OFFICIAL REPORT

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

"CONSCRIPTION OF WEALTH."

STATEMENT BY THE FINANCE MINISTER.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Sir THOMAS WHITE (Minister of Finance): I desire to make a statement upon a matter of public importance. It has been officially drawn to the attention of the Government that the use of the expression "conscription of wealth" in the debates in Parliament and by public and other bodies outside of Parliament and by the press in its news reports has caused a certain uneasiness among those whose savings constitute a vital factor in the business and industrial life of the Dominion and are so essential to the credit and prosperity upon which our efforts in the continued prosecution of the war must largely depend. I desire to say on behalf of the Government that there need exist no apprehension on the part of the public that any action of a detrimental character will at any time be taken with respect to the savings of the Canadian public. On the contrary it will be the policy of the Government in the future as in the past to encourage in every way possible the exercise of the thrift and economy resulting in national savings which have enabled Canada to maintain her credit and improve her economic position during the war. Any taxation to which it may be necessary for the Government to resort from time to time will be in accordance with legitimate and established forms of taxation sanctioned by the tradition and experience of British self-governing communities. This statement, therefore, must not be understood as precluding legislation providing for income taxation upon those whose incomes are such as to make it just and equitable that they should contribute a share of the war expenditure of the Dominion.

Hon. GEORGE GRAHAM: In the remarks which I made during the discussion which took place in the House, I did not use the term "conscription of wealth." The resolution which I introduced was in these words:

> That in the opinion of this House it is desirable that steps should be taken forthwith by the Government to provide that accumulated wealth should contribute immediately and effectively to the cost of the war.

The observations that I made were, I think, perfectly in harmony with the wording of this resolution and with the remarks just made by the Minister of Finance.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Hear, hear.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT, 1917.

CONSIDERATION OF THE BILL IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE HOUSE.

House in Committee on Bill No. 75, respecting Military Service—Sir Robert Borden. (Resumed from Monday, July 9. Mr. Rainville in the Chair.)

On section 11—exemptions:

> (1) At any time before a date to be fixed in the proclamation mentioned in section four, an application may be made, by or in respect of any man in the class or subclass called out by such proclamation to a local tribunal established in the province in which such man ordinarily resides, for a certificate of exemption on any of the following grounds:—
> (b) That it is expedient in the national interest that the man should, instead of being employed in military service, be engaged in other work in which he wishes to be engaged and for which he has special qualifications;
> (c) That it is expedient in the national interest that, instead of being employed in military service, he should continue to be educated or trained for any work for which he is then being educated or trained;
> (d) That serious hardship would ensue, if the man were placed on active service, owing to his exceptional financial or business obligations or domestic position;
> (e) Ill health or infirmity;
> (f) That he conscientiously objects to the undertaking of combatant service and is prohibited from so doing by the tenets and articles of faith, in effect at the date of the passing of this Act, of any organized religious denomination existing and well recognized in Canada at such date, and to which he in good faith belongs; and if any of the grounds of such application be established, a certificate of exemption shall be granted to such man.

(2) (a) A certificate may be conditional as to time or otherwise and if granted solely on conscientious grounds shall state that such exemption is from combatant service only.

(b) A certificate granted on the ground of the continuance of education or training or on the ground of exceptional financial or business obligations or domestic position, shall be a conditional certificate only.

(c) No certificate shall be conditional upon a person to whom it is granted continuing in or entering into employment under any specified place or established.

(d) A certificate may transfer a man to the class next in numerical order.

(e) When a conditional certificate is granted the conditions shall be stated on the certificate.

(f) It shall be the duty of any man holding a conditional certificate within three days after the conditions stated therein cease to exist or after his exemption terminates, to give notice in writing of such fact to the Registrar of the province in which he ordinarily resides; and if he fails without reasonable excuse to do so, he shall be guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding two hundred and fifty dollars.

(3) (a) Subject to such conditions as to application and notice as may be provided by regulations, and subject also to paragraph (b) of this subsection, a certificate may, during the currency thereof, be renewed, varied or withdrawn at any time by the local tribunal issuing the same.

(b) Where a decision of a local or appeal tribunal has been varied on appeal to an appeal tribunal or to the Central Appeal Judge, a certificate granted upon such variation shall thereafter, subject to such conditions as to application and notice as may be provided by regulations, be renewed, varied or withdrawn, but only during the currency thereof and only by the appeal tribunal or judge who granted the certificate.

(4) Any person who, for the purpose of taining a certificate or a condition in a certificate for himself or for any other person, or for the purpose of obtaining the renewal, variation or withdrawal of a certificate, makes any false statement or representation, shall be guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to imprisonment for any term not exceeding twelve months with or without hard labour.

(5) (a) Any man who, having applied to any local tribunal for the issue to him of a certificate, applies without the leave of the Minister to any other local tribunal for a certificate, and any person who, knowing or having reason to believe that an application for a certificate has been made or is being made by or in respect of a man to a local tribunal, makes or aids or abets in the making or establishing of an application without such leave by or in respect of such man to another local tribunal, shall be guilty of an offence and shall be liable on summary conviction to a penalty of not less than one hundred dollars and not more than one thousand dollars.

(b) All applications and all proceedings taken on application for certificates made without the leave of the Minister by or in respect of a man before a local tribunal other than the local tribunal before which the first application by or in respect of such man was made, shall be null and void.

(c) Nothwithstanding anything in this section contained, the Governor in Council may by regulations abolish any local tribunal, and transfer its duties and powers to any other local tribunal.

(6) Any person who alters or tampers with a certificate or, for the purpose of evading this Act, falsely represents himself to be a person to whom a certificate has been granted, or, if granted a certificate, allows, for like purpose, any other person to have possession thereof, shall be guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to imprisonment for any term not exceeding six months.

(7) When a certificate is lost, destroyed or defaced, the tribunal by whom it was granted shall, upon the application of the man to whom it was granted and upon payment of a fee of fifty cents, issue to him a duplicate of such certificate.

Mr. PROULX: It has been suggested by hon. gentlemen on the other side that conscription would not affect the farming community; that it was the intention of the Government to leave the farmers at home in order that they might produce food and agricultural products. Nothing, however, in these subsections exempts the farmers as a class. Considering the usefulness of their occupation, I think that they might well be exempted from military service. It would satisfy a great many people in the country if it was made plain in the Bill that the farmers would not be conscripted.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The agricultural class, under the provisions of the Bill as it stands, will undoubtedly be the largest class of those claiming exemption, but to go further and say that a man must necessarily be exempted merely because he is engaged in some form of agriculture is to rob the Bill entirely of any principle whatsoever. For instance, the father of a family and his two sons might have been accustomed to working a farm of 100 acres, and the two sons may have already gone to the front, leaving the father to depend upon hired help in the summer time. The neighbouring farm may be only 50 acres, and the father and three sons might still be at home. If a hard and fast provision such as my hon. friend suggests were adopted, all these anomalies might still continue to exist. The British Bill has a clause similar to ours in this respect, and in the working out of their Act explanations were published by the Local Government Board interpreting with as much particularity as was possible what was meant by the national interests. The mere fact of a man being engaged in a useful occupation was not of itself sufficient to determine the tribunal in exempting him. Other questions had to be considered; for instance, whether the applicant's place could not be filled by a man who was disqualified from the military standpoint, or even by a woman. These and many other considerations were taken into account by the tribunals. Simply because the occupation in which the man is engaged is useful, even though it may be the only one in which he is skilled, it does not follow that he should be retained. Any provision other than the general one that those who can best serve the national interests at home shall stay at home, is, I fear, a dangerous provision.

Mr. PROULX: I think that some limit should be imposed as to the number of men required on a farm. My hon. friend cited the case of a father and two sons on a farm of 100 acres, and the father being left to do all the work as the sons had enlisted. We might state in the Bill that not more than three persons should be allowed to 100 acres. Three men, I think, would be sufficient for that acreage. In England so many agriculturalists were allowed to enlist in the early days of the war, and farm labour became so scarce that 27,000 men had to be recalled from the trenches to cultivate the farms. There is danger of something similar happening here unless we provide against it. We should take steps to ensure that our production will be sufficient to support our own population and to help supply the Allies with foodstuffs. There are not many farms in Canada where you will find more than two sons and the father working the farm. I think the Bill should allow a certain number of men to each farm.

Mr. RAINVILLE: My attention has been drawn to this very question. The purpose of the Government in introducing this Bill is that the nation's efforts should be directed toward winning the war. Some men will be called on to fight, and others will be engaged in sustaining the productivity of the Dominion. The preamble states that in view of the large number of men who have already left agricultural and industrial pursuits in Canada to enlist, and in view of the necessity of sustaining the productivity of the Dominion, it has been found necessary to introduce this legislation. If the Government are sincere in stating that their intention is to retain men who are useful in agricultural and industrial pursuits, I do not see why this section should not be made to read accordingly. The preamble, it is true, sets out the Government's intention, but I do not see why it should not be expressly stated in this section—that agriculture and other necessary industries of the country shall be maintained. I therefore beg to move:

> That in line 32 of subsection (a) of section 11 the words "agricultural, industrial or" be inserted after the word "in" and before the word "other."

The subsection would then read:

> That it is expedient in the national interest that the man should, instead of being employed in military service, be engaged in agricultural, industrial or other work in which he is habitually engaged.

That would be expressly stating the Government's intention as set out in the preamble. I would impress upon the House that the intention of this Bill is not to conscript the whole man-power of the country, but only 100,000 men, and if there are any industries that should be protected, they are agriculture and the other industries necessary to the winning of the war. I think every one will admit that agriculture is one of the first industries that should be taken care of. The inserting of these words would not mean that a man so engaged would necessarily be exempted, but it would ensure that the production of the country would not suffer by reason of this Bill. The amendment is absolutely in accord with the Government's intention.

Mr. J. GIRARD (Chicoutimi-Saguenay) (translation): Mr. Chairman, I beg leave to second the amendment offered by my hon. friend from Chambly-Verchères (Mr. Rainville), to the exemption clause.

I think that, if the amendment offered by my hon. friend is not going to be applied to the exemption provisions, to which he wishes to apply it, it would be desirable to make the interpretation of the section clearer and to add to subsection A after the words "in which he is habitually engaged" the following words: "The men engaged in agricultural and industrial pursuits and in the fisheries." I do not intend to embarrass the Government with this amendment, but in the preamble, the Government seems to be aiming at protecting the agricultural and industrial classes. The intention of the Government in that respect is open to doubt. I have received several letters and I think this subsection should be made plainer, so as to make perfectly clear what the real purpose of the Government is.

As remarked by the hon. member for Chambly-Verchères, the intention of the Bill is not to conscript the whole man-power of the country, but only 100,000 men, and it matters little once those 100,000 men are enlisted, whether such or such a class is exempted, as what is needed is production and farmers engaged in sustaining the productivity of the Dominion, to support our own population and help supply the Allies.

Mr. BOULAY (translation): I fully agree with what has been said by my hon. friend from Chicoutimi-Saguenay (Mr. Girard). As far as possible, it is desirable to allay public anxiety and to ease the minds of many people who are anxious to know which are the classes that are going to be conscripted, and everybody knows that it is in the interest of the country that the agricultural class should be taken care of and exempted. I think that at this phase of the debate on this Bill, it would be desirable to insert a clause such as suggested by the hon. member for Chicoutimi-Saguenay to subsection A of the exemption section. By adding the words suggested by my hon. friend, the debate would be simplified and it would also meet the views of the Government which is acting in the general interest of the country. I may further say that it would meet the views of the people in general, and more particularly the views of the farmers who do not expect to be disturbed in the work in which they are engaged and who should be left at home, unless we want to throw the whole industrial machine of the country out of gear. I believe that the Government should not hesitate to insert those words, or else, we might add after clause F another one which would be clause "G", worded as follows:

That, it is expedient in the national interest that all the bona fide farmers and fishermen, instead of being employed in military service, should be maintained in the work in which they are habitually engaged.

If this would not be covered in paragraph (a) we could make another paragraph (g) and put it in there; so that it would be well understood which are the classes we want exempt. I think this would save quite a lot of discussion and would meet the views of the majority of the members of this House.

Mr. BRADBURY: I do not know very well how the House could adopt the amendment offered by my hon. friend. The principle of the Bill, as I understand it, is that there should be no exemptions. If we start to exempt the farmers, fishermen, and so on, there is no telling where we may end.

[Mr. Girard.]

An hon. MEMBER: And the lawyers.

Mr. BRADBURY: Lawyers are pretty well exempt anyway.

Mr. RAINVILLE: I do not mean by this amendment that it is to be a special exemption. I just mean to advocate the principle of the law as it is to-day. The hon. member knows very well that to interpret the law we may use the preamble just as well as any other part of the Bill, and saying that the judge will be called upon to decide as to what are the most essential industries is just repeating what is in the preamble.

Mr. BRADBURY: I agree with the idea and the argument of my hon. friend that the agricultural classes should not be disturbed, as far as possible. There is no intention in this Bill to disturb the agricultural class any more than any other class, but as was said by the Solicitor General a few minutes ago, take the case of a farmer working say 100 acres of land and having two or three sons to help him. If these two or three sons have volunteered for the front, the position of that farmer is different from the position of another farmer who may have two or three sons on the farm whom he can spare.

An hon. MEMBER: Provided they are wanted.

Mr. BRADBURY: Provided they are wanted. It is only fair these men should be selected. I think that is the principle of the Bill, and that is what every member of this House understands. I should object strenuously to support any Bill or any suggestion that would exempt any class of people in this country. This Bill must apply to everybody. The farmer has responded nobly already, and I am sure when the time comes to make the selection required for this 100,000 men the farmer will not be drawn on unfairly. But, where there are places, and we know there are hundreds, where farming districts have not done their duty, this Bill will compel them to do their duty. Other farmers have done more than their duty. I can cite you dozens of cases in my own constituency where men have gone who should not have gone, and who would not have gone if we had selective conscription. I think this Bill is a step in the right direction.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Would not the farmers, as a class, resent the insertion of any such clause?

Mr. BRADBURY: No doubt the farmers would take it as an insult if any such clause were inserted. The farmers are just as anxious as any other people to do their duty, and they have done it. I cannot very well understand what my hon. friend wants. To my mind the interpretation of the Bill is very clear. The intention of the Government in submitting the measure to Parliament was that the selection should be made absolutely equitable and fair, and the provisions of this Bill covered this.

Mr. MARCIL: Does the Solicitor General intend setting a standard by which those local tribunals are to proceed on his definition of the so-called national interest, or is each tribunal to be allowed to decide in each individual case and have a standard of its own as to what is the national interest?

Mr. MEIGHEN: In subsection 3 of section 5 there are regulations looking to the uniform application of the Act. There is a regulation which might cover generally the intentions of the tribunal as to what principles should guide them in determining what is in the national interest. That was done in Great Britain. I have before me a document published under the signature of the Right Hon. Walter H. Long for the guidance of tribunals, and the general principles by which they may well be governed. The English Act practically combined our first two exemptions in one. They followed that by an outline of the principles by which the local board of tribunals should be governed. I will read a portion of this document:—

12. The following observations as regards the different classes of cases may be of service:

Employment cases (section 2 (1) (a))—the question to be considered in these cases is not whether the man has a claim for exceptional treatment in his own interests, but whether it is or is not in the national interests that he should be retained in civil employment. "National interests" has to be construed broadly. It covers not only services which minister directly to the prosecution of the war, but also services which are esential to the country at the present time. Whether, for instance, in the maintenance of the food supply, or of the export trade, or in the performance of other services which it is desirable should be carried on in the interests of the community.

In deciding cases of this class, local tribunals should take into account not only (a) whether the service is such as ministers to the national interests at the present time, but also (b) whether it is in the national interests that the particular man should continue in civil employment, and whether, even if the services which he renders are essential, they cannot be performed by available men not of military age or otherwise not fit for military service, or by women.

Then they proceed to a similar treatment of the cases covered by our second clause of exemptions. I might also read it:—

13. It is provided that exemption (which must in this case be conditional or temporary) may be granted to a man who is being educated or trained for any work, if it is expedient in the national interests that he should continue to be so educated or trained. It is not intended that the mere fact that the man is being educated or trained shall be a sufficient reason for exemption. It must be clearly shown that it is in the national interests that he should continue his education or training either because he will become so valuable for work ministering, directly or indirectly, to the national requirements in connection with the war that it would be unwise to take him away from his education or training, or because, quite apart from any services which he is likely to render during the course of the war, his education or training will hereafter render him so essential to the community that it would be unwise to interrupt his education or training.

The presumption will generally be that a man undergoing education or training who is young and free from the responsibilities of older men should do his duty for the country at the present time by undertaking military service,—

That is the prima facie presumption.

—and therefore it is for the Local Tribunal in each instance to make sure that the conditions in the particular case are such as to justify special treatment before exemption is granted.

They go on to outline what in their judgment should cover cases of serious hardship which is our third class of exemption. Then they proceed to deal with cases of ill-health or infirmity. I do not say for a moment that the regulations that may be promulgated by the central appeal judge would be identical with those in England, but I read these to indicate the general scope that may be covered by the regulations. I could not say whether there is any reason or not for deviating very widely from them. At the moment I do not know.

Mr. PARDEE: By reason of the fact that there is uncertainty as to who will and who will not be exempted under the provisions of this selective conscription measure, and more especially as there has been a great deal of talk about its effect upon agricultural production, a doubt has been brought to the minds of a great many people in the agricultural industry as to how far selective conscription would go with them. I quite agree with the principle of the Bill, and I believe that nobody should be exempted from conscription under the measure. On the other hand, my opinion is that as far as possible the work of the agricultural community and the productiveness of this country ought not to be, even in the very least, impaired, for we have been told by members of the Government that production is almost as essential to-day to the winning of the war as some other forms of military service. I would make a suggestion to the Solicitor General. We have just had from the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) a declaration of the policy of the Government with reference to the conscription of wealth. The Government has taken exception, very reasonably, to the broad term "conscription of wealth" being used to such an extent and so irresponsibly as to upset certain classes of our people in the Dominion by making them believe that their own savings would be conscripted. The statement that the minister has made will allay public anxiety along that line to a large extent and will ease the minds of a great many people. I am not asking the Solicitor General to make any specific declaration that agriculture should not be conscripted—I do not want him to do that—but, could not he give some assurance that when the rules and regulations are drawn up for the purpose of carrying out this Bill agriculture will be looked upon from the point of view solely of the productive needs of the country and treated accordingly.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend will see that, inasmuch as these regulations are promulgated first by the central appeal judge, it would be improper on my part to even indicate what regulations that authority should recommend. At the same time, I can say that there seems no reason to doubt that the requirements of this Bill can be filled without taking such men from agricultural pursuits as would reduce agricultural production.

Mr. PARDEE: Say that again.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Without taking such men from agriculture as will reduce our agricultural production.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I suppose that statement would apply to other productive pursuits such as fishing, lumbering and mining?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I see no reason at all for believing that the production of this country cannot be fully maintained and the requirements of this Bill filled as well.

Mr. PROULX: The central appeal judge will be pretty well governed in making the regulations by what is said in Parliament. We pass the law; we are the representatives of the people and we should say who should be exempted from this conscription. If Parliament affirms the principle that agriculture is such an important industry and so necessary in the carrying on of this war that those engaged in agricultural pursuits should be as lightly touched as possible by conscription, the central appeal judge will be pretty well governed in framing the regulations by the opinion of this Parliament. I approve of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Chambly and Vercheres (Mr. Rainville). In certain subsections and clauses different occupations are mentioned such as financial and other occupations whilst the agricultural occupation is mentioned only in the preamble of the Bill. Agricultural occupation is as useful, if not more useful than, financial or professional occupation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Where are the other occupations mentioned?

Mr. PROULX: In subsection (d) of section 11:

(d) That serious hardship would ensue, if the man were placed on active service, owing to his exceptional financial or business obligations or domestic position;

Mr. MEIGHEN: That class mentioned in subsection (d) does not relate to occupation, but to obligations. It may be that the peculiar obligations under which a man is, domestic, financial or business, are such that he should be accorded special treatment in the interests of the community.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: As to the individual man.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is, it would be a serious hardship and would likely inflict hardship on others if that particular individual, owing not to his occupation but to his obligations were taken.

Mr. PROULX: Farmers have large obligations. Many of them have large mortgages on their farms.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then they would come under that clause.

Mr. TURRIFF: It seems to me that the wording of the clause is very fair as it is. I represent almost wholly farmers, and I should not like to see them especially singled out and exempted. I think any tribunal would surely see that production of food of any kind would be of such great importance to the Allies that a man who, by staying on the farm this year could produce a couple of hundred bushels of wheat for export next year, is worth more to the British army, to Canada and the Allies generally, on the farm than he could possibly be in the trenches at this time. I do not think there is a chance in a thousand that a tribunal would send a man who was working on the land and producing food either for Canada or for export into the trenches where he would not be worth one-half as much. When I was in the West lately I learned of an old man who had a farm of 480 acres, a great deal of it under cultivation. He was working like a slave himself, with one hired man; he could not get any more help. While I was there two men drifted into the town and wanted jobs. This man saw them and they asked him $6 a day, and would not consider anything less than $5 a day. Any man who knows anything about farming in the West knows that, at this time of the year, before the crop is grown, no farmer can pay $5 a day and board to a man and have anything left—he would go in the hole himself. I was wondering whether the Government had any idea of conscripting men for other purposes than sending them to the front. It seems to me that men who are walking around the country and trying to hold people up for $5 a day for labour on the farm, are a class of men that it would not be bad policy to conscript. I would say to them: If you do not want to go and fight for your country, the least you can do is to produce food for the men who are fighting, and do so at $2.50 or $3 a day and your board. That is good big pay. I should like to see the conscription go far enough to make that class of man get to work and do one thing or the other. If he is not suitable to go to the trenches he should be made to produce food.

Mr. MORPHY: I beg to suggest a change in the wording of subsection (a) of section 11. That subsection reads:

I think the phraseology is a little unfortunate. Instead of saying "is habitually engaged," it should read "has been for a certain period of time past habitually engaged." We might say at least one year prior to the passing of this Act, or at the time the war broke out. My idea is that exemptions under this Bill should be to real classes of the people. As the clause reads, hundreds of young men may rush to the farms who do not know anything about farming. They may have gone there during the last week, and under the phraseology here such young men could go to the tribunal and say: I am farming, I am hired out and have been for a month—at exorbitant wages. In that way a man might escape service. I think that, in the interest of the country, there should be added to that clause the words "for at least one year prior to the passing of this Act."

Something should be added to indicate that he must be a real farmer, a real fisherman, a real something, and not a man who is attempting to avoid service by taking up one of these occupations. The same thing applies to clause (f) in relation to conscientious objectors. The clause reads:

> That he conscientiously objects to the undertaking of combatant service and is prohibited from so doing by the tenets and articles of faith, in effect at the date of the passing of this Act, of any organized religious denomination existing and well recognized in Canada at such date, and to which he in good faith belongs; and if any of the grounds of such application be established, a certificate of exemption shall be granted to such man.

I would change that section to read "that existed before the 4th of August, 1914," being the time of the declaration of war. I do not know whether any one knows what orders have arisen in view of the possibilities of such an Act as this. The section as it reads now would apply to any coterie of persons who would say: We belong to a certain branch of a sect well known and organized in Canada. I think there should be a time limit there.

Mr. BRADBURY: If a man does not want to defend the state he should not have citizenship, no matter who he is.

Mr. MORPHY: There are certain people who have conscientious objections to combatant service and are protected by the law. My objection is to having others slip in and say they are exempted when they are not. In other words, a real conscientious objector should be exempted.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: I think the amendment before us is too broad, to start with, and it is very questionable whether it is required at all. I agree with the hon. gentleman from Selkirk (Mr. Bradbury) and the hon. gentleman from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) who both have had some experience in this matter. I do not think it is necessary that we should use the term suggested in regard to those engaged in agricultural or industrial pursuits, especially the latter, because it is altogether too broad. We use the term "industrial," and it covers almost everything in the country. Then, while the clause, as it would read after the proposed amendment, would not, of itself, positively exempt any one, the trouble is it might be considered as exempting them, and might cause a great deal of dissatisfaction, when certain people found they were not exempted. Some people engaged in agriculture in some parts might be dispensed with. In the part of the country in which the Solicitor General and I live, I presume there are not very many who could be dispensed with, because the farms are large, and the country is so thoroughly drained of suitable farm help, that the danger is that we will not have enough men to attend to our harvest and threshing. But I think that is not the case throughout the whole of Canada. I think the suggestion of the hon. gentleman from Perth (Mr. Morphy) would work a very serious hardship in the western country. I think my hon. friend will find that the people in the West move around a great deal more than they do in the East. We find hundreds of men engaged bona fide in farming, just as faithfully as any man in the country is engaged in that occupation, but they have only started this season. They have bought farms, and expect to raise thousands of bushels of grain. A man may be working alone, as many of them are. He may have thousands of bushels of grain growing now, but if my hon. friend's suggestion were adopted, he would not be exempt at all; he could not possibly be exempt, and the grain would have to go to waste, because if we take men from the farms in the western country, as my hon. friend will understand very well, and compel them to go to the front, the crop will be almost sure to go to waste. There are no surplus men to be had there. Every farmer there is required to look after the farms. There may be odd men, such as the hon. member from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) suggests, who are trying to hold the farmers up. I have no objection to seeing those fellows being sent away, even if they are farm labourers. I think it would be safe for us to leave the clause as it stands. I desire to make a suggestion, but I am not sure how pertinent it is. We have referred occasionally to regulations made under the Militia Act, and to rules of court, made by judges of the supreme court of the different provinces. It seems to me that there is considerable difference in the application of those regulations. The rules of court cover technical questions, which can be better dealt with by the judges of the supreme court than any one else, and the regulations under the Militia Act cover technical questions, which can be better dealt with by the Government, advised by their military officers. But I believe that this House is in a better position to deal with these exemptions than any one else, and I suggest to the Government that they should consider the advisability of making such regulations as apply to the exemptions a part of the Act.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN (Halifax): make it a matter of statute.

Mr. THOMSON: Whether we adopt that suggestion or not, I should like to have the regulations, at least under this particular section, disposed of by this House. Make them part of the statute, if you like.

Mr. RAINVILLE: I agree with some of the suggestions made by the hon. gentleman from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff). With regard to these exemption sections, we would like to know how the provision is going to work. The first exception, (a), refers to the man who is habitually engaged in a certain kind of work. The second exemption (b), refers to the man who has special qualifications, and the third exemption (c), deals with the man who is being educated or trained. The fourth (d), provides for the case of a man who has exceptional financial or business obligations. The fifth exemption (e), refers to health or infirmity, and the sixth exemption (f), deals with conscientious objections. The judge will be called upon to decide on these very cases, and the duty of the judge will be to find the 100,000 men who are to be sent to the front. When that point is reached, is that all? I say: No, it is not all. Some people are demanding the conscription of wealth; I would claim conscription for the promotion of agriculture and industry. Then another question is: who is going to direct the rejections or exemptions? Who is going to say that a man who is keeping a cigar store, for instance, would be more useful if he were placed on the farm? Then we have the case of the man on the farm who is doing nothing in the way of producing. Who is going to direct that he shall be exempted? Will it be the judge? It is impossible to think that a judge can deal with that. We will have to get some kind of machinery in the administration to deal with those exemptions, and get together the full strength of the nation, and direct it in the best interests of Canada and of the Empire, in the way of producing food, stimulating industry, and developing our mines and fisheries. Although we have kept the National Service Commission out of this Bill, I was thinking that every exemption dealt with in this clause of exemptions by the judge should be sent, with full information, on a card, to some authority, where it could be dealt with, because every one knows the National Service cards were filled up in a very unsatisfactory manner. The National Service Commission cannot accomplish anything with the cards, signed as they have been. Why not take this opportunity, with this big organization which will be established all over Canada—and maybe outside of Canada, for some people went away without reason—and get these cards, and all information obtained by the National Service Commission, and we may have the conscription of wealth, or agriculture or industry, whatever we may call it, and have machinery that will direct our people where they can go in order to render the best service to the country and to humanity. That is the first consideration and if we do not want to face a great shortage of food something of this kind must be done. And this shortage will not take place in Canada only. Everybody knows, considering what is taking place everywhere, that we may have to face a shortage of food all over the world. We may face shortage of every production in other countries, and we may have the manufacturers producing products that are not useful. If we insert a provision on the very first page of this Bill that agriculture and industry shall be the first consideration to be dealt with by the Government then we can use the full strength of the nation. The first consideration should be, not the farmer himself, but that which is produced by the farmer. I am not claiming exemption for the farmer; I am claiming what may be called the conscription of agriculture for the benefit of the people of this Dominion. When I put it that way, I do not think that hon. gentlemen can attribute to my words any other sense than that in which I utter them. One gentleman has said that such a course would be an insult to the farmers. I do not see why. If it is admitted that we should conscript for the army; that we should conscript wealth, agriculture, industry; then I say that agriculture is the first to be taken care of. If a farmer should not be producing enough, it would be the duty of a judge to say: You are not producing what you should; you go to the war, and we will put another man in your place. The result would be the production of what is necessary to feed the people. I do not consider that this would be an insult to the farmer, and I challenge those who contend that such is the intention of my amendment. My desire is that there shall be put on the farms all the hands available to work the lands properly and ensure a maximum amount of production throughout the country.

Mr. MARCIL: In the centre of Canada farming is a basic industry, and all over Canada agriculture is important, but there are parts of the country where mining or fishing are of the first importance. As I understand the explanation of the Solicitor General, no man can claim exemption because of his calling, but any man who cannot be replaced may be exempted because of the importance of the services which he renders here. This principle, I understand, is based upon the principle adopted in England. A man in any calling, therefore, may be exempted, and a man in any calling may be forced to go to the front.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would be hardly correct to use these words with regard to exceptions, but using them with regard to exemptions, my hon. friend's understanding is quite correct.

Mr. OLIVER: The subclause that we are now discussing is an exemption provision; it is a provision to enable everybody to be exempted. There is no necessity for the following subclauses in the section, because this subclause covers everything and everybody. In section 2 provision is made far the compulsory service of everybody, and in section 11 provision is made for the exemption of everybody. This is supposed to be a deliberative body, responsible to the people for the result of legislation passed with the authority of the House. We are told that the purpose of this Bill is selective conscription, but after over an hour's discussion we have not a scintilla of information as to what the selection is going to be, or on what basis it is going to be made. Parliament is asked to endorse a Bill of that character, affecting the lives and the honour of 100,000 of its citizens. Is the Solicitor General serious when he tells us that there is to be no regulation by authority of Parliament of the conduct of tribunals under this section?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I was quite serious when I told the committee what I did tell it, but I did not say what my hon. friend suggests. Any regulation recommended by the central appeal judge and approved by the Governor in Council is made under the authority of this Parliament and may look to uniformity in the application of this Act. They have been able in Great Britain to formulate such regulations; there is no reason why they should not be able to do so here, having regard, of course, to the somewhat different conditions prevailing in Canada. I cannot answer the extreme assertions of the member for Edmonton that this clause provides for the exemption of everybody. A similar clause was in the British Act, but it did not provide for the exemption of everybody there. I know no reason to believe that we cannot have as intelligent tribunals in Canada as they have in England. But we cannot with too great particularity or solidity of rule define just what a tribunal must do in any individual case. Nor can we say in broad language to the tribunal: exempt a man if you think it is in the national interest, and send him to the front if you think that is in the national interest. One would be much too narrow; the other very much too broad; a line must be found between. The line is this: that we endeavour here to lay down principles that will guide the tribunal in determining what is in the national interest and what is not.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What is that principle?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The principles are set out in (a), (b), (c), (d), (e) and (f) of section 11. These are almost identically the principles that have been found sufficient in England. After many months' trial of the statute there, various amendments were suggested to Parliament and various improvements proposed in connection with different features of the Act, but they left those principles as they defined them initially, because they had found them satisfactory. It is not, I think, asking the committee too much to suggest that we have at least some regard to the experience of Great Britain in that matter. We will get the advantage of their decisions wherever they will be of use to us. I do not think, however, that we can afford on the one hand, to be more exacting, or, on the other hand, to be broader and more indefinite.

Mr. OLIVER: Perhaps the Solicitor General will tell us who amongst the citizens of Canada cannot be exempted under subsection (a)?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is not the part of the Solicitor General to perform here the duty of tribunals. The duty of the Solicitor General is to explain the principle of the Act, not to say what the tribunals should do in any individual case. But if my hon. friend were himself a member of the tribunal, I should not have the least hesitation in bringing before him many men whom he and I commonly know and to whom he would have no difficulty in applying those principles.

Mr. OLIVER: It is not a question as to how far my friend and I might agree in regard to the application of these principles; it is a question of the responsibility of this Parliament of Canada for knowing how those principles are to be applied. I asked what I thought was a very reasonable and simple question, but my hon. friend was not able, or not willing, to give me an answer, and for the very good reason that only one answer was possible, and that was that under the section as it reads any tribunal may exempt any citizen of Canada from military service. There is no doubt about that. Will any member of this committee point out what citizen of Canada may not be exempted under this subsection from military service by a tribunal?

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: Assuming that a man were——

Mr. OLIVER: I have asked a plain question, and asking another question is not answering mine. I have asked a plain question, and if I cannot get an answer to it I shall have to be permitted to continue my remarks.

Mr. NICKLE: Take the case of a man engaged in a non-essential and non-productive industry.

Mr. OLIVER: Who is to say that the industry is non-essential and non-productive except the tribunal? And the tribunal can say whatever it pleases.

Mr. NICKLE: That is not the question my hon. friend asked. He asked any member of the committee to name any class of men who would not be exempt under this subsection. I say that under that subsection no man should be exempted who was engaged in a non-productive and non-essential industry, because it would not be in the national interests to exempt him.

Mr. OLIVER: The answer to that is that the tribunals are vested with the fullest possible discretion, and it is for them to say whether a given industry is a national necessity or not. If my hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Nickle) cannot give me a direct answer to the question that I asked, it is probably not within the competence of any member of this House to do so. So the matter stands exactly as I have stated it, and certainly we are not dealing fairly by the people of Canada unless from our places and at this time we require from the Government some method of limitation or direction that will make it possible for us to say to the people of Canada: This is a declaration of principle which will be given effect to under these circumstances and to this extent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know but that a tribunal which flagrantly and dishonestly violated its duty could not exempt any person. I do not assume, however, that our tribunals are going to be dishonest, negligent or unfaithful; I presume they will be honest, diligent and faithful. Assuming that, then I know that in the application of the Act the men can be secured in Canada, and without injury, I believe, to the country. No judge of the land interpreting the law is not able and competent within the sphere of his own jurisdiction to remit the sentence of any criminal and release him; he is, however, liable to appeal, and so is this tribunal. All these appeals come before a final court, and it is for that final court to interpret this statute, just as it is for the final court in the land to interpret other statutes. That is a very brief statement of the principle of all enactments that are left in their working out to judicial or semi-judicial tribunals. I know of no other way of effecting the end desired, but I should be very glad of suggestions from the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) as to how he would work out selective drafts if he had charge of the matter himself.

Mr. OLIVER: What I would say is this. I am not in favour of the principle of selective draft as it seems to be understood by the framers of this Bill. I certainly think that the principle embodied in the Militia Act, and which has recently been adopted by the United States, is a very much more desirable principle, because it is based on fairness, while the principle here is based absolutely on unfairness, and we are leaving the administration of the Act entirely to the good-will and honesty of the tribunals. Now that is not our business. Our business is to see that legislation passing through our hands is safeguarded so that it will be as little dependent as possible on the good-will or honesty of those charged with its administration. That is our share of the responsibility, and I should be glad to assist in discharging my share of the responsibility. If my hon. friend cannot bring down to this House a system of selective draft that will guarantee fair play between man and man, and between section and section of this country, then he should not bring down this measure at all. But as he proposes this selective system it is up to him and his colleagues to bring before the House some measure that will guarantee that fairness which it is our responsibility as members of this House to see embodied in the provisions of this or any other compulsory service Bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen), in the innocence of his heart, believes he has a system here which will bring about, so far as any human system can, just what my hon. friend desires, namely, a fair system of selection. I may be right or I may be wrong, but I have asked in vain for a better system from my hon. friend. He has referred very vaguely to the United States system. Will he explain to the House wherein the United States system differs for the better from this?

Mr. OLIVER: I cannot. I am not familiar with the United States system, but I know this: In the United States system there is an enumeration of the people. There is also a distribution of responsibility according to population, and after selection has been made there is a balloting as between those who have been selected. That is a guarantee of fair play as between state and state, as between man and man, and as between occupation and occupation. But there is no provision of that character in this Bill. I do not ask my hon. friend, when he brings in a Bill, to bring in such a Bill as was introduced in the United States, but I ask when he is bringing in a Bill based upon the selective system, that such a measure be introduced as will guarantee a fair selection; that is all I ask.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend states that the United States system differs from ours in two particulars. First, there is an allotment of a certain number of men from each state. If my hon. friend is anxious that that system be introduced into Canada would he be good enough to say so, and state how he would make the allotment? In the second place, he thought that the balloting added to the fairness. Will he be good enough to explain how the introduction of a hit-and-miss selection by ballot is going to add to the fairness of selection?

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend is pushing his inquiries very closely, and if I am compelled to answer him I will say very frankly that the system of selection by ballot has been considered the fairest system since the foundation of the world and since people began to count.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How does it apply unless there are more men available, after all useful and necessary occupations have been filled, than the number of men required? Does my hon. friend think there are more men available after all useful and necessary occupations have been filled, than are required here?

Mr. OLIVER: I am sorry to say that I do not. I think the condition of our country at the present time is such that we need all the men we have. But, very properly, we have made up our minds to send more men, and in doing that I say that we should be scrupulously exact in making our selection on principles of absolute fair play. But when I look into the Bill and make inquiries of the Solicitor General I find that there is no provision whatever in the Bill for fair play as between man and man, as between occupation and occupation, or as between section and section of our country. Now I say, unless it is possible to so embody the views of the Government in regard to selective conscription as to give that assurance to the people, they should not have brought in the system, or they should bring in some other system under which it would be possible for us to guarantee fair play to those we represent. I am sorry to say, I am not able to do this under the provisions of this Bill, because I have not, as a matter of fact, the same faith in the fair dealing in any act of administration on the part of my hon. friend and his colleagues as I would have in what the Premier calls the blind system of choice by ballot.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have only to observe that I failed to get any statement from the member from Edmonton as to how he would divide the one hundred thousand men among the different provinces of Canada. Secondly, I was not convinced that under a state of affairs where we required all the men not necessary for the essential productions of the war, the introduction of a system of luck is going to add to the fairness in getting the men who are required. I simply laid these two sentences before the House. I do not think the matter admits of further discussion.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend has stated that this provision is based upon the British law, and he says that in as much as the British law has worked well under corresponding circumstances, this law should work well here. I had the honour to read to the House some little time ago what appeared to me to be reliable information as to the working of the British law, and I may perhaps be pardoned if I re-read some part of this information. I think it will be agreed that if this information is even measurably correct, it not only bears out everything I have said in expressing doubts as to the possibility or the probability of fair play in the administration of this measure, but it absolutely assures that fair play is not to be expected under that administration.

Mr. BURNHAM: The hon. gentleman is laying an indictment on a most important question before the House, and does not specify one thing. In broad general terms he sweeps the whole Act right out without specifying a single thing. Surely the indictment must be gone into and the evidence submitted to a grand jury like this, or the complaint will not hold.

Mr. OLIVER: I like to hear the sound of my hon. friend's voice. The evidence I desire to bring before the House in regard to the administration of this unrestricted selective provision in England is contained in the correspondence of one Lacey Amy, which appeared in the Toronto Saturday Night of June 16. Mr. Amy says:

> Tribunals all through the country continue to hand out exemptions to huntsmen, variety artists, store managers, clerks, luxury manufacturers, frankly declaring that their mission is "to protect local industry." One district alone granted 30,000 exemptions during the past fourteen weeks.

Mr. BURRELL: Will my hon. friend permit me. I think this is rather a serious criticism, and the House is entitled to know the status of Mr. Amy. That is a very sweeping statement to make.

Mr. OLIVER: A very sweeping statement, Mr. Chairman, in regard to a very important question. I am not responsible for Mr. Amy. He is the regular correspondent of Toronto Saturday Night, and I presume is a reputable person. Saturday Night has a very wide circulation throughout the Dominion of Canada as a reputable paper, and I presume its correspondent in London is a reputable man. At any rate, on my responsibility as a member of this House, I placed those words on Hansard some two or three weeks ago, and it was within the province of the Government to verify or secure a contradiction of the statements made by Mr. Amy, in the interval which has elapsed. Apparently this has not been done; therefore, I must ask that Mr. Amy's indictment stand.

There is another side to this question, which is, perhaps, even more important than that which I have already mentioned. I wish to quote what Mr. Amy has to say in regard to it:—

> The failure to comb out the eligibles in the munition factories is a bit of inside history that should be made public for the enlightenment of those who would use drastic measures.

It will be observed, we are proposing to pass a law here which contemplates the exemption of employees in munition factories; you will notice, Mr. Amy is speaking about the failure to comb out eligibles in munition factories in England.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: Where is the exemption of employees in munition factories to be found in the Act?

Mr. OLIVER: It is contained in subsection (a) when read in connection with the last clause on the first page of the preamble. It either means that, or the preamble has no purpose at all. Mr. Amy's statement is a somewhat lengthy explanation of a very serious situation, but I desire to place it before the House, because I consider it has a bearing on the situation in which we find ourselves in Canada, not in exactly the same connection, but in another which I consider closely parallel:—

> The political strength of labour in England is too well known to need elaboration here. Only the harsh necessities of war, backed by a coalition government, could have enforced the policy of dilution of labour early entered upon. Labour responded willingly enough, especially as it did not carry with it at that time any policy of substitution. For with dilution came a guarantee not to conscript the members of the twenty-five unions concerned.
> But unforeseen difficulties cropped up, and events approached a crisis in the fall of last year. The unions, in what they considered self-protection, had insisted that the new men should join the unions and receive the union wage. And gradually the new blood outnumbered the old; and as it was made up of youthful fellows, the majority of whom had entered the factories to escape khaki (and they admit it with shocking complacency) its principles, and methods slowly crept into the ascendency. And, of course, its main object was to continue to draw five pounds a week in clover instead of a shilling a day before the German guns.
> Fully to appraise the menace of this condition, one should remember that these men were guaranteed exemption, that they control the unions which control the make-up of the dismissals for service. The attempt of the Government to overcome that obstacle by ruling that only the skilled should be exempt was frustrated by the unions demanding of the company managements that all employees be termed skilled—even the porters and workmen about the yards. A few were combed out here and there, but very few.
> Finally the Government and the leaders of the unions devised a scheme. It was intended to put an end to the domination of the new blood—whose shirking did not commend itself to labour leadership, an essentially loyal body of men in the main—and to secure for the army the needed recruits. The Government announced the cancellation of all trade union cards and war service certificates. The plan was to re-issue them only to the skilled. It looked good. But the shirkers were wise. Working strictly in local bodies only, for the leaders would not sanction it, the stewards put it bluntly to their managers. I know of factories where the entire body of workers threatened to strike if a single man was taken by the Government. They knew that not one could be combed out without the consent of the manager; and local fealty had cemented the old and the new membership through previous wage troubles.

It is clear that the experience in England does not justify leaving the discretion and the authority as to the enforcement of the principle of compulsory military service under this Bill to the tribunals appointed and empowered as these tribunals are expected to be. It has not worked in England, and if it did not work in England it certainly will not work in this country, because there is a respect for constituted authority, for precedent and for right doing because it is right, in England, that, I am sorry to say, does not exist to the same extent in this country.

Mr. BURNHAM: I do not believe that. That is a libel on this country.

Mr. OLIVER: Perhaps it is and again perhaps it is not. At any rate, I am standing here on my responsibility as a member of this Parliament to say that the rights of the people are not properly safeguarded under the provisions of this Bill. I am asking that they be safeguarded. If they cannot be safeguarded under the provisions of this Bill, the Government has no right to put through such a Bill, and they should bring forward some other Bill based on principles that would permit the safeguarding of the rights of the people, and which would give us an assurance that there would be equal justice between man and man, between industry and industry and between section and section of this country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no doubt at all that in the working out of the British Act difficulties were encountered, and they did not succeed in obtaining all the results aimed at. I do not know of any Act in Britain or in Canada that ever did succeed in attaining all the results aimed at. But I cannot understand the state of mind of a member of this House who concludes that because somebody writes to the newspaper, even the Toronto Saturday Night, that there were imperfections in the working out of the British Act, the Act is valueless and worthless. If the hon. gentleman is to reach conclusions on the face of a letter in a newspaper written by some one he does not know, I am afraid he will be driven by his logic to very strange conclusions regarding himself. We can put in a nutshell the difference between my hon. friend's suggestion and our own. He refers to essential industries such as munition works, and he has in mind other essential industries such as agriculture. He alleges that in England, owing to the weakness perhaps of some of the tribunals in certain spots, there were exemptions of variety artists, pool room artists and the like of that. That may well be. If these things did happen they are being cured by appeals to the central tribunal. The same things may occur here, but they will be cured in like manner. But take the system proposed by my hon friend—here is a farmer with 200, or 160, acres of land all alone on that farm. Right beside him, in the neighbouring village, there is a pool room loafer and the question comes as to what is the best method of selecting one or the other to go to the front for military service. We have the tribunal named under the method proposed here. We place the pool room loafer and the farmer side by side and we leave it to the tribunal to decide which of the two ought to go and which ought to remain at home. Is there a common sense man in this country, is there a member of this House, who would doubt what the decision of the tribunal would be? The pool room loafer would go and the farmer would stay at home to work his farm. What would my hon. friend do? He would take these two men, stand them up side by side, take two straws and have some one there to see who gets the longer straw and who gets the shorter. If the pool room loafer draws the longer straw, he stays safely at home and the farmer goes to the front. That is what my hon. friend says is absolutely fair and has been found to be the right method of getting men to go to the front.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend but I would like to interject for the benefit of Hansard that I did not suggest any such thing.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I venture to say that no hon. member understood him to suggest anything else. He wants to follow the lot system. Let the hon. gentleman tell this House how he intends that system to work out. He wants us to divide these 100,000 men among the provinces of Canada. I would ask him again to say how he is going to divide them among the provinces and how many to each?

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend is giving me a great deal of personal attention and I shall be glad to give him the information he wants. The authorities were good enough to hand out the other day a statement as to the population of Canada, giving the number of people of Canadian birth, of British birth, and of foreign birth, and the different ages—the ages, I presumed, that are covered by the Bill. My suggestion in regard to the levy would be this: I would make up my mind how many of these classes I propose to call.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What classes would my hon. friend call?

Mr. OLIVER: Whatever number of classes I considered necessary.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would the hon. gentleman have any objection to saying what classes he would call?

Mr. OLIVER: It is not necessary, it is not to the point but I have no objection. Incidentally, and without further consideration, I would say that I would begin at the youngest class and call successive classes until I had covered as many as I thought would be needed. Then, according to population as here laid down, if I were willing to take that estimate, I would credit to each province the number of men that it had enlisted and who had gone overseas or were available for overseas service. Then I would require of each of the several provinces the balance of the men necessary to make up the quota.

Mr. MEIGHEN: On the basis of population?

Mr. OLIVER: On the basis of population; not all the population but the population which is available for service. I do not see any other way in which it could be done that would be considered fair.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would the hon. member make any distinction as to districts of provinces, or would he take each province as a unit?

Mr. OLIVER: I certainly would not. I would treat Canada as a country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will figure how that would work out.

Mr. OLIVER: I am not saying that under circumstances as they are in Canada, on the mandate of a self-elected Parliament, I would undertake for one moment to enforce a compulsory service Bill. Do not let my hon. friend imagine that for a moment. While I believe in compulsory military service equally distributed over the whole country, I believe in it only if it has the support of the majority of the whole people of Canada. I would not propose to support it in defiance of or without having the support of the majority of the people. What I have laid before my hon. friend now in answer to his insistent inquiry is the only kind of a compulsory service that I could feel myself warranted in supporting. If I could not support that I could not support any.

Mr. BRADBURY: Has any other country a system like that?

Mr. OLIVER: I think every other country except Canada. The United States——

Mr. BRADBURY: A ballot system?

Mr. OLIVER: Surely. In regard to the ballot, if I was bringing a Bill for compulsory military service before this House, I would select by authority of Parliament those who would be exempt from the operations of that Bill, and if we had more men than we wanted, I would select by ballot those who should go. I would do what I have asked my hon. friend to do and what he refuses, that is to lay down the principles of exemption.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But we do.

Mr. OLIVER: There is no use our disputing about that. My view is that he absolutely does not. He brings forward a section here under which, and I have challenged the House to disprove my statement—every citizen of Canada may be exempted. I say that I would not bring such a Bill before this House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What principles of exemption would you propose to substitute for these principles?

Mr. OLIVER: It is not a question of principles but of details. We are asking the minister for details and he will not give them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What would be his details?

Mr. OLIVER: It is not possible to go into all the details. My hon. friend has incubated this Bill for a number of weeks; he has had the benefit of all the lore that has been accumulated on the subject of compulsory military service Bills in all countries, and he has not been able—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Give us one detail.

Mr. OLIVER: —or is not willing to come before this House with any details whatever that would guarantee fair play under the administration of that clause.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would the hon. gentleman explain how his ballot system would work?

Mr. OLIVER: I want to be a little explicit as to why I feel as deeply interested in this matter as I do. I have studied this population chart that has been distributed, and I have taken the figures given by the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) in regard to enlistments in Canada. I find that, when we consider the numbers of men who have gone from different sections of the country, there is a condition existing that was not taken into consideration in the figures which he gave, but is taken into consideration in the chart placed before this House. In the western provinces there is a large population of citizens of alien origin, some of them of alien enemy origin—many thousands of them. It is proposed by certain gentlemen on the Government side in this House that these people shall be disfranchised, I presume because they are not in all respects desirable citizens. It is obvious that you cannot expect from that section of the population the same enthusiasm in the matter of voluntary enlistment that we have from people of British or Canadian birth. As a matter of fact, we have not had that response from those people that we have had from people of Canadian or British birth, so that if we take the figures as contained in this chart and take that part of the population from which, as a matter of fact, we did draw the large proportion of our soldiers under voluntary enlistment, we find that the proportion of men who have gone from those western provinces, and particularly from the province of Alberta, under voluntary enlistment, is so much greater than the proportion going from any other province, that we have a right to ask that in any conscription Bill that is placed before this House, there shall be consideration of that fact. There are in Canada of native and British-born, 1,295,000 people of the military age set out in this chart, that is between the ages of 20 and 45. Of that number we are told 418,000 have enlisted; that is 32 per cent. In Ontario of that age and of those nationalities, there are 472,000, of whom 168,000 have enlisted, or 36 per cent. In Quebec there are 327,000, of whom 44,000 have enlisted, or 13 per cent. In Nova Scotia there are 84,000 men of whom 22,300 have enlisted, or 26 per cent. In New Brunswick there are 58,000 men, of whom 17,500 have enlisted, or 29 per cent. In Prince Edward Island there are 14,738 men, of whom 2,700 have enlisted, or 18 per cent. In Manitoba and Saskatchewan (that is one military district) there are 173,000 men, of whom 79,000 have enlisted, or 45 per cent. In Alberta there are 63,000 men, of whom 35,000 have enlisted, or 55 per cent. In British Columbia there are 90,000 men, of whom 39,000 have enlisted, or 43 per cent. I submit that, that being the condition of affairs, we are entitled to some guarantee in the administration of this Act that the sacrifices that have been made voluntarily in that country shall be recognized, and that the interests of those provinces and people shall be protected, as they are not protected under the wide-open provisions of this Bill.

Mr. BURRELL: I am affected in this matter much as the hon. gentleman is. Might I point out that we shall be protected to this extent, that the number of available men under the first three classes will be naturally infinitely smaller in his own province and in mine than in some other provinces.

Mr. OLIVER: Yes.

Mr. BURRELL: In the Okanagan valley, in my own constituency, about 500 men have gone to the front, and there is hardly a man of the proper age in a medically fit condition left in the whole country, so that the protection would really come naturally.

Mr. OLIVER: That is what we want—we want the protection to come naturally. But when I read the Bill, and see the exemption provision, which says that it is expedient in the national interest that the man, instead of being employed in military service, should be engaged in other work in which he is habitually engaged, and when I listen, as I have listened during the past three days, to assertions and reiterations that the voluntary enlistment of men in this country was held up by the authority of the Government for the advantage of certain interests in eastern Canada, I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I am not satisfied that we, the people of western Canada, are going to get a square deal under this Bill at the hands of this Government; and it is for that reason that I ask that there be some guarantee, if guarantee can be given, on the face of the Bill. We in the West have enlisted without suggesting a complaint of any kind whatever. We have asked for nothing but the privilege of service. We have given that service as no other part of Canada has done; and now, when the honour of voluntary enlistment is to be taken away, we are to be put under a compulsory law, which, on the face of it, and in the light of the statements made in this House within the last three days, is deliberately intended for the purpose of combing our men of the West and protecting the munition factories in the East. If that is not the reason, it is easy to find words in the English language to show that it is not the reason, and put them on the face of the Bill.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: It seems to me that to carry out the hon. gentleman's view we will either have to go into minute detail, not only as to the class of person to be exempt, but as to the actual persons themselves, because there are many members of exempted classes whose duty to enter military service is just as clear as that of members of other classes who are not exempt. In my opinion we must either leave a certain discretion to the judgment of the authorities, as we do in all other matters, or we have to give details, such as the hon. gentleman from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) could not give this afternoon. I think my hon. friend will find himself in very deep water, if he is going to give sufficient detail to enable the judge to actually identify every man according to those details. I point out to my hon. friend that the first three subsections of section 11 exempt a man on national grounds; the other three exempt him on private grounds. I also point out that, under the New Zealand Act, which, so far as selection is concerned, has worked very favourably, the exemptions are much less specific than the exemptions of the present Bill. The only exemptions under that Act are as follows:—

(c) That by reason of his occupation his calling-up for military service is contrary to the public interest.

(d) That by reason of his domestic circumstances or for any other reason his calling-up for military service would be a cause of undue hardship to himself or others.

Apart from the other two sections, those are the only two exemptions. One is in the public interest and the other covers the private interest. The sections are much less specific than the sections of the present Bill. The British Bill, which has been referred to by my hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen), is about in the same terms as the measure before us. It is practically framed upon the ground of national interest. My hon. friend will observe the words "national interest" are used in the first three subsections. You can practically put all these in one provision, and say that if in the national interest a man should not go, the tribunal should exempt him. The other class relates to private interests. In the United States Act, dealing with the class in question, the exemptions are:

Persons engaged in industries including agriculture, found to be necessary to the maintenance of the military establishment, or the effective operation of the military forces, or the maintenance of national interest during the emergency.

It all comes back again to the question of national interest. So that either we must go into such details that the Bill would be unworkable or unjust, or lay down such general principles as have been placed in the Bill for the guidance of the judge, and leave him to make the selection. It seems to me we cannot make any other provisions. We cannot go to one extreme or the other. For my part, I would prefer to adopt what has been done in Great Britain, the United States and New Zealand.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not wish to push this matter, but if the Government is intent upon following its policy, it has supporters behind it to enable it to carry out that policy; but I want to say that, in my humble judgment, there is no parity between the conditions in New Zealand and this country, or between those of the United States and this country. We have nothing on record to show that the Government of New Zealand, prior to the adoption of compulsory military service, was absolutely in league with certain industries of the country to prevent voluntary enlistment. That is the condition we have in Canada, and that is a condition that I, for one, consider most serious, when we are looking at this matter as we have to look at it. We must recognize that while in one breath we are told that this Bill is for the purpose of finding men who will maintain our honour and the strength of the Empire in the bloody trenches of Flanders, in the next breath we are told that the purpose of the Bill is to maintain the industries of Canada. I wanted the provision to be one way or the other. If we have to maintain the strength of our contingent in France, let us frame a Bill that will do that honestly and fairly, but let us not, under the pretence of supporting our men who are at the front to-day put through a Bill, the real purpose of which will be to protect the interest, the advantage, the pockets, of the munition profiteers, in Hamilton or Toronto, or in Sydney, the men who, it is admitted, successfully used pressure on this Government to secure the letting up of voluntary enlistment in their neighbourhood.

Mr. W. F. NICKLE (Kingston): It seems to me that the hon. gentleman from Edmonton, in the argument he advances, totally overlooks the fact that to organize a democracy such as Canada for the successful prosecution of the war, you must vest in some impartial tribunal or tribunals somewhere the right of deciding who shall go and who shall stay. I am quite ready to admit that long ago I got beyond the position of regarding what this province had done, or what that province had done, in reference to this war. It has been admitted that some of the provinces have done more than others. I think the hon. gentleman from Edmonton is right in saying that the province of Alberta has done singularly well. Other provinces perhaps have not borne their fair share of the sacrifice. But, surely, after almost three years of war, we have reached the decision that we as Canadians, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, can regard the fact that Canada is at war and that the situation is serious.

The member for Edmonton says that this Bill is not fair as between man and man. I listened with great care to what he said in this committee and tried to gather what he meant when he said that the Bill was not fair as between man and man. If I correctly interpreted his words, he means this: No tribunal will be able to arrange any scheme of administration that will make equality of sacrifice. I quite agree with my hon. friend in that; it is absolutely impossible, in a war like this, to secure equality of sacrifice. But is that any reason why we should stop? If men are wanted at the front, and if there are men who can go without affecting the national interest even though the sacrifice on their part be great, I as a Canadian say, let them go. If other men are required for the production of food or the manufacture of munitions, though their task be less onerous and involved in less danger, let them stay at home and do the work they can best do if that work is essential to the maintenance of our national position and the strength of the Allies. Any man who has studied the progress of the war from its inception up to the present cannot help being impressed with the fact that our almost suffering defeat in the early days of the war was due to lack of munitions. Any man who has watched the strategy of the war during the last year and who has observed the successes at Albert Ridge, Messines Ridge and Vimy Ridge must recognize that it was preponderance of artillery that made possible the advance of the infantry. Why should we not look at the whole matter in a broad way? Some men will be called upon to give more than others. But there are greater sacrifices than those made by the men who go to the front. The great sacrifice is made by the man who stays at home realizing that he should go and could go but does not go; because that man sacrifices his individuality and his honour. What I say of that man I say of the fathers and mothers who are keeping their boys home: they are sacrificing their sons in keeping them back more than other men are sacrificing their sons in letting them go.

I do not think that the amendment that has been proposed adds anything to the Bill. On one side you have military service; on the other side you have national necessity. If the tribunals act fairly as between man and man, and if national service takes preference over military service, then national service will prevail; but where military service takes priority over national service, military service will prevail. In other words, each case will be considered on its merits. We must assume that the tribunals will act fairly. No doubt there will be cases of individual hardship; cases where, perhaps, justice is not done as between man and man. To err, we know, is human. But we must trust to somebody the responsibility of seeing that the Act is fairly enforced. I started out a warm friend of the voluntary system. I followed it during many months of effort to obtain recruits; I was active in the district from which I come in assisting in the attempt to get more men. But I was driven to the conclusion that the voluntary system was extravagant and wasteful, and that it had become inefficient. Reaching this conclusion after long experience and careful study of the situation, I came to the further conclusion that we must have conscription. If the maximum efficiency of Canada is to be attained, surely it can only be by the taking of those who are not wanted at home. The member for Edmonton challenged me to give instances of men who would not be excused on the ground of national necessity.

Mr. OLIVER: Who could not be?

Mr. NICKLE: Who could not be? You might as well say there would be no criminals in Canada if a judge should exclude all persons on the ground that they were not guilty. But judicial functions are not performed in that way. The facts are laid before the tribunals; the evidence is weighed pro and con. We assume that the men we place in responsible positions exercise wise discretion and reach their conclusions upon the evidence and the facts presented to them. The same principle that guides our courts of law will guide those tribunals, and if these principles are carried out, the men who can be spared will go and those who cannot be spared will stay at home to do the national work. My hon. friend challenged me to give instances. I know dozens of men in my own riding—and it is a district that has not given ungenerously to this cause—who can be spared to go to the front and who are willing to go provided the sacrifice is equally borne throughout the country.

Mr. OLIVER: Hear, hear.

Mr. NICKLE: They are willing to set to one side all that has been done. They say: Although we have given liberally of our best—more, perhaps than we are called upon to give—we are willing to start all over again. If you make this measure apply with equality from the Atlantic to the Pacific, we shall do our duty to the utmost limit of our power.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend has referred to the patriotism of those who say that they take no account of what has been done; that they are prepared to go on an equality now. That is very generous on their part, considering what they have done as compared with what other people have done. What I say is that those who have given of their best in the past are willing to keep on giving of their best under the voluntary system without quarrelling with their neighbours whether they have done their best or not. When we are being put under a conscriptive system; when the glory, if you like, of voluntarism is to be taken from us, then we demand a square deal; that is all we ask. Everything my hon. friend has said has pointed to the fact that there is an object in this Bill which is not the filling of the line in France and Flanders. It is a Bill with a double purpose; one to find the men for the fighting line, and the other to protect certain home industries. Let the Government bring forward such a Bill as was introduced in New Zealand, for the sole purpose of filling the fighting line, and we can forego details that we demand in regard to this measure. But when a Bill is brought before us which is intended for a double purpose, then those who have done as we have done and who will be called as we shall be called upon under the terms of this Bill, certainly have a right to know how much of this Bill is to be for France and how much of it is to be for Hamilton. The idea that we have gained from the explanation of this Bill is that the man who is necessary in Canada should stay in Canada. Is that right? Am I misinterpreting the expressions of the Solicitor General?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is fairly correct.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend says that is fairly correct. Do I interpret correctly the sentiments of the member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) when I say that the principle of the Bill is that the man who is necessary in Canada should stay in Canada?

Mr. NICKLE: Where it is in the greater national interest that the man should stay in Canada rather than go to the front, then he should stay in Canada.

Mr. OLIVER: And what does that mean? It means that the fit men shall stay and that the unfit men shall go. Are you going to beat the Hun with an army made up on such a principle as that? We have an efficient army at the front to-day, not because our unfit men went, but because our fit men went. That is the sacrifice that Canada has made. She sent not of her worst, but of her best, and the consequence is that we have an army of which any country might be proud. And we are going to maintain such an army as that by a conscriptive system the very basic principle of which is that the good man shall stay in Canada and that the man who is not good enough for Canada shall go to the firing line.

It is the same principle that was recognized in the decision of a city magistrate which I laid before the House some time ago. A man convicted of horse stealing was pardoned or granted ticket-of-leave to enlist in the Engineers for overseas service. I am told—it may not be true, but the Solicitor General will know whether it is or not—that the very jails of Canada were combed and promises given of pardon or ticket-of-leave if men would go to the firing line. If those are the principles under which this Conscription Bill is to be enforced, I do not think it will be of any credit to Canada, and I do not think we shall have any efficient reinforcement of the fighting line.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps it is as well to refer to the latter suggestion of the hon. member, which is exactly on the same basis as the letter he read to the House on Saturday from a man he did not know, and which had absolutely no truth in it. The only difficulty I find in answering my hon. friend is in piecing together from his remarks such connected and tangible sentences as possibly might be placed together as an argument to be refuted; I find great difficulty in doing that. When he says that he cannot have confidence in our tribunals I understand him, because I do not think he would have confidence in anything established while the present Government is in power. With any hon. gentleman who reasons in the haphazard manner of my hon. friend from Edmonton it is all a matter of luck whether he supports the Government or not—all a matter of luck what conclusion he happens to come to first. My hon. friend from Edmonton has come to the opposite conclusion, and we will let it go at that. But because the principle of the Bill is as it was plainly stated to be, namely, that a man who it is decided can best serve the national interests in France shall go to France, and the man stay at home who can best serve the national interests by working in Canada, he says the effect will be to send the cripples to France and keep the strong men in Canada. There is no sense whatever in that argument.

Mr. OLIVER: Would my hon. friend be good enough to keep within a thousand miles of the facts when quoting me? My hon. friend surely knows that it is the spirit within the man that counts, and that that is more important than his bodily condition.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is very true, but I do not know what it has to do with the definition of the intent of this Act as stated by the hon. member for Kingston, and accepted by the hon. member for Edmonton, from which he argued that the effect would be to send the cripples to France and keep the strong men in Canada.

Mr. OLIVER: Just cut out the cripples, please. Even if it did send a few cripples to France it would be doing no more than has already been done in hundreds of cases, according to the Bruce report.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There may have been inaccurate medical examinations, even in the city of Edmonton. The hon. member argues that the New Zealand Act is entirely different. He says that their Act is quite fair.

Mr. OLIVER: I did not say that it was a fair Act. I said that the conditions in New Zealand were not on a parity with conditions in Canada, because we have no evidence that New Zealand was in league with the manufacturing interests to discourage voluntary recruiting.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He stated that the New Zealand Act laid down principles for exemption that were quite fair. What are the principles set out in the New Zealand Act for exemption?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Before giving the exemptions would the Solicitor General explain the principle of their Act? I am not acquainted with it, and I do not think many hon. members are, and it might be well to have the explanation on Hansard.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The New Zealand Act was passed on the 1st of August, 1916. It was not taken as an initial step in enlistment in that country, but after a long period of voluntary recruiting, just as in Canada. There is no division in their Act by sections; it proceeds on the very same principles as this Bill. It does not say to one province in New Zealand, as the hon. member for Edmonton would do: You have not sent as many men as another province; consequently, you must raise men until your proper quota is reached. The principle of the New Zealand Act is the principle of this Act. It says to the slacker in one province as to the slacker in another province: Your place is in the fighting line, and to the fighting line you must go. The principle of this Act recognizes that there are those who ought to be in France in every province in Canada, no matter how many have already gone from that province; that is absolutely true. I appeal to the hon. member for Edmonton and other hon. members from his province whether they have not said that in their own constituencies there are men who obviously ought to be in France. Would the hon. member for Edmonton put it into the mouth of those men to say: We are slackers, it is true, and our proper place is across the Atlantic fighting for this country, but because our neighbours who should have stayed at home and worked in Canada have gone to the front, therefore, we are exempt. That is the principle the hon. member wants embodied in this Bill. We say to the man who is a slacker—perhaps that is too strong a term to use of all, because many a man may have to go who may not necessarily be a slacker—but to the man who approaches the slacker in any degree we say: No matter whether you are in the province of Manitoba, or Nova Scotia or British Columbia or Quebec, you shall be assigned to the place where your services will be most valuable to this country; you shall go to France. We do not allow a man to escape his just duty to his country merely by the assertion: I am a citizen of Edmonton, or a constituent in the province of Alberta. That is the difference between our Act and the Act that would be framed by the hon. member for Edmonton.

The New Zealand is a much longer Act than ours, but I see no difference between the two in principle. It is over six weeks since I read their Act for such information as it could give me in the preparation of our own, and I can recall nothing in it that differs at all from the principle of our Act.

Mr. PUGSLEY: When Sir Joseph Ward was here he told me that the New Zealand Act provided for a certain quota from each of the 22 districts into which New Zealand had been divided. He said there was rivalry between the different districts to make up their quota, and that the voluntary system was proceeding very satisfactorily even though they had a conscriptive law. That is quite different from the way the Solicitor General puts it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Act is before me and I have made inquiries as to its contents, and my opinion is confirmed that it does not call for a fixed quota from any district; that was their plan under the voluntary system only. I do not know whether my hon. friend from St. John is in favour of the suggestion of the hon. member for Edmonton.

Mr. PUGSLEY: All that I proposed to state was what Sir Joseph Ward had told me.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not think my hon. friend would say he was in favour of the suggestion of the hon. member for Edmonton.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The hon. member for Edmonton is usually very sound in his views.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But there are exceptions, my hon. friend will admit.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Very rarely.

Mr. MARCIL: Is any number of men specifically mentioned in the New Zealand Act?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think not.

Mr. MARCIL: As there is to be no registration in Canada, how do the Government propose to ascertain the number of men available for the firing line? Will a census be taken in every municipality, or will the Government wait for the men to report? If the men do not report, what will happen to them? If 200,000 men report and only 100,000 are needed, how will the selections be made?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We will find out how many men are available by the number of men who report. We do not anticipate that there will be failure to report. We have confidence that the people of Canada in every part of this country will obey the law and report, and from that reporting we shall know the number available for service from each class as it is called. My hon. friend asks what we shall do if too many report. In the first place, it is quite clear that there will not be too many. From the first class there will not be 100,000, probably not half of that, but after the first class has been called we shall be able to tell how many the second class will produce, and if there is any possibility that it will provide too many the principle we shall follow will be to divide it into subclasses. Should there be only some very few over, I will not say what should be done, but I will say what might be done. The men might be taken in order of age, the older ones being released, until the exact number required was obtained.

Mr. MARCIL: I put the question because I saw by the papers last week that the Minister of Inland Revenue had been making a calculation which was published in an interview in the Quebec papers that 10 men from each of the 1,200 municipalities in the province of Quebec would produce 12,000 men. Montreal would give 10,000, according to its population, bringing it up to 22,000. Quebec would give 1,000, making 23,000, and 3,000 more would be found in the other smaller towns, bringing the quota up to 25,000. I do not know whether this was really said by the minister or not, or whether it was authorized, or is really the intention of the Government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I saw some report of the suggestion. I simply observe that it differs very radically from the views of the member for Edmonton.

Mr. MARCIL: It would not convey the Government policy?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Government policy is embodied in this Act. The New Zealand Act uses these words on the question of exemption:

> —is exempted for that by reason of his occupation, his calling-up for military service is contrary to the public interest.
> (b) that by reason of his domestic circumstances or for any other reason, his calling-up for military service would be a cause of undue hardship to himself or others.

It will be seen the door is still wider open and that the principles are more indefinite in the New Zeealand Act than in this Act. We state the reasons, but we do not state that any reason would be sufficient.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: We have had a very interesting discussion, and it shows the weakness of this Act, which, perhaps, is inherent in it and cannot be cured. Section 2 provides that every man is liable to service. My hon. friend from Edmonton submitted an argument, which cannot be contradicted: that by paragraph (a) of section 11, while every man is liable to service every man can be exempted. There is no possible exception. The weakness of this law is that you create a court to apply the law, and you establish no rules to guide the court—you establish no principle by which the court is to be governed. Subsection (b) of section 11 says:

> (b) that it is expedient in the national interests that the man should, instead of being employed in military service, be engaged in other work in which he wishes to be engaged, and for which he has special qualifications.

Every man could come under this section. One hundred men or a thousand men might go before a court sitting in Quebec, or in Ontario, or in Manitoba, or elsewhere, and apply for exemption. They may all apply because they are engaged in some useful occupation. One court will decide "yes, this man ought to go, and should not be exempted;" another court may say "he ought to be exempted." There is nothing at all to guide the court except the arbitrary rule, or the common sense, or whatever you call it, of the judges. My hon. friend knows that it is very unsafe for courts of law to be left to their own arbitrary views. They should have some principle to guide them. My hon. friend suggested yesterday that the rules which would guide the court would be framed by the central judge. My hon. friend from Qu'Appelle (Mr. Levi Thomson) said to-day, and there is no possible answer to it, that it is not for the central judge to make any rule. The central judge merely rules over the procedure for the application and carrying out of the Act, but he cannot make any rule which will be a guide, as a principle of law, of how the law is to be interpreted; that is something which should be done here. That is the weak part of this Act. I do not know that it can be remedied, and I must say so frankly. It comes back to what my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) says, that he prefers the balloting system. If the balloting system is unsatisfactory, and it is unsatisfactory in many ways, it is satisfactory on this point —the balloting system cannot be accused of favouritism. Everybody comes up. He may have bad luck, or he may have good luck, but there is no possible favouritism. With the clause as it is now, you are sure to have recriminations, and sometimes these recriminations may be well-founded, because after all it depends on the sense of one or of another as to how the Act is interpreted.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The hon. member for Edmonton has set forth a proposal, which is supported to a certain extent by the right hon. leader of the Opposition, and which, if it were carried to the extreme, would mean that Parliament sitting here, or a committee of the House sitting here, should itself select the one hundred thousand men who are to go to the front under this provision. It is perfectly apparent to all of us that any proposal of that kind is absolutely impracticable. Therefore, it is necessary to appoint some tribunal to determine who shall be called upon to go to the front, and who shall remain at home for the purpose of giving national service. There is only way of doing that, and that is by defining the principles in some such general terms, and by leaving the determination of the question to the tribunal. This is the course we have adopted. We have endeavoured to establish the tribunal in such a way that there can be no suspicion of unfairness or partiality, so far as its personnel is concerned.

Mr. MARCIL: But, there might be incompetency among some of those local tribunals—incompetency to grasp a situation, or to define national interest, as against military service.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There may possibly be incompetency in a judge or in a magistrate occasionally, but it does not necessarily follow that this Parliament should undertake to adjudicate upon questions of civil rights arising between individuals in this country.

Mr. MARCIL: The ordinary judge has a text of law which he follows. In this case, we do not seem to have any text by which those local tribunals are to be guided.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend will remember that notwithstanding the fact that a judge has before him a text of law. the records of the Appeal Courts in this country show that sometimes the judge does not arrive at the right conclusion upon that text.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It will be still worse when he has nothing to guide him.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: He has something to guide him.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will my right hon. friend—

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: One at a time, please. I claim the right to finish my sentence, and I propose to do it after which my hon. friends may stand up one after another and bombard me with questions.

As far as principles can be settled and made applicable, they are settled and made applicable in this Bill. My right hon. friend says there may be a certain inherent difficulty in the framing of a measure of this character. I admit that, and we have endeavoured to meet that difficulty as best we could; moreover, we have met it in a more specific manner in this measure than it has been met in Great Britain or in New Zealand. What more can be asked? I venture to think that nothing more can reasonably be asked. We appoint a tribunal, we assure the fairness and impartiality of that tribunal as far as personnel is concerned, and we leave to the tribunal to determine as best it can, whether a man's service is more important to the nation in the occupation in which he is engaged than if he should be sent to the front for the performance of military service there. We have every desire to meet any reasonable suggestion from the members of the committee, but we really cannot reach the conclusion that any suggestion made so far would make the Bill fairer or more effective than it is in its present form.

Mr. GRAHAM: Does that apply to all the suggestions made on every clause?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No, I was speaking of the suggestions made with respect to the matter now under discussion.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I judge from the remarks of my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) that his impression of the provisions of the New Zealand National Service Bill somewhat differs from the view of the Solicitor General. The idea of the member for Edmonton as to the New Zealand Bill is rather the popular impression of it. I had always understood that that legislation provided for the division of New Zealand into zones, and that there was allocated to each zone a certain number of men who were to be produced periodically as required, and that if the number required was not forthcoming voluntarily the conscription law automatically applied and brought forth the deficiency in the quota in any one zone. I am not particularly interested in the matter, but obviously the New Zealand system will be referred to in the House and out of it, and it is as well that a precise statement in reference to that Act should be placed before the House. Therefore I hope that the Solicitor General will take advantage of the recess to inform himself carefully as to the New Zealand Act and give the House the advantage of the information.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I still think that my hon. friend's impression of the New Zealand Military Service Act is wrong. The Act is now in the possession of my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley). I read it a month or two ago. I think that what my hon. friend has reference to is that before the Compulsory Service Act came into force, they had certain Acts relating to voluntary enlistment under which divisions were made—as it were, the last dying gasps of the voluntary system. The Compulsory Service Act proceeds upon the principle that our Act proceeds upon, that is to get the men who ought to go wherever those men are, and it does not divide the country into districts. I will be very much surprised if my recollection is wrong.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If my hon. friend brings down that Act he might also bring down the New Zealand Expeditionary Forces Act, 1915.

