

The hon. member for Lincoln said that the bill was rushed through in a difficult time. This may well be, but it does nothing for people's confidence in the government because it is putting through a bill which will destroy 90 years of collective bargaining in the most significant industry in the country. It angers people that the government is not competent enough to think this through. When it comes to committee stage of the bill, I hope government members will go beyond their normal "Yes, we agree with cabinet", and think clearly about what witnesses on behalf of the railway unions, management and the railroads have to say.

Aside from the principle of restraint and the principle of collective bargaining, this bill touches upon the principle of equity. The government will not restrain anyone unless the person thinks it is fair and other people are being dealt with in the same manner. This is why people worry as they look at how the government conducts itself with respect to other people.

It is not fair that the government can deindex income tax and cap wages, which make it harder for low-income people. It is not fair that the corporate president, as I mentioned earlier, is treated the same way in terms of the 6 per cent and 5 per cent as the charlady. It is not fair that those who receive perks of office—and we know who they are and what they are—such as hidden income, are not treated the same way as other people who are affected by the 6 per cent and 5 per cent caps. It is not fair that the government can put 6 per cent and 5 per cent restraints on the salaries of some people and we do not even know what are the salaries of presidents of corporations. Surely equity requires that the government put its cards on the table and tell us what these people earn; they are being paid by the public. It is not fair that the 6 per cent and 5 per cent cappings do not include fees of consulting and professional services directly for the government.

Miss MacDonald: That is $1 billion worth.

Mr. Crombie: As the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) says, it is $1 billion worth of business. Why are they not included? I realize that they are part of the government's patronage system, but why should they not be part of the 6 per cent world?

• (1610)

Ministers of the Crown have restraint under this bill only because they are Members of Parliament. They earn $104,100. As an example, they receive a $2,000 car allowance. Ministers of the Crown receive that allowance which was introduced as a restraint measure in 1930 to replace a car and chauffeur. Now they have the car and chauffeur back and still receive the $2,000.

Mr. Kelly: Did you hand yours in?

Mr. Crombie: When the public service is to be brought under a restraint program, the government—not just this government but any government—has an obligation to see how it conducts itself, and not just the people who serve it.

It is also not fair that just before Bill C-124 was introduced, Bill C-123 was brought in, which allows for the reorganization of certain government departments with the addition of four new parliamentary secretaries—four new Liberal backbenchers—which means an additional $6,900 each. Why is that fair? If those members are sincerely interested in showing some moral leadership in the restraint program, they would indicate that they would be willing to do the work without the extra compensation. However, I do not believe that is what we will see.

Even if it can be justified, is it wise or fair that, days before the budget was introduced with wage restraints proposed for the public service, ministers' staffs received increases of 10 per cent, not 5 per cent or 6 per cent? Lawyers in the Justice Department had increases of 11 per cent. It is these actions which question the government's moral authority to implement this restraint program.

I might say that I agree wholeheartedly with the comments of my friend, the hon. member for Lincoln, that civil servants are easy to categorize and shunt around. But one can have nothing but respect for the people you work with who are working for the Canadian government on behalf of the people of Canada.

This brings me to the question of equity in terms of the public service. There is one figure which has always impressed me. Women fill only 4.3 per cent of senior management positions but comprise 82 per cent of the lower paid administrative and clerical positions.

Miss MacDonald: Right on!

Mr. Crombie: They will be hard pressed to understand that any affirmative action programs within the public service that will be of any benefit to them will no longer be operated through the collective bargaining system, since it has been frozen by the government through this bill. Are we to think that this will contribute to the sense of fair play that the government's program is supposed to provide?

My colleague, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) talked about the national crusade and the crusaders. As we look at the national crusade of restraint we have to look at the tainted wings of the crusaders, because in the final analysis many people do not understand all of the program and the numbers, its applications and effects. For example, very few people understand that this is a bill not only dealing with restraint but one which takes away collective bargaining as well. People do not understand the consequences of the entire bill. That is why they very often do not judge by what is being said but by who is saying it; not by what is promised but by who is promising it. That is why, when it comes to the ability of the government to put through a wage restraint program in the public service, its chance of success is directly related to whether or not people regard what the government has to say as honest and believable. In short, whether or not they have any confidence in the government to carry out wage restraints.

That confidence has been undermined by government policy and government statements. For example, the fact that the deficit in the budget went up to $19.6 billion is not the most important factor. It is the fact that eight months ago the government said its deficit would be $10.5 billion. It is very difficult to have confidence in a government which makes a mistake in its understanding of the future of the economy in saying that its deficit would be $10.5 billion and it ends up at $19.6 billion. It is not only the fact that the deficit has doubled; the government could not see or did not know this would happen. It is bad enough that it doubled, but it is worse that the government did not foresee it.

The government showed its lack of leadership when it came in with a budget on November 12 which called for restraint and put its own spending at 22 per cent. It came in with its next budget on June 28, which again called for restraint and, indeed, wage restraint for the public service, when its own spending for 1982-83 was increased by 20 per cent. People take their lead not from what is said but from what is done. This government has shown that it may be one thing for it to preach restraint but that it does entirely the opposite.

I conclude by saying that this bill is more than meets the eye. It is far less than meets expectations. It is not purely and simply a bill to restrict the wages of public servants to 6 per cent and 5 per cent. What is at stake is whether or not the government itself will be able to change in order to muster its own moral authority, which the country needs in order to have a restraint program. There is nothing wrong with restraint. There is nothing wrong with people recognizing again that the only way to progress is to exercise some frugality, and that the only way to make use of the country's natural resources is not by squandering them but by husbanding them.

While some people believe that we must exercise growth and optimism or else the belief will be that we will head in the other direction, most people in running their lives realize that if they do not look after their own resources and husband them, and if they do not discipline themselves, they will not be able to depend in the future on the bounty coming forward.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has said that he is challenging Canadians. I have never heard such arrogance in my life—that we need the Prime Minister to say that his job is to challenge Canadians into restraint. Anyone who walks along the street and goes into stores, factories or shops knows that for the last two or three years people have slowly begun to change. Canadians have said, "Sure, I want more, but I know that in order to have more I must remember some of the older virtues of working hard, thrift and saving." They also know that much is dependent upon themselves in their communities. That is why this bill, and this Prime Minister, I might say, are not on the cutting edge of change. That is insipient arrogance which words fail me to describe.

All the government is doing is desperately trying to catch up to Canadians, who understood long ago that if there is to be any salvation for this country it depends on them and their ability to change their habits and be able to make the country work. As they watch this government they know for sure that they cannot depend on it to do either of those two things.

PUBLIC SECTOR COMPENSATION RESTRAINT ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING COMPENSATION IN THE PUBLIC SECTOR OF CANADA

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Johnston that Bill C-124, respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Mr. Speaker, before I begin my remarks I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) on an excellent analysis of the problems of world inflation. However, I think he failed to add two very important points to the five points he mentioned. What he did not say was that the world has been practising the lunacy of spending $500 billion of its income each year on armaments. If that kind of money is to be spent on armaments, it will not be used to feed, clothe and shelter hungry people or to provide them with warmth, sustenance and medicine.

I consider the other point he did not mention to be a very important factor. If it has not already made itself felt, it will affect our children in the future. For years, perhaps for even a century of industrialized society, we have been passing the social cost off to future generations. Future generations will pay for the frivolity with which we have treated our environment. We have used our air as a sewer and we will pay the cost in acid rain. We have used our rivers as sewers and we are paying the cost right now. This year, the Fraser River in British Columbia had to be closed to fishing, and there are probably many similar examples which could be cited.

We are concerned over the number of people who have been and will be deprived of jobs in Canada and perhaps throughout the world. We have not begun to have a glimpse of the impact of the technological society, the automated society, and what it will do to us in a relatively short time.

Bill C-124, derived from the budget, has all the earmarks of some attitudinal survey, as if it were based on something that pollsters like Martin Goldfarb or Allan Gregg might have come out with. Those pollsters have probably gone out and discovered that certain buzz words are accepted in society, buzz words such as "sharing", "co-operation" and "solidarity". These words are supposedly reassuring to the masses. They seem to pop out of every Liberal speech as if they were there because they had a particularly confident, caring sound. I could not prove it but I certainly suspect that that is how it happened. The surprising word is "solidarity". The expression "solidarity forever", formerly had a mildly left-wing taint to it, but not any more, not since Lech Walesa. It is now perfectly acceptable and even polite in society; it has found a new respectability.

I think that if someone were to suggest that this budget was sort of whomped up, he would probably find that he was wrong and that this is part of a policy which probably goes back two or three years. Some would say that it is a conspiracy. I would not be so extravagant as to use such excessive language, but I believe it goes back at least two or three years. Its purpose was to soften us up for this day, when we are told "Tighten your belts and lessen your demands. We are threatened. Lower your expectations." The only thing the government has not said is "Tote that barge and lift that bale".

That is the sense of what we are being asked. The people of Canada are being asked to participate in a crusade. Guess who wants to lead us in a crusade to the promised land to slay whatever is slain in the promised land, such as dragons or infidels? The very infidels who got us into this trouble now want to lead us out of it, and they ask us to have confidence. The dragons are at the helm.

On the other hand, I hear an accusation from the Liberal side concerning anyone who has the audacity to complain that we do not want to become part of the 6 per cent world, the wonderful world of 6 per cent. I think all of us would accept that world if we felt is was a 6 per cent world of prices and profits, not just a 6 per cent world of wages. If we say that it will not work, as it did not work the last time, or that it is unfair or inequitable, we are almost accused by some of being disloyal Canadians because we will not fall for Bill C-124. I, for one, will not be accused of being a disloyal Canadian because I happen to analyse the bill and its intention somewhat differently from that of the government, the desperately cornered government which has made a mess out of everything.

We are told by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) that we cannot get ahead of our trading partners. What does he mean by that? Our trading partners in what? What do we sell, besides auto parts, with a high wage component? Wheat? That is 3 per cent of the economy. Lumber and pulp is perhaps 16 per cent. Does that have a high wage component? Ore is 11 per cent. The rest of it can be forgotten; that is, most of it. Who are these trading partners? They are the United States to whom we sell 73 per cent, Japan to whom we sell 6 per cent, and Britain to whom we sell 3 per cent. I do not understand how it can be said that our wages might get ahead of those of our trading partners, because what do we sell with a high wage component, to justify the stand that the government is taking? The only exception is auto parts and we are behind the United States in comparative wages.

People have a right to make judgments about the government, and they do make judgments about the government. I know that Your Honour's attitude will be that of an objective speaker. What would Your Honour think of a government that allowed wages to fall behind inflation for five years in a row and then blamed the workers for inflation? There has been no wage-push inflation in Canada, but we are certainly paying for it with the loss of 1,200 jobs a day. A small community of jobs is going down the drain each and every day. In the last six months 100,000 manufacturing jobs have been lost in Quebec alone.

Let us compare our wages with those of our trading partners. In 1980, manufacturing wages were about $11.94 per hour in West Germany. In the U.S. they were $9.92 per hour; in Canada they were $9.06; in Japan they were $5.88; in Britain, they were $7.07. What were the increases in the period since 1975? Wages in West Germany have gone up 91 per cent; in the U.S. 56 per cent; in Canada 48 per cent; in Japan 95 per cent; and in Britain 116 per cent. Canada has fallen behind for five years in a row. We have the lowest wage increase since 1975, but we are told that we have wage-push inflation. We are told that we must somehow lessen our demands, we must do with less and have less security. More of us must be out of work and more of us must pay high interest rates.