Mr. OLIVER: If the minister has available a copy of the British and the American Acts they might be laid on the Table for our information.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is very difficult to get copies of the English Act although it is not so difficult to get the American Act; we will see that a copy of each is laid on the Table.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Apparently my hon. friend the Solicitor General is in error. I find that by section 32, subsection 2 of the New Zealand Act it is provided that the Minister of Defence may divide New Zealand into such areas commonly called recruiting districts, as he thinks fit. Sir Joseph Ward was very clear in his expression to me. He said that there were 22 areas in New Zealand and that a certain quota had been allotted to each area. Before this section is disposed of, I would like to suggest to the Solicitor General that provision be made that all hearings of applications for exemption before the local tribunals, appeals to the appeal tribunals and possibly hearings before the central appeal judge, should be open to the public. I think that is absolutely essential in order to give the public confidence in the decision of these tribunals. This Bill provides that a man may not make application on his own behalf but that application may be made by others. Under this measure the manager of a factory employing 5,000 men could make application for and on behalf of that large number of persons and the local tribunal might act upon that without the public having the slightest knowledge of what was going on. It is essential to the satisfactory administration of this law, that in reference to all applications the public should have an opportunity of being fully informed. They can only get that knowledge if the tribunals are made public. I would hope that the Solicitor General would move an amendment to the Bill which would provide that all hearings shall be open to the public both for the taking of evidence and the presentation of argument. I think that is very desirable. I had thought of moving an amendment myself, but I would hope that would not be necessary and that the Solicitor General would see the great desirability of having an amendment to that effect.

Then it has occurred to me to make another suggestion to my hon. friend and it is this: The idea of this proposed law is to in some way make everybody who is eligible for military service perform some service of a national character in case he is excused from going to the front. The Bill recognizes that there is a liability to serve, a liability on the part of a man to risk his life at the front, but it provides that he may be excused from the performance of that national duty if he will give his service to some other work which may be deemed to be equally in the national interest. It has occurred to me that if a man applies for exemption from service at the front he should be willing to serve the nation for the same compensation that a man gets who goes to the front. I have drafted an amendment, which is not quite in the form I should like to have it, but I venture to read it as a suggestion to the Solicitor General.

In making application for exemption on either of the grounds mentioned in paragraphs (a) and (b), the application shall state the willingness of the man by, or on behalf of, whom the application is made, to continue in such work at a wage or salary fixed by the Governor in Council, or by persons designated by the Governor in Council, in the fixing of which regard shall be had to the rate of pay and separation allowance, if any, which would be allowed in respect to such man if he were placed on active service.

We have this anomaly to-day, that in munitions factories, as I have been told, girls with no experience are getting $25 to $30 a week, and young men without experience, who can simply handle a saw or an axe get $5 to $6 per day. A young man who goes to the front and risks his life gets $1.10 a day in addition to his separation allowance, if any, and also his board. I should think that if a man says: It is true that I am liable under this law; I am within the military age; I am bound to serve my country—I admit all that, but I want to give my service to the nation in another direction, he ought to state in his application that he is willing to accept the same compensation that he would have received if he had gone to the front.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: To whom would the difference go?

Mr. PUGSLEY: To the nation.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: In what way?

[Mr. Pugsley.]

Mr. PUGSLEY: It should go to the nation. The munitions plants are all carried on for the nation, the Government would exercise a supervision over the wages, over the cost of manufacture, and the Empire and Canada would get the benefit of the saving.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: You would have to reduce the contract price of the shell or the manufacturer would get the benefit.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Clearly so. The Government could control that. In that way you would be working out a plan of national service. It does seem to me that this is a matter which the Government ought to take hold of. One step in reducing the cost of manufacture would be to reduce wages, and if you should find in any munitions factory a thousand men who under this Act would be liable to go to the front, but who say that they prefer to serve in the munitions factory, then, as a condition of their being exempted from going to the front, they ought to be willing to serve for the soldier's rate of pay. If they serve for a lower rate of pay it will bring down wages all around, and the country will get the benefit. The cost of munitions is simply enormous; it is out of all reason, I am told. Wages are two or three times what they ought to be. It makes no difference to the munition manufacturer what wages he pays; he adds the increased wages to the cost of the product, and the Canadian people and the people of the Empire are paying the bill. I heard the other day of the case of a young lady in Toronto—and I believe it is the fashion in Toronto for young women to work in munition factories; the idea has gone abroad that they are doing patriotic work—I am told that this young lady was placed upon the waiting list and was allowed so much a day while waiting to be employed. When the time came for her employment she received about two or three times the wages received by a soldier who has gone to the front. That is only an illustration of the large wages which are paid in these factories; unskilled workmen are getting three or four times as much as the boy gets who goes to the front and risks his life in the service of his country.

I would suggest these two amendments, one as to the hearings of all these tribunals being open to the public, and that hearings shall take place only after due public notice has been given; and the other that there should be a condition attached to the exempting of a man from military service, that condition being that he might be placed in such service as the Government might desire to place him in in the national interest; that his compensation should be fixed by officials of the Government, and that in fixing that compensation due regard should be had to the compensation which the man would receive if he had responded to the call of his country and gone to the front instead of remaining here engaging in other work.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am pretty well in agreement with the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) as to the wisdom in general of having all the tribunals open to the public. As these tribunals are in the nature of law courts, they should be, as law courts in general, open to the public. Of course, every one knows at the hearing of any case it is within the power of the judge to clear the court room and make it a non-public sitting.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: For very substantial reasons.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. Consequently my present impression is that it would be better to leave the Bill as it is, because the determination as to public sittings of the tribunals is a matter of procedure and of the constitution and practice of the court. Consequently it comes within the clause as to regulations which are to be framed by the Supreme Court judge, known as the central appeal judge. I think that the central appeal judge would be better able to frame regulations as to public or non-public hearings in particular cases than this committee. There might be cases where it would be a gross injustice to an individual that the hearing should be in public; but in the main the hearings should certainly be public, and the principles that would apply should be practically the same as apply in courts of law.

The second amendment proposed is of a most radical and extraordinary character. If adopted in principle, much more if adopted in detail, it would mean a very radical and extraordinary change indeed in the whole commercial and industrial system of the country. I should be glad if the hon. member would supply me with a copy of the amendment at six o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock, Mr. Bain in the Chair.

On section 11, Exemptions.

Mr. PROULX: Has the Solicitor General accepted the amendment proposed by the hon. member from Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Rainville), that the local tribunals shall have power to exempt men of the agricultural class?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have made a note of the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman from Chambly and Verchères. I cannot see, for the moment, that it will change the legal effect of the Bill in any degree. The only reason why it might be reserved is that perhaps the amendment would make the object more clear.

Mr. NESBITT: I think the amendment proposed by my hon. friend from Chambly and Verchères would, perhaps, make it plainer, and, as it is included in the preamble, would certainly not do any harm, and would make clear the intention of the section. Therefore, I endorse his suggestion. I would not like to say that I agree with my hon. friend from North Perth (Mr. Morphy), in his suggestion, because I think it is unnecessary. I think the Solicitor General, following the suggestion of my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley), could very well take the opportunity, either in this Bill or in a concurrent Bill, to organize labour. Since the war started, we have wanted nothing greater than the organization of labour. We require that just as badly as we require an increase of taxation, which would exempt nobody, and would furnish more towards the expenses of the war as we go along. I hope the Minister of Finance is preparing a Bill, which he will introduce by the time this Bill is passed, which will impose a general and heavier taxation on the people, so that the people may pay a greater proportion of the expenses of the war, and so that less may be borrowed. There certainly will be a limit to our borrowing capacity before long, and it is not fair to the country that we should postpone until after the war, making provision for the enormous expenses of this war. The country is more or less prosperous at the present time, and can well afford to pay more taxes. I do not refer to any special class, but I think that the people should in future pay more towards this war than they have in the past. With reference to the suggestion of the hon. gentleman from St. John, that the wages of the men throughout the country should be set on the same basis as the present pay to the soldiers, I am sorry to say I cannot agree with him.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I did not limit it to the present pay of the soldiers.

Mr. NESBITT: That would create chaos in the labour industry of the country, which would be a very bad thing, and, furthermore, the men could not live on the wages now being paid to the soldiers at the front; but I very strongly recommend that, either in this Bill or by some other means, the pay of the men going to the front should be materially increased. I see no reason on earth why this should not be done, and I am quite sure that it is not in proportion to the pay of other classes throughout the length and breadth of the country. If there is any one class in the world, at the present time, that should be well paid, it is the men who go to the front. It is not necessary for them to have more money while they are actually on the fighting line, but the money could be saved for them so as to give them a start in life after they return. Now is the time to arrange that. We should not postpone it. I think the Government should take that into consideration at once, whether in connection with this Bill or not, I am not going to say, but provision should be made that the men who go to the fighting line should be more adequately compensated.

Mr. GRAHAM: The hon. gentleman from North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) has touched two very important points. Broadly speaking, we have to feed, equip, and finance the men at the front. We also have to feed and finance ourselves, and send as much food to the Allies, in addition, as we possibly can spare. Any measure that does not provide for all these contingencies is only a partial means of meeting the requirements of the situation. It becomes more and more evident to me, as the discussion of this Bill proceeds, that two things should have been done. First, there should have been a registration, or an inventory taken, of all our powers, including men and women, our financial, agricultural and industrial powers, and everything else. I have been supporting this Bill, and intend to do so, but if another measure is not introduced it will only deal with one phase of the requirements. I contend that another measure should be before the members of the House now, to enable them to intelligently discuss this Bill. Referring for a moment to the question of registration, in the United States they have a registration, not only of the men but of the women. The women of the United States between certain ages have registered just as the men have, and each carries a card.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is that required by law?

Mr. GRAHAM: I think it is.

Mr. NESBITT: No, it is voluntary.

Mr. GRAHAM: They are all doing it, anyway. They are getting the combined strength of the men and women of the United States, for the purpose of this war. That makes it evident that there should be another measure put through the House almost conjointly with this one, in reference to food control, which, though perhaps not just as essential, is only secondary in importance to this measure. The women take a very important part, as the food controller has ascertained and recognized. With a Bill to provide for the registration of all other powers, as well as this manpower Bill, we would be in a position to know, at every step, what we were doing.

The reason for that assertion of mine has been made evident here today by the remarks of the members for Chambly and Vercheres (Mr. Rainville), St. John (Mr. Pugsley), North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt), and Edmonton (Mr. Oliver). In fact, all the speakers referred to the necessity of having men spared for agricultural purposes. If we had a full inventory of our powers we would know just what we had to start with. At present no one knows what raw material we have to work on, even in respect to this Bill. It is true that we have information based on some old census returns, but we have no definite figures as to what our raw material is in the way of man-power.

The necessity for the Bill, which, as I have suggested, should be passed concurrently with this one, has also been made evident to-day. The man who cannot go to the front ought to do something else, and that something else ought to be found for him, or pointed out to him by statute. It will be idle for us to say to one man: you must go to the front, and then excuse another man and let him go home if there be some other place in which he can do better work. The ordinary principle of compulsory service could not, to my mind, be worked out in respect to farm labour. You can compel men to do almost anything within reason when they are under military control and gathered together in numbers under the authority of officers, but you cannot compel one or two men on a farm to do this or to do that. You have to have some arrangement under which men would be willing to go on the farms. Some provision should be made for the distribution among the different industries of Canada—a provision which I do not find in this Bill—of the men who cannot go to the front. Many men who are physically unfit for military service are fit for some other form of service. We are taking no steps to place these men in a position to relieve men who are fit to go to the front, or to provide for a distribution of the man-power that is not called upon for military service. Such distribution should take place among various industries of Canada, which will be very much crippled if that course be not adopted. The member for St. John suggested that the men who cannot go to the front should be asked to serve in some other capacity at the same wage as that paid to the soldiers. Theoretically, that sounds all right, but I fear that it would not work out in practice. In order to ensure the success of this measure and of the Bill that I suggest should be passed concurrently with it, steps should first be taken to secure the co-operation and sympathy of organized labour. I fear that the step suggested by the member for St. John would make that an impossibility. I suppose that if his suggestion were adopted, we would have to have a Patriotic Fund, separation allowance, pension fund, or something equivalent to all these, for the men who did not go to the front and who engaged in other work at the same wage as that paid to the soldiers. Then, to place a man in an industrial establishment at, say, $2.50 a day when a man beside him would be earning $4 or $5, would so disarrange labour that the plan could not be successfully worked out. I am afraid that the carrying out of this proposal would not secure to the Government or to Parliament that co-operation of labour organization without which none of these Bill will be very successful. It is reasonable, though, to say that every man who does not go to the front ought to be asked to do something else for which he is fitted. I again say that the Government ought to place before the House with all possible speed proposals for the co-ordination and utilization of all forces not dealt with by this Bill, because this Bill cannot be as intelligently discussed by itself as it could be if we had a measure of the kind that I have suggested to discuss with it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I realized when I moved the amendment that certain difficulties would attend the proper working out of the proposal. But it is not impossible to devise an amendment to this Bill which would tend to equalize the wages paid to those who engage in some other branch of the national service and the wages paid to those who enter upon active service and go to the front. I quite agree with the member for North Oxford that it would not do to fix the wages of those who engage in some branch of the national service other than military service at what is now paid to the soldiers. The reason is that this country has treated its soldiers in a most shameful manner. Canada is not paying her soldiers that to which they are fairly entitled; everybody admits that. Some gentlemen answer by saying that the soldier does not go to the front with the idea of getting adequate wages. Pushing that argument to the extreme limit, you would say that the soldiers should not be paid anything.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What sum would the hon. gentleman suggest that we pay the soldier and the mechanic?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I would say that a fair wage to those engaged in the national service either in the way of serving at the front or in the way of performing labour would be $2 or $3 a day. Probably $3 would be fair under the present circumstances. A soldier at the front is probably not so much concerned about the money that he himself gets as he is about the provision of adequate living expenses to his wife and family, his mother, or the sisters whom he has left at home. Naturally the fact that his family would not be fairly well provided for would have a deterring effect upon a man in respect to his going to the front. I do not see why a man who is called upon under this clause to enlist and who says: My services would be better devoted to some other work in the national interest, should not, if he is exempted from going to the front, serve the nation for the compensation that he would get if he went to the front. He runs no risk of life or limb; he enjoys all the comforts of home. Being under obligation by law to serve his country, why should he not be willing, if exemption be granted to him, to do so for the same compensation as that which is granted to the soldier? If that were done and the nation were to take charge of the manufacture of munitions and other supplies necessary for the soldiers, the wages could be very easily equalized and justice would be done all round. Many of our young men are to-day deterred from enlisting, because if they remain at home they can get $4 or $5 a day and support their families in comfort, while if they go to the front they would get only one-third of what they could get at home.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would the hon. gentleman fix the same price of $3 a day for those who are exempted, to do farm work?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why not? That would be a matter for the officials to determine who would be employed by the Governor in Council. There would be many cases, of course, of young men working at home on their fathers' farms, and receiving no wages, for ordinarily the young man on his father's farm is not paid wages. But these are exceptional circumstances which could not very well be provided for. I do not submit this amendment as being perfect. It merely suggests the principle that should be applied in the case of those who ask for exemption. If that were done I think the applications for exemption would be very much fewer than would otherwise be the case. If the man applying for exemption knows that he would not receive any more compensation in any other branch of national service than he would receive if he went to the front, he would be very much more likely to go to the front.

Mr. EDWARDS: My hon. friend would fix the pay of a private at $3 a day?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS: What rate would he fix for lieutenants and captains?

Mr. PUGSLEY: It would be very easy to determine the relative increase that officers should receive. Those who have to do with the matter would necessarily fix the compensation. My idea in making this suggestion is to reduce the wages of those engaged in the manufacture of munitions to the rate which the soldier ought to get, or to raise the pay of the soldier to something approaching, if not equal to, the wages paid to those who remain at home. Whether that could be worked out or not I do not know. I shall, of course, be guided by the judgment of others, but it seems to me it could be worked out in a very large measure. I have another objection to this section. Paragraph (a) of subsection 1, section 11, provides:

[Mr. Pugsley.]

Paragraph (b) provides:

> That it is expedient in the national interest that the man should, instead of being employed in military service, be engaged in other work in which he wishes to be engaged and for which he has special qualifications.

As I understand the section, once an exemption is granted under paragraph (a) or (b) that is the end of the matter. It is not a conditional exemption.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certain exemptions must be conditional, and any exemption may be conditional.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Under what clause?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Subsection 2 of section 11, which says:

> (a) A certificate may be conditional as to time or otherwise, and if granted solely on conscientious grounds shall state that such exemption is from combatant service only.

So, any certificate may be conditional, and certain certificates must be conditional.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is expressly provided by paragraph (c) that it shall not be conditional upon his remaining in the employment in respect of which he is granted exemption. He is not obliged, however, to remain in that establishment or in that place. If he moves, he could be called up again and could again apply for exemption.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The certificate might be conditional on his remaining at a certain class of useful work, without specifying any place or establishment.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Paragraph (b) provides:

> A certificate granted on the ground of the continuance of education or training or on the ground of exceptional financial or business obligations or domestic position, shall be a conditional certificate only.

Paragraph (c) provides:

> No certificate shall be conditional upon a person to whom it is granted continuing or entering into employment under any specified employer or in any specified place or establishment.

Under that, the labourer could go from place to place, leaving the employment in respect of which he had been granted exemption and engaging in some other work, and it might be very difficult to trace him.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It might be embodied in the certificate that he should report.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That might be. I just wish to say one word with regard to the amendment proposed by my hon. friend from Chambly and Vercheres (Mr. Rai-ville). As I understand it, he proposes that subsection (c) be amended by inserting between the words "in" and "other" the following: "agricultural, industrial or." I think the Solicitor General will agree with me that that would rather limit the exemption which would be provided for. Where specific words are used just before the word "other," the courts are guided by those specific words. In this case "other work" would mean employment of a like character to that already specified. It seems to me that that would embarrass the tribunal very much, because it would be an indication of the opinion of Parliament that no exemption should be granted except to persons engaged in agricultural or industrial work or work of a like character. Now there might be many employments which would be just as important in the national interest, but which would be entirely separate and distinct from agricultural or industrial work. Unless the banks, for instance, have a sufficient number of employees to carry on the work of banking, it would be very difficult to carry on industrial work. Without banking facilities the business of great manufacturing establishments could not be carried on, and so also with regard to agricultural production—potatoes, cattle, wheat, flour, and everything of that kind. Without brokers to handle the business connected with the proper carrying on of that class of work the business of the country might be enormously hampered, and the work of those who are engaged in production might be very seriously interfered with. Take the question of transportation. What advantage would it be to have industrial or agricultural products unless we had transportation facilities to carry those products to the markets of the world? For these reasons I rather think it undesirable to limit the subsection by the amendment proposed by my hon. friend. I have not given the matter very much consideration, but I think upon the whole it would be very much better to leave the paragraph as it is, and it would be for the tribunal to say whether the agricultural, industrial, banking, mercantile or transportation work in which the applicant was engaged was in the national interest, and whether the applicant should be granted exemption or not.

Sir HERBERT AMES: The alleged inadequacy of the payment of our soldiers has been referred to so frequently in this House that I think it ought to be thoroughly understood just what our soldiers receive. Take, for instance, the case of a married man with a family of two children who has enlisted in the province of New Brunswick. What is the total remuneration received by him and his family on account of his services overseas? In the first place, he gets $1.10 a day, which is $33 a month. His wife gets a separation allowance of $20 more. From the Patriotic Fund in New Brunswick she gets an average of $15 more.

Mr. NESBITT: But the Patriotic Fund is purely voluntary, and should not be counted in what the men are supposed to get.

Sir HERBERT AMES: That makes $68. The man's food is estimated at 60 cents a day, for 31 days a month, which makes $18.60 more. His clothes, boots, cap, overcoat and everything he requires while he is in service are furnished him, representing at least $10 a month more. Consequently, that man and his family receive directly and indirectly on account of the services he renders his country no less than $96.60 a month, which will figure out $3.10 a day. This is what the people of Canada as a whole pay the married soldier from New Brunswick who has a wife and two children. This is not inadequate by any means.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Wages are not over-high in New Brunswick. They are supposed to be fair. Take the ordinary chauffeur for instance, who has no family. He gets an average of from $15 to $20 per week, which is higher wages than the boy who goes to the front and risks his life.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: Is $20 a week paid all the year around?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes, all the year round. They do not get less than $15 a week, and many of them get $18 or $20 a week.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I may say we have not much snow in the southern part of New Brunswick, and they run the automobiles all the year round.

An hon. MEMBER: Mostly wind.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes, we are favoured in that way too.

Sir HERBERT AMES: In this case it is $3.12 a day, seven days in the week, which is an average of about $22 a week.

Mr. NESBITT: I have made the calculation as to what the soldier gets, a little differently from my hon. friend's calculations. I quite agree he gets $1.10 a day, which is $1 a day as pay and 10 cents a day field allowance. He gets his clothing and his food which we might put at another dollar, which is the outside. He also gets his separation allowance, if he is married. If he is not married he does not get any separation allowance. The Patriotic Fund should not be counted in it, because that is a purely voluntary contribution by the people, and it should not be necessary for a country like this kind, considering the financial condition of the people to count that as part of the soldier's pay. The people should not be called upon for voluntary subscriptions to the Patriotic Fund; the Government should pay that in the form of extra pay to the men. It is more or less of a charity, though it does come voluntarily, and it is remarkably well administered. I have nothing to say against my hon. friend from Montreal St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) on that score, because he deserves great credit for the way in which this fund has been administered. At the same time that does not affect the principle. I hold the principle is wrong, and the Government should pay the men entirely. They should pay the men more than they do, and when it comes to the married men the separation allowance should be at least $30 in place of the $20 a month, to make up for the Patriotic Fund. The separation allowance does not take a man's children into account at all. They pay the same to the married man, whether he has children or not. If you limit it to $20 a month for the married man, if he has children he should be paid in addition, in proportion to the number of children he has. That is for the separation allowance only. The pay of the ordinary man should be increased to $1.50 a day plus the 10 cents field allowance, at the lowest calculation, and estimating his board and clothing as being worth, say, $1 a day, that would put him on the same basis as other men throughout the length and breadth of the land.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: I think the hon. member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) is not quite fair in his statement of the case. He takes an exceptional case to prove the rule. The general rule is the men at the front are unmarried. We are proposing to send men to the front by compulsion and the plan of the Government will be that only unmarried men shall go, as far as possible. Why my hon. friend takes this exceptional case as a basis for a general conclusion I cannot understand, if he intends to be fair, and I must assume he does intend to be fair. More than that, why should the man who is unmarried, and who is being sent to the front, receive less than the ordinary labourer at home receives? Is it a good reason to say that some other man at the front gets more than he does? I think the committee will have to acknowledge there is no justification in the world for paying men at the front less than ordinary labourers get at home.

Mr. EDWARDS: Does the hon. gentleman know what men are being paid at home?

Mr. THOMSON: I would not undertake to say, because I am not familiar with wages all over the country. If I were to talk of the wages I pay farm labourers at home, I could tell you very quickly. I pay $55 a month in summer and $30 a month in winter.

Mr. EDWARDS: Is it possible to estimate in dollars and cents the value of the services our men are rendering at the front?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. NESBITT: There is no use ringing that in. Every one knows it.

Mr. THOMSON: There is no reason not to pay a man because he is serving his country. I do not think it is fair that a man who is risking his life every day in the service of his country should receive less than an unskilled labourer at home. There is a great deal we never can pay him for.

Mr. MARCIL: Will the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) let me ask him a question? What is the rate of pay of a British soldier, for instance?

Mr. OLIVER: I wish to call the attention of the hon. member for St. Antoine to the fact that in a recent bulletin of the Patriotic Fund the statement was made that although there were 105,000 families dependents of soldiers, only 60,000 received aid from the Patriotic Fund.

Mr. MARCIL: May I repeat my question to the hon. member for Frontenac, who does not wish to appreciate the real value of the services rendered by the soldiers in the trenches? How much pay does the British soldier get?

Mr. EDWARDS: I understand the British soldier gets less than half what is paid to the Canadian soldier, and I understand the French soldier gets a matter of a few cents a day. I think there has been more talk in this House this afternoon about the pay of the soldiers than there has been by all the soldiers over in France. There has been more kicking here about their pay than there has been by all the soldiers overseas. We all realize we cannot value the services of our soldiers in dollars and cents. How then are you going to set a figure on their pay unless you try to deal fairly with them and compare this country with other countries?

Everybody is disposed to do the best he can for our soldiers at the front. There is no difference of opinion in regard to that on the part of the members of this House or in the country. It is all right now to get up and say that the soldier does not get enough pay. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) suggests $3 a day for a private. I doubt very much if he will find many members to agree with him. Another says $1.50 would be about right; somebody else would get up and say $1.55, I suppose, and somebody else $1.60. The question of pay is not what has kept men from enlisting. The reason why men have not enlisted in greater numbers is that they have been encouraged to remain at home and they feel that they are justified in remaining at home. Look at the Militia Gazette and you will find that in the fall of 1914 a great many young men were gazetted as lieutenants. They got the title of lieutenant and they are still remaining in Canada. They find it more profitable to run automobile garages than to go overseas. I do not know why they took out their commissions. Others find it advisable to scoot over to the other side of the line and go to college there. It was not a question of dollars and cents or of pay with them. They did not go overseas because they thought it was safer to be here.

Mr. NESBITT: My hon. friend tries to make it out a virtue on the part of these young men that they are not fighting for dollars and cents. We all know that there is no money which can recompense men who go out and risk their lives. But that is no reason why we should not pay these men a fair wage. The question has nothing to do with what Great Britain or France pay their men. We are entitled to pay our men a fair day's wage for the time they put in just as well as we are entitled to pay men fairly whom we employ in ordinary labour. We have to pay a man employed in an ordinary occupation more than we pay a man at the front. We know that the men at the front are not complaining at all. They did not join for the purpose of being paid a certain amount and we give them credit for that, but that is no reason why we should not see that they are properly paid.

Mr. McCOIG: I agree with my hon. friend from North Oxford as far as the pay proposition is concerned. The average single man who is working upon a farm in Ontario is receiving in the neighbourhood of $500 or $600 a year and his board. The argument is presented that in a great many cases he is only employed for a few months in the year, but in most cases the average farmer employs a man all the year round. If he employs a man for only six months he will have to pay him at a higher rate than $1.10 a day. The average man employed on the farm gets $2.50 a day and you can scarcely get them at that wage. During the remainder of the time these men are employed in the industries in the towns and cities. If we are going to compel men to go to the front we should not pay them less than we ought to pay them and we should not hesitate over a few cents per day. We should pay them the rate that we should be willing to accept ourselves if we were going and I do not think there is any one here who would be willing to go to the front for $1.10 a day. I feel satisfied that the Prime Minister will look at it in that way. If we conscript men and compel them to go, we should see that they are fairly paid for their services. We are proud to see them go, they are going to defend us and I venture to say that there are not many of us here who are very anxious to go.

Mr. EDWARDS: Does the hon. gentleman think the argument is any stronger in favour of the men who will have to respond to this law than it will be in favour of men who went under voluntary enlistment?

Mr. McCOIG: I do not think there is any question that a man should be properly paid when it comes down to taking him away from an industry or employment in which he is getting $2.50 or $3 a day, and telling him that he has to go to the front to defend us. Shall we send men to the front to defend us for $1.10 a day while we continue to prosper, make money and increase our bank accounts?

Sir HERBERT AMES: Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that a conscripted man should be paid more than a volunteer?

Mr. McCOIG: I feel that we would be justified in increasing the pay of the men who have already gone to the front. They entered at a time when the cost of living was only half what they are required to pay for the maintenance of their families throughout this country now. Their families suffered last winter and there was nobody who was called upon for assistance more than the hon. gentleman (Sir Herbert Ames) was during that time. There is no reason why we should not deal fairly and generously with those men. With reference to the exemption of men employed in essential industries and in agriculture, I would be inclined to support the amendment which is before the committee unless we get some assurance from the Prime Minister that it is the intention of the Government to make these exemptions. If the Prime Minister will give us an assurance that the men in these important industries will be exempted I would be glad to take his promise, or obligation, in the matter and I would not be so anxious to vote for the amendment. At this particular season of the year, when the farmers are being called upon for increased production, they are hesitating as to whether they can continue to increase production to the extent that is required under the circumstances because they do not know whether they will have their sons to assist them in taking off another crop or whether they will be present to put another crop in. Some crops were not put in on account of the unfavourable spring and now they cannot get help. The same difficulty will be experienced when it comes time to take off the crops. Root crops have to be cultivated, hay has to be harvested and if, on account of the backward spring they did not get the crops in earlier, it means that they should have double the help that they have upon the farms. Men will be required for putting in the fall wheat and making preparations for the next season and under those circumstances it is important that the farmer should know whether this Government, or this Parliament, is going to exempt such producers or whether we are going to conscript them the same as men from other professions and occupations. The same argument would apply to all the industries which are essential to the carrying on of the war.

Mr. RAINVILLE: My hon. friend (Mr. McCoig) must not be under the impression that I am asking that the farmers of the country should be exempt. I know that in the province of Quebec we have farmers who do not deserve to be exempt because they do not produce the necessities of life. Their staying on the farm is of no service at all, but on the other hand the continuance of others on the farm is very necessary in the interests of the state.

My object in pointing that out was to emphasize the desirability of setting forth what kinds of work Parliament considered might be of more importance in particular cases even than military service. That is why the amendment was moved. It is not a question of protecting the farmer in himself, but of protecting the agricultural industry or other industries which are of vital importance to our country.

Mr. ARTHURS: I believe that the general consensus of opinion among those already at the front is, not that the pay is insufficient at present, but that the scale of pensions should be made more adequate than it is at present. Any complaints I have heard at the front or in England have been along these lines. Our men are not complaining of the pay they receive. The French soldier receives five cents a day, the English soldier a shilling a day, less any allowance he may make to his relatives. The Canadian soldier gets in France approximately twenty cents a day for spending money, the balance being retained until he returns to England. It might be advisable to make the daily allowance in France elastic so that, particularly during the winter, the soldier could receive instead of thirty-five francs a month, fifty or sixty francs a month. But there is a strong feeling, especially during this time of high prices, that there should be a very material increase in the pensions, not only to the relatives of deceased soldiers but to soldiers who have been disabled.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I would direct the attention of the Solicitor General to clause (d) of 11 which reads:

> That serious hardship would ensue, if the man were placed on active service, owing to his exceptional financial or business obligations or domestic position.

It would be better if that clause ended at "obligations" and a new clause were framed to deal with cases where domestic circumstances offer fair ground for an exemption. It might be better to say, "financial, business, or domestic obligations." Or it might be preferable to follow the New Zealand Act in that respect and insert a new clause. Section 18, subsection

(b) of the New Zealand Military Service Act reads:

> By reason of his domestic circumstances, or for any other reason his calling-up for military service will be a cause of undue hardship for himself or others.

That perhaps better expresses the idea sought to be accomplished by our clause (d). It is difficult to state exemptions in the Bill, and possibly the very best has been done by expressing in general terms the grounds of exemption. There might perhaps be one specific exemption, that which is contained in the 9 p.m. Militia Act; the only son of a widow, being her only support, is exempted from service. Doubtless in such cases the sole remaining son of a widow would be exempted under the Bill as it now appears. Subsection 3 of section 18 of the New Zealand Military Service Act deals with that point, and also with the point raised by Senator Power in the other Chamber, who introduced a Bill making special provision for the exemption of a son where a brother had been killed in overseas service. The New Zealand Act reads:

> In the absence of regulations to the contrary, it shall be sufficient evidence of undue hardship on an appeal on any of the grounds specified in paragraph (d) of subsection 1 hereof, that the appellant is the sole surviving son of his parents who is of military age, and that at least one of his brothers has served in some portion of His Majesty's forces in connection with the present war and has lost his life by reason of such service.

Subclause (e) of section 11 states that exemption may be granted on account of ill-health or infirmity. This exemption will have to be established by medical evidence. This will be one ground of exemption which will be availed of very frequently by a great many who are liable to service under this Act. It will be very essential to eliminate any suggestion of partiality on the part of medical officers appointed by the tribunal. Has the Solicitor General in mind any safeguards which can be thrown around the administration of this section so as to prevent any suspicion of partiality in its administration by medical officers? I observed in the press a few days ago a regulation by the Government of the United States upon this very point.

I think it was to the effect that where an exemption was granted by a medical officer a second examination, or report, was required from another medical officer, and that an exemption was not conclusive or final until there had been a second report and examination by another and independent medical officer. Will the Solicitor General inform the committee whether he has given any special consideration to this clause, and whether he has any safeguards in mind which would assist in the fair administration of this particular part of section 11?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Referring to the latter suggestion first, as to paragraph (e), subsection 1, ill health or infirmity, it must be remembered that the militia authorities, subsequent to the determination of the tribunal, will themselves medically examine every man who reports. This clause existed under the English Military Service Act, and the local Government Board published certain principles, or, perhaps, better termed explanatory notes, as to the application of this clause by the tribunals, and they called attention to that fact in particular—that, inasmuch as the man, after he passed their survey, had to undergo examination before the military officer, their duty was only to exempt under this clause such men as manifestly were, for the time being, incapable of military service. Wherever it was a case of doubt it would certainly be passed on, and left to the disposition of the medical military authorities. They say further that, in the operation of this clause, it was wise that a certificate of exemption should, in the first instance, at all events, in this case, be only a conditional certificate. In that way, they say, the clause is not abused. All that I desire to impress is that it is not likely that there will be any medical officer directly under the tribunal, or in the service of the tribunal. They will deal only, for example, with cases on medical certificate, or, perhaps, two medical certificates, where it is shown the man is incapable of appearing before them, and in cases where he is not incapable of appearing, and does appear, but is so crippled or infirm that it would be a mere formality to pass him on to the military officer.

Mr. MARCIL: I think in any case where the health of the man called upon is in doubt, the family physician, who is familiar with the family antecedents, should not be overlooked, because in the enlistments for overseas many were enlisted—I do not care to say how many—who should never have been enlisted, who are now in sanatoria and military hospitals all over the country, and are a charge on Canada. They were sent back, because they were never physically able to stand the strain. In a case of that kind, I think that, in every case where there is a family physician familiar with the man's condition or antecedents, where perhaps there was a tendency to tuberculosis or something of that kind, there should be a provision that that physician should be consulted before any decision is come to.

Sir HERBERT AMES: I would urge that the previous suggestion of the hon. gentleman from Halifax (Mr. Maclean) be taken into serious consideration by the Government, and that paragraph (b) subsection 2 be divided into two paragraphs. The first part of the clause, down to the word "obligation," refers manifestly to the individual man, the hardship is upon himself, and it is a business hardship, but in the matter of domestic relationship, the hardship is not upon the man who enlists, but upon those he leaves behind, and there should be a clause providing that, in case of hardship to others who are the natural dependents of the man, the question of exemption should be considered. I have in mind the case of an only son of a widow, where the widow was wholly dependent upon the son for support. Under this Bill it might be quite possible that that only son would be compelled to serve. Again, cases where all the sons have gone to the front but one, and the family is dependent upon the boy left at home.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Or partially dependent.

Sir HERBERT AMES: Or mainly dependent. It is not a hardship upon the boy in that case, but upon the family; consequently, I think, there should be a separate clause dealing with domestic relationships, and making it clear that the hardship upon other people created by the boy being taken away is that which should be considered.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the clause is better taken altogether. It is a question entirely of obligation. The idea of the clause is obligation to others. I rather think my hon. friend from St. Antoine is not quite right in saying that if a man is under heavy business obligations, such obligations as can be performed only by himself, and those obligations are neglected, that that man alone has to suffer. I am afraid others would suffer too. In other words, the class of people who would suffer is just as wide as the class who would suffer by reason of a man being taken from his domestic obligations. I see no reason for separating the two.

Dealing with the case of the only son of a widowed mother, who is her sole support, no one could be more sympathetic in regard to exempting such a man than myself. But the difficulty is that, if we start these specific exceptions we destroy the principle and spirit of our Act, and I do not know where we should end. I think we should get into an endless maze. To carry my hon. friend's point a little further, what is the difference between the only son of a widowed mother, who is her sole support, and one of three sons of a widowed mother, if the other two are perhaps at the other end of the earth where they cannot be found; or one of four sons, if the other three are crooked; or one of four sons if the other three feel no domestic obligations whatsoever, and are perhaps in some other country? I have followed out that idea to show that there is no reason for stopping where the hon. gentleman suggests we should stop, if we start specifying these exceptions. One could logically proceed till he would be in an endless maze, if he started to make exceptions. I think the better plan is to lay down general principles, and leave the application entirely to the tribunal. In fact, I do not see any other practical plan.

Sir HERBERT AMES: I do not say those exemptions I have suggested should be introduced in the Bill. I am only urging that there should be a clause which would deal purely with domestic relations.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I dealt with that in my remarks a few minutes ago, and my remarks on that point would apply to the second suggestion of the hon. member for Halifax. As to excepting the only surviving son of parents who have, at least, one son killed, perhaps my remarks would not apply with quite the same force. At all events, both suggestions will be noted for review later.

Mr. EDWARDS: In the case of ill health and infirmity, who is to interpret the man's condition? Is it the regular medical officer?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, they will determine it after the subject has passed the review of the tribunal. As to the jurisdiction of the tribunal, that will be decided by regulation, but my own thought is that there will be no medical officer under the tribunal which will only deal with cases so manifest that the ordinary layman can say the party should not go through the formality of being examined by a medical officer.

Mr. EDWARDS: I do not know whether I caught the idea of the hon. gentleman from Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil). I understood the hon. gentleman to say that the certificate of the family physician should be accepted.

Mr. MARCIL: I contend that the family physician should be consulted in preference to a stranger who would not be familiar with the family conditions. Two medical men might be associated in that connection, one acting on behalf of the Government and one on behalf of the family.

Mr. EDWARDS: I concede that the opinion of the family physician might well be furnished to those who have to decide whether or not a certain person comes under this clause, but I do not think that the opinion of the family physician should be a determining factor. I speak as a medical man who knows something of the inside of the medical profession. Medical men are only human—the same, we will say, as lawyers are—and it is not fair to the medical man who is in close association with the people of a certain section of the community that he be asked to give his opinion with regard to the physical condition of a certain person in order that it may be determined whether that person is fit for military service. That would put the family physician in a very awkward position. While medical men are as honourable as the people of any other profession, I repeat that they are only human. I do not think that it would be fair to the medical man to ask him to give his opinion in this respect; nor do I think that it would be in the interest of what we have in view under this measure.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: I would like the Solicitor General to tell me to what extent the words "domestic position" would go if a man had a good lawyer, a good pleader —a good doctor, too—to plead before a judge who is ready to be lenient to anybody? The member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) spoke about widows: I was going to make a remark along the same line, because it all comes down to a question of domestic position.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know where the goodness of the doctor comes in in deciding on a man's domestic circumstances or domestic position.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: Sometimes he knows a good deal about it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am in hopes that the meaning of the clause will not depend in any way upon either the goodness or the badness of lawyers. No doubt their interpretation, in the first instance at least, will depend somewhat on the spirit and calibre of the tribunal. To produce uniformity in the decisions of the tribunals as nearly as is humanly possible in any institution creatable by us, we provide appeal tribunals, and we provide a Central Appeal Judge. When the matter comes finally before the appeal tribunal—still more clearly when the matter comes before the Central Appeal Judge—the actual meaning of the words "domestic position" will not, I am quite certain, be affected by either a good lawyer or a good doctor.

Mr. McCRANEY: With reference to the exemption of those engaged in agricultural labour, I inquired of Mr. W. D. Scott, Superintendent of Immigration, as to the number of farmers and farm labourers who were brought into Canada from the United States in connection with the seeding operations in western Canada this year. This matter has a very close relationship to the question of recruiting, and the committee may be interested in the figures. The information which I obtained from Mr. Scott was as follows:

> The number of farm labourers who ente ed Canada from the United States during the months of March, April and May was 14,030. This number is made up as follows: March, 4,389; April, 6,653, and May, 2,988. The cost of advertising in connection with our propaganda to secure an adequate supply of farm help was $65,897.51 for the months of March, April and part of May, our returns in this connection for the latter month not being complete.

When I point out that it was necessary to bring in over 14,000 farm labourers in connection with the spring operations, it will be seen that it will be necessary to bring in very many more in connection with the harvesting work in the fall.

Mr. CURRIE: The clause that we are now considering, which deals with exemptions, is one to which we should give a good deal of attention. It has been stated by the Solicitor General that the tribunals will exercise a certain amount of discretion in this matter. The clause gives the tribunals the right to exempt almost anybody. The words "domestic position" have a very wide application. I had a conversation with one of the officers acting on a tribunal of this kind in the United States, and I asked him a question on this very point. He said that the United States tribunals have no authority to grant any exemption; all they can do is recommend to higher authority the cases for exemption; the higher authority then has to pass upon them. According to this clause the tribunal has a perfect right to grant exemptions and the grounds set out are so very wide that a tribunal, if it were so minded, could grant exemption to almost any one. The old Militia Act exempts the only son upon whom a widow is dependent. I think that is a provision that should be put in this Act; the only son of a widow should be specially exempted, just as clergymen are. This provision has been in the Militia Act from time immemorial; in all countries where there is conscription a similar provision is made.

An hon. MEMBER: Why exempt the clergy?

Mr. CURRIE: The clergy are not exempt in France, but they are in other countries. They have been exempt in all our Militia Acts during the last couple of hundred years. The clergy and the only sons of widows have been exempted. I think the committee would do well to introduce an amendment to this clause to the effect that the tribunals in the first instance should do nothing more than recommend the exemption to a higher tribunal or court of appeal. That does away with the question of whether or not a man shall be exempt though what we call the legal moral risk. As a commanding officer at Valcartier I had applications from sisters, cousins, aunts and sweethearts of soldiers for the exemption of men in whom they were interested upon grounds of domestic position, business obligations, and that sort of thing. To my mind, this clause is too wide in its provisions. I would suggest that the Solicitor General narrow it down a little bit more, because it is a dangerous clause.

All over the country people are saying that there are clauses in this Bill under which the rich will be exempted, or at least favoured. If one member of a local tribunal happens to have a cousin or some other relative brought before him the chances are that he will exempt that man. Further than that, a tribunal in one county may be very lax, and the tribunal in the next county very firm, and I see nothing in the Bill to prevent a young man from appearing before the lax tribunal even though it is not in his county.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is provided against in the Bill.

Mr. CURRIE: I think the clause as to exemptions should be made absolutely clear. Ill health or infirmity is given in the Bill as one ground for granting exemption. A man might be infirm for a few weeks with a bad cold, and he could claim exemption on that ground, though in two weeks he would be quite all right again. Or a certificate from a doctor would give him an "infirmity" at once. My experience teaches me that men can develop various forms of infirmity when they do not want to go into the trenches, and I think that will be the case here. In certain cases a certificate of exemption should only be conditional. A man suffering from varicose veins, for instance, after three weeks in a hospital, is just as good as any soldier in the ranks, but under this infirmity clause he could claim exemption and get off altogether. I think this clause should be given a great deal of consideration by the committee, because if many young men are exempted on the ground of ill health or infirmity we shall have to take the classes higher up, perhaps up to 40 years of age. No one who has not been in the army has any conception of the reasons that doctors will give in order to get a man off. At Valcartier every man was examined, of course, by a board of medical officers, and if a man had a cigarette eye—and one man out of every four in Canada has a cigarette eye; that is the eye he blows the smoke on—if one eye was only two degrees stronger than the other, and many men are born with this defect, the man was rejected. His other eye may be perfectly good, but although a soldier needs only one eye to shoot with the man is rejected, although he is just as good in other respects as any other man in the ranks. A slight limp will also disqualify a man. A man with a dropped arch is also rejected, although he may be able to drive a team just as well as a man with an arch like a Highlander. One man out of every four is rejected for defects that do not interfere in the slightest degree with his usefulness in the trenches. A great deal has been said about the age of the soldier. Now, a man of 40 or 45 may be just as strong and healthy, and able to stand the trenches just as well as a man of 25, and sometimes better. I know lots of men over 60 who went over with the first contingent and are in the trenches to-day, going strong, and they claim that they will kill off all the young men in the trenches before they get through. For the reason that this House should make a strong effort to prevent any fraud being perpetrated on these tribunals, I think this clause should be discussed further. I think, also, that the Solicitor General should provide that a widow's only son who is her sole support should be exempted. That is the practice in every Christian country—in Europe at all events, although I do not believe it is the practice in New Zealand—and I would strongly urge that provision be made in the Bill granting exemption to a widow's only son who is her sole support.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I cannot quite agree with my hon. friend in his last suggestion. Why should the only son of a widow be exempted when the five sons of another widow might be taken?

Mr. CURRIE: I said, if he was her sole support.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Perhaps I misunderstood my hon. friend. At all events, a widow with five sons is entitled to keep one of them at home, if a widow with only one son is entitled to keep her boy at home. I know of a family in Brantford where the five sons have all gone to the front. One has been killed, one is now wounded, and three are in the trenches. The mother is a widow and is absolutely in need of some one to support her. Why should she not be allowed to have one of her sons at home, just as much as a widow with only one son? However, I am not here for the purpose of suggesting how men may escape from doing their duty. The primary object of this Bill is to raise men, not to exempt them, and if there is one man who should be exempted and who does not seem to be mentioned here, it is the returned soldier who has done his bit in the trenches. After being at home here for a few months he might be considered medically fit again, and might be called up under this Act unless there is a provision against it, even though he had served two years at the front.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He is exempted in the schedule.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Another point that I do not see covered by the Bill is whether the men who are conscripted will be given any choice as to the arm of the service which they shall join. It appears to me that a man who is an engineer by trade should not be attached to the infantry. A horseman or an artilleryman should be allowed to serve where he will be the most useful. I think the Bill should make some provision for putting the man in the hole for which he is best fitted. His training may have fitted him for a certain kind of soldiering, but not for every kind of soldiering, and it appears to me that a man's fitness for a particular arm of the service and his liking for it should be taken into consideration. The aerial service is becoming more and more important every day. I for one think Canada should have had a flying corps long ago, and I hope provision will soon be made for it. We have seen by the newspapers recently that Great Britain is short in this respect, and in view of the urgent need for aeroplanes and airmen, I do not see why a man who is physically fit for the flying corps, and has the nerve and other necessary qualifications, should not be allowed to join that wing. It seems to me we should be using our material to a disadvantage if we assigned such a man to some other branch of the service. I trust the Solicitor General will take that suggestion into his consideration, and, as I may not speak on the Bill again, I take this opportunity of repeating what I said in my original address, that the Bill should not be restricted to providing the 100,000 men that are required to-day, but should be wide enough to allow us to raise 200,000 or more men should they be required. Men who are exempted from serving with this first draft of 100,000 should not be exempted for all time to come, but should be available in case another 50,000 or more men are required. Those men who have got off this time, so to speak, in the very class in which they are called, should not be considered exempt for all time to come. I do not know whether this is carried out in the Bill. I simply mention it so that the Solicitor General may make a note of it.

Mr. McCRANEY: Is the certificate of exemption good in its class until the end of the war?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. Every certificate of exemption may be conditional.

Mr. McCRANEY: But, supposing it is not conditional; supposing a mistake has been made?

Mr. MEIGHEN: If it is not conditional at all, but is absolute in form, then it is an absolute certificate and exempts the man from that call. The call is sent out by proclamation, calling the men in that particular class. If a man in that class secures an absolute exemption, the certificate of exemption applies to that call. While we are on the subject of exemption, I may say certificates may be conditional as to time. A man may be exempted pending the happening of a certain event, or he may be exempted pending his occupation in a certain line of work. I wish to call attention specially to this power of exemption by which a man may be relegated by the certificate to another class next in order. That is to say, though a man may be of the age which would bring him under the regulation in the first case, if in the judgment of the tribunal, though he is not absolutely entitled to exemption, it is in the national interest that he should wait until the next call, he may be relegated to the next class, and when the next class is called he may be relegated to the one following. That is the method of exemption under the British Act, and which I think will take the place of some other provisions of the British Act and will be very useful indeed.

Now as to this wholesale exempting; of course it is possible, and it may be found to be the case, if weak tribunals are formed in some localities by accident. That is why we have the right of appeal. That is why we have a central appeal judge, and it is hoped that all this will be corrected by the two appeals, and that uniformity will be secured, because in the end, the military authorities having power to go to the central appeal judge, the one system will apply over the whole of Canada, and the one interpretation will govern throughout.

Undoubtedly, should this Parliament see fit to extend the Act, as suggested by the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt). any exemptions that had previously been made would be utterly valueless, and any calls made thereafter would be calls made anew, and new applications for exemption would have to be made.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: Might I ask the Solicitor General how he will explain the position of a judge who is too lenient and grants exemption to everybody. Such a judge will be surrounded in a district where he is well known and has lots of friends, and may exempt everybody under section 11. Who should appeal? Not those who are exempted, because they have their certificate of exemption from the judge. Do you mean somebody will appeal? If so, who is it?

Some hon. MEMBERS: The Minister of Militia.

Mr. GLASS: I have seen cases which, if exemptions are to be specified, would present even stronger claims than the case of the only son and sole support of a widowed mother. I have in mind the case of a mother who had two sons and a daughter. The elder son was her only support, the two others being very young children. This young man was not the only son of a widowed mother, but he was a son who was the sole support of his mother. I can conceive how a broad application of the principle in the clause treated by the tribunals themselves would cover all cases in a much fairer way than specifying individual instances. I agree with the Solicitor General that the broad application of the principle will give more satisfactory results than trying to define a lot of fixed cases.

Mr. ROSS: I just want to make a remark or two in regard to the principles contained in the Militia Act, one of which has been spoken of here to-night, that is the exemption of an only son and support of a widow. It seems to me there is another exemption contained in subsection 2 of section 26, which I suggest might with propriety be embodied in this Act. It reads as follows:

> 2. If there are inscribed on the militia roll more than one son belonging to the same family, residing in the same house, only one of such sons shall be drawn, unless the number of names so inscribed is insufficient to complete the required proportion of service men.

If you get your quota of 100,000, and if, as is more than likely, you have more answering your call—because you cannot gauge the 100,000 down to a man, or 100 men, it seems to me this provision in the Militia Act is only just and fair, and should be made to apply to the case of a family in which there are two sons. Under the new law there is no provision made for such an exemption.

I wish to say also, I still sincerely believe that the production of food is so important in this country at this time that some special provision should be made in regard to agriculturists. There is no question but the whole German offensive and submarine campaign to-day is against food production. There is no offensive upon land. They see food production is our weak point, and every man we take off the farm in Canada is only assisting the Germans and the German game. I do not think it should be left to tribunals to say that any farmer shall go on the combatant line. There should be something in this Act saying that any man who is engaged bona fide in the producing of food on the farms of the country, on say, the first of May or the first of June—set a date on it if you like—shall not be obliged to go on the combatant line. I mention the first of May or the first of June in order to prevent men who may have anticipated it from skulking their duty by going back to the farm, not in good faith but as a matter of subterfuge. I saw something in the newspapers to-day or yesterday in regard to what Secretary McAdoo of the United States has said as to what they expect from Canada. He said the grain supply of the United States was depleted, and the Allies and the American nation were almost dependent upon Canada for their supply of grain. Such being the case, I do not think the question of the exemption of a man who is engaged in agriculture should be left to the whim of any tribunal, which may consist of men obsessed with the military idea, and not the idea of food production. I think a man who is engaged in the production of the firing line. The man on the farm is producing foodstuffs not only for the soldier at the front but also for the artisan and mechanic in the town who is handicapped at the present time by the lack of labour and exorbitant prices and labour should not be taken from the land. Otherwise, the prices of food, which have increased to such an extent that the ordinary man is hardly able to live, will be further increased. We should have an assurance from the Solicitor General, or the Prime Minister, that rules and regulations will be framed under this Act which will say that they shall not be taken—

Mr. PUGSLEY: How could they change the Act?

Mr. ROSS: They can make rules and regulations if the Act says so. Section 12 says:

> The Governor in Council may make regulations to secure the full, effective and expeditious operation and enforcement of this Act.

Mr. PUGSLEY: But they could not change the spirit of the Act.

Mr. ROSS: That would not be changing the spirit of it, because agriculture is an absolutely necessary industry. You contend that yourself.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why do they not put it in the statute if they want it?

Mr. ROSS: On the other hand, I cannot see how the arrangement which has been suggested by the Deputy Speaker (Mr. Rainville) is possible because, strange as it may seem, I do agree with my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) in this case. If you put in the words that have been suggested by the amendment, you will limit the construction of the clause very considerably, because you will have to interpret the clause, as we say in law, on the principle of ejusdem generis. You could not exclude a telegrapher or a man engaged in the transport service because the word "other" being in there would necessitate an interpretation of the Act preventing men in other not similar occupation being exempted when it it might be greatly in the public interest to exempt them.

Mr. PROULX: I proposed this afternoon to have a special subclause of section 11 in regard to the agricultural classes. What my hon. friend from West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) has said confirms me in my contention. The view which the hon. member for St. John expressed a moment ago was that if you added it to subclause (a) it would perhaps embarrass the interpretation of the clause in regard to other occupations. For that reason there should be a new clause. I was referring especially to agriculture.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: I would like to say a word with reference to subclause (f) of section 11:

> That he conscientiously objects to the undertaking of combatant service and is prohibited from so doing by the tenets and articles of faith, in effect at the date of the passing of this Act—

It strikes me that some change in the wording there might be beneficial. It is provided by subclause 2 of section 3 that a man who was not married until after June 11 shall be counted as unmarried. I think it would be better, instead of wording this as being in effect at the date of the passing of this Act, that it should be so worded as to be in effect at the date of the introduction of this Bill, or June 11. That would get rid of the possibility of the trouble that the hon. gentleman from Perth (Mr. Morphy) has spoken of, that some little sect might spring up, introduce some change in their doctrine and promulgate a regulation against combatant service. It would be more in keeping with the intention of the Act if, instead of the date being fixed at the time of the passing of the Act, it should be at the time of the introduction of the Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That suggestion, along with a similar one made by the hon. member for Perth, which was that it should be at the date of the outbreak of the war, is worthy of consideration. I would suggest that we pass on and hold these three or four suggestions over for consideration. The clause will be reopened and I will refer to the matter at a later sitting.

Mr. NESBITT: What clause is that?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Subsection 1 of section 11.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: I would like to ask a question of the Solicitor General about paragraph (f) providing exemption for the person who conscientiously objects to undertaking combatant service. The clause is:

That he conscientiously objects to the undertaking of combatant service.

That clause seems comprehensive enough. If I feel in my own conscience that I cannot go out and shed another man's blood, or do anything like that, that I cannot become a combatant, am I to be forced to engage in combatant service? I say: "Thou shalt not kill," and the faith of every Christian is that he shall not kill.

Mr. NESBITT: Steal.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: Steal they do—many of them. Who is to be the judge of my conscience? Will the judge of this tribunal interfere with my own conscience? I say I cannot go to fight, that I am ready to defend my country against all enemies, as many of my people are, that I cannot conscientiously undertake to be a combatant. Who is going to be the judge of that? I want to find out if my conscience will not be respected by the judge. Surely I am the judge of my own conscience. Who is to say that I have no reason for asking exemption on this ground? It seems to me that this opens the question very wide and that you will have to exempt everybody under that clause because it applies a religious test. That will be the first reason that every person will advance why he should be exempt. Do you know, Mr. Chairman, that this clause is stronger than any other? It says that the judge "shall" exempt such a man. That puts an obligation on the judge to exempt him. If I tell the judge I cannot go and combat any human being the judge has to say that I shall be exempt.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The word "shall" applies just as much to subclause (e) as to subclause (f). If a man establishes any of the grounds of exemption, then he is entitled to exemption. "Shall" has no special reference to subclause (f). The subclause is phrased in the best way it was thought possible, to avoid the abuse of the exemption privilege by conscientious objectors. The experience in Great Britain was considered very fully in the framing of that clause. A man must not only show that his objection is really dictated by his own conscience but further he must show that he is prohibited from combatant service by the tenets and articles of faith, in effect at the date of the passing of the Act, of a well known religious denomination existing in Canada and well recognized at that date, and that he belongs to that denomination. These words are principally from the American statute. We have had regard not only to the experience and working out of the conscientious objectors' clause in England but also to the American provisions looking to the taking care of all legitimate cases of conscientious objectors, but at the same time looking to the prevention of abuses of the clause which was one of the chief sources of abuse experienced in Great Britain.

Sir HERBERT AMES: Do I understand that the meaning of that is that he both conscientiously objects and is prohibited?

Mr. PROULX: Does the minister know whether there were many sects or denominations in England who objected to military service?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know how many there were, but I know there were a great number alleged.

Mr. NESBITT: What is the reason for clause (b)?

Mr. MEIGHEN: In the British Act our subclause (a) and subclause (b) are united. Subclause (a) refers to exemption of a man on the ground that he is better serving the national interest in the work in which he is habitually engaged. Subclause (b) is to take care of the case where a man, although he may not be habitually engaged in a particular work, can, in the opinion of the tribunal, do work in that particular neighbourhood by which he would better serve the national interest than by going to the trenches; some special, and, perhaps, very insistent necessary demand may be filled by him. That is the way it was under the British Act, but it was felt here that in the case of a man seeking an exemption, not because he is better serving the national interest where he is habitually engaged, but rather because he felt that he could do something where men were badly wanted in the neighbourhood, it would be necessary to show special qualification for that work. That is an additional precaution which we have taken against the abuse of this clause which has not been taken in England. Otherwise the two are precisely the same.

Mr. NESBITT: The British section sounded much better to me than this, which is indefinite.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is the British, except that before a man can be exempted to undertake special work he has to show special qualifications. In Great Britain he does not need to so show. Thus, however indefinite it may be—and any such provision must be indefinite—it is more definite than the British provision.

Mr. NESBITT: That aims at what I was trying to get my hon. friend to undertake, that is, that he would organize labour, bring in an Act organizing labour so that the Government, or somebody, would place the labour where it was most needed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will bring the matter to the attention of the Minister of Labour.

Mr. NESBITT: That will not do any good.

Mr. OLIVER: If I understood the minister's explanation of this subsection, this is the other barrel of the provisions of the Bill. One barrel is supposed to catch the needs of the front trenches; the other barrel is to catch the needs of industry at home.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Agriculture.

Mr. OLIVER: Munition making, for instance, or some other productive industry, conveniently situated, as my hon. friend said, to where this applicant for exemption resides. It is amply evident that there is no necessity for this subsection if it were merely intended to exempt men from service at the front. Every possible circumstance of exemption is provided for under the preceding subsection. This subsection is inserted for the express purpose of giving direction of the labour of the country, under threat of military service, to the fulfilment of the requirements of the directors of industry in our great cities, I presume.

As to the attitude of the Government in regard to that matter, that is to say, in having one eye on big business in eastern Canada while the other eye is directed possibly towards the trenches, I shall take the liberty of quoting from the speech of the Finance Minister on Saturday last, when he said:—

> During the fall of 1915 and the early part of 1916, it was brought to the attention of the Government—I should say to the attention of nearly all the members of the Government—that in certain districts in which recruiting had been brisk, vital industries such as coal mining, iron and steel, agriculture, and the munitions industry, were suffering by reason of the fact that the recruiting was not in any degree selective; that is to say, that skilled mechanics were being recruited, and that it was not possible to replace them because of the long training required to qualify a man in those trades.

While the hon. minister made that most moving speech in regard to the military necessities of the Allied armies, it will be observed that his mind was fixed rather upon the well-doing and well-being of his friends in the eastern industrial centres, and that the recruiting of men under the voluntary system for the filling of the needs of the front was only on all fours, in his mind, with the needs of the iron and steel, the coal mining and the munitions industry, and, he says, agriculture.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman remember himself complaining bitterly to the Government because we did not control enlistment so as to prevent men leaving agriculture to go into the trenches?

Mr. OLIVER: Me?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: Well, I would like to know when.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I read it in Hansard recently. I will undertake to produce it.

Mr. OLIVER: I should be glad if my hon. friend would read it again, because if he pays any attention he will find that he did not read it correctly.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will undertake to produce it.

Mr. OLIVER: I shall be glad. The Finance Minister went on and read to the House a letter that he had addressed to "Dear Mr. Harmer," President of the Sawyer-Massey Company, Limited, of Hamilton, Ontario. This was a letter in reply to one which he had received from this president of the Sawyer-Massey Company, and we must infer from the tenor of the letter that the Sawyer-Massey Company was one of those who had been protesting against such enlistment of men as would affect the well-doing and the well-being of their operations in Hamilton. In the course of this letter the Finance Minister said:

> I am aware of the force of the arguments presented as I have canvassed them many times during the past few months. There is a point beyond which over-recruiting weak ns the strength of a nation for a long drawn-out struggle.

He says in conclusion:

> You may depend upon it we shall do what we can here to keep the nation strong and at the same time put forth our best efforts in the field.

We are going to keep the nation strong at home by taking care of the Sawyer-Massey Company first, and then we are going to take care of conditions in the field. The minister, after having read this letter, says:

I had the view, during the concluding stages of voluntary recruiting, that the essential industries were being crippled to a certain extent by the enlisting of skilled mechanics, some of whom—I do not say all of whom—could have rendered better service, or as good service, in connection with the prosecution of the war, possibly, as if they had enlisted, although I am the first to say that I admire above all the man who enlists and goes forward to the front. Nevertheless in certain industries which are vital it is necessary, in my judgment, that a certain selection should be exercised.

We have, in this provision, the purpose of the Bill—to exercise a necessary selection in the interest of vital industries. I want to say that in my poor judgment, when the Government of this country comes before Parliament with a proposal to conscript 100,000 men, under the pretense that they desire to procure these men for military service, they should frame their measure with that end in view, and if they want to make provision for the protection of vital industries, that should be taken care of in another measure, not to introduce a means of, in a way, forcing labour into the employment of the so-called vital industry under the threat of military conscription. We know what our position is. We are one of the countries in this war. We know that the war must be won, or that the consequences to us will be very terrible. We know that it is our duty to win the war, and the Government, on behalf of their friends, the munition makers, come to this House and propose to put through a measure, in the name of patriotism, in the name of loyalty, in the name of our dead soldiers, the purpose of which shall be to assist the munition makers and the profiteers, who are making enough money to-day out of the blood and agony of the country, without having this Parliament legislate in addition on their behalf.

Mr. CURRIE: I think the hon. gentleman from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) is labouring under a misconception, and I do not think he wishes to be unfair. At the time that letter was written to the Minister of Finance by the gentleman who manages the Sawyer-Massey Company, these were the facts: Great Britain had sent to the trenches something like 10,000 of her own skilled workmen, whom she afterwards brought back to give them employment in the munition factories in England. I have in mind one shipbuilding industry where a great many of the most skilled men enlisted and went to England, arriving there about that time. Great Britain did not send these high class mechanics that were sent over there into the trenches, but they were conscripted into the munition plants, shipbuilding yards and machine shops. They were trained and sent across the ocean, but were conscripted by the British munition workers. I think if there were any case where exemption should be provided, where men should not be allowed to leave the country and enlist to go to the trenches, it should be the case of those workers. They never should have been allowed to leave here. Hundreds of them left Canada ostensibly to go to the trenches, believing they were going there, and when they got to England, they found themselves taken out of the army, and placed at work in munition factories.

An hon. MEMBER: Why?

Mr. CURRIE: Because they were needed. Britain needed skilled workmen. Skilled rivetters from the Collingwood shipbuilding yards enlisted, but were not allowed to go to the trenches; they were conscripted to build warships in Great Britain. The needs of this country in that regard are just as great as the needs of any other country. Anybody who knows anything about manufacturing in this country knows that, within the last year, the great increase in the cost of everything manufactured has been due largely to two things, namely, the high cost of labour, and the high cost of raw material. There is no doubt about that. Nobody objects to paying the wages, but the fact remains——

Mr. PUGSLEY: Before you leave that point, I understand you say that 10,000 of our men who enlisted for service in the trenches were conscripted.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. gentleman was not listening.

Mr. PUGSLEY: They were conscripted by the British Government and put into the shipyards. Is that the statement?

Mr. CURRIE: If the hon. gentleman had been listening, he would have heard what I stated. I said that Great Britain had sent to the trenches, and brought back to England something like 10,000 skilled workmen. When Lloyd George took charge of the Munition Department he started to drive the munition factories, to get out guns and shells to destroy the German power,—the only way in which it could be destroyed. The men had left the coal mines, the factories, workshops, shipbuilding yards and machine shops of England, and had gone to France, and 10,000 of them were brought back to England, and every man that they could find—even in our army in England—who was a skilled man, was put to work there. So that these men enlisting here, with the best intention in the world, expecting to go to fight the Germans, were not allowed to go after they got to England, but were put to work, as I have stated. What is wrong about that? They did not conscript the men to work for nothing in the factories, as they do in Germany. The munition workers in Canada get more than they do in any works in the world, much better pay than in the United States, and the cost to the Imperial Government of munitions made in Canada is a large percentage less than the cost of those munitions made in England, or in the United States. Everybody who knows the business knows that we are making them cheaper for the British Government than they can make them at home, with much cheaper labour.

I desire to refer to another matter. The most unfortunate thing in connection with the labour question is the poor quality of the labour left at home. If that labour had applied itself diligently to its work, nobody would have objected, but, from my experience of a number of plants that I have seen, I know that every month, when the pay roll is gone over, sixty per cent of the workmen have changed. Is that right? They are getting all the money they ask. They will only work two weeks in one shop. They get their money, jump and go to another shop. I say that is not fair to the men in the trenches. It is all right that these men should receive large wages, but that they should neglect the work and only work half time is a crime, when munitions are needed so badly at the front. Why should a skilled workman employed in a factory here be allowed to stay at home, and only give one-half of his time to the work? Then the complaint is made, "Oh, you are attempting to conscript these men in the factories." Is he any better than the trained workman, his comrade, who has gone overseas and is being shelled, for $1.10 a day? I cannot see that he is. I cannot see that there is any necessity to pay him any higher wages than the other man, as a matter of honour and justice. That fact remains true. So that there is no cause of complaint.

These men are not making complaint by petition through the hon. member for Edmonton because they think they are going to be conscripted. Until such time as a large body of them make complaint, it will not be necessary for the House to take up their case. Every workman in this country who is conscientious and anxious to work can get employment at the highest wages ever paid in Canada and under more satisfactory conditions than prevail in any other part of the world. The manufacturers of Canada, it may be said to their credit, are selling goods to the Imperial Government at ten per cent less than the price at which similar goods can be purchased in the United States. I do not see, therefore, that there is any reason for complaint.

Mr OLIVER: Some of my hon. friend's remarks a few moments ago established the point that I made with regard to this legislation. He complains of the character of the labour that is now available for the gentlemen who are engaged in the manufacture of munitions, and he thinks it is right and proper that labour should be conscripted for the advantage of the munition manufacturers.

Mr. CURRIE: Not at all.

Mr. OLIVER: That is what I understand to be the purport of his remarks. I do not wish to enter into any controversy with my hon. friend; I only wish to state my own position. In order to meet an urgent military necessity, it is right and proper that we should conscript men under proper circumstances and by means of a proper law which has proper authority for its being passed. This law, I maintain, has not such proper authority. But the conscription of men for civil employment is another matter altogether. People who will submit gladly under fair circumstances to a measure of conscription in order to meet a military necessity will not submit to conscription for civil purposes for the profit of any citizen of the Dominion of Canada. In other words, they will not submit to be conscripted for the private profit of any man or any corporation. At any rate, that is the position that I take. While I am willing to support a fair measure of conscription, brought in under proper authority, in order to meet a military necessity, I certainly protest against the conscription of men for civil employment for private profit, such as is the purpose of subsection (b) of this Bill.

Mr. CURRIE: What would the hon. gentlemen call civil employment? Will he be more specific?

Mr. OLIVER: Any employment that is not military.

Sir HERBERT AMES: Suppose a man who was skilled in the operating of a threshing machine was for the time being running a gentleman's motor car in Edmonton; in other words, doing non-essential work. If it was proposed to conscript him, and he said: if I am permitted to do so, I will go into the country and resume my former occupation of running a threshing machine for the next six months, knowing, as I do, that there is a great need for skilled mechanics of that kind; would the hon. gentleman consider it inadvisable, under those circumstances, to exempt that man from going overseas?

Mr. OLIVER: The hon. gentleman's question is a very long one; I think I would have to know the details before I would be able to give an answer.

Sir HERBERT AMES: I made it as brief as I could.

Mr. OLIVER: That is, before I could give a direct answer to my hon. friend's question. But I certainly would not, under existing conditions, support, or defend, or countenance compelling that man to leave his civil employment to go into another for the private profit of another citizen, or a set of citizens, under the threat of military service provided in this Bill. I say that that is not a proper use to which to put the powers that are vested in this Bill. Such drastic action I do not consider at the present time well advised. But, assuming it to be well advised, if we are to conscript 100,000 men for military service, then we should prepare a Bill and enforce it for that purpose, not for the purpose of advantaging any private individual or corporation in civil employment. If the Government of this country were carrying on in its own name, for its own purposes, at its own cost and for the profit of the country, certain forms of industry intimately connected with the prosecution of the war, I could then see the reasonableness of conscripting labour for the benefit of that industry. But it is one thing to conscript labour for the benefit of the State and it is quite another thing to conscript labour for private profit. I suppose I will be corrected when I use the word "conscription" as applied to labour, but it is the purpose of this section to use the powers under this Bill for the purpose of, in effect, conscripting labour for private profit. To that I most strongly object.

Mr. CURRIE: A young man who is working on a farm is to be conscripted. He says to the farmer: I want $100 a month. The farmer says: I will give you only $50. He has his choice, therefore, of taking $50 from the farmer or of being conscripted. Does the hon. gentleman think that that is a case which comes under his category of civil employment? These things will occur right along. Is that a hardship? Is that the case of a man being conscripted by a civil power for the purpose of making profit for a farmer?

Mr. OLIVER: I may not have caught the hon. member's statement correctly, but, as I gathered it, I would say that I think so. If we want 100,000 men and this man is subject to the draft and is fit to go overseas, he should go overseas. We should not use the threat of sending him overseas in order to drive him into the private employment of some other citizen. That is an improper use of the power and authority that this Government is asking from Parliament.

Mr. GLASS: My hon. friend does not seem to think that Great Britain's experience of three years has any bearing upon cases of this kind. The member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) has already shown that the British Government had to bring large numbers of men back from the trenches and fit them into industrial life. I cannot understand my hon. friend's reasoning when he says that because a man is exempted he is necessarily conscripted into industry. It may happen—I hope it will not—that labour will have to be conscripted and directed to industries devoted to the prosecution of the war. The United States are not so slow to comprehend the difficulties that prevailed in England and other countries that sent thousands of their men to the trenches and afterwards had to withdraw them and employ them in industries. As evidence of the fact that the United States do not intend to allow themselves to be led into the same mistakes as those made by the European countries, I find in this evening's Star a despatch from Washington which reads as follows:

The United States will sift out and exempt from fighting service labourers vitally needed in feeding, clothing, supplying and equipping the armies. Lest this nation make the same mistake England did at the outset, the Government will free such men and see to it that they keep at their work. To this end, a corps of experts to-day began a list of industries essential as backstops of the armies in the field.

From official sources it is learned the list probably will name farmers as a general class, miners, men engaged in shipbuilding, munitions, workers of all classes, and every branch of industry that aids directly or indirectly in maintaining the military forces.

My hon. friend is very much concerned lest men should be maintained in the manufacture of munitions. Why, to-day men working in munition factories are doing just as important work as the soldiers in the trenches. The United States are to be commended for the very careful preparations they are making to meet this extraordinary emergency. They have wisdom enough to profit by the mistakes of others. I cannot understand why my hon. friend takes so much exception to the exemption of labour on the ground that it is conscripting labour into industry. Even if that were so, if the needs of the army required a greater effort from industry, it is only what has been done in England and France. The same thing applies to agriculture. Urgent as is the call for greater production to-day, I do not think there is any doubt that the call in 1918 will be stronger still, and if we do not encourage the farmer by helping him to get the labour necessary to work his farm how can we expect him to respond to the call for greater production? There is undoubtedly a great shortage of farm labour at the present time. I do not see why these tribunals should not be given discretion to look after the needs of agriculture and the necessary industries of the country.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend and other members of the House have spoken to-night of the needs of agriculture, and have held out the suggestion that under the provisions of this Bill men could be practically conscripted into agriculture. My hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) touched on this point to-night and I want to emphasize what he said, that there is no such thing possible as conscripting men into agriculture, because conditions do not admit of it. To put an unwilling or inefficient man on a farm where only the owner and one or two other men are employed is simply adding to the burdens of the farmer and not helping him in his work. There are conditions under which you may be able to conscript men profitably; for instance, where a large number of men are required on some work where they can be kept under supervision. But that cannot be done on a farm, and to hold out to the farming community of this country that this or any other Government can conscript men for the service of the farmers is simply humbugging the farmers if they believe it, and I am afraid that many of those who hold out the suggestion are aware that they are merely humbugging the farmers.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. gentleman knows very well that last year the soldiers in training were allowed furlough to assist in gathering in the crops, and I hope the Government will do the same with the volunteers and the conscripts this year. According to the present indications we are going to have a very big crop, and it will be a great pity if it is allowed to stand in the field uncut for the want of labour. To-day our unemployed, men who do not want to be employed at almost any price, are asking $100 a month to go on the farms, and many of the farmers cannot pay that price. These men are asking for the wages they would receive in the munition plants, and why should the munition plants go into competition with the farmer? I think the country is in danger of losing a great harvest through the obstacles that are being placed in the way of what the hon. gentleman calls the conscripting of labour to the farmers. It is absolutely necessary that the farms should have labourers, and I should be willing to go as far as any one in this House in the direction of having a clause put in the Bill to the effect that the men who labour on the farm shall be exempted so long as they stay on the farms; for it is just as necessary to have good crops as it is to produce munitions. I trust the soldiers in training this year, both volunteers and conscripts, will be ordered to go on the farms. Last year if they did not go on the farms they did not get any money. That was surely conscripting them, and nobody kicked.

Mr. NESBITT: As a matter of fact, the soldiers were not forced to go on the farms last year by any means. We had to make a written application for a man and guarantee to keep him a certain time and pay him a certain amount of money. The soldiers got that money in addition to their military pay, and it is no wonder a lot of them went on farms. It is preposterous for my hon. friend to say that the soldiers were forced to go on the farms.

Mr. CURRIE: What I said was that if they took their furlough they were forced to go on the farms.

Mr. NESBITT: They were not forced to go on the farms if they took their furlough, for several of them worked in factories at Woodstock.

Mr. CURRIE: They were not entitled to do so.

Mr. NESBITT: That makes no difference; that is what they did. My hon. friend does not know everything about everything. I heard him say something else tonight which has no particular bearing on this clause. He said that in Canada they were making munitions cheaper than in England.

Mr. CURRIE: That is right.

Mr. NESBITT: You think that is right? How much will you bet that it is right? You are the first human being I have heard say so, anyway.

Mr. OLIVER: There has been a great deal of talk about assisting the farmer under this Bill. It was not the farmers who put in a protest in the fall of 1915 and the spring of 1916 against the voluntary enlistment of soldiers for overseas service: it was the heads of the munition plants. We have had evidence of that in this House within the last two days. Mr. McDougall of the Steel Company, Mr. Harmer of the Sawyer-Massey Company of Hamilton, and many others plagued the life out of the ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) —so he said in the House the other day. The Minister of Finance said only two days ago:

> During the fall of 1915 and the early part of 1916, it was brought to the attention of the Government—I should say to the attention of nearly all the members of the Government—that in certain districts in which recruiting had been brisk, vital industries such as coal mining, iron and steel, agriculture, and the munitions industry, were suffering by reason of the fact that the recruiting was not in any degree selective.

I will guarantee that it was not the representatives of agriculture but of these other industries who made the protests. It was "big business" in Canada that protested against voluntary enlistment in the fall of 1915 and in 1916, and as the result of their protests voluntary enlistment slackened, fell off, became insufficient.

An hon. MEMBER: When?

Mr. OLIVER: Ever since.

An hon. MEMBER: At what date did it start?

Mr. OLIVER: Some time in June, 1916; and it has continued ever since. Now we have this conscription Bill brought in. The Prime Minister tells us it is exactly the same principle, so far as compulsion is concerned, as the Militia Act, but it has the selective principle instead of the balloting principle, so far as compulsion is concerned. We find that under these selective provisions every argument which has been brought up in this House since the Bill came into Committee confirms the idea that the Bill is essentially selective, and selective in the interests of the same men who demanded selective voluntary enlistment early in 1916, and who now demand selective compulsory enlistment. As I said before, I have no objection to that if it is right and proper; if it is necessary; if it is honestly brought before the attention of Parliament and the country in a Bill framed for the purpose. But what I do protest against is that it shall be smuggled through Parliament under the pretense of a Bill for the purpose of supporting the honour of Canada on the battle line. First things first. If we are to win the war, it must be won by fighting men; and if we are to increase our power on the battle front, let us come before the country honestly and say so, and make provisions for that purpose. Having done that, if it is necessary to take care of industrial conditions in the country by compulsory service, let us make satisfactory preparations for that. But on such a question as this, where the lives of 100,000 men are involved, and where the honour of Canada is involved, let us not attempt to smuggle legislation through Parliament under false pretenses.

Mr. McKENZIE: It appears to me that it would be well for the Government and its friends to get together and try to agree as to the necessities of the country with respect to this Bill. So far as I am concerned, I do not know that I have any great right to criticise the Bill. If I had been here I would have voted against it. But, while it is going through committee, I suppose I have the right to say something in regard to it as a member of the House. I hold in my hand a letter over the signature of a very close friend of the Government who, as I am informed, is in charge of the coming campaign for the Conservative party in the province of Nova Scotia. This gentleman is very close to the Prime Minister, and to the Solicitor General, and I think it is only right that the House should have the benefit of the information he says he possesses. The letter I refer to is signed by no less a person than the Hon. Charles E. Tanner, I believe a present senator. We knew him in former years in the local legislature as the honoured leader of the Conservative Opposition. This letter is dated Ottawa, May 16, 1917, and it is addressed as broadly, and in fact more broadly, than the epistle of Paul to the Romans. It is addressed: "To the Members of the Provincial Conservative Association," so its very wide scope must necessarily be based upon some truth, as far as truth is possible in that body. There is a paragraph in this letter which would seem to indicate that we, the Liberals, were down on the theory of voluntary enlistment, and that we were saying this Bill was not necessary. He says:

> The conditions in regard to recruiting are not fairly stated by Opposition critics.
> Up to the 15th March, 444,745 men who were residents of Canada had joined the Allies' colours. At the beginning of 1917 we were over the 400,000 mark. Is it reasonable to expect that after raising an army so great in proportion to our population we could maintain the high average of the first two years and a half? We must give the country fair play as well as the Government, in this regard. We are making steady progress. Since the present year opened, we have averaged an enlistment of 7,000 men each month. For the four months ending April 30th, the exact total is 28,045 men; not too bad, following up a contribution of upwards of 400,000 men.
> You will observe the Government's critics abstain from referring to these facts. Nor do they mention the other pertinent fact, that the increased call for men for the farms, munition plants and mines intensifies the difficulties of recruiting agents.

Before Mr. Tanner sent this to the association, I have no doubt he consulted his friends in the Government. My knowledge of Mr. Tanner for over twenty-five years is that he is a very careful and truthful man. If his testimony is to be accepted, they were getting recruits at the rate of 7,000 a month, which would mean we would have the full complement called for by this Act within a year. I would seriously call the attention of the Solicitor General to the statement of his friend, advocate, and representative, in the great province of Nova Scotia, in writing to people saying that matters were going along splendidly, and that we were getting 7,000 men a month and in a short time we would likely have all the men we required. Now, what is all this fuss and all this trouble about if Mr. Tanner, whose name is signed to this letter, is giving the facts and I have no doubt he is.

An hon. MEMBER: What is the date of that letter?

Mr. McKENZIE: May 16, 1917. This was a long time after the Premier came back from England, and after they were in possession of all the inside information he could impart to a friend. I think it is only proper that the people of the country, as well as the members of the Provincial Conservative Association, should know what is the true inwardness of this.

Mr. GRAHAM: Subsection (c) of section 11 reads:

> That it is expedient in the national interest that, instead of being employed in military service, he should continue to be educated or trained for any work for which he is then being educated or trained.

I suppose that refers to students or apprentices. Could the Solicitor General give us a concrete case to which this section would apply?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think it is my duty to refrain from giving concrete cases. Any statement on my part would be an attempt to dictate to the tribunals.

Mr. GRAHAM: Could the hon. gentleman imagine a case then?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I could imagine a case very readily, and I am quite sure that those who inserted the same provision in the British Act knew that there would be practical applications of it or they would not have inserted it. The provision in the British Act is the very same as ours. I would in general terms say that if a man belongs to a class called out, and if he shows that at that time he is approaching the termination of a certain educational period, the results of which would be lost if he came just at that time, but that if he deferred for a week or two, or a month or two, that condition would be over and consequently he would be enabled to render better service to the state—that would be a class of cases that would come under that provision. I do not say that there would not be other classes. We had the advantage of the presence of Major Murray, who had to do with the working out of the several exemption provisions of the British Act, and we got no recommendation that this clause should be left out. We got many which we thought were useful and which we availed ourselves of. The working out of the British Act did not indicate that there was any danger in putting that clause in, but, on the contrary, indicated that it would be useful.

Mr. NESBITT: Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say, with reference to this clause (c), that he is going to take into consideration some of the suggestions that have been made?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, I have a note of practically all the suggestions that were made.

Mr. NESBITT: The hon. gentleman will consider them?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, they will be given very careful consideration and the decisions will be communicated to the committee, and if thought fit a motion can be made to return to the clause.

Mr. OLIVER: In regard to paragraph (c), I think the Solicitor General might have given the committee the reasons that appeal to his mind for the insertion of this provision. It hardly seems enough to say that it appeared in the British Act. There has been a large enlistment under the voluntary system from our institutions of higher education. I do not know how many hundreds, if not thousands, of young men who were taking courses in the colleges and high schools have volunteered and have formed a very valuable part of the army at the front. It seems rather strange that, that condition having existed in this country, we should make special provision for the exemption of that particular class of men.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman must remember that any exemption granted under this clause must of necessity be a conditional exemption. No absolute exemption can be given to any man under that clause. A reference to sub-paragraph (b) of subclause 2 makes that clear. It is manifestly made to cover the necessity for temporary exemption for the purpose of enabling a man to complete a process of education that is near completion at the time of the call to report for duty. I should think that would constitute the great majority of cases that would come legitimately under that clause. For example, a man might be within a week of the termination of his examination for a profession. No one would contend that it would be in the national interest that that man should report for duty until that work was done. Unless such a clause as that is in, I do not think the tribunal would be empowered to permit a man to wait until the termination of the week and then report for duty.

Mr. OLIVER: I am quite satisfied with the propriety of the action suggested by my hon. friend, but there is another side to it. While he says it is the intention that this provision shall apply in such cases as he has mentioned, the clause does not say so and it would be quite possible under this section for one who was of military age to secure exemption by simply entering one of those educational institutions.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not to secure it, because unless there was a special case an appeal would immediately overrule any tribunal which would give a man exemption just because he had entered an educational institution.

Mr. OLIVER: That may be so, but this circumstance might arise. If it does not mean what it says, that is different. That is what it says and I would, of course, assume that it meant what it said.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman leaves out the first phrase of the subsection "that it is expedient in the national interest." It does not make it expedient in the national interest to exempt a man who enters an institution to avoid military service. It is for the tribunal to determine whether it is or not and if the tribunal determines wrongly it will be corrected.

Mr. OLIVER: I want to say a word in regard to this matter of appeals. My hon. friend and I have discussed the merits of the case relating to the judgment of these tribunals and I shall not continue the discussion. When a decision has been rendered by the tribunal, if that decision is against the national interest, then the question can only be raised by the Government itself. It is under the authority and initiative of the Minister of Militia that an appeal is taken in case a decision is supposed to be adverse to the country. Beyond any question, that leaves the matter absolutely in the hands of the Government to force an appeal, or not to force an appeal, as they please, and it leaves the matter in this shape, carrying out the suggestion of my hon. friend from Montreal, St. James (Mr. Lapointe)—given judges who are favourable to wide exemptions, and given the sympathy of the Government in the matter, the Act becomes a dead letter in so far as particular sections of the country are concerned. When I spoke strongly earlier in the day in regard to the propriety of demanding a certain quota of men according to population from different sections of the country, I did it because if that provision were inserted this contingency of which I spoke could not arise, but that provision not being inserted that contingency can arise, and I am bound to believe that it is with the view of acting on that contingency that the elementary provision requiring a quota is not included in the Bill.

On paragraph (c) subsection 5, section 11:

Notwithstanding anything in this section contained, the Governor in Council may by regulations abolish any local tribunal, and transfer its duties and powers to any other local tribunal.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What is the purpose of this last subsection?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was thought that as the work proceeded it might be found that there were too many local tribunals, and that in that event provision should be made for consolidating tribunals. This is the provision. The powers of any tribunal may be transferred to another, and then the other takes the place of the first one, and may carry on anything that the first one has had under review.

Sir HERBERT AMES: Is there any stipulation making it obligatory upon a man to appeal to a certain tribunal? Must he appeal where his residence is? What would prevent a man, if he should feel that one local tribunal was easier to pass than another, from going into the other district and appearing before the local tribunal where he thought his chances of securing exemption were best?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is nothing to prevent him. A man may make his selection in his own province. If it is good enough for him, it is good enough for the department. But having made his choice, he must abide by it.

Sir HERBERT AMES: Is it not likely to become something like the divorce law in the United States, where men go to the state where it is most easy to obtain a divorce, Nevada, for instance?

Mr. MEIGHEN: If a man gets a divorce in Nevada, there is no appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, but here we have a system of appeals. With the other plan the danger would be that we would have a great many questions of domicile.

Subsection agreed to.

On subsection 7, section 11:

When a certificate is lost, destroyed or defaced, the tribunal by whom it was granted shall, upon the application of the man to whom it was granted and upon payment of a fee of fifty cents, issue to him a duplicate of such certificate.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What is the purpose of levying a fee of fifty cents?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is a precaution against the certificate being too lightly lost. We had to take a more exacting precaution than this in connection with the exodus regulations.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Who gets the fee?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is the intention that it shall go to the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada. I think under the law it does not become the property of the tribunal unless it is made its property.

On subsection 2, section 12:

(2) All proclamations and regulations shall be published forthwith in the Canada Gazette and in such other manner, if any, as the Governor in Council may think necessary to ensure knowledge thereof by all persons concerned, and shall forthwith be laid before Parliament if then in session, and if not in session within ten days after the next meeting thereof.

Mr. PARDEE: I think the proclamations should be published once in a newspaper in each county town where the boards are to sit. The Canada Gazette is not widely circulated, and comparatively few people ever get it.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is not important.

Mr. PARDEE: I think it is important enough to let the people know what is being done.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I agree that the Gazette publication really gives little or no publicity. It simply enables the newspapers to get it. The most of the proclamations are important, and they should be published in local newspapers. It may be necessary to utilize the poster system or billboards, but as to the publication of newspapers, there can be no question. The only reason that section was inserted as it is was that some minor regulations and changes might have to be made, and it would not be wise to insist on the publication because it might involve too much expense. The House may take the assurance that an important proclamation will receive wide newspaper publicity.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Will the peace officer appointed under this section be under military control?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, this is a civilian Bill, under a civilian minister, and the Governor in Council appoints the peace officer and other officers to carry out the provisions of the Act. They will be in no sense military officers. They are peace officers.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I observe that in this section there is provision to remunerate the registrars. Paragraph (a) reads:

Define the duties of registrars and fix their remuneration.

And subsection (f) says:

Make provision for expenses and the remuneration of officers.

I assume, therefore, that the members of the tribunal will not be remunerated.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The intention is that they shall not be remunerated.

Mr. OLIVER: Subsection 3 reads:

All regulations shall have the same force and effect as if they formed part of this Act.

The Solicitor General said that the tribunal should be granted, in some measure, by memoranda or letters of direction. Would those directions be a part of this Act under that section?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think that the circular, as it is called, relating to constitution, functions and procedure of local tribunals, published in Great Britain, should be called regulations. Although they constitute general indications to the tribunals looking to uniformity, it would be impossible, and it would be barbarous drafting, to insert such provisions as are in this circular in the Act. Consequently, I am not quite certain whether it was intended that this should be among the regulations which, under the Act, should form a part of it or not. I am informed they are not part of it. But such as are regulations have the force of law. They must be consistent with this Act, and they must look to the carrying out of this Act and nothing but this Act.

Mr. OLIVER: It is not contemplated that such directions, or such a circular, addressed to the tribunals in operation under this Bill, will be a part of the Act?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, not directions of the nature of those I hold in my hand.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I call attention to paragraph (c), subsection 11, section 12, which reads as follows:

(c) Prescribe the conditions as to time or otherwise under which applications for certificates may be made, deferred applications received, appeals entered and heard and rehearings had, and prescribe forms.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Section 10, subsection 3, paragraph (b), reads:

(b) The Governor in Council, on the recommendation of the Central Appeal Judge may make regulations governing the right to and fixing the conditions of appeal from an appeal tribunal to the Central Appeal Judge, provided any person authorized by the Minister of Militia and Defence may as of right enter and prosecute such appeal.

We have here two powers to make the same regulations. Under paragraph (c) of section 12, the Governor in Council is authorized to make regulations concerning appeals and re-hearings, and under section 10, subsection 3, paragraph (b), the Governor in Council, on the recommendation of the appeal judge, may make regulations governing the right to appeal, and fixing the conditions of appeal. It seems to me there is a clashing, or a tautology.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The intention is that under section 12, the Governor in Council may make regulations, as to time or otherwise, under which deferred applications may be received and appeals entered, and it is not provided that it shall be on the recommendation of the central appeal judge. That refers to the conditions under which appeals may be entered, and nothing more. On the other hand, section 10, subsection 3, paragraph (b) provides that the Governor in Council may make regulations, on the recommendation of the central appeal judge, fixing the conditions of appeal from an appeal tribunal. That is not in regard to the entering of an appeal, which is dealt with in paragraph (c), of section 12.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Would it not cause confusion, and would it not be better to have one provision?

Mr. MEIGHEN: This matter was drawn to my attention yesterday by the right hon. gentleman, and I am disposed to think it might be well to take a portion of paragraph (c) of section 12, and insert it under paragraph (b), subsection 3, clause 10. I suggest that we defer consideration of this portion of section 12.

Subsection stands.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

PRIVATE BILLS.

FIRST READING OF SENATE BILL.

Bill No. 109, for the relief of John Newton Salter.—Mr. Northrup.

UNOPPOSED MOTION FOR PAPERS.

Mr. KYTE:

For a copy of all correspondence and other documents relating to the granting to beam trawlers registered in the United States the privilege of using ports in the province of Nova Scotia for the purchasing of supplies, the shipping of men, etc., without license therefor as required under the modus vivendi.

SOUTHERN SASKATCHEWAN COAL FIELDS STRIKE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. G. TURRIFF (Assiniboia): Has the Minister of Labour any information to give the House in regard to the report of a strike in the coal fields near Estevan in southern Saskatchewan? I understand the men are striking in order to secure the same terms as have been given to the coal miners in Alberta.

Hon. T. W. CROTHERS: I have had no direct information, but I heard indirectly from Winnipeg, as I was asked whether the jurisdiction of Mr. Armstrong, recently appointed director of coal operations in District 18, extended to that region in Saskatchewan. I replied, of course, that it did not. I was told that some prominent gentlemen in Winnipeg were endeavouring to adjust the difficulties.

Mr. TURRIFF: Can the minister give any reason why the coal mines in Saskatchewan should not be under the jurisdiction of Mr. Armstrong, or whoever may be appointed by the Government, as well as the others?

Mr. CROTHERS: At the time when the director was appointed a few days ago, there was no intimation of any difficulty elsewhere than at District 18. If necessary, we may extend his jurisdiction to take in these other mines, but thus far that matter has not been considered.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT, 1917.

CONSIDERATION OF THE BILL IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE HOUSE.

House in committee on Bill No. 75, respecting Military Service.—Sir Robert Borden (resumed from Tuesday, July 10).

Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

On section 13—general provisions:

13. (1) The Militia Act, the Army Act and the King's Regulations and Orders for the Army shall so far as applicable and not inconsistent therewith apply to and form part of this Act.

(2) Section twelve and subsection two of section forty and the proviso to section forty-five of the Militia Act shall not apply to men liable to be called out under this Act.

(3) The Minister of Militia and Defence may transfer to the Naval Service any man who has reported for duty under the provisions of this Act.

(4) Unless further authorized by Parliament the reinforcements provided under this Act shall not exceed one hundred thousand men.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Do I understand that any transfers to the Naval Service of men enlisted under the provisions of this Bill would come within the number to be conscripted under this measure, that is, the 100,000?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. MARCIL: Is a conscript transferred of his own accord, or may he be sent without his consent?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Such transfer would be of the same nature as transfers to the artillery service or to the air service; that is to say, the man could not finally determine whether he went or whether he would not. His wishes, however, would be considered to the utmost extent possible.

Mr. MARCIL: He might be sent against his will.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He might finally.

Mr. MARCIL: Are there any exemptions in regard to persons called upon to act upon these local tribunals?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The measure makes no provision for such exemptions, and I cannot see the need of such a provision in view of the authorities who appoint the tribunals. They will take care that those who should be exempted are exempted.

Mr. MARCIL: In the Militia Act members of the Privy Council, members of the Senate, and so on, are exempted, so I thought the same provision might apply here.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think there will be any great rush to appoint members of the Privy Council to these tribunals, and I do not think there is any need of exemptions. The exemptions in the Militia Act are in regard to military service, and we have practically the same exemptions here. At all events, we have the exemptions which appear in the schedule.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Will my hon. friend tell me the meaning of subsection 2, which reads:

> Section 12 and subsection 2 of section 40 and the proviso to section 45 of the Militia Act shall not apply to men liable to be called out under this Act.

I have not the Militia Act here. Will my hon. friend read section 12?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Section 12 of the Militia Act reads:

> Half-pay and retired officers of the regular forces shall not be required to serve in the militia in a lower grade than that of their rank in such forces.

That is rather negatived by this section.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It does not apply?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It does not apply. That is to say, the men cannot insist on their right. The second clause is:

> No person shall be entitled to exemption unless he has, at least one month before he claims such exemption, filed with the commanding officer within the limits whereof he resides, his affidavit made before some justice of the peace, of the facts on which he rests his claim.

I really do not think that would apply anyway, as it is inconsistent with the Act, and when we were negativing we negatived the whole section. Subsection 2 of section 40 is:

> No officer shall be bound to serve in the militia in a lower grade than that of the rank with which he has been retired.

That is negatived also. The proviso in section 45 is—and I will read the whole section so that the meaning of the proviso will be apparent:

> The Governor in Council may make regulations, applying to officers and others, belonging to His Majesty's regular forces, and to officers of any military force of any part of His Majesty's dominions, when serving in Canada, and to officers of the militia, as to the persons to be invested as officers or otherwise with command over the militia or any part thereof, or any person belonging thereto, and as to the mode in which such command is to be exercised: Provided that command shall not be given to any person over a person superior in rank to himself.

Wherever section 45 is applicable and consequently is included in the new Act it is only applicable without the proviso. The proviso is negatived.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Why is the proviso negatived?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Because it is inconsistent with the spirit of the Militia Act, which says the militia authorities shall have full control over rank, etc. In fact, every one is brought down to the same level at the moment the Act applies to him.

Mr. MARCIL: Regarding the position of the conscript soldier once he is enlisted does he rank in every respect on the same footing as the volunteer, as regards promotion, pension in case of disability, pay and so on? Are they both treated on the same footing?

Mr. MEIGHEN: As the law stands here, there is nothing to put him on any different footing.

Mr. OLIVER: Might I ask the reason why the provision of subsection 4 contains the words: "The reinforcements provided under this Act shall not exceed 100,000 men."

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is so that Parliament will be apprised of the entire scope and destiny of the Act. It was thought well that Parliament should understand from the beginning just what was the limit that might be reached under the Act it was asked to pass.

Mr. OLIVER: Is it to be understood that when these 100,000 men are raised Canada's military obligations in connection with the war have ceased?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, no. I do not think there is any ground for that understanding. Canada will still be in the war, and very much in the war—in fact, more in the war than ever, when the 100,000 men are raised. It will be for Parliament thereafter to decide whether or not the Act should be amended.

Mr. MARCIL: Has any thought been given to the transferring into the Canadian service of Canadians who are in the Imperial service? I saw in the paper yesterday that a large number of Canadians had enlisted in New York for service with the Imperial troops. Has any attention been given to the idea of having all Canadians serve with the Canadian corps, instead of having them dispersed through the British regiments.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You mean, in France?

Mr. MARCIL: No, in England. There are a large number of Canadians enlisted with British regiments, and I wanted to know whether the idea of transferring all Canadians to the Canadian corps had been considered, and whether the same thing would not be done in the United States. A day or so ago one of the Ottawa papers published a picture, showing Canadians enlisting in New York for service with the British troops.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: As I understand it, the hon. gentleman raises two questions, first in respect to the enlistment of British subjects and Canadians in the United States, and second as to those already enlisted in the British army being transferred to the Canadian forces. In regard to the latter question, the matter has not had any consideration so far as I know. In connection with recruiting in the United States, when a man desires to enlist, he chooses whether he wants to go into the British army or into the Canadian army. So far, I think, most of the recruits have chosen to go with the Canadian forces. I am not informed as to the exact numbers, but the men can choose which force they will go into.

Mr. MARCIL: What about transferring Canadians now enlisted from the English regiments to the Canadian corps?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I said that matter had not been considered. What my hon. friend desires to know is whether any action has been taken to transfer the Canadians now in England or in France serving in the British army to the Canadian corps. So far as I know, the matter has not had any consideration.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: So far as I am aware there are not very many Canadians serving as privates in the British army. They are principally officers—men who went overseas very early in the war. In a good many instances they were offered commissions in the British army, and accepted them.

Mr. MARCIL: Perhaps it would be in the interests of the service to have these men put together, with the Canadian corps.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There has already been more or less difficulty about surplus of officers. I do not think it would be of any advantage to recall those officers from the British army.

Mr. OLIVER: I asked the question in regard to the further effect of this subsection in connection with our obligation under the Act, and the reason for fixing the number at 100,000 men, because I recall my hon. friend from North Grey (Mr. Middlebro), speaking on the second reading of the Bill, very emphatically announced that this Bill was for the purpose of raising 100,000 men, and when the 100,000 men were raised the Bill was dead.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: I said, without further legislation.

Mr. OLIVER: Exactly. The Bill was dead. Further legislation would be necessary in order to do anything more in connection with Canada's part in the war. I just wanted to ask further what relationship this Bill in its terms under this subsection bears to the pledge given by the Prime Minister on behalf of Canada as to the part Canada would take in the war. Is it supposed to have a connection with that pledge or to be entirely independent of it?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The purpose of this section is to reserve the control in Parliament as to compulsory military service beyond the number stated in the Bill. We thought it proper that Parliament should have the control.

I had mentioned the number, 50,000 at least, possibly 100,000, when speaking on the subject on the 18th May. The Bill, therefore, limits the number to be raised under its provisions to 100,000. If a further number is required then a very short Bill would be necessary simply to increase the number from 100,000 to such further number as Parliament, in its wisdom, might determine. The Bill has no relation to the supposed pledge which my hon. friend has quoted beyond the fact that it is to provide a certain additional number of men for the purpose of maintaining the Canadian Expeditionary forces at the front. When my hon. friend speaks of a pledge I assume he means the authorization which was given in January, 1916, by which the authorized Canadian forces were increased to 500,000 men.

Mr. OLIVER: That was my allusion. I am somewhat surprised at the Prime Minister speaking of a supposed pledge, or raising any question as to there being a pledge when, if I recall correctly his remarks on introducing the Bill, he himself spoke of that announcement, or authorization, as a pledge on behalf of Canada.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend is not quite accurate. I said that it was not in form made as a pledge, but as the authorization, in the form in which it was given, had been regarded or treated as a pledge in some quarters, in so far as I was concerned, I was content so to regard it.

Mr. OLIVER: Hear, hear. That bears out exactly what I said, that the Prime Minister did, in his address to the House on the introduction of the Bill, allude to his authorization of January 1, 1916, as a pledge.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I alluded to it, but in the way I have stated.

Mr. OLIVER: Yes, in that way as a pledge and as a pledge on behalf of Canada. I desire to draw attention to the fact that notwithstanding that pledge, in which I am bound to say the honour of Canada is involved, this Bill specifically does not provide for its being fulfilled according to my calculation. We have had statements made that we have had enlistments in Canada for overseas service of 418,000 men. If we count 418,000 men as having voluntarily enlisted, and if we add 100,000 conscripts to that, we will have over 500,000. But I want to draw the attention of the House to the fact that when we claim credit for having enlisted 418,000 men, we are claiming credit under false pretenses, because we claim to have enlisted these men for overseas service. When the men did not go overseas and are not continued in service, we are not entitled to credit ourselves with having fulfilled our promise to that extent. The other day the hon. Minister of Militia (Sir Edward Kemp), for the first time since this matter has been under consideration, favoured the House with a statement as to how many men had actually gone overseas, or were available in Canada to go overseas, and how many we had enlisted who had not gone overseas and were not going overseas. He went into very considerable detail in the figures, so that there is no matter of argument about it. As for the total, it amounted to a little over 75,000 men altogether who were enlisted but who did not go overseas and who are not going overseas. Therefore I may claim that in any future calculations we make 75,000 men should be deducted from our nominal enlistment so as to give us the actual enlistment we have made. If we deduct 75,000, men from 418,000 we will have the actual effective enlistment and if then we add 100,000 to be raised by conscription under this Bill we are still short a little over 50,000 of the pledge made on the first of January, 1916.

I do not wish to emphasize too strongly the position; it is beyond argument in this connection. I do not think it is creditable that we should make a pledge and then fail to fulfil it. Neither do I think it is wise or creditable that we should claim to have done something that we most emphatically have not done. In connection with these men who have been enlisted and who have not gone overseas, it was a noticeable fact that with respect to the 75,000 after the Minister of Militia had gone into detail as to what had become of 64,000 there were 10,000 or 11,000 that he could not account for but whom he had absolutely lost off his map. Under these circumstances surely we are not entitled to claim credit for enlistment up to the amount we have been persistently claiming before the country. I must accept this Bill as an absolute indication of the position taken by the Government that the pledge made by, or on behalf of, the people of Canada on the first of January, 1916, is not fulfilled and is not intended to be fulfilled.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The hon. gentleman is, of course, quite ready to accept anything that is in his own mind and no one can complain of that. It is a matter for himself. As far as this Bill is concerned, it is not anticipated that more than 100,000 will be raised under its provisions before Parliament will meet again. Therefore, it is desirable to reserve control to Parliament at its next sitting.

Mr. OLIVER: May I ask the hon. Solicitor General how long it is expected it will take under the operations of this Bill to raise 100,000 men?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is hoped that we will do it before next session is very far advanced.

Mr. OLIVER: About what month of the year is that likely to be?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have not given very specific consideration to the point yet. I am more anxious to secure the passage of the Bill and get it immediately into operation. The longer we delay here, of course, the longer we will be in getting the men.

Mr. OLIVER: There is no doubt about that and if my hon. friend will permit I will quote him a little story that I read one day of an Irishman who missed a train. They said: "Pat, you did not run fast enough." He said, "Bedad, I did, but I did not start soon enough." If my hon. friend is anxious about the passage of this Bill, I can only say that if he had started sooner he would have been through sooner. May I ask if the Government had taken into consideration the number of classes that are likely to be called out under this Bill and what classes they are likely to be?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is utterly impossible to determine how many classes will be required. We will call out whatever are necessary. We will know that as soon as we get the Act into operation, and of course the sooner it is in operation the sooner we will know it.

Mr. OLIVER: Did the minister say that only the first class would be called?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh no; all will be called that are necessary to get the 100,000. We do not know how many will be called, and we cannot tell until the Act is in operation. We will be able to form a fairly accurate idea as soon as the results of the first call are known.

Mr. OLIVER: Since the minister has raised the question of delay in the passing of this Bill and getting it into operation, may I suggest that if he had included in the provisions of the Bill or in a preliminary Bill a provision for registration, he would have saved a great deal of time in getting the full effect of the measure, because, if I understand him aright, he intends to make a call, say for class number one, and if that class does not yield enough men, he will call number two, and so on. We have no assurance how many classes will have to be called before the required number of men are secured. I submit that even yet it would be the part of wisdom, if that is the method in which the Government intends to proceed, to incorporate a provision in the Bill for a registration of the man-power of the country and to have that done without delay.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Registration would get us one result and one only. It would get us the names and ages of the various men in the country; it would get us the numbers in the different classes. But we would not be any further ahead because we should not know how many of these would, under the operation of fair principles of selection, be available for military service; we should have to go through the whole process of selection. In other words, we should have to apply all the provisions of the Bill first to registration and then to enrolment. So far as I can see, it would duplicate the work and the length of time, and secure no better result.

Mr. OLIVER: The Prime Minister was good enough to say on the second reading of the Bill that the Government would be glad to receive suggestions from members of the Opposition. It was not possible to make suggestions at that time, but now that the Bill is in committee I have taken the liberty of making several suggestions which do not seem to be well received, so I hope I have relieved myself of any responsibility laid on me in that connection. Has the minister reached any conclusion as to the approximate number of men who are likely to be finally enlisted from the different sections of the Dominion?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, there have been no calculations made for the reason that there is not sufficient data on which to make them.

Mr. OLIVER: One of my hon. friend's colleagues was good enough to offer the House certain suggestions in regard to the number of men who would be required from the different sections of the country; and I may say that, he being the most recent acquisition to the Cabinet, and therefore most closely in touch with both the people and the Government's policy, his statements have been given very wide acceptance throughout the country. Perhaps the Solicitor General will pardon me if I make a somewhat definite inquiry as to what foundation there was for the suggestions made by the hon. minister in regard to the levy of men from the different parts of the country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister to whom I think my hon. friend refers is not in the House. Perhaps we might proceed with the Bill and take that up later.

Mr. OLIVER: I am not interested so much in what that hon. gentleman has to say; he has already made his statement. What I am anxious to learn is what foundation there was for his statement. Has the hon. member who has drawn the Bill and is conducting it through the House any knowledge on the subject, and if so would he impart it to the House?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have no intimation from the minister concerned as to what he said or his foundation for it.

Mr. OLIVER: What he said was that the burden of raising 100,000 men might be divided in this way: 25,000 from Ontario, 25,000 from Quebec, 5,000 from New Brunswick, 5,000 from Nova Scotia, 2,500 from Prince Edward Island, 10,000 from Manitoba, 10,000 from Alberta, 10,000 from Saskatchewan, and 10,000 from British Columbia. He went on to explain that the raising of 25,000 men from Quebec, from which province he comes, would not be a serious burden on that province. He went into a great deal of detail in the matter and evidently made his statement for a very definite purpose. I am anxious to know if the minister in charge of the Bill has any knowledge on this question which he will impart to the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I have not. From the statement of the words of the minister in question given by the hon. member for Edmonton, it would appear very clear that the minister did not pretend to have any knowledge either. It would appear that the minister was using a specific result that might be possible, in order to indicate what the burden of the Bill would be. He did not say that he had any reason to know what the result would be. He had to take some result apparently, to give a specific argument, and according to my hon. friend he simply used the word "might." I presume the word "might" might be used as to anything.

Mr. OLIVER: The minister will pardon me for being somewhat pointed in this matter—

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not observe that myself.

Mr. OLIVER: —because it is a matter of very serious interest in various parts of the Dominion. We do want to know on what terms and principles this Bill is to be administered and what consideration is to be given to the sacrifices already made. For that reason we insist that if it was intended by the Government that the Bill should be fairly administered with regard to the conditions of the country, with regard to the need for men in the fighting line, and with regard to the services already rendered, provision would have been made in the Bill requiring a certain number of men for the firing line out of a certain proportion of population; and when the Bill does not contain that provision—and the hon. minister says the Government will not insert such a provision—I am compelled to come to the conclusion that the reason for that most extraordinary action in this case is because it is not intended that the Bill shall be administered fairly as between section and section of this country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I suggest in that connection that the hon. member might move as an amendment a division among the provinces in such a way as he sees fit, in order that we may have something specific for the consideration of Parliament.

Mr. OLIVER: I have said and repeated and repeated—

Mr. MEIGHEN: You have not moved though.

Mr. OLIVER: No, it is not my business to move. It is my business to suggest, and I have the promise of the Prime Minister that any suggestions I make will be considered. I have made specific propositions and will be glad to have an answer. I made propositions five minutes ago. I said: take the population of the Dominion of military age, deduct the men who have gone into the fighting line, and apportion the requirements according to that population.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Province by province.

Mr. OLIVER: Yes, province by province, most undoubtedly. If the Government is not able, or does not dare to do that, then the Government is proposing to do exactly what I have accused them of doing, namely, undertaking to place an undue share of the burden of this war on those parts of the country which have, in the past, been most willing to bear it. The only reason for a conscription Bill is that the unwilling shall be made to bear their share of the burden. Those who have been willing in the past are still willing to bear the greater share of the burden in the future; we have no need of a conscription Bill for them. It can be done by voluntary enlistment. I say the minister has admitted that the Government does not intend to give the people of this country a square deal under this Bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have not said that.

Mr. OLIVER: What has the hon. gentleman said?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have simply stated that this Bill endeavours to seek out the slacker, not in one or two provinces, but in all provinces, wherever he may be, and not allow him to escape because someone else in his province, who could have done better service at home, was patriotic enough to go—that the slacker nowhere shall escape on that ground, but that wherever he is, in Alberta, Nova Scotia, Ontario or Quebec, he shall be sought out under this Bill and sent. I hope the hon. gentleman will not accuse me of discourtesy, if I do not answer for the eleventh time, the argument he repeats this afternoon.

Mr. OLIVER: The minister has asked me a specific question, as to how I would apportion the draft under this Bill. I have answered him directly. Will he answer me this question: does he say that it is the intention of this Bill to make the levy according to the principles I suggested?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman refers to the principles. The principle upon which this Bill intends to make the levy is according to the proportion of available men in each district and in each province.

Mr. OLIVER: But the hon. gentleman will not make provision in the Bill that that should be done.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Such provisions are there now.

Mr. OLIVER: Then we will have to argue that point, as to whether the provisions are in the Bill now or not. There is no specific provision in the Bill that will require the section of the country that has not done its share in the war up to the present time, to do its share now. I am in the judgment of the House and the country—in the judgment of this House at all events—that I have certainly made suggestions to the Government as to the amendment to the Bill desired on that point. I have repeated it to such an extent that my hon. friend says he will not answer any further suggestions in regard to it. Therefore, I am bound to conclude that it is not the Government's policy to make this Bill one of conscription of equal service.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. OLIVER: Pardon me. I wish to argue now in regard to the provisions of the Bill, as to the assurance of equal service.

Mr. EDWARDS: Before the hon. gentleman leaves that point, will he tell me what section or sections of the Dominion have not done their share, in the hon. gentleman's opinion?

Mr. OLIVER: One of these sections, I might say, is the province of Ontario.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. EDWARDS: Is the hon. gentlemen naming the sections in the order in which they have fallen furthest short of doing their duty, when he names Ontario?

Mr. OLIVER: No.

Mr. EDWARDS: Are there any other sections, which, in the hon. gentleman's opinion, have done less than Ontario?

Mr. OLIVER: Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS: What are they? We will deal with them first.

Mr. OLIVER: I am not dealing with them at all.

Mr. EDWARDS: What section of the Dominion in the hon. gentleman's opinion has fallen furthest short of doing its share? That would be the one naturally to which the hon. gentleman would apply first.

Mr. OLIVER: I am not here for the purpose of gratifying the idle curiosity of the hon. gentleman from Frontenac. We are not here to take up time in that way. My hon. friend asked a question and I answered it properly, and he was not satisfied with the answer. I shall not keep on answering his questions all the time. We are here for serious business.

Sir SAM HUGHES: In justice to a great many men who have not gone to the front, and who are not slackers, I might take the liberty of suggesting that all who have not gone to the front should not be classed as slackers. I should like to see a battalion raised under this measure which would be able to march to the front and feel that it could not be said that they were slackers. Hundreds of thousands of these men have not gone to the front for want of some such action as this, to give them an opportunity to go.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not wish to be understood as finding any fault with the people who have not gone. I am only insisting that, when we undertake to make men go, we shall do so on fair principles. My hon. friend (Mr. Edwards) asked me a question in regard to people who had not done their duty. I have not all the figures available, but I have some figures which will, perhaps, interest him. I find, according to a statement placed before the House by the Government, that in the population of Ontario between the ages of 20 and 45, there are 371,291 Canadian-born. There is a population of British-born in the same province of 101,171 between the ages of 20 and 45. I understand that Ontario is said to have enlisted 168,000 men. I do not know how many of that 168,000 are included in the lost army of my hon. friend the Minister of Militia—the 75,000 he has lost—but taking it for granted that the enlistment is 168,000 from the province of Ontario, I think it will be agreed that, of the enlistment of Ontario, at least 50 per cent are from amongst the British-born.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. OLIVER: I think the casualty list will show that beyond any argument.

Mr. CURRIE: I might say that the controversy as to the proportion of enlistments among the British-born and the Canadian-born, which arose in the early days of the war, was not carried to sufficient length to suit the political object of a certain class of the community; that is to say it did not become a fight between the British-born and the Canadian-born of English descent, on the one hand, and the Canadian-born of French descent on the other. The attestation papers were made up at Valcartier in such a way that it was impossible to get the exact data on the question the hon. gentleman has mentioned. A man was asked his Christian name and surname and so forth, and then he was asked his nationality.

Even the commanding officers were sometimes in doubt as to the designation of a man's nationality; they did not know whether a man who was Canadian-born should be put down as an Englishman, an Irishman, or a Scotchman. In the majority of cases the men gave the nationality of their fathers. I do not see that this point is one that should be emphasized, because the men are all desirous of serving Canada; it matters not whether they be English-born or Canadian-born. I myself know a number of cases where men of Canadian birth were put down as being Scotch, Irish or English. When the sergeant asks the man who comes before him what his nationality is, the man naturally says: my father is Irish; therefore I am Irish. The sergeant then, would put him down as Irish.

Mr. GRAHAM: That would be all right if he was Irish.

Mr. CURRIE: That is the way this information was obtained. I think that in this respect a mistake was made, because most of the men of the First Contingent were Canadians. I do not wish to take any credit from the British-born, because they did enlist in large numbers. After the controversy had been started as to whether the British-born were enlisting in greater numbers than the Canadian-born, almost every British-born man in the country rushed to the colours to justify the contention that the British-born were enlisting faster than the Canadian-born. The Canadians have done their duty; I think it ill-becomes any body to make reflections upon the Canadians for not enlisting, because they enlisted voluntarily and well.

Mr. OLIVER: This is not a question of reflections upon anybody. This is a question of how we are going to apply this conscription Bill; whether it shall be fair or not fair. As I have figured it, there are sections of the country where there has not been that response in the matter of enlistment that there has been in other sections.

[Mr. Currie.]

Mr. CURRIE: Suppose there were two towns, one on each side of the Ottawa river, each containing 500 people; and suppose that in each town there were 100 men of military age of a certain class. From one of the towns 50 men have gone, and from the other none. When this law is applied, the 50 in the one town will have to go, and the 100 in the other. It is not practicable to apply a percentage system; the proper way is to take all the men of the class called out. The hon. gentleman does not seem to have studied the Bill; otherwise he would have known that that is the way the Bill works out. When a class is called out, every man in that class in any given section of the community has to go. All men except those who are exempted have to serve; nobody can escape. A village in Quebec has 100 men of military age of a certain class; a village in Ontario has only 10 men left of that class. The 100 will have to go from the village in Quebec, and the 10 from the village in Ontario. That is the way the Bill works out. I do not see any objection to that.

Mr. OLIVER: If that was the Bill, there would not be so much objection. The only trouble is that that is not the Bill.

Mr. CURRIE: That is the Bill.

Mr. OLIVER: Oh, no; it is not. The hon. gentleman himself, the Prime Minister, the Solicitor-General—all those who have spoken on the Bill—know that the Bill is not a Bill to find men for the firing line only. It is a Bill to find men for the firing line on the one hand, and for the industrial enterprises of friends of the Government on the other.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. gentleman is talking politics.

Mr. OLIVER: That is what my hon. friend himself said the other night.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. OLIVER: That is what the Bill is intended for; that is what its provisions contain, and that is why I am insistent upon knowing how this burden of military service is to be distributed.

Mr. MIDLEBRO: Will my hon. friend point to a single provision in the Bill which compels a man to work in a munition factory against his will?

Mr. OLIVER: No, but I can point to two provisions in the Bill which are put there especially for the purpose of providing for the exemption of men who are working in such industries, or are willing to do so. There is, therefore, no such condition as the member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) has suggested: that if there are so many men in one town and so many in another, all of the same class, they must all go. That is not what the Bill provides.

Mr. CURRIE: All who are included in the class called out are liable to service; of course, the exemptions come afterwards.

Mr. OLIVER: Precisely.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. gentleman was endeavouring to prove that there was an injustice even in respect of the calling out of the classes. He contended that only a certain percentage in various localities should be called out, and that the percentages could be adjusted to call for more or less according to the number from various sections that have already enlisted. But how can the calling out of the men be proceeded with otherwise than as provided in this Bill, in order that it may be justly and fairly done? If it were provided that a percentage of a given class should be called out in one locality and another percentage in another then we might well say that the Bill was unjust; but when every man of a given class is called out, surely it cannot be said that there is injustice. A village in Quebec with a population of 500 will give every available man of the class called; an Ontario village from which a number of men of the class called have gone to the war will give those who remain. I think that that is a fair proposition. I agree with my hon. friend that the Bill is a little lax in some of its clauses; perhaps the tribunals are allowed to let men off a little too freely—I think that there should be some check on those tribunals. But there is no use in wasting all the afternoon arguing about something that is in the Bill.

Mr. OLIVER: This is a very important matter. It is the most important piece of legislation, I suppose, that has come before the Parliament of Canada since Confederation, and it is desirable that we should understand thoroughly what its results are going to be. We are not quibbling about the percentage of a given class; what we want to know is whether the results will be fair and equitable. Unless the results are fair and equitable, the Bill will become an instrument of 4 p.m. tyranny and oppression, not a manifestation of the spirit of democracy or of a desire to win the war. If the Bill simply contained provisions intended to provide men for the firing line, certain restrictions would not be needed. But in view of the fact that subsections (a) and (b) of section 11 have been deliberately placed there for the specific purpose of exempting men from the firing line, how can my hon. friend or anybody else say that there is any assurance, under the provisions of the Bill, of equality in its administration?

Mr. CURRIE: I know of cases such as this: if the maker of a special tool in a factory were conscripted, a hundred men not of military age would be thrown out of employment. Why should there not be some arrangement whereby men of this kind should be exempted? There is no argument at all in favour of the hon. gentleman's contention, in which there is neither common sense nor justice. If the hon. gentleman would confine himself to objectionable clauses of the Bill, we would make much more progress.

Mr. OLIVER: I have stated my case as to the Bill having two purposes. Beyond any argument, it is a double-purpose Bill. That being the case, those of us who are subject to its provisions in respect of one of its purposes are insistent upon having knowledge as to how far its other purpose will be employed for the benefit of other people. The Solicitor General has rested his whole case on behalf of this Bill upon the contention that those who are charged with its administration will administer it fairly and according to its intent as stated to the Committee. He rests his whole dependence upon that and refuses absolutely, specifically and persistently to provide any safeguard of any kind whatever. Having rested his case absolutely on the good intent of himself, his colleagues and those who may through their instrumentality be appointed to administer this Bill, he will have to permit me to say that, since the beginning of this war on August 4, 1914, until this minute of this hour, there is nothing in the war administration of this Government to warrant the supposition that anything administered by it in regard to the war will be fairly administered. From the day war broke out, from the day when boot contracts and horse contracts were let, down to the disbanding of the battalions in England, down to the arming of our men with Ross rifles, and down to the introduction of this Bill, there is no instance in which my hon. friends can claim that Canada's military administration has been conducted fairly and with regard only to the winning of the war. It has been a double-barrelled administration, just as this Bill is a double-barrelled Bill. It has been one barrel for the war and the other barrel for politics, just as this Bill is one barrel for the fighting line and the other barrel for the munition plants.

Mr. CURRIE: Mr. Chairman, will you please read the section under discussion?

Mr. OLIVER: The section under discussion refers to the raising of 100,000 men.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Blain): Section 13, reads:

(1) The Militia Act, the Army Act and the King's Regulations and Orders for the Army shall so far as applicable and not inconsistent therewith apply to and form part of this Act.

(2) Section twelve and subsection two of section forty and the proviso to section forty-five of the Militia Act shall not apply to men liable to be called out under this Act.

(3) The Minister of Militia and Defence may transfer to the Naval Service any man who has reported for duty under the provisions of this Act.

(4) Unless further authorized by Parliament the reinforcements provided under this Act shall not exceed one hundred thousand men.

Mr. OLIVER: I am speaking in regard to the last subsection which refers to the raising of 100,000 men.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. OLIVER: I am asking for information in regard to the section re the raising of 100,000 men. That, I take it, is the critical section of the Bill. When the minister asks us to rest our dependence upon the administration by the tribunals and by the Government, I ask him: There being no registration of the man-power of the country, a call being made and that call not being responded to, what is the action of the Government? What responsibility do the Government purpose assuming, and how do they purpose exercising that responsibility?

Mr. MEIGHEN: In what case?

Mr. OLIVER: The issue of a call for, say, class No. 1 and the non-response of some members of that class in a certain locality. What measures are the Government going to take to ensure that all the members of that class in that locality respond?

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the hon. gentleman will look at subsection 4 of section 4 of the Bill, he will find that any man who does not report is guilty of absenting himself without leave and is liable to be tried by court-martial. There have been trials by court-martial before, and future trials by court-martial will be much the same as those that have taken place. Or, such a man is liable, on summary conviction, to imprisonment. There have been summary convictions before, and there have been imprisonments before. Those that will take place under this measure will be the same as those that have taken place during the last forty years.

Mr. OLIVER: John Smith is in class 1, and he does not respond to the call; he simply stays at home. What happens?

Mr. MEIGHEN: John Smith is guilty then of absenting himself without leave, and he is liable to have court-martial applied to him, the same as courts-martial have been applied time and again in this country; or he is liable to summary conviction and to imprisonment, the same as every year thousands in this country are liable to summary conviction, and can be sent to prison.

Mr. OLIVER: Who is going to bring John Smith to the court-martial or to the magistrate's court?

Mr. MEIGHEN: He will be brought by the machinery of the law, and if there is not enough machinery now, we will make more.

Mr. OLIVER: Who will put the law in motion?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Those on whom the responsibility rests under the British North America Act will put the law into force.

Mr. OLIVER: Who, does the minister consider, those will be?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Those on whom the responsibility generally rests for the administration of the law. I really thought the ex-minister knew that. The responsibility for the administration of law is on the provinces.

Mr. OLIVER: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The initiative may be taken by others. If the initiative is not taken by others, we will take the initiative, because it is the intention of this Government to enforce this Act.

Mr. OLIVER: That is the point I wish to make. I think I have arrived at a full explanation that in the last resort it does not depend upon the tribunal; it depends upon this Government, whether the law is enforced or not. If John Smith does not respond to the call, it depends upon this Government whether or not he is going to be brought. I think that is agreed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The tribunals have their functions; the Government have theirs, and the various authorities in Canada who are considered the responsible officials of Canada, have theirs. We hope and trust that all will discharge their duties, but I can say that whoever fails, that party will not be the Government of Canada.

Mr. OLIVER: Then, the matter comes to exactly what I say, namely, that we have to depend upon the fair play of this Government in the administration of this measure in bringing men to appear before the tribunals under their liability to service. I have no confidence in the good faith of this Government in the administration of this measure, especially after the statement made by my hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) in this House in his address on the second reading of the Bill, and on account of the further remarks of his colleague, the Minister of Inland Revenue, (Mr. Sevigny) in regard to this Bill.

Mr. BURNHAM: Would a coalition Government improve matters?

Mr. OLIVER: The statement was made to this House that it was intended to give special favours to a particular province in this country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. OLIVER: That was stated absolutely and specifically, as plain as words could state it.

Some hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the hon. member says that I made that statement, I will ask him to retract his words and I will ask for the enforcement of my request.

Mr. OLIVER: Will the minister permit me to read from Hansard in justification of my statement?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not need to give the hon. gentleman permission; he can read what he likes from Hansard:

Mr. OLIVER: May I read from Hansard, Mr. Chairman?

> This Bill in its results will work more lightly on the province of Quebec than on any other province in Canada.

I believe that ought to be satisfactory to my hon. friend.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is thoroughly satisfactory to me, but if my hon. friend has any sense of reason, it must be very unsatisfactory to him.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. OLIVER: If that is not good enough, let me read more:

> —this Bill as drafted is not intended to, and will not, if I understand the Bill, work unfairly to that province. Rather, on the other hand, for just and good reasons—not because that province desires any favouritism for it gets no favouritism but for just and good reasons, "this Bill in its results will work more lightly on the province of Quebec than on any other province in Canada."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Why?

Mr. OLIVER: I do not know why. It is for my hon. friend to say. My point is that the hon. minister stated in this House that this Bill was framed to fall unequally upon the provinces of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. OLIVER: That is what Hansard has him as saying—that it will fall more lightly upon the province of Quebec than upon any other province.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: Admit you are caught, and go on.

Mr. OLIVER: No, I am not caught. Does the hon. minister desire me to retract?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly I desire you to retract.

Mr. OLIVER: What does the hon. minister desire me to retract?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Everything you said regarding my statement in the House, which was directly contrary to the fact, and which I may say now you knew to be contrary to the fact.

Mr. OLIVER: If the hon. minister will be good enough to state the words he objects to, I will be very glad to retract them on his assertion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend makes one statement too many. I do not intend to repeat what was a gross error, if not worse.

Mr. OLIVER: I can only say then that the hon. gentleman desiring me to retract what I said, I will with your permission, Mr. Chairman, retract it, and you will permit me to read from Hansard what my hon. friend said.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Read it all.

Mr. OLIVER: I think it will be very interesting for the House. At page 2643 he says:

I want to say something else, and I do so with especial earnestness. It may be that in the heat of discussion I do not avoid animosities perhaps as carefully as I should; but I say this to those hon. gentlemen opposite whose position with regard to this Bill is surrounded by embarrassments much heavier than those that surround us, I say to them that this Bill is not designed and is not framed to be unjust to the province of Quebec or to any other section of this country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. OLIVER:

I point to the provisions of the Bill. This is not the time to discuss it in detail, but a few words will, I think, make my meaning apparent to everybody. It is framed and it is advanced in no spirit of recrimination whatsoever, in no spirit of petty jealousy, because the real men of this country, from end to end, are not of that feeling and do not want that feeling expressed by this Bill. We of English-speaking Canada have the kindest feelings towards our French Canadian compatriots.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. OLIVER: Do I hear that from the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), and the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs)?

Mr. ARTHURS: You will find Parry Sound does its duty.

Mr. OLIVER (reading):

We realize that there are certain considerations having to do with this subject of recruiting that apply to them that do not apply with the same force to us. I want to say to the members from Quebec—

I would like my hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) to tell us what these are?

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend had better finish the reading first.

Mr. OLIVER (reading):

—I want to say to the members from Quebec that this Bill as drafted is not intended to, and will not, if I understand the Bill, work unfairly to that province. Rather, on the other hand, for just and good reasons—not because that province desires any favouritism for it gets no favouritism—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. OLIVER (reading):

—but for just and good reasons, this Bill in its results will work more lightly on the province of Quebec than on any other province in Canada. In what way will it work so lightly? In the first place, the province of Quebec is an agricultural province.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. OLIVER (reading):

In the first place the province of Quebec is an agricultural province.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. OLIVER (reading):

A much larger proportion of the population of that province is engaged in agriculture than is the case at least with any other of the other old provinces of Canada. Agriculture is one of our essential industries, our greatest essential industry, necessarily employing much the largest proportion of our population. Consequently, under the terms of the Bill, the exemptions to agriculture will far outnumber the exemptions to other avocations of our people. Therefore, the exemption clauses, applied evenly and fairly all over this Dominion,—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. OLIVER (reading):

—as is the intent, will, for just and good and sound reasons, be of more value to the province of Quebec than to any other province of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. OLIVER (reading):

Secondly, in the province of Quebec, the young men marry at an earlier age than in the English provinces. It is a custom that deserves commendation.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. OLIVER (reading):

How does that affect the operation of this Act? Under this Act, the first three classes to be called out embrace only unmarried men between the ages of 20 and 34. Under those three classes it is not impossible that the whole 100,000 may be secured, and, in that case, the Act will apply to a smaller proportion in the province of Quebec than in any other province.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. OLIVER (reading):

This, however, is the case not because the Bill makes favourites, but because the Bill is fair.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. OLIVER (reading):

It is for good, sound and sufficient reason, and is in the general interests of the state. Consequently, this Bill, so far from being designed or framed to result in unfairness to the province of Quebec, will, on the contrary, in its practical effects, for good and sufficient reasons of state, fall more lightly on Quebec than on any other province.

Now, my hon. friend has drafted a Bill for making it fall more lightly on Quebec. The English language is there to be read, and that is the climax of his protestations to the province of Quebec, that they are under the terms of this Bill treated more lightly than any other province of Canada.

When my hon. friend made the protestations he did, and dragged them into his address without any cause or provocation, we must be compelled to reach the conclusion that he desired to impress upon the people of the province of Quebec that they had received special consideration at the hands of the Government in the drafting of this Bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He said nothing of the sort.

Mr. OLIVER: I have read what he said.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And it is contrary to what you state.

Mr. OLIVER: I am entitled to place a fair interpretation upon it, according to my judgment.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But not to misrepresent. Let me say that I would not trust to my hon. friend's judgment, because he has gone wrong.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend will have to trust Hansard. I have read Hansard to the House, and as a member of this House I am entitled to interpret what my hon. friend says in the fair light of the English language. That is what I have done.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, that is what you have not done.

Mr. OLIVER: And it will be accepted both by my hon. friend and his friends, that that is what has been done. I will not delay the House by re-reading what my hon. friend has said. The purpose of it is so evident that he will pardon me if, living in another part of the country, under different conditions, to which part of the country my hon. friend has not extended his assurances of protection, and to which he refuses to extend any assurance of protection, if I feel some question in my mind that this Bill does not protect the interests of the people of the country, because it is not intended to protect them.

As a matter of fact, it does not. We must depend on the fair play of the Government for bringing forward the men who are to give military service. I interpret his assurance to the province of Quebec as meaning that special favour will be given in that province and I have no faith in the assurance that the Bill will be administered fairly and that the men will be brought forward. If he intended that it should be administered fairly, why should he not say to this House, following up and correcting the statement of his colleague, how many men are to be taken from the province of Quebec and how many from Alberta? His colleague made the suggestion to the House for the purpose of its being sent throughout the country so as to influence the public mind just as he made this statement for the purpose of influencing the public mind. We are entitled to hold the view that if the Government will not make provision in the Bill that it shall be administered fairly as between man and man, industry and industry, and section and section, it is because they do not intend to so administer it.

Mr. BURNHAM: May I ask the hon. gentleman—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried:

Mr. BURNHAM: Oh, all right. Since the hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) has ascertained that in the last analysis the enforcement of this Bill depends upon this Government, and since he, or his side could have introduced safeguards by joining in a coalition Government will he explain why it is that the Liberal party in Parliament refused to join in the coalition which might have been effected?

Mr. OLIVER: I am afraid I will have to disclaim responsibility in the matter.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Blain): Perhaps I should direct the attention of the committee to this rule:

> Speeches in Committee of the Whole must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

I am only reading this in the hope that we will be able to keep order in the committee. The committee, I am sure, is as anxious about that as I am.

Mr. OLIVER: There is another feature of the administration of the Bill to which I wish to draw the attention of the minister, and that is the question of appeals. When a man is called up and the tribunal decides that he is entitled to be exempted, the appeal from that decision depends upon the Government. Assuming that there is a section in which public opinion is not in favour of military service, that the tribunal as appointed reflects public sentiment in that case, that those who go forward and ask for exemption, are given exemption, it is absolutely within the responsibility of the Government, under the provisions of this Bill, to see that these cases are appealed. Essential power then is in the hands of the Government to see that this Bill is properly enforced. The Government, while professing to divest itself of the responsibility—which, in my humble judgment, it should not do—does not so divest itself of responsibility, and therefore there is all the more reason why provisions should be in the Bill which would protect the public interest and the public welfare. I have used the reference that my hon. friend has made to the province of Quebec. The Minister of Inland Revenue referred to the province of Quebec. It is not that I have anything to say about how they administer their affairs in Quebec, but if I am compelled to read what they say as indicating an intention to extend favouritism to that province, I expect a square deal in my own province. Favouritism in one part of the country might just as well be favouritism in another part of the country and it is for that reason that I ask that provision may be made in the Bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I, first of all, wish to thank my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), for extracting and quoting so generous a portion of my speech of the 21st June which formed a very fertile oasis in the dreary desert of his own address. I cannot extend my thanks further or compliment him on his ability in interpreting words. His method of interpreting words is that when I stated that the Bill makes no favourites of provinces, he takes that to be a statement that it makes a favourite of the province of Quebec. All the difference there is between my statement and his, I find, is that there is a "not" in my statement and the " not " is left out of his interpretation. I am inclined to agree with my hon. friend in one conclusion. He says that if the Bill is administered unfairly by the parties responsible for its administration it will not be a success. I do not think there is any doubt about that. But in the choice of those tribunals hon. gentlemen opposite are to have just as much to do as we have. That is the statement of the Prime Minister and it is the policy of the Government. We provide for a condition under which the best men will be selected.

Mr. NESBITT: How would they have the selection?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Because the board of selection which names one of the members of the tribunal is intended to be composed of persons chosen by hon. members opposite to as great an extent as persons are chosen by hon. members on this side of the House. That is the intention and it has already been so stated. The board selects one member of each local tribunal and a judge selects the other. I do not think it is exaggerating the condition of affairs on the bench to say that most of the county court judges in Canada to-day were appointed by hon. gentlemen opposite. It is at least within the mark to say that in the choice of this board of selection, hon. gentlemen opposite and those appointed by them, will have really more to say than hon. members on this side and those appointed by them. The appeal tribunals which are above the local tribunals and which are to correct errors made by the local tribunals consist solely of judges, and I do not think it is wrong to say that most of these judges also were appointed by hon. gentlemen opposite. That is in the nature of things because they were in power for sixteen years while we have been in power for something over five years. Then, the central appeal judge is chosen from the Supreme Court bench, consequently there again hon. gentlemen opposite have already reposed perhaps the highest standard of confidence that could be reposed in any man in Canada. If, under these circumstances, we have to assume that we are going to have a set of worthless local tribunals, a worthless central appeal judge, and a worthless Government, of course the Bill will not be a success.

That is the only conclusion in which I can agree with the hon. member for Edmonton. But I have not lost faith in human nature. The hon. member for Edmonton has been in a state of cerebral distemper or something lately—I do not know what is wrong. He seems to have no faith or confidence in any one. This is a selective compulsory service Bill. We want to apply a process of selection to get those men. In working that out I should like to have employed the finest analysing and selective instrument in the world, which is the human mind. The hon. member for Edmonton, on the contrary, would rather commit that task to a box of dice or to some instrument of chance, having lost faith in human nature. I have not lost faith in my fellow men. The hon. member wants to substitute blind chance for human judgment. He has no confidence in two men, but all kinds of confidence in two straws. That is the difference between myself and the hon. member for Edmonton. It is a question of the choice of the best method. I am in agreement with him also that what he stated this afternoon had been stated by him before; in fact I would go further and say it has been stated by him over and over again before and has been answered before. I cannot congratulate him upon having made any impression by that kind of so-called reasoning upon either his own side of the House or this side. All I can do is to reaffirm now that, so far as we have been able to do it, the principles imbedded in this Bill are the principles which, fairly acted upon by reasonable men, will select the most available men for the front, which is the primary object, with the least injury to agricultural and industrial pursuits at home. That is the purpose, and if, in effecting that purpose, there is any definite suggestion or amendment that in the opinion of hon. gentlemen will secure that end more clearly and certainly, we shall be only too glad to hear it.

Mr. GRAHAM: Do I understand that the suggestions that have been made concerning the forming of these tribunals have been already rejected by the Government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. I do not think that any suggestion has been made from either side of the House inconsistent with the principle that I said was to be adopted, namely, that the same say in the choice of the board of selection should be given to hon. gentlemen opposite as to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House.

Mr. GRAHAM: We were urging that county court judges should be chosen to act on these boards, and I inferred that that suggestion had been rejected.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That was a suggestion, but it has nothing to do with the argument on the point I was making. I have gone very carefully over the notes made on the suggestions of yesterday, and some of them, I think, can be embodied with advantage in the Bill. It would seem to me best to take them up in rotation later.

Mr. GRAHAM: Suppose that 100,000 men are not secured by the calling up of the first class and that by the calling up of the second class 110,000 are secured. Does not the Solicitor General think that, notwithstanding what he has said, the ballot would be the fairest possible way to make a choice?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I should think not. In the first place, I do not think there is any reasonable possibility of our getting over the 100,000, for the reason that we have power to divide classes into subclasses. But if by any chance we should get a small number over, it would appear to me that rather than resort to the ballot, it would be fairer and more in consonance with the general principle of the Bill to release the older men in order of age until only the necessary number was left.

Mr. DEVLIN: After the 100,000 are secured under conscription, will all organization relative to conscription cease ipso facto?

Mr. MEIGHEN: After securing 100,000 men the Bill cannot be used to secure any more. The organization will then be at an end until Parliament acts again, if it does act.

Mr. DEVLIN: Is there any provision for exemptions in the 100,000?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, they have got past the exemption stage and are in the army.

Mr. DEVLIN: So that the Bill may call for more than 100,000?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. More than 100,000 reinforcements cannot be secured under it. Should more be enlisted, then, under powers which the Militia Department now has, they may release some of the men, and I gave a suggestion of a principle on which release might be possible.

Mr. TURRIFF: If, say in the city of Ottawa, a large number of young men who would be liable to conscription under this Bill should fail to come forward, what provision is there for punishing them? It might be the duty of the Attorney General of the province to enforce the law, but he would not likely take any action. I have not yet been able to ascertain that under these circumstances the slackers could not get off.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would be the duty of the authorities, no matter how many men had reported themselves, to see to it that the law was enforced as to those who did not. And, so far as the Government is concerned, that is the intention.

Mr. NESBITT: It would be the duty of the authorities to see that they were registered, but how would the authorities know?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The general answer would be, in the same way as they know of the violation of any law, but specifically I might say that, inasmuch as everywhere in Canada there are those who have gone forward, and who are interested that more go forward, and that this war be pressed forward with all the strength of the country, it is believed that that class of people will make themselves of service to their country by making known to the authorities those who disobey the law, and I think there are good grounds for that belief. I do not think there is any section in Canada where there are not sufficient numbers who are interested generally in the enforcement of the law, and interested specially in the enforcement of such law as strengthens the army of this country for the war, and who will assist their country by reporting men who fail to do their duty under this Act.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I should like to say a word in reference to an idea, which seems to influence the minds of some hon. members, and to point out that there would not be any safeguard in the registration that has been spoken of. I call attention to the fact that the men are to report. That is their first duty. Suppose that you provided for a distinct registration, you would have in front of you exactly the same difficulty.

Mr. NESBITT: Sure, I understand that.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: You would have the question as to whether or not all have registered, and in the United States, at the present time, they are hunting up men who have not registered, and taking proceedings against them under the law, so that there really is not any additional safeguard in registration. If there were a distinct provision for registration we should be in precisely the same position.

Mr. NESBITT: I was not advocating registration. I was trying to find out if the Government had any means of knowing the men who did not come forward, because, with all due deference to the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen), in many sections of the country they would think it tattling, as we used to say when we were boys, to tell on a neighbour's boy who did not go forward. There is no question, they would think it disloyal to their neighbour.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They would think it better to be disloyal to their neighbour than to their country, at such a time as this. I have full confidence that, depending on the means I have stated, infractions of the law will be ascertained, but if that dependence is not sufficient, and if other means should be found necessary to find out those who have not registered, such means as may be necessary will be taken.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: No doubt the Government will find ample means to find the slackers, if you call them by that name, but I must say to my hon. friend that, if he has to depend on the informer, he may not obtain the information.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: The only provision in the United States law for the man who refuses to register reads as follows:—

> Any person who shall wilfully fail or refuse to present himself for registration or submit thereto as herein provided shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall, upon conviction in the district court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, be punished by imprisonment for not more than one year, and shall thereupon be duly registered.

So that they have the same provision as we have.

Mr. NESBITT: That does not cover the point.

Mr. CURRIE: The language of this Act is not very clear. It says, "called out for active service," and there is also the matter of enrolment and the matter of registration, which they use in the United States, and which we are not using here at all. I think all the classes should be first enrolled, and the call for active service should come subsequently. Then you would have all the manhood enrolled in the first place between the ages of 20 and 45, but a man could not dodge between the two classes. A man might be of such an age that he would require six months to get into one of the classes called out, and, by the time the class was called out, he would be in the other category, and might evade both classes in that way, but if they were both called out and enrolled in the first instance, it would save a great deal of trouble. Any one who has anything to do with the enrolment of soldiers will understand that it requires a tremendous amount of work to prepare the papers of the men. I know of cases where it will take two or three weeks of hard work, with a staff of five or six hundred men, to get the attestation papers of a thousand men filled up and everything in proper shape. So that there is going to be a great deal more work in addition, calling these men out or enrolling them. The word "enroll" is not mentioned in the Act at all. I presume that if they are called out and come before the tribunal, they are enrolled and papers are prepared for them.

Mr. MARCIL: If they do not claim an exemption, they do not go before the tribunal at all.

Mr. CURRIE: Where do they go?

Mr. MARCIL: That is what we want to find out.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They will report as provided in the proclamation.

Mr. CURRIE: Would it not be better to have them all report, in the first place? You would have all the men and you would know how many would go into one category and how many in the other, and the matter would be settled in the beginning. I think everybody should be enrolled from 18 to 45, and then if you want to call out those from 20 to 30, you can do so. A man would then get his papers to show he was enrolled, and if he were arrested by the corporal's guard, he could produce his paper to prove, he was enrolled.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Bill provides for that.

Mr. CURRIE: But it does not provide they shall all be called out at once. If you call them all out at once, every man in the section would be enrolled. The military tribunals will meet in every parish or township, and the young men will have to be enrolled. If you fail to get 100,000 in the two classes, you have to call out the third class. In foreign countries, men always carry their papers in their pocket. If a man is in a class which has not been called out, he has his papers in his pocket to show he has been enrolled. I think we should follow the same procedure, and it would simplify matters. I think hon. gentlemen should not insist continually on numbers being given in this House. Hours have been spent in arguing about the number of men sent to the front, and the number who have not been sent to the front.

It is one of the first principles of war that information as to numbers or strength of troops should not be given out to any person. It is simply giving aid to the enemy to ask, as gentlemen in this House have constantly asked, how many men have enlisted from time to time. I hope that the Government, when this Bill is enforced, will insist that this rule shall be observed. To give information as to how many men are enlisted, where they are enlisted, and that sort of thing, is a violation of one of the fundamental rules of war; namely, that information as to the number of troops enlisted or enrolled or the figures of parade states of the army should never be given. I hope, therefore, that members on the other side will not constantly endeavour to make an issue of the number of men enlisted, for by doing so they are unconsciously helping our enemies. If the Minister of Militia said that 70,000 more men enlisted than really did, he was only giving the Germans a greater scare to that extent. He should have said 100,000 more—or he should have refused to give any information at all. Everybody who has read anything of military law or military history knows that it is a crime to give figures in this regard, and that rule should be enforced here in this House as it is outside.

Mr. MARCIL: Is all voluntary enlistment on the part of men who will not come under the classes named in this Bill to be suspended the moment the Act comes into force?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is nothing in the Bill to that effect.

Mr. NESBITT: I am sure that the Government are to be congratulated upon having my hon. friend the colonel to advise them in this matter. May I ask the Solicitor General whether section 3 has been passed?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The whole of section 3, which is the section dividing the classes, was allowed to stand.

Mr. OLIVER: I notice that the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Sévigny) is in his place. May I direct his attention to the following statement which he made in the House on June 25, page 2751 of Hansard:

> The law authorizes the raising of 100,000 men, in nine provinces. I do not know what number of men the tribunals of each province will decide to send to the army, but let us suppose it will be as follows: British Columbia, 10,000; Alberta, 10,000; Saskatchewan, 10,000; Manitoba, 10,000; Ontario, 25,000; Quebec, 25,000; New Brunswick, 5,000; Nova Scotia, 5,000; Prince Edward Island, 2,000. We reach a total of 102,000 men; the law authorizes but 100,000. The Government thinks they can be found, but once more, I say the tribunals will decide.

May I ask the hon. gentleman upon what basis he suggested that distribution of men?

Mr. SEVIGNY: I was just showing that it was very easy to find 100,000 men in Canada.

Mr. OLIVER: Am I to understand that the minister made the suggestion without any knowledge of the facts?

Mr. SEVIGNY: According to the Bill, the men must be chosen by the tribunals. I do not think that any man in this committee or in the country can say now what the tribunals will decide.

Mr. OLIVER: The tribunals are to exempt men, not to choose men.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I do not agree with the hon. gentleman's distinction. In my judgment, the men will be chosen by the tribunals. The tribunals will decide what men are more essential on the farms, on the railways or in the industries, and they will decide at the same time what men can be spared for the army.

Mr. MARCIL: That would mean that no man would be enlisted unless he went before the tribunal. My understanding is that the only men to come before the tribunals are those who claim exemption. If a man does not claim exemption, his case will not come before the tribunal.

Mr. CURRIE: My understanding of the Bill was that the tribunals pass on everybody; I was surprised to hear the Solicitor General say to-day that they do not. Men who are more valuable in certain employments than they would be at the front are still, as they were under the voluntary system, able to go of their own free will. There is nobody to say: You cannot go. Many men are essential to the industries of the country for other purposes. As the Bill stands now, unless such a man objects to going—and many men will be too proud to ask for exemption—he goes. I think that the names of men in certain trades or categories—farmers especially—who are called upon to go should come before the tribunal.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman is not quite right in his interpretation of the Bill. The obligation is not imposed upon the man himself of applying for exemption. He may apply, but if any one else feels that it is in the national interest that that man be exempted, that person may apply on the man's behalf.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I can understand that that would apply to large manufacturers or makers of munitions who might apply on behalf of 1,000 or 5,000 men in their employ. But how can it be worked out in regard to the farmer or the farmer's boy? In such cases application would not be made by a stranger or by anybody except by the boy himself or his father. The member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) says that in many cases the men will be too proud to apply for exemption. Such men would necessarily be conscripted and attached to the army unless application for exemption were made on their behalf. There is a great deal in what the member for North Simcoe says that, in the interests of the nation, many positions in various occupations should continue to be filled by those who are now filling them. That more especially applies to the farmer, the farmer's son or the farm labourer. The Minister of Inland Revenue has said that the tribunals pass on every man.

[Mr. Sevigny.]

They do not; they pass only upon men who make application or on whose behalf application is made. If application is not made on a man's behalf, he necessarily becomes attached to the army and must serve. If he declines to serve, he will be treated as a deserter and be liable to punishment accordingly.

Mr. SEVIGNY: That is the way I understand the Bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think that it should go out from the House that application for exemption brings any ignominy or disgrace upon the applicant, even if he applies on his own behalf. I think that men engaged in agriculture in Canada who are of opinion that they serve the national interests at home do no dastardly or disgraceful act in applying for exemption. They are doing what they believe to be in the national interest, and I think they will not fail to apply. I think that there will be no general feeling of revulsion against those who do this. If they fail in individual cases to do so, there are others who can apply on their behalf, and I do not think that those others will fail to apply.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It is well that we should understand exactly what are the principles of this Bill. They are very clear and well known; I am surprised that they should be discussed at all. The principle of the Bill is that every man between the ages of 20 and 35 is liable to be a soldier. There is no distinction; the law is that every male British subject in Canada is liable to service. He will be called upon and he will be obliged to obey; he has no recourse except that of going before a tribunal and claiming exemption. Exemption can be claimed upon various grounds. He can say: my health is not good. He can say: my family are suffering. Or he can say: I am a big banker; I have a big business to carry on; therefore I should not be called upon to perform military service. Subsection (d) of section 11, which contains the exemptions, provides that exemption may be granted if it be shown:

> That serious hardship would ensue, if the man were placed on active service, owing to his exceptional financial or business obligations or domestic position;

What is the meaning of "his exceptional financial or business obligations"? As I understand it, a banker who has a large financial institution can claim exemption on that account, and it will be for the tribunal to declare whether his claim is right or wrong.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think my right hon. friend's interpretation is right. That a man is a big banker would not be a proper claim for exemption under clause (d), which refers to claims of hardship, not on account of big assets, but on account of big liabilities. A man does not become rich from the size of his liabilities.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: He may be exempted on account of the big business he is carrying on, whether you call it obligations, or assets, or anything else.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The word in the clause is "obligations."

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The clause reads:

Owing to his exceptional financial or business obligations.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, obligations.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Obligations to whom? To the public whom he is serving, not his own personal obligations, because that would be a still worse claim. At all events, he can claim exemption, and it will be for the tribunal to decide whether his claim is right or wrong. Then the clause says that he can claim exemption on account of his "domestic position." That is a most elastic term. What does that mean? Can he say that he should be exempted because he is the father of twelve children? There might be something in that. The hon. member for Edmonton had something to say upon that point. I do not think, however, that the fact that a man has a large family is what is meant. At all events, a man can claim exemption for a multitude of reasons, such as for poor health, for business obligations, for financial obligations, for domestic position. But the broad principle upon which the Bill is based is not that the tribunals will constitute the army; the principle is laid down that, without any exception, every British subject between the ages of twenty and forty-five is a soldier and liable to be called out, and that he must go unless exempted by a tribunal.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the principle of the Bill, shortly, but not completely stated.

Mr. NESBITT: Will the tribunals have power themselves, from their own personal knowledge, to exempt anybody?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, the Bill does not contemplate exemption except following an application.

Mr. MARCIL: After this Bill is passed, if a man who should remain here should insist on enlisting voluntarily in order to go to the front, will he have to go although it is in the interest of the country that he should remain here?

Mr. MEIGHEN: As to voluntary enlistment, this Bill makes no change whatever.

Mr. GUTHRIE: In regard to section 11, the Solicitor General mentioned a moment ago that an application for exemption may be made by any man for or on behalf of any man. The wording of the Bill is:

Or in respect of any man.

There is a distinction between an application made on behalf of a man and that made in respect of a man. The former, I assume, would be made by a parent or an agent of the man. It is open to any outside individual, not an agent of the man himself, to apply a tribunal to have that man retained in Canada?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, it is.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Then, the wording should not be "on behalf of a man"; it should be as printed in the Bill: "in respect of any man."