What is the situation in Japan? That is a major competitor for manufactured goods. The Japanese have a lifetime job promise not to be fired at the whim of a company such as B.C. Tel or Bell Canada. They receive bonuses every six months if a company earns a profit. Whoever heard of bonuses here? All one sees is confrontation. Japanese who work for corporations receive low-interest loans when buying homes, and the use of vacation cottages if they need a summer holiday, as probably most of us do. There is much government-industry planning. Those are the privileges in Japan compared to the type of security of the average Canadian or, for that matter, American worker. It is no wonder that the Japanese are willing to co-operate.

Supposing we do all of this and supposing we accept the 6 per cent solution, what will be the quid pro quo? What will the government do for us? Will it guarantee, for instance, that we will have lower land prices or lower prices for anything that we purchase? Of course not. It will do exactly what it did the last time: it will freeze workers' wages at 7.5 per cent and let inflation go to 9 per cent. We did that in 1975. That is why some people are a little cynical about joining this crusade. It is a little hard for us sometimes, just a little bit difficult. That is one example.

What would you think, Mr. Speaker, of a government which robs people of their homes and businesses through high interest rates and then brings in a budget which does nothing about that? We heard the musings of the minister of housing about lowering interest rates when he appeared over national television on the weekend. When the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was asked about that today, he either feigned or proved that he did not know anything about it. I do not know what people feel about their promises.

A lady in my constituency sold her house on May 28. She put in $25,000 and got out $1,900. She says at least they do not owe the credit union anything. That family took a bath. She is a school teacher and cannot afford that kind of expense.

I listened to what high interest rates have done to one businessman. He has been in business for 25 years and has a $1,200,000 mill. He pays the bank $6,000 a month in interest. The bank shut him down. That put 56 people out of work. That is what high interest rates have done. We are asked to take less, to limit our demands to 6 per cent, no matter who it is. What is the government going to do about prices or interest rates? Silence, deafening silence.

In 1980 bank interest was 2.6 per cent above the inflation rate. Today it is 8 per cent above the inflation rate. We now hear that some banks are in trouble, that their profits are down. They certainly deserve to be down; they have almost had a Roman carnival for the last two years. If their profits are down slightly these days, I do not think anyone should worry too much about that. As the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) said a few months ago, the banks ought to bleed a little.

What would you think of a government that signs deals to increase petroleum prices 30 per cent per year, 10 per cent on July 1 alone? It is taking $1.8 billion more out of the hides of consumers. It wants us to limit our demands to 6 per cent, but refuses to try and negotiate energy deals. These 10 per cent, 10 per cent, 10 per cent increases every six months will mean that by 1986 the same people who are frozen to 6 per cent and 5 per cent will be paying $1,900 to heat the average home and $1,700 to drive a car. At the same time, world oil prices are tumbling, falling from $40 a barrel to $32.50. We are still pumping up our prices. Esso is in bad shape. It had to lay off a lot of people. A year ago its profits were $140 million; now they are only $40 million. Esso is really hurting. That is the third example I would give when asked to make comparisons and join a crusade.

What do you think of a government that is prepared to give away billions in order to push Candu reactors on every tinpot dictatorship in the world? This government was prepared to give the Mexicans two $6 billion Candu reactors, depending on the life of the contract, up to $1 billion each in export development or payment subsidies, interest subsidized loans. The government was going to borrow at 14 per cent and give it to the Mexicans at 7 per cent, simply for financing.

The school teacher in my constituency was paying 22 per cent interest on her home. She would like the equivalent of a Candu reactor deal that we are prepared to give to Mexico, to Rumania—Argentina is completed—to Korea, or to anyone who wants to line up. We do not care, we will sell them one. As a matter of fact, we will help them buy it so that we can rescue an industry that nobody needs right now because we are beginning to conserve electrical power. Nobody wants nuclear energy because it is poisonous. You cannot get rid of the waste material. We could make plutonium into a nice chummy little bomb.

What do you think of a government that would pump billions into nuclear energy, billions into armaments and billions to poke holes in the Beaufort Sea but has no money or very little for conservation, alternative energy or any kind of different lifestyle? The party is over on those biggies. If you have nothing but a megastrategy such as Alsands, Cold Lake, a big coal deal, nuclear strategy, and those flop, you do not have anything. In the meantime we have allowed our manufacturing base to wither away.

What would you think of a government that chisels old age pensioners out of $300 million, $300 each over the next two years, by limiting indexing? That pension which was fought for for years and years is threatened. Universality is threatened. It is on its last legs. It is out. If you have a 10 or 12 per cent inflation rate and indexation of 6 per cent, you have destroyed universality. You have cost every old age pensioner who receives OAS $300 in the next two years, totalling $300 million because there are roughly one million old age pensioners.

In the two years that follow, the cumulative loss will be $900 million. If you want to shell-game that money into some other program, that is one thing. However, if you do not do that, you have deprived the economy of that much money because these old people do not squirrel it away, they spend it. They have very little disposable income.

Some will say that the old age pensioners have all kinds of money. There may be 200 or 300 millionaires in Canada who do not need it. It will not hurt them a bit. That amounts to admitting that your tax system is inadequate to recapture. In other words, it favours the rich. You cannot have it both ways. You cannot say they do not need it and you will recapture it, because you will not do it. This stunt, and that is all it is, is an admission that the tax system discriminates in favour of the rich.

As a result of this budget, low-income earners will have a 50 per cent tax increase. If you earn $100,000, you will get a 3 per cent tax increase. If you earn $200,000 like the heads of some corporations, and I could name them, the captains of industry, the industrial maggots of Canada—sorry, the magnets—you will now be paying less tax under the new budget.

Miss Jewett: The typhoons!

Mr. Rose: It is not that they do not create jobs, not that they are not nice fellows or worthy people. The point is that if their income is limited to 5 or 6 per cent for the next year and they are making $500,000, it does not mean very much. Five per cent is $25,000. That is probably double the income of a sweeper working for the civil service in Winnipeg. That is a big deal for them. If they earn $12,000 a year, 5 per cent of that will be $600. That is not enough to pay the rent and the groceries. That is the fifth point.

What do you think, Mr. Speaker, of a government that, in addition to those five obscene things, goes on to break contracts with public servants? Retired public servants paid 1 per cent for their indexing all the time they worked for the government so that the inflation factor would be looked after in their retirement. If you do not have some sort of indexing, every day you are retired your purchasing power drains away. Those opposite will argue that it will drain away anyway if we do not counter inflation. I do not think we will counter inflation by this technique. In any event, these people have paid for this. Who are they? What are their incomes? Can they afford to be without that indexing or to have their indexing reduced to 6 per cent while they paid for 12 per cent or whatever rate would prevail? I will tell you who they are. They are people who have an average of $7,900 income per year. That is below what a lot of people regard as the poverty line. Some of them are spouses on survivor benefits, and the average for them is $2,171.

What niggardly, chiselly, small-mindedness, possessed the government to do that is beyond me. I just do not understand it. Someone said, I think it was the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie), that we have got to get this bill to committee. We sure do. I hope the government will be flexible. I am not in that great a hurry to get the bill to committee, because my colleagues and I think that there is a good deal more to be said on this bill. We are not going to hustle it on. We want everyone to know what is happening and what is being done to people. These are people who paid for their inflation protection all the time that they worked.

What would you think, Mr. Speaker, of a government that has embraced policies that have destroyed the value of our dollar? What does that mean? It means that everything we import, whether a can of tomatoes or whatever, costs us more. You may say that we do not need to import tomatoes. The fact is that we do import tomatoes, and canned tomatoes too. That is because we sold out all our canning industry 20 years ago; there is not one left except Canada Packers. The rest in Canada are the big five from the United States.

We have resource-based policies, but there is no market for resources so there are deficits. We have foreign investment policies which mean that every time some people invest here in an equity situation they buy out more of our country. When things get tough they take the research and development, they take the foreign-owned subsidiaries and hustle them back to the United States or somewhere else. This is the kind of policy that we are talking about.

These are the policies that have destroyed our dollar. Instead of hustling along with the pipeline to take Canadian oil to the Atlantic provinces, we are still spending $10 billion each year on oil compensation. Those are the policies, and they are the people who want to lead this crusade to the promised land.

For the first time in months, Mr. Speaker, our balance of payments is on the plus side. We should all be happy about that. Do you know why it is on the plus side? Because imports are down, not because exports are up. That is to say, we are less able to buy things we want to buy from abroad. Keep this up and we will have a terrific balance of payments. We will have a tremendous balance of payments, really favourable; all we have to do is pauperize Canadians some more so that they will not be able to buy anything imported. Of course, the country will be broke, but our balance of payments picture will look good. This is what we have got, this is what we will have, and this is what these crusaders want us to be proud of and to follow. But we are not going to let them do this.

What would you think, Mr. Speaker, of a government with a policy that forces 4,500 businesses into bankruptcy this year, smashing the dreams of thousands of people? It is putting more people on the dole because more and more money has been snatched out of the economy so they cannot buy things. There are 5,500 people out of work in the forest industry in Port Alberni and they are not going to be very good customers at the local dry goods store or the 15-cent store.

What has been happening in this society is that the rules have been changed. We have a credit crisis. People would like to buy homes, they would like to buy cars, they would like to buy farm machinery, but they are afraid to do so because they do not know what the payments will be like. They do not know whether they will be able to meet the payments. That is the credit crisis. That is forcing 25 bankruptcies of small businesses per day. It was once just the small-business man who was having trouble with financing. Now it is the large ones, too.

What would you think of a government, Mr. Speaker, that singles out public servants as scapegoats? That means taking public servants as merely the shock troops, I suppose, in our battle against inflation. Who are these people? I mentioned the sweeper; 6 per cent of a $12,000 wage means $600. I mentioned the deputy minister earning $100,000; he gets $6,000. Then there are the sweepers, the janitors, the messengers, the waitresses, the hospital workers, all on an average of about $11,000 or $12,000 a year.

If there is one point, Mr. Speaker, that I think has to be made, and I think it is going to be made and needs to be made over and over again, it is that equality of treatment is not equity. To be equitable is not to treat the janitor the same way as the deputy minister, because the janitor has far less disposable income. Therefore, he has far higher fixed costs and can control his life far less. It is more difficult for him.

The President of the Treasury Board, when he spoke on this matter, said that he wanted to preserve the pecking order. He said he did not want to alter the ladder system, so that when the great new world came about two years down the road we would be able to pick up and carry on with our contracts. In other words, he wanted to freeze the existing inequities. If there is anything that needs to be changed, it is the pecking order. That is what needs to be changed.

If the minister walked in here and said: "Look, under $30,000, full indexing; $30,000 to $50,000, partial indexing; and freeze every salary over $50,000," we still would not vote for it. I still would not vote for it, because I do not agree that this is going to work anyway. We still would not vote for it, but it would make a lot more sense than what we have got.

I could go through the winners and losers in this thing. I could name them. They are all in the Ottawa Citizen today, or some time recently. Believe me, the big winners are not the people on the low end of the scale. They are never big winners. This time they risk being big losers.

What would you think, Mr. Speaker, of a government that breaks contracts with its own employees, especially women? The government says, in essence, that in order to make democracy work we have to take away your democratic rights. That is essentially what they say. They say: "For two years we are not going to negotiate anything; you are frozen at 6 per cent. Maternity benefits are out; affirmative action, equal pay for equal work, health and safety, those things are not negotiable, because for two years we are not going to negotiate anything." And it is the same with anything else that may come up, such as technological change.

Who are these people? About 80 per cent of the women in the civil service are low paid or relatively low paid. They are secretarial staff, janitorial staff, and those in that kind of clerk position, in 80 per cent of the cases. About 4 per cent of female workers belong to management.