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Kamouraska): Mr. Chairman, I believe we should have an explanation from the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Sévigny) about his former statements. Besides what the hon. minister has said in his speech in this House, he has given an interview to the press of Quebec, in which he gave pretty near the same figures as those mentioned in his speech here, with this exception, however, that he went farther. In that interview, he said that the province of Quebec would probably be called upon to contribute 25,000 men; in this total figure, the contribution of the city of Montreal would be 10,000 men; that of Quebec, 1,000 men, and each of 1,200 municipalities of the province would furnish 10 men and the balance would be contributed by the towns of Fraserville, of Three Rivers, of St. Hyacinthe, of Sorel, etc. My hon. friend has been most generous in his nomenclature of towns who should contribute. Now, from what has just been said, the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) and from the hon. minister's own words, he seems to have simply drawn an inference with the sole object of demonstrating that 100,000 men could be easily drafted in the country. Now, I must say to the hon. minister that his statements have been construed otherwise; the newspapers have seized upon them and they seem to believe, in the province, that these statements have been made on behalf of the Government, that is to say that, in consequence of this law, 25,000 men would be levied in the province of Quebec only. Would he please tell us if it will be 25,000 men or more than 25,000, that the province of Quebec shall be called upon to contribute?

Hon. Mr. SEVIGNY (Translation): In reply to my hon. friend from Kamouraska, I will tell him that, no more than he, do I know the number of men which the province of Quebec will be asked to contribute as a result of this enactment; it is possible it might be only 10,000 men and it is equally possible it will be more. By the words I spoke in this House as well as in the interview mentioned, I simply meant to show that the province of Quebec could easily furnish these 25,000 men, and that Montreal could easily supply 10,000; I believe that, on that point, my hon. friend from Kamouraska will be of my opinion.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): I am not at all in accord with you as regards this Bill.

Hon. Mr. SEVIGNY (Translation): I understand that my hon. friend's opinion would be to do nothing at all.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): I said, as far as this Bill is concerned.

Hon. Mr. SEVIGNY (Translation): I believe that Montreal might contribute 10,000 men and Quebec, with her population of 100,000 inhabitants, could furnish 1,000 of them. Moreover, we have, in the province of Quebec, 1,200 municipalities and I am of the opinion that all these municipalities, even that of Kamouraska, could furnish 10 men each, especially so, if my hon. friend would make some effort. Consequently, if these 1,200 municipalities supplied 12,000 men, and if we add to these Quebec and Montreal, we have a total of 23,000 men. It seems to me that the balance of our contribution, that is to say 2,000 men, could be furnished without any difficulty by the cities of Hull, Sherbrooke, Three Rivers, St. Hyacinthe, Chicoutimi, Lévis. My object was simply to show how easy it would be for the province of Quebec to furnish 25,000 men without suffering from it to any material extent. I believe that if this province did furnish these 25,000 men, she would be most proud of it, not only for the time being, but especially in the future.

[Mr. E. Lapointe.]

Now, I do not know, no one in this House knows, how many men will be called in the province of Quebec, and I would not be surprised if that contribution was far inferior to that presumed figure of 25,000 men, for we have in that province many large families, and a great portion of the population is engaged in agriculture.

As the Government's object is above all to take into account the needs of the agricultural class, it is possible that the province of Quebec will not be asked to contribute 25,000 men, but, at all events, I assert that, in my opinion, she could easily furnish them.

Mr. E. B. DEVLIN (Translation): Will my hon. friend allow me a question?

Hon. Mr. SEVIGNY (Translation): Certainly.

Mr. E. B. DEVLIN (Translation): The hon. Minister has just mentioned the name of the city of Hull. Has the hon. minister any idea of the number of soldiers furnished by the city of Hull and by the county of Wright?

Hon. Mr. SEVIGNY (Translation): I know that the city of Hull has furnished 800 men.

Mr. DEVLIN (Translation): And the county of Wright?

Hon. Mr. SEVIGNY (Translation): I do not know.

Mr. PROULX (Translation): How many men does my hon. friend think the county of Dorchester is going to furnish?

Hon. Mr. SEVIGNY (Translation): I may say to my hon. friend that I shall certainly do my utmost to induce my electors of the county of Dorchester to do their part generously, and I know they will do it. I have more confidence in my compatriots than my hon. friend from Prescott or my hon. friend from Kamouraska. I know that my compatriots are willing to do their full duty in the present crisis, but, unfortunately, they are misguided.

Mr. LAPOINTE (St. James, Montreal) (Translation): I would like to know from my hon. friend, the Minister of Inland Revenue, on what ground he bases himself; how does he come to the conclusion that he can find 10,000 men in Montreal?

Hon. Mr. SEVIGNY (Translation): I did not catch the question.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): I ask the hon. minister on what he bases his opinion that he can find 10,000 men in Montreal?

Upon what basis, how do you figure it out, how do you get these 10,000 men upon whom you can lay your hands and send to the front?

Hon. Mr. SEVIGNY (Translation): I may tell my hon. friend that, since the question of conscription has come up, some fifty Montreal people have stated to me that the city of Montreal could easily contribute 10,000 men.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): Are the parties who have so well informed the hon. minister people who would like to ge themselves, or are they persons in favour of the present administration, or rather, those who surround him that have made such a statement. Upon what does he rely to make that statement?

Mr. RAINVILLE (Chairman of the Committee) (Translation): I believe this debate somewhat exceeds the limits of the clause we are now discussing.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska) (Translation): Paragraph 4 of article 13 reads as follows:

> Unless futher authorized by Parliament the reinforcements provided under this Act shall not exceed one hundred thousand men.

I believe that under this paragraph 4, we certainly have the right to know where, how and in what way these 100,000 men are going to be levied; I believe we are perfectly in order when we ask the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue, who declared, a few days ago, that 25,000 of these 100,000 men would be probably levied in the province of Quebec, upon what he bases his calculation. The hon. Minister just said that the province of Quebec could easily furnish 25,000 men, without in any way suffering from it; without injury to agriculture or to the industries. Could she furnish twenty-five, thirty, forty or fifty thousand men, without any injury to agriculture or manufacturing? Does my hon. friend limit to 25,000 men the sum total of suffering to be inflicted on the province of Quebec?

Hon. Mr. SEVIGNY (Translation): I have given my answer just now, it is useless to repeat it.

Mr. OLIVER: I wanted to get some further information from the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue in regard to the statement he favoured the House with some weeks ago. He made the suggestion as to the apportionment of the requirement of men to meet this 100,000 draft, and I feel it is most important that we in other parts of the country should know if his statement was made with authority or not with authority. I understand my hon. friend disclaimed having any authority for making the statement he did.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He did not make his statement as to any proportion of the men that would be taken.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I wanted to say that in my opinion it would be very easy to get 100,000 men in Canada. As I said a few minutes ago, speaking in French, it would, I believe, be easy to find 25,000 men in the province of Quebec. I figure it this way: the city of Montreal has a population of 600,000, and, in my judgment, it would be easy to find 10,000 in that city. I have been told this by at least fifty people who live in the city of Montreal since conscription was first mentioned in this country. Take the city of Quebec, where there is a population of 100,000, and in my judgment it would be very easy to get 1,000 men in the city of Quebec. There are 1,200 municipalities in the province of Quebec, and I should suppose that it would be very easy to get at least 10 men in each municipality, which would make 12,000 men, and, including my estimate for Quebec and Montreal, you would thus get 23,000 men. We have in the province, cities like Hull, with a population of 20,000; Sherbrooke, with a population of 20,000; Three Rivers, with a population of 20,000; Valleyfield, with a population of 10,000; St. Hyacinthe, with a population of 8,000; Sorel, with a population of 6,000, and Levis, with a population of 10,000, and others. In my judgment, it would be very easy to get from those cities the 2,000 men necessary to bring the total up 25,000.

Mr. MARCIL: Will the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue tell me whether he has had an opportunity of discussing this question of conscription in the province of Quebec since the Dorchester election, so as to place him in a position to form an opinion as to the feeling of the people in any large gathering in any city, or in any county in the province? Is the minister in a position to inform the House as to the feeling of the people on the question?

Mr. SEVIGNY: I know that there has been agitation in Quebec during the last two months and for different reasons—perhaps for political reasons in many cases. I may say to my hon. friend that since I made my remarks in this House on June 21, I have received some very nice letters of congratulation from the good farmers of the county of Dorchester, and from many persons in different parts of the province.

Mr. MARCIL: That is from those who are not going to the front.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I may give one instance of the appreciation I have met with. The other day I met a young man from Montreal, who was practically a stranger to me, and he said: "Mr. Sevigny, I have always been a Liberal, but I am ready to support your Government on this conscription question; I think the Liberal party of the province of Quebec is wrong on this question, and in future I am ready to give my support to the Conservative administration." Now, I am willing to give the name of that man, and I may add that he is a very important man in the city of Montreal.

Mr. MARCIL: If the hon. minister would go further and give us the opportunity we ask of submitting the whole question to the people of the province of Quebec, and of the whole Dominion of Canada, we could settle the matter then once for all. We have been assured that if the majority of the people of Canada declare for conscription the province of Quebec will submit, because the people there are a law-abiding people. The chief objection is that the people in the province of Quebec have not been consulted. They claim this moribund Parliament has no right to call upon them before the people have given their verdict.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I would advise my hon. friend to address those remarks to his friends on his own side of the House who have voted against a referendum.

Mr. MARCIL: I followed my honoured leader, and voted with him. I hope the Prime Minister will give the people an opportunity to pronounce upon this question by way of a general election or otherwise. We hear a great deal about Quebec in this connection, but there are eight other provinces in the Dominion. If there is any doubt about Quebec there cannot be any doubt about the other eight provinces. If the people want conscription, let us have it unitedly; let us get the people all united so that Canada will be of some assistance to the Mother Country and the Allies, but do not let us keep quarreling and wrangling among ourselves as we are doing now.

Mr. OLIVER: I think we can take it for granted that the suggestion placed before the House by the Minister of Inland Revenue is probably a suggestion he would make to the Cabinet when the question was under consideration. For that reason I would like to ask him on what ground he made the suggestion that 10,000 men might properly be conscripted from the province of Alberta under this Bill.

[Mr. Sévigny.]

Mr. SEVIGNY: Alberta has done splendidly since the war broke out. At the same time I have been told by several persons from the province of Alberta—I was told last night by a gentleman from Alberta, Mr. Boileau, whom I think my hon. friend knows—that while Alberta had done splendidly in recruiting since the war broke out the impression was that Alberta could supply 10,000 more men.

Mr. OLIVER: Does my hon. friend think it is a fair proposition that Alberta, having already sent 35,000 out of a population of 400,000, should be called upon for 10,000 more, as compared, we will say, with the province of Quebec which, having sent 44,000 is to be called on for 25,000 more? Does my hon. friend think that is a fair equalization of the burden?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried, carried.

Mr. OLIVER: Perhaps the minister will be good enough to give a reply.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I have already said that Alberta has done splendidly but this law will be not for the province of Quebec alone, nor for Alberta alone, but for all the provinces of this Dominion, and if it is possible to find 10,000 fit men in Alberta, I am sure they will be ready to do their duty. In many cases, no doubt, they will come before the tribunals and ask to be exempted and if the reasons are found good they will certainly be exempted. I am sure the tribunals of Alberta will take into account what has been already done by that province.

Mr. OLIVER: It is quite evident that the points I have been trying to place before the committee are established, and that it is the intention of the Government under this Bill to make the willing horse continue to bear the greater part of the burden. The suggestion that 10,000 should be taken from Alberta in comparison with 25,000 from Quebec is one that would satisfy anybody as to the intention of the Government in regard to the administration of the Bill.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: Why does the Minister of Inland Revenue propose to take 25,000 from Quebec and only 25,000 from Ontario? Taking into consideration the difference in population, does he intend to punish Quebec?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member for Edmonton might answer that question if it be addressed to him.

Mr. OLIVER: I have no hesitation in saying—

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: I am speaking to my fellow citizen who represents the province of Quebec in this Parliament. The hon. member for Edmonton is defending his own province with all the knowledge and talent which he possesses. It is incumbent upon the Minister of Inland Revenue to explain why he proposes to make this difference between these two provinces; that is, that the province of Quebec, with a population of 3,000,000, shall furnish 25,000, and that Ontario, with a million more people, shall furnish 25,000 men?

Mr. SEVIGNY: A million?

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Mr. SEVIGNY: Not at all.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: Not as much as that. Let the minister give us the reason why he takes 25,000 from Quebec and only 25,000 from Ontario.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Before this section is carried— Oh, the Minister of Inland Revenue has not answered yet.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think that before any information is asked from the Minister of Inland Revenue the hon. member for Montreal, St. James (Mr. Lapointe) and the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) should settle the preliminary dispute between themselves. One of them says that 25,000 is too many from Quebec, and the other that 25,000 from Quebec is altogether too few.

Mr. OLIVER: I beg my right hon. friend's pardon. I say that 10,000 from Alberta is too many in proportion to the number from Quebec.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The hon. member (Mr. L. A. Lapointe) does not think so.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The question I am about to ask the Minister of Inland Revenue will not be so difficult to answer. I was very much interested in the way in which he thought the 100,000 could be raised. I would like to ask him if his figures are based upon the young men from 20 to 23 years of age or upon the total from 20 to 45 years of age, whether his figures are based on the calling out of the first class or the calling out of the total classes.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The figures which the hon. gentleman gave were preceded by the words "let us suppose." He has already explained that he gave them purely as an illustration.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Prime Minister, of course, does well to come to the relief of the Minister of Inland Revenue. Perhaps it is well that he should, but I do not think that he has afforded any excuse to the minister for not doing me the courtesy of answering my question. The minister has stated that it would be quite possible to raise 100,000 men and he said that so many could be raised in the province of Quebec. Indeed, he has quoted prominent people in Montreal and others to the effect that 25,000 could be raised in that province. What I ask the minister is whether the information is that they could be raised out of those who are called in the first draft, from 20 to 23, or whether it would include all the classes from 20 to 45, both married and unmarried. It is not an unreasonable question. I am quite sure the minister will not take the suggestion of the Prime Minister and decline to answer.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I will examine the question and I will be glad to give an answer to my hon. friend to-night or to-morrow.

Mr. MARCIL: When Canada went into this war we offered 30,000 men. That number was further increased to 150,000. Last session, when England adopted conscription, I asked the Prime Minister whether the fact that compulsory military service had been adopted in England would in any way modify Canada's participation in the war. The right hon. gentleman answered very briefly that because they were doing more over there it was no reason why we should do less here. I understand now that by an agreement between the Allies, as the number of English troops increases at the front the French troops are reduced and a large number of these French troops have been brought back to peaceful avocations. There seems to be an understanding between the various countries participating in the war as to what proportion of troops shall be furnished by each nation. Is Canada consulted or are we entirely at the discretion of the British war authorities? Can we hope that next year our numbers may be decreased in any way? How does the matter stand?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think my hon. friend is depending purely on newspaper rumours, which are not always a very safe guide. The only purpose, so far as I am aware, which animates the Allies, is that each nation should throw its full strength into the war in order to bring it to a determination, with victorious results, as soon as possible. That is the only purpose that I know of.

So far as France is concerned, I think that all of us will agree that, perhaps more than any other nation, she has fulfilled that purpose to the full national strength of which she is capable. Every man has been sent to the front who is capable of giving military service, except those who have been retained in munitions factories and other absolutely essential industries, to carry on the necessary work of the nation. There is no such agreement or understanding as my hon. friend has suggested, because the whole strength of all the nations is being tested to the utmost in the effort to win the victory in this war.

Mr. DEVLIN: Can a man who has failed to receive his exemption from one local tribunal go to several other tribunals, with the permission of the minister?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, he may not. He would never get the permission of the minister, even if provision were made for that. There is no provision which contemplates that contingency. It might happen that a man who had received a conditional exemption from one tribunal might, of necessity, and not in any way to avoid his responsibilities in a military sense, be in another part of the country when his conditional exemption expired, and in such a case the minister might deem it his duty to permit that man to apply to a tribunal near where he was, thus obviating a journey of perhaps a thousand miles.

Mr. DEVLIN: Does not subsection 5 of section 11 infer that the minister may grant permission to a man who has already been turned down to go to another tribunal?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Provision is made for exceptional cases such as I have spoken of. I do not think any hon. member would suggest that the Act should be so iron-clad that even in such exceptional cases the minister should not have power to give permission to a man to renew his application before another tribunal if the circumstances were such that it would be a hardship on him to go before the original tribunal.

Mr. DEVLIN: But once the certificate would be refused, he would have no right to go before another tribunal, even if permission to do so were granted by the minister?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is not contemplated that any such cases as that would be permitted. If the certificate is refused, the man must report or go to the court of appeal.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I was surprised to hear the Solicitor General, in answer to the hon. member for Wellington, say that an application might be made, not only on behalf of a person, where the applicant would be supposed to be his agent, but in respect to any person; in other words that, without a man's knowledge, his employer might select the tribunal and himself make application without the knowledge of and not at the request of the person for whom exemption is asked. An application of that kind might be made in respect of a man before one tribunal, and then if that man applied to another tribunal he would be subject to a penalty of not less than $100 and not more than $1,000. I suggest that the minister might well make provision against the occurrence of any such injustice as that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If such a case occurred there would be power in the minister to permit the man to make his own selection and be relieved of the first tribunal. The object here in view is to avoid having a man who has been refused an exemption by one tribunal going to another tribunal, trying his luck where he thinks he may win. I do not think there is any substantial danger of the kind my hon. friend has in mind.

Referring to the first point raised by my hon. friend, the Bill says that there shall be such notice and intervening time as the regulation may provide. The man in respect of whom application was made would know that and he could go before the tribunal and say he did not want exemption. His case would be heard and great weight would be given to his own desire. If it were not given, all he would have to do would be to enlist voluntarily.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Where an application was made in respect to a man, any notice would be sent to the man making the application. Take the manager of a large factory employing 1,000 hands of military age; these men would of course become liable to serve the moment the proclamation was issued.

This manager, without consulting the men, we will suppose is of the opinion that their services are required in the national interest, and that it is very much better that they should work in his factory than that they should go to the front. He makes the application, but it need not be on their behalf at all. The words "in respect of" have been used, in order to eliminate the personality of the men entirely. The manager makes the application on behalf of a thousand men in his employ. Any notice which is given by the tribunal will be given to the man who makes the application, not to the man in respect of whom the application is made, but will be given to the manager, and the whole matter might be tried and the man might be either forced to serve, or might be forced to remain in the factory, without his ever having been consulted, and, indeed, without his ever having any knowledge whatever of the proceedings which are being taken in respect of him.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The regulations certainly would provide that the man affected would have notice.

Mr. PUGSLEY: How can the hon. Solicitor General assure this Parliament in regard to regulations to be made by a judge who is not yet appointed? The Solicitor General said the Government would not make the regulations, but that they would be made by the central judge. What guarantee have we that regulations would be made to cover a case of that kind? Possibly, the attention of the judge would not be called to this particular section. It seems to me that in framing a law of this enormous importance, a law which is to give the right to the Crown to deal with the life and liberty of the subject, difficulties of this kind should be provided against, and a direct provision should be inserted in the statute.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know of anything that would so manifestly present itself to the mind of the central judge than that, in the event of some one applying in respect of another, the party affected should have notice before final decision. Notices in all details like that are left to regulations, the building up of which, in a systematic way, is a work that naturally follows the passing of an Act, and has, for fifty years in Canada, always followed the passing of such an Act. Nothing could be more manifest than that that was in its sphere of regulations, and would be governed by regulations to be framed. It is because I attribute to the central appeal judge common sense that I conclude he would frame regulations in regard to that.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Can the Solicitor General tell us what would be the policy of the Government in respect to bona fide rejections made prior to the coming into force of this Act, where those who were rejected held a certificate of rejection? Would a person who was rejected prior to the coming into force of this Act, and who held a certificate to that effect from the proper authority, be required to come forward and prove his rejection?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That should be made clear publicly now, or made public in some other way.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the suggestion of my hon. friend is a very good one. The question came under review in the preparation of the legislation, with the idea of ascertaining whether or not it would be possible to avoid the coming before tribunals of some or all of the class mentioned by my hon. friend, namely, the class who heretofore have been rejected, but the result of the deliberation showed that there was no way of getting at those who should be finally rejected on that account. Some of them hold certificates and some do not. Some who hold certificates should not now be exempt. Some got a certificate that, perhaps, they should not have got, had such an Act as this been in effect: consequently, it is felt that they should come in the same class as the whole body of the population, and that all men heretofore rejected must appear again, and obtain exemption, if they desire it.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I rather agree with that, as a matter of policy, but I think particular pains should be taken to have the public understand that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think that is correct.

On section 14—burden of proof.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I ask that this section be allowed to stand for the reason that there may be some changes in it.

Section stands.

On section 15—

15. (1) Every man within the classes described in section three shall, after his class or subclass is required to report, as provided in section four, whenever required by a peace officer or by any person who has authority for the purpose, produce his certificate if he has one, and shall answer truthfully all inquiries bearing on the question of his compliance or non-compliance with any provision of this Act.

(2) Any such man who fails to comply with this section shall in respect of each failure be guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding one hundred dollars or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year.

Mr. GRAHAM: Perhaps the hon. Solicitor General has explained before, but it is not clear to me, what arrangement exists between the United States and Canada in the matter of the enforcement of this law. With reference to Canadian subjects residing in the United States, is there a reciprocal arrangement between the United States and Canada, by which American citizens on this side of the line must comply with the American law, unless they enlist voluntarily and vice versa?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have already mentioned that the subject has been discussed, but no definite arrangements have yet been made, pending the passage of this Bill. As to some matters, there have been arrangements of a certain character: for example, we have agreed that United States subjects residing in Canada, who are subject to the law which has just been passed in the United States, shall be considered eligible for registration in Canada. If I am not mistaken, we have agreed that they may register at any post office in Canada. Some other minor matters of a like nature may have been determined, but there has not been an arrangement such as my hon. friend's question suggests. Of course, there has been an arrangement by which we are permitted to send recruiting officers into the United States. I think that has been mentioned by the Minister of Militia.

Mr. GRAHAM: Is there likely to be such an arrangement?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The subject has been discussed, but nothing has been concluded yet. We have said to the United States Government that the Government of Canada will be prepared to co-operate, in any reasonable way, for the purpose of making their law effective.

Mr. NESBITT: Is any provision made for cases where certificates referred to in section 15 have been lost?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Any one who loses his certificate may obtain a duplicate upon the payment of a fee of 50 cents.

Mr. NESBITT: Under what clause is that provided?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Subsection 7 of section 11.

On section 16—

16. (1) All expenditure under or for the purposes of this Act shall be paid out of such moneys as Parliament may appropriate for the purpose.

[Mr. Meighen.]

(2) This Act shall come into force on such day, after the passing thereof, as the Governor in Council may fix by proclamation.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I understand that amendments are to be submitted by the Government to some of the sections which have been allowed to stand. I would suggest, therefore, that subsection 2 of this section stand until all other sections of the Bill shall have been finally passed.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Very good.

Mr. GRAHAM: I would judge from subsection 1 that the expenses of the enforcement of this Act will be taken not from the special vote under the War Measures Act, but from a special vote for this purpose.

Mr. MEIGHEN: May I ask whether the subsection the hon. gentleman desires to stand is:

This Act shall come into force on such day after the passing thereof as the Governor in Council may fix by proclamation.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Very well; that is agreeable

Subsection 2 of section 16 stands.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Mr. GRAHAM: At six o'clock, I asked a question in reference to section 16, subsection 1, which says:

All expenditure under or for the purposes of this Act shall be paid out of such moneys as Parliament may appropriate for the purpose.

My question was: Will the cost of the enforcement of this measure be paid out of the war appropriation, or will there be a special appropriation?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have not given that matter special consideration, but I would expect the cost would be met out of the war appropriation.

Mr. GRAHAM: Can the Solicitor General give us an estimate of the cost of the enforcement of this measure?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. The hon. member will see from statements already made that the Government has in mind the keeping of that expense down to the lowest reasonable limit. I instance the statement of intention that we do not purpose paying the tribunals. If we paid them, the total expense would be very large. Our intention of not paying the tribunals is not, however, chiefly from the point of view of expense, it is in the belief that in that way we afford an opportunity for men, who are very anxious to perform some service, to do so; it is in the belief that by getting that class of men, we shall secure a better class than if we got those who seek the position by reason of money incentive.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Do I understand my hon. friend to say that the expenses of this Act are to be taken out of the War Approbation Act?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is my expectation. I do not see any other fund that they can logically be taken out of.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It does not matter much whether they come from one appropriation or another. From the way in which the Bill is worded, it seems to contemplate a separate appropriation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It may be a separate appropriation, but it will be a war appropriation.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: In regard to this question, I would like to bring to the attention of the House a matter that I have brought up in the House on other occasions. In all the Federal Acts there ought to be some provision for the enforcement of the Act, and for providing the expenditure necessary to that end. When the United States Congress pass a federal law, they make provision for its enforcement. In the Act itself they say: It shall be the duty of the Attorney General of the United States to enforce this law, and for this purpose a certain specified sum is set apart in the Act. They further say: The Attorney General is hereby empowered to employ experts, attorneys, or special agents, and to do anything necessary for the enforcement of this law. The United States has become a strong country because it has federal law which is enforced. We in Canada have federal law, but we do not always enforce it. As the leader of the Opposition may recollect, when I had this question up before the House in regard to another Act, he said that the duty of enforcing the Act was on the Attorneys General of the provinces. That is not the proper method of enforcing a federal law. In my opinion, every federal law ought to contain a provision putting on the Attorney General, or the minister in charge of the department concerned, the responsibility of enforcing the law, and there ought to be a money grant from this Parliament for that purpose. In the United States great improvement has been made in the way of reaching certain crimes that were supposed to be within the jurisdiction of the different states. There was lack of enforcement of the laws and lack of money to enforce the laws, but they gradually came to the conclusion that while they had federal laws there must be federal enforcement of it by the responsible officers of the federal administration, and that money for that purpose had to be provided. An instance in connection with the United States is this. The authorities could not get at the crimes that had been committed throughout the whole Union in connection with labour troubles and things of that kind. As the railways were under the federal jurisdiction of the United States, they passed an Act in connection with the Transportation Act of the United States to make it illegal to use the railways for crime in connection with labour. In this way they made nearly all such crimes that were in the Codes of the different states a contravention of this new Act which they passed in connection with the railways, and in this way they got enforcement of the law. We in this country are not getting enforcement of many of the laws passed by this federal Parliament. We leave that enforcement to the provinces, and most of all to private prosecutors. To-day there is a great combine in paper, and although that is in contravention of the federal law, there is no enforcement of that law. The matter is left to the individual. We are passing a new insurance measure, and the other day I asked the Minister of Finance how he purposed enforcing it. I purpose asking the same question when we come to discuss the Railway Act. In the discussion in the committee on the Railway Act, we found the evidence submitted was largely on how the law in connection with railways was to be enforced, and we have not yet come to a clear understanding on the matter, and it will come before the House.

In connection with all these Acts, however, if they are to be effective, there should be inserted a provision placing the responsibility of enforcing them on the Minister of Justice or the Solicitor General, and another provision providing money for that enforcement. The United States have had such provisions for some years now, and they have secured national unity largely through their declared intention of enforcing federal laws, of charging the responsible officers of the Government with the duty of enforcing the laws and of making the national treasury responsible for providing funds for that enforcement. If we want to have national unity in this country, we shall have to follow the example of the United States and to insist upon our national laws being enforced by some responsible officers, and upon plenty of funds being provided in the law for their enforcement. That does not, perhaps, apply so much to this Act as to other Acts, but I take this opportunity of directing the attention of the House to the matter, and I hope in this Act we shall have no question as to its enforcement, who is responsible for it, and whence the money for that purpose is to come. If we do that, we shall have our national laws respected as they have not been respected before. We shall know that some officer is responsible for their enforcement. We have no federal enforcement of federal laws.

Hon. Mr. HAZEN: Would the hon. gentleman apply that remark to offences under the Criminal Code?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: The way to secure the enforcement of the Criminal Code is to put its enforcement as a duty on somebody, and grant the money necessary for its inforcement. The great complaint in Canada has been that until quite recently we could not get the enforcement of any code or law which was made by the federal Parliament. They went farther in the United States, and we will have to come to it in this country—they created federal courts for the enforcement of federal laws.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It was that way from the first in the United States.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: It may have been and to that extent they were that much better off than we. We have the power to create federal courts, and we have created the Supreme Court and the Exchequer Court, and we have gradually put responsibilities on different officials; for instance, we propose to put the responsibility of enforcing the Railway Act on the Railway Commission.

I would go much further than this, however, and I would say that the enforcement of every Act should be put as a duty on some official. In the United States they have a selective conscription measure, and they have made every provision for the enforcement of it. All the federal attorneys in the Union may be employed to enforce the law. The courts that will enforce it, just as our special tribunals, are federal creations; but they also bring in the state Governments. They are in a position to command each state to produce its levy, and they apportion the levy on the different states. The point I wish to make is that they have the federal machinery and a federal grant of money for the enforcement of federal statutes, I hope this House will impose the duty directly on someone in the Administration who will have to do it. This is a war measure and it must be enforced. Perhaps it may be enforced by the Militia Department.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The Minister of Justice will do it.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Then let us say that it is the duty of the Minister of Justice or of the Department of Militia to enforce the Act.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It is so stated in the Bill.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I know it is. Whatever department is charged with the enforcement of the Act must be supplied with funds for that purpose, and I am quite convinced the money will be freely voted by this House. The time has come now in Canada, after our fifty years' experience with poor enforcement of federal laws, that we should have it specifically set out that the Act is to be enforced, and who shall enforce it, and sufficient money provided for the purpose. Of course, it may be said it will be provided by a special grant, and that may be the way of doing it, but ultimately we must come to the point that the money shall be provided for its enforcement, and until we come to that we will have lack of administration, and we may have lack of funds for the purpose. I hope the Minister of Militia, and the Minister of Justice, and the Minister of Finance, will not only make provision for the enforcement of the Act, but that the money will be forthcoming, not only to enforce this Act but to enforce every federal law.

Mr. DOHERTY: Perhaps it is not very appropriate at the moment to enter into a discussion of the general questions as to the enforcement of laws. I think it is quite obvious that with regard to general laws, such as the Criminal Code and other laws enacted by the Parliament of Canada, that inasmuch as the administration of justice is specially confided to the provincial authorities, very great difficulties might arise if you created divided authority in the enforcement of those laws. As I understand it, under the Criminal Code information may be laid by any party who considers himself interested, and I presume it would be within the function of this Government, or any department of this Government that felt specially interested in the prosecution for a particular offence, to cause information to be laid and the machinery of the law set in motion. However, there comes a certain time in the prosecution of a criminal case when the Crown is charged with the duty of carrying on the prosecution, and I do not think there is room for question that the Crown in that sense means the Crown in the right of the province, the administration of justice resting with the province. I think I may point out that you might give rise to a very anomalous situation if after a party had been committed for trial you had the Crown in the right of the province in the exercise of its function of seeing to the administration of justice, undertaking the conduct of the prosecution, and this Government seeking to have another representative of the Crown intervene and take the matter up. I only point this out as showing that it is not such a simple thing as would appear to the hon. gentleman, to suggest that the enforcement of all of the laws made by this Parliament would advantageously be put in the hands of this Government. There are no doubt particular statutes appertaining to matters specially within the purview of this Government with regard to which it might be desirable that the prosecution should be instituted at the instance of the Government. There are certain offences which this Government may consider it its duty to prosecute, for instance, offences of counterfeiting, offences affecting the currency of the country, and, I suppose, other instances might be thought of if one considered the matter. Now, as regards this particular Bill, I think its provisions make it clear that there are certain offences the prosecution of which belongs to the Minister of Militia, and in so far as representing the public interests before the local tribunals or the appeal tribunals it is sufficiently clear the duty is upon the Minister of Militia. As regards the administration of the Act generally, it is confided to the Minister of Justice, and as I understand the law, it lays upon the Minister of Justice the duty of seeing to its carrying out. No doubt we would look to all competent authorities, and to every public-spirited citizen, to give us their co-operation wherever it could be useful or effective in connection with the enforcement of this law, but I may say that as I understand the responsibility resting upon the Government —and the responsibility is put upon the Minister of Justice in connection with the administration of this particular law—while we would expect to have the co-operation to which I refer, we would quite recognize, and I in particular would recognize, our responsibility in seeing to the enforcement of the provisions of the Act.

As regards the suggestion that there should necessarily be a vote of money, I do not see why we should make special provision for it in this Act. No doubt it will be a proper thing so far as money will be required that we should come to Parliament for a vote of money for the purpose of carrying out this Act in the manner we would come before Parliament for a vote of money for any other like purposes.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: There is a good deal in what the hon. Minister of Justice says, but it does not quite deal with the difficulty. He has spoken of general laws as I have and we have found out that many Acts of this Parliament are not enforced. Take that most important law in war time —that against combines to enhance prices contrary to the public interest; we have never had any enforcement of that law in this country, but they have enforced similar laws in the United States. They not only have a commission, but they have converted that commission into a court for the enforcement of the law. There are criminal proceedings threatened to-day against the paper manufacturers of the United States under the Federal law and the Federal Government are enforcing that law. We have never done that here. The more we see of legislation going through this House the more it does seem apparent that we ought to have some provision for the enforcement of not only one Act, but of all Acts, even if their enforcement does more or less clash with the authority and responsibility of the provincial governments. The provincial authorities have not always enforced the Criminal Code. You cannot get them to. Complaints have been made that the Ontario Government should have at times enforced the law against combines. It has not been enforced. While I agree in a measure with what the minister has said, it does not meet the situation and we are not meeting it in Canada. We have not risen yet, after fifty years of experience, to an appreciation of the duty imposed upon this Parliament to provide for the enforcement of its own laws. I have not any doubt that in this particular case, following the ordinary routine, a sum of money for the enforcement of the law will be forthcoming and will be voted as a money grant. But, sooner or later, we must depart from what is now an obsolete method and we must come to the practical, democratic method of enforcing Federal laws; that is, by putting the responsibility on the Government and high officials and giving them money for that purpose.

As to the Act itself: I have not spoken a great deal on it so far. I have almost left it alone, for the reason that the thing that has struck me in this debate as far as it has gone has been that in war time, no matter how democratic your government may be, and I am a believer in democratic government of the people, by the people, and for the people, it is not so much a question of legislation as it is of administration. For four weeks or more this House has taken up time in discussing the matter. I disagree with my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), who proposes a referendum on this question. A government charged with the responsibility of conducting a war must carry on that war as a matter of administration. If it wants legislation, it is the duty of that government to get that legislation in short order, put it through Parliament and assume the responsibility of it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Better dispense with Parliament altogether.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: No, not in a case of this kind. I want to tell the right hon. gentleman that in England and the United States they put their conscription through in short order. Can my right hon. friend imagine a government, charged with the administration of the war, having a long discussion in Parliament on a law which it proposes? War time is not a time for discussion but a time for administration.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My hon. friend had better sit down then.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: No, I will not sit down. I shall deal with that in a moment in another direction. The duty of the Government in war time is to carry on the war and if it wants legislation it ought to come to Parliament and get it. This Parliament should have put through this measure in one week if it was necessary to do it. I believe it is necessary. In the United States and Great Britain they got similar legislation through in a much shorter time because they regard these things as matters of administration and not so much matters of discussion.

Mr. MARCIL: Has my hon. friend read in to-night's paper that the German Reichstag had been closed because the parties failed to agree?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: That may be. I do not want to take my line of conduct in any respect from Germany. I want democracy, I want democratic government and democratic principles, but in time of war, when we have a responsible Administration charged with the conduct of the war, we are perfectly justified in putting a measure through in short order and carrying it out as a matter of administration. To-day, a government that believes in conscription is asked to go to the people and get their approval in connection with this measure. What we have to do is to allow the Government to carry on the war and put the responsibility upon them when the time comes.

There is a corollary which follows what I have just said. What is it? We had a peace government in this country when war began. We have carried on the war for three years and we are now beginning to have a war government. The people think that the time has arrived when we should have a national government, a union government, a coalition government, if you care to call it such, to carry on the war. The trouble in Canada to-day is that we have not got a united government. We only have a government so far on party lines. There has been a proposal in the country, and it has been referred to in the House, to get a union government. We have to get that union government to carry on the war and to enforce this Act. I started out to talk about how we were to enforce the Act and I discussed the question of money and of the officer who was responsible for its enforcement. But we must have a union government to enforce this Act. The people demand it and my hon. friends on the other side of the House who voted for conscription showed that they had heard the voice of the people demanding the enforcement of this conscription Act. They want to see it put through in short order. There are three things that the people of this country want —first, conscription, second, a union government, and, third, and above all things, to avoid an election in which political passions are called into play in this time of war. In some way or other, we want to see national unity but it is a hard thing to get. I do not despair of that unity and the way to get it is to begin with a national government, a government representing all the people who are in favour of conscription. We cannot get them all but in war time, if we are bound to win the war, if we want to create national unity, or at least unity among all those who believe in conscription, we must have a national government on that line. I hope national government will come and that it will be made up of those who are in favour of a national policy to win the war and of devoting all the energies of the people to that end. I do not think Canada is going to be disrupted on this question by reason of this proposal for conscription. What you want is vigour and strength in doing what ought to be done and the responsibility for that is on the Administration. The Administration then ought to go forward with the law that does require what should be done, a law that has to be enforced and, above all a law that will be enforced and upheld by a national government.

We must come to that in this country; we must come to it within the next six weeks or I do not know what is going to happen. There will be dissension in this country, because there are to-day signs of a lack of unity. But there are also growing signs of national co-operation among the different parties in this country. The speeches that have been made in this House by hon. gentlemen on the other side in favour of conscription have only reflected the opinion of the people of this country, and this House must be as big as the people. But we are not. The people of Canada are largely in favour of this law; they are in favour of its enforcement; they are in favour of unity and co-operation, and not of political dissension. We are making headway in that line to-day and we have been for a good many days past. The people are with us. They desire to have this Parliament reflect their views and establish a national government which will help to build up and strengthen national unity. They also want, above all things, to have all the resources of the country devoted to the winning of the war, this to be worked out on lines of administration. This is not a time to discuss questions of principle that should have been settled and were settled in this country years ago, when the present Militia Act was passed. We have undertaken in this time of war to re-discuss a principle that was settled long ago, a principle which we have no business to be discussing to-day. The Administration here should be as strong as the Administration in England has been since the establishment of a national government. That Government came down and said: Here is a conscription measure which we propose to put into force. We want Parliament to pass it within a few days. That was done in England and it was done in the United States, and these are both democratic governments, just as much as ours is. We can learn from them a good many things about how to conduct a democratic government. even in war times. But the characteristic of all governments in war times ought to be administration and not discussion. The Government has assumed the responsibility and can easily discharge it if they will rise to the point—and the Prime Minister has risen to the point—of proposing a national government. If that is done, there will be no trouble in enforcing this law. I do not want to see this discussion prolonged. I want to see the law placed on the statute book and to see it enforced, and I want to see a union Government to enforce it. If that is done we will get the 100,000, or any number of men we have to get. We will get them in some way, and a union Government will have no trouble in getting them. With a union Government there will be no delay in administering the law; it will go right ahead with it. If we can do that on this occasion there will be very little disunion in the country, there will be, on the contrary, a splendid display of national union, all our people joining together in a mighty effort to win the war. We are fighting for principles which we hold dear, the principles of liberty. Every nation now in the war is working on the principle of conscription.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What about Australia?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Australia can look after itself, and Australia will yet be in this war with a national conscription measure, I have no fear of that. If we give them a lead they will be in all the quicker. Thus, if we want to win the war we must have an Act of this kind. It should have been put there in short order, and provision for its enforcement should be made. But, most of all, its enforcement can only come when we have a really national Government, and I hope we shall see it before long in this country.

Mr. OLIVER: Does my hon. friend wish the House to understand that in his belief this Government that is bringing in this conscription measure does not intend, or is not able, to enforce it?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I did not say that. I say they will enforce it much better, judging by public opinion in this country, and I am guided by public opinion, as I gather it, and am only putting forth my own views and representing the views of the province from which I come when I say that the people believe in conscription and believe that a measure of conscription can best be enforced in this country by a union Government.

Mr. MEDERIC MARTIN: How can you say they believe in conscription if you do not consult them and give them a chance to express their views?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: You had a chance to discuss this when it was up in this country, and Canada to-day is committed to conscription by the Militia Act. What surprises me and the people of Canada is that we are re-discussing this question of conscription. I am willing to have discussion of the matter, but it should be reasonable discussion. I am trying to reflect the views, not of either political party in this country, but of the people, and I say that the people of Canada to-day are largely in favour of this conscription measure, and in favour of its enforcement, and that they think the best way to get it enforced will be by a national government.

Mr. GRAHAM: I suppose that the question of whether we are to have conscription or not was largely settled some days ago when the second reading of the Bill was passed.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I grant that.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend apparently takes the ground that we should take this law as read without any question as to any of the clauses.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I did not quite say that. I said that the legislation ought to be put through this House in the same way and in the same time as in England and the United States.

Mr. GRAHAM: To get back to the Bill, which my hon. friend has been retarding for some time, but which the rest of us are so anxious to get through.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: That is a fine remark.

Mr. GRAHAM: All this discussion we had on the second reading, and if my hon. friend had been here during the past few days discussing these questions and making suggestions in response to the invitation of the Government, he would understand how anxious the House is not to throw all the responsibility on the Government, because no man can go away into the country and say that the Government did something for which he is not responsible. Each member has to take his responsibility. I do not want any government, national or otherwise, to take responsibility that I should assume myself. I assume a share of responsibility, after the second reading of this Bill, and so does every member, to have the Bill placed in as practical and as workable a shape as possible.

In that direction both sides of the House have been working for some days. In reference to section 16, has the Solicitor General made any estimate of the number of men it will take to enforce this measure? I do not mean any special work, such as looking after those who refuse to come before the tribunal, but in the formation of the tribunal. I agree with the Solicitor General in one respect; I think there is a large number of good men in Canada, who, being unable to go overseas themselves would gladly give their services in any direction the Parliament of Canada would suggest to them. I made the same statement when the National Service Board was being selected. I thought it was a great error to select partisan men, and pay them so much a day, or per month, and expenses, when men of equal calibre would gladly do the work for nothing. Would it not be wise, not as an essential, but for the appearance of the statute when it is printed and bound, that subsection 2 should be made a section by itself, possibly the last section in the Bill? It is one of the most important sections.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There could be no objection to making subsection 2 a section by itself, and it seems to me it would be all right to make it the last section.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It should be a separate section, and not a subsection.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. The same criticism could be made of other sections. While they are cognate in a sense, they are not closely cognate, always, to the sections where they appear, but still it was thought better to have them inserted in that way.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I think it was an afterthought.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was sufficiently previous to be in the Bill.

Mr. GRAHAM: It was a sub-thought.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There has been no estimate made of the number of local tribunals that will be required. It has been stated in the debate to-day that there were 1,200 municipalities in Quebec. It seems difficult to me to assume that we could get along by including very many municipalities in one tribunal, either in Quebec or any other province. Therefore, the number of tribunals will run to a great many hundreds if not thousands.

Mr. MARCIL: Will the minister explain why this clause, in reference to the Act coming into force, is inserted in the Bill at all? If there is such great urgency for it as would be imagined, after hearing the remarks of the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean), why is it not provided that it shall come into force at once?

Mr. MEIGHEN: This Bill requires regulations to be made, and certain preparations, and it is thought better to have it in this form, so that it could be made effective just as soon as it was thought proper.

Mr. MARCIL: The leader of the Government who proposed coalition evidently intended that this Bill should be submitted to the people in a general election.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think, if the hon. member will look at the letters which passed between the parties, he will find he is not correctly stating the position.

Mr. MARCIL: I understood the right hon. gentleman to say that, after the passing of this measure, they might go to the people.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The wording of the letters is much better than the understanding of any individual man.

Mr. MARCIL: The hon. Solicitor General cannot say whether this law is to be held up for any particular purpose?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, it is held up for its own purposes, if it is held up at all, not for political purposes.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: If we have a national Cabinet on the line proposed, there is no question as to when it will be enforced, and how well it will be enforced. The point which has just been raised is the point which is agitating the public mind in Canada. They know that if this Act is to be enforced there must be a united public opinion in support of it, and the way to get a united public opinion in support of it is a national government for war purposes, and the very argument that I presented, only a few minutes ago, has now been raised by hon. gentlemen opposite, and they must see that, if they are anxious to get this Act enforced—and I think the people of Canada are all anxious to have it enforced—there will be no question as to the date when it will go into operation.

Mr. MARCIL: The hon. gentleman must not misstate what I said. I am not anxious for the Act to go into force. I am anxious to have it submitted to the people, but I want to know why the Government, if there is such urgency, does not provide that the Bill shall come into force at once.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is an awkward question.

Subsection adopted.

On subsection 2 of the Schedule—Exceptions.

2. Members of His Majesty's regular, or reserve, or auxiliary forces, as defined by the Army Act.

Mr. NICKLE: Will the Solicitor General state whether this section will exclude the members of the permanent force from the provisions of the Act?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. NICKLE: If it should happen that a member of the permanent force was an officer, but was not a member of the Canadian Expeditionary Force, would he, as a member of the permanent force, be excluded from the provisions of the Act?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. NESBITT: What is the meaning of "His Majesty's regular forces"?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think these are defined in the Army Act.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: His Majesty's regular soldiers are the regular army of Great Britain.

Mr. GRAHAM: We have no regulars here.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: They may be living here.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It refers to the British Army and not to the Canadian Army.

Subsection adopted.

On subsection 3 of the Schedule—Exceptions.

3. Members of the military forces raised by the Governments of any of His Majesty's other dominions or by the Government of India.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That refers to members of the military force raised by any of the other Dominions of the Empire. The previous section refers to members of the army of the United Kingdom of Great Britain. A similar provision appears in the New Zealand Act.

Mr. GRAHAM: Have we some of them here?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: They might be residing here, but not very likely.

Mr. GRAHAM: They ought to be fighting somewhere.

Subsection adopted.

On section 4:

Men serving in the Royal Navy or on the Royal Marines, or in the Naval Service of Canada, and members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force.

Mr. PROULX: Does that include the men who are overseas?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes; also the members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force in Canada.

Mr. MARCIL: What about the men who have been discharged from that force and are still available for service?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The next clause exempts them.

Mr. GRAHAM: I brought to the attention of the Prime Minister the other day the case of young men under the minimum age mentioned in this Act, who had been to the front and who had returned home, wounded or gassed, for medical treatment. I mentioned a concrete case: that of a boy who enlisted when under seventeen years of age, has returned to Canada and is undergoing medical treatment. Unless some special provision is made, under the ordinary terms of his enlistment that boy will have to go back after he has recovered, while a man a year older than he is, who has not served at all, will be exempt under this Act. The Prime Minister said that he would take into consideration my suggestion that a young man who is under age, who has seen service and has returned for medical treatment, be not asked to go back to the front unless he desires to do so. Although cases of that kind have nothing to do with this Act, provision to cover them might be put in the exceptions, or something might be done under the ordinary military service regulations.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: That could not be put in the exceptions. A man, however, who is a member of the Canadian Expeditionary Force, or has been honorably discharged therefrom is excepted under this Bill. The question raised by my hon. friend has no application to this Bill, though his suggestion might be carried out under the regulations relating to the voluntary system.

Mr. GRAHAM: I see that quite plainly. I brought the matter to the attention of the Prime Minister the other evening in the absence of the Minister of Militia. I take this opportunity of directing the attention of the Minister of Militia to the matter.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: My hon. friend refers to young men who have been wounded and who are convalescent in Canada. Many soldiers about the age of nineteen are convalescent in France and in England. It must be remembered that very often, when friends and relatives of these men in Canada ask that they be retained in Canada, or in England, or that they be considered as having done their full duty, the young men themselves object. I had a case of that kind to-day. The parents of a young man made representations regarding his heart action. They had it in their mind, also, that he had varicose veins, and suggested that he should not be sent back to the front. Upon investigation, it was found that the young man was not troubled with either of these ailments; that he himself never heard that he had such things. So that if we adopted my hon. friend's suggestion we might debar some young men who have been slightly, or, perhaps, severely wounded, from carrying out their intention of returning to the front after their recovery. You could not very well discriminate between those in France or England and those in Canada. Some might not want to go back to the front; others might want to go back.

9 p.m.

Mr. GRAHAM: My suggestion was that they should not be compelled to go back if they did not desire to do so. I would not interfere with a young man in that respect; as a matter of fact, he could enlist the next day after his release if he wanted to.

Mr. GLASS: What about the young man within the age of the class called who had seen service, had returned to Canada, had been honourably discharged, and was physically fit to return?

Mr. MEIGHEN: He is exempted under clause 5 of the exemptions.

On subsection 5:

Men who have since August 4, 1914, served in the military or naval forces of Great Britain or her allies in any theatre of actual war and have been honourably discharged therefrom.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I suggest that subsections 5 and 6 be allowed to stand for the present. The Prime Minister desires to be present when the discussion with regard to them takes place.

Subsections 5 and 6 of the schedule stand.

Mr. MORPHY: Take the case of an officer who spends a year and a half fighting in the trenches, comes back, takes another regiment over, is unable to go to the front on account of there being too many officers, is returned to Canada and is anxious further to do his bit. Would he be debarred by subsection 5 from going with the forces to be raised under this Act?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, he is not debarred at all. This Act puts no restraint on him.

Mr. MORPHY: His services would be availed of if they were offered?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, yes. I have some other amendments to propose which constitute important additions to the Act. I have not a large number of copies of them for distribution, but numbers of them will be distributed and available on the table of the House to-morrow morning. I will read the section which I propose as section 16 of the Act, the present section 16 to be made section 17:

16. Any person who comes within any of the classes set out in section 3 and who contravenes any of the provisions of this Act or regulations made thereunder for which contraventions or other penalty is herein provided shall be guilty of an offence and shall be liable upon summary conviction to a penalty of not less than $100 nor more than $500 and to imprisonment for a term of not less than one month nor more than twelve months or to both fine and imprisonment.

(2) Any person why by means of any written or oral communication or by any public speech or utterance advises, urges or advocates that the men or any of the men mentioned or intended to be described or included in any of the classes hereinbefore mentioned shall contravene, disobey or refuse, neglect or fail to comply with all or any of the requirements imposed upon them by this Act or by regulations made thereunder or who wilfully resists, obstructs, hinders or impedes or attempts wilfully to resist, obstruct, hinder or impede, or persuades, induces or influences, or attempts to persuade, induce or influence any person or any body or class of persons to resist, obstruct, hinder or impede the due execution of this Act in any respect according to its true intent and purpose or for the purpose of obstructing, hindering or impeding the operation or administration of this Act to abstain from submitting for decision of the proper tribunals claims for exemption under this Act or the evidence available in support thereof or in any manner whatsoever to embarrass the Government or the minister in the administration of this Act or the regulations thereunder shall be guilty of an offence and shall be liable upon indictment or upon summary conviction to imprisonment for a term not less than one year nor more than five years.

(3) No proceeding authorized or pending before any of the tribunals provided for by this Act and no decision of any such tribunal shall by means of injunction, prohibition, mandamus, certiorari, habeas corpus or other process whether of the like kind or otherwise issuing out of any court be enjoined, restrained, stayed, removed or subjected to review or consideration upon any ground whether arising out of alleged absence of jurisdiction in the tribunal, nullity, defect or irregularity of the proceedings or any other cause whatsoever nor shall any such proceeding or decision be questioned, reviewed or reconsidered collaterally in any action or proceeding, civil or criminal.

(4) Nothing in this Act contained shall be held to mitigate or affect the punishment provided by any other Act or law for the offence of assisting the enemy; nor shall anything in this Act be held to limit or affect the powers of the Governor in Council under the War Measures Act, 1914.

(5) Any person who prints or publishes or causes to be printed or published in any book, newspaper, periodical, tract, pamphlet, circular or printed publication whatsoever any editorial, article, letter, correspondence or other matter intended or having effect to advocate, advise, persuade, instigate or influence the public or any person, body or class of persons to resist, obstruct, hinder or impede the due execution of this Act or compliance therewith in any respect or particular according to its true intent, meaning and purpose or for the purpose of impeding or defeating the operation or administration of this Act to abstain from submitting for decision of the proper tribunals claims for exemption or the evidence available in support thereof or in any manner whatsoever to embarrass the Government or the minister in the administration of this Act or the regulations thereunder shall be guilty of an offence and shall be liable upon indictment or upon summary conviction to imprisonment for a term not less than one year nor more than five years; and whether the printer or publisher of any such book, newspaper, periodical, tract, pamphlet, circular or printed publication shall have been first convicted or not the same shall be summarily suppressed and shall remain suppressed for the duration of the present war; and moreover the further publication of any book, newspaper, periodical, tract, pamphlet, circular or printed publication whatsoever in any issue of which any such editorial, article, letter, correspondence or other matter shall have been published is prohibited and the same shall be summarily suppressed and remain suppressed for the duration of the present war.

(6) This section shall come into force on the day of the sanction of this Act.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It would be better to put martial law into force at once.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What I have read is proposed as section 17 of the Act.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Will that appear in the Votes and Proceedings to-morrow morning?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I intend to have typewritten copies laid on the table of the House to-morrow.

Mr. NICKLE: It will appear in Hansard.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I suggest that the committee return to the consideration of the sections that have been reserved. I will ask the committee to return to the consideration of one or two that are passed on the understanding that the suggestions made regarding them would be considered and spoken to in the committee.

Mr. TURRIFF: Before we go back to those sections, I would suggest, in reference to exemption 6 that the Solicitor General is having a stand over, that we take into consideration the leaving out of that subsection altogether. It does not seem to me fair to the clergy to exempt them. In the different classes that are called they will be mostly young unmarried men between twenty and thirty-five. A large number of clergymen have gone overseas in connection with their own work or as trained soldiers to fight for their country and I think the discretion should be left with the tribunals to exempt any particular case, but in a general way the clergy should be subject to the same law as the rest of the people. I have objected to farmers being exempted as a class, and I think it is only right that the clergy should not be exempted as a class.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That section is not before the committee now.

Mr. PROULX: The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) should remember that under the Militia Act, the clergy are exempted. The exemptions in the Militia Act should be inserted in this Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The section that will be before the committee first is the first section reserved, namely, section 3. In respect of this section, it has not been found desirable to recommend to the committee the acceptance of any of the suggestions made. There were not many made and none pressed with regard to this section.

Mr. NESBITT: I was not here when that section was discussed. Take the first three classes. Supposing that there were 50,000 men in the first draft—is it proposed to call out only class 1 in the first place, and to pick those 50,000 out of class 1, if they can be secured?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Under this measure only one class can be called out at one time, but there is no necessity, under it, of completing the selection from that class until the next class is called out. I would apprehend that if, after class 1 was called, the mechanism provided by the Act is found to work out satisfactorily, just as soon as it would become apparent that there would not be enough men secured under class 1, class 2 or a sub-class of class 2, would then be called, as might be determined upon from the information obtained in the report on class 1.

Mr. NESBITT: If it appeared that you could get enough from class 1, you would not call class 2 at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think that is a very unlikely contingency.

Mr. NESBITT: I cannot agree with my hon. friend. I think it is very likely. 50,000 men in class 1, from 20 to 23 years of age inclusive, could readily be secured in this country, and I think it a great shame that these boys should be the only ones taken in the first draft. I am calculating on 50,000 men, not 100,000 men, being the first draft. It is a great shame and pity that the Government should take all these young men, and not call out the first three classes and take a certain proportion of the 50,000 from each of the first three classes. I seriously object to calling out only the first class and taking those young boys away from their homes without calling out any of the other men of this country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman may have his opinion as to the number that can be secured from that class, but I can only say that I very emphatically disagree with him. Still, on my part, that is only an opinion, and no one can tell. I apprehend that all three classes will be called before the number required by this Bill is obtained, and it is the intention to obtain that number.

Mr. NESBITT: Take the exemptions. The first exemption is:

Many of those young men have not yet taken up a profession in life, whatever that may be. The same is true of the second exemption. They could not claim that they would be better employed in some other particular work, because they have not been habitually employed in other work. The consequence is that the Government will get many more men from that class than they expect, and it is a pity and a shame that those boys should be taken away and the other men from 23 to 28 and from 28 to 34 should not be drawn upon at the same time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the hon. member thinks the matter out, he will come to the conclusion that even if his prediction is correct—and I think that is very unlikely —there is nothing in the nature of a shame. If what he recommends should be done, it would mean that there would be some between 20 and 24 who would be available and some who would be left.

Well, under his proposal there would be just the same shame, if you call it that, as there is in this, because the shame is between those who were taken between 20 and 24 and those who were left between 20 and 24. If there are more available to go than this Bill calls for, then the shame is between those who go and those who do not go.

Mr. NESBITT: My hon. friend takes the wrong meaning out of what I said. I do not mean to say it is a shame that some should be taken and some left. It is a shame that boys of that age should be selected out for the first fifty thousand men, without taking any of the others. A great many of these young men have never been away from home. They would be exposed to the temptations that might arise through being taken into the army, and so on. For that reason, and many others. I think the three classes should be called out together, and the selection made from the first three classes from 21 to 34 inclusive.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is quite possible the three will be called out so closely together that the hon. gentleman will find his anticipations are not realized.

Mr. NESBITT: I may tell the hon. gentleman I have given this subject a great deal of thought. I have thought about this particular section of the Bill ever since it was introduced. This is the part of the Bill I have always been opposed to in my own mind, because with all due deference to my hon. friend, I know he can select a great many of these boys out of practically every town in this country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the hon. gentleman will think longer I may be wrong and he may be right. However, just let me put this to him. If his prediction is right under his plan there will be, say, two boys, as he calls them, in the same position, both 23 years of age. Smith will be taken for the front, and Jones will be left at home.

Mr. NESBITT: You do that anyway.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think so.

Mr. NESBITT: That is what you call "selective".

Mr. MEIGHEN: What we do is this: we take Smith and Jones, but we leave at home for the time being Brown and White, who are between 24 and 28. According to my hon. friend's plan he would take Smith and White, one in the first class and one in the second class. Now I am not sure that Smith would feel any better at the front because Brown was left at home than he would feel if Jones was left at home.

Mr. NESBITT: That applies all around, no matter how you select them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The only difference is that Jones is the same age as Smith, and cannot see any reason why Smith should be left at home. White is a few years older, and there may be something in leaving him at home for the time being.

Mr. TURRIFF: I quite agree with my hon. friend from North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt). In the stress of war as war is waged at the present time, I am thoroughly convinced that the men between 24 and 28 years of age, as defined by class No. 2, are physically better able to withstand the trials. They are more mature, and are able to stand the hardships better than the young men of 20. They are also better able to withstand the temptations of a soldier's life, and we all know this is a very serious phase at any time. While I can quite agree with what has been advanced by the Solicitor General on previous days, that the men between 24 and 28 would probably make a slightly bigger hole in the affairs of the country if they were taken away, because of the fact that a man between 24 and 28 is more likely to be established in life, still I think it is absolutely certain, as my hon. friend from North Oxford says, if you want to get 50,000 men in the first draft you may get every one of them in class No. 1, from 20 to 24 years of age, and you may have a great many in the same class left. I think it would be an absolute mistake to take 50,000 men from the men between 20 and 24 years of age. I should think it would be much better to unite these three classes, Nos. 1, 2, and 3, into one class, and call them out together, and select your 50,000 men or 70,000 men from them. I believe 70,000 was the number mentioned by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister. In that way you would get the men from 20 to 35 years of age, and would not get them all between 20 and 24. There is a great deal in what my hon. friend from North Oxford has said, and I think it is well worth while allowing the matter to stand over so that the Solicitor General may look into it further with a view to seeing if he cannot unite those three classes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) has, it must be agreed, hit upon the real test as to whether selection should be made from the younger men first or those a little further on in life, namely, the test of fitness for the endurance of the war. His judgment of the fitness of the men, however, differs from that of the responsible leaders at the front. Sir Douglas Haig has very clearly stated that the men who endure the hardships of this war best are the men between 18 and 25. I am no judge of that myself, but if I were asked I should say I hardly think this possible. However, that is his statement. Then, there is another very important matter. The air service, which requires a physically perfect man, not only from the standpoint of health but from the very vital standpoint of nerve strength, restricts its men to the ages 18 to 25. These two considerations seem to me to put it beyond the discussion of this House as to what class of men really endure the hardships of this war best. That being the case, it would appear to me that other considerations are secondary, although they are important. I want to add this, under this Bill if it is felt after a very thorough canvassing of the situation that the whole number can be secured in the first class, or for any other reason if it is felt that there will be little difficulty in proceeding with the selection under the tribunals which have been inaugurated, we might very well call out class 1 on Monday, class 2 on Tuesday, and class 3 on Wednesday. For that matter, I think we might call one at nine o'clock, one at ten, and the third at eleven, on the same day.

Mr. OLIVER: Might I call attention to the United States Act placed on the Table to-day, which reads:

> Such draft as herein provided shall be based upon liability to military service of all male citizens, or male persons, not alien enemies, who have declared their intention to become citizens, between the ages of 21 and 30 years, both inclusive.

[Mr. Turriff.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know that is the United States Act.

Mr. MORPHY: I am rather inclined to fall in with the view of the member for North Oxford in regard to the classes as they are placed here.

I think, notwithstanding the statement alleged to have been made by General Haig, and having regard to the fact that our soldiers are citizen soldiers and the common knowledge that one has that a boy of twenty is after all hardly a man but only a boy, that his physical being has not been perfected and that his bones are not probably any too well set, there is something a little repellent and repulsive about the idea of putting an immature youth into a war of the nature of the present one. It is true that these young men have gone and it is splendid that they have gone willingly. Lots of them went at 16 years of age without any conscription. But it struck me while the discussion was going on that if class two were put where class one is, having regard to the argument that the force may be found in one or other of these classes, if the more seasoned, yet young, men were put first in class one and the younger boys put in class two, it would be following along a line that would be congenial to my thought and I believe would be very well received in the country. We all hear of Germany being forced to put her young men in the field. The Government might ameliorate the situation by making a different classification that would not prejudice the working out of the Bill. The Solicitor General says that all of these three classes will be required. If that is so the reversion of the numbers, putting number two where number one is, probably putting number three where number two is and putting number one where number three is, making number one the last of the classes, I believe would be a change that would not injure the working out of the Bill but would give to the first draft a full man's strength of those first selected, men steadier in their characters, more set in their frame and constitution, and more calculated to endure the rigours of war.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Would the Solicitor General tell me why there has been a departure from the English Act? He has been good enough to lay on the table of the House the two British Acts and in looking over these I can only find one class—from 18 to 41 years of age. Am I right in that?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Solicitor General has spent hours quoting what has been done in England for our instruction and example. In fact, our Bill in many respects follows the English Act, and yet in England their experience shows them that it is wise only to have one class running from 18 to 41 years of age, making no distinction between married men and unmarried men. Yet, in this Bill the measure is complicated by creating ten different classes, which seem to be founded upon an arbitrary age limit for which there is apparently no good reason whatever. I would like to know why it is that the British Act has been so greatly departed from in that particular?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not obliged, even in this instance, to depart from my veneration for British precedent. In Great Britain the Derby system was in effect for some time and a pledge was given by the then Prime Minister to the married men who had enlisted that before they were sent overseas —I may not be precisely stating it—the unmarried man would be required. The first Military Service Act of Great Britain was for the purpose of carrying out that purpose in the main. The whole number between 18 and 41 were taken, but the Act applied there only to unmarried men, not to married men at all. Later on it was made applicable to married men. In the circumstances public opinion in Great Britain had reached such a position and the position of the Government as to the requirements in France had reached such a condition that they knew that they would need every one and perhaps more than every one they could possibly get. Consequently their Act covered them all together, but their Act provided what our Act does not provide, and I would like hon. gentlemen to note this, that they might be called out as would be set out in regulations. There they had the power by regulations to make the divisions. They divided according to age in Great Britain. Those first were all taken and after that they took them in order of age by regulation, commencing with—

Mr. PUGSLEY: What age?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Eighteen.

Mr. GRAHAM: What was the first class?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will read the regulations:—

Groups and Classes.

For convenience of administration a further distinction will be observed between the voluntary attested men and men to whom the Military Service Act applies. The voluntarily attested men will, as hitherto, be divided into groups according to their age and marital condition. The men to whom the Act applies will be divided into classes corresponding to the groups of single men who have voluntarily attested.

These voluntary attestations were according to age and those called out under the Military Service Act were called out in classes corresponding to the ages of the conscripts called out under the voluntary system.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Could the Solicitor General give us those ages?

Mr. MEIGHEN: They are as follows:

Single men born in.	Group.
1899	B
1898	A
1897	1
1896	2

And for married men it is exactly the same.

Mr. TAYLOR: Mr. Chairman, I wish to endorse the arguments which have been offered in favour of combining the first three classes under this Bill. I agree with what the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy) has said about the greater suitability of those covered by the second class for the service which we require from these young men in a war of the kind in which we are engaged. From the military standpoint, I know that we would have much better service out of these three classes by combining them than by taking them singly in any order. It is quite true that Sir Douglas Haig is reported to have said that the very best service has been secured from the youngest men in the army, but I am quite satisfied that neither Sir Douglas Haig nor any other general officer, would be satisfied to have his battalion composed exclusively of these young men. We need the young men to give steam to the operations and we need the older men to give ballast. We have heard a great deal about the number of Canadians sent across to the Old Country and returned to Canada as rejects, as physically unfit. My experience is that that has been caused largely by the system they have there, particularly in the winter season, of discarding the very young and the very oldest classes of the Canadian Expeditionary Force.

Then, having got all these old men together, they send a large number of them back to Canada as unfit, and having got the boys together, they decide that they are not useful either and send them back or keep them for a very long period. If they were sent as battalions with the old and the young and the middle aged together, they would have for the military service 1,000 fit men, whereas, by the process of elimination that now goes on during the winter months, they have only 800 fit men and 200 rejects.

It seems to me that we would get much better service if we would combine the three classes first named in this Bill, and that the authors of the Militia Act who provided for the calling out first of all men from eighteen to thirty, based their decision very wisely.

Mr. MARCIL: From my hon. friend's experience, how long will it take these conscript troops before they are ready for the field?

Mr. TAYLOR: From my own experience in Canada, I may say that I had a battalion fully trained and ready for any experience that might be before it in six months from the date of authorization. We were kept in Canada after that for four months because of the falling off in recruiting. In June of last year the 131st Battalion was over the 1,000 mark, that being the strength supposed to be attained before a battalion was permitted to go overseas. From June until October the conditions for recruiting were so difficult, even in British Columbia, that we got new men only sufficient to meet the wastage in Canada, and when we got the order to go overseas in October we were only two over the 1,000 mark. Our training then was no better than it was in June, when we first reached the 1,000. We were not any better, probably we were a little stale if anything from discontent on the part of the men. When we got to England the battalion was found ready for any service, and the first draft of 500 men was sent to France within two weeks of our arrival in England.

Mr. GRAHAM: I think that if anything were needed to convince the House of the wisdom of the combination of these two clauses, the member for New Westminster (Mr. Taylor) has provided that argument. I feel very strongly on this point, as I outlined the other day. I am not sure that I would not make the minimum age twenty-one. This is not voluntary service; this is compulsory service, and we cannot base what we are going to do under this Act on anything that has occurred under voluntary service. You are compelling men to go, which is a far different thing from having them enlist. They can enlist at eighteen if they like. But there is a lot in what my hon. friend has said and also in the remarks of the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy) and the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt). No person need tell a man who has raised boys that the boy at twenty is as well seasoned as a man at twenty-five. I do not care what kind of theory you give, we know better. Any man who is engaged in athletics knows that a man does not play out at twenty-two or twenty-three, but is at his best at twenty-five or twenty-six. Any man who engages men to go to the bush or elsewhere to endure hardships does not want the boys. As the hon. member for New Westminster says, the young man is aggressive, aggressive, perhaps, to recklessness, and I agree that no commander would want a battalion of that kind unless he had the steadiness of the older men with them. Leaving out the domestic side of it—because taking a boy of twenty years of age from home by compulsion is a serious thing—to my mind no argument has been presented to show that the man of twenty is preferable to the older man. I have no hesitation in saying that no such argument can be presented. He is not mature.

There is another side of it. It has been stated as the intention of this Bill to take men who are not needed in this country, that is men who are less needed than others and who are not producing, but are rather consuming what others produce. If you go through the large cities and comb them to find out the men who are doing this thing, it will be found that they are not men between twenty and twenty-four, that more of them are between twenty-four and thirty. The young man of twenty to twenty-four is probably a student and perhaps resides at home, just getting ready for life. If men are going to be non-producers, you will find them between twenty-four and twenty-eight. I agree with the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy); I would reverse number two and number one at least. That would be my first suggestion. But, better than that, I would combine the three classes that have been named—first, second and third. In that way I think the desired number of men would be easily obtained, probably in this one class, and I have yet to be convinced that a better and more seasoned class of men would not be got with these three classes combined than you will get under the first class alone.

Mr. TURRIFF: I would also suggest to the Solicitor General to consider whether he should not change the minimum age in class one to twenty-one years instead of twenty, making the minimum age one year more than at present. If we were short of men I would not make that suggestion; if there was going to be any difficulty in getting 100,000 men in Canada under this Bill, I would not think of making that suggestion. But there is not going to be any difficulty in getting the men, and I think every one will agree that a young man of twenty-one is better able to meet the exigencies of a soldier's life than the man who is a year younger. I think it would be an advantage to leave the boy at home until he is twenty-one years of age.

Mr. GLASS: There are two reasons for giving consideration to the proposal to change the minimum age limit to twenty-one years of age: In the first place, we would be following the precedent set by the United States; in the second place, we would be responding to public opinion in this country. I have received requests from a number of organizations, women's organizations and others, urging that the minimum age be placed at twenty-one, and I understand that the Government have received similar requests, some from my own district. The arguments that have been presented by the hon. member for North Perth and the hon. member for New Westminster strongly impress on my mind the desirability of combining these three classes. Then it will be necessary to combine classes four, five and six, because they stand in exactly the same relation, only they happen to be married instead of single men. But, so far as the physical powers of the men are concerned, these classes are on all fours with classes one, two and three. I think the suggestion is a good one, and there should be no difficulty in getting the full complement from these three classes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not pretend to set myself up as an authority before the committee, as to when a man is most physically capable of standing the hardships of this war, first, because I am not an authority on physical fitness, and, secondly, because I do not know anything about the hardships of the war, and I would not think of placing my opinion against that of hon. gentlemen, especially those hon. gentlemen who have had as much to do with the militia as the hon. member from North Perth and the hon. gentleman from New Westminster. I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that, in Great Britain, they divide them according to age, but that was not because they expected to take all from the first age, namely, those born in 1899. That would be taking men who were only at that time 17 years of age. It was done merely for the convenience of enlistment. They knew, from the beginning, that they would require all of those ages that they could get. We are of the same opinion, and it is our intention to take, as I expressed it yesterday, those best available, wherever they are, and of whatever age they are. But we want to start at this age for this reason: under the Bill, if those first three classes are grouped, which is suggested by several, it will mean that all of them will be called at once, and they will all come before the local tribunal at the same time.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend said he could call one class at nine o'clock, another at ten and another at eleven o'clock the same day. Would that not be the same condition?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, that could be done, but it is in the public interest that we should be enabled to make the classes as they made them in England. They may be made in the United States in that way for similar reasons, under regulations. All men are made liable there, and all men are made liable here. We go further than the British and United States legislation, and we make classes ourselves, which, if all three were called together, would mean that all would come before the local tribunal on the day named in that call. That would mean the withdrawal from their ordinary avocation of all these men at once, and the reporting to these tribunals on the day fixed for reporting in the proclamation. We might get, by that means, far more than the alloted number. We want to avoid that if we can, but we also wish to avoid congestion of the tribunals, and the withdrawal from other avocations of life of everybody at once. We expect to require three classes. We may require four. Our expectations are not founded on anything that could be called sufficient data, but the purpose is to call some on one day, some on another, and some on a third day, and then to select from all these, but we do not wish to be compelled to call all at once, because it will be likely to result in the congestion of the tribunals, and it will unnecessarily call away at one time all these men from the ordinary avocations of life, and create a very unnecessary disturbance.

Mr. NESBITT: But they are only called out to report.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And to apply for exemption.

Mr. GRAHAM: The great majority will not apply for exemption.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. Solicitor General informed the House, in answer to a question, that nobody appeared before the tribunal, except the men who wanted exemption.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My statement was correct.

Mr. CURRIE: How does it come that every one of these men will have to appear before the tribunal?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I said all who wanted exemption would have to apply to the tribunal, and we feel it will not be convenient that they should be all called at once, because if they were, there might, and likely would, result a congestion of the work of the tribunal, and there would be an unnecessary withdrawal, at the same time, from the ordinary avocations of life of these men, some for the purpose of entering their applications for exemption, and others for the purpose of reporting, and all, ultimately, who are enlisted, for the purpose of recording. They could not all be taken at once very well. If the Bill read, "all who would be called upon" and that they might be called upon, as set out in the regulations, then we could follow what they do in Great Britain, and likely what they will do in the United States. But we go further, and do not ask the House to trust to regulations. We set out the divisions in the Bill, not that we feel we will get the men from one division at all, because we want to comb the available men at all events from the first three divisions, and if we find that we do not get enough from those divisions we will have to comb from the married men, but if we group the three classes the hon. gentlman from South Oxford will see it will mean the bringing in of all these men to report at once, the withdrawal of them from their avocations, and the bringing in of all who seek exemption, to make their applications to conduct the prosecution of their appeals, and so on. It will cause an unnecessary disturbance of industry and withdrawal from ordinary pursuits.

Mr. ROSS: Can my hon. friend tell me the number that would be lost by raising the age from 20 to 21?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I discussed that before. I do not know that I can add anything to what I said the other day. I am not anxious to make the age 21, even for the sake of following American precedent.

Mr. GRAHAM: Following our advice.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The American precedent has been urged. I think we will do well to keep within two years of the British precedent, and one year of the American precedent, rather than to get three years away from the British precedent, in order to get into line with the American procedure. Regard has been had to the fact that each and all of us have been endeavouring to get men of 18 and 19 to enlist voluntarily, and those who have responded have gone to the front at those ages, but there were others, who were equally able to go, living alongside of them who did not go, and there was some element of fairness in the argument that we should not, at all events, exempt too far down, out of consideration for the fact that boys of younger age had gone.

Mr. GRAHAM: Those that went at 18 are now 21, if they went at the beginning of the war.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Those who enlisted at 20 under this, will be nearly 21 before they go.

Mr. GRAHAM: The object of this Bill is to get the men.

Mr. OLIVER: No.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend says he does not agree with me. I am assuming that is the case. The little inconvenience which the Solicitor General refers to, in having all these men called out at once, should not interfere, even if it does exist, but, for the life of me, I cannot see where it exists. If only the men who are asking for exemption are really to be interfered with, it makes little difference whether they are interfered with on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday or Thursday.

Mr. NESBITT: And the putting of these three classes together might make some little difference in the manner suggested by the Solicitor General, but so little as to be unobservable, or practically no difference at all in comparison with the magnitude of the work in hand.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It just means three times the delay at the tribunal offices, and three times the crowding at the recording offices.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not think that is a serious objection. If necessary, there can be a greater number of tribunals. I think that would be one solution. I do not look at it as my hon. friend does. I do not anticipate a mighty throng coming before these tribunals to seek exemption. I believe that the majority of young men will not seek exemption unless there be some real, tangible reason why they should do so; the number who ask for exemption will be comparatively small. But if what the Solicitor General apprehends does occur, and there is a little congestion, that circumstance sinks into insignificance when compared with the advantage of putting these three classes in one.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We get the same results in the end.

Mr. GRAHAM: If my hon. friend gets the same results he will get the same congestion, but he will spread it over a few days longer.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, no.

Mr. GRAHAM: The Solicitor General thinks that he is not going to get the required number of men from the first and second classes; that he will have to call out all three classes. If that be the case, I see no reason why they should not be all called out at once. I do, however, see a reason why all the eligible young men in Canada between the ages of 20 and 24 should not be taken while the others are left. If, as the Solicitor General argues, it will be necessary to call out classes one, two and three in order to obtain the required number of men, then he has presented no argument to the committee why the three classes should not be combined in the first instance and called out in the same draft—unless it be that of congestion or of taking men from our industries. But it will not take a single man from the industries for a day or for a minute—only the men who are asking for exemption.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What about the reporting of the men? They would all report on the same day if they were all called out at once; there would be just three times as much reporting, and it would take days to look after that part of it. When I rise in the morning I am reasonably sure that I will require three meals on that day, but I do not on that account argue that I ought to take the whole three at breakfast time because, although some congestion might occur, I would get the same result. If we do nothing else, we avoid inconvenience by following the plan suggested in the Bill. Hon. gentlemen do not seem to realize that we can under the Bill obtain the same result, because we can

10 p.m. see that all three are called out and that different dates, perhaps not far apart, are fixed for the hearing by the tribunals and the reporting of each of the three classes. In that war not one single object is lost that would be gained by having all report at once and the tribunals sit on all at once.

Mr. GRAHAM: If my hon. friend is wrong in saying that the whole three classes will have to be called in order to secure the required number of men, under the Act as it stands he will denude Canada of the younger men and not touch the others at all. If he gets the required number of men between the ages of 20 and 24, he will not call out the others. I do not want to quote Germany as an example, but Germany, perhaps the greatest fighting machine in the world, calls out her boys last.

Mr. CURRIE: Excuse me. Germany's first army consisted of men under 24 years of age. The hon. gentleman should know that if he knows anything at all about it.

Mr. GRAHAM: I know that my hon. friend knows everything—in his own mind—and that is just as good to him as really knowing. He will allow me to disagree with him; there are many things even about the Canadian militia that he has yet to learn. If he will read the newspapers he will see that during the last few months Germany has resorted to calling out her boys.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Under the military age.

Mr. GRAHAM: That depends on what the military age is. But, whatever the military age is, I was referring to boys. No matter what my hon. friend says about the age of 24, I was talking about boys of 20. Germany calls out all her boys last; unless the cables are untrue she has called them out during the last few months.

Mr. CURRIE: I have a book here, the Here is what this year-book says, page the facts. I do not ask the hon. gentleman or the committee to accept my word for it. Here is what this Year-Book says, page 945, with reference to the German Empire and its state of defence:

> Military service in Germany is compulsory and universal, with the usual exemptions. Liability commences at the age of 17 and ends at 45, but actual service begins at 20. The term of service in the First Line, or active army, is seven years, two in the ranks and five in the reserve.

So that the first army in the trenches would consist of men from 20 to 22 years of age.

Mr. GRAHAM: That does not follow.

Mr. CURRIE: We will agree, then, that the age goes up to 27. But the reason why boys are called out now is because every year a certain number of them reach the age of 17, 18 or 20, as the case may be. Every year the Austro-German army gets over 800,000 additional men because that number of men become of age to enter the army. The young men may be called out at 19, at 18, or at 17—because they become liable to service.

Mr. NESBITT: At what age are the men of the German Empire put in reserve?

Mr. CURRIE: At the age of 23 they go into reserve and serve there for five years. The army comprised of men from 20 to 23 was the First Line army that fought the British at Mons. The reserves were called out and embodied while the first army was marching across the frontier. Then the first army was embodied for a month, or, say, two or three weeks. Then the second army or reserve was embodied, now ready for the field, bringing all the men between 23 and 27 into the army.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend has said a lot of things that are not stated in that book.

Mr. CURRIE: I am merely stating what I know to be the facts. I happened to meet some of the Germans over there, and I realized that the first German army was composed entirely of young men. Indeed, the German writers claim that men from 20 to 23 are the best soldiers.

When the First Contingent went over, a great number of men went who were under age. I do not say this to disparage the men under 20 who went to the front; no braver men ever fought for our King and country than the boys of 18. One who was a page on the floor of this House and who enlisted when the war broke out—he was then 16 years of age—is now a veteran who has seen service during two years and a half. The young men under 20 fought just as well as the men of 35 or 25. Moreover, they recovered their strength and spirits after a long day's march much more quickly than men 30 years of age. There is no reason why a man could not be enlisted to serve at the age of 18 and be just as good a soldier as the man of 25. I should not want the committee to say that these men do not fight well; many of them died bravely, standing their ground just as well as the older men. I have in mind one young man who was 16 when the war broke out. He lied about his age, went to the front, was wounded in battle, came home, re-enlisted after recovering, assisted in recruiting a battalion, went back to the front with his battalion, and is being held in England for another six months until he reaches the age of 19. Further, if you are going to call out no men younger than 21, what about the number of volunteers who are in the Old Country waiting until they reach the age of 19? There is some force in what the minister says. Germany, Austria, Russia, all the great nations, consider actual service in the field should begin when a man reaches the age of twenty years, and I do not see why we should not follow their example.

Mr. GRAHAM: In the United States, the age is twenty-one.

Mr. CURRIE: In the United States, the young men do not mature so fast as they do in Canada, and they are not as hardy. There is much in the suggestion of calling out the three classes together. I have been endeavouring, since I have read this Bill, to visualize what will happen when it goes into force. I thought I had the right animal by the ear when I concluded that every man who belongs to the class concerned and who reads the proclamation, when he finds that he has to go and serve, immediately reports himself to somebody. I thought I was right when I said that that somebody was the local tribunal. I was informed, however, that it was not. The man must report to some person who will take his name, address and so on, and who will make out his papers. Possibly there is a section providing that where nothing else applies, the Militia Act applies, and the Militia Act will apply with reference to enrolment. I think that is really what occurs, although the Solicitor General did not seem to be clear upon that point. As soon as the proclamation is issued, the man reports to some militia officer in his municipality or to the mayor, if there is no militia officer. The proclamation could appoint the mayor.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Look at section 13.

Mr. CURRIE: Subsection 1 of section 13, says that the Militia Act will apply where nothing else does. Under the Militia Act, the Government could appoint men in all parts of the country, and the conscripts could report first to these officers, and then, if they desired to apply for exemptions, they would have to go before a tribunal which would be similar to a court of revision. I was not clear on that point before, but I am very glad to understand it now, and I think the House will understand the matter from what the Solicitor General has said. The man must first of all report to some person, officer, or non-commissioned officer, appointed under the Militia Act, give his name, address, age and other particulars, and then get his papers. If he wants an exemption, then he must make application or have somebody make application on his behalf to the local tribunal.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He does not report through that officer.

Mr. CURRIE: No, but he can certainly state his objection to the officer, and he will be told to go to the tribunal with any objection he has. Is that correct?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is likely that the tribunal will sit before the day for reporting, so that the man can have his application in before he reports.

Mr. CURRIE: I think it would be better to have all the men report first, and then you would have a complete record of them.

Mr. DEVLIN: The hon. member has been giving explanations about the Bill. Perhaps he might explain what class the divorced man would come into. Would he come into the class of unmarried men or widowers? What class would the man judiciously separated as to bed and board come into?

Mr. CURRIE: I am not in charge of the Bill, but I would say that the divorced man would come under the category of unmarried men, because the Divorce Bills passed in this House state that a man, once he is divorced, is unmarried.

I wish to discuss the case of the married man who has a young family. I think the older married men, that is those from thirty-five to forty, should be taken before the married men from twenty to thirty. The younger married man generally has a very young family dependent upon him. His children are not of such an age that they can take care of themselves. Therefore, if you are going to take the married men, you should take first the married man who is likely to have a grown-up family. A married man of from thirty-five to forty will usually have some children who are old enough to take care of their mother in case something happens.

Mr. BURNHAM: That depends upon when the man gets married.

Mr. CURRIE: Men get married fairly young these days. Every commanding officer within the sound of my voice will agree with me that one thing that touches us all is that sometimes we have in the ranks fathers with three or four small children at home dependent upon them. The separation allowance does not provide sufficient for those children. The State could well afford a certain amount monthly for each child instead of stating a lump sum. There should be a lump sum for the mother and then five or ten dollars a month for each child. We are not, however, discussing that; we are discussing the categories. I trust the minister in charge of the Bill will give very serious consideration as to whether the Bill had not better provide that when you are going to take a married men's class you should take, first, men over thirty instead of men under thirty. In regard to the marrying section, I would like the minister to consider whether it is exactly according to Hoyle that no one who is going to be conscripted is to be allowed to get married. That is virtually what happens, because it is stated that unmarried men who get married after a certain date will not be considered as married within the meaning of this Act.

Mr. DEVLIN: Will not that be against morality and public order?

Mr. CURRIE: I do not think this Parliament should put any obstacle in the way of a man getting married. At Valcartier I was strongly against any young man who was going to the war getting married, and I would not allow many young men to get married. After I reached England I found that the people there held different views, and they were endeavouring to encourage every young man who was going to the war to get married. I came to the conclusion finally that that was the correct idea.

Mr. DEVLIN: What is the practice in France?

Mr. CURRIE: The same as in England. Every young man, before he goes to the war, is supposed to get married. The matter is one of the protection of the race as well as anything else, and it was discussed pro and con in the English papers. The people there finally decided to encourage and permit all their young men to get married before they went to the war. As I said before, I changed my views on the subject, and I subsequently permitted every young man under my care who wished to get married to do so. I hope this measure will not throw any obstacle in the way of any man getting married, and if he gets married I hope he will be put in the married men's class. There are not enough men getting married nowadays.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: In view of the objections that the Solicitor General has raised to merging the first three classes, and in view of the possibility of getting sufficient men in the first class, I think the suggestion offered by the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy) was a very good one, that is, that class 2 should be called first, and either class three or class 1 following class 2. In the event of enough men being called out under class 1, I can hardly imagine that battalions of mere youths would be as desirable as would battalions in which older men were intermingled with younger men. As the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Taylor) has pointed out, the older men would add some ballast to the younger men.

And I am sure, from what I have seen myself, that older men placed alongside the younger men would be a very great advantage indeed. I do not think it would be advisable to call out those under 23 or 24 years of age first, if there was any possibility of getting the required number of men from that class. I can hardly help feeling that the first call of say 50,000 men would be met in that class. I think there are surely a sufficient number of men in that class who are eligible, and who have no claims to exemption, to bring the number up to at least 50,000, and personally I would not like to see battalions of mere youths drafted, and older men left at home. I think the suggestion of the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy) that class 2 should be called first is a very good one, in view of the objections the hon. the Solicitor General has put forth to merging the three classes.

Mr. DEVLIN: I would like to repeat my question to the Solicitor General although of course the member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) gave me an answer. Take the case of a man in the province of Quebec who is separated as to bed and board, where the wife is given entire charge of the children. Would such a man, if he remains married, be placed in the category of married men, and exempt in cases where married men would be exempt, or would he placed in the category of widowers?

[Mr. Currie.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: I should say that is not a matter of administration, but rather a matter for the interpretation of the judiciary. To my mind the man referred to by the hon. gentleman is still married. A judicial separation does not dissolve a marriage.

Mr. GRAHAM: Should not the Act be amended to include him?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think so, because his domestic obligations may exist just the same. I do not think we should keep refining the Act for the sake of two, or three, or even half a dozen men. I wish to draw this to the attention of hon. members—let us not be worrying ourselves too much by the fear that there will be a tremendous and immediate result from any cause. If such should be the case, it would be very different from what took place in Great Britain, and I do not know of any reason why we can expect such a very pronounced and enthusiastic response and absence of application for exemption in Canada, in contrast with what took place in Great Britain. It would appear to me to be rather likely on examination of the conditions there, as to nearness to the war, and conditions here as to that and many other things, that the contrast would likely be the other way. Most earnestly I hope it will not be so. Still, let us not worry ourselves in this House by the dream of possibilities that are not warranted by the experience of countries which have tried the selective draft system. In Great Britain, the experience was that the number of applications for exemptions far exceeded all expectations, and the number of exemptions exceeded the expectations by a large percentage. Only by a tightening up of the Act, by regulation and by amendment, and by a strict and severe system of appeal, were they able to obtain the men they expected to obtain from the beginning. Here in Canada, have we reason to believe from the record of our voluntary enlistment, as compared with Great Britain, that we are going to get results far more favourable and far more satisfactory than they achieved there? Grand though our record is, I am afraid we cannot boast it is better than the experience of Great Britain.

That being the position, we have every reason in the world to anticipate that we will require all the available men in the first three classes. "Available" is a term which has no very exact meaning. It is a term that may mean one thing or another. We want the 100,000 best available men.

We think we can get the 100,000 best available men under the provisions of this Bill, consequently the working out of the Bill and the getting of them, believing that we will have the whole first three classes to comb through at all events, is to divide them into classes in order that the machinery which we here provide may not be unnecessarily congested. We may call them out just as quickly as we like, and we may call out class 2 ahead of class 1, if we wish.

Mr. GRAHAM: Then, why not do it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Because the Act is all right as it is. There is no sound reason for it, and what reason there is would be against it. At least, that is my judgment. But, supposing I am wrong, it will come to the same thing in the end. The classes will be called in such order as will be most expeditious and consistent with the efficient working of the machinery, and we hope to get the best available men out of each of these first three classes. I would ask the committee not to refine unnecessarily in this matter. We will undoubtedly need all the men we can get.

What new spirit has come over the House which makes it feel that we can come to the conclusion there are far more men in this country than we will need for the war? We will need them all. We will need this 100,000 men, and we will need them as quickly as we we can get them. I hope we will never need any more. When we come to get 100,000 more, after the voluntary enlistment we have had, we will not find them coming to us pell-mell. Our experience will be the experience of the older countries, and we must unite, and try to get the men, or at least have the machinery to get them in the most efficient way.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not want to be considered too obtrusive in this, but I rather made up my mind to-night that the invitation of the Government to this committee to make suggestions was merely a play upon words.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the hon. gentleman will permit me to get from this clause to some others, I will convince him by actual acceptance of suggestions that it was nothing of the kind. I am sure I do not wish to impose my will on the committee, but I do not want the Act to be altered for no purpose in such a way that it will result in the unfortunate working of the machinery of the Bill. We get the purpose that hon. gentlemen have in mind under the Act as it is. There is no other object that can be served. Consequently, it becomes a matter of the smooth working of the Act, nothing more and nothing less. Suggestions have been made which have been found very valuable, and I propose to recommend their acceptance to the House.

Mr. GRAHAM: I was dealing with this one just now, and this will be my last word on it. Taking every word the Solicitor General has said, and it is an argument in favour of the proposition made by other members of this committee, if he is right that it will take the three classes then no difference will be made in this selection by combining them. If he be right in saying that it will take the three, there is no reason why he should not take them at once except the little inconvenience if any, that will be caused. If he is wrong, then he is going to call out boys from 20 to 24 before he calls out the others.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We could not take them altogether in any event by calling out the three at once. It will be the appeal tribunals, who, by the severity or leniency of their interpretation of the exemption clauses, will decide just how many we get. Secondly, we hope we shall get on with a not too severe application of the Act. We will apply it equally everywhere. That will be the controlling idea. We are going to utilize the whole three classes.

Mr. GRAHAM: If you are going to take the whole three classes why do you not do it at once? The Solicitor General argues from my point of view every time he speaks. If it is so that he will take the three classes he has not presented any argument at all for not taking the three classes at once except that of a little inconvenience. He might do away with that by calling them out at 9, 10 or 11 o'clock or Mondays, Tuesdays or Wednesdays.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They have to report at different times.

Mr. GRAHAM: That may be so but at the most it is only a little inconvenience and I do not think the committee takes that argument seriously. It is not a serious matter compared with the result of denuding the country of its boys of from 20 to 24 while these other men are not required to go over.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no possibility of that.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is the hon. gentleman's opinion and he is entirely free to express it, but he is wrong.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is not a matter of opinion at all. Whether I am right or wrong, the Government can call out the whole three classes and take the most available men of the three. That is the intention.

Mr. GRAHAM: The Solicitor General says for the first time that that is the intention. He contended all along that that could not be done. He never said that it was the intention to use the whole three classes for the first 50,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I venture to say that I have said it half a dozen times.

Mr. GRAHAM: I have been trying during the three or four times that I was on my feet to get the hon. gentleman to say that. If he does that he can put them into one class. There is no reason for not putting them into one class.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Except the matter of convenience which is very important.

Mr. GRAHAM: The matter of convenience enters into it very little, if at all. We are leaving it in the hands of the tribunal or the Government to say whether they will call out class one first and get the whole 50,000 out of that class. The refusal of this suggested change by the Solicitor General does not give us the guarantee that we would like to have that they would treat these three classes as one. I will not vote for that clause in the Bill as it stands now because there is no reason, except the paltry excuse which has been given by the Solicitor General, for leaving it there.

Mr. MORPHY: I would like to ask the Solicitor General to take a totally different view. I cannot understand his view when he says that it is for convenience that the classes have been placed in this way. Convenience would be furthered by combining the three classes from 20 to 34 years of age. Doing away with two classes would simplify the Bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Bill would be simpler but the working out of the Bill would be much more difficult. If they were all in one class they would have to be called together; consequently they would have to report together supposing they did not get exemptions. That would congest the reporting and cause unnecessary delay on the part of those waiting for their turn for perhaps days. Consequently, it would congest the local tribunals before whom applications for exemptions were being made and heard. Hon. gentlemen may entertain the opinion that there will be no inconvenience. On this matter the officers of the Militia Department have been consulted. They regard very seriously this matter of convenience. The question of compensation to applicants for certificates of exemptions pending the determination of their cases has been under consideration. It has been decided that it be not granted; otherwise it would be in the Bill. The introduction of anything which will create inconvenience is opposed very strongly by those who have to do with the working out of the Act. There will be delays, men will be kept 10 or 20 miles away from their avocations and if we have the three classes apply at once there will be unnecessary inconvenience to the individual and unnecessary expense to the country. That is the argument as to convenience. There can be no question about that, at all events, to my mind. Of course, I would agree with my hon. friend from Perth (Mr. Morphy) that that would be met just as well by putting class two where class one is. There would be no difference one way or the other, but the congestion which would be caused by calling the three classes together is to be avoided.

Mr. MORPHY: It is difficult to speak very specifically on matters dealing with the man-power of the country, but as plainly as I can speak, I want to do so. The reason that moved me to suggest that the classes be reversed and that the older unmarried men and widowers without children be taken before the boy of 20 is that I can point to town after town where the pool rooms and picture shows are filled with young men from 24 and 25 years of age, while the boys of 18 and 20 have gone to the front. I want to reach that class. If the Solicitor General will utilize his undoubted ability in some way to reach that class he will give great satisfaction to the country. I do not think it is fair to put through a Bill which on the face of it calls from a good home the young fellow who has reached 20 years of age and forces him into the limelight as a conscript, when men of the class that I have mentioned all over the country, men who drive their motors, frequent pool rooms, go to the picture shows, enjoy all kinds of amusements and have no patriotic spirit, are left at home. These are the men that I want to get after and they are the ones that I want to get after first. If there is to be any class singled out, it should be the men who should have gone to the front at first and not the young fellow with green bones who is growing up and who will be taken out of a good home while these fellows are going around in idleness and making fun of the war.

Mr. RAINVILLE: There is a part of the community that we should not forget, and that part is represented by the pedlars. I refer to the pedlars who have gone from Canada to the United States, the pedlars who have come from England to Canada, and the pedlars who are in the army. We see them in Montreal and elsewhere. They pass from one regiment to the other. My hon. friend from Perth (Mr. Morphy) says that he wants to get after the young fellows who go to the picture shows. I would like to get after the deserters from the army. We have had a wastage of 73,000 in the army, half of which is due to unavoidable causes and the other half to deserters.

The hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) referred to an editorial in a Detroit newspaper welcoming 17,000 Canadian boys. Where did these boys come from? They came from Canada. We have heard a lot about slackers. I shall never give the name of slacker to a man who has not enlisted, but who has remained in Canada. But the man who has gone from Canada to the United States in order to evade military service I would call a slacker, and if we are honest and sincere in our desire to get after slackers why not get after the 17,000 in Detroit, and, perhaps, another 17,000 in other cities not far from the boundary. What are they doing there? They are not working; they have some one to pay their board; they are well-off people from Canada, rich men's sons. We have some slackers here from England to be found in insurance offices in Montreal. Going into these offices one would think he was in the city of London, from hearing their language. They do not ask for a salary; they are supposed to be working on commission, but they do not care if they put on one, or two, or three insurances per month, as they receive their cheques from home. These are slackers. But we have something more. I have here the immigration report of the United States. In 1913 the emigration from Canada to the United States was 43,000, in 1914 it was 43,000, in 1915 it was 59,000, an increase of 16,000, and in 1916 it was 85,000. It is no wonder that the Detroit paper speaks of 17,000 Canadians when you have in two years an increase of 58,000 over the normal emigration from Canada to the United States. Are we going to let these boys stay there, these pedlars men who go from one regiment to another, or from one country to another? These young men will not serve in the United States or in Canada. They are beautiful boys, strong and healthy. Why not take some steps to get them back? The man in Canada to-day should not be called a slacker, but every man who went to the United States to avoid military service deserves that name, and the difference in the immigration figures before and since the outbreak of war shows conclusively that these men went there for the purpose of avoiding military service. The day after the Prime Minister announced conscription there were 73 applications in one office in Montreal for passports to enable boys to go to Mexico. They were not going there to work. These young men have stayed in our country, but this incident shows that we have a part of our population who will go anywhere to avoid military service. These Canadians who have gone to the United States retain all the rights of British citizenship, and when conscription is being introduced into Canada the first duty of the Government should be to bring these men back. The Government should also go after the deserters who make up a part of the shortage of 73,000 men. I know that some of these men are in some of our parishes, and notice should be given that they are liable to punishment.

Mr. McKENZIE: In what way could this Government bring these men back from the United States?

Mr. RAINVILLE: By an arrangement similar to that entered into between the United States and Great Britain, or that between the United States and France by which thousands of Frenchmen are being sent back to France. An arrangement could easily be made for the exchange of such men.

Mr. McKENZIE: I know of no process of law that will run in a foreign country, and I want the hon. member to explain how they could be brought back under this Bill.

Mr. RAINVILLE: It would require the consent of the United States Government to send them back.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is another matter entirely.

Mr. RAINVILLE: I would strongly urge that these slackers who have gone to the United States should be brought back.

Mr. NESBITT: The Solicitor General in arguing against the combination of these three classes quoted the British Royal Aviation Service as taking men under twenty-five. That is quite right, but the reason given by them was that the young man under twenty-five was likely to take greater chances. Besides that, he had to have an intricate knowledge of a certain kind of machinery, and everybody knows that the younger a man is, practically speaking, the more apt he is to pick up knowledge of machinery, because he is not so set in his views, or he has not had a training in some other line of business. He is apt to learn more quickly the organism of the machine he has to manipulate, and is much more apt to take hazardous chances. I understood from the men who were recruiting that that was why they wanted younger men. In addition to that, younger men were lighter. Anybody familiar with athletics knows that the younger a man is the better athlete he generally makes, provided he is over 18 years of age, because his bones are not so hardened, and he can be trained into greater activity. I refer to the foot runner and the field athlete. They are more amenable to training and can be more serviceable for that reason. Any one who has had experience in training in any walk of life knows that the man who has his growth, and whose bones are set for every day plodding work, is more matured than the young man from 20 to 23 years of age. My hon. friend from West Simcoe told us what the regular army in Germany was. I have seen a great many people from Germany in my time, and I have read a great deal about the German army, but I do not believe anybody else has ever said that the first German army was composed of men from 20 to 22. I am quite sure I never heard it before, although my hon. friend read it out of a book. That was their ages when they were enlisted, but are not retired till they are 45, and I have no doubt the German guards, the greatest of the German soldiers, is composed of men of more mature years. The hon. gentleman from North Simcoe also stated that these young Canadians were brave and made good soldiers. There has been no suggestion or hint that they are not. We all agree that they have done nobly, but there is no possible doubt that they are not as safe, when exposed to the temptations of military life, as the men of more mature years, and there is no doubt there was more sickness, according to Dr. Bruce's report, among the younger men than among the older men. I absolutely agree with my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. Taylor) who has had the experience, apparently, that if these three classes were combined they would make a steadier army. The Solicitor General asks, what reason have we to suppose that there would be 50,000 men to be got from the first class? I ask, what reason have we to suppose that there would not be 50,000 men obtained from the first class? Suppose there were a great many applications for exemption, what reason have we to suppose the tribunal would allow those exemptions, because those are the very class that are not in a fixed avocation? I do not believe that the tribunals would allow those men to be exempted to such an extent as they would perhaps exempt the older men. No reason has been given by the Solicitor General, from start to finish, why the three classes should not be combined, except for convenience of registration and convenience of exemption. I have not the slightest idea that the registration will have to be done in one day, no matter how many classes are called out. I have no hesitation in thinking that whoever makes the regulations will have sense enough not to make them all register in one day, but will give a number of days for the registration, and a number of days for applications for exemption. There is no need whatever to have all the men apply on the one day for exemption or registration.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Assuming there would be seven days allowed, why should we have all the men waiting around, during that time?

Mr. NESBITT: There is no necessity for that. The advertisement can easily state that the men of certain ages will register between certain days.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then my hon. friend is dividing again?

Mr. NESBITT: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The result is the same as if the whole three classes were to be called, in any event.

Mr. NESBITT: I beg pardon, it would not have the same result. They would all be called at the same time, but the notices would state that men between certain ages would register between certain dates. If the Solicitor General will tell us definitely that some system of that kind will be provided in the regulations such as he suggested a few days ago, it will be quite satisfactory, but why not have it in the Bill and let the regulations provide, as they do a great many other things in the Bill, how they shall be called out, and make them all one class. The Solicitor General may know more about law than the ordinary man, but other people have just as good ideas as to the number of men that will be called out, under these classes, as he can possibly have, and he will be more than surprised at the number of men who will be liable to be called in that first class in every town and city in this country, and if they are all exempted, of course he will not get the desired number. However, I take it for granted the tribunals will use common sense in their exemptions.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It can be done as my hon. friend suggests, by grouping the three classes, and leaving the regulations to divide them.

Mr. NESBITT: Only for registration.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That, in effect, is the same as it is now. It is the intention of the Government, as I have already stated several times, that the whole three classes shall be resorted to, because we believe that will be necessary in order to get the 100,000 men, without interfering unnecessarily with industry. I am very glad to hear the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Oxford, because I know he is sincere, and he believes that the 100,000 men can be procured quite easily without interfering with industry at all, and without taking any of those who, in the national interest, are better at home, but he must remember that for days, for weeks and for months in this House, hon. members who sit not very far from him have told us over and over again, in language of more or less menace, and very much verbal force, at all events, that we could not get more men in this country without denuding our population of its productive element, without interfering with agriculture, and without interfering with industry of every kind to a serious extent, from the point of view of prosecution of the war.

The member for North Oxford is more nearly right than were those hon. gentlemen. I was glad to hear that expression of opinion from him. I myself think that we can get the 100,000 men without any diminution of production, but I do not see that we will get them so very easily without more applications for exemption than the hon. gentleman anticipates.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is surprising that the Solicitor General should inform the committee to-night that it is intended to call out the three first classes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have said that from the beginning.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Not at all. But we have a still higher authority than the Solicitor General. We have the authority of the Prime Minister, who made an entirely different statement to this House on July 7. I took the liberty then of saying that it was most injudicious that the young men from 20 to 23 should be first called out for service, and it was argued by the Prime Minister and the Solicitor General that that was the class of men that could best be spared. The inference to be drawn from their argument was that it was in the best interests of the country that these young men should be first called out. It was contended that they would make the best soldiers, that they could best be spared from the industries, that they were not settled down in various occupations. What did that mean? It meant that if the number of men required could be obtained from the men of the first class, the second class would not be touched, nor would the third, the fourth, or any of the remaining classes. Let me read what the Prime Minister said on that occasion. Referring to some remarks which I had made, he said:

> If my hon. friend has any better suggestion which will commend itself to our judgment we are prepared to consider it. Would it be worth while to place all those between 20 and 35 in one class, call them out at once, and, perhaps, get 300,000, or 400,000, or 500,000, when we really only want 100,000? We may get 100,000 men in the first class.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He did not say he expected to.

Mr. PUGSLEY: He did not say he expected to? When the Prime Minister, who is responsible for this Bill, who has presented to the House figures with reference to our population, says: we have established ten classes; we purpose taking them in the order in which they are placed on the statute, but we may get the whole 100,000 from the first class; are we to assume that he meant what he said? Yet the Solicitor General says: Oh, he did not say he would be likely to get the required number from the first class. The statement of the Prime Minister meant that all the men required would be taken from the first class if they could be got. Yet the Solicitor General, after the strong arguments presented to-night by members on both sides, says: Oh, we will get over that, because we may at 9 o'clock in the morning call out the first class, at 10 o'clock call out the second class, and at 11 o'clock call out the third class; it is only for convenience that we have arranged these different classes. His statement is a surprising one, and entirely at variance with the statement made by the Prime Minister a few evenings ago. The Solicitor General says that to adopt the suggestion of the member for North Oxford would be doing the very thing that this Bill allows to be done. But what the member for North Oxford says is this: the call would be upon all these three classes if they were united in one, and for convenience those of a certain age might register in one booth and those of another age in another. That does not mean that the men would be in three separate classes; it means that they would all be called out together, but that, for convenience of registration, or reporting, they would be allowed to report at different places, according to their age. The same result might be accomplished in another way, perhaps more conveniently. Those whose names begin with certain letters, say from A to G, could register at one place, those from G to M in another, and so on—speaking, if you like, of the same village or parish. Notwithstanding what the Solicitor General has said, this Bill imposes a first obligation upon the young men between the ages of 20 and 23 years inclusive. The second obligation is upon those from 24 to 28 inclusive, and so on up to 40 years of age. It seems to me that the three classes should be united in one, just as was wisely done under the Militia Act, and that the unmarried men should also be united in one class. This should be insisted upon until the Bill is amended in order to meet the view of the majority of the committee. If this Bill passes, the Solicitor General will have no power by regulation or otherwise to avoid imposing the first duty upon the first class. Upon the first class will rest the call to active service. If an insufficient number of men are obtained by that call, then the second class would be called upon. As the Prime Minister said, it might not be necessary to call upon the men of the second class; that class could be divided into two sub-classes, one of which could be called first. No power on earth—central appeal judge, Solicitor General, Governor in Council—can alter the meaning and intention of the Bill if it is allowed to pass in its present form; that is, that the first obligation shall rest upon the young men between the ages of 20 and 23 inclusive.

[Mr. Pugsley.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman has exercised his much-practised talent of sufficiently misstating the case in order to give a wrong intention. The first obligation is not on the young man; the obligation is on all, and is fixed on all by this Bill. The order of call is all that is fixed, there is no order of obligation. The order of call is fixed in England by regulation on the very same principle as that upon which it is fixed here; it could be done that way here with the same result. Our statute gets the same result as obtains in England by grouping the men together and dividing them afterwards by regulation for the purposes of the call.

Mr. McKENZIE: Are not these divisions made for the purpose of calling the classes out in their order?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is it not true that you call the first class, and that if you do not get enough men from that class you go to the second, then to the third, and so on? Is that not the purpose of the Bill?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is worded so as to enable us after we have called out sufficient classes—it is the intention to call out three at least—to subdivide in such a way that we will not get more than 100 000 men. I think the Prime Minister stated at one point—I say this subject to correction—that there was no possibility—and he added the words "or likelihood"—that we could get this number from the first class. It was never so contemplated.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Prime Minister's exact words will be found on page 3252 of Hansard.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The order of the call is fixed by the Bill. It is a matter of policy how many you set out to make certain that you call. We might set out to call a minimum of three. We may be compelled to call more than three, but we shall, at all events, know how many as we proceed, and we test the machinery of the Act by these calls as they proceed. That is all I have stated. As I have said before, I do not want to impose my view as to physical fitness or to anything, or to recommend it to the committee at all. I have had some consultations with those who should know better than I as to this subject of convenience, and I must say that my opinion on that point has not been moved in the least. I think, however, it only just to the committee, in view of the opinions expressed by the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) and others on each side of the House, that I should not take the responsibility of asking that section 3 pass to-night in its present form.

Mr. NESBITT: I thank the minister. That was just what I was going to ask him to do.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think it is my duty to bring those matters to the attention of my colleagues and to ask that this section be considered when the committee meets again.

Mr. McKENZIE: There is one thing about this Bill that so far I have not been quite able to understand. This measure is called by the Government and by the people throughout the country "Selective Conscription." I have not been able to find the selective element in the Bill or in the machinery that is about to be put into force. The term "Selective Conscription" as understood in the United States means that the men are selected for their physical attainments and other reasons, and the Government secures, out of the men who have registered, a selective class to fill up the number they require. As I understand this Bill, on a certain day, a call goes out for all the men of class 1 to register at certain places. They come and they register. Every man who registers is supposed to be drafted into a battalion and go through the necessary steps until he reaches the front. Up to that stage, there is no selection at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is in the United States?

Mr. McKENZIE: No, here. The man who registers, has enlisted, practically the same as if he has volunteered. That is the end of the matter. Unless he appeals to this tribunal, he goes through the various steps until he reaches the front. I cannot find any selection so far. The only selection would be if the man appeals. If nobody appeals, there is no selection. Where does the selective element come in? Perhaps the minister will tell me what he understands by selection. I do not regard appealing and the decision by the Court of Appeal, as selection at all. That is merely the result of a man protesting in a certain way against going, and appealing to the court and the court sustaining his protest. I fully agree with the views put forward by the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy) as to the class of men that we should first select. I do not take all the grounds that the hon. member put forward, such as that many of them are idlers. That may be. I argue on the ground that we get the better class of men from the ages mentioned by the hon. member for North Perth, and that we should leave the others for the present until they reach a maturer age. What I particularly want to point out to the minister is in regard to the idea that the Government by their own act shall select the men who should go and leave out the men who should not go. So far as I have heard the discussion, there is no machinery per se in the Act itself.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am assuming that after this measure becomes law, there will probably be a short opportunity for voluntary enlistment. On that assumption I wish to put a suppositious case to the Solicitor General for the purpose of inquiring whether the point has ever been before him for consideration. Suppose the Act is enforced to-morrow, and a call for 50,000 men is made. Suppose the Government statistician informs the Solicitor General or the Minister of Militia that the proportion which my own province, for instance, would be liable to contribute towards that call, would be 2,500 men. Suppose, immediately after the call was made, two men of military experience advised the Minister of Militia that they could each recruit a battalion of 1,250 men, making a total of 2,500 men, the proportion assignable to Nova Scotia under that suppositious case, what would be the policy of the Government in such circumstances? Would the voluntary enlistment of 2,500 men be regarded as the equivalent of the call which might have been made under the Act? Would the province have credit for the number so voluntarily enlisting, and would the call under the Military service Act be postponed or abated or discontinued altogether until the next call was issued. Such a condition might possibly arise, and if so, there should be some provision in the Act to meet it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Act, of course, does not allude to provinces.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I know that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And there is no intention of discriminating between provinces at all. The Act does not deal with the Dominion as so many provinces; it deals with the Dominion of Canada as a nation. The contingency that my hon. friend presents is not something that has to do with the purpose, spirit or details of the Military Service Act; it would be a matter of policy on the part of the Government.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I admit that. The question I meant to put to the Solicitor General was, if it would not be wise to provide in the Bill for such a contingency. Possibly, that provision should be in another Bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This Bill provides that while voluntary enlistment is authorized, any one can voluntarily enlist, and if the men to whom the hon. gentlemen refers, who claim they could raise battalions in Nova Scotia, presented evidence to convince the department that they could do so, then undoubtedly if voluntary enlistment was still authorized and was not stopped by specific Order in Council or specific statement of policy, those men, or one of them, would be authorized to recruit. It would all depend upon the same considerations that now determine the department in authorizing battalions.

Mr. OLIVER: Do I understand the minister to say that once a call is issued there would be no variation from that call because of a proposal of voluntary enlistment?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have no reason to suppose there would be. I do not suppose there would be. Once a call is issued, it is the intention to carry the call out, and to get the men.

Mr. NICKLE: I would like to add a word of entreaty to those which have already been addressed to the minister in charge of this Bill in reference to the advisability of some change being made in the order in which the men are to be called. I had no intention of saying anything in regard to the subject, as I had hoped that what had been said by other members might have moved him to the acceptance of the principle that boys of twenty would not first be called. I have not one word to say in disparagement of what the young fellows of 18 and 20 who enlisted early in the war have done.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. NICKLE: Because I know from stories that have been brought to me by those who have been at the front, that those young boys without military experience have gone over the parapets as subalterns and as privates, and have smilingly faced death. But I am not unmindful of the fact that a young man of twenty has not attained the fulness of his physical perfection, and it seems to me not unreasonable that the parents in this country should have the right to request the Government to give the young boy who has not yet left home an opportunity of remaining there until, to use a stereotyped expression, he has gristle into bone.

I know from observation, and I know from what has been told me by men from the front, that the arduous life that the youth in the trenches has to lead has a tendency to restrict physical development. If the Government carry out the object as expressed in the Bill, I think they will bring this measure into effect in a way that will cause the greatest sorrow and the greatest anguish in the homes of Canada, because they are going to take the boys that the mothers of Canada believe are not as yet fit to be thrown on their own resources. More than one mother has directed my attention to the fact that while she was perfectly willing her boy should go to the front, she would have liked him to attain sufficient years and have so strengthened his character that he might be better able to resist temptation, and to resist the strain of the arduous labours to which he must necessarily be exposed.

If the Solicitor General will read subclause 4 of section 3, he will find it reads as follows:

> The order in which the classes are described in this section shall be the order in which they may be called out on active service, provided the Governor in Council may divide any class into sub-classes, in which case the sub-classes shall be called out in order of age, beginning with the youngest.

That means if the Governor in Council divides those classes into sub-classes, the boys of twenty will be the first to be called out. I think this will be most unfortunate from a national point of view, as well as from the point of view of the boys who have to go. Let us view for a moment the attitude of the tribunals which sit in judgment. The Bill lays down as a fundamental principle that 100,000 men are required and 100,000 men are to be obtained. As against that, national interest has to prevail. If I were a member of a tribunal, it seems to me I would approach the subject in this way. "100,000 men must be got; therefore, no exemptions can be granted, or exemptions to such an extent as will prevent this number of men being had cannot be granted, therefore, I, as a member of the tribunal, must be careful in my exemptions to see that at least 100,000 men are available, and I must be careful to excuse no man unless the reasons for his being excused are overpowering." What is the number of men between 20 and 24 available in Canada? I read from the census return supplied to this House by the Government, as follows: In 1911, Prince Edward Island showed 3,592, Nova Scotia, 18,951, New Brunswick, 12,902, Quebec 72,692, Ontario 104,245, Manitoba 24,350, Saskatchewan 32,993, Alberta 23,551, British Columbia 25,555. Those are single men between the ages of 20 and 24. That means that in 1911 there were over 300,000 unmarried men between the ages of 20 and 24 available. Let us take for granted that 25 per cent of these men have enlisted. We would therefore have 225,000 men available from which a selection can still be made.

Sir HERBERT AMES: Those statistics are six years old.

Mr. NICKLE: The hon. member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) says those statistics are six years old. That is quite true. Still the Government statistician who prepared the figures says: "the figures of the table are those of the census of 1911, and it is estimated that the increase since 1911 in the male population of Canada of ages 20 to 45 lies between 300,000 and 400,000. As approximately this number has been already recruited, the figures of 1911, it is thought, reflect rather closely present conditions in the Dominion as a whole." It therefore seems to me it is not unreasonable that I should take these figures as a basis for my argument. When the young man of twenty applies for exemption he will be met by the question: "Why should you be exempt?" The only reason he can give as to why exemption should prevail in his case would be this: "in the national interest I am entitled to be exempted." The tribunal will say: "on what particular grounds should you be exempted?" The young man of twenty has not chosen his avocation in life, his proclivities have not been determined, and he will find himself in this embarrassing position that because he has not had an opportunity of selecting some definite line of work in which he is perfecting himself, the tribunal will likely say: "the work you intend to undertake, or the work you have undertaken, is not of such a character that it should be considered as in the national interest. You need not continue in it, you must be considered a recruit."

If the figures I have read are an approximation, and I think they are if the statistician is correct, it is possible the whole 100,000 men may be taken from the first class, and the second class not called up at all. In my judgment this would be radically unfair.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. NICKLE: It is unfair for this reason, the young man who has not left home is entitled to the protection of home until such time as he has attained stability of character. The young man of 20 to 22, unless he has had to leave home to earn his own living, has not attained the age at which he should be deprived of the protection of his home, and I sincerely trust the Solicitor General will endeavour to look at it in the light in which I think it is looked at by many of the fathers and mothers in this country.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: My hon. friend has probably overlooked the fact that his figures are wrong, inasmuch as the figures in the Bill are four years, and the census figures are five years.

Mr. NICKLE: My figures are an approximation.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: But the census figures are for five years, and the first class is from 20 to 23, inclusive, four years.

Mr. NICKLE: I thought I was reasonably generous when I took twenty-five per cent off that.

Mr. MORPHY: I would call the attention of the Solicitor General to another point in section 4, page 3, of the Bill:

> The Governor in Council may from time to time by proclamation call out on active service as aforesaid for the defence of Canada, either in Canada or beyond Canada, any class or sub-class of men described in section 3 and all men within the class or sub-class so called out shall, from the date of such proclamation, be deemed to be soldiers enlisted in the Military Forces of Canada and subject to military law for the duration of the present war.

Assuming that the Bill goes into operation and the Governor in Council, under that clause, calls out by proclamation every one of those 303,000 young men between the ages of 20 and 24 who were referred to by my hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Nickle), is absolutely fixed by section 4 of this Act unless they can show reason for exemption. What justification would there be for calling any other class if the number were there? The law fixes them in the military service of Canada and there is no power that can get them out. You cannot call any other class. Your limit is 100,000, and they must undoubtedly be taken from among these young men.

Mr. PROULX: According to the Militia Act single unmarried men are called first up to the age of 45. I see by clause 4 that married men and widowers with children from 20 to 34 are called before single men and married men from 34 to 45. The calling out of married men imposes a heavier burden on the country, because it has to take care of their wives and children. Would it not be possible to take unmarried men up to the age of 40 before touching the married men and widowers with children?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That, as almost all other suggestions, was debated in the committee when this clause was first up. The reason for the classification which has been made is that the best military age is broadly from 20 to 35. After 35 there is a marked deterioration; consequently, it was felt that all below that should be accepted first.

Mr. McKENZIE: I put a question to the Solicitor General in respect to this selective element that is in the present Bill. I did not get an answer because my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Maclean), by reason of his superior right intervened. Now that the point mentioned by my hon. friend is over and done with, possibly the Solicitor General would answer me.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There may be a measure of correctness, speaking from the point of view of the philosopher, in the point of my hon. friend. The selective clauses are the clauses which relate to exemptions. The operation of those clauses will be of itself the selection. It is quite true that with respect to those who enrol themselves and do not themselves make any application or suggestion to the local tribunals that in the national interest they be exempt, or in respect to whom no such application is made, there is no specific operation of any selective clause. But that proceeds on the principle that if the man himself does not suggest by way of application to the local tribunal that he should be exempt, and if no one does it on his behalf, there is a fair and reasonable assumption that the selection would not exempt him. Consequently, practically speaking, the selective principle permeates the whole Bill.

Mr. McKENZIE: As I understand the hon. gentleman's answer, there is no selection at all. The Government accepts everybody who comes along, everybody who will write his name down as being within a certain class. The Government do not reject anybody but take everybody.

[Mr. Morphy.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: Clause 3 stands. Now, we are at clause 4. As to clause 4 a suggestion was made by the leader of the Opposition and also it was made independently by hon. members on this side of the House and pressed, I remember, by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Taylor) that there should be a diversion of jurisdiction between the Militia Service Act and the Army Act on one hand and this Act on the other, that the line should be clearly fixed where the Militia Service Act ceases to operate, as it were, in regard to prosecutions and penalties and where the Army Act commences to operate. It was urged that there should not be an alternative jurisdiction and it was further urged by the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Morphy) that there should be a more severe penalty. Careful consideration has been given to the proposals and I wish to suggest to the committee that the suggestions be met in this way: That sub-clause 4 of section 4 of the Bill be amended to read as follows:

> Any man who is called out, and who without reasonable excuse fails to report as aforesaid, shall be guilty of absenting himself without leave, and shall be liable, on summary conviction, to imprisonment for any term not exceeding five years with hard labor.

The result is that we create here only the offence of absenting himself without leave as committed by the man who fails to report and who is made liable to report under this Bill.

Mr. CURRIE: Why use the term "absent without leave" because "absent without leave" under the Army Act is a different thing altogether. Why not say "refuses to report?" Absence without leave is treated by the commanding officers constantly and a man is fined for a few days' absence. A confusion of terms might arise.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think the name is very important; in fact, it might be just as well to call it an offence. It seems to me to be fully the same offence as that committed by the man who, having enrolled, absents himself without leave. Consequently, I think the name is quite appropriate, but if we simply called it an offence the effect would be exactly the same.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That leaves out paragraph (a) altogether?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, it leaves out the creation of the offence by this Bill that he who, having reported, does not remain on active service where placed, leaving that offence to be taken care of by the Army Act. There is another alternative jurisdiction. He is between the civil and military tribunals, and the line is clearly drawn between the operation of the Army Act and this Act. The punishment for absenting himself without leave is made five years with hard labour. It was thought that as no one could commit the offence except a man who was physically fit for military service that punishment would suit him.

Mr. LEMIEUX: You increase the penalty from three years to five years?

Mr. MEIGHEN: On the well-known principle of making the punishment fit the crime. It is hoped that this will have a greater preventive effect.

Mr. McKENZIE: Does failing to go and register constitute the offence with which the minister is dealing?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Failing to report if it is his duty to report under this Act.

Mr. McKENZIE: There is another matter involved. There should be the greatest certainty that the individual has had notice before he is subjected to punishment. This is similar to the offence of contempt of court in the case of a juror or witness, and in such a case the judge requires very clear evidence that the individual has had notice. The mere proclamation of the Military Service Act would not be sufficient to justify us in treating as a criminal a man who did not obey all its provisions.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The effect would be that the Government would have to assume responsibility for that notice reaching every man in the country. I do not think if my hon. friend were a member of a Government he would care to assume that responsibility. If it should be shown to a judge that the person charged was not aware of the proclamation or had no notice of his duty, that fact might be pleaded by way of excuse, and it would be for the judge to decide.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Where must he report, to the military authorities?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Under the Militia Act.

Mr. CURRIE: In the administration of the law, I think that these men should be compelled first to serve in the army and then to serve their term in prison. If a man wanted to avoid going to the war he might prefer to take his chance of getting two or three years in the penitentiary, with good food and clothing and perhaps a little stone breaking, which is not as hard as trench work, to going to the front. I had a letter from a Canadian who got into trouble of this kind in the Old Country and who was finally given two years; but he had first to join the conscript army and go to the trenches. If a man is capable of service he should not be relieved of his obligation to serve simply because he stays away and a magistrate sentences him to a year in prison.

Then account should be taken of the large number of men who are enlisted in the militia and the Canadian defence force. They claim exemption under this Act. These men have enlisted under a valid contract for three years, and under the Militia Act are exempted from service abroad. I know a number of men under these circumstances who say they are not liable under this Act. How is that condition to be met under the Bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Unless they are also members of the Canadian Expeditionary Forces they are liable. Every one is liable except those who are exempted, and they are not exempted.

Mr. CURRIE: How can the Government void that valid contract unless these men are specifically mentioned. There should be some clause distinctly stating that these men are not exempt. There was the same trouble in England. The territorials would not serve abroad, saying they had enlisted for three years for service at home and would not serve abroad. The Government had to disband the territorial regiments, and that threw these men back under the ordinary Act. It should be made clear that this Act applies to all men enlisted in the Canadian militia. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) said that this Bill will be interpreted not by this Parliament but by the courts. A man will make a claim in the court, and unless the Act is clear on every point, the judges may rule against him. It is not the first time Parliament has passed a Bill and the judges have decided that it was not good law.

Mr. LEMIEUX: As has been stated over and over again during the debate, our militia men, under the Militia Act, can serve beyond Canada. Therefore, our militia men can serve overseas.

Mr. CURRIE: Yes, but the proclamation under the Militia Act has not been made yet, and they are not liable to serve abroad until the proclamation has been made.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The amendment I propose will make subsection 4 read as follows:

Any man who is called out, and who without reasonable excuse fails to report as aforesaid, shall be guilty of an offence, and shall be liable, on summary conviction, to imprisonment for any term not exceeding five years with hard labour.

That is the maximum penalty. It may be less.

Mr. CURRIE: Would the Solicitor General consider the advisability of inserting a provision that the mere fact of a man being sentenced under this section shall not release him from liability to serve under this Act? I think common sense would tell us that that would be a proper provision.

Mr. MEIGHEN: A man once made liable by an Act is not released until the Act says he is released. Consequently, a man does not release himself by violating the Act. In my opinion, the Act, as it stands, renders a man liable, after he commits the offence and serves the punishment, just as he was before. If, however, I should change my mind, I will bring the matter before the committee.

Mr. TAYLOR: Subsection 2 of section 4 reads:

Men so called out shall report, and shall be placed on active service in the Canadian Expeditionary Force.

In the case of a man who does not report, and is sentenced to a term of imprisonment, he is not in the Canadian Expeditionary Force, not having reported, and they have no claim on him. In order to compel that man to go overseas, we must first make him a member of the Canadian Expeditionary Force. Under the present practice, a man who deserts, and is brought back, tried by a magistrate, and sentenced to a term of imprisonment, does not by that procedure, evade service with the force, but, when his battalion leaves for the front, he is taken from prison, overseas, and compelled to enter upon his military service there. It seems to me we should provide in this Bill that those who seek to evade service by getting into prison may be taken out of the prison, on the occasion of the first draft, and taken overseas.

Mr. GRAHAM: Unless he is entitled to exemption.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Those men do not get exemption. Section 4 reads:

4. (1) The Governor in Council may from time to time by proclamation call out on active service as aforesaid for the defence of Canada, either in Canada or beyond Canada, any class or subclass of men described in section three and all men within the class or subclass so called out shall, from the date of such proclamation, be deemed to be soldiers enlisted in the military forces of Canada and subject to military law for the duration of the present war, and of demobilization thereafter, save as hereinafter provided.

Whether he reports or not, the moment the proclamation issues that man is a soldier in the military forces of Canada, and subject to military law, and consequently, being a soldier, we can apply the hand of the law to him, just as much as we could to any other soldier, and if he does not report when it is his duty to report, it is the duty of the proper authorities to apply the physical hand of the law to him.

Mr TAYLOR (New Westminster): There is this difficulty in the reasoning of the hon. Solicitor General: that this man was a member of the military forces of Canada only, and the military forces of Canada are not, by this Bill, sent overseas. It is only the Canadian Expeditionary Force that goes overseas. This man, not having reported, is not a member of that force, according to subsection 2 of section 4.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The subsection does not say that no one shall be placed on active service except those who report. It is the duty of the authorities to place these men on active service, and it is their duty to report. They will be placed on active service, whether they report or not, or whether they are brought to the proper place by the military authorities.

Mr. McKENZIE: These men not reporting may be tried in a summary manner, which means that any ordinary justice of the peace could send a man to the penitentiary for five years. I would seriously suggest of the minister that no less a personage than a county court judge, under the Speedy Trials Act, should have authority. I do not think it is right that an ordinary magistrate, no matter how well meaning he may be, who knows very little about law, should be entrusted to the very serious duty of trying men, in circumstances of this kind. I think they should be tried before a county judge.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The summary convictions clauses of the Act provide for an appeal to a judge. It is true that, in cases involving intricate law, or substantial cases of law, the general scope or spirit of the legislation is to entrust that to the judges, but this will not involve consideration of law to any very great extent. It would be a simple matter to decide whether the man was of the proper age, and if he was of the proper age, whether he had an exemption.

Then it is a mere matter of judgment as to the proper punishment. Of course, if a county judge tried all these cases it would, in one sense, be better. But we want to take care not to add too much formality or chance of delay or congestion to the enforcement of the Act.

Mr. McKENZIE: I would suggest that the hon. gentleman at least provide that these cases be tried before county court judges or stipendiary magistrates in cities and towns.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would suggest that we deal with this clause as we have dealt with some other clauses: that it be allowed to pass, and I will promise consideration myself, as well as to bring it to the consideration of my colleagues. It can be spoken to later in the House.

Subsection 4 of section 4 agreed to.

Progress reported.

On motion of Sir Edward Kemp, the House adjourned at 11.58 p.m.

Wednesday, July 12, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

APPOINTMENT OF AN OFFICIAL.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN moved:

That the recommendation of His Honour the Speaker laid upon the table of the House on the 29th ultimo., respecting the appointment of Joseph Ludger Parr as clerk in the Library of Parliament be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

ALDERSHOT, N.S., CAMP GROUNDS.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN:

1. Is it the intention of the Government or any department thereof to construct any building or buildings on the Aldershot Camp Grounds in Kings County, N.S., this year?
2. If so, will the Government invite public tenders for their construction?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1. No, not as far as the Department of Militia and Defence is concerned.
2. Answered by No. 1.

REQUEST FOR SOLDIER'S DISCHARGE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): I call the attention of the Minister of Militia to the following communication which I have received from the Rev. G. S. K. Anderson, Evangelist, of Escuminac county, Bonaventure:

Escuminac, P.Q., July 9, 1917.

Hon. Charles Marcil,
Quebec, P.Q.

Dear Sir:—

I write at the request of Mrs. Nelson Court of Escuminac, P.Q. She is anxious to secure the discharge of her son from the fighting forces of France. She has already given two of her sons to the country. George was killed in France on June 3, 1916, and John died of pneumonia on February 5, 1917, in a military hospital at North Battleford, Sask. She wants this son home to look after John's homestead. His full name and address is as follows: No. 488300, Private Harry Ivan Court, R.C.R. Battery, "C" Company, No. 10 Platoon, France, C.E.F. Do what you can for her or direct her to the proper authorities.

Respectfully yours,

G. S. K. Anderson.

In view of the fact that this lady has already given two of her sons to the country, I would ask the Minister of Militia to consider her request for the discharge of her other son.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: If the hon. member would forward communications such as this direct to the department they would receive every consideration. The department receives hundreds of such letters every week. I can assure my hon. friend that I will give this matter my attention.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT, 1917.

CONSIDERATION OF THE BILL IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE HOUSE.

House in committee on Bill No. 75, respecting Military Service.—Sir Robert Borden (resumed from Wednesday, July 11).

Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Mr. MEIGHEN: When the committee reported last night we had just passed section 4; section 5 had already been passed. Subclause 3 of section 6 was allowed to stand pending further suggestion as to how the board of selection might be made up. The suggestion was made by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) that the local or provincial boards might have sole control for their own provinces; that instead of establishing one board we should establish nine—or really eleven, to take care of the Yukon and North West Territories. We hardly think that could work out. It is suggested, subject to any further suggestions which may be made, that this board of selection consist of say four members from the province of Ontario, four members from the province of Quebec, and two members from each of the other provinces. In the carrying out of the work outlined, the recommendations of the members from the provinces would be taken as to each province, but the report of the board would be the report of the whole board, which would make it much more simple than if we were to have the reports of nine boards. The boards could consist of members or senators, or those who are neither members nor senators. That is the suggestion of the Government in the matter, but if there is anything that will improve on it we will be glad to hear it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Does my hon. friend stand by the present disposition of the Bill to have one of the members of the board appointed by the Senate and the House of Commons?

Mr. MEIGHEN: To have them appointed by a joint resolution of the Senate and House of Commons, but of course to be appointed in such a way that one from each province, except Ontario and Quebec, will be selected by the Opposition in the Senate and in the House. In Ontario and in Quebec the Opposition will select two in each, the same principle applying to the Government side in the Senate and in the House.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: As my hon. friend is aware, I voted against this Bill, and am not much in sympathy with it. If I wanted to carry out my own views, I think I would favour the recommendation of the Government, because, as I understand it, it is an impediment in the way of the Bill. If you have a selective board appointed by the two Houses of Parliament, it can only act when Parliament is in session, and should there be a vacancy in the board it could not be filled until the ensuing session. I do not object to that at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That can be easily cured by the resolution.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What resolution could you frame that would cure it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There would have to be a resolution empowering them to sit and act when Parliament is not in session.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: But you appoint two men by resolution of the two Houses of Parliament. Suppose the two men died, or are prevented from acting, how are they to be replaced by another resolution of Parliament if Parliament is not in session. So far as I am concerned, I do not object to this impediment in the way of the Bill. I would suggest you might have one of the members of the tribunal appointed by the judicial authority, in fact I see no reason at all why the two members should not be so appointed. The chief justice, or the two senior justices could perform the duty. Yesterday I heard the compliment which was paid the judiciary by the Solicitor General, and the compliment he paid the late Government in respect to its appointments, and I feel that the chief justice in each province could perform that duty as well as anybody.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There are objections to that, and they have been given some consideration in the course of the preparation of the Bill. I think the better course for the present would be to let clause 3 still stand, and possibly the Prime Minister might consult with the leader of the Opposition on the subject.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I have given my view.

Mr. MARCIL: Another point that might be considered is: what becomes of those appointees on the dissolution of Parliament.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The appointment will be made by Parliament under such a resolution or such legislation as would provide that the appointees should not cease their functions when Parliament dissolves. The rest of the clause passed with the exception of subsection 5, which remained over at the request of the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham), with a view to the imposition of a penalty of imprisonment. I think the suggestion is a good one, as I intimated at the time. Subsection 5 provides:

> Any person duly appointed a member of a local tribunal shall, unless relieved in writing by the authority appointing him, perform his duty as such member, and any person who without reasonable excuse fails so to do, shall be guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding five hundred dollars.

It was pointed out that this might lead a man to purchasing himself out of performing this duty. I think the same objection might exist if an alternative penalty were provided, consequently I beg to move:

> That for the words "a penalty not exceeding five hundred dollars" there be substituted the following words: "imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years and not less than three months."

Mr. LEMIEUX: I thought my hon. friend said five years last night.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. Five years is the penalty for refusing to report.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Do I understand that the fine is to be replaced by imprisonment?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The punishment should be imprisonment only for those who refuse to act without being relieved in writing by the appointing authority, and without being excused.

Mr. PROULX: Are members of parliament liable to be called upon to act?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am afraid I cannot relieve the mind of the hon. member on that point. I am afraid they are.

Mr. PROULX: Then I would suggest we should be disqualified.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The suggestion does not appeal to me at the present. I do not think members of parliament should ask, any more than any one else, to be relieved of duty in connection with the war.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: On Tuesday, while discussing subsection (f) of section 11—

Mr. MEIGHEN: We will come to that in a moment.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: I want to raise a point of order. When we were discussing clause (f) of subsection 1 of section 11, which provides that exemption may be granted to a man on the ground that he conscientiously objects to undertaking combatant service. The Solicitor General and the hon. member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) answered that this subsection would be taken in along with the following. When I was discussing the question I had before me the French copy of the Bill, which says:

Que sa conscience ne lui permet pas d'entreprendre le service à titre de combattant;

That makes a different and altogether distinct reason of exemption, according to conscience. Is the English copy or the French copy right?

Mr. DOHERTY: I think there can be no doubt that the error is in the punctuation of the French version. I do not see why there should be the word "combatant." There is no doubt that the section as drafted contemplated what is provided in the English version, that is that these two things should combine; that he should have conscientious objections and that his objections should be based upon the tenets of a religious denomination to which he belongs. It is a regrettable mistake, but the mistake is unquestionably in the inserting of the semicolon.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: It is not only the punctuation, because in the French version there is altogether different and distinct cause, as it goes on after the first semicolon:

que cela lui est défendu.

Another description of conscience.

Mr. DOHERTY: I understood the hon. gentlemen to attribute the difference to the presence of the semicolon. He now states that they have also omitted the translation of the word "and." I think that, instead of the semicolon, the word "et" should have been inserted. Certainly to translate the English version that word ought to have been inserted, and there ought to have been no semicolon.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: Which is correct?

Mr. DOHERTY: The English version is correct.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Before taking up the amendments to clause 7, I would ask the Solicitor General if he does not think there should be some modification of clause 2 of section 3, which reads:—

For the purposes of this section any man married after the 11th of June, 1917, shall be deemed to be unmarried.

Does he not think it would be advisable to give the tribunal power of exemption if a marriage had been arranged prior to that date, although actually consummated afterwards? Would it not be better to leave some discretion in the tribunal?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We shall have to return to this clause, as it has not been adopted, and in the meantime I shall consider the suggestion.

Mr. McCRANEY: Has the minister considered the suggestion of the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell), that a county or district court judge should be a member of each tribunal, instead of the nominee of the judge?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That has been very carefully considered, but it is not deemed practicable. There may be cases where there is only one judge in a county, and he would not be able to attend to the duties of the tribunal except in his own district.

Mr. MARCIL: Is there anything in the law to provide that members of local tribunals must be residents of the province in which they are to serve?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no provision as to where they shall reside, but no one except those who reside in the district could perform the duties. We have sought to avoid divisions by districts, as we do not want to have any questions of jurisdiction.

Mr. MARCIL: If a man is not required to reside in the province in which he is to act, a man from Nova Scotia might be named to serve in British Columbia.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would not say that was legally impossible under the Bill, but it would be manifestly impossible for such a man to perform the duties, and he would never be appointed.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Should you not restrict appointments to local tribunals to men residing in each county?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think it is necessary owing to the men who make the appointments, the judges on the one hand and a board of selection named by this Parliament on the other.

Mr. MARCIL: Are there any special qualifications required of the men who are to serve on local tribunals?

Mr. MEIGHEN: None are named in the Bill. The qualifications are good common sense and strength of character.

Mr. MARCIL: A man might be taken from Ontario and appointed to serve in Quebec, or vice versa. Does the minister not think that, in the interests of the law, it should be provided that the men appointed should possess the respect of the community in which they reside and be known as equitable and fair-minded men, rather than to bring strangers from outside?

Mr. MEIGHEN: If it were necessary to insert a provision in the Act to produce that result, we might consider framing a clause; but, on account of the authority which names the members of the tribunal, the county court judge on one hand, and the Board of Selection of Parliament on the other, who might perhaps name members of Parliament on one side or members on the other, it would seem to me rather ridiculous to suggest that they might name men who had not the respect of the public, and that these men should be enjoined by Parliament against sending men from Ontario into Quebec, or vice versa. Such a thing seems to me utterly inconceivable.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The objection of the hon. gentleman from Bonaventure is certainly remote—rather academic than practical. At all events, he is objecting to the vicious principle of the Bill, in regard to the appointing of the local tribunals, and I submit to my hon. friend—and I think I will be supported in my view by hon. gentlemen in the House—that the members of the local tribunal ought to be judges. The judges are appointed by this Parliament in every community to settle disputes between man and man; they are the arbiters appointed by law to settle difficulties in a community, and, therefore, you ask the judges to appoint members of the tribunal, but you do not ask that the men who are appointed to the tribunal should be judges. In my estimation—and I submit it in all sincerity and candor—the members of that tribunal should be men who, by their profession, are acting as arbiters between man and man. These men will have to decide whether a man is to be exempted or not. They will have to decide whether a man is fitted to be in the trenches, or whether it is better that he should be left to his own avocation. Who can settle that question better than the judges appointed by the Minister of Justice? It seems to me, in the nature of things, that the members of the tribunal should be the local judges, who know almost everybody in the community and who are familiar with the condition of things in the district, and who have a knowledge of the men in the community. You will, of course, find men who know the country as well as the judges, but they have not had the same training.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am inclined to agree, that, if it be possible for them to do the work, they are the best qualified. I have in mind the county court judge of Portage la Prairie, and I cannot conceive how any one man could, in any reasonable time, take care of the work delegated upon the tribunal by the Act in that county court district. Even if the judge had nothing else to do, the district is too large, the population too great, and the applications for exemption possibly too many for the judge to deal with. It seems to me there is very great danger of practically damning the progress of the Act by such a provision. Of course, we must not frame the provision on account of conditions in one county only. We would not refuse to adopt the suggestion, merely because there were two or three counties where it could not be applied, but I do not think, speaking generally of Canada, from what knowledge I have at the present time, that the county court judges should be fairly asked to do all the work.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My hon. friend from Portage la Prairie admits that the best qualified man in his district would be the county court judge, but he says that the county judge is so busy that he has no time to attend to the duties which would be assigned to him under this Act, and, therefore, we must go to some one else. To whom shall we go? There is probably a merchant in the town, a very fine man, and quite competent, but he himself is too busy with his own business to be able to attend to it. Or there may be other prominent men who would be competent to do the work, but they are too busy in their own business. You will have to get somebody who will make the sacrifice.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We could appoint several men, and they would take time to hold their meetings.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: You could appoint several men, and if judges are to be had, they should be appointed, and if there are no judges available, appoint some one else.

Mr. GRAHAM: We are making precedents all the time, and I have a practical suggestion which might work out. In every community, there is a first-class lawyer who could act as judge, and release the judge for this work. Let him be appointed as a judge, for the time being, while the judge is performing this work.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That might be practical, if one tribunal composed of a judge could do all the work of a county. I have stated really all that I am in a position to state on that subject.

Mr. MARCIL: Can the hon. gentleman tell us what was done in England?

Mr. MEIGHEN: They did not appoint judges at all. They had large local tribunals, composed of laymen. They did not find it possible to appoint judges there.

Mr. DOHERTY: All the work of these tribunals will be subject to correction by the judges, so that you have the supervising and controlling influence of the judges, to correct errors that may occur from lack of experience on the part of members of the tribunal. Therefore we think that, in the most practical and effective way, we avail ourselves of the undoubted competent services of the judges.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It is stated that appeals are never to be encouraged. I should like to see such a class of tribunals that appeals would be limited, as much as possible. If you have a class of tribunals, in the first instance, whose composition leads you to think that it is necessary to make provision for an appeal, that is a poor arrangement.

Mr. DOHERTY: If we could absolutely avoid appeals, it would be a desirable thing from many points of view, but I think that would be very difficult. The best of judges are liable to err, and it would be an unfortunate situation if any number of men found themselves subjected to the judgment of one individual, without any opportunity whatever of rectifying any possible error that might creep in. I think, to meet that, we must provide for a system where there shall be a right of appeal, and if we do that, I come back to what I said before, that I think we get the best service from the judges by giving them supervision and control to rectify any mistake that may be made in the tribunal of first instance. I may say that, while the questions to be determined are of very great importance, in view of the results of that determination to the individual affected and to the country, the questions, as a rule, would not be questions involving, or necessitating for their decision, any very profound knowledge of law. The question that will arise in a large number of cases, will be purely questions of fact—such questions as, in a great many provinces, it is thought well to leave to the decision of laymen, that is to jurors.

In many of the provinces, including our own, it is thought better, even when we have the judge sitting there in the court, that questions of fact should be determined by laymen. It is difficult to see what questions of law will arise before these tribunals; certainly the bulk of the questions arising will be questions of fact that could be fairly dealt with by men of practical common sense. I am sure that we could repose in those men the same confidence that the law reposes in jurors, even in preference to judges.

Mr. ROSS: My hon. friend's argument would surely not apply to Ontario, where almost every county has two county court judges. One of those judges could be released from his ordinary work in order that he might perform the work required by this Act.

Mr. DOHERTY: In some counties in Ontario the work of the county court judge is not very considerable; in others it is. But it must be remembered that we shall have to have more than one tribunal for each county; if the county court judge has to be on every tribunal, we cannot have more than one tribunal per county. Having regard to the population of the counties in Ontario, I fancy that it would take a long time to have all applications dealt with by one and the same tribunal. It would be anomalous to make such distinctions between the character of the tribunals that in the same county some persons would be applying to a tribunal presided over by a county court judge and others would have their cases dealt with by tribunals of another character. When you have county court judges on the tribunals, you limit the number of tribunals available for the purpose of hearing such appeals as may arise. The inadequacy of the number of judges is a very substantial objection to our constituting these tribunals of judges only. As I have said, the questions which will arise will not be such as to call for training in the law, except in exceptional instances. In those exceptional instances, if any error be committed, there will be ample remedy by appeal to the judges who under this system will be available for the work of correction.

Mr. DEVLIN: Is it proposed that the evidence heard before the local tribunals shall be taken down by stenographers?

Mr. DOHERTY: No, I do not think that is in contemplation.

Mr. DEVLIN: Then in what manner will it be possible for the judges in appeal to decide upon questions of fact if there is no factum before the court for decision?

Mr. DOHERTY: Appeals of this kind will be dealt with as appeals in criminal cases are dealt with. That, in effect, means that the appellant tribunal will hear the evidence and re-try the case.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think it is important that county court judges be retained as members of the local tribunals. I am in favour of having the county court judge himself act or preside rather than that he should appoint some one else for that purpose. The suggestion of the member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) is a good one. In Ontario, and, I fancy, in all the other provinces, in cases where the judge desires to be relieved for a time from his official duties, there is power to appoint a practising barrister of certain qualifications to attend to the judicial work of the county while the judge is absent or otherwise engaged. If a county court judge, undertaking the work assigned to him under this Act, should find that the additional work is too much for him, it would be an excellent thing to give him power to appoint some one to perform his judicial duties while he is thus engaged. Perhaps a special regulation would have to be made in regard to Quebec; certainly the law in Ontario works very well. In many cases judges obtain leave of absence for periods of three or six months and a barrister of good standing in the county is appointed to take his place. I do not think that in any instance in Ontario, unless it be in Toronto, is a county court judge overworked. I know of no junior or senior county court judge in the province who does more than four or five days' work a month. I think, therefore, that so far as Ontario is concerned there will be no difficulty in having a county court judge act in all cases—though conditions may be different in other provinces. Perhaps a general rule might be established that would clear up the whole difficulty. If I had been here when the clause was under discussion a day or two ago, I would have suggested that the tribunals in Ontario should consist of the county court judges and the wardens of the respective counties. I think that arrangement would be fair, having regard to the political parties and to every other consideration that has to be had in mind in connection with this Bill. I do not know what the municipal institutions are in the other provinces or how such an arrangement might affect them; in any case, I think that the county court judge should himself preside over the local tribunals and that he should not have power to delegate his authority to another.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) contemplates that there will be only one tribunal for each county court district. I feel quite sure that more will be necessary in very many county court districts. Further, assuming all he says to be correct, a county court judge can be appointed, and I think would be appointed, by the board of selection in such a case as he has in mind. Assuming that in Ontario the county court judges all have time to perform these duties, the board of selection can name them in every case in which they do not name themselves. In any event, this clause stands, on account of the present position of the discussion with regard to the board of selection. I fancy, therefore, that we shall get along faster if we proceed to clause 7.

Subsection stands.

On section 7—appeal tribunals:

Mr. ROSS: How about appeals from a tribunal one of whose members is not a county court judge?

Mr. MEIGHEN: In connection with section 7, the suggestion made by the member for East Middlesex (Mr. Glass) has been, in the main, accepted. I thought first that it would be possible to arrange for two county court judges always to sit in appeal if a county court judge sat on the local tribunal. The difficulty, however, is that that would necessitate, in the event of their disagreeing, provision for carrying a stated case to the central appeal judge. There did not, however, seem to be the same difficulties in the way of insisting that a higher court judge should sit in appeal wherever a county court judge sat in the local tribunal, because it would be possible for the registrar to collect the cases and so allocate them that much inconvenience would be avoided in sending higher court judges to hear the appeals. I, therefore, beg to move:

That there be added to section 7 the following proviso:

Provided that appeals from the local tribunal on which sits one or more judges shall be heard and decided by an appeal tribunal constituted of a judge of a higher court.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: Is there any definition of the term " higher court?"

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think one could give any simpler term, or any term that required less definition.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: The Minister of Justice is aware that a judge of the superior court in Quebec may act as judge of the higher court in his own district, or a judge of the superior court in Montreal or Quebec may act as the judge of the court of criminal assizes. That is the reason why I put the question: Is there any definition of what will be considered a judge of a higher court? A judge of the superior court may one minute sit as an ordinary judge of the superior court, and the minute after he may ascend the King's Bench for the criminal assizes, and thus become a judge of a higher court.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am not quite certain that a King's Bench court is higher than a superior court. I had the idea that all our courts stand on a parity, although they exercise different jurisdiction. The other day I intimated that I thought, for the province of Quebec, there should be a modification in the section, so that we would make quite clear what were the courts whereof the judges should be named of this appellate court, and I, therefore, beg to move:

That section 7 be amended by inserting after the word "tribunal" in the fifth line thereof the following words:

"In the province of Quebec one judge of the Court of King's Bench or Superior Court of said province, and in the other provinces."

The reason for that will be obvious to all hon. members from Quebec where we have not the same judicial system as prevails in the other provinces in which there are a large number of judges, not judges of higher courts, but judges of courts with very considerable civil jurisdiction. To retain the words "any court" in the case of Quebec would leave it possible (which I think would not be desirable) that a judge of a stipendiary magistrate's court or possibly of the court of sessions might be appointed, and I think it more desirable that we should keep the appointments to the two courts mentioned in my amendment. It was pointed out the other day that in the city of Montreal there is a circuit court, but it seems hardly desirable to introduce in this legislation a special system for Montreal. The other day the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) stated that the circuit court judges of Montreal have all the work they can possibly do, and to appoint circuit court judges might possibly constitute a very serious injustice to the numerous litigants who come before them and who, in the great number of cases, are of that class of persons who can ill-afford to have any unnecessary delay in disposing of their cases, or any interference with the cases that are being heard.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: Suppose a case comes before a judge of the superior court of Terrebonne and a decision is arrived at, and the man appeals; will he have to take his appeal to this higher court, the Court of criminal assizes, presided over by a judge of the same district, or will he have to go before a court of appeal in Montreal?

Mr. DOHERTY: If the hon. member will look at the section, he will see that in the province of Quebec it is not contemplated that judges of the superior court should sit on the local tribunals of the first instance.

From the preceding section the hon. gentleman will note that the local tribunals will be composed of persons who are named by a judge of the superior court. In the districts of Quebec and Montreal, where there are a number of judges serving the district, the person will be selected by the Chief Justice or the acting Chief Justice of the province, as the case may be. In the other districts, the members of the local tribunals will be named by the district judge of each district, and it is not contemplated that he will name himself, nor that a judge of the district of Montreal will name a superior court judge to sit on the local tribunal.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: Will there always be a judge of the superior court on the local tribunal?

Mr. DOHERTY: No; it is not contemplated in any case that on the local tribunal a judge of the superior court should himself sit.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: He may sit in appeal? He will be considered as belonging to a "higher court?"

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes. The hon. member need not be troubled about the term "higher court." Under the amendment I have just moved, it is provided that in the province of Quebec the appellate court shall consist of one judge of the court of King's Bench, or of the superior court of the province.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Has section 7, as printed, been passed?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There are two amendments proposed, one by myself, which is a proviso, and the other by the Minister of Justice. Outside of that, the section is as printed in the Bill.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is a suggestion I would like to make, but I may be too late. The section reads:

> The Chief Justice of the court of last resort in each province . . . shall establish . . . Appeal Tribunals—

And so on. The language is mandatory, not permissive. Then there is a reservation:

> In case of his absence, or failure to act, then a judge of that court designated by the minister.

Why not "designated by the said Chief Justice?" If the minister is the proper person to make the appointment, he should do it in the first instance.

[Mr. Doherty]

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman does not get the exact meaning. The Chief Justice is to make the appointment of the judges, who themselves will be the appeal tribunals. If he fails to act, if he fails to name those appeal tribunals, then the minister names a judge who will name them.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Why should not the Chief Justice name that judge?

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the Chief Justice fails to do the one thing, the probability is that he will fail to do the other. We do not, however, contemplate any such failure except on account of physical disability or necessary absence. If any one should fail to appoint the tribunals, they would likely fail also to appoint a judge to appoint the tribunals, so we take care that the tribunals shall be appointed by giving the minister power to name some one else to take the place of the Chief Justice in case the latter fails.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: I see that subsection 3 of section 6 states that the tribunals shall consist of two members. What is the meaning of the word "members"? Can an ex-convict or a woman; or a man engaged in military service be appointed a member of a local tribunal? I think the word "member" should be defined.