The people who bear the brunt are the poor people, the old people, the women and the young people. The young people will not even be able to get a job. It will be very difficult to face a graduating class next year. We have seen what this government has done. It has broken faith with its own workers. It has contracts coming up that we negotiated in good faith and what is the government going to do with them? It is going to cop out on them; that is what it is going to do. So collective bargaining is out.

What do you do about Air Canada and CP Air, Mr. Speaker? The flight attendants belong to the same union, as do the railway workers who were mentioned too. But no one has mentioned the Dairy Commission; it has a raise coming up. And those concerned with grain handling have coming up in September a negotiated raise of 10 per cent. All the national marketing agencies are getting raises. Are there any guidelines? Or did this government simply walk in on this 6 per cent idea without thinking of federal-provincial agreements or agreements with marketing agencies? That factor is gone, or at least it has not been mentioned, it has not surfaced.

I asked the Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox) the other day what he was going to do about regulatory bodies and were they going to be frozen to 6 per cent. I am speaking of regulatory bodies like the CTC and the CRTC. I was told that Bell was different. It was quoted in the press: "Bell is different." Why should anyone invest in Bell, says the minister, if they can get 15 per cent on their bonds? That is true. Why should you? But Bell wants a 25 per cent increase. The doctors of Ontario want a 25 per cent increase. The nurses of Ontario want a 25 per cent increase.

• (1650)

Mr. Orlikow: And they will get it.

Mr. Rose: B.C. Tel employees just received an 18 per cent increase, and we are told we cannot feeeze the profits of those people to 6 per cent because that would not be good for the investment climate. Bell said, "We will limit our people earning over $100,000 to 6 per cent". These are Bell's middle-management people. Bell wrote to me and told me that. I thought that sounded pretty good. It sounded terrific.

I know these managers will really suffer if they lose $6,000 a year, but if Bell really wants to help the country, why does it not lower its subscriber rates? That would put millions of dollars more into the economy. Perhaps people would buy things at the grocery store, or even the phone mart store. I do not know, but lowering rates might be a real help. But Bell will not lower its rates. B.C. Tel not only will carry on with the 18 per cent increase it was granted recently but it now also promises to lay off 2,000 workers. If this government does not roll back that last increase and if B.C. Tel proceeds to lay 2,000 workers off, then we will know. We will know that this 5 per cent and 6 per cent inflation fight will be borne by the average worker and not by the corporate sector. In any event, this is what the Financial Post says:

> Greenshields analysts also believe the telephone industry's future is "very favourable." Preferred buy: Bell Canada, "although we see strong merit in B.C. Telephone."

Of course they see strong merit in B.C. Tel, because B.C. Tel will lay off workers and continue with increased subscriber rates. B.C. Tel will also continue to provide rotten service.

There is something else. What about a government which favours investors and savers over salary earners and spenders? Our savings have never been so high, due to the policies of this government. The government came out last year with Canada Savings Bonds carrying the interest rate of 19 per cent. Why in the name of sanity would anyone invest in a mine or business to get a 15 per cent return when he can get that much out of Canada Savings Bonds? So what happens? We close mines in Newfoundland and other places. These people have all their money tied up in cash. There is no enterprise in that. We must bring interest rates down to at least 1 per cent above the inflation rate. If we are not prepared to do that, all schemes are useless and there will be a lot of suffering producing no results.

We have never mentioned prices, profits, the professional fees of doctors, lawyers, surveyors and accountants, and incomes from investment. Are they to be limited to 6 per cent? Of course not. We have to make the pot richer.

However, what we will do is reduce the effectiveness of FIRA. The Foreign Investment Review Agency is supposed to help our country, according to some people, including hon. members on my right. If we want to sell this country out really fast, we can weaken FIRA. We will get more foreign investment and more foreign purchasing. A small-business man in my riding makes canopies for trucks. The Foreign Investment Review Agency which does not publish what it is doing, nor does it give reasons for doing what it does. In any event, it let an American canopy firm go to Annacis Island in the riding of my colleague, the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett), and that put two Canadian canopy firms out of business. Does the operator of the canopy firm in my riding want to see FIRA weakened? Of course he does not. The United States has far tougher buy-U.S. and invest-in-U.S. laws than we do. The Americans keep foreign subsidiaries out by many means. But what are we going to do? If a company is worth $2 million and has 100 employees, we say that is too restrictive and we cannot have FIRA piddling around with that little stuff. What little stuff, the high-tech industries or the small sawmills in the riding of my colleague, the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Kristiansen), which are to be purchased holus-bolus by foreign investors because we are going to change the criteria to $5 million and 200 employees?

What should we think of a government which indulges in the old shell game of steal from social programs? That is what it has done. It did that in relation to block funding for universities and medicare. Where did this $3,000 loan for houses come from? People can get $3,000 grants. Did that come from the old age pensioners? I think it is a good program. I think the small business program is not a bad program either, but what is it doing for interest rates? Somebody mentioned that the Americans have an inflation rate of 7.5 per cent, but their interest rate is 17 per cent. Did a low inflation rate bring interest rates down in the United States?

Mr. Blackburn: No way.

Mr. Rose: Of course it did not.

What about a government which plans, as the minister announced, to raise unemployment insurance premiums paid by everyone who works to pay for the enforced idleness of those who have been put out of work? Even in the minister's own riding of Cape Breton Highlands-Canso there are 18,000 people collecting unemployment insurance but only 9,000 people listed as being unemployed. How could 18,000 people be collecting unemployment insurance when only 9,000 are listed as unemployed? I suppose the worst thing is the spread of fear among those who have jobs to soften them up so that we will accept less. It makes lay-offs acceptable!

I do not know the man who wrote the following article in the Vancouver Sun. It is a sarcastic article. It says:

> Canadian workers would be better off if they were paid less.
>
> Poor people must be given less money to make them work harder.
>
> Rich people need more money to expand the economy.
>
> The free market causes land prices to soar, which allows speculators to buy hockey teams and baseball teams and football teams, which is good.
>
> High interest rates are necessary to reduce inflation, make work for bankruptcy lawyers, and create opportunities for the happily unemployed.
>
> Unions are going to destroy this country by fighting for better pensions, proper health and safety legislation, medicare, equal pay, the minimum wage for farmworkers, and decent maternity leave.
> Tighten your belts, Canadians, 'cause we have to compete with three-dollar per day militarized, beaten, tear-gassed South Koreans.
>
> Expand the military!
> Cut back social services!
> Isn't free enterprise the greatest?

I have been told the reason the last budget was a failure was that it was prepared by bureaucrats. Perhaps they are sitting up in the gallery. It was not political enough; there was no input from the caucus. But this time there is. If members of the Liberal Party ever get home for the summer, they can say they have had their input. They had their Kingston conference, and we were told the bureaucrats were not even allowed to see the budget. I do not know what hon. members opposite will tell their constituents after they have told them there is some aid in the budget for small business. Some of the provisions for housing are good, but I wonder if they will tell their constituents that their government broke contracts with the public service and raised taxes, except for the very wealthy, and that it chiselled old age pensioners out of $300 million over the next two years. The government did nothing about interest rates. There is little for job expansion, and Canadians are left with an $18 billion deficit.

Mr. Stewart: Twenty.

Mr. Rose: In fact, the government has guaranteed a bigger deficit because as incomes fall, government costs for welfare, UIC and lack of taxes paid are bound to rise. That will make the deficit even greater.

Hon. members opposite are jubilant about this so called political budget. I hope they will go out and tell the whole truth to their constituents about what this budget and Bill C-124 are really designed to do. The design is to have a massive redistribution of income away from working people and into capital and profits for corporations. And hon. members opposite ask the people to join in that crusade! It is not equitable, it is not fair, it probably will not work because it is a hoax.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Hon. members will note that the Chair is not following the usual practice of alternating between left and right. If no other hon. member stands, the Chair will recognize the hon. member who is standing, the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Kristiansen).

• (1700)

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, in the circumstances perhaps I may be forgiven for saying that it would occur to an objective observer that there is a certain lack of commitment evident in the feelings of some of those who have suggested that they see something unfair in the legislation before us. The manner in which they are jumping at the opportunity of expressing the grievances of those who will suffer as a result of Bill C-124 shows that their fervour is somewhat lacking. That is not surprising in view of some of the contradictory statements we have heard from members of the official opposition in the last while. I hope it is simply an aberration and that they will find their consciences and their feet in the next few hours and days.

In commencing my remarks on what I consider to be one of the most damnable and discriminatory pieces of class legislation that I have had the misfortune to consider since being elected to this chamber of horrors, I feel compelled to warn you, Mr. Speaker, and any other possibly faint-hearted member that the deep feelings I hold on the nature of the subject before us may cause me to slip or, perhaps to put it more appropriately, to escalate into what might be described as lunchroom terminology, backwoods vocabulary or just plain speaking.

I shall try to restrain myself but these feelings are not mine alone; they are those of many people I have worked with over the years. They are so strong that it may be difficult to restrain some of the more volatile expressions and terminology that may be appropriate. I make no apology for that because, in spite of the fact that I have been a member of what is sometimes ludicrously called this House of Commons—and I have to wonder at the word "Commons" when we deal with legislation of this kind—for some two and a half years, I am still an industrial worker and a trade unionist in conscience and at heart. I am proud of that. I feel compelled, in spite of the sometimes phony sophistication of this place, to call a spade a bloody shovel.

As a prelude to the statements and accusations to come, I should also say that the Conservative Party will invoke my wrath and anger every bit as much as the Liberal government, because in spite of its mealy-mouthed and hypocritical effusions of mock protestation, Bill C-124 is a classic example of that party's thin blue line of knee-jerk reactionary conservatism in practice.

When it comes to the rights, needs and legitimate aspirations of honest, hard-working people, the shallow, hollow little men and women of the Conservative Party to my right are every bit as mean, deaf, dumb and blind in the political and economic sense as are the overstuffed apostles of Liberalism across the way.

Bill C-124, an act respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada, is bad law. It is unfair, it is unwise, it is discriminatory and it is counterproductive. It is based upon a lie and it is wrong. Quite simply, it is an attack upon the very spirit and soul of a democratic society. It seeks to place the burden for our society's ills on the shoulders of those who are the servants, not the masters, of Canada's governmental and economic system.

I should like to quote from a document that is rather well known in the annals of western democratic evolution, the Magna Carta of 1215. Part VI of that document reads as follows:

Clauses to control the behaviour of royal officials, particularly those of local government. No town or individual shall be forced to make bridges or maintain river banks—

Nothing could be more clearly designed to show the absolute moral bankruptcy of a government that chooses as a scapegoat for its own ineptitude and failures the servants of the people, the public employees of this nation. The Magna Carta was presented to King John in the year 1215. Because some of those opposed to him were referred to as those who robbed the rich to give to the poor, one can only assume that what he was representing, and what this government which is acting like him represents, are those who would steal from the poor to give to the rich. Relatively speaking, that is exactly what this bill is about.

We have heard a lot of talk about crusades. Perhaps we need some more crusaders but different from those of 1215. Perhaps we need someone who will attempt to seek some form of redress or an appeal for justice on behalf of those rendered powerless, either to help themselves, or to have any significant say in what to do or how to do it for the majority of their waking lives, namely, when they are at work.

The actions of the Liberal government and the Conservative opposition in this situation remind me of a parable related to me and the leader of this party, the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent), by an old Doukhobor gentleman who called in to us during an open line show in Trail, British Columbia, some two and a half years ago. He told us that the Russian people have a saying that, "no one ever mentions the wolf; it was the goat that ate the sheep." That may be very simple but it is surprising how close it is to the truth in the present situation. No one is talking about the wolf being to blame for the present situation but somebody sure is looking for a goat.