Mr. DOHERTY: Surely the hon. member does not apprehend that any judge of the superior court is going to appoint to these tribunals a penitentiary convict, or a woman, or any of the classes of people whom I am sorry to see my hon. friend grouping together. If we had to define what kind of a man is to be appointed I think it would lead us into giving a great many details. If we put the appointing power in the hands of the most competent and reliable people we can find, I think we can trust to their judgment to appoint the right class of people to sit on the tribunals. We have, on the one hand, the judges, and on the other, the selective board, the formation of which has not been absolutely settled, but which at all events will clearly be a body enjoying the confidence of the Senate and the House of Commons of Canada. I think under those circumstances we can be satisfied that no objectionable person will be appointed to these tribunals.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: I have confidence in the good faith of a man, but I think it would be safe to have the word "member" expressly defined in the Bill.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 10—appeals:

Mr. MEIGHEN: Paragraph (b) of subsection 3 was allowed to stand, some members objecting to the proviso that the Minister of Militia and Defence may, as of right, enter and prosecute an appeal to the central appeal judge. In deference to the opinion of hon. members I beg to move that this proviso to paragraph (b) of subsection 3 be dropped.

Motion agreed to.

On section 11—application for, and grounds of exemption:

Mr. MEIGHEN: This section was carried with the understanding that I should speak to the committee with regard to suggestions that had been made. One suggestion, in regard to which I wish to move an amendment, is with respect to paragraph (f)—the "conscientious objectors" clause. It was urged that an earlier date should be fixed than the date of the passing of this Act regarding the existence of religious denominations opposed to military service. I therefore beg to move that for the words "at the date of the passing of this Act" there be substituted "on the 6th of July, 1916."

Mr. DEVLIN: What religious denominations will be exempt? Will a man be exempt who declares before a tribunal that he cannot conscientiously take arms for the killing of another human being?

Mr. DOHERTY: What the Bill requires is not merely that a man shall have conscientious objections to military service, but that he be prohibited from combatant service by the tenets and articles of faith, in effect at the date of the passing of this Act, of any organized religious denomination existing and well recognized in Canada. Now the questions, what are the tenets and articles of faith, and what is an organized religious denomination well recognized in Canada, are all matters of fact susceptible of proof otherwise than by the mere statement of the applicant.

Mr. DEVLIN: A man, then, will have no right to decide according to his conscientious beliefs?

Mr. DOHERTY: He can decide his conscientious beliefs for himself, but in order that he should be entitled to exemption it is required not merely that he himself should conscientiously object, but that he should be a member of a religious organization well recognized in Canada whose tenets prohibit his acting as a combatant. So he has two things to prove: not only the state of his own conscience, but the further fact that the state of his conscience is the result of his conforming to the tenets of any organized and well recognized religious denomination existing in the country at the time mentioned.

Mr. C. A. WILSON (Laval) (Translation): Mr. Chairman, in order to be better understood, I shall speak in French to submit the following point:

I find that the English statute does not go as far as the Bill now before us. Why should we exempt the party claiming as an exemption the fact that he belongs to any religious sect whatever, and why could not the judge hearing the applicant's objections consider the conscientious motives of another party claiming the same exemption?

We already have in the law of evidence in the province of Quebec and generally in the Canadian law of evidence exemptions of this nature. For example, if a man refuses to take an oath upon the Bible he is allowed to be sworn in some other way, or to make a solemn affirmation, and his scruples are recognized and respected.

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY (Translation): I have previously pointed out that, under this Act, it is not only required that the applicant objects to serve as a soldier on conscientious grounds, but, moreover, that he actually belongs to a church or religious sect whose tenets forbid all its adherents to serve as soldiers.

The tribunal undoubtedly will implicitly believe whatever he states as to his beliefs, but when it comes to determine the two other facts, firstly, whether he belongs to a certain religious sect, and, secondly, whether the tenets of that same sect forbid his serving as a soldier, I do not believe that it would be fair to allow him by means of this only statement in the form of a yes or a no what prohibitions do exist according to the rules and regulations of that religious sect. This is a fact readily proven, because it must be remembered that it applies only to religious obligations generally established and recognized in this country. As for the case recalled by the hon. member, when you only have to know what is a man's belief, he is perfectly free to state it. But here you need a further fact, which is quite independent of his own beliefs, and is, as a matter of fact, to be proven independently of his own statement.

Mr. WILSON (Translation): In Montreal, very recently, they went pretty far; they refused to accept the oath of a witness who had refused to give it on the Bible, because he had declared he did not believe in God. His belief was to that extent respected.

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY (Translation): His belief shall be duly respected, in accordance with the prohibitions of the church or religious denomination to which he belongs.

Mr. BELLEMARE (Translation): Would the hon. minister allow me a question?

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY (Translation): Certainly.

Mr. BELLEMARE (Translation): We have in some of our classical colleges ecclesiastics, some of whom are in the minor orders, others in the major ones. What I want to know is whether an ecclesiastic who has only received the tonsure, which according to our church is a real order, is, under the Act, exempted from military service?

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY (Translation): I may inform my hon. friend that the word "clergy" in this Bill comprises every one who has received holy orders, and that the tonsure is an order.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: It is very easy to see in reading this section that the questions which will be decided by the tribunals will be simply questions of fact. The local tribunals will have to decide whether it is expedient in the national interest that a man should be employed in the military service or in any other work, or whether his exceptional financial or domestic situation prevents him from going to the front. That is absolutely a question of fact. As every one knows, the decisions of lower courts on questions of fact are never reversed by the higher courts, unless gross injustice has been committed. Why then so many appeals? In the first place we have the local tribunal, in which a judge may sit because the Solicitor General told us that if the judge is not very busy in his district he may be appointed to serve on the tribunal. The decision of this local tribunal as to whether a man shall or shall not go to the front will then be confirmed or reversed by the higher court on the same question of fact. Even that is not sufficient, because he may have to go before the Supreme Court, where one man may reverse the decision of three or four others who have seen and heard the witnesses and who are personally acquainted with the circumstances of the particular case. I really believe that this provision is inflicting a great hardship on those who will have to go from one court to another, and it is contrary to the accepted principles of law and equity.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But, the hon. member forgets it is not strictly an appeal. The leader of the Opposition raised the point in the first place, and it was clearly indicated that what is allowed is of the nature of an appeal from summary conviction, and new evidence may be made; consequently it is partly in the nature of a new trial. While it is true the matter before the local tribunal is one of fact, still there may be errors in the application of the principle deciding the question of fact, and it is well that those errors should be passed upon by a man who has the training of a judge.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: But the member of the first appeal tribunal has the training of a judge. Why then go further than this appeal? Why bring the appeal to Ottawa?

Mr. MEIGHEN: To bring it before the Central Appeal Judge.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Why?

Mr. MEIGHEN: With a view to securing the uniform acceptance and application of the principles. What is before the committee is an amendment to the effect that the date of the existence of the denominational body be fixed at, say, July 6.

Mr. CURRIE: Apparently some of the hon. members find objection to this clause on the ground that some fake religious organizations may be established with a view to keeping men away from the war. If the words " well recognized by the law in Canada " be inserted, and a date fixed, it would cover the difficulty. No matter how small a religious organization may be, it must have an Act which enables it to hold property. This would establish it as a matter of fact, and give its members a status before the tribunals. There are certain branches of the Socialists known as the Individualists, who might claim they are entitled to exemption under this law. Their existence might be recognized because of their meetings and so on, but, to give them a status under this Bill, they should be recognized by the law.

Mr. DEVLIN: I did not have any reference to any sect whatever. I wanted to know how far a man's individual thought would be considered by the law, or whether he had to belong to some particular sect or denomination

Mr. CURRIE: The Act should be made more specific in that respect, so that the onus would not be on the tribunal to say whether some small local organization, such as may exist in various parts of the country, and which has no status whatever, should be recognized. If it is recognized by law, then there should be some organization behind it. I think possibly that would avoid all that difficulty.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The governing test should be the reality and bona fides of the denomination. That reality and bona fides could not be determined by the mere fact of the body having a corporate existence. There might be a very real and thoroughly sincere denomination without such a corporate existence—

Mr. DEVLIN: But not recognized by law.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not recognized by law—a body who had not gone to the trouble or had not seen any object in taking out letters of incorporation or in becoming recognized by law. That would appear to me to be an arbitrary test to apply. It is a question of fact whether such an organization really exists and is recognized.

Mr. MARCIL: Are the local tribunals versed in the theology of all these various sects?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is not a question of theology, but merely of the existence of the denomination and its recognition in the community. It is a question of fact which the local tribunals will decide in the first instance.

Mr. DEVLIN: My understanding is that this relates to the Mennonites, the Doukhobors, and the Quakers.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: And the Christadelphians.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Those would be included; there may be more.

Mr. CURRIE: They are all incorporated and hold property and are well recognized organizations. I do not think the minister could mention any organization with an article of this kind in its creed that is not already recognized by law and has not its chapels. Those who are not in that position are those who cannot come out in the light of day and show themselves. I do not think they are entitled to exemption.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think that even so outstanding a body as the Quakers have any incorporation. There may be individuals incorporated as a church, but I think it would be risky to say that every sect of Quakers in Canada, wherever located, have legal incorporation; but, even if one could say that, it would be more risky to say that every other body entitled to exemption has incorporation.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has my hon. friend in mind the same exemption that is provided for in the Militia Act, or is this section entirely new and introduced with a view of exempting other persons than those who were mentioned or entitled to be mentioned in the Militia Act?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The experience in Great Britain would go to show that it would be very dangerous to accept the wording of the Militia Act as it now reads. That leaves out the persons who, from the doctrines of their religion, are averse to bearing arms or rendering military service under such conditions as may be specified. My hon. friend would hardly suggest that the matter could safely be left in that form.

Mr. MARCIL: Did I understand that the Christian Brothers were to be exempted?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not specify any denominations.

Mr. MARCIL: There are a number of Christian Brethren in my constituency, and I would like to know whether they are to be exempted or not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That will be cleared up by the proper tribunal.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What has been the actual experience in England under the last conscription law? I see that the conscientious objectors are exempt. Does that include certain sects, or are individuals who do not belong to any specified sect exempted?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Under the first Act as it was introduced a man was able to secure exemption merely by convincing the tribunal of his own individual predisposition in the matter. The application of the law had to be tightened, as they found that the number who conscientiously objected to going to the war was very large indeed. This section embodied the good points of both the British and the United States sections.

Mr. NESBITT: Mr. Chairman, the Solicitor General was to take into consideration an amendment moved by yourself (Mr. Rainville) to subclause (a), with reference to agriculture. Did he take that into his consideration?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was moved by the hon. member for Chambly-Verchères (Mr. Rainville) that there be added after the word "in" in the third line of (a) "agricultural, industrial or." Objection was taken by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) that the effect would be to require the interpretation of the word "other" on the principle of ejusdem generis, and consequently to imperil the right of those engaged in such occupations as transportation to secure exemption. Whether those engaged in transportation and similar occupations would be shut out by the principle of ejusdem generis is a question which it might now be perilous to raise. Take teachers in schools and institutions, I should be afraid that the principle of ejusdem generis would shut out their right to secure exemption.

Mr. DEVLIN: They would come under (c.)

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, they are not in training; they are training. Then there is this objection, that notwithstanding the very strong claims of agriculture, speaking generally, to exemption, which claim doubtless will result in adequate exemptions for agriculture, the same argument could be made for the classes suggested by Mr. Girard, say those engaged in fisheries, who are producers of a food more and more required by reason of war conditions, and other similar industries might be particularized. Consequently it was thought that, especially since this clause has worked satisfactorily in Great Britain under this wording, it would be better to keep it in its present form.

Mr. NESBITT: The clause in the British Act specially mentions agriculture, if I read it correctly. Speaking of the exemptions, the section says:

> Provided also that the powers under this provision shall not extend—
> (a) to any man who is for the time being engaged in agriculture, and whose work is certified by the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries (or, as respects Scotland, the Board of Agriculture for Scotland) to be work of national importance, and who was engaged on such work on the thirty-first day of March, nineteen hundred and seventeen.

When my hon. friend suggested it, he did so because in the interpretation it specially mentioned agriculture and did not mention anything else. So far as I can see by this clause, if the suggestion of my hon. friend were accepted, it would not make any difference in any other work. I would not say the duties of a school teacher should not be called work, because sometimes he has pretty heavy work.

Mr. MEIGHEN: His duty means work all right, but, agriculture and industry are mentioned specifically. The other work would need to be of the same nature and kind—ejusdem generis—as industrial work: consequently, teachers might be excluded. As to the third British Act, I think, if the hon. gentleman will read the title to the Act, and the preamble, he will see that it has not the effect, or the wide application, he thinks it has. The title is:

> An Act to enable the exception from military service of men excepted on the ground of previous rejection, or the previous relinquishment of, or discharge from, naval or military service, or unsuitability for foreign service, to be reviewed.

The Act proceeds:

> Be it enacted by the King's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same.

Then it is provided that the powers under this provision shall not be extended to any man who is, for the time being, engaged in agriculture, and so forth. It has not the effect of exempting agriculture from the general provisions of the Act. It simply says that, in this combing at this stage, there shall be these exceptions. I may not have stated it as strongly as I should have, from my standpoint, but, at any rate, I have not stated it too strongly.

Mr. NESBITT: I did not understand my hon. friend to propose that agriculture should be excluded altogether. I only meant that it should be emphasized in the exception.

Mr. BOULAY (Translation): Mr. Chairman, before the exemption clause is finally adopted, I would like to again express my regret that the Government have not seen fit to accept the suggestion offered by some of the members in order to exempt the farmers from compulsory military service. After all that has been said in this House, I am led to understand that under subsection (a) every one or almost any one can be exempted from military service; I believe the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) has thus expressed himself. I perfectly understand that the farmers may be placed under this head, but at all events, they will be no less under the obligation of appearing before some tribunal within a certain delay, just as will be the case for all men between twenty and forty-five years of age, while, if a general exemption had been provided for in the Act itself, they would have been relieved of such an obligation. Moreover, this obligation cannot but entail numerous inconveniences, specially if this Act should be enforced during harvest time. Some members have expressed the opinion that such a clause would be an insult to the agricultural class. To me this argument does not seem a serious one, inasmuch as our farmers are not over scrupulous on the subject, and that they could enlist anyway whenever they saw fit. The farmers are so necessary in Canada that they should not be enticed to enlist in any way whatever.

I now want to draw the attention of the House to a charge which has been laid here by three members, a charge we ought to investigate as I believe.

I stated when I spoke in this House on June 27 ultimo that I had heard that a large number of young Englishmen had emigrated to Canada during the first months of the war in order to evade compulsory military service enacted in England. The hon. member for Montcalm (Mr. Lafortune) made the same assertion in this House on July 5th, last Thursday. I will quote his own words:

> Frequently, we see steamers coming into port with some 700 or 800 young Englishmen on board; we see them strutting, with a new walking stick, along the streets of Montreal. They come over to our country to fill the places of our French Canadian boys who are expelled from our stores and our mills, in order to force them, in a sense, to enlist.

At this point the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Paquet) interrupted the hon. member for Montcalm and asked him:

> Mr. PAQUET (L'Islet) (Translation): Will the hon. member allow me one question?
> Mr. LAFORTUNE (Translation): Certainly.
> Mr. PAQUET (Translation): Has the hon. member information to justify his assertion that the French Canadians are replaced in the munition factories by Englishmen just come from the British Isles?
> Mr. LAFORTUNE (Translation): Certainly, I am not afraid to assert it.
> Mr. PAQUET (Translation): The charge is a most serious one.
> Mr. LAFORTUNE (Translation): Most serious, I admit it; but I do, nevertheless, declare that, in many cases, French Canadians are turned out of doors and that their places are given, a few days later, to your Englishmen just landed from London. The very thing happened in a shell factory in my own village; these French Canadians were told: "Why don't you enlist? Why don't you go and help the Empire"? They were thus forced to sacrifice themselves and to give up all they held most dear, in order to save the Empire.

Now, I read in the Hansard of the 11th instant, another almost similar charge laid by the hon. member for Chambly-Verchères (Mr. Rainville) when he stated that some 73,000 men, after enlisting in the Canadian Army, deserted and disappeared.

He added, that the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), referring to a Detroit newspaper, stated that it had been ascertained that 17,000 English Canadians, mostly from Ontario, were living in that city. Headed: "We have some slackers here from England to be found in insurance offices in Montreal"—And, more than that, relying on statistics which he must have had from good authority, he said that the immigration which had had figured up to 43,000 men in 1914, I believe, had reached 85,000, in 1916, which means an increase of 42,000 for 1916. That is surely an extraordinary fact, and the hon. member for Chambly-Verchères stated: "I would strongly urge that these slackers who have gone to the United States should be brought back."

In both cases which I have just quoted, I believe there is for the Government ample justification for a searching investigation, and that would be of primary importance. These facts appear to me far more important than the charge made against people of the province of Quebec of having insulted soldiers on their way through. In the latter case, a court of enquiry was immediately constituted, which tribunal did act and seems to have given satisfaction to all parties concerned. Now, I do believe that the charge laid against these deserters and these emigrants who have left their country in order to evade military service, is far more serious than the other I have just aliuded to; it would be only right, it seems to me, that the Government should make an investigation upon it.

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY (Translation): In the first part of his remarks, the hon. member for Rimouski expressed the hope that the farmers should be particularly exempted. It seems to me that what has already been said should suffice.

There is no doubt that agriculture, in this country, is of paramount importance, and that anyone who is, "bona fide", necessary to farm production and who actually gives good returns for an earnest labour, should have no reason to feel uneasy.

As for the suggestion of an invesgation in order to find out if it be true or not that a great number of young Britishers have come to this country and that many French Canadians were discharged from certain manufactories in order to replace them by these British youths, I simply will draw the attention of the hon. member to the fact that this Act, when in force, will provide the opportunity of making such an enquiry before the very tribunals to be appointed. Precisely these facts shall be examined and cleared up, and if those facts mentioned in the different speeches which have been quoted by my hon. friend are established, those young Britishers will not be treated otherwise than any other British subject. Every British subject in Canada, whether he come from England or anywhere else, shall be brought under this Act.

Now, as to the third case to which the hon. member draws our attention, referring to those who are said to have left Canada since the war was declared, in order to escape military service, our ruling applies to every British subject at present residing in Canada, as well as to every British subject who did reside in Canada for any length of time previous to 1914. I can say to the hon. member that the provision to include directly the latter class, was precisely inserted with a view to that class he has just mentioned, and I do not believe it will become necessary, in order to put it into effect, to make any arrangement with the United States authorities.

I have every reason to believe, and I do believe, that the hon. member may well trust that we will make such an arrangement by which these gentlemen who have attempted to evade the law, who have deserted their country in order to set themselves free from defending it, will come under the effects of the Act, just as well as those who have stayed at home.

Hon. Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I must approve the remarks of the hon. member for Rimouski. In our district, in the county which I have the honour to represent, the whole population, so to say, are employed at farming or in the fisheries. They are two classes of food producers. Had the farmers and the fishermen been exempted, this entire population would not have been obliged to appear before the courts to be exempted. That is what must happen throughout the district of Gaspé, throughout the counties of Bonaventure, Gaspé, Rimouski and in the maritime provinces. As I have just stated, that population is made of food producers and, if they do not show up before the tribunals, there are penalties enacted by our law.

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY (Translation): I would beg leave to say to the hon. member, in reply to his remarks, that when we pass an Act to demand from a certain part of our population the supreme sacrifice, even that of their own lives, it does not appear to me there can be any occasion for a serious reproach on the part of the farmers or the fishermen, because we ask them to kindly show up before the tribunals. Besides, we shall see to it, that the trbiunals be numerous enough and set under such conditions that they may hold court without exacting from anyone a serious derangement and the inconvenience of being summoned before such a tribunal will be reduced to its minimum. I would be greatly surprised if, under such conditions, we had any complaints, because, in the very interest of the general system, we only demand from those, who are exempted by their occupations, to simply take the trouble to go and submit their demand and expose the circumstances that may justify them.

Hon. Mr. MARCIL (Translation): The tribunals will be plentiful, so they say, especially in that section of the province of Quebec where the distances are the remotest. As the hon. Minister is aware the Gaspé district alone contains ten thousand square miles; we have around there some townships just as large as any ordinary county in the province. Should the tribunals be somewhat distant, you will readily see the inconvenience arising therefrom.

If I rightly understand, the intent of the Act is that a producer is just as necessary and renders just as good a service to the empire as any soldier in the trenches. As all these people are producers, I am glad to hear that the tribunals will be plentiful and of easy access.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: How is this proposed legislation going to work, assuming that the measure is put in force—though I believe that it never will be; at least, not before a general election. I say this because the Bill is one for the conscription of man-power, not of wealth, though it is stated that the measure may be followed by a measure of taxation on incomes. To my mind, the title of this Bill would be more appropriate if it were "Exemption Bill." Another name might be given to it, having regard to the amendment proposed by the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) it might be called a Bill for the conscription of liberty. Assuming then, that the Bill will be put in force, it will operate, if I am right, in the following way. Section 16, subsection 2, says:

This Act shall come into force on such day, after the passing thereof, as the Governor in Council may fix by proclamation.

This is the commencement of the Act, if I understand aright. Then we come to section 4, "calling out by classes," which reads:

(1) The Governor in Council may from time to time by proclamation call out on active service as aforesaid for the defence of Canada, either in Canada or beyond Canada, any class or subclass of men described in section three and all men within the class or subclass so called out shall, from the date of such proclamation, be deemed to be soldiers enlisted in the military forces of Canada and subject to military law for the duration of the present war, and of demobilization thereafter, save as hereinafter provided.

This section is—

The CHAIRMAN: We are discussing section 11. Will the hon. member kindly reserve his speech, which is a general one, he will have an opportunity of making any general remarks he may desire?

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: I will do as you, Sir, have just stated. I was just going to suggest that. Then we come to section 12, "regulations," and subsection 2 of section 12, "publication." I am trying to illustrate how this Bill is going to work. If I am wrong in my illustration of how the Bill will work I would like the Solicitor General to set me right. Has the Solicitor General given any thought, or has he any idea, as to the length of time that should elapse between the proclamation of the Act as per section 16 and the proclamation authorized in section 4—the calling out by classes—in view of the exemptions as provided for in section 11? In other words, what period of time will be given to those who would like to make application for exemption, and in what way will the proclamation and the regulations be published so that the whole Dominion will know?

Mr. MEIGHEN: After the Act is passed, and perhaps before it is carried into operation, there will be undertaken the duty of preparing the regulations, and also the duty of selecting tribunals, under such regulations as may in the meantime have been formulated and adopted. That done, or that proceeded with as far as may be necessary, a proclamation will issue calling out men. I do not know how long a period will be fixed, and it would not be for me to say how long, but I will say on behalf of the Government that it will give ample time for every one who desires to do so to appeal to the appropriate local tribunal for exemption. The proclamation will set out all particulars, so that no one need be confused or in ignorance of the requirements. The man will be told where he should report and where the tribunals will sit, and the method of making application for exemption will be set out. The date for reporting will also be fixed. My thought is that the date for reporting will be subsequent to the sitting of the tribunal, so that at least the determinations of the local tribunals will likely be over before the date for reporting, and possibly further determinations of the appeal tribunals. I give this only by way of illustration of what is in my mind as to how the measure will work out.

The hon. member mentioned something about the publication. The proclamation has to be published in the Ga-

5 p.m. zette. Such publication, of course, we acknowledge, will not reach the people, but it has the effect of establishing legal evidence that the proclamation was issued and that the call was made. It establishes proof, by production of the contents of the Gazette. It will also be published in newspapers and perhaps by means of posters. It will be thoroughly published so that every one will have knowledge of what is required of him. I think that covers the full request of the hon. member for St. James, Montreal (Mr. L. A. Lapointe).

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Does the Solicitor General purpose making any change in respect of paragraph (d) of subsection 1 of section 11? It was suggested by the hon. member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) that that section be divided; but if the minister intends making no change, I would like to have an understanding from him as to what is meant by "domestic position," and what exemptions would probably be granted under that definition.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Speaking solely as an individual—because the interpretation of this, as of every other law, is for the judges —I would say that the best synonym for "position" would be "circumstances"—domestic circumstances; that is, having regard to a man's domestic obligation, not wholly of a financial character, but of every character. As to what exemptions will be granted, speaking in the same capacity, I would say that exemptions will be granted, based on the circumstances the man was in as to domestic obligations. For instance, a man who, although married, had relatives dependent upon him, perhaps a widowed mother, perhaps a crippled father, perhaps a crippled mother and a crippled father, perhaps younger children or other relatives —that would be a circumstance of "domestic position" that would, if it appealed to the tribunal, entitle that man to exemption.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I was rather anxious to have the minister's statement on Hansard. Since discussing this clause of section 11 the other day, I have had an opportunity of looking over the proceedings in regard to the Military Service Bill in the British House of Commons, and I noticed that there was considerable debate on this particular clause, and the clauses in the two Bills are now identical. The committee in the British House of Commons were always anxious to have from the minister in charge of the Bill a statement as to its probable meaning, and the Government did not hesitate to put their interpretation upon it. In many instances, that interpretation without any further amendment was acceptable to hon. members of the committee.

In the English Bill the word "position" read first of all, "domestic obligations." The word "obligations" was amended to "circumstances," and eventually that was changed to "position," and this last word was accepted by the committee without any opposition. It might be interesting to know just what was in the mind of the committee of the British House as to the scope of the word "position." Mr. Long, who was in charge of the Bill, stated that it would include a widow's only son, and also cover the case of a single unmarried son of a family whose other members had all enlisted. If that is intended to be the case here, it would be as well to have a declaration to that effect. Mr. Morrell, speaking on this point in the British House, said:

> I was one of those who had an amendment down asking that the only son of a widow who has not yet enlisted should have an absolute exemption under this Bill, and I venture to say that the words used by the Prime Minister entitled me to expect that an amendment of that sort would be accepted.

Then he proceeds to quote from a statement made by the Prime Minister, as follows:

> I have had brought to my notice most moving cases of mothers who have sent three or even four sons to the war. They have been either wounded, killed, or at any rate disabled on active service. Where there is a single unmarried son left behind, it would, of course, be a monstrous thing if the State were to call for military service from a man in that position. He is as much entitled to exemption as any man in the Empire.

That statement by the Prime Minister was considered by the committee as tantamount to an express declaration by statute that such cases would be exempted.

Mr. MARCIL: Were exemptions granted in England to men whose brothers had already gone to the front?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The sole surviving son of a widow is exempt.

Mr. MARCIL: Suppose that one son has gone to the front and two sons remain at home; would the two sons be entitled to exemption?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not think they would both be exempted, but the tribunals would no doubt take into consideration the fact that one son had already enlisted. I suggested the other day that the son of a widow be exempted, but if the Government would give to the words "domestic position" the wide interpretation given to them by the British Act, it would not be necessary for me to press my suggestion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have no objection at all to giving a general definition of any phrase in the Act as it appeals to myself, but I could not undertake, and I do not think any member of the British House of Commons undertook, to say how the Act should be applied in an individual case. Such a statement would be valueless in any case, because it is a matter for the tribunals to decide. In this connection I might point out that Mr. Long was written to by Mr. Gibson on this very subject, and in his reply, under date of February 23, 1916, he set out at considerable length the impossibility of instancing individual cases or classes of cases, and the necessity of leaving it to a statement of principle. His letter, written by his secretary, ended with these words:

> Mr. Long trusts that these observations will prove of service to tribunals. He fully realizes the difficult nature of the task committed to them and the extreme importance of deciding cases which come before them in a manner which will command the fullest public confidence.

I do not wish to read the whole letter—I will send it to the hon. member—but it establishes the position I have tried to take, that we must leave the application of the law in every individual case to the tribunals, and we must leave any differences there may be in the application of the Act to be corrected by the process of appeal.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I have no objection to offer to the statement of the minister. I was anxious to have placed on Hansard some statement from him for the guidance of the tribunals. Let me give him a case. In the original British Military Service Act the word "exceptional" —the last word of the second line—first of all read "special," but on the third reading of the Bill the word "exceptional" was submitted for "special" after considerable debate. There was in the minds of the committee the particular case of the sole remaining son of a widow. Some members of the committee were pressing the Government for a declaration which would serve as a guide for the tribunals. Sir J. Simons, discussing the proposed amendment, said:

> This is one of the cases where a clear declaration from the Government as to the sort of standard they were setting up would make a lot of difference. If my right hon. friend was prepared to say that if you take the only surviving son of a widow dependent upon her boy's earnings and regarded that as a case that clearly ought to be exempted we should be satisfied that it would not make very much difference whether the exemption was "special" or "exceptional."

I notice that efforts were frequently made during the passage of the Bill through the British House to get a declaration from the Government, more for the guidance of the tribunals, I suppose, than anything else; in fact, I cannot see what other purpose it would serve. It was for a similar reason that I asked for a statement from the Solicitor General. I was not asking that the wording of the section be changed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is important to observe in this connection that that service can be readily performed by the Central Appeal Judge. In the first place he would be more competent to perform it, and in the second place he would be a more fitting person to perform it. He could issue and place in the hands of the local tribunals such definitions and such general information, with such illustrations as he saw fit to give, concerning the application of the various principles of exemption as in his judgment might be most useful to them. In doing that, I apprehend that he would have very close regard to similar information sent out to the tribunals in Great Britain, and to decisions rendered in Great Britain by their final tribunal. It must be clear that we gain by adopting their very language, because in that way we get more clearly and usefully the advantage of their decisions.

Mr. MICHAUD: I read in this morning's papers that the consumption of wheat, beef and bacon in Canada should be reduced by one-third. I would suggest that it should be increased by one-third, and for that purpose I believe we should take the farmer's son into consideration. Under this Act are members of the local and appeal tribunals to be provided with information by the Government in reference to farming products when an applicant appears before the board? Where will the board get its information in regard to the man on the farm?

Mr. MEIGHEN: From the Bill; chiefly from paragraph (a) of subsection 1, section 11, and also from such information as may be sent him under the provision of this Bill by the central appeal judge, who will render all the assistance possible to the tribunals in the application of the provisions of the Bill which provide for the exemption of men necessary for agriculture and other purposes in the national interest.

Mr. OLIVER: I took the liberty of discussing this clause at some length on a previous occasion. I now desire to take advantage of the copy of the United States law, which was laid on the Table, for the purpose of supporting and emphasizing the position I took in regard to what was to me the evident purpose of this section, and which was not related to a fair conscription of the man-power of the country. The parallel section of the United States Act reads as follows:

> Sec. 4. That the Vice-President of the United States, the officers, legislative, executive and judicial, of the United States, and of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, regular or duly ordained ministers of religion, students who at the time of the approval of this Act are preparing for the ministry in recognized theological or divinity schools, and all persons in the military and naval service of the United States, shall be exempt from the selective draft herein prescribed; and nothing in this Act contained shall be construed to require or compel any person to serve in any forces herein provided for who is found to be a member of any well-recognized religious sect or organization at present organized and existing and whose existing creed or principles forbid its members to participate in war in any form, and whose religious convictions are against war or participation therein in accordance with the creed or principles of said religious organizations, but no person so exempted shall be exempted from service in any capacity that the President shall declare to be non-combatant; and the President is hereby authorized to exclude or discharge from said selective draft and from the draft under the second paragraph of section 1 hereof for partial military service only from those liable to draft as in this Act provided persons of the following classes: County and municipal officials; customhouse clerks; persons employed by the United States in the transmission of the mail; artificers and workmen employed in the armouries, arsenals, and navy yards of the United States, and such other persons employed in the service of the United States as the President may designate; pilots; mariners actually employed in the sea service of any citizen or merchant within the United States; persons engaged in industries, including agriculture, found to be necessary to the maintenance of the military establishment or the effective operation of the military forces, or the maintenance of national interest during the emergency; those in a status with respect to persons dependent upon them for support which renders their exclusion or discharge advisable; and those found to be physically or morally deficient. No exemption or exclusion shall continue when a cause therefor no longer exists.

It will be observed that this provision of the United States Act covers, in a great measure, the same exemptions as are covered specifically in this provision of section 11 of the Act we are considering, but it differs from section 11 on the very points I raised, and in support of which I expressed myself somewhat strongly. The conditions of the United States being more closely parallel to those in Canada I think we might fairly look to the law of the United States for guidance in dealing with our conditions here; and as the legislators of the United States had the advantage of the British law, and reached the conclusion they did—a conclusion that is vastly different in its operation from the law we are now discussing—I contend that my position has very good support.

The first difference between section 11 and this provision of the United States Act to which I wish to draw attention is that there is a very much greater specification of exemption. I impressed upon the hon. minister the desirability of making more specific exemptions. He refused to make those exemptions, and demanded that I should give him even one exemption. I have quoted from the United States Act, and he is at liberty to consider that all the exemptions in the United States Act would be proper exemptions to be included in our Act.

The next difference to which I wish to draw attention is that in the United States Act there is no provision parallel to paragraph (b) of subsection 1, section 11, a provision of our Act, which I have taken the liberty of saying has been inserted in the Bill for the purpose of using the threat of compulsory military service, as a means of securing labour for friends of the Government engaged in industrial enterprises in Canada. There is no such provision in the United States Act.

The other feature I desire to draw attention to is that the tribunals organized under the United States Act are subject in their decisions to regulations framed by the President. They will be directed by the responsible authorities of the country, and I am one of those old-fashioned people who believe in responsible government. I believe in the Government of our country being responsible for its acts of administration, particularly so where life and liberty and right are at stake. The efforts of the Bill to divest our Government of responsibility for whatever action may be taken by the tribunals is not a policy that appeals to my mind as being sound from any point of view, and I direct the attention of the House to the fact that it is not the system adopted in the United States. The President of the United States is held responsible for the regulations under which exemptions will be granted by the local tribunals.

Another difference is that certain of the exemptions are to be dealt with by what might be called the inferior tribunals. Another class of exemptions is to be dealt with by what we will call the appeal tribunals only. The reason for that distinction is very obvious, and I maintain that it is a wise distinction. I shall read the provision:

The President is hereby authorized, in his descretion, to create and establish throughout the several States and subdivisions thereof and in the territories and the District of Columbia local boards, and where, in his discretion, practicable and desirable, there shall be created and established one such board in each county or similar subdivision in each State, and one for approximately each thirty thousand of population in each city of thirty thousand population or over, according to the last census taken or estimates furnished by the Bureau of Census of the Department of Commerce. Such boards shall be appointed by the President, and shall consist of three or more members, none of whom shall be connected with the military establishment, to be chosen from among the local authorities of such subdivisions or from other citizens residing in the subdivision or area in which the respective boards will have jurisdiction under the rules and regulations prescribed by the President. Such boards shall have power within their respective jurisdictions to hear and determine, subject to review as hereinafter provided, all questions of exemption under this Act, and all questions of or claims for including or discharging individuals or classes of individuals from selective draft, which shall be made under rules and regulations prescribed by the President, except any and every question or claim for including or excluding or discharging persons or classes of persons from the selective draft under the provisions of this Act authorizing the President to exclude or discharge from the selective draft "Persons engaged in industries, including agriculture, found to be necessary to the maintenance of the military establishment, or the effective operation of the military forces, or the maintenance of national interest during the emergency."

The exceptions are those that come directly before the appeal tribunal and are not tried before the original tribunal at all. From beginning to end the purpose of the United States Act is plain on its face. That purpose is to raise so many men, to raise them on a basis of population, and to raise them with the object of finding men for the fighting line. It is because the Bill before the House differs from the United States Bill in those particulars that I, as a member of this House, object to it, and object to it most strongly. I took the liberty of saying that in my opinion the provisions of the Bill as we have it before us were as they were with the distinct idea in the mind of the Government not to administer the Bill with a view to laying an equal burden of service upon all the people of Canada, and I further took the liberty of saying that that was made absolutely evident by the fact that no provision was contained in the Bill requiring such equality of service. I have read to the House the section of the American Act regarding exemptions. But the section concludes with a proviso as follows:

> Provided, that notwithstanding the exemptions enumerated herein, each State, Territory, and the District of Columbia shall be required to supply its quota in the proportion that its population bears to the total population of the United States.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I need not refer to the portions of the hon. gentleman's speech which were repetitions of his stand previously taken. The United States legislation makes certain specific exceptions, just as ours makes certain specific exceptions, and much along the lines of our exceptions in the schedules. It then proceeds to authorize the President to make more exceptions—it does not make them—and included in the further exceptions which the President is authorized to make are pilots, mariners, and a great many people, and then persons engaged in industry, including agriculture, found to be necessary to the maintenance of the military establishment and the effective operation of the military forces or the maintenance of the national interest during the emergency. Then it provides that notwithstanding such exceptions that may thus be made, or may not be made, the men must be secured, so that if the securing of the men invades the exemptions the men have to be obtained all the same. What is the difference between that and ours? We also say that we exclude industries essential for the national interest, and we say that we exclude them only to such an extent as will enable us to get the men. What is the real fundamental difference there? Does any one suggest that we in Canada should say that all engaged in industries beneficial to the national interest shall be excused? Does any one say that, out of mere idlers left in Canada, doing nothing, engaged in no industry whatever for the national interest, we could pick up the 100,000 men fit for military service, physically fit. No one would suggest that. We would have to do as they provide for here, if enough men were not secured without invading the exemptions then you would have to invade industries, first those not essential and then those essential. So, in effect, it is the same. They establish tribunals to determine these things and do not say that the President shall exempt these men; they simply authorize him to do so. It is true that we have responsible Government here and it has a fairly faithful adherent in myself, so much so that on questions of very great and insistent responsibility I think it is the province of the Government to discharge that responsibility and not shift it to the people, not try to relieve itself of the responsibility. Such is my adherence to the principle of responsible government. But the principle of responsible government is not impaired by leaving to the judicial authorities the determination of questions of law and fact, nor, I submit again, is it impaired by leaving to the jury of tribunals simple questions of fact such as are left to them by this Bill.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not wish to pursue the discussion, but I again ask the minister to state as shortly as possible the specific reason why the proviso of the United States Act does not appear in connection with the Bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Because we in Canada prefer to regard the whole of Canada as one nation. In the United States it is more a collection of states, and their constitution is based on that principle. Here we are not a collection of provinces; we are one nation divided into provinces only for purposes of the local jurisdiction.

Mr. OLIVER: If that is the reason it is not a good reason, because if there is a distinction in parts of the United States on account of geographical or other considerations, these considerations are very much more marked in Canada, and, indeed, it is because of those distinctions, geographical and other, that Canada is a Confederation to-day, instead of being a country. We have the Federal system in Canada as they have it in the United States, but my hon. friend, in this Bill, sees fit to ignore the existence of the federal system in Canada, though, I am compelled to say, with a purpose which would be absolutely prevented if this provision were adopted, with the absolute purpose of not having an equal enforcement of the Act as between the different sections of the country. Can the hon. minister give us any reason why the provision in paragraph (b), subsection 1 of section 11, which has no parallel in the United States Act, is inserted in this Bill?

Mr. MEIGHEN: In the United States the framing of the principles is left to the executive. Under this Bill, we submit the principles to Parliament in the same way as they do in England. The clause which my hon. friend has before him shows that the framing of the principles is left to the executive. We set them out, as they do in England, practically in the wording of the English Act.

Mr. OLIVER: I will not deal with that, but I will only say that I do not agree with the hon. gentlman; the United States Act declares the principles just as our Act does, and specifically imposes upon the President the responsibility of providing the details, which ours should do as well.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will have to read it. I have not made a statement which I cannot support. In section 4 of the United States Act, I find the following:

> Such boards shall have power within their respective jurisdictions to hear and determine, subject to review as hereinafter provided, all questions of exemption under this Act, and all question of or claims for including discharging individuals or classes of individuals from selective draft, which shall be made under rules and regulations prescribed by the President.

Then it goes on to provide that the President may authorize definite exemptions under the previous clause. Of course they can not evade the President's rule, unless of course they fail otherwise to secure the men. So that the President sets out the statement of principle which apply to exemption. Here we set them out as they do in England.

Mr. NESBITT: Do I understand the hon. minister to say that he intends to pass paragraph (a) in the form in which it appears in the Bill?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, the only amendment that I propose as to section 11 is to change the words "at the date of the passing of this Act' in subclause 1 (f) to "6th July, 1917."

[Mr. Oliver.]

Section adopted.

On section 12—regulations:

Mr. MEIGHEN: The only portion of this clause that stood was paragraph (c) of the first subsection. That stood over, in order to consider a proposal made by the leader of the Opposition, to the effect that there might be conflict of the different sets of regulations. Section 10 of the Bill provides for regulations to be made regarding appeals from the appeal tribunal to the central appeal, and those regulations must be made initially by the central appeal judge and approved by the Governor in Council. All regulations not made by the Governor in Council are approved by the Governor in Council, and, consequently, we are responsible for all the regulations made. Clause 12 provides for regulations that are made initially by the Governor in Council, and inasmuch as subclause (c) refers to the question of procedure on appeal, it was urged that it should go rather into section 10. The difficulty in meeting the suggestion exactly is that section 10 deals with the appeal tribunal and appeals from it, and, consequently, the whole of paragraph (c) would be rather inappropriate there, but it is fully met by an amendment which I now propose—that the words "on the recommendation of the central appeal judge" be inserted before the first words of paragraph (c), subsection 1, section 12. It will then read:

> On the recommendation of the Central Appeal Judge prescribe the conditions as to time or otherwise under which applications for certificates may be made, deferred applications received, appeals entered and heard and re-hearing had, and prescribe forms.

Mr. McKENZIE: I do not understand clearly when a man may appeal. Is it after he registers? Supposing a man answers the call, comes in and registers his name, does he then make his appeal?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The better word would be "report." There is no registration. He reports, as required by the proclamation under section 4. The local tribunal will, I think, sit before the date for reporting at all, and those desiring exemption will present their case to the local tribunals, and if they are aggrieved by the finding of the tribunal, they will enter their appeal at once, or at such time as the regulations provide, and send it to the registrar of the province, and, perhaps, the appeals will be all over by the date of reporting, and if the appeals are not concluded, he will be considered as on leave of absence, without pay, until the appeal is decided. If it is decided against him, it is his duty to report.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: As soon as a man receives notice that he is enlisted, he must at once take advantage of the exemption provision, and send his application to the provincial registrar, saying, "I claim exemption."

Mr. MEIGHEN: The proclamation will state that the tribunal will sit to hear applications for exemption at such-and-such a place. Then, if you claim exemption, you go to one of these points where the tribunal sits, and make out your case. If it is against you and you wish to appeal, send the notice of appeal to the registrar, or hand it in to the tribunal, and the tribunal will forward it to the registrar, if the regulations so prescribe. At any rate, a notice of appeal should go to the registrar, as soon as the adverse decision is given by the local tribunal.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: He can make his application when he is notified.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He can make it as soon as the tribunal sits.

Mr. LEMIEUX: When the proclamation is issued putting in force this Act, the various classes are conscripted, ipso facto.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX: When the proclamation is issued, those who are liable under the Act are conscripted.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know about that.

Mr. LEMIEUX: They need not register, but they are conscripted by law, unless they get exemption from the tribunal to which they must address themselves. Suppose I am conscripted by this law, the moment the proclamation is made by the Governor General, if I wish to be exempted, I address myself to the tribunal, go before them, and the tribunal may exempt me.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The proclamation bringing the Act into force does not call out any men at all. There must be a subsequent proclamation under section 4, which calls out a class of men, and the moment that issues all men in that class are soldiers, and it is their duty then, if they wish exemption, to go to the tribunals, which will sit on the day named and at the place mentioned in the proclamation.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Are they called individually?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh no.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It is just a proclamation that such a class by proclamation are liable to service?

Mr. MARCIL: What is the meaning of these words?

> And any person aggrieved by the decision of a local tribunal and any person authorized by the Minister of Militia and Defence may appeal against any such decision.

If they are not satisfied with the decision of the local board, must an authorization be obtained from the minister before an appeal can be registered?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, there is an absolute right to appeal.

Mr. MARCIL: Section 10 provides that any person aggrieved by the decision of a local tribunal, or any person authorized by the Minister of Militia, may appeal.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Any person aggrieved may appeal; that is absolute. Any one authorized by the minister may appeal; that is the other side of the case. In a word, either side may appeal.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: As my hon. friend knows, in the Criminal Code provision is made as to the time within which appeal may be made. Would it not be proper to embody in this Bill a provision as to the time within which appeal may be made from the decision of the local tribunal? If regulation in that respect is made by Order in Council, the House will not have a word to say about it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Anything as to the period within which appeal may be lodged will be clearly set out in the proclamation itself, which will be published everywhere.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: Why not put it in the law?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There would be just the same reason for working into the Bill all the other details of the law. The principles of the machinery of the Act are all here; the rest, which is mere detail, could not be embodied in the Act. There never was an Act of this kind in which such details were embodied. As a matter of fact, the proportion of work left to regulation is infinitely greater in the Militia Act than it is in this Act.

Mr. CURRIE: I have had inquiries by letter whether a man will be allowed to be represented by counsel before these tribunals. Will the Solicitor General inform me on this point?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Bill does not say yes or no. The Bill leaves it to regulations formulated by the Central Appeal Judge, for this reason: It was the general feeling that persons acting as counsel should not be heard before the local tribunals. It was felt, however, that in certain cases coming before the local or appeal tribunals there might otherwise be hardship, and the matter was left open to regulation to be framed by the central appeal judge.

Mr. CURRIE: If the regulations that are to be laid down follow the customary military regulations, then persons will not be allowed to have or be represented by counsel.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I believe that is correct.

Mr. CURRIE: Then, unless there is a direct—

An hon. MEMBER: This is not a military Bill.

Mr. CURRIE: Excuse me, it is a military Bill and will be dealt with almost entirely by military men. If the judges who frame these regulations follow military rule, they will not permit the employment of counsel. I think, therefore, that some provision should be put in to allow a man to have counsel.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the precedent of military courts is followed, I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman is right. But those having charge of the framing of the regulations would not be obliged to follow military precedent, because while this is a military Bill, the tribunals are civil tribunals administered by the Minister of Justice under civil law.

Mr. NESBITT: Do I understand that when the proclamation is issued the men do not have to report to anybody?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The proclamation will fix a day for reporting, and they have to report on that day.

Mr. NESBITT: To whom?

Mr. MEIGHEN: To whomsoever is named in the proclamation. I assume that there will be hundreds of places at which to report.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. NESBITT: The men so called out shall report and if they desire exemption they may appeal to the tribunals. Will the tribunals be set up before the issuance of the proclamations?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Before the date of the reporting, I think.

Mr. NESBITT: They will be mentioned in the proclamation?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, yes.

Mr. NESBITT: The men do not report to the tribunals?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. NESBITT: They appeal to the tribunals only for exemption?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is all. From the records kept of reports and appeals we shall be able to get what is, in effect, a full registration.

Mr. LEMIEUX: As I understand the machinery of this Bill, it is as follows: The Bill becomes law by proclamation. Then another proclamation issues, fixing the time and place of reporting. Then the local tribunals are set in motion; they are established by proclamation at different points throughout the country. Those who seek exemption will go before these local tribunals, which will pass upon each case as speedily as possible. Then there may be an appeal from the Minister of Militia or from the parties seeking exemption; that appeal goes before the appeal tribunals. Then there may be another appeal from that higher court to the central authority, and when the central authority has made its decision, the man is exempt or must report for the fulfilment of his duty. I understand the central authority will be a member of the Supreme Court of Canada. Has the Government selected a judge to fill that position?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not in a position to state who that person will be.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I understand that a man seeking exemption can do so orally or in writing, in the briefest form possible. He may or may not be represented by counsel before the local or the appeal tribunal.

Mr. MEIGHEN: According as the regulations set out.

Mr. LEMIEUX: This will be set out in the proclamations or regulations issued?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. NESBITT: To whom will the appeals be sent if written?

Mr. MEIGHEN: To the registrar. It may be that provision will be made for the leaving of the appeals with the local tribunals, by whom they will be forwarded to the registrar. They must, however, reach the registrar, who allocates them for hearing.

Mr. NESBITT: While the appeal is being determined, the applicant goes back to his ordinary employment?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. CURRIE: In every other conscription measure, provision is made as to where and to whom the conscripts must report. Provision is made for the enrolment and registration of the men.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That will be done by proclamation.

Mr. CURRIE: I do not see what merit there is in omitting that provision from the Bill. I have been told that the purpose was to enable the tribunals to sit on the cases before the men were enrolled. What does it matter when the men are enrolled? In France the conscript reports to the clerk of the commune. In Canada, under the Militia Act, a man is supposed to report to some local militia officer, but if we follow this regulation we will find that we have no local militia officers left who can be called upon to perform that service. The militia of Canada, with the exception of four or five battalions, is all at the war. The other battalions are virtually denuded of officers. Perhaps there may be a lame lieutenant who cannot pass for overseas service. There are in the country no available officers whom you can utilize to go to those centres to take the men's names and attest them.

Mr. COPP: There have come back from England some officers who are not doing anything.

Mr. CURRIE: There are not many of them altogether, and there would not be nearly enough of them for the work. I suppose the hon. member may know some in his county. He knows something about the militia there. There are no officers left to take charge; they are all either on overseas service or out of the service altogether.

Mr. COPP: Some from my province are in England doing nothing.

Mr. CURRIE: There are some on the opposite side of the House who have never gone to the war, and who are still drawing very large pay as members of this House, whilst all the other members belonging to the Expeditionary Force are off the payroll and attending to their duties in this House. As in the greater portion of Canada there are no militia officers left to look after this work, civilian officials would have to be appointed, and for that reason I cannot see that there is any merit in evading in this Bill what is in every other Bill. I would like to know what was in the mind of the Solicitor General when, in drafting the Bill, he did not make some special provision as to whom the men should report to, for instance, the mayor, or the clerk of a municipality, or somebody of that kind. The Bill does not state to whom the men are to report, and it would help in the administration of the Bill if that point were clearly laid down.

Mr. MEIGHEN: All that was in my mind was that there was no need of encumbering the Bill with a list of several hundred persons and places——

Mr. CURRIE: That is not necessary.

Mr. MEIGHEN: —to whom and at which men should report. That wi'l all be fixed by the militia authorities. There may be difficulty in getting such persons. I know the country is pretty well denuded of militia officers and men, but the Minister of Militia believes suitable men can be secured, and of course, suitable places will not be hard to find. They will be set out in the proclamation.

Mr. NESBITT: The officers are supposed to keep a list of the men who report to them?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. By means of the tribunals before whom all who get exemptions will have to have gone and their records, and by means of the reporting officers to whom the men report and their records, we shall have a register of every one, and I have not been able to see how we can either ease the work or add to the efficiency by duplicating that by a separate registration.

Mr. NESBITT: The only selection is really by the exemptions?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is correct.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is not the Bill at all. The Bill says that everybody who is notified is a soldier and remains a soldier until exempted.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I thought the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) said that the real selection was by the exemptions. That is the case. The selection is made by the exemptions.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The Bill says that everybody who is notified is a soldier. If he can be exempted, that is all right; if he cannot be exempted, he remains a soldier. There is good ground for the suggestion made by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie). If a man is a soldier, to whom is he to report?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The same notice that tells him he is a soldier will tell him where he is to report.

Mr. COPP: When the Solicitor General was answering a question put by the hon. member for North Simcoe in regard to allowing counsel to appear before the different tribunals, did I understand him aright to say that this was a matter that was left to the regulations to be made by the Central Appeal Judge?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. COPP: Did I also understand him to say that all the regulations made by the Central Appeal Judge were subject to the approval of the Governor in Council?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Amendment to section 12 agreed to.

At six o'clock, the committee took recess.

After Recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

On section 14—burden of proof:

Mr. MEIGHEN: I move that this clause be struck out and the following substituted therefor:—

If in any prosecution under this Act any question shall arise in respect of the matters hereinafter mentioned the burden of proof shall be upon the person charged to establish by satisfactory evidence—

(a) that he does not come within any specified class called out;

(b) that he has duly reported in accordance with section 4;

(c) that he comes within any of the exceptions set out in the schedule hereto;

(d) that he has been duly exempted under the provisions of section 11.

And in the absence of such evidence the contrary shall be conclusively presumed.

This is much the same as the original section, but I think better expressed. It will be apparent at a glance that the proof in each case would be very readily at hand on the part of the person charged, but would be practically impossible for the prosecution to secure. For instance, the fact of a man not coming within the class alleged depends upon his age, and whether he is a British subject. Now, he knows his age; that can be very easily established, but it would be a very difficult matter for the prosecution to establish. With regard to coming within the exceptions, it is a principle very frequently adopted in law that the exception must be proved by the party claiming it. Again, it is very easy for a man to prove that he has been exempted by producing a certificate, but it would be very difficult for the prosecution to show that he had not been exempted. The burden of proof is also on the person charged to show that he has reported. If the bruden of proof was on the Crown they might have to search the records of every reporting office in Canada, but the man can prove it very easily by producing evidence of it. So I think it is not only fair, but necessary, that the clause should read as amended.

Mr. NESBITT: Will a man be given a certificate to show that he has reported?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Very likely he will. I think they are always given a certificate on enlistment. But even if a man is not given a certificate showing that he has reported his own evidence would be proof of it, whereas to establish the negative would be practically impossible.

Mr. OLIVER: This provision applies, I suppose, to the case of men who desire to be exempted on the ground that by reason of age they do not belong to the class called up. In a country like ours with so large a portion of our population coming from other countries, and where there is so much moving about on the part of our people, it may be very difficult for a man to produce proof of his age. Has that been taken into consideration, and what steps will be taken to meet that condition?

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend is not, I think, quite right in his idea that exemption is in any way related to this question. A man would not be able to go to a tribunal and say: "I am not in that class at all; therefore, give me a certificate of exemption." If he believes that he is not in the class called, he should not go to the tribunal at all, but simply stay at home. Then if he should be prosecuted he would come and give the best evidence of his age that he could, and however difficult it might be for him to show his exact age, it would be infinitely more difficult for the Crown to show what his age was. He will be in the possession of the best evidence that is procurable, whatever that evidence may be.

Mr. OLIVER: That latter instance is what I had in mind. I am sure the minister will appreciate the difficulty that a very large part of the population of our western country would have in establishing their age before a tribunal. I do not know whether it is possible to make a provision recognizing that difficulty, which is peculiar to our country and did not exist in any degree in England.

Mr. MEIGHEN: To a great many it would be very, very difficult to establish their age. But this must be remembered; they will try to show their age not before any tribunal we are establishing but before the regular courts—before the magistrate or county court judge in appeal, as the case may be—because that is where any prosecution would take place at which they would have to show their age. While they might not be able there to show their exact age, still they would be able to give much evidence as would persuade the judge one way or the other, and if he was of the opinion that the man was really outside of the class called up I have no doubt that on the ordinary principles of law he would say: "That is a reasonable excuse, anyway," and the man would not be punished.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Suppose that A is called up but is really not in the class. He would have to furnish the best evidence he could that he was not of the age called up. In our province the best evidence would be a certificate of birth, and that costs something like a dollar. I know that from personal experience, because not very long ago I was asked by an insurance company with whom I had carried a policy for several years, to renew the evidence of my age, and I had to go to the registry office and get a birth certificate and pay for it. Where there are many young men in a community, quite a number of these certificates would be obtained from the registry office. Who is going to pay the costs?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is not provided for. While the production of certificates might be, I might say, final evidence, still it is not the only evidence. A parent may swear to his son's age, and that is very strong, if not final evidence.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I understand that this Bill will be reprinted.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, yes.

Section as amended agreed to.

On proposed new section 16—penalties:

Mr. MEIGHEN: I move that paragraph 1 of the new section 16 should be the following:

> Any person who comes within any of the classes set out in section 3, and who contravenes any of the provisions of this Act, or regulations made thereunder, for which contraventions no other penalty is herein provided, shall be guilty of an offence, and shall be liable upon summary conviction to a penalty of not less than $100 nor more than $500, or to imprisonment for a term of not less than one month nor more than twelve months, or to both fine and imprisonment.

It will be observed that in this section as transcribed in Hansard the word "or" appears after "contraventions," and the word "and" appears after "$500." The word "or" should be "no," and the word "and" should be "or."

Mr. McKENZIE: As I understand it, under this Act the penalty is always fine and imprisonment.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think that would be the effect, as it reads.

Mr. McKENZIE: Does not the minister think that "not less than $100" is a very severe penalty for what may be a very trivial offence? There are a great many provisions in this Act, and a person may inadvertently transgress in a small way. If the court is obliged to say that he is found guilty of any offence under the Act, there is no alternative but to fine him $100 or more. It seems to me that is rather severe. I have always been opposed to those minimum sentences. I think there should be discretion left to the courts.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Of course this is the first time the clause has been before the committee, and the Government will be very glad to hear the views of hon. members on the question of the minimum fine.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: In my judgment there is much more than that. This paragraph is most drastic. I do not believe it is possible to find in any law anything so vague, so general, and so severe. There are special penalties provided in the Act for specific offences. I have two in mind at the moment, but there are others. A man who neglects to report is liable to a fine, and a man who has not a certificate to exhibit to a peace officer is liable to a fine. Of course, I cannot find fault with the principle that there should be penalties for specific offences, but here is a penalty of $100 and an imprisonment of twelve months for a contravention of something which is not defined in the Act. Read it again, Mr. Chairman, and I will leave it to the common sense and fairness of both sides of the House. What contravention is here contemplated You have specific offences already provided for, but here is a vague enactment that if any one contravenes something which is not defined he is liable to a fine and imprisonment. That is not fair or right; it is not justice. I cannot imagine what contravention is here contemplated, which would subject a man to a fine of $100 and imprisonment for twelve months besides.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is not at all an unusual type of section in a Bill. I am sure my right hon. friend will remember other Bills where a general clause is inserted providing against infractions not specifically mentioned in the Bill. I have in mind a clause in the Criminal Code, which is even a great deal more general than this. I think it was passed under my right hon. friend's Government, but of that I am not sure. It says that any one contravening any of a certain class of laws not mentioned in the Code shall be liable to a certain penalty.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: That is disobedience of a statute.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Exactly. Such contravention renders a man guilty of an offence, and the punishment is set out. A more extreme case than that can scarcely be conceived. It does not even say what the statute is.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It includes the provincial statutes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) asks me what is the offence contemplated. There is no special offence contemplated, but by reference to section 12 it will be seen that the Governor in Council has power to make regulations to secure the full effective and expeditious operation and enforcement of the Act. Under paragraph 2, subsection 1, they may appoint such peace officers, or other officers, and give them such powers, and impose on them such duties as may be deemed necessary. Under subsection (g) they may prescribe penalties for peace officers or other officers appointed under the authority of the Act, who are convicted of neglect or refusal to perform duty without reasonable excuse. They may not only prescribe penalties for refusing to perform the duty, but may also make regulations binding on the men who come within these classes.

They may make duties in connection with reporting on the nature of their exemptions, etc. But it is well to have a general clause covering it. I am not insisting on the $100 minimum; in fact, I was impressed by the suggestion of the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) that there might be quite a trivial offence, and that it would be well to make the minimum fine much smaller.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My hon. friend's arguments confirm my objection. I can well understand that power can be given to the Government to make regulations under this Act, and, following the example set forth in paragraph (g), subsection 11, section 12, prescribe penalties which would be in accordance with the offences created by the rule. I have no objection, no one has any objection, to this paragraph (g), subsection 1, section 12, which reads:

> Prescribe penalties for peace officers or other officers appointed under the authority of this Act, who are convicted of neglect or refusal to perform duty without reasonable excuse.

If regulations were made by the Governor in Council, the Governor in Council could provide penalties in accordance with the offences. The regulations may provide for punishment for neglect of a duty which is of a trivial nature, and then impose a penalty in accordance with that trivial offence. But here you provide a double penalty of $100 and imprisonment besides for an offence which is in the air, breach of a regulation which has not been made. The regulation may be absolutely trivial, and for the breach of that trivial regulation you have a double penalty of such a grievous character as this.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Why a double penalty?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It provides for imprisonment or fine or both. It is an extraordinary penalty for an offence that may be most trivial. Let the Government take power to make regulations and to make penalties to suit them, but let them not make a penalty and then make the offence afterwards.

Mr. DOHERTY: There is no doubt that the specific nature of the offence is not stated in this section, but no man will be charged, nor will he be subject to be tried, for a general statement of contravention of this statute; when he comes to be charged he will be charged with some specific thing which it will be on the prosecutor to show was a contravention of this statute, or of such regulations as may be made.

As to the wide nature of the penalty, as the Solicitor General said, I quite appreciate that it may be desirable to make the minimum lower than is fixed here; but within the limit so prescribed it will be the function of the court to make the punishment fit the crime, and it is precisely because there may be varying degrees of gravity that we give this wide margin of punishment. No obligation is imposed upon the court, for any one of these contraventions that may arise, to impose the maximum penalty, but there may be contraventions of such gravity as to justify the imposition of the maximum penalty. Surely we are not exposing anybody who may be guilty of violation of this Act to any undue consequence when we are leaving him in the hands of the court to appreciate the gravity of his offence, and, within the limit fixed, to impose a penalty that may be suitably applicable to the particular offence.

Mr. McKENZIE: Up to $100 you leave the court no decision.

Mr. DOHERTY: As to that I think there will be no difficulty about reducing that minimum penalty. I have no objection to saying that it may be fixed at $10. Even in cases where specific cases are dealt with, the courts are given in most instances, a wide margin of discretion; you cannot determine the gravity of any particular violation in advance. You may have the same technical violation of the law committed under circumstances where the court would impose a trivial sentence and under other circumstances where the court would feel called upon to inflict a serious penalty. It is for that reason that we give the court this wide discretion. It is a most usual provision. I know of cases where one man has been sent down for fourteen years and another man for one month for what was technically the same offence. It seems to me that we would have been more open to criticism if we had asked for an indiscriminate power, on our own authority, to fix any penalty or punishment, without limit. This is a section which has been mentioned as being contained in the Criminal Code, 164:

> Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to one year's imprisonment who, without lawful excuse, disobeys any Act of the Parliament of Canada or of any Legislature in Canada by wilfully doing any act which it forbids, or omitting to do any act which it requires to be done, unless some penalty or other mode of punishment is expressly provided by law.

Here we have a penalty provided for any violation of any law of the Dominion of Canada or of any province thereof.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: More than that, of any law that any province may make in the future.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Is that an example to be followed?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It is my right hon. friend's example.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: No, not mine. I have sins enough, but not this one. May I ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) if he can suggest what contravention of this Act has not already been provided for by penalty? There are already six or seven different penalties in the Bill, and what is there left which is to be covered by this penalty?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Suppose that in the regulations certain duties were imposed on the man reporting; that is to say, as to how long he should remain at the office, or as to his duties during that time. If a man were to report all right, but did not obey the balance of the regulations, there would be no penalty provided under the Act as it stands. No penalty could be provided under subsection 9 of section 12; there would be no way of punishing a man under it.

Mr. OLIVER: The question simply seems to be the imposition of a minimum penalty.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I suggest that the amount should be fixed at $10, and that the minimum imprisonment be cut out.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Can the hon. minister give a concrete case?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I just gave one to my hon. friend.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Will the hon. member repeat it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The regulation made in pursuance of this Act, under the authority of section 12, will necessarily impose duties upon men reporting in a class. It may impose duties on them in respect of their applications for exemption, should they make any, or in respect of their reporting. I exemplified the duties, namely that they should remain a certain number of days, and how they shall conduct themselves, and so on. If a man fails to report he comes under another section, and is liable. Supposing he reports and fails to carry out the other provisions of the regulations, and so gets out of hand before he is placed on active service, there is no clause to cover his case, and, so far as that goes, while he would be disobeying the Act, there is no specific penalty provided for that offence.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: If he does not report, he is liable to imprisonment.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But in case where he does report, and before being placed on active service, does not comply with the regulations.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Then he comes under the Militia Act, and there are numerous ways of enforcing discipline.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But these remedies cannot be enforced till he is placed on active service.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: He is placed on active service as soon after reporting as can be arranged. The words are "he shall report and shall be placed." But if men report at one time, they cannot be placed at the moment, and there should be some regulation covering their case. Until they are so placed they do not come under the Army Act, and consequently some penalty has to be imposed.

Mr. OLIVER: For the information of the House, I will read the following provision in the United States Act.

Any person charged as herein provided with the duty of carrying into effect any of the provisions of this Act or the regulations made or directions given thereunder who shall fail or neglect to perform such duty; and any person charged with such duty or having and exercising any authority under said Act, regulations, or directions, who shall knowingly make or be a party to the making of any false or incorrect registration, physical examination, exemption, enlistment, enrollment, or muster; and any person who shall make or be a party to the making of any false statement or certificate as to the fitness or liability of himself or any other person for service under the provisions of this Act, or regulations made by the President thereunder, or otherwise evades or aids another to evade the requirements of this Act or of said regulations, or who, in any manner, shall fail or neglect fully to perform any duty required of him in the execution of this Act, shall, if not subject to military law, be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction in the district court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, be punished by imprisonment for not more than one year, or, if subject to military law, shall be tried by court-martial and suffer such punishment as a court-martial may direct.

It will be observed that the principle in this Act is that there is no minimum punishment.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I will quote something better than the Act. I will quote the hon. minister's own Bill, that a man is a soldier enlisted the moment the proclamation issues.

Mr. GRAHAM: Hear, hear.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Clause 4 reads:

4. (1) The Governor in Council may from time to time by proclamation call out on active service as aforesaid for the defence of Canada, either in Canada or beyond Canada, any class or subclass of men described in section three and all men within the class or subclass so called out shall, from the date of such proclamation, be deemed to be soldiers enlisted in the Military Forces of Canada and subject to military law for the duration of the present war, and of demobilization thereafter, save as hereinafter provided.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is quite true.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: And, therefore, the man would be liable to punishment.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They are soldiers in such a case and subject to military law. but we impose penalties on them while they are soldiers, for example, for not reporting. We enable penalties to be imposed on them by this provision, if, though they may report, still they consider they are not in the National Service, or in the hands of the military authorities, and commit an offence. If there is no offence the statute can do no harm. I appeal to the clause read by the hon. gentleman from Edmonton, which is in exact spirit with this clause, but much wider.

Mr. OLIVER: But there is no minimum penalty; that is the point.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am quite agreeable that there should be no minimum penalty as to imprisonment. In the United States they have no fine. We have a provision for a fine, and I do not think we should permit the magistrate to make it less than $10, because that would be enabling men to utterly evade the Act.

Mr. McKENZIE: I think $10 is far too high. I wish to point out to the Solicitor General that the policy of the criminal law in Canada is to inflict no minimum penalty. If the hon. gentleman will run through the Criminal Code, he will find that the offender is liable to such and such penalty. He is liable to be fined the whole amount or any small part of it. I cannot recall any case where the imposition of a minimum penalty is made obligatory under the Code.

Mr. DOHERTY: The case which comes to my mind is the offence of stealing from the mail, for which offence a man must be sentenced to three years imprisonment, and no less. I am quite satisfied there are others.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is a grave and serious offence. We are dealing with minor offences. Stealing from the mail is one of the most serious offences dealt with by the Code, but hon. gentlemen opposite always have the happy faculty of passing off anything on us that may appear to have gone through this Parliament when we were in power. One of the things of which the Conservative party in the country is proud —and they have reason to be proud——is that the Right Hon. Sir John Thompson was the father of the Criminal Code, and we always gave him credit for it, so that the Liberals are not responsible for anything found in the Code. But they throw the Code at us and say, "This thing is in the Code, and so you cannot complain of it." Although we are not responsible for the paternity of the Code, we are proud of some parts of it, and have no cause to find fault with many of its provisions. If my hon. friend will run through the provisions of the Code with reference to assault, which sometimes are of a grave character, he will find that provision is made for a fine not exceeding $20. The Code does not say it must be $5 or $6, but simply says a fine not exceeding $20, or imprisonment not exceeding three months. It tapers to nothing, on the one hand, and may go as high as $20, for the gravest kind of assault on the other hand. I submit the question can be left to the discretion of the court, up to a certain amount. I am not very particular as to what the maximum will be, but I think it will be safe to leave it to the discretion of the judge, as to whether it will be one, two, or ten dollars. I submit that, for a trivial offence, the judge's hands should not be tied, and it should not be compulsory for him to impose as high a fine as $10.

Mr. MEIGHEN. I think we had better retain the $10 minimum. This is a very grave law, and it seems to me we had better take care that it cannot be violated with practical impunity, to the slightest extent.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend is insisting, as against my contentions, that we should trust those whom we place in charge of the administration of the law. I am now asking that he himself have that confidence in those who administer the law.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no question about trusting them, but if we leave the penalty without a minimum it will hold out to the violator of the law the prospect of getting off without punishment. An hour in jail is a great disgrace; a fine of fifty cents is not a disgrace. If it is left the way I suggest, the offender has no prospect of getting off without a fairly substantial penalty. While we have every confidence in the judiciary, it will be of assistance in the administration of the law if we point out to all who contemplate its contravention that they will be liable to substantial punishment.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Any offender in this case would be young men without knowledge or experience, who might violate the law unwittingly. Under such circumstances a nominal fine and a lecture from the judge would be the best punishment and the most likely to produce good results.

Mr. J. A. DESCARRIES (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I concur with the honourable members who have preceded me in asking the Government not to make $10 the minimum fine. As it was previously stated, the first called under this Act will be young men of twenty and over. Many of them without experience in life, may commit offences through thoughtlessness, not appreciating the seriousness of these offences. A great many young men of twenty, under age and moneyless, will certainly not have the sum of $10, which is the fine that the judge will have to enforce. Consequently, I think that it is proper that honourable gentlemen should urge on the Government the desirability of not fixing any minimum fine, but that the matter shall be left to the judgment of the magistrate who will decide upon whatever fine he will see fit according to the seriousness of the offence committed.

Mr. PROULX: In view of the fact that these complaints will come before magistrates, I am of the opinion that no minimum penalty should be stated; the matter should be left to the discretion of the magistrates.

Mr. KYTE: I assume that a certificate of infirmity or ill-health might be accepted by the tribunal as evidence of a man's unfitness. Is it intended to provide in the Act a penalty for the issuing of a false certificate, such as is provided in the United States Act?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would appear to me that one of the objections to putting in a penalty would be this: It would indicate that a certificate from a physician would be evidence to a tribunal that they should exempt a man. It is likely that the regulations would provide for exemption in cases where it was absolutely proved that the man in question could not come before the tribunal or, having come before it, was crippled or otherwise disabled and could not possibly become a soldier. We do not want to indicate to local tribunals that a physician's certificate is sufficient to enable them to exempt a man. However, I do not give that as a final reason why there should be no such penalty; it appears to me a substantial objection to there being one.

Mr. KYTE: The regulations to be drafted by the proper authorities for the conduct of these examinations might I assume, provide for the acceptance of a certificate of that kind. Is it not desirable, therefore, that some penalty should be provided for the issuing of a false certificate or the making of an incorrect examination?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Is that point not covered by the following provision of the Bill:

Any person who, for the purpose of obtaining a certificate or a condition in a certificate for himself or for any other person, or for the purpose of obtaining the renewal, variation or withdrawal of a certificate, makes any false statement or representation, shall be guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to imprisonment for any term not exceeding twelve months with or without hard labour.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is that not as against the person applying?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No, it is in reference to a person obtaining a certificate for himself or for any other person.

Mr. McKENZIE: As I understand it, that reaches not the man who issues the false certificate, but the man who makes a false statement in order to get it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: To get a certificate of exemption for some one else he issues a false statement which is his medical certificate. In that case he is clearly liable to the provisions of that section. I did not have that section in mind when I answered the question put by my hon. friend (Mr. Kyte).

Mr. McKENZIE: What is the effect of subsection 3 of the section we are now considering? Would it not take away the right of appeal? It is not very clear.

[Mr. Kyte.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think that we had better proceed to subsection 2 now.

Mr. DOHERTY: Subsection 3 does not in any way affect prosecutions taken before the courts for violations. It applies to the proceedings of the tribunals established under this Act; that is, the tribunals that deal with exemptions. But if a prosecution be brought against a man for violation of this Act, he will go to the ordinary court, if it is not a case of summary conviction or indictment, and he will be tried in the ordinary way for the offence. Subsection 3 says that no proceeding authorized or pending before any of the tribunals provided for by this Act and no decision of any such tribunal shall be removed by means of injunction.

The subsection goes on to provide:

Nor shall any such proceeding or decision be questioned, reviewed or reconsidered, collaterally in any action or proceeding, civil or criminal.

That is merely to keep within the hands of the tribunals established by this Act the decision of the questions submitted to them, but when the matter comes to a question of prosecuting a man for violating this Act, the tribunals provided by this Act are not going to try that. The ordinary courts of the country will try it.

Subsection agreed to.

On subsection 2 of proposed new section 16:

(2) Any person who by means of any written or oral communication or by any public speech or utterance advises, urges or advocates that the men or any of the men mentioned or intended to be described or included in any of the classes hereinbefore mentioned shall contravene, disobey or refuse, neglect or fail to comply with all or any of the requirements imposed upon them by this Act or by regulations made thereunder or who wilfully resists, obstructs, hinders or impedes or attempts wilfully to resist, obstruct, hinder or impede, or persuades, induces or influences, or attempts to persuade, induce or influence any person or any body or class of persons to resist, obstruct, hinder or impede the due execution of this Act in any respect according to its true intent and purpose or for the purpose of obstructing, hindering or impeding the operation or administration of this Act to abstain from submitting for decision of the proper tribunals claims for exemption under this Act or the evidence available in support thereof, or in any manner whatsoever to embarrass the Government or the minister in the administration of this Act or the regulations thereunder shall be guilty of an offence and shall be liable upon indictment or upon summary conviction to imprisonment for a term not less than one year nor more than five years.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Has my hon. friend forgotten anything in that subsection? Is there any possible offence that he has not reached by it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I hope no serious offence has been overlooked.

Mr. OLIVER: From what source has my hon. friend derived the suggestion for this section?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Just from the ordinary and very common fund of intelligence that I have.

Mr. MARCIL: Is this provision taken from the British Act?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. LEMIEUX: From the American Act?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. LEMIEUX: From the German Act?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. GRAHAM: From the Acts of the Apostles?

Mr. MARCIL: If this provision is not in the British Act, what is the object of inserting it in this Bill?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I observed some threats that action would be taken to destroy the usefulness of the Act. That suggested it to me.

Mr. MARCIL: The Solicitor General is surely not acting on mere hearsay?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We will not act on hearsay, unless it is carried into effect.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Here is a part of the subsection:

> Anybody who hinders or impedes the due execution of this Act in any respect according to its true intent and purpose or for the purpose of obstructing, hindering, or impeding the operation or administration of this Act to abstain from submitting for decision of the proper tribunals claims for exemption under this Act or the evidence available in support thereof.

If anybody advises a young man: Do not go before the tribunal to claim your exemption, he is liable to imprisonment.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. This assumes the claim is made.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: No. (Reading):

> To abstain from submitting for decision of the proper tribunal claims for exemption under this Act.

That refers to a man who advises anybody not to submit to the proper tribunals.

Mr. DOHERTY: The right hon. gentleman should read the definition of the offence in its entirety. It is the purpose for which that is done that makes the act an offence. There is no offence in a man advising anybody not to go before a tribunal. To make it an offence, there must be evidence in the manner of doing it that the advice is given for the purpose of opposing or defying the Act.

9 p.m.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Who will go and advise somebody not to claim exemption, and who will follow that advice if it is given by some one? Suppose anybody says to a young man: Do not claim exemption. If he does not, what will be the objection? The young man will remain a soldier. Is there any offence in that?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My right hon. friend might see that advice of this character is given to the young men: You are entitled to exemption; you are not entitled to exemption; those of you who are clearly entitled to exemption must not make your claim before the tribunals because, if you do so, you will recognize the Act, and it is the intention not to recognize the Act.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: If the man does not claim exemption he is a soldier. If he claims exemption and does not get it, he is a soldier.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The man who advises is liable in any case.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: If such a thing is an offence, I wonder who will commit it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Do the words "in the administration of this Act" qualify the word "embarrass" or the next sentence?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It qualifies the word "embarrass."

Mr. PROULX: Should a minimum term of imprisonment be fixed in this case? It seems to be a large power to put into the hands of a magistrate to permit him to impose a sentence of one year, perhaps on insufficient evidence?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think in this case a minimum will have to be fixed. We must make it very clear that any attempt to flout or to defy the law of the land in this particular, which has to do with protecting the existence of the State, will be met with a sufficient, and indeed with a very substantial punishment, and there is no hope upon conviction of any escape.

Mr. GRAHAM: I come back to what the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) asks. Men of journalistic occupation have had experience with the so-called censorship, and some very foolish letters have been written to publishers; in fact, at one time some of the letters practically admonished the newspapers that they must not criticise the Government, lest their doing so might interfere with certain work which ordinary men did not think had anything to do with the matter at all. If the same rule were to be applied and the same judgment exercised here, then a public speaker would be subject, under this Act, to a penalty if he criticised the Minister of Justice, for example, in this way. Under this Act, the Minister of Justice can, under certain circumstances, appoint by wire a member of a certain tribunal. Suppose, on the recommendation of some person, the Minister of Justice recommended for that position a man not fully competent. If the same wisdom is to be used in the interpretation of this Act as has been used in some of the censorship letters, then a criticism of the Minister of Justice for making that appointment would be embarrassing him.

Mr. DOHERTY: Criticism never embarrasses me.

Mr. GRAHAM: But the minister's Government is here passing a law to make it a crime to criticise him.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No.

Mr. GRAHAM: If, in administering this Act, the same judgment is used that has been used during the past few months in regard to the censorship, then the Act would make it a crime to criticise the Minister of Justice for making, for the carrying out of this Act, an appointment which was an improper appointment. Perhaps legally I am wrong, but to the layman this statute on the face of it seems to be going very far afield in order to make an offence out of criticism which is perfectly legitimate, and which a public man must make, if he is to perform his duty.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman forgets that the purpose is of the essence of the offence. The purpose must be to impede the operation of this Act.

Mr. GRAHAM: It does not say so in connection with this.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, all that applies. I have never heard of any censorship of criticism of public men.

Mr. DEVLIN: Le Canada, of Montreal, which criticised the appointment of a certain military official in that city, was notified, if my information is correct, that if it did not cease its attacks it would immediately be suppressed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the hon. member had better check his information up.

Mr. DEVLIN: Does the hon. member deny that to be a fact?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have not heard of it at all, and I think I should have if it had been a fact.

Mr. DEVLIN: But the hon. member does not deny it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. I do not know anything about it. I think I should have heard of it if it were correct.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not need to have my information checked, because I know whereof I speak, and I say now that if the same wisdom, or lack of wisdom, were displayed in the enforcement of this Act as was displayed in the correspondence with some newspaper men in regard to the censorship, then a man who criticised such appointments as I have indicated would be guilty of an offence under this Act.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am not entirely a stranger to the drafting of this section.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Better not boast of it.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have no apologies to make. I have given it some thought, and I think it would be absolutely impossible for it to cover criticism of what the minister did. It says:—

> Any person who by means of any writing or oral communication or by any public speech or utterance advises, urges or advocates that the men or any of the men mentioned or intended to be described or included in any of the classes hereinbefore mentioned shall contravene, disobey or refuse, neglect or fail to comply with all or any of the requirements imposed upon them by this Act or by regulations made thereunder or who wilfully resists, obstructs, hinders or impedes or attempts wilfully to resist, obstruct, hinder or impede, or persuades, induces or influences, or attempts to persuade, induce or influence any person or any body or class of persons to resist, obstruct, hinder or impede the due execution of this Act in any respect according to its true intent and purpose or for the purpose of obstructing, hindering or impeding the operation or administration of this Act to abstain from submitting for decision of the proper tribunals claims for exemption under this Act or the evidence available in support thereof or in any manner whatsoever—

—tries to induce people to embarrass the Government or the minister in the administration of this Act or the regulations thereunder shall be guilty of an offence.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend in reading the clause introduced the word "induce" on his account.

Mr. DOHERTY: All that is governed by the word "induces" in the earlier part of the clause. The whole paragraph, —or for the purpose of obstructing, hindering or impeding the operation or administration of this Act to abstain from submitting for decision of the proper tribunals claims for exemption under this Act or the evidence available in support thereof or in any manner whatsoever to embarrass the Government——is governed by the phrase "persuades, induces or influences, or attempts to persuade, induce or influence any person or anybody or class of persons to resist." We have tried to make it perfectly clear that the people who are wanted to be got at by this section are those who, I think everybody will agree, should be visited with condign punishment. This section is not aimed at, and does not strike at, the man liable to conscription, but it does strike at those who are standing behind with no obligations of their own and with their skins perfectly safe, they may imagine. We have had a good deal of pronouncement, not only of desire but of full intention to make this an unworkable Act. This section is framed to strike at those who try to induce other people to hinder, and at those who do hinder the operation of this Act after it has been duly enacted and come into force. To my mind that is an exceedingly grave offence; and, to suggest, because we are trying to prevent that exceedingly grave offence—and wording the section so as to make it perfectly clear, in my humble judgment, whom it is intended to hit at—that we are trying to legislate to prevent criticism of this Government seems to me to be going a little beyond the limit at all events of fair criticism of this section. I would have thought that there would have been unanimity in this House that any man or class of men who after this becomes the law of the land seek to hinder its being carried out ought to be punished. The purpose of this section is to reach that class of men, and only that class of men.

Mr. GRAHAM: I, of course, disclaim any desire to protect any man who is trying to obstruct the carrying out of this Act.

Mr. DOHERTY: No other man will be hit under this section.

Mr. GRAHAM: The minister said in his concluding remarks that the section applies to the man who induces another person to do something to embarrass the minister, and applies also to the man who was so induced.

Mr. DOHERTY: Not the man who "embarrasses."

Mr. GRAHAM: If my hon. friend will read Hansard to-morrow he will see that he said the section covered not only the man who induces, but also the man who does something to embarrass the minister in the carrying out of this Act.

Mr. DOHERTY: I said the man who hinders not embarrasses.

Mr. GRAHAM: Embarrasses is coupled with the other. This criticism is not unfair, and it is just as well that we have had this little discussion put on Hansard so that we may know what the intent of the section is. To those who are engaged in newspaper work the following section is even more applicable than the one we are now quoting, and it is very necessary in the public interest that the law be made so clear that no person can take advantage of the Act to suppress what is legitimate criticism in the public interest. No Government, or minister, or tribunal, is infallible, and unless it is made clear that the Act is not to place them above criticism by the press or by the speaker on the platform or in discussion, the Government, with all its goodness, and the tribunals might go astray. I have never taken the ground in the newspapers that the bench itself was above criticism. In some cases it can be legitimately and reasonably criticised. But I want the minister to make it absolutely clear that this clause does not restrict legitimate criticism and that such criticism will not be looked upon as an offence even if it embarrasses the Government or the minister.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not know if there are words that could make it any more clear. I would be glad to make it clearer, if it were possible. It does not hit at criticism, legitimate or illegitimate, as long as it is kept to criticism. It is the hindering or impeding or wilful attempt to resist, obstruct, hinder or impede; or to persuade, induce, or influence other people; or to embarrass the Government or the minister in the carrying out of their operations. Perhaps it was not proper for me to say I thought the criticism unfair, but it is a great surprise to me, because the thought never entered my mind that this section affected criticism in any way. Certainly there was no intent to affect criticism in any shape. I have read it again, and I cannot see how anybody could bring "criticism" within the four corners of this section.

Mr. OLIVER: There is an advantage in connection with this section, which we have not had in connection with any of the rest of the Act. When we discussed any other section of the Act that we did not consider applicable to conditions in this country, we were told it was the Act in England, or some place else. Now we are dealing with a section for the origination of which I believe my hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) and my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) claim to divide the credit between them. That being the case, and seeing that in no country in the world up to the present time has there been drastic enactments of this kind,—I am sure if there had been it would have been referred to before now—I am in agreement with my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham), that it is entirely proper that when this Parliament is passing an Act it should take all reasonable and necessary means to secure, not only the enforcement of the Act, but a proper respect for the Act in its enforcement. So far as this provision goes, if in the wisdom of the Government it is considered necessary to make such drastic provision as this, then I have nothing to say; but I think the Government takes upon itself a grave responsibility to say that in this supposedly free country, and at this date in the history of the world, it is necessary to impose a limitation upon the right of free discussion such as we are told there is no precedent for in any other legislation my hon. friends have made themselves acquainted with. While we have a duty to perform in the passing of suitable legislation, and in regard to the enforcement of that legislation, we also have a duty to perform in maintaining the right of free discussion in this country, and it is to be regretted that the experience we have had in dealing with the censorship which has been imposed has been along lines which certainly give reason for alarm to any person who values the right of free discussion or the common liberty of the subject, when it is proposed to put an enactment in these terms on the statute book.

My hon. friend the Minister of Justice insists that the words "or in any manner whatsoever to embarrass the Government or the minister in the administration of this Act or the regulations thereunder," do not apply to criticism of the Government or of the minister in the enforcing of the Act. Our experience with the censorship would certainly compel us to believe that criticism of the minister or the Government in regard to the administration of the Act would be interpreted as an embarrassment of the Government and the minister, and would render the individual liable to the penalties provided in this section. I am one of the old-fashioned people who believe in the right of free speech, who believe in the liberty of the subject, who believe that there cannot be good administration and good legislation without fair and reasonable criticism; and I say the attempt to impose such a provision as this on the country under the excuse of the existence of war conditions is a deliberate attempt to use those war conditions as a means of depriving the people of Canada of a very considerable share of that liberty for which their fathers fought, and for which our sons are fighting to-day.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: I would suggest that the word "wilfully" be inserted, making the paragraph read: "any person who wilfully by means of," etc. Supposing a lawyer were called upon for his opinion as to whether a man should report under the law and he advised that according to his reading of the law it was not necessary for this man to report, what would be the position? I think everybody would be protected if the word "wilfully" were added to the paragraph. I would also strike out the words which refer to a minimum penalty. It seems to me if they remain the result will be to defeat the purpose of the Act, because there may be cases where the contravention would be very trivial. It might be simply a remark, en passant, "I don't think you are bound to report considering the conditions you are under." The judge will be in the presence of some very trivial offence, for which a most severe penalty is inflicted, and he may force his conscience, and say: "I will render a verdict of 'not guilty'." I am prepared to admit it is a grave offence, but we have a great number of offences provided for under the criminal laws in this country where the maximum penalty is fourteen years and there is no minimum—it is left entirely to the discretion of the judge. I would leave the question of a minimum penalty to the judge in this case. If there is a minimum penalty provided it may place the judge in a very awkward position, and I endorse what my hon. friend from Cape Breton North (Mr. McKenzie) and my hon. friend from Prescott (Mr. Proulx) have said in this connection. I have seen cases of offences against the Post Office Act, for instance, where judges were very much embarrassed. The minimum penalty fixed was three years, but the judge and especially the juries—as my hon. friend the Minister of Justice well knows—would find the accused "not guilty," because the minimum penalty was too severe. If the Government has any confidence in the judges who will administer this law they should be given a discretionary power to decide whether the penalty will be one hour imprisonment, or five years. I feel it my duty to tell the House, after an experience of twenty-two years before the criminal courts, that there are some offences against an Act which would be amply punished by one hour's imprisonment. I address my remarks particularly to the hon. Minister of Justice, and I know that from his fifteen years' experience on the Bench he would have done away with those minimum penalties if he had had the power.

Mr. DOHERTY: We are dealing here with a criminal offence, and, of course, for any criminal offence there must be criminal intent. It is not a mere accidental interpretation of words that would render a man liable to conviction. I do not think there is any serious ground for apprehension that anybody will suffer undue consequence because of the omission of the word my hon. friend refers to.

As to the question of minimum penalty, laws are for prevention as well as for punishment, and I think that the nature of the offence that is contemplated here is such that it is highly important to have the law produce in the fullest degree its preventive effect. For that purpose and in that view, it is well that it should be made perfectly clear to anybody who may be tempted to offend in this direction from the time that this law comes into force, that there will be grave consequences attached to his action. I can conceive of no circumstances under which one year's imprisonment would be too severe a penalty upon a man deservedly convicted of this offence. The class of men who will commit this offence will be a class of men deserving, in my judgment, of condign punishment. If there should be exceptional cases such as have been referred to, the court would have the privilege of suspending sentence, and there is always the opportunity of exercising executive clemency, so that there will be a remedy for the exceptional cases referred to by the hon. gentleman; and I do not think that to prevent such possible exceptional cases the country should be deprived of the protection resulting from the general knowledge that those who seek, without exposing themselves, to incite other people to unlawful resistance to the execution of this law, will, on conviction, suffer at least imprisonment for one year.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: If a judge, after hearing a case, is embarrassed by finding the punishment too severe and reports to the executive, the Minister of Justice cannot advise the judge to impose a penalty of three months; he will have to tell the magistrate to let the law follow its course. As to suspending sentence, I have grave doubt as to the right of judges to suspend sentences, and this action on their part is often severely, and I think properly, criticised. As to executive clemency, the Department of Justice have simply the printed factums and depositions before them, and have not the same opportunity of judging the evidence as the magistrate who observes the witnesses in the box and can so determine whether they are entitled to credit. This offence would be a most grave, a most heinous one, according to circumstances; but it may be trivial too. Then why not leave it to the magistrate who has the discretion to raise it from one year to five, to exercise discretion in imposing a sentence from nothing up to five years.

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. gentleman apprehends danger from cases where the magistrate will be of the opinion that this is too severe a sentence. In such a case the executive would be advised by the magistrate of his views, and it would be quite different from a case in which the executive would be called upon to overrule the decision of the judge. I find it difficult to conceive of cases where a conviction would properly be made for this offence where a year's imprisonment would be too severe punishment.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I wish to emphasize what has been said by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver). I am a free British subject, and if there is one thing which I admire in British institutions, it is the freedom of the press and the freedom of speech. I understand that my hon. friend assumes a share of responsibility for the drafting of this legislation.

I am surprised that he should claim the paternity of, and responsibility for framing, such drastic legislation. It is admitted that there is no parallel in Great Britain, or the United States, or even in Germany, for such a law. In none of these countries was similar legislation ever framed to give effect to a law passed by Parliament. Many of us have travelled in Great Britain, and if there is anything which struck me, as a Canadian of French blood, whenever I visited England, it was the great freedom of speech which existed in that country. The first time I went to London I was told by my friends not to fail to go to Hyde Park on Sunday morning, after service, and listen to the various speeches which were delivered there by agitators, socialists, parsons and political speakers, each of them claiming his right, as a free British subject, to criticise, as severely as possible, any legislation which to him appeared obsolete or drastic, and I am yet to be told that the British Government has ever taken any action against the speakers who, from time immemorial, condemned the Government at Hyde Park.

Mr. DOHERTY: In war time?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes. I will give a case in point. England is at war, and this evening's papers to-day will show my hon. friend that thousands of people are blaming the Government for not using reprisals against the air raids on London. This is embarrassing the Government, although we have the declaration of several of the ministers of the Crown that it is against the grain for Britishers to make reprisals of the German kind. I desire to give a case in point. I was speaking of the freedom any man has in England to combat legislation which has been enacted.

Mr. MEIGHEN: To resist the operation?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes, and I will give my hon. friend a case in point at once. I was in England in 1906, and one of the largest meetings I ever witnessed was one held at the base of Nelson's monument in London. It was after the Balfour Government had passed the Education Act, and that Act was resisted by the various dissentients in England, and by the various sects, and I remember hearing a speech by the Rev. Dr. Clifford, asking the people to resist, by passive resistance the operation of that legislation. So much was that the case, that a few months afterwards, when Mr. Asquith came into office the legislation was repealed. I will give another instance to the Minister of Justice. An Act was passed by the British Parliament in 1914, the year of the war, and what happened? Sir Edward Carson went to Ulster. Did he flout the law? Did he put the law in defiance? Why he addressed the people of Ulster and preached resistance, and, to-day, that rebel is one of the ministers of the Crown. He used freedom of speech. He over-reached it, in my judgment, and in the judgment also of the Minister of Justice, and yet, to-day, in Great Britain, the man who preached treason and rebellion in Ulster against an Act of His Majesty is the First Lord of the Admiralty. The Minister of Justice claims parentage for the very many amendments to this measure; I offer him my sincere compliments on those amendments, and I wish him success.

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. gentleman condemns the action of Sir Edward Carson, and then condemns me for framing legislation to prevent like action in this country. I ask how he connects the two things. The statement he has just made demonstrates that there ought to be a law in Canada to prevent people doing that kind of thing—taking his description of what Sir Edward Carson did. We have more respect in this country for law than the hon. gentleman represents that Sir Edward Carson had. I am not proposing to be led into a discussion about matters with regard to which my opinions are absolutely well known, but if the hon. gentleman wanted to select an instance to justify legislation of this kind, he has given us instances, as he has described them, of open, flagrant, flouting of the law going uncontrolled. If his description be correct, all I can say is that there was a lack of firmness on the part of those charged with the enforcement of the law. I certainly will not sympathize—and I am quite satisfied that the House does not sympathize—with the advocacy of the doctrine that if we go throughout this wide world and find a place where anybody flouted laws and threatened resistance, such action should be held up to us for our admiration, and as an example for us to follow. I do not think the hon. gentleman has been very happy in the selection of the instance which he has cited.

Mr. GRAHAM: And this is the 12th July.

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes. I do not think he could have combined either time, place, circumstance or illustration to be more unhappy in the combination. The hon. gentleman talks about this awful unprecedented law. I wonder if the hon. gentleman ever read sections 69, 70, 81 or 82, and a number of other similar sections of the Criminal Code, dealing with this grave and serious offence of inciting people to a violation of the law.

Mr. OLIVER: The parent is not going back on his baby.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not quite see the application of the remark of the hon. gentleman, and I cannot make the connection.

Mr. OLIVER: Everybody else can.

Mr. DOHERTY: When the hon. gentleman talks about an unprecedented law, it is only another instance of the reckless expressions some persons indulge in. The Solicitor General said that in the Conscription Act of the United States there was not a provision like this, nor was there in the Conscription Act of England. Unprecedented law! I am satisfied that in the two countries which I have mentioned, they thought they had provisions to meet the conditions of their particular law —and I am not absolutely certain that we have not such provisions here as well.

Mr. OLIVER: The provisions under which Sir Edward Carson preached rebellion in Ulster and was within the law?

Mr. DOHERTY: I am not going to follow that further. The hon. gentleman wants to get himself in the same unfortunate combination of circumstances as that in which the member for Rouville landed himself. I hope that there will be room for both of them in the same uncomfortable quarters.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It looks as if the hon. gentleman was garrisoned by Ulster.

Mr. DOHERTY: That is another illustration of some of the conceptions of which the member for Rouville is capable.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Do not send me to jail for that.

Mr. DOHERTY: If the hon. gentleman is contemplating committing this offence, I can assure him that the jail will be there for him. I did not know that he contemplated committing it. I shall be sorry if he does, for, of course, there will be no respecting of persons.

Mr. GRAHAM: Will that be embarrassing the minister?

Mr. DOHERTY: That will be embarrassing the member for Rouville.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And all the Irishmen who are "agin the Government" will be embarrassed, too.

Mr. DOHERTY: Another hon. gentleman undertakes to tell me that all Irishmen in Canada are going to violate the law. No man who does not violate the law will be in the slightest degree embarrassed—and my people are as law-abiding as any section of the people in this country. I am not afraid for them, if the member of Rouville is afraid for himself.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend well understands the meaning of my remark; I am speaking of those who are "agin the Government."

Mr. DOHERTY: That is one of those cheap jokes that are thrown at my people —the cheap jokes of ignorant people who do not understand my people. My people will know how and when the proper time comes to resent insult. Now, let us come back to this unprecedented law. I was asking the member for Rouville, who is a distinguished lawyer, if he had ever read sections 69, 70, 81, 82, 109 and 110 of the Criminal Code; and if so, whether he had any appreciation of how gravely the general law of the country looks upon incitement to violation of law. It looks upon it so gravely that under section 69 a man who incites violation of the law by the committing of murder is liable to be hanged.

Mr. OLIVER: We do not want to know anything about the man who incites a breach of the law. We want to know about the man who in any manner whatsoever embarrasses the Government.

Mr. DOHERTY: That is not covered by this section.

Mr. OLIVER: Then why is the provision here?

Mr. DOHERTY: Let hon. gentlemen read the section; they understand the English language.

Mr. OLIVER: Yes, we understand the English language.

Mr. DOHERTY: This section does not make it an offence for a man to embarrass the Government.

Mr. OLIVER: Then will the minister take the words out?

Mr. DOHERTY: But it makes it an offence for any man to induce people to embarrass the Government in the administration of this Act; in other words, to impede the operation of the law.

Mr. OLIVER: And the result is that the man who criticises the minister or the Government does embarrass him and is subject to penalty under this Act.

Mr. DOHERTY: That is the hon. gentleman's view; that the man who criticises the Government is guilty under this Act. I had thought that the man who criticised the Government was in the exercise of his liberty, which this Act in no way embarrasses. This section lends itself so absolutely to no criticism that in order to make an argument, hon. gentlemen have to say that the section is something which it is not, and hence we have condemnation of laws which do things that this law does not pretend to do. I do not want to use too strong an expression; I shall simply say that no lawyer with any respect for his opinion would contend that this law pretends to say what hon. gentlemen have suggested. I am satisfied that any layman who will sit down and read it, not seeking to find what is not in it, would never dream of its talking about criticism of the minister or of the Government. It talks in very clear language of a variety of ways of hindering and impeding the operation of this Act and of a variety of ways of striving to induce people to hinder and impede and embarrass the operation of this Act. That is all it talks about.

Mr. DEVLIN: What is the meaning of the word "influences" in this section? Let me put a concrete case. Some member of this House, in rendering an account to his electors of the position that he has taken may feel disposed to give his reasons for having criticised the compulsory service Bill and may be very strong in his denunciation of that Bill. Some persons in the audience may afterwards take exception to the way that he has spoken, saying that what he said had influenced a number of people to oppose the law. Thereupon they lay a complaint before two judges, who, for argument's sake, may be two tailors. Tailors are very respectable men, but they may not be learned in the law. These two tailors take up the word "influences" and they say: Yes, that member of Parliament certainly has influenced the electors, and, therefore, is guilty under this section of the law. I would like a pronouncement on this subject. The Minister of Justice may be a little bit fatigued; perhaps the Solicitor General will answer.

[Mr. Doherty.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: Where do tailors come in in the matter of trying summary convictions?

Mr. DEVLIN: They might be justices of the peace.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then there is an appeal.

Mr. DEVLIN: That is not answering my question. I am putting a concrete case and I would like the Solicitor General to give me his opinion. It is a case that might readily arise. If a member of the House, having criticised the Government for bringing in this Conscription Bill, were charged before justices of the peace or your local tribunal, call it what you will, with having influenced his electors to resist conscription, would he, under such circumstances, be found guilty, or what latitude would be shown?

Mr. DOHERTY: Clearly, he would be tried for what he said, not for what he did or for what misinterpretations the electors may have put upon what he said. If he said something in itself influencing them to resist the law, he will be guilty. But the member of Parliament in question would not be guilty if he criticised this law, saying that he was opposed to it, and contended that it should not have been passed.

Mr. DEVLIN: And gave his reasons.

Mr. DOHERTY: And gave his reasons for being opposed to the law. So long as the member invites nobody to resist it; so long as nothing is intended to influence any one to resist the law, the fact that a man goes away from the meeting and proceeds to resist the law would not, I am sure, result in the conviction of the member by any court of average intelligence, upon the ground not of what he said or did, but of the mental operations of some of the people who heard him. I think we can trust the courts to interpret the case in that way.

Mr. DEVLIN: Following that up, we shall see that the next day the city papers, if the case occurs in a city, report what that man has said, and misreport his words. The minister will agree with me that that is very often done. Would the newspaper be considered to be guilty of a crime as having influenced people through the publication of a misreported speech?

Mr. DOHERTY: If the newspaper misreports the speech, that is to say, if it does not reproduce what was said, then that newspaper will have to take the responsibility for what it sends out to the public, if it sends out matter of a nature to influence men to resist the law.

Mr. DEVLIN: It is the newspapers we shall have to get after.

Mr. DOHERTY: The newspapers will not have any greater liberty to seek to inspire resistance to this law than the individual who does not own a newspaper will have.

Mr. DEVLIN: Of course, I may be pressing these details, but this is the first time, in my existence at least, that in this country I have been up against any law which would tend to limit the right of speech or the liberty of the press. It would be well for the minister to go just as far as he possibly can in giving detailed cases of what latitude will be allowed to men to speak—for instance, members of Parliament or political candidates to their electors, or any citizens, and how far newspapers may go. Because, while I may have implicit confidence in tribunals, I have not always the greatest confidence in the world in Justices of the Peace, although they may be well meaning.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think my hon. friend will see that there is an almost infinite variety of ways in which this section might be contravened, and that it would be absolutely impossible, and more than that a highly unprofitable task, to attempt to enumerate them here this evening.

Mr. OLIVER: The Prime Minister has certainly put the case in a nutshell. There is an absolutely infinite variety of instances in which the terms of this section might be contravened, and the citizen left liable to serious punishment. We do not object to reasonable legislation to secure the enforcement of and respect for any law, but we do object to the use of indefinite and comprehensive terms by the use of which innocent parties are made subject to severe penalties. That is the meaning that I am compelled to take out of the reading of this section. The minister has seen fit to read it in his own way. The way that I read it is this:

> Any person who, by means of any written or oral communication or by any public speech or utterance, or in any manner whatsoever, takes such action as will embarrass the Government or the minister in the administration of this Act or the regulations thereunder, shall be guilty of an offence.

Mr. DOHERTY: If the hon. member leaves out all that intervenes, the section reads in that way, but if he puts in all that intervenes, it reads as in the section.

Mr. OLIVER: I have some reasonable understanding of the English language. I am an average man with an average knowledge of English, and the law should be so framed that an average man can read it understandingly. I understand it as I have read it to the House, and I have every reason to believe that that is the understanding ninety-nine men out of a hundred would have in reading it. If the minister does not mean that, he should not say that.

Mr. DOHERTY: He does not.

Mr. OLIVER: Then he should not put in words that may reasonably be read with that meaning.

Mr. McKENZIE: What the hon. member has left out is merely cumulative of his meaning.

Mr. OLIVER: Precisely. I have read the section as I interpret it, as I believe it is intended to be interpreted, and as I believe, of intent, it is to be interpreted.

Mr. DOHERTY: In that, the hon. member is entirely mistaken.

Mr. OLIVER: Not ten minutes ago, I heard the minister announce to the House that this was to be used as a threat. Its importance was in its preventive capability as much as in its punitive capability. Then, the minister surely must have used a form of words covering the possibility of severe punishment, or there would be no threat in it. When the power is placed in the hands of any authority, the tendency is to use, or even to misuse that power, and the more extensive the power, the greater the liability to misuse it. I am going to contend that such a law intended to terrorize the public from the use of free speech and from the employment of just criticism of matters of administration in which the people are concerned is not a law that tends to the well-being of the country. On July 4, 1917, Lord Northcliffe, speaking to the National Press Club at Washington on the subject of censorship said:

10 p.m.

> The danger of a censorship is that it may be used to exalt incompetence to impair efficiency by hiding mismanagement, to weaken resolution by exaggerated optimism. The dangers of misuse of the power of censorship are well known to those who know what we suffered from the hiding of the truth about the war for the first two years.

That is merely in regard to the censorship of the press, but this is a section involving the censorship of the people, the censorship of the right of free speech. I will not delay the House; I have placed my opinions before it as clearly and as definitely as I am able to do, and I will only take the liberty of reading from the Orange Sentinel of the 12th of July—

An hon. MEMBER: Glorious day.

Mr. OLIVER: —just exactly what appears to my mind to be the import of this particular enactment. The Sentinel says:

> The glorious revolution of 1688 put an end in Great Britain and throughout the British Empire to the doctrine that Kings rule by Divine Right.

Now all we have to do is to change the word "Kings" to "Governments," and we are not to forget that we have to-day a Government that is putting into force a Conscription Act upon a disfranchised people. The Sentinel goes on to say:

> The Kaiser, posing as the annointed of Almighty God, is sending his people to the slaughter by the hundred thousand. He claims it to be his Divine right to do so. He denies to his people any real share in the government of the country, in the declaration of war, and in the continuance of the struggle. He is an autocrat after the pattern of James II. That monarch claimed the right by Divine appointment to suspend the laws of the country. He aimed not only to suspend the civil laws but the religious laws.

Further on, this article says:

> When William and Mary took the crown from Parliament, they acknowledged the supremacy of the people, and thus founded the first great democratic state among the modern nations. Upon the foundation laid by William of Orange rests the present superstructure of the British Empire.

And the Government of to-day, ruling by Divine right, undertakes to deprive Canada of the right of free speech which was guaranteed to it by the revolution which placed William of Orange on the Throne.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The Minister of Justice was reading the law to me a moment ago. He quoted from the Criminal Code, about the offence of sedition, I suppose; I need not be reminded of the existence of sedition, because I know that it exists. Can the minister find in the Criminal Code any section that will prevent an accused from invoking the writ of habeas corpus which is suspended by this legislation?

Mr. DOHERTY: There are many laws which provide for the suspension of habeas corpus. The one that comes to my mind at the moment is one the paternity for which belongs, I think, to my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), who has such an antipathy to governments that govern by Divine right. I do not know whether governments that govern by diabolical right are more to his taste or not.

Mr. OLIVER: By democratic right.

Mr. DOHERTY: So far as the suspension of the habeas corpus writ is concerned, the Immigration Act of this country suspends interference with the operations of the inquiry boards, and so forth, by means of any process issuing out of any court.

Mr. OLIVER: That is not applicable to citizens of Canada.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not think that the principle varies so much.

Mr. OLIVER: I think it varies a great deal.

Mr. DOHERTY: In this particular instance I think the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) does not quite grasp what is meant by the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus. There is nothing in this Act that suspends the writ of habeas corpus in a general way. But we had, perhaps, better discuss this matter on the other subsection, as it is entirely separate and distinct from the question we are now discussing.

Mr. OLIVER: Will the minister not agree to the suggestion that this clause be revised so as to actually convey, even to such a mind as mine, the intent the minister declares it to convey?

Mr. DOHERTY: I speak with all respect, but I do not know any words in the English language that will make it clearer; it must be my limitation, of course, but I must avow my limitation. If the hon. gentleman sees in these words power to punish people for criticising the Government, then I do not know any words in the English or any other language that I could possibly use that would not convey to the hon. gentleman the meaning that people are to be imprisoned for criticising the Government. I do not know how I could alter it. I have left all that kind of thing entirely out. What more can I do? In all frankness, if the hon. gentleman will tell me what words I could use that would not convey the meaning to him that I make it an offence to criticise the Government, and that will convey the meaning that I want to convey as clearly and emphatically as I can, that those will be punished who encourage people to impede or hinder the operations of this law or to induce or persuade people to embarrass the Government or the minister in its operation—if there is any other form that I can use that will convince the hon.

gentleman that I am not making a law to punish criticism of the Government, I will be glad to consider it. I have tried not to say that, and I have not said it, but still the hon. gentleman reads that into the section and says, "Now, won't you reconsider the section and read that out of it?"

Mr. OLIVER: As the minister has appealed to me I think the situation would be relieved if he were to strike out the words "in any manner whatsoever to embarrass the Government or the minister in the administration of this Act or the regulations thereunder."

Mr. DOHERTY: If the hon. gentleman will read the section I think he will see that it is not made an offence to embarrass the Government or the Minister of Justice in the administration of this Act or the regulations thereunder; that is not what is made the offence. The verb "embarrass" is in the infinitive mood; it is "to embarrass," which necessarily means that it follows on something else. What is made the offence is this: the offence is the inducing or influencing people to do all these things that follow. After making it an offence to impede or hinder, and so on, the section goes on:

—or persuades, induces or influences, or attempts to persuade, induce or influence any person or any body or class of persons.

to do a number of things, the last of those things being "to embarrass the Government." The offence is the persuading or inducing or influencing or attempting to persuade, induce or influence any person to do any of these things, or the persuading or endeavouring to get people to embarrass the Government.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: Why not leave it to the general law? Section 69 of the Criminal Code, to which the minister referred, should cover this.

Mr. DOHERTY: The sections to which I referred have to do with a number of different kinds of offences. The analogy is this. These sections make it an offence to incite people to commit that particular kind of crime. Here we have made a new law; we are imposing new obligations, and we are putting into this Act a provision in substance that inciting any one to a violation of this Act shall be an offence. The Criminal Code says it shall be an offence to kill a man or to incite somebody else to kill a man. We say: Certain things must be done under this Act, and it shall be an offence for anybody to incite anybody else to contravention of this Act. That is following out what is almost the general rule. It is perhaps open to the argument that possibly we might find general provisions which would meet the case. But is it not fair to the public, if it is true, to put them on their guard in this Act, that interference with the Act is an offence? I do not pretend to carry the whole Criminal Code in my mind, but I am strongly of the opinion there is a general provision with regard to obstructing the operation of law, and if there is no special provision, then at common law it would be an offence. But we want to provide appropriate penalties for the incitement to violation of this law or the obstruction of its operation, and we do think—notwithstanding what the hon. member from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) said about this being a threat—it is important that we should have the full preventive effect that may result from calling the attention of those who may be tempted to offend in that manner to the fact that it is an offence carrying serious punishment. In the second place, I think there is in this an element of fairness to those who may be tempted to offend in this regard. Any one who reads the newspapers is quite aware that there are persons who have been boasting of their intention to hinder the operation of this law, and asserting how easy it will be for them to make it entirely inoperative. I do not wish to refer to previous debates in this House, but I think one could make citations from some speeches in which we were told how absolutely inoperative this law was going to be, and what an arsenal of weapons was in the hands of people to prevent this law from becoming effective. I think people should have their attention called to the gravity of such statements, and perhaps it is only fair to bring it home to them now, that when they start doing it they are committing a grave offence, and will be liable to grave punishment.

Mr. OLIVER: If I followed the argument of my hon. friend, this section applies to the man who incites, but does not apply to the man who personally embarrasses the Government or the minister. Is that the understanding?

Mr. DOHERTY: As regards the particular matter of embarrassing the Government or the Administration in carrying out the law, so far as "embarrassment" is concerned, it has a different meaning from "hinder" or "impede." Embarrassment of the Government is not in itself made a specific offence. What is made an offence is for people to embarrass the Government in the operation of this law. The provision is not intended to deal with people coming under the direct operation of this law and who disobey it. They are dealt with under other sections of the Act. The people we are trying to reach here are those who set to work to hinder or impede the application of this law by their own actions or conduct, and those who seek to persuade others to hinder or to impede the application of the law. With regard to the offence of seeking to persuade, we have included those who seek to persuade others to embarrass the Government or the minister in the administration of this Act, though we have not taken the act of embarrassing the Government or the minister as constituting an offence in itself. What is sought to be reached, and what I think this House would agree with me ought to be reached, is a class of people who either because they do not come under the Act or because they have not the courage to take any risks themselves, want to stand behind, and through newspapers or by speeches or by any other method, try to rouse up other people—perhaps unthinking people who do not quite understand—and get them into a frame of mind where they will proceed to try to hamper and embarrass the administration of this Act. I should think everybody ought to be agreed that this class of persons should be punished. I can understand there may be a large measure of sympathy with those who are subject to the application of the principal provisions of the Act, and who may be tempted not to submit willingly to its operation, but I cannot understand extending sympathy to or seeking to shield the man who, not coming under the Act himself and therefore taking no risks, seeks to lead other people into committing either a direct violation of the Act or to hinder or impede the operation of the Act or to embarrass the Government in trying to carry it out. A man of that class should have no sympathy from any one.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I quite understand that any man who incites others to resist the law or to disobey the law comes under the provisions of the Criminal Code, and I have no sympathy with such a man. But does not my hon. friend see that this clause deals with a political measure? Conscription is a political measure, passed by a moribund Parliament. By the very nature of things it will be the issue before the people of Canada at the next election. I say to my hon. friend, in all sincerity, that by enacting this drastic condition he is simply sowing the seed for informers in this country. What will happen? Say a meeting is held in my hon. friend's constituency in Montreal. His political opponent, surrounded by sympathizers and political speakers, will criticise the Government or will criticise my hon. friend, not only for having enacted this measure when Parliament was functus officio, but for all the shortcomings and failings of the Government during the last six years. There will be informers at that meeting, and these informers will report the castigations inflicted on my hon. friend or on the Government by the speakers.

Mr. DOHERTY: It is not an offence to castigate me. In any event, I may say they do not do it in my constituency.

Mr. LEMIEUX: These informers will report the castigations, and an information will be laid. My hon. friend knows the political game will be played in his electoral division.

An hon. MEMBER: By you.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The animus is there. An information will be laid against the speaker, and he will appear before the court. He may be found guilty according to the evidence brought by the informers. So far so good. The judgment or verdict of the court is there, he is sentenced. It is a political question arising out of a political meeting between political opponents, and yet the man whose words have been misconstrued and distorted will not have the privilege of invoking the Habeas Corpus Act.

Mr. DOHERTY: My hon. friend is under a misapprehension. There is nothing in this Act to deprive a man of a writ of habeas corpus. This would not be a proceeding before a tribunal, and therefore would not be affected by the section under consideration. Such a man would be brought before the ordinary civil courts and he would have all the rights and privileges enjoyed by any other person who is brought before the courts of the country for any offence. What is sought by this subsection is to avoid having the operation of the tribunals interfered with and retarded by having the tribunals brought before the judges of the courts on injunction, certiorari, mandamus or some other proceeding. I read in the paper the other day the speech of a lawyer, whom I respect both as a lawyer and a gentleman, who said that this Act would never operate because they would take all cases to the civil courts and keep them there until the war was over. My friend's friend who is coming down to castigate me can castigate to his heart's content, and when he has done castigating, if I have anything to say about it, it will not be in the way of prosecuting him; I will take care of my defence in that matter. But if anybody wishes to prosecute him for that castigation he will take him before the ordinary courts and nothing in this Act will affect any remedy, right or recourse that he will have under the general law of the country.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: He may be taken before the courts, but he will not have the remedies of the law, he will not have the writ of habeas corpus or the injunction.

Mr. DOHERTY: But the case put by the hon. member for Rouville is not one that would ever come before any of the tribunals. It is not provided that a man who is prosecuted for violating the Act will be prosecuted anywhere except before the ordinary courts, and there he will have all the usual remedies. The only thing that the tribunals provided for under this Act can deal with or decide is the question whether or not a man shall be granted a certificate of exemption from military service; and it is intended that that shall be decided by these tribunals provided for in this Act without interference from any other court.

Mr. LEMIEUX: So that the offence under subsection 2 is of a different nature from that under subsection 3?

Mr. DOHERTY: There is no question of offence in subsection 3.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Subsection 3 has nothing to do with offences.

Mr. LEMIEUX: As regards subsection 2, we have all the remedies that the law provides.

Mr. DOHERTY: It creates an offence for which a man is liable to be indicted or convicted on summary proceedings.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: In other words, if anybody is indicted under the general law, he has all the remedies of the law; but if anybody is prosecuted under this Act, he is deprived of all the remedies of the law.

Mr. DOHERTY: No.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: How can it be otherwise?

Mr. DOHERTY: Subsection 2 creates a certain offence and says it is punishable on indictment, that is before the ordinary criminal court.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I understand all that.

Mr. DOHERTY: Subsection 3 provides:

> No proceeding authorized or pending before any of the tribunals provided for by this Act and no decision of any such tribunal shall by means of injunction, prohibition, mandamus, certiorari, habeas corpus or other process whether of the like kind or otherwise issuing out of any court be enjoined, restrained, stayed, removed or subjected to review or consideration upon any ground whether arising out of alleged absence of jurisdiction in the tribunal, nullity, defect or irregularity of the proceedings or any other cause whatsoever nor shall any such proceeding or decision be questioned, reviewed or reconsidered collaterally in any action or proceeding, civil or criminal.

Now, the general court before which a man is indicted is not the tribunal provided by this Act, it is a tribunal existing irrespective of this Act, and will exist after this Act has ceased to have any effect. The tribunals provided for by this Act are the local tribunal, the appeal tribunal and the Central Appeal Judge. Proceedings before those three tribunals under this Act cannot be removed into any other court by any process whatever, to be reconsidered there. That is the entire effect of this.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I understand that. If I impede the Government, and embarrass them in every possible way, I am not liable to indictment, under section 2.

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. gentleman is liable.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: If I say to Mr. Wilson, "Now you embarrass the Government," and if he is foolish enough to follow my example, I become liable to prosecution, but if I do the act myself, I am not liable. I may be liable otherwise, but not under this section. The man who induces the other to act is liable, but the man who takes the action is not liable. Then section 3 deals with another class of offence altogether. We pass to the prosecution of the offences which are created by this Act. The young man who goes before the first tribunal, and appeals, and so on, is dealt with by those tribunals, and is deprived of all the remedies of the law. That is what the section means. Why should this man be deprived of all the remedies provided by the law? Why should he not be accorded the privileges of British subjects, when all these provisions are framed for the protection of the freedom and liberty of the subject?

Mr. DOHERTY: It is not a question of offences under this section at all. It is a question of a decision as to whether a man should have a certificate, or whether he should be refused a certificate, and these tribunals will be established for the purpose of determining that question. It is intended that they should have exclusive jurisdiction to deal with it, and, for the purpose of protecting that exclusive jurisdiction for the determination of that question, interference by other courts is prohibited, and the reason of the enumeration of the different processes by which other courts might interfere in cases in which they are entitled to interfere is simply so that we might make it quite clear that, by no means whatever is any other court to interfere. The effect of this provision is simply to establish that the jurisdiction for the determination of these cases shall belong exclusively to this court.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is what I complain of.

Mr. DOHERTY: If that is what is complained of, that would not apply to the case the hon. gentleman refers to. The matter to be determined requires to be promptly determined, and we cannot wait till the war is over for a decision. The questions, in their nature, are, in the great bulk of cases at all events, questions proper to be determined by a jury, in any ordinary court. More than that, we have taken care to submit the decisions of all of these tribunals to the judges of the ordinary civil courts of the country, in the way specified in this Act, so that we extend to the individual the protection, not only of the judge of first instance, but of a judge of the Supreme Court, to see that this is done rightly. Having given him all of these protections, all that is sought to be done by this provision is to prevent his seeking to have an appeal to other courts, to get them to determine a matter over which to-day they have absolutely no jurisdiction, and, unless this Act gave it to them, could have no jurisdiction. But abuses of the processes of the law happen repeatedly, and if this section be not enacted people, under pretext of lack of jurisdiction, or unconstitutionality, or anything whatsoever, no matter how unfounded may seek to go to some other court or courts, not because they have a right to, but by misrepresenting the situation, and once they get launched before those other courts you would have these interminable appeals.

We have sought to make provisions to enable these tribunals, in a proper way, to carry out this section practically, effectively and within a reasonable time, and to throw round them the protection of the judiciary of this country in this way; and having done that, we say now we shall make it absolutely impossible for anybody acting in bad faith to seek to remove this question from the tribunals appointed to deal with it, and by means of processes of different kinds, to spin out the litigation in regard to it until the war is over. That is what we have to guard against, and this is not at all unusual. Wherever, with regard to a particular question, exclusive jurisdiction is given to a particular court, that ends the remedy in any other court.

Mr. C. A. WILSON (Laval): I may question the jurisdiction of the court itself.

Mr. DOHERTY: Not under this Act.

Mr. WILSON: Supposing John Jones walked into court, ascended the bench and said, "I am the judge to decide on military law," no lawyer appearing before John Jones would have the right to question his jurisdiction, and ask him under what authority he is acting.

Mr. DOHERTY: I never made such a statement, because the law says that a proceeding before a tribunal under this Act shall not be interfered with. The hon. gentleman says that if John Jones went into court and took a seat on the bench and said "I am the tribunal to administer this law" he could not be interfered with. I may tell the hon. member that you could at once obtain your writ of certiorari, or your mandamus, injunction or habeas corpus, or you could take quo warranto proceedings, or any other action you liked against him, in a case such as you suggest. Before you can apply this section, you require to have a proceeding before the tribunal provided by this Act, and it does not say that you may proceed before anybody who may say "I am the tribunal to try this matter."

Mr. WILSON: I am putting the case in an exaggerated manner, to make my meaning plainer.

Mr. DOHERTY: You are supposing a case of somebody acting who is not the tribunal specified under this Act. You cannot be deprived of any remedy whatever by such a proceeding. It is only when you come to deal with the procedings before a tribunal duly authorized that the protection of this Act will come in.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I understand all this, but my hon. friend will understand my objection. There are three tribunals for the protection of a conscript. He is called upon to enlist. He claims the protection of the court and claims exemption, and from the decision of that tribunal he is allowed to have an appeal, and from the decision of the second tribunal he is allowed to have another appeal.

My hon. friend says that all this is for the protection of the conscript. So far, so good. But my hon. friend knows that under the common law, and under the statute law also, there are certain rights and prerogatives which are also for that man's protection. My hon. friend says, in effect, that a man shall not have the use of those rights and prerogatives because if he did we might have litigation that would continue until the war is over. Well, the application for exemption will be either serious or frivolous. If it is serious, it should be argued before the court. If it is frivolous, we can depend upon the judges, who were subjected to the laudation of the Solicitor General yesterday, to throw it out.

Mr. DOHERTY: When they reach it, in the ordinary course of the business of the court.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: When the application is reached, it can be thrown out if it is frivolous. But my hon. friend here seeks to deprive the British subjects of remedies which have always been sacred to them. Legislation prohibiting the exercise of rights and prerogatives is always looked upon with extreme disfavour.

Mr. MACDONALD: The provisions of subsections 2 and 5 of this section are extreme and unusual, interfering with the right of free speech and of free discussion in the press. These proposed provisions, therefore, are worthy of the closest attention of the committee. The Minister of Justice has indicated the class of people whom he desires to reach through subsection 2. I submit that the cases to which he refers are sufficiently provided for by the first subsection. My hon. friend goes far beyond his stated purpose when he makes it an offence for a person to do anything which will induce any one to embarrass the Government or the minister in the administration of this Act. He says that this section is to come into force when the Act receives the assent of His Excellency and before the Military Service Bill goes into operation. It is constituting an offence that nobody ever heard of to go before a justice of the peace and say that during the course of a political discussion some one used words which were calculated to induce some one else to do something that would embarrass the Government in carrying out the terms of an Act which was not in existence. If you have a court which is willing to receive information of that kind, what matter of proof would be submitted to it in order to get a conviction? My hon. friend is going too far when he leaves it to a gentleman not learned in the law who may happen to be a justice of the peace to say whether a man who criticised the Government, as he had a perfect right to do, during the course of a political discussion which he had a perfect right to engage in, was embarrassing the Government in the operation of an Act that was not in existence. If the justice of the peace was a keen supporter of my hon. friend—and some of these justices of the peace are—you can fancy what sort of evidence he would require in order to satisfy him that the Government was being embarrassed. I think that we ought to have a definition of what the word "embarrass" means. What does my hon. friend mean by embarrassing the Government? The word is capable of definition; the phraseology should not be left in such general form, to be interpreted at will by any justice of the peace in the country. The right to criticise this Government is a right that should be preserved if the democracy which is at stake in this war is to be upheld in Canada. My hon. friend is going too far if he seeks to take away the right of legitimate criticism of those who are entrusted with the conduct of public affairs in this country. My hon. friend will say: You can appeal from the decision of the justice of the peace in this regard. But consider the humiliation of a perfectly honest man who, with no desire to do anything improper, is convicted by a justice of the peace under this provision. That man has certain views which he has a right to express, either in writing or verbally, to those who are willing to attend to him. First, then, there should be a definition of the word "embarrass;" secondly, the right of legitimate and honest criticism on the part of the free citizens of this country should be preserved.

Mr. DOHERTY: If I am not mistaken, the word "embarrass" as applied to operations of that kind has an understood meaning and has been dealt with by the courts. I rather thought this evening that some hon. gentlemen thought that the minister's being embarrassed meant that I might feel embarrassed—that, perhaps, I might blush. I do not attach that meaning to the word. Embarrassing the Government or the minister in the administration or operation of this Act is the equivalent of creating difficulties or of placing difficulties in the way of putting the Act into operation.

Mr. MACDONALD: What about the right of reasonable criticism?

Mr. DOHERTY: The member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) and I threshed that out quite fully; perhaps the hon. gentleman was not here. I need not go over that ground again.

Mr. MACDONALD: Why is that put in? I do not think I have made myself clear to the minister. I appealed to my hon. friend to do this. He is giving jurisdiction to a tribunal which is not learned in the law. He is asking it to interpret language which is specially technical. In that, he is asking it to find, as a matter of fact, that somebody had said something which in effect was intended to induce somebody else to embarrass the Government in regard to the operation of an Act which had not been declared to be in force. I am dealing with the period that exists between the coming into force of this section after His Excellency sanctions the Act, and the time when the Military Service Act is declared to be in force. Too much power is put into the hands of a justice of the peace if you enable him, at the instance of any informer, to ruin the good name of any man so that he would have to go to a higher court to get rid of the stigma attached to his name. Why should not the minister preserve the reasonable right of criticism to a decent citizen of the country who does not pretend to take the position of that class of men which the minister says is the class he intends to go after?

Mr. DOHERTY: As to reservation of the reasonable right of criticism, I should be glad to reserve it if I saw in the section anything that attacked it.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is a new law and an extraordinary law. If the minister would agree to insert a provision that no proceedings should be taken under this Act except with the consent of himself or his department, that would relieve the minds of the people very materially.

[Mr. Doherty]

Mr. DOHERTY: I should be very glad to give thought to that. At first glance, it seems as though there might be no objection to it.

Mr. McKENZIE: Trivial actions might be brought.

Mr. DOHERTY: I should be glad to do anything to disabuse people's minds of the idea that this has in contemplation the prevention of criticism of the actions of the Government. As regards

11 p.m.

what the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) said about this being in force before the Act itself came into force, I quite realize that the embarrassing operation cannot begin to operate until the Act is in force. But, on the other hand, if the people are going to utilize the period before the Act is proclaimed to get all their plans made and to circulate their instructions—

Mr. MACDONALD: You reach them by the first part of the section. Why put in this verbiage?

Mr. DOHERTY: I understand the hon. member's objection. What he is anxious about is the provision with regard to inducing the people to do anything to embarrass the Government in the operation of the Act.

Mr. MACDONALD: In the interim, before the Act comes into force.

Mr. DOHERTY: After this Act has come upon the statute-book of the country—although it has not come into force—and the people know that it is liable to be put into force by proclamation at any time, if they are left free during that period of time, if it should be of any notable length, to make their arrangements openly and publicly and to counsel each other as to what action to take to thwart this Act or to embarrass its administration when it does come into force, it might be very little use for us to put the Act into force at all. To me, it is a contemptible thing for people to be making such arrangements in advance.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister reaches all that class of people by the ample provision he has in the first part of the section. The rest is superfluous.

Mr. DOHERTY: Then I understand the hon. member's criticism is that we make it an offence for people to embarrass the Government? I am convinced that the section would convey a fairly clear idea that I think any average judge would understand.

Mr. MACDONALD: Not judge—justice of the peace.

Mr. DOHERTY: Well, justice of the peace. Whatever class would be empowered to try cases under this section would be quite able to grasp the meaning of the section. I do not see quite the same difficulty about the word "embarrass," but I have no objection to give that thought, and to see if I can find some word that will be less embarrassing to hon. members and on which we can all agree.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: I hope the Minister of Justice will accept the suggestion of my hon. friend from North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie), and that it will be made clear that citizens of this country will not be deprived of their right of criticising even this Act or any other piece of legislation of this Government. According to subsection 6:

> This section shall come into force on the day of the sanction of this Act.

The Prime Minister, when he appealed to my right hon. leader to form a coalition Government, stated that this law would be passed and then an appeal to the country would follow. In addition to that the Prime Minister, when introducing this Bill, said that he was considering the advisability of submitting this law to the people of Canada before enforcing it. Further than that, the constitution of this country prescribed that there shall be an election in a few months. Evidently the issue at this election will be this very law of conscription. It was, I believe, in the mind of the Prime Minister when he made his offer to the leader of the Opposition to appeal to the country for the purpose of submitting this law. If the issue is conscription, is it fair to put into force subsection 6, and thus make it an offence for any one to criticise this measure? I am sure the Government, in appealing to the country on this issue, does not intend to prevent the opponents of the Bill from presenting their case to their electors. When the Conscription Bill was introduced in the British House of Commons, somebody stated that to apply the Bill to Ireland would be a national crime and a folly. I believe myself that imposing conscription on Canada is a folly and a crime, and I intend to say so to my electors.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Then you will go to jail.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Will that be embarrassing the Government in contravention of the provisions of this section?

Mr. DOHERTY: It will not embarrass me.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: I understand my hon. friend to say that it will not be considered as coming under the provisions of this section.

Mr. DOHERTY: I confess I do not see how it can be considered as coming under the provisions of this section. The hon. member can see the distinction between criticism of the law and either himself hindering its operation or administration and advising the people to hinder its operation or administration. The two things are, to my mind, perfectly distinct.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Supposing any hon. gentleman opposite comes to the Minister of Justice and asks him not to prosecute any of his electors who might be refusing to answer the call of his class—suppose the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Sévigny) who stated to his electors in the County of Dorchester a few months ago that they would not be conscripted—went to the minister and tried to prevent him from prosecuting those who come under these provisions, would he be considered under these provisions to be hindering the operation of the Act or embarrassing the minister?

Mr. DOHERTY: No, most certainly not, because it would not hinder or embarrass me in the slightest degree. But my hon. friend had better ask that question of my hon. friend from Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) because unless I accept his suggestion the prosecuting will not rest with me. The hon. member himself could go out and lay an information, and the Minister of Justice would not be able to be embarrassed with regard to it.

Mr. OLIVER: Is it the understanding of the law that it will be no part of the responsibility of the Minister of Justice or of the Government to prosecute the man who does not answer the call of his class?

Mr. DOHERTY: I was dealing, and I understood the hon. gentleman to be dealing, with the question of the punishment of people who seek to hinder the execution of this law. I pointed out that it would not be necessary for the Minister of Justice to intervene in order that there should be a prosecution unless I accepted the suggestion of my hon. friend from Cape Breton. If I did not do so, I could not intervene to prevent the supposed constituents of the Minister of Inland Revenue from being prosecuted if anybody wanted to prosecute him. I cannot see how from what I have said the inference has been drawn that I would not be interested in seeing the law enforced. I have already pointed out that I would be neither hindered nor embarrassed if the Minister of Inland Revenue should call upon me under those circumstances. In the first place I do not think he would ask me to refrain from action in any circumstances where it was my duty to act, but if I did accept the hypothesis of my hon. friend, I do not think it would make any difference to my action in the matter.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The provisions of clause 2 are not aimed at persons who use thoughtless words. They are not aimed at all at criticism. It is one thing to criticise those responsible for the enactment of a law; it is another thing to incite people to refuse to obey that law after it has properly passed.

The two things are absolutely distinct and apart. This clause does not touch the first case at all; it is designed most distinctly to touch the second. But even so, it is not designed to prosecute every person who may utter some thoughtless word. It is designed to prevent a serious attempt to reduce this law to a mere nullity; that is its purpose, and that purpose, I think, ought to commend itself to the judgment of every member in this House and every man in the country, because when the people fail in their respect for a law which has been properly passed a condition will have been reached which will not augur well for the future of the country.

The suggestion of my hon. friend from North Cape Breton is quite in line with the purpose for which this section has been proposed. If he will be good enough to let the Bill pass, with the understanding that we will take his suggestion into consideration, I shall be obliged, and if it is desired to revert to the matter again in case we should not accept his suggestion we shall be very glad to do so.

Subsection 2 carried on division.

On subsection 3 of proposed new section 16:

No proceeding authorized or pending before any of the tribunals provided for by this Act and no decision of any such tribunal shall by means of injunction, prohibition, mandamus, certiorari, habeas corpus or other process whether of the like kind or otherwise issuing out of any court be enjoined, restrained, stayed, removed or subjected to review or consideration upon any ground whether arising out of alleged absence of jurisdiction in the tribunal, nullity, defect or irregularity of the proceedings or any other cause whatsoever nor shall any such proceeding or decision be questioned, reviewed or reconsidered collaterally in any action or proceeding, civil or criminal.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: This clause has been fully explained by the Minister of Justice. As he has pointed out, it is not designed to deal with cases of prosecution for offences. It is merely designed, like a great many similar enactments, to prevent interference on technical grounds with the operations of the tribunals. Innumerable sections of this kind are to be found in legislation in this country; they are to be found in the Canada Temperance Act, in the enactments of provincial legislatures with regard to liquor, in the Immigration Act, and in many other Acts which one could enumerate if it were necessary. The object is a very clear one. The enforcement of laws of this character is very often confided to persons who are not thoroughly versed in the law, and are therefore liable to make mistakes of which advantage might be taken by application to a higher court. It is the purpose of these enactments that technical objections of that character shall not be available to those who seek to defeat the law; that is clarly the purpose of section 3, as it has been drafted and as it is now proposed.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The object is well known. There are, however, precedents of this character, and they should not be considered as precedents. I think it is very dangerous legislation.

Mr. McKENZIE: I would suggest that this clause is in the wrong place. The connection is bad, and it is very apt to be misleading. If this clause were at the end of clause 5 there would not be so much danger of misunderstanding.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think my hon. friend is quite right. If he will let the Bill pass as it is, we will endeavour to put the clause in its proper place. It really ought to be in a section by itself.

Subsection 3 carried on division.

On subsection 4 of proposed new section 16:

Nothing in this Act contained shall be held to mitigate or affect the punishment provided by any other Act or law for the offence of assisting the enemy; nor shall anything in this Act be held to limit or affect the powers of the Governor in Council under the War Measures Act, 1914.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What is the meaning of this?

Mr. DOHERTY: There are matters dealt with in this Act—for instance, the matters we were speaking of a moment ago—that might be considered, according to the circumstances, as amounting to giving assistance to the enemy. There might be such hindrance of the operation of this Act as might be assisting the enemy. It is not intended by reason of the provisions here made to prevent the application of existing laws in regard to assistance of the enemy. We do not want to reduce the responsibility of any man for actions that may possibly be covered by this section, if the conditions and circumstances make them such as to amount to assisting the enemy; we do not want to withdraw such a man from the operation of the general laws upon that subject.

I am not prepared to point out particular cases where it does, but I think it is so highly probable that you might find cases of actually assisting the enemy which might come under the letter of this provision, that it is wise to make it clear that it is not intended by enacting this provision with regard to the operation of this Act to mitigate the law wherever it may be applicable with regard to assistance to the enemy.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Is there anything in this law so far which may be of any assistance to the enemy?

Mr. DOHERTY: This law is intended to hinder and impede the enemy. A man might carry on his operations for the purpose of hindering this law, and might so conduct himself for that purpose as to assist the enemy in effect and bring himself within other provisions dealing directly with assisting the enemy.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: For which a more serious punishment is provided.

Mr. DEVLIN: Who will have the say as to whether the other prosecution will be instituted or not? Is it the local tribunal that will decide the point?

Mr. DOHERTY: Of course if it belonged to the Minister of Justice to order prosecutions under this Act, it would be for him to determine upon the facts of a case whether it constitutes a violation of some other law with regard to assisting the enemy for which the punishment may be heavier than this, and whether he should proceed under that other law, or whether the case merely came under this law. If it is open to any one to lay an information without authorization from the Minister of Justice, it will be for the person laying the information to make up his mind what he wants to charge the party accused with. If he thinks he has a charge against him under this Act, he will proceed under this Act. If he thinks he has a charge involving more severe punishment under another law, he will proceed under another law.

Mr. DEVLIN: Will the local tribunal have the decision of the point of law?

Mr. DOHERTY: Nobody will be tried before the local tribunals for an offence. Persons charged with those offences will be brought before the criminal courts. The local tribunal has power to decide only one question, and that is, is a particular man entitled to an exemption certificate.

Subsection 4 agreed to.

On subsection 5 of proposed new section 16:

(5) Any person who prints or publishes or causes to be printed or published in any book, newspaper, periodical, tract, pamphlet, circular or printed publication whatsoever any editorial, article, letter, correspondence or other matter intended or having effect to advocate, advise, persuade, instigate or influence the public or any person, body or class of persons to resist, obstruct, hinder or impede the due execution of this Act or compliance therewith in any respect or particular according to its true intent, meaning and purpose or for the purpose of impeding or defeating the operation or administration of this Act to abstain from submitting for decision of the proper tribunals claims for exemption or the evidence available in support thereof or in any manner whatsoever to embarrass the Government or the minister in the administration of this Act or the regulations thereunder shall be guilty of an offence and shall be liable upon indictment or upon summary conviction to imprisonment for a term not less than one year nor more than five years; and whether the printer or publisher of any such book, newspaper, periodical, tract, pamphlet, circular or printed publication shall have been first convicted or not the same shall be summarily suppressed and shall remain suppressed for the duration of the present war; and moreover the further publication of any book, newspaper, periodical, tract, pamphlet, circular or printed publication whatsoever in any issue of which any such editorial, article, letter, correspondence or other matter shall have been published is prohibited and the same shall be summarily suppressed and remain suppressed for the duration of the present war.

Mr. GRAHAM: What does that mean? What effect does it have on the prosecution of the case? It says whether the man responsible for the printing or publishing of the article be convicted or not the newspaper will be suppressed. Does that involve the suppression of the newspaper even if the man were acquitted?

Mr. DOHERTY: As far as the offence constituted here is concerned, it is precisely the same as the offence dealt with in subsection 2, except that this deals with the printing and publishing of it. If the party were acquitted, he might be acquitted because he was not the man who published it. Still, the publication is there to speak for itself, and if on its face it comes under this section, then that publication ought to be suppressed. Perhaps it was not the fault of the owner, and perhaps he is not responsible for what happened, but you must have the power of suppression even though you may not be able to find out who is the person responsible for the publication. The man who did it may not be convicted and punished, but the publication tending to hinder the operation of the Act is there—it is a substantial thing—it is not a question to go to the law courts about. We may not be able to find the man who published it, and the publisher of a particular paper may be able upon his prosecution to establish that the article slipped in unawares, but we do not want it to remain in circulation simply because it is not possible to convict somebody of having produced it. I think in the majority of cases, where it was called for, there would be no difficulty in convicting the publisher; still the two things are provided for—the possible conviction of the publisher and the suppression of the paper, and it is pointed out that it is not essential for the one to be done that the other should be successful.

Mr. GRAHAM: I can see that clearly; but suppose this were the case: that the proprietor who may be his own editor goes away temporarily and in good faith installs somebody else as editor in his absence. It very often occurs that the temporary man may publish something diametrically opposed to the policy of the paper and to the wishes of the proprietor. Does not the hon. minister think it a hardship that the owner, who is entirely innocent, and who has been taken advantage of, is to be robbed of his property by this Act. His paper is suppressed until the end of the war.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: What my hon. friend means is that under the provisions of this section the suppression would be obligatory; that we would be obliged to suppress it, because we use the word "shall?"

Mr. GRAHAM: It looks like that to me.

[Mr. Graham.]

Mr. DOHERTY: There is some force in that. We might substitute the word "may."

Mr. OLIVER: An editor accused of being responsible for the publication of matter which is an infringement of this section has an opportunity on his trial of giving evidence in his own behalf and of being represented by counsel. Should not the proprietors of a newspaper have a similar right to be heard before their paper is suppressed?

Mr. DOHERTY: The section merely makes provision that suppression may follow. It would be necessary to make provision by regulation for the steps which would lead to suppression. The power of suppression under the censorship regulations for the publication of seditious matter is exercised on the responsibility of the Government through the Department of the Secretary of State. It is a power that can only be exercised effectively by somebody acting in an executive capacity. If you have to go to the courts, the publication continues in the meantime and may render nugatory the purpose of the suppression.

Mr. OLIVER: Surely the men who have their money invested in a newspaper enterprise ought to have the right in the protection of their interests and property of having the question whether the article is an infraction of the law tried out in exactly the same way as the accused man would be tried. That would seem to be elementary.

Mr. DOHERTY: It would, of course, be highly desirable to have the matter tried out before any suppression was made, but I do not see how that could be done effectively. Suppression is a power that is only effective if it is susceptible of prompt exercise. It would expose people to serious damage in their property if that power were unwisely exercised, but I do not see how it could be effectively exercised by the ordinary process of law. It goes without saying that the power of suppression would not be exercised by any minister without very grave consideration or on any but the clearest justification.

Mr. DEVLIN: Who will have power to suppress a paper pending trial?

Mr. DOHERTY: The particular minister will have to be designated by regulation. In a general way the censorship is in the Department of State.

Mr. DEVLIN: Is that not against the principles of British justice that no man shall be declared guilty until he is found guilty? You suppress the paper although the court has not declared whether there is anything in it which calls for suppression.

Mr. DOHERTY: Because under this law it is not made a matter for the court to determine, and the reason for that is that it does not seem to be a matter that is possible to confine to the determination of a court if you are to have an effective censorship. The hon. gentlemen talked about British justice. I think, if he would look up what took place in the operation of the British censorship, he would find that we were not going any further in this regard than the authorities in the old countries found it necessary to go within their own country on more than one occasion. We have only found it necessary to suppress a paper in one instance. I hope we shall have very few instances, but if a case should arise, it will certainly not be an effective remedy, if we are asked first to find the defendant, or somebody to prosecute, and obtain a decision of the court in the matter. With all respect to my hon. friend, in matters of this sort, which, after all, are matters for the protection of the country, heavy as the responsibility may be, I do not think any other course is open than to place the responsibility on the Government and let them decide what shall be suppressed and what shall be permitted. We are exercising that responsibility already with regard to anything in the nature of seditious publications. Under the Post Office Act, the Postmaster General closes the mails to publications without going to any court or without asking whether it should be done or not. I am not quite sure that a court is very much better qualified than anybody else to determine who ought properly to be entrusted with the responsibility that generally belongs to ministers, of saying whether a publication is of a nature to produce certain results. A judge is no better qualified to appreciate these matters than any other educated man with a sense of responsibility who would approach the case with the view of acting impartially and doing what is right under the circumstances.

Mr. DEVLIN: If that be the case, and the court is not supposed to determine whether the newspapers should be suppressed or not, how can a judge be supposed to condemn the man who printed the article?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Those are two distinct things. The prosecution is one thing and the suppression of a newspaper, either altogether or during the war, is another thing. In the course of this war, we have to deal with all the publications, for example, that come into the country. A number have been prevented from coming in because they were distinctly seditious. I think, in one case, a newspaper published in this country was suppressed for a certain length of time. These are not matters which could very well be determined by the adjudication of a court. Any government that is conscious of its responsibility will exercise such powers most sparingly. I may take the committee into my confidence to the extent of saying that many communications have been sent to the Government from different parts of the country with regard to newspapers which, perhaps, were publishing matter of a detrimental character, but we have always felt, when such matters were brought to our attention, that it was only in a rather extreme case that the Government should exercise such extreme powers, and it is with a strong sense of responsibility that this Government, or any government, would take into consideration any such question.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: The proposition to suppress the paper first and try the editor afterwards reminds one of the policy adopted by Cardinal Richelieu, where the man was executed first and tried afterwards.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We were obliged to deal in that way with a number of seditious publications that were coming into this country. There was no other way of dealing with them.

Mr. GRAHAM: The Prime Minister has suggested that the word "may" be used instead of the word "shall"—"This publication so found guilty shall be suppressed to the end of the war." I am not speaking from the standpoint of sympathy for the man responsible for the publication, but I may say that in every locality a weekly paper particularly is an institution. In punishing the guilty, you may be robbing a locality of an institution, which would mean a great deprivation to the people of that locality. Would it not be wise for the Government to take, by this Bill, powers of discretion to say whether the paper shall be suppressed till after the war, or for a period? For this reason: there might be some man who would take that paper who would perhaps assist very much in the prosecution of the war by his articles, and if the paper were suppressed, it could not be conducted at all thereafter. I make this suggestion because if you rob some of the localities of their weekly paper, you might almost as well take their prayer books from them. I know the objection which might be made would be that the paper might be transferred to some person else, but really remain the property of the same individual. But if a bona fide sale were made, and the paper were conducted properly under the new management, it would save the locality from being deprived of what is an institution in a great many sections and a great benefit to the people.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It might be suspended for a period not exceeding the duration of the war.

Sir HERBERT AMES: As a mere layman, who has listened to lawyers for four hours, I will make a suggestion before this section is adopted. Most of us will be called upon to try and explain the meaning of the clauses to people who are not perhaps as familiar with these matters as we in this House are. Would it not be possible to paragraph these sections in such a way that the meaning would be a little bit clearer? For instance, that subsection 5, which we have been dealing with, and make it read something like this:

(a) or influence the public or any person, body or class of persons to resist, etc.,

(b) or for the purpose of impeding or defeating the operation or administration of this Act to abstain from submitting for decision of the proper tribunal claims for exemption of the evidence available, etc.,

(c) or in any manner whatsoever to embarrass the Government or the minister in the administration of this Act, etc.

If they were placed in that form, we should be able to see them, one after the other, and we poor laymen, who have not had the benefit of a legal education, might be able to explain it to our friends so that it would be understood.

Mr. OLIVER: I hope the hon. gentleman will be more successful than I was in getting the minister to break the section up into paragraphs. I tried to get it divided into sentences.

Mr. DOHERTY: We will make an effort to get back to our A. B. C.'s, and perhaps we will reach the comprehension of everybody.

Mr. OLIVER: In regard to the question of the proprietor of a newspaper and the newspaper itself, we have always had the understanding that the manager or the proprietor, when accused, would be brought up for trial, and would be tried on the merits of the question as to the offence committed through the publication of the article. Am I to understand, however, the Prime Minister has said that the trial of the man is only a question of establishing his identity or responsibility, but the question as to the nature of the article is a matter entirely for the Government through its censorship? If so, it is an arbitrary authority to be exercised by the Government; it is not to be a matter for the consideration of the court which tries the owner or manager of the paper.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think my hon. friend must be referring to something that was said by the Minister of Justice; I do not remember touching upon the part of the question that he first mentioned. I pointed out that in these cases of censorship in respect of something that is regarded as detrimental to the public interest, the executive must exercise a certain responsibility, and that that responsibility, by reason of its character, must be, and had been up to the present time, exercised sparingly. The Government has possessed full powers to deal with this subject, and the cognate subject defined in this section will be approached in the same spirit and with the same sense of responsibility, looking to its being sparingly exercised and only in absolutely plain cases.

Mr. OLIVER: I understand, then, that the Government takes upon itself the responsibility of deciding as to the criminality of any published article?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: And that the court is only for the purpose of establishing the responsibility of the individual?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No, I was speaking with reference to the suppression of the newspaper. When you come to the prosecution against the individual, then you come to the court and the whole matter is fully opened.

Mr. OLIVER: When a person is prosecuted because of an article published in a newspaper it is the character of that article, not himself personally, that is in question, and upon the character of that article he suffers the punishment provided in this section. What I was urging upon the Minister of Justice was that the suppression of a newspaper, which is a very serious matter, indeed, should in the same way be made the subject of consideration by the court; that newspapers should not be suppressed unless an independent court had decided that the article published was in contravention of the terms of this section of the Act. I was claiming the same consideration for the property rights centred in the newspaper as is conceded to the individual in his personal rights—the right of trial and of evidence as to the facts. I see no reason why that cannot be done; I see every reason why it should be done.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I really do not think that it is practicable. In the cases to which I have referred it would hardly have been practicable for the Government to go to the courts for the purpose of obtaining a determination respecting the publications coming into the country from abroad or with regard to the newspaper which was suppressed for a certain time. The Government has never acted, nor would it propose to act, unless the case was so manifestly plain and beyond question that there could be no doubt about it.

Mr. OLIVER: The case of papers coming into the country is not at all on all fours with the case to which I am referring.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think that it really is; I will tell my hon. friend why. In the case where a newspaper coming into this country in the ordinary course under postal convention is virtually suppressed by being refused admission, a question as to the action taken arises with the proprietors of the newspaper; sometimes it is made the subject of diplomatic inquiry. So that the same question does arise, although the persons who publish the newspaper do not happen to be citizens of this country.

Mr. OLIVER: That is what strikes me as constituting a great difference between the two cases. In the one case, we may do as we please, or as our neighbours will allow us; in the other, we are dealing with our own citizens and with investments of property very much out of proportion to the property affected by the suppression of the circulation of a paper coming into this country. The citizens of our country who have property rights in a newspaper are entitled to the benefit of every law that exists for the protection of their property; they are entitled to different consideration from that accorded to the citizens of any other country whose news papers may achieve some small circulation here. I will mention another point of difference between this Act and the censorship or the stoppage of papers coming into this country from a foreign country. The censorship as it stands to-day is a censorship on account of treason or the giving of information of military value to the enemy. This is censorship directed against criticism of a government policy and administration—a different matter altogether. A discussion of the Government's policy and administration is essentially the right and business of every public newspaper in the country and the assumption of authority of the Government absolutely to destroy a newspaper without let or hindrance, without trial or consideration of any kind, is a very serious matter. I submit that that authority should not be assumed in the terms that the Prime Minister has laid down. Under the conditions which I have tried to sketch, the right of the citizen in his property should be protected by proceedings before the courts.

Sir HERBERT AMES: I understand that if a paper transgresses it shall be summarily suppressed and shall remain suppressed for the duration of the war. As that is provided by Act of Parliament, I suppose that if a paper so suppressed should endeavour to make amends, apologize profusely and promise never to repeat the offence, that paper could only be reinstated by Act of Parliament.

Mr. DOHERTY: On the suggestion of the member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) it was agreed that for the word "shall" we should substitute the word "may," to provide for possible limited duration of suspension.

Mr. GRAHAM: The Prime Minister intimated that the term might be for a period not exceeding the duration of the war.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: The application of the censorship in the past has, I am sorry to say, not been such as to inspire confidence in the good judgment or in the fair dealing of the Government in the administration of that censorship. We have the very startling instance of the suppression of a newspaper published at Sault Ste. Marie. I am not aware of the grounds upon which that paper was suppressed. We are, however, aware that every week day since the war began there has been published in the city of Montreal a paper that, to my mind, has carried treasonable utterances in a large majority of its issues, and it has not been touched by the censor.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Why?

Mr. OLIVER: I cannot say why. I am only stating the fact, and the fact, according to my judgment, is such as to render the newspaper proprietors of this country very much alarmed at an enactment, proposed as this is, by which a paper, for criticism of the administration of this Government in regard to a matter which is of most intimate interest to the people of this country, is to be liable to arbitrary suppression. I am under the impression that no such law exists in any other country. In no other country are the newspapers placed under such conditions as to carrying on their business. That being the case, perhaps the Government has not yet considered the actual circumstances in regard to the newspaper business, the enormous amount of money invested in newspapers, the responsibilities that have to be carried by those who are concerned in their conduct and in connection with those investments, and—I am sorry to have to say it—the grave possibility of the power vested in the Government by this section being used otherwise than on principles of absolute fair play and justice. The Government should systematically, for its own credit and for the credit of the country, absolutely avoid placing itself in a position where it could be accused of unfairness in the enforcement of this law. I am not objecting to the principle already stated, that when a law is passed it must be enforced and should be respected; but as to the provisions in regard to newspapers, I am compelled to think the Government has not had sufficient information as to the circumstances or conditions or it surely would not have framed this section in this form.

Mr. MORPHY: Will the hon. gentleman kindly name the paper to which he refers, which has, prior to this date, been publishing seditious articles in the city of Montreal?

Mr. OLIVER: The paper that is publishing articles that I consider have a very strong seditious tendency is Le Devoir.

Mr. MORPHY: A French paper?

Mr. OLIVER: Yes, the paper that was largely responsible for the return of the present Government.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

[Mr. Oliver.]