We are in a desperate situation in this country, Mr. Speaker, and we all recognize that. I gather from some of the things that were said at the meetings between the government and the provincial premiers, between representatives of the federal government and the business and corporate leaders and between leaders of the Canadian Labour Congress and the government in the last few days, that things may be more desperate than anyone has admitted up to this point. We would be among the first to agree that if times are as tough as they appear to be, it is going to require much more of a coming together and much more of a spirit of true compromise between the different interest groups in our society and representatives of political parties than has been normal over the past few years. If we are to achieve that in a constructive way, then there must be some acceptance of good faith on the part of all parties involved.

It is a hollow appeal to ask of working people in particular but also ask of those who have not had the opportunity for some months and years to engage in remunerative work to make the first sacrifices.

A young plywood plant worker from my home town of Nelson, B.C., wrote some words on the subject last November, about the time some 100,000 people gathered on Parliament Hill to protest the high, avaricious and usurious level of interest rates that were threatening to drive many people out of their homes. His words say a lot about attitudes justifiably held by many people at this point. I should like to take the opportunity to put on the record of the House the words to a song that this young man wrote. In clear and in more understandable terms than many of us are capable of expressing, they recount the horrors and feelings of anger and frustration of many people. This song was written in November, 1981, by Chris Hart, a single parent with a little boy:

• (1710)

Interest rates are giving my soul a beating
I don't know how long I can keep on eating
I've got a little boy back home in B.C.

And I tell you Pierre He's counting on me
To give him breakfast in the morning
And a lunch to take to school
To buy him warm boots for the winter
And now I feel like a fool
Cause Santa Claus stays in the trunk this year
It's never been this bad before
It's a sorry situation my friend
When a working man can't make a living no more
I used to have a job in a plywood mill
If I had my choice I'd be there still
I made the best plywood I could you see
There was no good reason this happened to me
But nobody's buying plywood
To build houses they can't afford
It seems that everybody's had to stop what they're doing
Since the interest rates have soared
We're just looking for a little leadership
You're supposed to be good at that
I'm ready to practice some civil disobedience
Against the ones still getting fat
Bankers are reporting record profits
They've sure got their fingers deep in my pockets
The Feds say it's all going according to plan
They're gonna lay the blame on the working man
But a quiet people anger
Slowly at the start
I feel the anger rising quickly now
Soon to blow apart
If the banker takes my home away
I'm not sure what I'll do
But if I fight with him and lose Pierre
I'm coming after you, Yes I am
I'm coming after you.

Those are not phony words, Mr. Speaker. They were written by a young single parent who last week was not only told that he was going to continue to be laid off after having worked for not more than two or three weeks since last fall in the plywood plant in which he has some eight or nine years' seniority, but that the mill was closing permanently. That mill is one of only two major industrial operations in my home town and his. He is angry and his neighbours are angry.

If people think—not only some people in government but some people in some corporations—that they can use this opportunity to squeeze concessions on working conditions, safety and many other things won by hard struggle over the years, then I think the operative phrase is "every dog has his day". Any employer who has been in the industrial relations business knows that it does not pay to milk everyone for everything you can get because of a temporary advantage, because they will find a way to get even. They may have to hurt themselves in the process, but they will do that because they are very human.

The government thinks that by Bill C-124, Mr. Speaker, it can impose a law which will not only restrict incomes of public servants but will also eliminate for that period of time the entire process of collective bargaining. I do not know what kind of mentality it is which makes the government think it has the right to take away fundamental human rights in this manner. Even if one was to concede that there is a right in desperate times to put a ceiling or a cap on wages, there is absolutely no excuse for them denying the very process of jointly attempting to determine the conditions of your work, whether you are going to live or die on the job, and all of those other matters so vital to the interests of ordinary people. By so doing, the government will sow and reap the whirlwind.

In trying to analyse the kind of mind which gives rise to this sort of action, one can only assume that there are many in the government who think, "Well, we gave them these rights so we can suspend them." The right to withdraw one's labour, Mr. Speaker, was not given to anyone by government. It was won on this continent when working men and women found that by exercising their right to withdraw their labour they could gain some appreciation and recognition of their problems and appropriate grievances—without laws setting out when and how they could do it. When that right was found to be effective, not only by working people themselves but by the rest of society, that is when governments across this land and in the republic to the south began to recognize that right in law. The right was not given, it was simply claimed and recognized, and in being recognized it was thereby limited and structured.

I am not debating here whether or not that was an appropriate action. In a civilized society we attempt to structure our conflicts in ways which allow for an appropriate peaceful method of decision-making among different sectors. Industrial relations and employer-employee conflicts have been stabilized in a better and healthier way for society at large than what we see in some countries in Europe, particularly eastern Europe, which have never adopted the necessary democratic structures to allow ordinary working people to freely determine their own destinies and the conditions under which they work and live. Instead, they have had the kinds of explosions such as we have seen in Poland simply because they have never come up with the kinds of structures necessary for people to sort out their problems in a democratic and reasonable way.

The spokesman for the Conservative Party who spoke prior to the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose) made some very constructive comments, Mr. Speaker. He again drew attention to the irresponsibility of the provisions contained in this bill which eliminate collective bargaining within the public service and for employees of Crown corporations, and the impact that may have on joint council collective bargaining. Such joint collective bargaining, to the extent it takes place today, is a relatively recent innovation. It is still rather fragile and I and many of my colleagues and members of the official opposition—and surely there must be some in the government as well—tremble at the fact that something that new and fragile, but which has also been very useful, can perhaps be put to death by an unwise law which has been poorly considered and poorly thought out.

I would hope that even if the government is determined to proceed with its 6 per cent dream world and the unfair manner in which it has been imposed, it will at least see the error of its ways in possibly wiping out the kind of joint bargaining councils and joint approaches to industrial relations which have served many of our industries so well over the period of the last few years. I am also thinking particularly, Mr. Speaker, of Canada Post, our new Crown corporation. We have for years and years attempted to bring the post office out of its former shell, a shell which was made up of government interference in labour-management relations and other matters. One minister after another used to involve himself in the situation. The minister used to change as often as we change our shirts; they used to butt into the internal workings of the post office. Only last year Canada Post was established as a new independent postal corporation. By so doing, the government allowed its managers and employees to bargain under the provisions of the Canada Labour Code. Thus they could work out, as free men and women, various problems which could not freely be worked out previously because they were subjected to a different piece of legislation. I am thinking about problems regarding technological changes particularly.

• (1720)

One major problem which developed in the post office as a result of the imposition of highly technical machinery 10 or 15 years ago—

An hon. Member: Much of which did not work.

Mr. Kristiansen: Yes, that is true. The introduction of highly mechanized machinery resulted in mechanical problems as well as human ones. When the nature of jobs was changing, the labour-management process had to undergo a change because there was a high degree of automation in which people did not have any say. For these reasons they started tearing themselves apart, both employee against employee and employer against employee. They were frustrated because they did not have and were not allowed to have the mechanism under the laws of the land which other employees and managers had. They have just now been given that freedom.

We have heard the testimony of the new president of Canada Post that the incidence of lost time due to industrial disputes has now dropped rather dramatically since the inception of that corporation. At last here was some evidence that perhaps there was a chance for those people to work and live together within the confines of that Crown corporation. Perhaps they would have been able to begin to develop a more mature relationship than has been the trademark of the corporation for many years. Now the government will throw that freedom right out of the door. It is coming down with a heavy hand which could not be better calculated to throw this entire mechanism, upon which much of the country is dependent, right back into the dark ages from whence it came.

It is not my role at this point to point the finger of blame at whether it was the government, management or unions which caused the conflict that took place within the post office. After a while it becomes an academic argument as to which came first, the chicken or the egg. Apart from any value judgments, one began to feel that both the union and the management came to deserve each other. But, recently they were looking forward to a new relationship, and there has been some evidence of that relationship developing. Things such as that do not happen magically overnight when dealing with human beings in very intricate set-ups. This sure as the devil is not the way to do it. It is counterproductive to the work of many former ministers. I see at least one of them across the way today. In fact, he spoke in the debate a little earlier. Several former ministers and hundreds of people in labour, in management and in the House have worked for years in an attempt to get the postal service back into a position where it could do the job it was intended to perform on behalf of Canadians.

I beg some of the saner minds which I am sure must be over on the other side of the House to take a second look. if they insist despite the arguments upon keeping caps on levels of incomes, I suppose it is their right because they are the majority and form the government. I ask them to consider some of the arguments we have made and at least one argument of the colleagues to my right. I ask them to remove the carte blanche crackdown on the entire process of collective bargaining which can do much damage for years and decades into the future.

I am hopeful, because of the tone of the remarks of representatives who attended meetings with members of the government on Friday, for instance, that perhaps their thoughts are not etched in stone. Perhaps they will think some of these things through. I hope that is the case. During the course of committee study I hope saner heads will prevail and that we will come up with legislation which, while it still may do some damage in the short run, will not lock us into the long-term holocaust which I am afraid might otherwise be forthcoming in industrial relations within much of the government service.

My comments are based upon an assumption that some of the drive toward this legislation took place in good faith. But some of the evidence of the past, such as our experience with the Anti-Inflation Board in the 1970s, causes us to wonder about the motivation of this bill's attempt to move into the entire area of collective bargainning. The current Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) had a role to play in the Anti-Inflation Board in one of his previous lives before his latest reincarnation. I was fairly involved in that whole affair in both the East Kootenays and the West Kootenays at the time. The present Minister of Transport in his role as chairman of the AIB visited the East Kootenays to meet with representatives of United Steelworkers and United Mine Workers because of some joint bargaining process. I cannot even recall the percentages in question at that time, but I think they were something like 7.5 per cent or 8.5 per cent limits. They were a little more intelligent than those in this bill. At least they had some freedom in terms of bargaining and to sort out their priorities within those limits, which is a little more sensible than what is before us today.

In any event, the Minister of Transport sat down with the parties at the bargaining table. He suggested—and I am paraphrasing his remarks—that there might be some way to see the way clear to giving those people an extra percentage point, if only they would remove some of the restrictive provisions within their collective agreements. Someone asked him what he meant by restrictive provisions or restrictive clauses. He leafed through the contract and said, "Here is one here; it is entitled 'contracting out'." At that time the chairman of the AIB had the job, according to the government at least, of restraining the level of remuneration. He attempted to obtain what he thought was a more rational sharing of wealth in the country. We did not agree with that, but that was one way in which it was suggested that it should be done. He was willing to give away more money in exchange for those workers giving up some of the very clauses in their agreements which gave them job security. Since that gentleman is still in cabinet today, one has to wonder whether that kind of thinking is there at this time.

What is the purpose of having the entire area of collective bargaining placed under these controls? Is it to prevent working people, at a time when they are faced with unprecedented plant closures and long-term lay-offs, from utilizing their ability to bargain for perhaps better severance pay provisions or other protections against the real threats and dangers they see heading straight at them today? Some people say, "It cannot be that way because we are just talking about the public service and we know that people in the public service do not get laid off." That is not true. This legislation also involves employees at CN and CP, Air Canada and CP Air. CP happens to be a private corporation and Air Canada is a Crown corporation. Are they suggesting that there will be no more cutbacks in CN or its trucking firms? What pattern is being established when the government appeals, as it did to the business community, to transfer these policies to the private sector as well?

What should we read into the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) remarks last week, which I believe were quite schizophrenic if anything, when he said that he had no intention of imposing controls, even in co-operation with the provinces, across the private sector, and then suggested a few minutes later that if it does not work he may have to consider doing that? He has everyone guessing, and I suppose that is part of the game. But do we need that insecurity added to the insecurities which Canadians have already been feeling during the last few months? It makes one wonder.

One also has to wonder when the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) is apparently telling leaders of the business community and particularly the leaders of the Canadian Labour Congress and the labour movement during private meetings in Ottawa—I am paraphrasing a news report I read—that he and the government were not suggesting that we were pricing ourselves out of markets via the increasing cost of labour, while at almost the same time the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) was saying exactly the opposite in the House. That minister said, as reported at page 19173 of Hansard on July 9, 1982, last Friday, in answer to a question from the member for Vancouver Centre (Miss Carney):

> Madam Speaker, I would first like to point out to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre that I visited British Columbia recently, and I will be there again on Monday to talk to employers and unions about job creation and labour market programs. It was clear in those discussions, when you talked with both employers and members of the unions that the greatest danger to the competitive position of the lumber industry in British Columbia in disposing of its product is the fact that our wage settlements are running substantially ahead of those in the United States.

I took issue at that time, in a rather unparliamentary way, with the words of the minister, because it is just plain hogwash. While it does not suit the purposes of the government, the fact is that leaders in the forest industry in British Columbia have said as much in very recent months.

An hon. Member: How about steel?

Mr. Kristiansen: This minister was talking about the lumber industry. I do not have the statistics in front of me about what the hon. member is are talking about. I do not know the figures as intimately.

However, his statement is absolute hogwash. Even without considering the differences between the Canadian and the American dollar, the unit cost of labour in the Pacific northwest of the United States and western Canada is virtually identical and, if anything, there is approximately a ten-cent higher margin of difference in the Pacific northwest of the United States. The minister's statement was simply untrue.

No one in his right mind would suggest that the markets for our Canadian lumber will increase at the present time by having a wage deferral or wage cut among the woodworkers in British Columbia. More houses will not be built by driving more consumer purchasing power out of the economy and by doing nothing about interest rates across the board. That cannot be accomplished through that action. Perhaps the government could be persuaded to expand some of the housing initiatives it began and to do something drastic through other measures that have been urged by many members on the opposition benches. For several months the government has been urged to turn around the situation with regard to demand in the housing, construction and forest industries. Perhaps the government can encourage more demand for housing.

Perhaps the government of the republic to the south can also stop acting in such an asinine way as that displayed by its veto of recent initiatives proposed by Congress in the last few weeks, and start to take action which would spur the demand for much needed housing in the United States as well. This would produce more jobs and allow some of the mills in British Columbia and other parts of Canada to either remain open or to reopen. The introduction of a wage deferral, which only provides for a variance of a small percentage on a wage cost item which comprises 20 per cent of the cost at most, will do nothing to increase demand for housing or for lumber and will do little to help create a healthier industry in British Columbia.

We should review the situation as a whole. The budget was brought down on June 28. Bill C-124 is an important part of that budget. This bill is combined with other budget measures which are certain to draw even more money out of our economy in terms of purchasing power, resulting in even less domestic business for our own industries and enterprises. This will reduce consumer demand for many of our retail merchants across Canada and drive even more into bankruptcy. I fail to see how this can be seen as the beginning of a turnaround, which has been touted by some on the Liberal side of the House. To believe that would require some stretch of the imagination.

Canadians in our constituencies all across the country fail to see this turnaround as well. This is obvious when one sees their reaction in telegrams, letters and surveys and when one listens to them on the telephone, as I did in the last few weeks.

In conclusion, I would appeal once again to what, hopefully, is the conscience of many of the members on the government side of the House and to the ministers to realize that even if they wish to persist in what appears to be the major objectives of this legislation, they ought to listen carefully and study the information they were given in the meetings on Friday as well as hear the many representations which have been and will be made to the House. When this bill goes to committee let us reason together in an attempt to remove at least those measures which will bring untold long-term harm to the employees of the Government of Canada and its corporations as well as to the very fabric of industrial relations in this society and to the freedom and welfare of Canadians as a whole.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Madam Speaker, I feel constrained to enter into this debate because of the blatant inequities in Bill C-124. I would remind the government at the outset that the last time they brought in wage and price controls, the year following the lifting of those controls the government was defeated. I think that is something which the treasury benches should take into consideration at this time, if not publicly then certainly privately in caucus and cabinet discussions.

Of late, there have been many references to the fact that we are no longer in a recession but, rather, in a depression. In many respects, the recession or depression that we are in today is even worse than the great depression of the 1930s. The stockmarket crash took place in October, 1929, as we went into the winter of 1929-30, and the bottom had fallen out of everything by 1931. Wages had gone down to virtually nothing and there was massive unemployment. Prices fell to rock bottom as well. The vast majority of the people of this country, of the United States and of western Europe felt that they were all in the same boat. Oh, the very rich weathered it quite nicely in Capri, in Nice and in West Palm Beach, but they were such a small, insignificant group in the western world in terms of numbers that people seldom thought about them except when they went to the nickel movie in the afternoon and saw how the very rich were living. Generally speaking, virtually the entire population felt the depression and suffered as a result. Consequently, across our country there developed a sort of esprit de corps. People said, "We are all badly affected by this great depression and we will have to pull together on our own." They said this because the damned government under R. B. Bennett was doing nothing, like this government here in Ottawa. So they decided to pull together by themselves.

I can recall those days of hardship back in the 1930s. They were days of hardship, but also days of togetherness when families got together and shared. I can recall growing up in Sault Ste. Marie, which was one of the hardest hit areas in central Canada. If there was one empty seat in a car heading out to Lea's Bay or Pointe-aux-Pins on a Saturday or Sunday, one called up a neighbour and made sure that that seat was filled by a person who could not otherwise get away to the beach. My father was the head of a Gilbert and Sullivan operatic society and he was able to call dress rehearsals for 10 o'clock on a Monday morning because the non-professional cast had no work and there was all kinds of time to work together and to play together. In that depression, as severe as it was, with the soup kitchens and bread lines, there was a feeling of common suffering. Everyone was adversely affected and therefore everyone on the block, in the neighbourhood or the community was pulling together. There was no feeling of alienation toward some groups in society, although some were hurt more than others. There was no feeling that someone in Ottawa was trying to rip off something from them or that people in some parts of the city were better off than those in other parts.

Today, however, we are in a very pernicious kind of depression. We have widespread unemployment, with 1.3 million officially unemployed. There are probably 1.7 million or 1.8 million in total who are unemployed. Yet we still have 10 million people working in this country. Also, we have rising prices at a time of mass unemployment. There are also some professional or self-employed people who are making more money in 1982 than they made in 1981.

Mr. Nickerson: Good for them.

Mr. Blackburn: A Conservative over there says, "Good for them." So much for sharing, so much for a deep appreciation of the suffering that is going on in this country when a Tory can shout out and say, "Good for them", if they are making more money this year than last year, and that Tory will stand up and vote for controls on wages.

Mr. McDermid: Are they producing more?

Mr. Blackburn: This is a time, gentlemen, when those on the Tory benches should show understanding and compassion. If we expect those who are making lower incomes to accept lower wages, it is time for all of us to show some compassion and understanding for those who are earning less.

Mr. McDermid: Oh, you sanctimonious pup.

Mr. Blackburn: I am not trying to be sanctimonious. I am being realistic. The hon. member is embarrassed by the remarks of his colleague. If he is upset, he should rise when I am finished and make a speech on this subject because he has all kinds of time, so he should not get upset.

Mr. McDermid: Tell the truth.

Mr. Blackburn: Today we are in a situation where those who are in dire straits are being told to tighten their belts, to deprive themselves even more, and we all face rising prices and costs. Now we have unemployment insurance and welfare, two things that we did not have in the 1930s. I can guarantee that without welfare and unemployment insurance, we would have soup kitchens and bread lines in many cities across Canada today; in fact, in most cities. Therefore, when we compare the depression of the 1930s with the depression of the 1980s, I believe those who are suffering today are suffering more than those who suffered in the 1930s because they know of the inequity which is being perpetrated and advanced by Bill C-124. It states that all federal public servants will receive an increase of 6 per cent this year, 5 per cent in 1983 and 5 per cent in 1984. Therefore, those at the top will not suffer nearly as much. In fact, they will not suffer at all from the decrease in their income from 1982 to 1984. But those clerks and those who clean out our public buildings, those who do menial work in federal service, will have relatively bigger cutbacks or losses in revenue next year, and they will hurt even more. The bill is simply not fair.

Of course, the primary aim of Bill C-124 is not directed at the federal civil servants. It is directed at provincial and municipal civil servants and the entire private sector. However, the private sector employees have already been hurting. As an example, I could name but three companies in my own constituency, in my home town of Brantford, namely, White Farm, Massey-Ferguson and Trailmobile, which have been suffering from wage constraint for the past year and a half. Their employees work for regular wages for three or four months and then they drop down to unemployment insurance for another two or three months. Then they are back on regular wages when called back for three or four months, and then again they are back on unemployment insurance. As a matter of fact, it has been estimated that if a White Farm employee had worked a full 12 months in the past year, his income would have been roughly $21,000 or $22,000, but with all the lay-offs resulting in the collection of unemployment insurance benefits, his gross income has dropped to about $15,000 or $16,000. That is a wage constraint. Yet the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) says that it is greedy businessmen and greedy workers who are forcing the government to curtail the increase to our old age security recipients. How much nonsense does the Prime Minister think that this side of the House can continue to endure? We will certainly not accept it as an argument. As a matter of fact, it is the spuriousness of the government's arguments with respect to this recession or depression which causes us to refuse to accept virtually anything it now says on that side of the House.

• (1750)

The government goes from one public relations disaster to another. It does not have its financial and economic act together. I say that because in order to find a new solution or way out of this recession, the government has again resorted to a failed program which it attempted in the seventies, the Anti-Inflation Board of 1975.

Let us look at some of the figures at that time as far as the Anti-Inflation Board is concerned. In 1974-75 also, the government blamed wages for forcing up the cost of living and prices. We know that not to be true. At that time the New Democratic Party said it was not true. It was later proved not to be true, that we were right.

We are asking the same thing today. The government says that wages have to be lowered in order to bring down inflation. We have the data to support our argument that wages are not causing inflation in this country today. It is not a wage-push inflation. The government is resorting to this as a spurious argument, a cheap means of bringing in controls.

Let us look at the failure of the previous controls exercise of the seventies. Whan the Anti-Inflation Board was introduced in 1975, the rate of inflation was 10.6 per cent. The target of the AIB for bringing inflation down was 8 per cent in 1975, 6 per cent in 1977 and 4 per cent in 1978. Those were the targets. Instead, inflation was only slightly moderated. When controls were removed in 1978, lo and behold the rate of inflation was 9 per cent. It was down about 1 per cent after three years of wage controls and some price controls.

Price controls were not equitably enforced. I recall listening to some businessmen and professionals joking in 1976 and 1977 that their incomes were actually going up much more rapidly than the AIB was permitting because they were getting phony job promotions. That was the most common way of circumventing the wage controls at that time.

In 1975 the annual rate of unemployment was 6.9 per cent. During the control period, it moved steadily upward. Controls caused unemployment; 7.1 per cent in 1976, 8.1 per cent in 1977 and 8.4 per cent in 1978. One reason for this is very obvious. When you take money away from consumers through lower increases in pay, you are taking high velocity money out of the marketplace and are depressing demand. When you depress demand, you cut back on productivity. When you cut back on productivity, you increase unemployment. It is a vicious downward spiral. This stupid government cannot get this through its thick head. I do not know how much pressure we in the opposition and the people of Canada have to bring upon this government to make it see some common sense and understand some basic, fundamental economics.

Let us look at some wage settlements under the Anti-Inflation Board. According to a government paper, wage settlements during the AIB program were brought down from almost 20 per cent in 1975—it was actually 18.6 per cent in the second quarter of 1975—to 7 per cent in 1978. According to a Conference Board study on the AIB program, controls resulted in the loss of several thousand jobs, a drop of 8 per cent in wages and a break in the inflation rate of a paltry 1 per cent. That was over three years. There was a break in the inflation of 1 per cent for a year compared to the rate of rise without controls.

I have just given the facts. We have a model to go by, the Anti-Inflation Board from 1975 to 1978.

Mr. Orlikow: It at least pretended to deal with prices.

Mr. Blackburn: Bill C-124 does not even mention prices. Even worse, the government and the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) do not have the courage to admit that what is putting inflation up today and raising the cost of living, the consumer price index, is interest rates. There is no mention in the budget of bringing down interest rates. In any event, there is no plan to bring them down.

Second, energy and fuel costs are escalating. They will continue to escalate in 1982, 1983 and 1984. At the very time when the President of the Treasury Board is telling Canadians they will be held to a 6 per cent increase, their gasoline, home heating fuel, and hydro bills will all be going up between 20 and 30 per cent. Is that equitable? Is that reasonable? Is it any wonder the President of the Treasury Board is having problems trying to sell his package?

Is it any wonder that the CLC is saying to the government that if it wants their support, that if it wants organized labour to shoulder its share of the burden, then the government has to co-operate, share some of the burden and demonstrate that consumers will not have to pay 30 per cent more for home heating fuel in 1983, 20 or 25 per cent more for gasoline and 25 per cent more to Bell Canada for their telephones. If the government wants to regulate increases, it will damn well have to go after the CRTC and CTC to make sure that freight rates, passenger rates and telephone rates are held.

What is the President of the Treasury Board going to do about marketing boards? Farmers are already hard pressed. They have virtually no cash flow. To follow logically the argument of the President of the Treasury Board for restraint, we should be holding the price of eggs, poultry and all dairy products at 6 per cent. How in the hell is the minister going to sell that to the farmer who cannot afford to buy machinery?

This is why in my city about 7,000 agricultural implement workers are out of work. I wish the minister would stand up and try to at least bring some logic to his argument. He cannot do that because it is spurious argument. He and his cabinet colleagues are constantly saying we have to break the inflation psychology. Whatever inflation psychology we had died a year and half ago. The vast majority of Canadians are not buying frivolously. They count every penny that comes into their household. They are worried about meeting their mortgage payments with rising interest rates. They are worried about not being able to pay their gas bill or their home heating bill. They are afraid they will not be able to pay their taxes.

The budget of the Conservative government at Queen's Park brought in by Mr. Miller a few weeks ago will result in at least a 7 per cent increase in municipal taxes in 1983.

I see that it is six o'clock, Mr. Speaker. I believe I will have another ten minutes at eight o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At 6 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Speaker, before we took recess for dinner, I was trying to impress upon the government that its approach to fighting inflation by trying to control public sector wages was the wrong approach. I tried to point out to the government that the major causes of inflation today are basically threefold. The first reason is the very high interest rates or the real interest rates that are running around 8 per cent or 9 per cent above what they should be. That is a major cause and accounts for slightly in excess of two percentage points of the consumer price index. The second is energy taxes, on everything from home heating fuel, natural gas, diesel fuel and gasoline, a 30 per cent increase last year, another built-in increase of 27 per cent in 1982-1983. Again, this accounts for about three percentage points of the consumer price index. And, of course, the third reason is the cost of imports. In fact, imports are becoming so costly that Canadians cannot afford to buy a lot of the imports and that is why we have a favourable balance of trade with the United States—it is not because we are selling them more but because we are importing less. The reason we are importing less is that we have less money and we simply cannot afford it.

In those three areas alone we have at least six percentage points of the consumer price index. If it is running at about 11.5 per cent, it would have us down to about 5.5 per cent of real inflation. It would be as low as the average annual inflation rate in the United States. Instead of this the government once again is looking for a scapegoat. It is very typical of our Prime Minister to blame someone else. The Prime Minister says: "I never made a mistake in government." The Prime Minister never would admit to making a mistake. So, as we did in the year 1975 with the Anti-Inflation Board, again now in 1982 the government says: "It is labour, organized or unorganized."

But this time they cannot get a consensus right across the country. The provincial premiers will not agree, so he cannot invoke that section of the old British North America Act that allowed him to impose wage and price controls in 1975. Instead of that, he is attacking the federal public servants, hoping it will spin off into the provincial civil services and then to civil or municipal services and to the private sector.

When we come to the private sector, Mr. Speaker, we realize that honestly, even there the wages have not been inflationary. As late as 1980, Canada was seventh in hourly compensation, that is, wages and benefits in manufacturing, in terms of the United States dollars. Belgium in 1980 stood at $13.18 an hour, an increase over 1975 of 100 per cent. Sweden stood at $12.60 an hour; Netherlands at $12.18; West Germany at $11.94; United States at $9.92; France at $9.46; and Canada at $9.06 an hour. That was just five cents an hour above Italy. And yet we hear a lot of right wingers in this country saying, "It is wages; our wages are so high that we are pricing ourselves out of world markets." That is absolute nonsense. I am putting that on the record and I am challenging any Liberal sitting opposite me right now to stand up after I sit down and challenge my statement based on the data I have just presented.

Also, Mr. Speaker, while we are speaking of the private sector I would like to read into the record a notice that was sent to employees in a certain factory in the city of Brantford just last week. These are non-union, salaried employees. They have no organization to fight their battle with management. Management may be right in this case, the company may be in dire straits—I would not be at all surprised. We are talking about legislation wage controls. This is not a legislated wage control: it amounts to a decrease of 19 per cent in their wages. This is what it says:

First, the general increase which became effective on April 19, 1981 will be rescinded. On the other hand, the $52 per month cost of living adjustment which was eliminated at that time will be restored in full, put into the basic salaries. There will be no cost of living adjustments in the future. Second, no salaried overtime payments will be made except as required by law. Third, all salaried employees will work a 40-hour week. This change which affects those salaried employees now working 37.5 hours will be accomplished by the addition of one-half hour to the end of the current working day.

I love this one. These are just salaried non-union workers, supervisory staff and office personnel. Four-minute rest breaks are eliminated. Employees will, however, be permitted time for refreshments to be consumed at their normal working stations. It is almost like reading something out of Charles Dickens in the nineteenth century.

Fifth, the merit increase program will be frozen. Sixth, the current sick-day program is to be eliminated. In its place the following schedule of short-term disability benefits will apply and will represent the maximum available in any 12 month period.

Then it gives a list here of how many days each employee has off. If you worked between one year and three years you would have one week full pay if you are sick.

As far as I know, in the House of Commons if a Member of Parliament becomes ill he can be ill on the first day of a Parliament and never really show up again before his salary is substantially reduced. Here in this factory case, after the employee has been there three years, he or she will get one week full pay if sick.

Life insurance to the amount of $10,000 will be provided for each salaried employee, the opportunity to purchase attractive group rates additional insurance at totals of one time to two times less the basic $10,000, the annual salary, will be afforded each employee, and so on. That is based on reduced salaries.

That represents a 19 per cent cut in pay. It need not be legislated. The market forces presumably forced this upon the company, which in turn forced it upon the employees. This is the kind of mess that the government has got the business community into.

Specifically, Mr. Speaker, with respect to Bill C-124, the most pernicious and most contentious aspects of it are not really the compensation aspects. What is going to happen if this bill is passed without any changes in committee? For one thing, there will be no collective bargaining for two years on any issues—not just on money matters or income but on any issues. There will be no negotiations on technological change, on job categorization, on work loads, on overtime, on maternity leave, on any affirmative action groups.

We know, Mr. Speaker, that those who will be most adversely affected by this lack of ability to negotiate will be those at the bottom, the women in the federal work force. They are those with the lowest paid jobs, the most menial work, the least skilled. Once again, they are those who will have to take it on the chin. The professionals at $50,000 and $60,000 a year, I am quite sure, are not going to suffer all that much. But those earning under $20,000 or $25,000 a year will certainly be hurt a great deal.

• (2010)

Another matter which really angers me has been raised in the question period. I was absolutely outraged when I read in the newspaper that on the very day the budget came down 473 lawyers in the federal Department of Justice received a 10 per cent increase in pay. They received that increase just a matter of hours before the budget was introduced. As I said in my speech, earlier this afternoon, this government is going from one public relations disaster to another. It is as if hon. members opposite have no experience in government. And to make matters even worse, the inequities in this bill simply bring out their warped approach to the economic problems facing the nation today.

How could hon. members opposite possibly allow 473 lawyers a 10 per cent increase in pay just a few hours before the budget was introduced and then turn around and expect civil servants, who have already settled their contracts, to have their salaries knocked back to a 6 per cent increase when their contracts terminate? This is reprehensible behaviour by the government and cannot be allowed to go unnoticed and unchallenged.

The average Canadian is prepared to accept his or her responsibility in fighting inflation and in trying to get the economy moving again, but the average Canadian is not prepared to allow this government to be deceitful and dishonest in its approach, first, to the causes of inflation and, second to the cure. In the first place, we have a perfect example of a government refusing to admit that it should share a great deal of the responsibility for causing our inflation instead of blaming every other country in the world for it. Second, I challenge the government to accept that the major causes of inflation today are high interest rates, energy taxes and the high cost of imports, and to come clean with the workers of Canada and say: "We appreciate it is not mainly your fault and that there are other causes, but we are asking you to do your share to get the economy going again." If hon. members opposite took that approach, they would probably get a more sympathetic reaction across the country. However, by bringing in Bill C-124 and legislating wage controls, the government is blaming the men and women workers of this country for the mess we are in today.

The most depressing problem of all is what to do when controls come off. Everyone, naturally, will want to scramble to catch up; the economy will get going full steam again and overheat. If we are to have wage and price controls—and I am not saying we should—for heaven's sake, let us bring them in at a time when the economy is overheating. The economy is not over heating right now. It is dying. It is almost stone cold. We have 31 per cent underutilization in our plant and manufacturing sectors. Is that the time to constrict further the money supply in the country? Hardly. This is the time to increase demand and increase spending so that we can increase productivity and get more people back to work. That is the argument I have used throughout the budget debate, and I use it again in this debate on Bill C-124.

My time is almost up. I am very dissatisfied with the intent of this bill. I am fed up with the all-encompassing aspect of the bill. I am fed up with the deceit of the government, the spurious economic arguments of the government and the reason the government gives for bringing in wage controls. The government is still dodging the major fundamental economic problems facing Canada and individual Canadians.

Until we get the real interest rate down to about 2 per cent, which is 2 per cent above the inflation rate, we will not stimulate the economy. We will not stimulate investment. People will not be prepared to expand their businesses or open new ones. Until we get some control over skyrocketing energy costs, we will have very high inflation, and as long as we have to rely on imports with a 77-cent or 78-cent dollar, again we will have inflation.

The government has addressed the wrong reason for inflation. It refuses to accept any degree of culpability for causing inflation, and it is not really attacking the main causes of it. Instead, it is making scapegoats of workers once again.

When I began my speech before the supper break, I said that the government is wrong in its approach. Just one year after AIB wage controls were removed the government was defeated, and I can very easily predict this evening that one year after these controls are removed, in 1984, the government will be defeated again.

In conclusion, I will paraphrase Shakespeare by saying the following: when is the winter of our discontent ever going to be made glorious summer by a change in government?

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to speak, and I will be fairly brief. I hope I will not take quite as long on this important topic as the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn) did.

I want to divide my presentation this evening into three parts. Hon. members might like to call the first part a rebuttal of some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Brant. The second part will be a description of the differences in political philosophy between hon. members on this side of the House and hon. members opposite with respect to the problems presently afflicting the nation and the problems which have caused hon. members opposite to bring in Bill C-124. Third, I would like to deal with some of the specifics of Bill C-124.

Before saying one or two unkind things about the presentation made by the hon. member for Brant—of course, not about him personally—I would like to compliment him on his presentation tonight. I think it was one of the best speeches that hon. member has ever made, at least from a technical point of view. I have difficulties with some of his reasoning, but he did make some good points.

I think the hon. member summed up the socialist approach to problems when he said quite explicitly that it was deplorable that some self-employed entrepreneurs had made more money in 1982 than they had in 1981. How terrible it had been—

Mr. Blackburn: I said some people.

Mr. Nickerson: —that some people had made more money this year than last year.

Mr. Blackburn: I said some people.

Mr. Nickerson: How shameful it was that some people had done better this year than in the past.

Mr. Blackburn: I did not say it was shameful.

Mr. Nickerson: This just illustrates the socialist ideology that everyone should be reduced to the same level of mediocrity and to the same level of misery.

I take quite the opposite point of view. Any businessman or entrepreneur who made more money in the difficult times of 1982 than in 1981 deserves to be congratulated. In my opinion people like that have accomplished something. Anyone who has managed to do this must be possessed of a disproportionate amount of good luck or, if not that, a superior ability. Such a person must have worked harder and with more diligence than the very many people who, because of conditions beyond their control, lost money during that period and did not make as much as they did in previous times.

What are the benefits derived from people who, because of the extra effort they expended, were able to do better for themselves and, consequently, for the nation? Who pays the taxes in this country? It is not the people who are out of work and it is not the businesses on the verge of failure; it is the successful people who work hard for what they have. They pay the taxes that enable us to give subventions to the people not as fortunate. Who is hiring workers in the country today? It is not the businesses on the verge of failure; it is the successful ones that are providing the few jobs that there are. They are paying better wages than those on the verge of bankruptcy. They pay better wages to get the people they want, and that is good. Who are the people making investments so that Canada will be strong in years to come? It is not the people who are losing money but the people who are making money. If the hon. member for Brant had his way, presumably the few remaining successful people would be taxed out of business. They would do what many other Canadians have already done, vote with their feet! They would be forced to leave the country, taking their money and investments with them. If that were the case, everyone would lose.

What we need to do in this time of economic hardship is to give all the encouragement possible to those people who are proving that in difficult times they can still make a go of things. We should not be telling them that they are not wanted in Canada because they are doing a little better than anyone else. Instead, we should be encouraging them and making it as easy as possible for them to do better. That would benefit the government and the citizens of Canada.

This afternoon I listened intently to the speech of the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Mackasey), a distinguished member of the House for many years. But I took exception to some of the ideas he presented. He seemed to be saying that what we are engaged in is a zero sum game; that in order for any one group of people to benefit, those benefits have to be extracted from another group. It reminds me of a poker game where people play for so long, and after an allotted time the winnings of some will balance the losses of others. I do not agree with that idea at all. We should be promoting the increase in the general wealth of the country. We are not engaged in a poker game. We should be engaged in the development of the resources and the people of this country.

The hon. member for Lincoln stated that controls are necessary. That is a favourite idea of hon. members opposite and of hon. members to my left. When it comes to controls and the influence that the state should have in the lives of people, their ideas are not very different; they both want controls.

This afternoon members of the NDP pretended to be against Bill C-124. I guess they have to say that because they think they have a lot of political support from organized labour, although I am not so sure; organized labour thinks for itself and does not do everything the NDP tells it to.

I listened carefully to what members of the NDP had to say. They were not saying that they were against controls. They were saying "Controls would be fine if we had wage controls here and price controls there. We just love those controls. Give us all the controls you are capable of." That is the way they really think. The NDP would just love to be welcomed back to the bosom of Beryl Plumptre. I can see that in their eyes, Mr. Speaker.

Let us consider what effect this zero sum approach and consequent controls have had over the lifetime of Liberal governments for 30-odd years. They are the reason we are in the state that we are in today. This is not something brought about by two or three months of action or inaction; it has developed in this country as it has in many others, as a result of policies pursued for decades.

Social services are a good example of my point, Mr. Speaker. Everyone in this House wants to ensure that people who are not so well off as some others get a break. I do not think that anyone in the House would be against that idea, although we have different approaches on how to accomplish it. Very little good has come from the leftist policies over a 30-year period with respect to increasing the incomes of people who receive the lesser proportion of income in the country. In 30 years there has been no significant difference in the proportion of income those in the lower 10 or 15 per cent of the population receive. The figures provided by the Welfare Council of Canada and similar organizations show that the only appreciable difference is that 30 years ago a larger proportion of the income of the lower 10 or 15 per cent of the population came from wage employment. Today, the biggest proportion of their income comes from government transfer payments. The wage component has been reduced.

• (2030)

In making this rather minor change we have built up a huge administration to handle the various transfer payments. We have accomplished a transfer from productive Canadians not to the poorer sector of the economy but to the administrative class, that is, government. The administrative class has a vested interest in controls. There is nothing that would make them want to change the system.

I believe in the principle of expanding wealth, Mr. Speaker. If we are to generate the expanding wealth of the nation we do not need more controls put on society by the state, but less controls. There must be more freedom for individual initiative. That is the direction we must take, Mr. Speaker. There must be a reverse policy to that which has occurred in Canada and in many other countries over the last 30 years.

One of the differences between the depression of the thirties and the Liberal depression of the eighties must be kept in mind if we are to devise solutions to the problems facing us today. In the thirties, the depression was associated with chronic deflation. The prices of farm products, manufactured goods and labour were continually going down. In those days, with that type of problem, it is quite possible that it might have responded to the policy of deficit spending, printing more money to prime the pump. I have my doubts as to whether that really worked in the later 1930s, but at least it made sense to make the attempt because it might have resulted in beneficial effects. However, what has happened is that after times got good again the government, instead of taking more by way of taxes to build up reserves so that when times became bad again, when the business cycle had turned full circle, it could pump those funds back into the economy—which I understand was John Keynes' hypothesis—the government said, "Look, we have run up these deficits, we have printed money during bad times and we should continue to do it through good times to make those good times even better." That is what we have been doing for decades. It is like a drug addiction, you keep having to have more and more of the drug of deficit spending and consequent inflation in order to get the same kick. We have gone about as far as we can go now, and in the Liberal depression of the 1980s we cannot use that same technique anymore. We have such a high debt now and we are running such high deficits—a projected $20 billion this year and probably higher—that we cannot print more money to bail ourselves once more out of the problems that this government has got us into. We have to think of different solutions to that problem because the Liberal depression of the 1980s is one associated with chronic inflation, not the deflation of the 1930s.

As I have said before, in the 1930s it made sense for governments to try new initiatives to get the world out of that situation, but in the present situation I think that government is more of a hinderance than a help. The government is already too far involved in society, in particular the economic aspects. If we are to cure this problem, it is not by more deficit spending, more inflation and more controls, but by the very reverse. I think only the private sector of the economy can get us out of the mess this government has got us into.

As to Bill C-124 itself, Mr. Speaker, I personally do not like it. I think the government, on which should fall the responsibility for this economic situation, is asking Parliament to bail it out. Public service salaries are not really a matter for legislation. Parliament should not be asked to dictate what salaries and terms and conditions of employment should be. That is a matter which rightfully belongs, in my opinion, to the executive branch of government. It is their baby, Mr. Speaker. But what has happened? The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston)—and I do not condemn the person presently holding that office because it has happened over many years—and his staff, his senior negotiators, have failed. They have allowed things to get ahead of them. They have not exercised the proper restraint in their collective bargaining. So what they are doing now is admitting failure. The government is saying, "Look, we cannot do the task that was rightfully ours." It is now coming to Parliament and saying, "We have entered into all these agreements, and we should not have because we cannot keep them. Please, Parliament, save us from ourselves by passing legislation to undo the wrongs we have done."

I think, Mr. Speaker, that Bill C-124 is a con job. All the policies that go with it, the so-called budget of June 28, are con jobs. It is a con job when you ask business and labour to co-operate in the fight against inflation and at the same time the government is running up a deficit of $20 billion, possibly more, which will guarantee that inflation will continue into the foreseeable future. The likely result of this type of policy is an even greater portion of the national income being transferred from labour and business to government. It is a con job which will result in even more interference by government and a greater proportion of the gross national income being spent by government. This will lead to a worsening of the problems, it will not help to make them better.

I dislike the blanket approach of Bill C-124. I think proper management, a function of the executive branch not the legislative branch, requires flexibility. Each task which must be done has to be judged on its own merits. If this were done correctly, perhaps we would find there should be increases given in some places, and reductions in other places. The government should keep in mind the market forces as they affect the rest of society and perhaps use that knowledge to determine what public service salaries should be. But the blanket approach of 6 per cent this year and 5 per cent next year will not increase the effectiveness or fairness with which the Public Service of Canada is treated. I think one of the things we could do to increase the efficiency of the public service is to rid ourselves of many of the levels of command which have been built up in the last 15 years or so. It would be better if many of these levels were reduced and there was much closer association between, say, the deputy minister and the people in the public service who are actually providing the services. The bill has been gone into by many of my colleagues and members on the other side. They have come up with a number of very specific problems contained in the bill. The inequities between CN and CP employees, the question of indexed pensions for public servants when the premiums have already been paid and the question of non-wage negotiations, will undoubtedly be dealt with in committee.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that as far as I am concerned the whole package means one thing: the Liberal government has failed, and the public no longer has any confidence in this government. What we want, sir, is not wage or price controls, or any other control. What we need in this country is a Conservative government which appreciates the way the economy operates.

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Mr. Speaker, I will not take much time in dealing with Bill C-124. However, I did wish to say that this is one of those rare occasions when I find myself in a position to support the government's intentions as expressed in this legislation. It is a rare occasion indeed because, for the first time since the election of 1980, I find myself in that position. I intend to speak in favour of the bill. I intend to vote in favour of the bill. I should like to explain some of the reasons and at the same time state my reservations with respect to this issue.

It is comforting that I could follow one of my colleagues in the House who has spoken very dramatically in opposition to this piece of legislation, and for very valid reasons. The difference of opinion and difference of intention are unique to this side of the House. While I am convinced that I have colleagues on the other side of the House who feel similarly split with respect to their views, I can assure Mr. Speaker that when the division bells ring there will not be a single member on the government side, who may feel as the last speaker felt, who will vote against the legislation. Unfortunately that circumstance has weakened very substantially the principles upon which the House has been based. The absence of free expression of legitimately-held views by members of the House has led in many circumstances to a great deal of disrespect that the general public has for the way in which some of our functions are performed.

Let me simply say with respect to Bill C-124 that it is divided basically into two parts. There are three, but the two essential ones are those which deal with public service remuneration and those which deal with the remuneration of Members of Parliament, Senators and judges. If I may deal with the second part first, today we are faced, as Canadians responsible for the passage of legislation which will govern the affairs of our fellow Canadians, with a very serious responsibility. The country as a whole is suffering. There does not pass a single day while I am here or while I am at home that I am not confronted with genuinely expressed anguish from some of my constituents who are suffering from our economic troubles.

Last Friday before I left, I received a call from a constituent who until two weeks ago had been operating a business which employed 24 employees. There are now 12. Those 12 people have families, responsibilities and homes. They have built a future in my riding, as have 1,300,000 Canadians across the country, and now find themselves without genuine employment. For a period of about a year they are entitled to take what amounts in many cases to half remuneration in terms of a payment from the unemployment insurance fund, and after that has expired, they become recipients of welfare until that too expires.

This is no time for Members of the House to be insulated from the problems which exist in the country. For that reason, I find it incumbent upon me to show at least some personal restraint, and I accordingly applaud the government for having introduced a piece of legislation which bears down heavily on Members of Parliament and Senators, since we are the only group under this bill who will actually take a reduction in remuneration. It is appropriate because it is here, quite frankly, that the responsibility for the economic morass exists. Collectively we are responsible—on this side for permitting that side to ever form the government, and that side for creating the mess in which Canada finds itself. Accordingly we should not benefit from inflation which the government creates. After all, it is only with respect to a reduction in expectations for the future, subject, as I have said to the effect of an existing reduction in the actual salaries paid today to Members of Parliament and Senators. Others who are to benefit from the relative security of their positions because no job is secure—and now I wish to pass on to the first group affected by this legislation—in some way should be called upon in a fair and reasonable fashion to bear some of the burden. It is a small burden indeed that is imposed upon them. They are asked simply to take less of an increase—a 5 per cent or 6 per cent reduction in the increase which effectively would operate today, trying their known increases to 6 per cent and 5 per cent over ther next two years respectively.

I will not deal at this stage with the rather complex way in which the bill is drafted, setting out the year of commencement, the termination of the years and the way in which contracts currently in existence are to be protected until they terminate. But the principle is good. I seriously doubt that if one were to ask the average public servant in Canada—and I am not talking about the senior bureaucrat—"Do you, Sir, feel it appropriate, having regard to the special circumstances of your employment, to the fact that your employer will never go bankrupt officially, and to the fact that your fellow citizens cannot even find jobs, that you be called upon to restrain your demand upon the economy?" I am convinced that the average public servant, being reasonable, will respond in the affirmative. I know that there will be the Jean-Claude Parrots, interested in agitation, interested in creating conflict—and to that extent I suppose he finds good company in the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)—and interested in promoting disharmony, who would love to generate that kind of motivational action, dissent and conflict among public service unions. I seriously doubt that the average rank and file member would follow the call because they recognize their privileged position in society.

Quite frankly, I have very little sympathy for the senior public servants who are similarly restrained, if we recall the fact that they were not very harshly treated by the bill, having regard to the fact that some of them managed to get an increase on June 17, others as late as the day the budget was introduced imposing this restriction, and that others, being employees of ministers, may indeed—and the ministers requested have failed to supply this information—have received a 10 per cent increase in remuneration as recently as March and another one as recently as June 17, which is not altogether surprising. These are the very people who should share the reduction in renumeration which is provided for Members of Parliament by this bill because, quite frankly, every member of the House, as well as the ministers, knows that the people who have established the policies of this country and who have led us to financial ruin are the highly paid bureaucrats who always look after their own best interests.

• (2050)

My colleague, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), has made an excellent suggestion that it would be appropriate if these order in council appointees were changed when the governments change.

Mr. Orlikow: Why did you not do it?

Mr. Gamble: I am asked by a member of the NDP, who would certainly do it because they have made all NDP appointments, why we did not do it. I urged those who had an opportunity in 1979 to, in fact, do that very thing. Having regard to the lessons we learned in the past, very painful lessons, I am convinced that the next time the opportunity comes we will implement the suggestion made by the hon. member for Provencher. If this were done we may have had a fresh new group who, recognizing that their position was dependent upon the government, may have offered advice which would have helped sustain governments in power and which would have been beneficial to the general public. I must say that the current group of bureaucrats have expended their usefulness, a fact well recognized even by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) who, in drafting the budget which gave rise to this piece of legislation, seemed to have very conveniently, fortunately for him, omitted to consult some of those bureaucrats.

I am rather amused by the provisions of the bill which would have the effect of prohibiting strikes. I would remind the House that when I introduced a bill of my own as a private member's bill last year which would have dealt with that issue but only as far as strikes in essential services are concerned, members of the government in debating that bill made light of the suggestion. However, the government is now in a position less than a year later where it would implement even more stringent prohibitions against normal labour activities among public servants. I believe that the general public would respond positively to legislation prohibiting strikes in essential services. I do not believe that the general public is prepared to deal with the public service rendering non-essential services in the more stringent manner that the government now apparently believes ought to be the case.

When the government had an opportunity to take intelligent steps toward recovery the government and its backers refused to do it. Now, when the time has gone it looks upon the public service as an appropriate whipping boy for its own failures. However, it is significant that it has tried to do something. Personally I do not believe that what it is attempting to do will remedy the problems of inflation in Canada, but it may have a desired psychological effect.

The Prime Minister likes to talk about frightening the hell out of Canadians. I prefer to think that our severe economic difficulties have made Canadians, who are reasonable people, convinced that they each have a part to play in the regeneration of our economy.

I have indicated that I believe that the public service will respond positively. I also believe that this may have a beneficial psychological effect upon labour movement negotiations. We know that the UAW is about to enter into rather intricate and important negotiations with the automobile industry. We also know that our automobile industry in Canada is suffering. The Japanese, as a single source of imported automobiles, now occupy 25 per cent of the Canadian market with their automobiles. I believe that all Canadians have a responsibility and that they will positively respond to that responsibility. This is the extent of the effectiveness of this bill.

Without the co-operation of the general public, wage restraints and the $100 million to be saved next year and the $800 million the following year are but a drop in the proverbial bucket in which the government has sprung so many leaks.

Another cause of our dilemma has been government spending. Government spending currently exceeds $90 billion per year. Part of this has been brought about by the unfortunate economic situation in Canada. But we must ask ourselves how this situation developed. It developed because of the government. In the heydays when the sun was shining and the treasury was full, the ministers of the government followed the general practice of squandering the heritage of Canadians. They are now trying to make up for it. That squandering cannot be made up as one would desire.

The interest charges on the national debt alone exceed $17 billion as anticipated by the budget papers delivered on June 28. If we cast our minds back, that figure was almost twice the entire national budget when the present Prime Minister came to office, pledging when he came that he would cut the spending on the public service. As my colleague says, we have heard a more recent comment that government spending would not exceed the growth in the GNP. That is the most ludicrous performance that we have witnessed. The last budget to which we had reference in November projected $75 billion in expenditures. We are now looking at approximately an additional $15 billion in expenditures.

This does not include everything. Our economic performance has been a disaster. The government disclosures have only been half of it. The public accounts disclose statements such as $1 in a contingent liability fund to cover the liabilities of some of the Crown corporations, some of which have liabilities exceeding $1 billion. In this respect I am thinking of Canadair with liabilities of $1,400 million. Quite frankly, this company would not exist were it not for the government guarantees. That liability is disclosed as having a value of $1.

The government has run wild with the public purse. It is endeavouring in this small, minuscule way to recover some of its credibility. The government is to blame for the circumstances which all Canadians are suffering from. It is to blame for the heritage of debt which will be carried by our children and grandchildren and for as long as anyone alive today will be able to forecast. That is the great bequest of the Liberal administration to future generations. That is robbery. It has pillaged the pockets of the children and the unborn of this nation. It has tied them down with burdens and provided nothing for the days of emergency such as we are in now. It has squandered the heritage which was left to us when we were young.

• (2100)

I support the bill. It is the only sensible piece of reasonable effort that I have seen from the present administration. It is regrettable, unfortunate and lamentable that this is all that the government has to offer. The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) stood in his place on Friday and suggested that the public follow the lead of the government in its restraint program. If there is an average Canadian who is still employed and follows that lead of the government, restricting his income demands to 6 per cent and increasing his expenditures by 20 per cent, that individual will be bankrupt. The only thing that distinguishes the government from the individual is that it is able to look upon every asset that the public in Canada possesses and say, "I can call upon the assets of those Canadians who have saved them, who have inherited them and who have worked for them, and I will use the assets to pledge against the debts of our ludicrously stupid administration". No one can follow the lead of this government on any road other than the road to insolvency.

Last week the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) stood in this House and, when speaking for the Prime Minister in his absence during the question period, said that the government shares the views of both J. J. McDonnell, the former auditor general of Canada, and Ken Dye, the present Auditor General. I wonder to which comment he referred. Which one of the remarks made by these gentlemen was similar to the view of the Government of Canada? Was it the remark of Mr. Dye when he said, "Our nation is on its knees." Or was it the remark of J. J. McDonnell when he said, "The country is going down the drain." I wonder. Needless to say, we did not have any particulars.

I question whether the people who occupy the front benches opposite know what ills they have wrought upon Canadians. I wonder whether they are prepared to do anything about it. I am anxiously looking forward to some legislation of the kind that the nation demands. I am looking forward to the day when that government will have the courage to admit that our businesses have failed and our unemployment has increased, because we, having ruined the economy, and having recognized the close relationship between interest rates which must be paid in Canada and the value of the Canadian dollar, have employed high interest rates to keep Canadian dollars at home and preclude Canadians and others from selling them in exchange for more attractive U.S. currency. Will they now admit that it is a farce that is perpetrated every Thursday, much to the agony of Canadians, wherein 90-day treasury bills establish the rate fixed by the Bank of Canada, which is then, in some magic way, used as a signal to the chartered banks to increase interest rates? The chartered banks do not borrow from the Bank of Canada either on Thursday or at any other time. All this government has done has been to shift the responsibility for interest rates directly from the Minister of Finance to the Governor of the Bank of Canada. That responsibility is one that has crippled not only small but also large businesses in Canada. That interest rate burden cannot continue to be borne by either industry, business or home owners. It is certainly true that the value of the dollar would be greatly enhanced if the government could cut its expenditures and if it did not have to rely upon the artificial fixing of high interest rates to maintain its credibility. Who, indeed, would want to invest in Canada when the government has done its best to drive Canadian business out of the nation and when it has done its best to add tax burden upon tax burden? In the November budget there was an increase in taxation. In the June 28 budget, there was a further increase in taxation. Curiously enough, both increases were equivalent to $1.3 billion. The voracious appetite for additional taxes, added to the Canadian ownership charge, the hidden charge on petroleum purchases, the shifting of the excise tax to an ad valorem basis, the shifting once again of the manufacturers' sales tax to a wholesale tax to gain further and further revenues, were all designed to leave less and less in the hands of the consumer and the production sector of the economy and to put more and more in the hands of the government.

But the government has not shown any inkling that it has learned its lesson, that it must indeed pare its own expenditures. We on this side of the House have begged the government to refer the estimates to a special committee of the House for examination and reduction. There is not an hon. member on the government benches who does not believe that somewhere in those estimates is a fund that is wasted. We all know that they exist. Who is better able to take an axe, to take a chainsaw and to cut through that dead wood and actually reduce the expenditures of this government than hon. members of the House of Commons?

We have urged the Prime Minister and the Minister of Transport, when acting for the Prime Minister, to clearly show that the government's intentions are noble and that they will in fact do something positive to let the nation know that we are about to accomplish something, namely to accomplish the reduction of our own extravagance in this place. But it will not happen. They are too proud. They have never made a mistake in their lives. They are afraid to admit their errors.

There is not a Canadian who does not recognize that errors have been made. They look to those people on the government benches to stand up and say, "I insist upon cutting out the waste. I insist upon giving you good value for your money." Until that happens, the effort we go through here today with respect to this bill is a waste of time. However, as small as it is, as insignificant as it is in the total scheme of things, although it is deficient and inadequate, I feel compelled—since it is the first time and, having regard to the conduct of this government, it is probably the last time that I shall ever see anything worthwhile from it—to vote for it.