Mr. MORPHY: When the hon. gentleman says that does he refer to articles published prior to 1911 or since?

Mr. OLIVER: Prior to 1911.

Mr. MORPHY: He is complaining of the seditious character of articles written since 1911?

Mr. OLIVER: The articles written since 1911 have, in large measure been, in my humble judgment, of a seditious character. Some hon. gentlemen asked why the discrimination between the paper published at Sault Ste. Marie and the paper published at Montreal. I want to be understood that I did not say that the failure to suppress the paper in Montreal was because it had been largely instrumental in returning the present Government to power. I wish to draw attention to this far-reaching provision of this section, by which not only is the paper that publishes an objectionable article suppressed, but another paper that copies that article is, if I understand the section correctly, automatically suppressed. Perhaps those who drafted the section hardly realized how far-reaching that provision was. In the preparation of a newspaper, while the pen, now largely displaced by the typewriter, occupies a very important place, we will admit that the scissors are also used.

Mr. GRAHAM: In Edmonton.

Mr. OLIVER: In using the exchanges for the purpose of providing matter for a paper, it is not the responsible editor who makes the selections, it is usually some subordinate member of the staff who does so, and I think it would be a most terrible thing that a paper should be absolutely suppressed because, through inadvertence, an objectionable article had appeared in its columns. Perhaps my hon. friend did not appreciate the technical points in that connection, or he surely would have thrown some saving provision around that penalty.

Mr. DOHERTY: I think the last observation is met by the substitution of the word "may" for the word "shall." The paper does not become absolutely suppressed, and I think circumstances such as the hon. gentleman mentions would have great weight in determining whether the paper that republishes should be suppressed or not. On the other hand, I think the hon. gentleman will admit that it would be a very foolish position to take to say: Well, the paper that contains the original article we will suppress, but all the other papers in the country can print that article and keep it in circulation, and they will go on with impunity. I quite understand that the case the hon. gentleman suggests would not be a case for the exercise of the power, and his objection was very well taken so long as the imperative "shall" remained in the section, but the use of the word "may" would appeal to the judgment of anybody charged with the exercise of this power.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. OLIVER: To the hon. members who are so anxious to have this section carried, I say that this is the severest infraction of the rights of the people of Canada that has taken place since this Dominion was formed, and I do not think a few minutes are wasted in just going into the details of it. A little while ago, the Prime Minister, if I understood him correctly, said that there was an absolute distinction between the offence of inciting opposition to the law and criticism of the law. There is a difference between the two things at the two extremes, but there is no sharp dividing line of difference between the two. No man can say definitely just where fair criticism ends and obstruction or interference, or incitement to interference begins.

If I say that the administration and legislation of this Government in a certain particular is wrong, I am thereby inciting people against that administration or legislation. I cannot criticise adversely the administration or legislation of the Government without in some degree inciting people to opposition to that administration or legislation; and so I take the ground that when the Government introduces legislation worded in the general and comprehensive terms of these two sections, it is an attack upon free speech and upon the right and duty of public criticism of the public affairs of this country.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There is some force in what my hon. friend says as to the two things shading into each other. The same observation is perfectly true as to the shading between what might legitimately be regarded as sedition and what might legitimately be regarded as the expression of a strong opinion not amounting to sedition. All that is perfectly true, but I do not see that it makes the provisions of the section unwise. We must deal with these things, and we simply have to exercise our best judgment as to whether a particular article is seditious or whether it is something that is just a little short of being seditious.

Mr. GRAHAM: I hope the committee will not be too weary, but my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) and myself are speaking for a very large and influential class of people in the community. What would the Government do in this case? Suppose a member of this House made a speech in this Chamber that would come under this Act if it appeared in a newspaper as an editorial. Would the newspaper be liable under this Act if it reproduced that speech?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not know.

Mr. DOHERTY: It is a matter of discretion.

Mr. OLIVER: I just wish to say a last word. From what the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice have just said, I can come to no other conclusion than that from the passage of this Act forward the press of this country lies under threat from this Government, and to that extent is prevented from the exercise of the right and duty of legitimate criticism of the acts and administration of the Government.

Mr. BOIVIN: I should like to make one suggestion to the committee. Why not leave the question of press censorship, in so far as it is affected by this Bill in the hands of a judge of the Supreme Court. Extensive powers have been given to a judge of the Supreme Court by this Act. We come to one clause where there is absolutely no appeal of any kind, where there is not even a trial, and where the Government is taking upon itself to suppress a newspaper upon the judgment of one of its ministers. Now, there is a great difference, in my mind, between censorship after this law comes into force, and censorship as it has existed in the past. In the past censorship has been directed against sedition, against divulging secrets concerning the army, and so forth, but under these provisions it will be directed against any article which may embarrass the Government in connection with the operation of this Act. That means that the Government is the interested party, the accuser, and also the judge. It certainly is against all principles of British justice to have the same man the accuser, the interested party, and the judge. I know that a lot of confidence is being placed under this Act in the judges of the Supreme Court. I believe the Government believe they will be absolutely fair in the application of this Act. I feel sure that in the other clauses the Government have introduced all the safeguards they possibly could, and in this particular instance they are taking upon themselves a certain amount of authority that I am convinced at this time they will administer to the best of their knowledge and ability. But they are leaving people under the impression—this has been commonly stated in the few hours since these clauses have been printed—that they are taking this means of suppressing the Opposition press in the event of an election. I do not say that for a moment; I do not believe the Government would use the law for that purpose; but if they can remove that suspicion by placing the administration of this censorship in the hands of a judge of the Supreme Court, or some impartial body, why not do so, and avoid being at one and the same time accuser, judge and jury?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not think my hon. friend has put it in quite the right light in one respect. He speaks of the Government being the accuser. It is really the state, the Government acting for the time being as its instrument, asserting the rights of the state against organized disobedience to the state's law; that is the position, nothing more and nothing less. Further than that, under the censorship which has had to be carried on not only in this country, but in Great Britain during the last three years or thereabouts, powers quite as extensive as these have been capable of exercise, and, as I have said before, they have been very sparingly used—used almost altogether by suggestion to the press, by communication, and not by infliction of punishment whether in the way of suppression, prosecution, or otherwise. So I think there need be no serious apprehension about this. My hon. friend, however, has made a suggestion that is worthy of consideration. It is an invidious position for a Government to be in; I entirely agree with that. So far as the Government are concerned, we have left these matters altogether to the officers appointed, and have only interfered when the officers came to us for direction or with a recommendation. It has been left absolutely to the officers appointed, and so far as I know, and as I fully believe, they are animated by a desire to exercise their powers fairly and with perfect impartiality. The Government naturally would be sparing in the use of its powers in this connection, because whenever they are exercised those responsible are always open to unfounded imputations and insinuations. My hon. friend says it might be proper that matters of this kind should be left to a judge of the Supreme Court. That is a suggestion which strikes me rather favourably at the moment, and I am prepared to consider it. If my hon. friend would be good enough to let the clause pass, I will undertake to return to it for the purpose of making the necessary amendment, or if we should not see fit to adopt the suggestion of my hon. friend, we will return to it for any purpose that may be desired.

Mr. LEMIEUX: In case a paper is liable to be suppressed for treasonable editorials, would the editor be remonstrated with first? Would he be called before a judge of the Supreme Court, or before the board of censors, to explain or to amend, or would he simply be summarily suppressed?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think that will have to depend on the circumstances of the case. There may be some cases of so glaring a character that they would be beyond remonstrance, there might be other cases in which remonstration would be proper and desirable.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Suppose a paper is circulated publishing treasonable matter, would the editor be liable under subsection 2?

Mr. DOHERTY: He would not come under the present subsection. He would come under the first part of subsection 5. Subsection 2 deals with verbal utterances, and 5 deals with printed or published utterances and adds the power of suppression in the case of printing.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Does the law reach only the editor, or does it reach the proprietor and those who finance the paper—the backers of the paper?

Mr. DOHERTY: I think it does not go beyond those who have to do with the publication of the paper; those who are responsible for or take part in the publication of the treasonable matter. I do not think, for instance, the boy who tied up the newspaper bundles, or the man who packed them for the purpose of sending them away, would be reached by this section.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend has sufficient experience in journalism to know that very often the editor is only the instrument of other parties who finance the publication. Are those who are behind the publication not as responsible as the editor himself?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It would depend, I suppose, on how they financed it. If they were really the proprietors and financed it in that way, they might be liable. If they were persons who financed the paper by lending money, they would not be liable because they have really nothing to do with the direction of the paper.

Subsection agreed to on division.

On subsection 6 of proposed new section 16:

6. This section shall come into force on the day of the sanction of this Act.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What is the meaning of the word "sanction" there?

Mr. DOHERTY: The Act is sanctioned when the Crown gives assent to it, that is to say the day the Act is finally passed.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Then, it is intended that the provisions of the section will be enforced between the time the Act is passed and the time it is proclaimed by the Government?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: As I understand it merely means that after the Act has received the assent of the Governor General it shall not be competent to any person to urge disobedience of it. Its operation has not begun, so far as the calling out of men under it; it has not been proclaimed. But in the meantime it shall be unlawful for any person to urge disobedience of it.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I think it will be difficult to get a judge to convict a man for impeding the administration of an Act which is not being administered, and which has not yet come into force. This Act may be passed to-morrow, and it may be law as far as the assent of both Houses and the Governor General goes. Then it may not come into force by proclamation until the end of the year, or it may never come into force. Can we ask a judge to impose a penalty on a person for impeding the administration of an Act which is not in force and which may never come into force? You cannot stop a horse until you have started him.

Mr. DOHERTY: It is quite clear no one can impede an operation which operation is not going on, but people may advise and urge and arrange in advance to impede it when it comes into force. Under this section, we can reach them.

Mr. OLIVER: I may inform my hon. friend the judge is only necessary to deal with the individual. The Government can enforce the gag on the newspapers without any help from the judge.

Subsection agreed to on division.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I expect the rearrangement of the clauses of the amendement moved as section 16 will make it clear that paragraph 6 applies only to paragraphs 2 and 5. It has not any application to the other paragraphs of the section. The second paragraph of section 17 must be retained. It may be made a separate section, as suggested by the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham).

There still remains section 3, which was left last night. That is the section which divides the men into classes. There were many who urged that it would be unfair to call class 1 ahead of classes 2 and 3, some urging that all three should be called together, and others urging that class 2 should precede class 1. Various reasons were given on both proposals. I stated that, while I felt it would be exceedingly inconvenient to call all three together and would result perhaps in impediments being thrown in the way of the operation of the Act, I would reserve the clause and consult with the other members of the Government. I desire now to recommend to the House that the three classes be united. At the same time, I wish to make it clear that we hope to get over the inconvenience that would result by calling them all together by such divisions in the regulations as may enable us to take care of them at times sufficiently separated to prevent congestion, and to ensure that all three will be treated absolutely alike in so far as priority of selection goes. It has been the intention to comb those first three classes at least, and more if required. That being the case I wish to move that clause 1 shall read as follows:

Those who have attained the age of twenty years and were born not earlier than the year 1883 and are unmarried or are widowers who have no child.

Then classes two and three would be struck out. There is no reason why classes one, two and three should be united that does not apply just as well to classes four, five and six. I therefore beg to move that class four be known as class two, and that its description read as follows:

Those who have attained the age of twenty years and were born not earlier than the year 1883 and are married or are widowers who have a child or children.

Classes five and six would then be struck out and the classes that are now classes seven, eight, nine and ten would be changed to read classes three, four, five and six.

Mr. TAYLOR: I would suggest that the last word in section three be changed from "youngest" to "oldest." The class ranges from twenty to thirty-four, and if they are not called out for another year the thirty-four year old man will certainly not be improved by waiting, while those who are of the age of twenty will be a year better at age twenty-one than they are at twenty.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The intention, in fact the most absolute statement, is that no matter how they are called out there will be no priority as between those calls in the ages twenty to thirty-four. The arrangements for the trial of applications for exemptions will proceed in such a way that all will be taken care of as nearly together as possible, so as not to congest the tribunals. Priority of obligation is abolished.

Mr. TAYLOR: Is subsection 3 to be amended?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, it does not require to be amended.

Mr. TAYLOR: So long as the word "youngest" remains—

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is only the matter of the order of reporting, so long as you group the three, or are certain that all three are to be called, that priority is abolished.

Mr. TAYLOR: That is not the way the section reads. It says the order in which they are described in this section shall be the order in which they are called out on active service.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Called out is the proclamation, and we will say that the new class one is called out. A division is made in order to avoid congestion, and it is said that the first class will report on such a day and the second class on such another day and the third class on such another day. All of these must report. In so far as the applications for exemptions are concerned, we might have the tribunals sit on the last class first, but so far as this section goes, it is simply reporting to the military officers.

Mr. TAYLOR: I think there is more in it than that. If you enlisted 100,000, under this the oldest man would be left off. I think it should be the youngest man.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, that would be a matter for determination under the military rules that now exist. Any one can now be released. They could release the oldest or the youngest, or one-half at the top and one-half at the bottom, if there were too many.

Mr. TAYLOR: Why not amend section 3?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would not affect that question; that is simply a question of the order of reporting.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I may not be here tomorrow. When the Prime Minister considers the section concerning the clergy, will he include the students in divinity and theology as they were considered in Washington when they passed a similar Bill? The term "clergy" is a wide term and it might be well to mention students in divinity and theology.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I shall take that into consideration.

Progress reported.

On motion of Sir Robert Borden, the House adjourned at 12.40 a.m. Friday.

Friday, July 13, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

PRIVILEGE.—Mr. BARRETTE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. A. BARRETTE (Berthier) (translation): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege.

I am represented by the Halifax Chronicle in its number of the 7th instant as being a recruiting officer in the pay of the Militia Department.

Allow me to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I never was a recruiting officer for the Militia Department and that I never received any pay from that department, either directly or indirectly.

COLD STORAGE.

Hon. T. W. CROTHERS (Minister of Labour): I place on the Table the report of the investigation held into cold storage of commodities in Canada. I move that this report be printed and that Rule 74 be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL.

FIRST AND SECOND READING OF SENATE BILL.

Bill No. 110, to incorporate Canadian Ukrainian Institute Prosvita.—Mr. J. J. Hughes. Read a first and second time.

EXTENSION OF TERM OF PARLIAMENT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): I would like to give notice to my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) that on Monday next I purpose moving the resolution which stands in my name on the Order Paper with regard to the extension of the parliamentary term.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT, 1917.

CONSIDERATION OF THE BILL IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE HOUSE.

House in committee on Bill No. 75, respecting Military Service.—Sir Robert Borden (resumed from Thursday, July 12).

Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

On section 3—division into classes:

Mr. J. GIRARD (Chicoutimi-Saguenay): (translation): Mr. Chairman, I trust the House will allow me to draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Justice to the peculiar conditions which owing to its immense area, exist in the district I have the honour to represent.

If I may judge from the explanations given us by the members of the Government, since this bill is under consideration, I do not think these particular circumstances have been absolutely met.

The hon. Minister knows that the front line of the Chicoutimi-Saguenay county, between Chateau Bay, the intersection point between Labrador and my district, and Mistassini, extends over some 800 miles. From the Labrador coast down to Tadoussac, there is a population of 15,000 inhabitants divided into groups living at distances of twenty-five, fifty and even one thousand miles respectively from one another. I may also point out that, for a certain portion of them, there is no regular means of communication between these communities, no boat service, and that the mail service is most irregular and slow. It is easy to realize what difficulties these people will have to contend with, in order to obey the law, on account of that very distance. Let us now suppose that they were called to the colours by a proclamation of the Governor-General; they would never hear of it, in all probability; and, by the terms of this Act, they should be considered as slackers and as deserters.

I therefore believe that these special cases should be provided for by the Act itself, for they might arise in some other parts of the country. The people I refer to, although most honest, cannot afford to lose a cent, no more than a day's work. They are all fishermen who go, day after day, to make a living from the products of the sea and as the returns are not always satisfactory, they are not well off. It is therefore necessary to save them every possible expense. It will then be seen how difficult, it is, not to say impossible, for them to navigate for three or four days, often under contrary winds, to reach a place where a tribunal may be sitting, and then they would be liable to pay a fine for not appearing within the delay fixed by the Governor General. At Lake St. John, supposing the tribunals would be located where the court is held, either at Chicoutimi or at Roberval, the people called out under this Act, may however have 75 or 100 miles to go in order to put in an appearance. I want it to be understood that the people of my district find themselves under most difficult circumstances to comply with the law and that they should not be held liable to any penalty if it is impossible for them to obey this law within a certain delay. It seems to me that the remarks I have just made are as much in the Government's interest as in that of that portion of the population. I know that my people are earnest; I will not say that they are partial to the Act, but I am positive that they will submit when it will be finally passed. My only object is to protect them against hardships which will surely arise.

Mr. H. BOULAY (translation): I agree with my hon. friend of Chicoutimi and Saguenay in the remarks he has made. I might say the same about a large portion of the people of Matane county and also, seeing the absence of the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. L. P. Gauthier) about that part of the population living along the sea-cost in the county of Gaspé. All those people are subjected to the same inconveniences just mentioned by the hon. member for Chicoutimi and Saguenay. I hope the Government will also pay attention to them when the time comes.

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY (translation): I may assure both hon. members that the Government will take every possible means so that all can fill their due obligations.

As I stated yesterday in answer to the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil), we will try and put tribunals in sufficient numbers, so they may be easily reached in every part of the country where a community is found large enough to justify the location of such a tribunal.

Now, as to the suggestion that some might be liable to penalties for not having reported upon the date fixed in the proclamation; I might first say that we will always consider those people's conditions and that different dates will chosen on account of the difficulties peculiar to each locality. At all events, according to the law, if the hon. members will look it over, they will see that no one is liable to be sentenced for not having reported in due time, as long as there is a reasonable excuse, and the conditions set forth by the hon. members who cannot be suspected, would be, I believe, accepted as reasonable excuses.

If, on account of the physical conditions of the country he lives in, or from lack of facilities or of means of communication, a man found himself in the case of being utterly unable to appear, I think I may safely say that such would be considered a fair excuse; but, we will do every thing humanly possible in order to give every one the means of discharging his obligations.

Mr. GIRARD: The hon. Minister states that the tribunals will be as numerous as possible, according to population. With his leave, I will give him a few details as to these people's situation. Along the northern shore, there are villages of some 600 souls; others contain only a score of people and some localities where there would be only four or five families at the most. Without deprecating them, they are all fishermen who are not wealthy, therefore the expense they will be put to should be reduced as much as possible. It is for the cause's own success. Every thing is not accurately reported and I would like to have the interested parties absolutely satisfied as a result of the hon. minister's statements that they are fully protected. These small communities are sometimes scattered at a distance of some 60 miles from quite an important centre; there are some 75 and even 100 miles away. How are you going to reach those little villages very thinly populated; how do the Government intend to protect them, to save them from travelling expenses? Would it not be preferable for the tribunal to move from place to place?

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY: In reply to the hon. member, I may state that as far as possible, we will try to have the tribunal go to those who should appear, whenever it may be shown that it is absolutely impossible to do otherwise, in order to save these people too long journeys to reach the court. Of course, the hon. member will not pretend, I hope, that a tribunal should be constituted for some four or five families. We will try and meet such cases. The same tribunal would have the care of those small villages or communities. Evidently, the tribunal cannot be expected to go from house to house; but, at all events, we will take every possible means to help the population, that they may fill their obligations, as I have already stated, and with the smallest expense possible to them. It seems to me that the hon. member as well as those he represents need have no uneasiness. We will recall to them the "ad impossibile nemo tenetur", and no one will be punished for not having done what he could not do.

Hon. Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): (translation): I entirely approve the remarks made by the hon. members for Chicoutimi-Saguenay and for Rimouski. I am glad to hear that the hon. minister will give special attention to these regions. There is one point, however, which these hon. members have not mentioned and upon which I wish to call the Government's attention. About August or September, a large number of young men leave Bonaventure and Gaspé and the two other counties mentioned, to go and pass the whole winter season in the lumber camps, some in the Ottawa district and others around Tupper Lake, in the United States; they are then absent five or six months a year. Should the call be made during their absence, the case of these young men should, I think, be taken into consideration, for they will be away from their homes. I would like the hon. minister to consider this case in his regulations.

Mr. TURGEON (Gloucester) (translation): It is important, in my opinion, to consider the peculiar case of the fishermen who are in very large numbers in the Maritime Provinces. I second the remarks made by the members who have just spoken and I must tell the hon. Minister of Justice that the county of Gloucester has a fishing population perhaps larger than that of the other neighboring counties. We have a fishing fleet of more than two hundred boats, schooners, manned by four or five fishermen each; the father with one or two of his sons, or with the hired help of neighbours, to develop the resources of the sea as well as those of the land; just as do all our Acadian families in Gloucester county and other districts.

For these reasons, I join the hon. members who have preceded me and I ask the hon. Minister of Justice to so fix the regulations that the tribunal which may sit in Gloucester county as well as in the neighbouring ones, be duly notified of these special cases.

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY (translation): In answer to the two members—it would be useless to repeat what I have just stated—but I can assure them we shall try and give every possible facility to everyone that he may fulfil his obligations.

It may not be out of order to ask the hon. members, when the time comes to apply the Act,—if there are any special circumstances in their counties or in their districts, to communicate them to us—if they have any suggestion to offer as to the best way of meeting such special difficulties, they may submit them to us and I may assure them that we will give their suggestions all due consideration.

Now, as to the possibility of the absence of persons called to serve, I may point out that, as provided in this Act, it is not necessary to apply to one's home tribunal; the application may just as well be made to the nearest tribunal to the place where one happens to be. Thus, for instance, if a young man residing in Gaspé should be in Ottawa when the Governor General's proclamation is issued, he may apply to the tribunal sitting in Ottawa and obtain an exemption certificate from that tribunal. We have no intention to make special provisions so that every young man be compelled to apply to his respective tribunal; I repeat it, the nearest tribunal shall be authorized to hear his case.

Hon. Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): (translation): Mr. Chairman, I beg leave to draw the attention of the Minister of Justice to the conditions created by the lumber companies. These companies are often located at forty miles, fifty, seventy-five and sometimes at more than one hundred miles from any settlement; it is useless to add that there exists no means of communication. I do not suppose that the proclamation calling a certain class of men to the colours will be posted in the woods for these lumbermen in particular; it will, therefore, be entirely impossible for these men to know what is going on, their own relatives not knowing where to find them. These men go away in the fall and only come back in the spring and, during this whole period of time, it is almost impossible to communicate with them. Therefore, if the tribunal should sit in any of the months during which they are away, I cannot see how they will be able to obey the law, unless an exemption be provided for in the Act itself.

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY (translation): We will do all we can in order that all classes of people may comply with that Act, and no one shall be held responsible for not having done what he could not do. The Act provides for a fine only against those who do not fulfil their obligations. Now, impossibility is the best of excuses and I do not believe it would be necessary to insert a special clause to declare not guilty the party who has not performed an impossibility.

Mr. GIRARD (translation): Let us suppose a proclamation is issued during winter. As there is no possible means of communication with Clark City, on the island of Anticosti, it is therefore impossible to send them any news of this proclamation. Generally, there are between 600 and 1,000 men who work in the woods; these men come from almost everywhere and a large number of them are from my district. I then understand, from the words of the hon. Minister of Justice, that this would be a case of impossibility, and there is no doing impossibilities.

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY (translation): I understand that, if it is impossible for those people to reach a tribunal, or for a tribunal to reach them, that is a case of impossibility.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Section 3 has not yet been passed by the committee. A suggestion by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) as to subsection 2 stood over for consideration. Earlier in the debate the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Rainville) urged very strongly that the date of the marriage, after which the marriage should have no effect upon priority of call, should be changed to the date of the acceptance of the principle of the Bill by the House of Commons, instead of the date of the introduction of the Bill. The hon. member further urged that the Bill should take into account marriages that were contracted for prior to the introduction of the Bill. I think the suggestion of the hon. member will be met by adopting the date of the acceptance of the principle by this House. That date could not have been determined upon at the time of the introduction of the Bill, and it is in reality the more logical date of the two. Once the House of Commons accepts the principle of the Bill it is fair to assume that the people of the country will accept it as the law when passed. I therefore move that in place of the words "11th" and "June" in sub-clause 2, there be inserted the words " 6th " and " July."

Mr. NESBITT: Did my hon. friend take into consideration the suggestion of my hon. friend from New Westminster? (Mr. Taylor).

Mr. MEIGHEN: We have all taken it into very careful consideration from the beginning. The hon. member for New Westminster and the committee will agree that, after the grouping of the first, second and third classes together, and after the abolition of even the semblance of priority as to obligation between the former three classes of these two groups, no purpose will be served by making a further alteration in the Bill.

Mr. CURRIE: I do not see why we should put any unmarried men in the third category. I think that every unmarried man should go before we call on any of the married men, regardless of age. It may be said that the older unmarried men are not as fit for war service as the young married men. In that case the medical certificate will let them out. There is no other country in the world where the unmarried men are held back and the married ones sent to the front. I do not think it is fair that unmarried men, many of them wealthy, driving their automobiles, men who are too mean to marry, should be left at home and the married ones sent.

Mr. MARCIL: Perhaps some of them could not find a girl.

Mr. CURRIE: Yes. They constitute two classes, one class very wealthy, who drive automobiles, are selfish, and do not get married; and another class of fellows who are of no value to the community—perhaps marking in billiard rooms or holding horses in livery stables. That class, if physically fit, should go before the young married men, and I appeal to the justice of the House and of the minister in that respect. We have already sent too many married men, and the country will have greatly increased financial burdens in consequence.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think there is a great deal more to be said on the other side of this married men's question than has yet been uttered, although I certainly do not wish to prolong the discussion. We cannot get over the necessity, from the point of view of national interest, of calling the single men before the married men. But there is a great deal to be said for the contention that the unmarried women of this country have to be considered as well as the married women. The married women, when their husbands go to the front, are entitled to separation and to consideration of one kind or another; but the unmarried women have none of that. I do not want to pursue the matter further. No doubt the unmarried man, other things being equal, is freer, and his domestic position has not the same encumbrances. But we cannot shut out of consideration the other point of view, which I venture to suggest to the committee. I think, in a word, we have gone as far as we can in putting priority of obligation upon the unmarried men.

Mr. NESBITT: Was it not suggested that divorcees should be considered as unmarried?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. Divorced men are not married, and consequently come in as unmarried men here. Of course, if they have other domestic obligations, they can claim exemption under section 11.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD: The figures showing the relative numbers of married and unmarried men given by the Prime Minister when introducing this Bill are six years old, and for the moment it is impossible to tell how many there are of each class in Canada and how many of each class have enlisted.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Minister of Militia informs me that we have no figures of that.

Mr. PARDEE: The ultimate cost of sending unmarried men is not as great as that of sending married men. I can only reiterate that, in my opinion, the unmarried men should be the first to go.

Mr. CURRIE: The one thing that has brought the voluntary system into disrepute more than anything else is the tremendous amount of red tape that has surrounded the separation allowance. Under the King's Regulations, a soldier has to get the consent of his officer to marry. The common soldier is not allowed to address his officer on any matter of business or discipline unless he is brought before the officer by a non-com. That is the rule of the army. A young Canadian desires to get married, He asks his corporals or sergeant to bring him before his officer. When brought there he states his case. The officer is perhaps a young subaltern, who says, "That is all right, I will tell the commanding officer." Then he forgets all about notifying the commanding officer, or goes off with the men to Europe and the department is not notified that consent has been given to that marriage. Very many cases constantly come to my attention, and I am sure every member of this House is aware of cases of that kind, where no separation allowance was allowed, all through the carelessness of the officer not giving notice to the department that he had given consent. There is no form which the officer can fill in, showing that he had given his consent. This is an old army regulation made at the time when men were living in quarters, quarters had to be provided for the men, and only a certain number of men were allowed to get married in each regiment of the regular army. The regulation was framed to prevent a man marrying an undesirable. I think, as far as we in Canada are concerned, we can safely assume that every man who has joined the forces and married, has married a good woman, and no objection can be taken on that score. The next point is the obtaining of the consent of the commanding officer. In every case I have had occasion to investigate, I found the officer had given his consent, but neglected to notify the proper authorities. The result is that these women have suffered, and are suffering, great hardships, and the system has been brought into contempt. I submit that it is not too late for the department to adopt a regulation, which they can do at any moment by Order in Council, providing that every women married to a Canadian soldier is entitled to separation allowance, without hunting up the officer, and that, in no case, will the allowance be kept away from her, unless the commanding officer has notified the department that the man has married an undesirable. I think the members of this House will consider such a regulation very fair and just, and it will prevent a lot of red tape. These conscripts will be getting married, and we may have a lot of difficulty. It will simplify matters if it is presumed the consent was given, and in no case should the separation allowance be withheld, unless the commanding officer notified the department that it was not in the interest of the state that the separation allowance should be paid.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: My hon. friend refers particularly to marriage in England?

Mr. CURRIE: No, in Canada. I have in mind two cases.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: So far as Canadian marriages are concerned, we need not worry very much, because there has been no great restriction placed upon young men marrying in Canada, but there have been very great difficulties encountered in this regard in England, for reasons that are apparent to any one who has studied the situation. An Order in Council has been passed to safeguard the public and to safeguard individuals. Our young men in this country have not been accustomed to all the conditions which exist in London and in other places in England, and it has been with a view of preventing a certain kind of marriage taking place in England that restrictions have been placed upon the soldiers marrying. It is not desirable that the young men of this country should contract hasty marriages in England, and marriages, perhaps, in some cases, with women who are not desirable wives for young Canadians, and, therefore, safeguards have been provided. After giving the matter a great deal of thought and consideration, an Order in Council was passed a short time ago, whereby a young man desiring to get married must obtain the consent of the officer commanding, and the officer commanding was directed to secure the best evidence he could to show that the woman was a desirable woman for the young man to marry. He was also directed to call to his assistance the clergyman of the parish, if possible, to certify as to the character of the woman whom the soldier desired to marry. I think these safeguards were necessary. Therefore, I am sure the course that has been adopted will be approved.

Mr. CURRIE: I am not dealing with the question of marriages in England. That is a seperate matter altogether. I stated that the regulations should be such that it would be presumed that any young fellow who married in this country had received the consent of his commanding officer before being married. I have a case in mind of which I was notified the other day. I have the letter of the commanding officer, written some months ago, that he gave his consent in the town of Barrie to the man marrying a respectable woman, and her separation allowance has not been granted. Other cases have been brought to my attention all over the country. Men have been married, and the officers commanding have neglected to send the notice to the department. I believe, after the men go abroad, the regulations should be much stricter. My own experience in the matter bears out every word the minister has said, but I think a regulation should be made, dealing with conscripts and with those who have been married already in Canada, giving the separation allowance, without any further red tape. I ask the minister to facilitate this, so that we will not have any question about the separation allowance to the wives. Many separation allowances have been standing for three years, and are not settled yet.

Mr. NESBITT: A month or so ago, I took up a case with the department. The young man claims his name was posted on the bulletin board at the barracks for two weeks previous to his getting married, and I have not had any satisfaction from the department. In that case, the woman is just as good as any woman in Canada.

Mr. SMITH: I desire to emphasize the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Simcoe. I think the line is drawn too tightly in connection with some of the separation allowances. I have a case in mind where a soldier in England had not only been reduced in rank, but his wages or earnings had been withheld from him, and the separation allowance was withheld from the mother. It appears to me that the poor mother in Canada should not have to bear any of these hardships, because of what takes place in England.

Mr. BARRETTE (translation): Will the minister allow me a question?

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY (translation): Certainly.

Mr. BARRETTE (translation): Are the members of this House exempted from the operation of this Act and if not will the members who voted for the bill be the first called in the service?

Mr. DOHERTY (translation): Under the provisions of this Act the members of the House of Commons are not exempted from compulsory military service. I do not know, of course, who are those who will have the honour of the first call. I am inclined to believe though, that all members of military age are anxious to serve.

Mr. THOBURN: A peculiar case was brought to my notice yesterday. A family living in my county, father and mother, had five sons at the front, and these sons had been the sole support of their parents. One of the sons was killed, and one of the remaining four was a married man, consequently there was a separation allowance for his wife. Unfortunately the mother of these boys died. The three remaining boys had not made any provision for assigning their pay. Consequently, the father received nothing. No blame is to be attached to the Militia Department because no provision has been made for such cases. But this is the case of a father and a mother whose five sons, their only support, are in the army, the father being in poverty. My hon. friend (Mr. Bradbury) says they should get the assigned pay accordingly. But it appears that when they do not get separation allowances, they are not entitled to assigned pay. Appeal has been made to the department in charge of such matters, and a remedy will, perhaps, be afforded. Under present conditions, however, if special provision is not made to cover such cases, the father will get nothing.

Mr. OLIVER: I wish to give an instance somewhat similar to the one my hon. friend has mentioned. A widow living in Inverness, Scotland, has four sons, one of whom is in the British service. Of the other three, who are living in Canada, two, being unmarried, volunteered in 1916. The other son in Canada was married. The three young men in Canada were jointly supporting their widowed mother in Scotland. When the two unmarried men volunteered it was arranged that the third brother should assume the whole of the charge in respect of the mother that the three had previously been carrying. This brother afterwards applied to the department for a separation allowance for his mother so that he might volunteer and his mother still be protected in her support. The allowance has been refused to the mother, who is entitled to separation allowance for only one son. When application is made for separation allowance on behalf of that son the reply is that he was not the sole support of his mother and that she is, therefore, not entitled to separation allowance on his account. If this widow had had only one son in the army and two others in civil life—married men—she would have been entitled to separation allowance, but having three sons in the army, she is not, according to the regulations, entitled to any consideration. I think that is a strange rule. The widow whose two sons in Canada have gone to the front, to say nothing of the one son in the British army, should not be penalized as the result of greater sacrifice on the part of members of her family.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Many different combinations arise in respect of the adjustment of separation allowances. The member for North Lanark (Mr. Thoburn) mentioned one case and the member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) referred to another that was not on all fours with the case mentioned by the member for North Lanark. But they are both exceptional cases; I have no doubt that many other members have in mind similar cases of what might be called—well, not quite irregularities, but something of that kind. The rules have been amended over and over again in order to meet different conditions. As soon as those conditions are met, we hear no more about the difficulties which the regulations were designed to remove. But new combinations and new difficulties arise, and in order to meet these and to clean up some old claims which have been accumulating, I appointed a board of two officers—lawyers—who had returned from the front. I associated them with the Assigned Pay and Separation Allowance Branch. They have been going over these cases, but have not yet caught up with them all. It is the desire of the Department to cover all these cases and to endeavour to get them straightened out, but it is a very difficult task. I do not think that it is possible to make rules and regulations which will cover every case which is bound to come up. At the same time, I admit that such cases of hardship as the hon. gentlemen has referred to ought to be covered in some way. I think that the board to which I have referred will be able to accomplish that.

Mr. OLIVER: I wish to complete the statement of the case to which I referred. The latest report I had from the Board was that inasmuch as the widow was receiving support from her married son in Canada, she was not entitled to separation allowance. I pointed out to the minister that the arrangement made by the son in Canada to enable his brothers to go to the front was not an ordinary family obligation. It was an exceptional obligation, assumed purely from patriotic motives, and should not debar the mother from the right to separation allowance, in respect, at any rate, of one son.

Mr. BARRETTE (translation): Has the Minister of Justice thought of enlisting the inmates of the State penitentiaries and prisons and does he not believe it would be better to enrol them instead of enlisting our farmers. It would certainly be a saving to the country and it seems such a suggestion should meet the approval of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. DOHERTY (translation): In answer to my hon. friend, I may observe that the inmates of the State penitentiaries and prisons are not exempted under this Act. I think they could claim exemption just now, for their answering the call would be found impossible unless we set them at liberty. As to what should be done towards those inmates. the question has been and will still be considered. There are a great many things to be pondered over before we reach a definite conclusion as to the enlistment of those prisoners and inmates, and I have already had occasion of making some remarks in this House upon that matter. However, I do not think it would be possible or desirable to send all of them to the front, without discrimination. There are many of them whose crimes and character would render such a move altogether undesirable, and who could not be enlisted with the other respectable citizens forming part of our military forces under this Act. Therefore a choice would have to be made and the matter will be considered.

Section agreed to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Coming to section 5, which is already carried, I beg to move:

That subsection 3 of section 16 be struck out of section 16 and be made subsection 6 of section 5.

This follows a suggestion made last night by the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie). The reading is just the same as it was in subsection 3 of section 16 except that in the second line there is a word or two changed. There is no change in meaning. It now reads:

No proceeding authorized or pending before any of the tribunals described in section 5—

The rest is just the same.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Will the Solicitor General read the subsection as amended?

Mr. MEIGHEN: (Reading):

No proceeding authorized or pending before any of the tribunals described in section 5, and no decision of any such tribunal shall by means of injunction, prohibition, mandamus, certiorari, habeas corpus or other process whether of the like kind or otherwise issuing out of any court be enjoined, restrained, stayed, removed or subjected to review or consideration upon any ground whether arising out of alleged absence of jurisdiction in the tribunal, nullity, defect or irregularity of the proceedings or any other cause whatsoever nor shall any such proceeding or decision be questioned, reviewed or reconsidered collaterally in any action or proceeding, civil or criminal.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: All the sections up to section 13 are now carried. In regard to section 13, I wish to have added as subsection 5 what was formerly subsection 4 of section 16 shortened a little. I therefore beg to move:

That the following be added as subsection 5 of section 13:—

(5) Nothing in this Act contained shall be held to limit or affect punishment provided by any other Act or law for the offence of assisting the enemy nor the powers of the Governor in Council under the War Measures Act, 1914.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Sections 14 and 15 are already carried. Section 16 has now removed from it subsections 3 and 4. The remainder of the section has been abbreviated chiefly by combining what were formerly subsections 2 and 5. It has also been abbreviated with a view to meeting the suggestion made last night by the hon. member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames). This is what I propose as section 16:

4 p.m.

16. (1) Any person who comes within any of the classes set out in section 3 and who contravenes any of the provisions of this Act or of regulations for which contravention no other penalty is herein provided, shall be guilty of an offence and shall be liable upon summary conviction to a penalty of not less than ten dollars nor more than five hundred dollars or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding twelve months or to both fine and imprisonment.

That is virtually the same as it was last night.

(2) Any person who by means of any written or printed communication or publication or article, or by any oral communication or by any public speech or utterance,

(a) Advises or urged that men described in section 3 shall contravene this Act or regulations, or

(b) wilfully resists or impedes or attempts wilfully to resist or impede or persuade or induce or attempts to persuade or induce any person or class of persons to resist or impede the operation or enforcement of this Act, or

(c) for the purpose of resisting or impeding the enforcement or operation of this Act, persuades or induces or attempts to persuade or induce any person or class of persons to refrain from making applications for certificates of exemption or submitting evidence in respect thereof, shall be guilty of an offence and shall be liable upon indictment or upon summary conviction to imprisonment for a term not less than one year nor more than five years.

In subsection 3 the chief amendment is that a suggestion made by the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Boivin), which I hope the committee will permit me to say is one of the most valuable we have received, is adopted. Subsection 3 will now read as follows:

(3) Any newspaper, book, periodical, pamphlet or printed publication containing matter prohibited by subsection (2) of this section, may whether the printer or publisher thereof be previously convicted or not, be summarily suppressed and further printing or publication thereof and of any subsequent issue of any newspaper or periodical containing such matter may be prohibited for any term not exceeding the duration of the present war; provided no action shall be taken under this subsection or under subsection (2) of this section without the approval of the Central Appeal Judge.

Mr. OLIVER: There is no doubt that this section shows a vast improvement as a result of the discussion of last night. I am not going to find fault with the introduction of the provisions under their present limitations if the Government thinks it is necessary to have such provisions in the Act. That is within their judgment. I must congratulate them on having decided not to insist on the very comprehensive and indefinite provisions which appeared in the section as we were discussing it last night and which the Minister of Justice seemed to consider so very essential to the value of the Act.

Mr. DOHERTY: It is all there still.

Mr. OLIVER: The minister's eyesight must be very much better than mine. I again desire to bring to the attention of the Government the view that I expressed last night with regard to the rights of property in newspapers, and to claim for the newspapers the same protection of the courts that even under this law is not taken away from the individual. This section provides that action shall not be taken to suppress a newspaper except with the approval of the Central Appeal Judge, and is a great improvement over the clause as it read last night; but it will be observed that under this provision the newspaper has no opportunity of justifying its position. There is no provision for consideration of the circumstances; no provision for the taking of evidence, no provision for the consideration of the case except such as the Central Appeal Judge may see fit to give. I claim as a newspaper publisher that a case of this kind, dealing with the administration of our own domestic affairs, is in a different class from the application of the censorship in the matter of treasonable utterances or giving information to the enemy. This clearly and distinctly deals with a matter of internal administration—with the administration of the internal affairs of this country by a party government, and as such, is on the one hand entitled to be criticised in the public interest, and on the other hand is subject, when power is given as it is given here, to action being taken from motives of party prejudice rather than from motives of the public interest. All I ask is that the newspaper be treated as the individual is treated, and that those who are responsible for its management have the same privilege of showing cause, under the same circumstances as the individual against whom proceedings are taken under the previous part of this section. I think the Prime Minister or the Minister of Justice said last night that that was not practicable. I say that it is practicable absolutely, so far as civil matters are concerned. I have had some experience, and I am aware that a newspaper in actions for libel is dealt with as if it were a person; that is, the suit is against the owners of the paper. In the case of an accusation being made against a newspaper such as is contemplated in this section, there is no reason, from the point of view of the administration of law, why the newspaper should not be given the same rights and standing as the individual. I claim that the large investment in the newspapers of this country, the importance of their work, and the very difficult position that they have to fill in their service to the public, renders them essentially entitled to at least the same protection that the individual enjoys.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I beg to move that the new section 16 which I have just read be substituted for the old section. I also move that subsection 6, which provided for the coming into force of the section under the sanction of the Governor in Council, be struck out. When we come to section 17, I will move that the second subsection also be struck out.

Mr. MARCIL: I presume that a newspaper proprietor will be given a hearing before action is taken by the Central Appeal Judge to suppress his newspaper. Newspapers employ quite a large number of men, and the sudden suppression of one without giving the proprietor an opportunity to be heard might not be in the public interest.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend will realize that, except in a very flagrant and outrageous case, the suppression of a newspaper for one offence would not be probable at all. If any action were taken under this provision I should imagine the newspaper would be first warned, if it were publishing matter that came within the provisions of this Act; perhaps it would be warned more than once, unless its conduct was exceedingly outrageous and detrimental to the public interest.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I would point out to my hon. friend from Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) that a newspaper cannot be suppressed except with the approval of the Central Appeal Judge. He would not suppress a newspaper without just cause.

Mr. MARCIL: I have had some experience in reporting public speakers, and I have in mind a case in Montreal which went as far as the Privy Council. If members of this House, after listening to a speech, were asked what the speaker had said there would be many different versions. Before action is taken against a newspaper will steps be taken to obtain an authentic report of what the speaker really said?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Before a prosecution was entered, the very best means of getting an authentic report would doubtless be adopted.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It would be useless to bring a proposition otherwise.

Mr. MACDONALD: I am very glad to see that the provision, which I considered very anomalous, making it an offence to induce other people to embarrass the Government, has been struck out. The section is now very much more intelligible. Referring to what my hon. friend from Bonaventure has said, I would assume that the evidence necessary to prove the utterance of the speaker would be the same as to prove a fact in any other court. I might ask the Solicitor General if there are any provisions by which a newspaper is given any particular credence, or is the whole matter to be left as if it were the proving of any other fact?

Mr. MEIGHEN: In the case of subsection 2, the prosecution is on the same basis as any other prosecution. Section 14 is the only clause in the Act containing anything about the burden of proof.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Which does not relate to this.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Which does not relate to this.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I beg to move that the last clause of new section 17 be struck out. In view of the fact that the section relating to defiances of the Act can be most usefully brought into operation when the Act itself is in operation, and of the further most important fact that there is really no executive action taken under the Bill until the proclamation referred to in section 4 is issued, the object of this subsection is really obtained by the presence of section 4 of the Act.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It may be quite correct that it serves no useful purpose, inasmuch as the machinery putting the Act into operation must be proclaimed under another section, still, I think it would be a mistake to eliminate this section. I was in hopes that before the Bill came into operation there would be a further effort made for voluntary enlistment in this country, which might possibly obviate the necessity of ever putting this Act into force, and for that reason I would like to see this clause remain in the Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think it rather complicates matters to leave it in, for this reason: section 16 must be brought into effect as soon as the Act is sanctioned. It would not do to leave section 16 utterly wanting of operation until the Act was called into operation, because if that were allowed the Act might be made very difficult of operation in advance, by means that would be legal. With this clause in the Act, one requires a section calling section 16 into effect previous to calling the Act into effect. If my hon. friend will read section 16 he will find difficulty in getting a very decided or certain interpretation as to just what a court could do under it, if the rest of the Act were not in effect. I do not see any reason for retaining this section, and I can assure my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) that the object he has in mind will be just as well attained with the Act in the form I moved it.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD: Would it be out of place to remark that I am very glad the Solicitor General has seen fit to take the view he has of the anomaly that would have existed in asking the courts to impose a penalty on a man for contravening an Act which had not come into force. I pointed this out last night to my hon. friend the Minister of Justice, and he argued at some length that the view we took on the subject was not worthy of very much consideration.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not think I stated it exactly as my hon. friend says. On the contrary, I gave it a great deal of consideration, and the result has been very satisfactory.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: All that remain are exceptions 6 and 7 of the schedule.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Following the precedent of the United States Act for compulsory service in that country, I would move that section 6 be amended by inserting after the word "including," in the first line, the words "divinity students and."

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The Militia Act has numerous classes of exemptions. Section 10 says:—

10. All the male inhabitants of Canada, of the age of eighteen years and upwards, and under sixty, not exempt or disqualified by law, and being British subjects, shall be liable to service in the militia; provided that the Governor General may require all the male inhabitants of Canada, capable of bearing arms, to serve in the case of a levee en masse.

Section 11 provides:—

11. The following persons only shall be exempt from liability to service in the militia:—

Members of the King's Privy Council for Canada.

Judges of all courts of justice.

Members of the Executive Councils of Provinces.

Deputy Ministers of the Federal and Provincial Governments.

Clergy and ministers of all religious denominations.

Telegraph clerks in actual employment.

Officers and clerks regularly employed in the collection of the revenue.

Wardens and officers of all public prisons and lunatic asylums.

Members of the naval militia.

Members of the police force and fire brigade permanently employed in incorporated cities, towns and villages.

Professors in colleges and universities, and teachers in religious orders.

Persons disabled by bodily or mental infirmity.

The only son of a widow, being her only support.

Pilots and apprentice pilots during the season of navigation.

Persons who, from the doctrines of their religion, are averse to bearing arms or rendering personal military service, under such conditions as are prescribed.

This last provision is also included in this Act, but all the other classes of exemptions are not exempt under this Act. For instance, judges are not mentioned in the Act, nor are members of the Executive Councils of the provinces, deputy ministers, telegraph clerks in actual employment, etc. What is the intention of the Bill? We have made the Militia Act a part of the Bill, and as I understand it, all the exemptions under section 11 of the Militia Act would apply under this Act. There is some confusion in my mind, because only one class mentioned in the Militia Act is included in this Bill. What is the explanation?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The circumstances under which this Act is passed differ very very radically from the circumstances under which the Militia Act was passed. Furthermore, the requirements of the country, the prospective circumstances, differed very radically from the corresponding circumstances in 1905. A great many classes are exempted under the Militia Act of 1904, and I think I could name three or four times as many who would be as well entitled to exemption from that standpoint as those who happen to be mentioned there. In the forming of this Act we endeavour to keep the exceptions down to the minimum, and, in a word, they include only the following. First, contractual exceptions; that is to say, exceptions that, as a nation, we have contracted to make, covered by exception 7; then we except those who are serving or have already served, that is an exception of those who have done their duty: then we make an exception under the heading of religion, having in mind the paramount necesssity of maintaining the moral and religious strength of the community; that is an exception that I think appears in the military Acts of every nation. We have reduced to a minimum these classes of exceptions, and inasmuch as we have adopted the tribunal system or the judicial system of selection, we do not undertake to dictate to these tribunals or quasi-judiciary what should be their action. Under the Militia Act the selection is made purely by lot, and, unless there were specific exceptions, those men would be as likely to go as any others. Consequently there was a necessity for specific exceptions, and I think that they might have gone further, for, in the operation of the Act, they would have run against the most marvellous results. With a system of ballot, the draftsman of the Act had to make specific exceptions; but where the selective system is adopted, it is best to leave discretion to the tribunals.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I wanted to know where we were. I do not object to the clause, far from it; I think it is very well conceived. If I had any suggestion to make it would be to make it wider. I would except religious orders from the operation of the Act. As to the contractual exemptions, I do not know that that is a good reason. The only contractual obligation entered into with the Mennonites, when they came here in 1877 or 1878 under the Government of Mr. McKenzie, was that the Government undertook that their religious scruples would be observed. There is no such contract with the Quakers, but they are exempted on the ground of religious conscience.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Not an absolute exemption.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The right hon. gentleman fails to distinguish between exemptions and exceptions. Exceptions are given only to those whom we contracted to except. Then there is another class, who may claim exemption if they can prove their case on the ground of conscientious objection. The Quakers would come under that if they could prove their case.

Mr. NESBITT: I am quite sure that many of the parsons do not want to be excepted under this Act. Any I have heard from do not. I do not know why they should be if they are liable to go, any more than any one else. Then why select theological students as among those entitled to exemption?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is all on the one principle.

Mr. NESBITT: You are making them exceptions. I do not see any reason for that or any reason why the clergy should be exempt. In my section of the country they are not demanding to be exempted; in fact a good many of them have gone to the front voluntarily, some as chaplains and some as fighters—and some of them can fight as well as any one. A good many of them have been preaching to every one else to go and fight, and I do not see why they should not go and fight as well as any one else, especially the theological students.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It is quite true that a great many of the clergy have gone overseas in the Canadian Expeditionary Force and that they have rendered very fine service to the State in Great Britain and at the front. That is still entirely open; it is not proposed by this Act to take away that privilege of the clergy.

Mr. NESBITT: It is not proposed to take away the privilege of volunteering?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Not by this Act.

Mr. NESBITT: That is referred to in one clause.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am quite sure there is a specific clause to that effect. So far as the clergy are concerned, I think it is proper to follow the precedent of our own Militia Act, which has been in the statute book for 49 years, and also the precedents in Great Britain and the United States. So far as divinity students are concerned, we are following the precedent of the neighbouring nation—and for this reason, as I understand it, that the absence of a very large number of clergymen of various denominations has made it necessary, from time to time, in some of the churches at least, to utilize the services of divinity students, and in some of the churches the student becomes dedicated to the ministry almost from the time he commences his studies. So, under all these conditions, with the precedents we have, with the varying arrangements of the different churches in the country, it seemed proper to make this slight addition to clause 6. May I say to my right hon. friend that members of any recognized order of an exclusively religious character are, in terms, excepted.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Yes, I see that.

Mr. MARCIL: My attention was called by some members of a religious order yesterday to the fact that in January, 1916, when the third reading of the Military Service Bill was under debate in the English House, it was moved that the exemption to the clergy be struck out, and that this motion was opposed by Mr. Bonar Law and was withdrawn after a short debate. It also appears that the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Archbishop of York both refused to give their clergy permission to enlist. As the Prime Minister has said, in the United States the law explicitly exempts them in these words:

> Regular or duly ordained ministers of religion, students who at the time of the approval of this Act are preparing for the ministry in recognized theological or divinity schools.

The words used in the English Act are:

> Men in holy orders or regular ministers of any religious denomination.

I may say that a large number of the Roman Catholic clergy in Quebec have voluntarily enlisted as chaplains, and that all of those who belonged to the religious orders which have been expelled from France and who have taken up their residence in this country went back to assume their military duties in France. I think the Capuchins in this city lost three or four of their members on the firing line. None of them tried to evade service in any way. I think it a proper position to take that in the public and moral interest of the country these young students should remain at their calling.

Mr. MORPHY: I decidedly dissent from the proposition that divinity students should be placed in the same category as the clergy. I fancy the colleges of this country up to date—at least in many places throughout Ontario—have sent to the front their young vigorous manhood, irrespective of what the future had in store. They have gone boldly to the front, under the voluntary system. I speak for myself only, but it seems to me quite improper that the young manhood attending universities throughout this country—where the universities have not, as universities, shown the same patriotic and loyal feeling that other universities have shown, where, in fact, divinity students have been requested in some cases practically not to go as volunteers—should be exempted under this section. It is incompatible with the dignity of this Parliament that any such exemption should be placed in this Bill. It is not fair to the young men of the country who are not divinity students. One man is as good as another before the law. Each has a duty to perform to the state, and to specialize and single out one body of students, because they may be denominated divinity students, is not to my mind compatible with the true spirit of democracy. We boast to-day about democracy that we all love so much and I do not think there is any distinction, when you come down to ordinary human flesh and blood. I do not think it is fair to the others, who may be conscripted under this Bill, that any class of students should be exempt. The Prime Minister, in my hearing, has given the only good reason that has been advanced why divinity students should be exempted, namely, that, owing to so many of the clergy having gone to the front, the services, in a religious way, of these students must be utilized. But I have never heard it stated that there was any shortage of clerics in any denomination. Consequently, I do not believe that the argument is a fair one, nor is it in the public interest that we should give weight to an argument that thousands of young men throughout this Dominion, who are attending the various universities or schools of a semi-religious nature, or purely and simply divinity schools, should be exempted from the operation of this Bill. I speak absolutely freely, without any sectarian feeling, and I enter a personal protest against any such legislation going upon the statute.

Mr. OLIVER: Does not subsection "C" of section 11 cover the case of all students?

Mr. NESBITT: No, these are different.

Mr. OLIVER: Why are they different?

Mr. NESBITT: That is what I want to know.

Mr. OLIVER: Subsection "C" of section 11, reads:

I think I spoke on that point before, and, for my part, I do not see why there should be any special exemption of those who are being educated or trained for any calling in life in our educational institutions. I alluded to the fact that there has been a magnificent response from those institutions of higher education to the call for men, in spirit and in numbers, and in every other way, and of all our population it seems to me that those in attendance at our educational institutions and our institutions of higher learning are the last who should be put on the Indian list.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: I agree entirely with what the hon. gentleman from North Perth and the hon. member from Edmonton have stated. I think among all the classes of young men throughout Canada, no class has been more ready, and more willing, and has, to a greater extent, volunteered to go to the front than university students. I think that can be proved beyond doubt. But if it is intended to exclude or to exempt university students, I cannot see any argument for so doing. I wish to enter my protest, without any further argument. I cannot see any reason why the divinity students should be exempt. Some hon. gentleman thought we would be insulting the farmer by even offering to exempt him from service at the front. I think the divinity students would feel much more insulted, if they were exempted. They have shown that they are ready to go forward and serve their country, and I hope what has been said along this line will change the minds of those who have the Bill in hand, and that divinity students will not be exempted.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The conditions in this country are very much like those in the United States and in this, we are following the precedent which has already been established by that country, and one to which I think there can be no reasonable exception taken.

Mr. NESBITT: If the Premier is following the example of the United States, why did he not exempt the farmers, as they do in the United States?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am informed that they do not.

Mr. NESBITT: I understand they do exempt them.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have not read the Act carefully, but if I am right, that answers the hon. gentleman's question. I have no personal knowledge of the matter, but it has been represented to me that divinity students have been called upon in this country to undertake duties such as are ordinarily performed by the clergy. In addition to that, there is another circumstance, which I think might fairly be taken into consideration, that in some of the churches of the country, one church at least, the divinity student is dedicated to the ministry from the time he commences his studies, or almost from that date, and, therefore, he is looked upon and regarded as, in effect, a member of the clerical order from that time. It has been admitted that it was a proper thing to exempt the clergy. I am well aware, because I have received telegrams and messages from gatherings of clergymen of some of the churches in the country, that they would be content not to be exempted— in fact in some cases they rather suggested that they had rather not be exempted.

I know that clergymen who have gone to the front have been animated by a sense of duty, and they have performed their duty well. But, if we admit that we ought to except the clergy—and they have been excepted in this country for forty-nine years—we are not taking a very pronounced or dangerous step in advance when we except divinity students as well. That is why the Government thought it advisable that this slight amendment should be made in clause 6.

Mr. BURNHAM: I cannot understand why divinity students should be deprived of the privilege of going to the front.

Mr. PROULX: They are not deprived of it.

Mr. BURNHAM: I do not believe that they should be excepted or exempted. I have yet to find a divinity student who is better than any other man. As to his being dedicated, I think it is assumed that he is dedicated only when hands are laid upon him. Technically speaking, that is the time of his dedication. After that, if he does not pass his examinations, he is not dedicated at all. After all, it is a very mundane affair. I do not agree that the clergy should be excepted. Certainly that provision will look very bad; it will make the clergy look as if they were a poor, miserable lot of people.

Mr. PROULX: I agree with the views of the Prime Minister on this point. Speaking in respect of the Catholic clergy, I know that many divinity students are engaged also in teaching in colleges and seminaries, and it would be a great handicap to those educational institutions if the divinity students were taken away and sent to the war. They have been exempted in the United States Act, the provision reading, in part:

> Regularly or duly ordained ministers of religion, students who at the time of the approval of this Act are preparing for the ministry in recognized theological or divinity schools.

A similar exemption should be provided in this Act.

Mr. NESBITT: If these students are teachers, they would be a proper class to exempt; why they should otherwise be specially considered, I do not understand. With reference to my suggestion that those engaged in agriculture in the United States are exempt, I do not find that provision in the United States Act; therefore I was misinformed. When the member for West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) was speaking, I was reminded of a young man who went to college and had been well and sufficiently educated for the Church. When he came home, his father said: Well, John, you have the education, but you lack the grace of God; so you can go at something else.

Mr. OLIVER: In France, the clergy are not exempt. In 1914 or 1915 I met a priest of the Catholic Church, a native Frenchman, who at that time expected to be called as a reservist to France. The clergy there are subject to the same regulations as those applying to other people.

Mr. MARCIL: But French precedents do not go very far in this country; we generally follow British precedents. If the hon. gentleman goes far enough into French precedent, he will see that France has done a great many things in the religious domain during the last ten or fifteen years. For one thing, it has suppressed the Sundays—a highly respectable institution in this country.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend should be more familiar with the current history of the country of his forefathers. The observance of Sunday has been restored in France by recent authority.

Mr. MARCIL: There was an arrangement by which a man could choose one day in the week during which to take a day's rest —jour du repos hebdomadaire, as it was designated then. The day might be Saturday, Monday, or any other day in the week. All the elections and other kinds of state business were carried out on Sunday. I think, therefore, that French precedent will not go very far in this country. I would point out to the member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) that Roman Catholic divinity students enter the Holy Orders at the age of about twenty or twenty-one. Although they do not receive full orders until they finally reach the priesthood, in the eyes of the Church they are part and parcel of the Church from the time they receive their first minor orders. They are more than students, in the ordinary sense of the word; they form a part of the clergy, even though final degree of priesthood is not conferred.

Mr. NESBITT: Then they are all the better prepared to die.

Mr. MORPHY: If divinity students are part of the clergy I see no reason why they should be specially mentioned—but I do not say that that is a proper interpretation of the meaning of the words as used in the Act. It is extraordinary that a matter of this kind should not appeal to the sense of the committee in a directly opposite manner. The member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) has just told the committee that they have suppressed the Sunday in France. There is no question of that kind here. But, if I am correctly informed, over 11,000 of the priesthood of France are in the front line trenches doing the duty of soldiers. In Italy about 11,000 priests are fighting in the trenches for the cause of civilization and liberty. It is beyond my comprehension why, at a time when Canada is calling for 100,000 men, whom she badly needs, we should insert in this Bill a clause to withdraw from the young manhood of the country a large amount of splendid fighting material. I can scarcely conceive that such a thing is possible. Are these young men asking for this provision? Who has asked for it? Why is it put in? It seems to me most outrageous that this class should be specifically exempted—a class including men from 20 to 28, the very life-blood of the country that should go and support our soldiers at the front. I protest most strongly against this invidious distinction, especially in view of the assertion of the member for Bonaventure that divinity students are part of the clergy. There are Protestant students who are not part of the clergy; let us get them. If, having regard to his assertion that divinity students are part of the clergy, my hon. friend wants to withdraw all his co-religionists from the operation of this Act, then it is time for us to define what "clergy" shall mean under this Act. If what the member for Bonaventure says is true, the Bill is radically wrong in its use of the word "clergy." If divinity students are included in the word "clergy," I would ask the committee to define the meaning of the word, and to provide that it does not include students who are liable to become clerics. If from the use of the word "clergy" we are to infer that students are part of the clergy, I most emphatically protest against the inclusion of the words "divinity students."

Mr. OLIVER: This is a Bill for military, not for religious purposes. While I, for one, would not agree to follow the precedent of France in matters of religion, I think we could not do better than follow the precedent of France in military matters.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I find myself in entire sympathy with the Bill as it stands on this question. Two considerations occur to me that will help us to a rapid decision. In the first place, the number affected as divinity students would be comparatively limited; the loss to the fighting forces would not be very great if we kept all the divinity students at home. I must say that it is strongly present to my mind that in all English-speaking countries the clergy have been held to occupy a special position. The second consideration that arises in that connection is this: That there is no intention, as I understand the Bill, of preventing them from enlisting voluntarily. They have full freedom to go voluntarily, as some of the best men in England and Scotland have gone, and have made the supreme sacrifice. But when the matter comes to compelling men to leave the spiritual avocation of the clergy of the community, then I think the sentiment of all English-speaking countries would be in favour of the Bill. From our youth up, we have rightly regarded, and been taught to regard, the clergy as being a special portion of the community dedicated to the most solemn work that can occupy human beings. They baptize us in childhood; they solemnize our marriages; they console our relatives when we are dying and they say the last rites over our clay. For that reason, as I say, they have always been held in special regard, at least in the countries that compose our Empire, and I certainly think that to compel them to leave what is the highest avocation that can occupy the minds and energies of men in order to fight would be an act which would not meet with the general approbation of our people.

As to the practical point raised by the Prime Minister in regard to students being used to occupy the position of clergymen who have gone to the front, once a student of divinity has embarked on his course and been given the mark of his calling, it would be a foolish act on the part of this Parliament to use compulsion to make him leave those studies and his high calling for the purpose of serving his country at the front. For these reasons I endorse very strongly the Bill as it stands.

Mr. CURRIE: I desire to call the attention of the Prime Minister to the case of the medical students. There are a great number of medical students. Many medical students enlisted in the various contingents before completing their studies and went to the war. A number of them were sent back last fall to complete their studies so that they might later on return to the front to engage in work in the medical service. I do not think it is fair to take any student of medicine. If you are going to exempt any class of students, you should exempt any student who desires to dedicate his services to the war. When he is called out, you should make some arrangement whereby he would, whilst a conscript, be permitted to finish his medical studies in his university, so that he may qualify himself to be of service in the war. Skilled medical men are very much needed in the war zone or in the hospitals behind the firing line. The last resources of medical men are being drawn upon, and hundreds of students have been allowed by the British Government and by our Government to return home in order to complete their studies.

So far as divinity students are concerned, I have no hesitation in agreeing with the remarks of the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy). I think we have gone far enough in linking up this Parliament to the church. There is no Church and State in this country any more, but we are linking this Parliament up even with divinity students. Most divinity students never become clergymen. One-half of the students that I have known that have taken up a divinity course have finished in law or something else, so that whilst I have every deference to the desire of the Prime Minister to grant exemption to divinity students, there are divinity students and divinity students, and it would take us all night to make a distinction between the different classes. What about students of Christian Science, which is considered a form of religion, and various other beliefs? The gate for exemption would be very wide. When I hear of riots and troubles in various cities over this Bill, I find that the people raising most of the row are divinity students who are throwing bricks and other things of that sort. When you are not exempting the farmer, and not even giving an intimation to the tribunal that special consideration must be given to the claims of agriculturists—

Mr. NESBITT: That was ruled out.

Mr. CURRIE: —it is going too far to say that the tribunals shall not be allowed even to look in upon a divinity student. With all due deference to the minister in charge of the Bill, I must say that my experience with tribunals of various kinds is that they will hew to the line, and unless you give them some special intimation as to how you desire their decision, they will decide strictly according to the letter of the law. Whilst this is called a selective measure, there is not in it a single line which indicates that the agriculturist, the munitions maker, the shipbuilder, the man who transports food to the cities—men who are needed if anybody is needed— are to be exempted, and still we go to all the trouble to say that we will exempt a section of the community that, from a purely economic standpoint, is of no use to us. I respect the clergy; I think it is only right that men engaged in the avocation of clergyman should be exempted; but if you exempt divinity students, the divinity colleges will not be able to hold all the students. It is time that we drew the line somewhere, and if divinity students are to be exempted, we shall have to adopt some method of intimating to the tribunals that the agriculturists will have their claims considered when they come before the tribunals. Fancy a poor farmer's boy who has never been before a tribunal in his life, appearing before one to claim exemption. Who is to speak for him? Nobody. And these tribunals are composed not of farmers but of professional men, and the professional classes of this country are constantly saying: Oh, the farmers have not volunteered in sufficient numbers—and they will not let off the farmers. My experience of my county is that the farmer's son has gone to the front more readily than the young man from the town or village, and the farmer is therefore entitled to every consideration. He is giving his share to this war, and he is more entitled to consideration than the divinity student. But more especially is the medical student entitled to consideration, and I think the Prime Minister should insert in the Bill a provision that medical students shall not be conscripted until they get their degrees.

5 p.m.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I suppose it is understood that under paragraph (c) of subsection (1) of section 11, medical students may be exempted.

Mr. CURRIE: They are not specifically exempted by the Bill.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The remarks made by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) are very applicable, and it might be satisfactory if the Solicitor General said, as a matter of record, that medical students would be exempted under that paragraph.

Mr. MORPHY: Also agricultural students.

Mr. MEIGHEN: All students may apply for exemption under that paragraph.

Paragraph 6 agreed to.

On Schedule; paragraph 7:

Those persons exempted from military service by Order in Council of August 13, 1873, and by Order in Council of December 6, 1898.

Mr. MACDONALD: Who are those persons?

Mr. MEIGHEN: By the terms of each of those Orders in Council, there is specific exemption from military service. The first one refers to the Mennonites, who come from the slopes of the Caucasus in Russia. Previous to their coming, certain representatives were sent to Canada, and the land was spied out and the conditions discussed. One of the conditions was that if they were to settle in Canada they would be exempt from all forms of military service. Practically similar provisions are inserted in the Order in Council which followed on the trip of inspection by these representatives. The Doukhobors, who came in 1898, were also promised exemption from military service by specific terms of an Order in Council. It was felt that as the honour of the nation was pledged to these people, they should not have to prove their case before tribunals, and consequently they have been definitely exempted.

Mr. MARCIL: Are they very numerous?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not wish to say that the Order in Council applies to all of them, but those to whom it does apply make up a substantial number.

Mr. OLIVER: Does the Order in Council carry the exemption down through succeeding generations, or is exemption guaranteed only to those who came to Canada under the terms of the original Order in Council?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The point raised by the hon. member has been in my mind. The Order in Council does not in definite language carry the exemption to succeeding generations at all. Whether or not it could be contended that was the intention of the Order in Council is a question that, I think, we should not now determine. We should abide by our contract as it may be interpreted by the tribunals. The question may finally come before the Central Appeal Judge. The Order in Council simply says that these people are exempt from military service. It would appeal to me that the intention of the country was to exempt them as a community. I could scarcely argue before this House that the intention was simply to exempt the actual men who came originally, and not their children. However, I do not pretend to give a decision; it is not for me to do so. The Order in Council does not in specific terms exempt the children.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The Mennonites, when they came to this country, followed the tribal system, living in villages and communities of their own. I suppose those who have adhered to that system will be entitled to exemption, but that may not be the case with those who have gone to our cities and towns and have been absorbed into our population.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That seems reasonable.

Mr. CURRIE: The Mennonites have been proselytizing all over the country, and have formed churches of their own amongst our Canadians. I have in mind a number of such churches. There are two in my riding formed by Mennonites, none of whom came from the Old Country. I do not think the exemption should be granted to them, just because it is being granted to those who originally came from Europe.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Exemption will not be granted to all, but simply to those to whom the Order in Council applies.

Mr. MORPHY: Only to those who came at the time the Order in Council was passed?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the way the Order in Council reads. I would not care to take the responsibility of deciding whether it applies to their descendants also.

Mr. MORPHY: In the western part of Ontario there are communities of Mennonites in the counties of Waterloo, Huron, the two Perths, and part of Bruce. Many of the children and grandchildren of these men have left the Mennonite church as they grew up and joined some other, possibly the Evangelical Methodist. Where do they stand? The same answer, I suppose?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think the Order in Council applies to any Mennonites in Ontario, but to those who came to this country and settled chiefly, if not altogether, in Southern Manitoba; perhaps some went further West. I would say with some deference that the Order in Council could scarcely be held to apply to any who left the Mennonite faith, no matter whether they were Mennonites originally or not.

Mr. McCRANEY: I represent a considerable number of the Mennonites to whom this Order in Council applies. Briefly, their history is, I believe, that they originally lived in Germany and were put under military service by Frederick the Great. On the invitation of Catherine of Russia, about 125 years ago, they removed to the neighbourhood of Odessa, in Southern Russia and established themselves in large colonies there. They were allowed to use their own language—they speak Low German—and they grew up enjoying their own customs and living at peace with the Russian Government. Although they speak the German language I find that their sympathies in this war are with Russia, because of the very friendly attitude which the Russian Government had always assumed towards them, and of the way in which their rights had been preserved in that country. About 1873 the Russian Government began to impose military service on the Mennonites, and in consequence they sent a delegation to Canada. I believe this delegation went to southern Manitoba, and, finding conditions satisfactory, correspondence took place between the Minister of Agriculture and representatives of the Mennonites in which they set forth that they would like to come to this country if they could be guaranteed exemption from military service. It was because of opposition to military service that they had left Germany in the first place, and also why they wished to leave Russia. So the Order in Council was passed. My Mennonite friends tell me that they are not exempt in Russia to-day; they are not, however, engaged in combatant service, but work with the Red Cross and that sort of thing. Notwithstanding the fact that the Mennonites in this country are exempt from military service, a number of the young men of the Mennonite families in my constituency have volunteered and have lost their lives at the front in the defence of this country.

Mr. MACDONALD: Would the Solicitor General be good enough to put on Hansard or lay on the table of the House these Orders in Council, because this question will undoubtedly come up in the enforcement of the Act, and it is very important that the exact terms of the Orders in Council be known?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will see that copies of the Orders in Council are laid on the Table. I might add to the remarks of the hon. member for Saskatoon that these communities of Mennonites who are here exempted, including those in his own constituency, have expressed since the war began their very deep appreciation of the fidelity with which the bond given to them has been lived up to, and they have sent down very large sums of money indeed, collected amongst themselves for the Red Cross and other patriotic purposes.

Mr. OLIVER: For what purpose are the words "those persons exempted from military service by Order in Council of August 13th, 1873" inserted? The persons who were exempted from service by the Order in Council in 1873 must, by reason of the lapse of time, not be subject to military service at the present time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the wording of this should be held to include the children, then the children are exempt from military service.

Mr. OLIVER: Does not the Government intend to reach a decision on its responsibility or on some other definite responsibility in regard to that matter? This is a question in which the honour of the country is involved, and I should think it is not wise to leave it to the decision of an inferior tribunal which might be appointed to hear appeals against the call for men. I would respectfully suggest the matter is of sufficient importance that a definite decision should be reached.

Mr. McCRANEY: I hope there will be no question on the part of the Government as to the fact of these Orders in Council including all the members of the Mennonite sect to which the original arrangement applied, and to their children who are connected with the church.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hon. gentlemen must remember that it is no light thing to exempt any section of the community from liability to military service or to any national service. It has already been done by Orders in Council. I think it is scarcely within the province of the Government to say the extent to which these Orders in Council went, if there is any doubt about it. It would appear to me better to leave the limitation of these Orders in Council to the determination of a competent tribunal. As the Act reads now, it would be for the Central Appeal Judge—who would be a member of the Supreme Court of Canada—to decide whether or not those Orders in Council should be applied to the protection of the children of the persons who came under them. For myself, speaking personally only, I would be disposed to agree with the hon. member for Saskatoon and the leader of the Opposition that the interpretation might well be put on them that they included children so long as those children remained members of a recognized Mennonite or Doukhobor community, holding like faith as to military services.

Mr. OLIVER: Does that mean the immediate children?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The descendants.

Mr. OLIVER: For all time?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. NESBITT: In my riding we have a sect called the Omish, who are Mennonites. They are really German Quakers, and they certainly do not believe in fighting. They do not even believe in voting, let alone fighting.

An hon. MEMBER: Have you many of them?

Mr. NESBITT: Yes, we have a great number of them, and they are wonderful citizens. They are the best farmers in Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: Excepting the Scotchman.

Mr. NESBITT: Not even excepting the Scotchman. Those people have been there for a number of years, and I was wondering if they would come under clause (f). They certainly conscientiously object to the undertaking of combatant service.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They will come under clause (f) if they prove their case under it. As I understand, they disbelieve in military service.

Mr. NESBITT: Absolutely. If you were to strike them on the right cheek they would turn the left.

Subsection agreed to.

On the preamble:

Mr. OLIVER: Some days ago I asked the Parliamentary Secretary (Mr. McCurdy) for a statement of the number of men who had gone to England and had been declared unfit for service and returned to Canada. I assume it is in order to deal generally with the conditions which have led up to the necessity of the bringing in of this measure. In other words, that this is the time and place when it is in order to discuss the general administration and policy of the Miltitia Department in connection with the war. In that connection I desire to have the information which I asked of the parliamentary under secretary, and which he promised to secure.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the information has not been furnished, it will be secured at the earliest possible date and an opportunity will be given for discussion upon it.

Mr. OLIVER: When the Bill went into committee there arose a general discussion in regard to the military policy and administration of the Government. That was diverted into the consideration of the clauses of the Bill. I then asked the Prime Minister if it would be in order at a later date, and when it would be more convenient to the minister, to resume the general discussion that had been initiated by the Prime Minister himself. I was told that it would be arranged for. I assume that this is the time and place when it would be in order to take up such a discussion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Militia Estimates, I understand, are not through, and the hon. gentleman might take up the discussion on them. The parliamentary secretary is not here, and in his absence I cannot give a definite answer. The information may be almost ready. My hon. friend will lose nothing in the way of opportunity for discussion by permitting the preamble to go through.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not think it would be fair to allow the preamble to go through without some consideration or discussion. If it is not convenient or practicable to discuss the general question, I wish to draw attention to this statement in the preamble:

> Whereas enough men do not volunteer to provide such reinforcements.

I claim, on behalf of this House and this country, a statement from the Government from the authorities who are bringing in this Bill, as to why enough men do not volunteer to provide such reinforcements.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not precisely gather what my hon. friend intends by the question. Enlistment is voluntary under the system hitherto pursued, and every possible effort, so far as I am aware, has been made to induce enlistment in sufficient numbers. I have given statistics which indicate that not enough men are at present enlisting to provide for the wastage which is going on in the Canadian forces at the front.

Mr. OLIVER: So the only reason that the Prime Minister can give is simply that enough men do not volunteer. That is the reason why we must have this Bill. We have had discussions in the House between the Prime Minister and his ex-Minister of Militia in which it was stated very definitely by the ex-Minister of Militia that one reason why men did not volunteer was because the opportunity was not given them to volunteer owing to pressure brought to bear by friends of the Government upon the Government. I want to know how far that statement is justified.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have already given my statement in regard to that in the House, and I have nothing to add. So far as I am aware, there was no such condition at any time. I read a letter which embodied my views on the subject, and I said that those views were reiterated some six or eight months afterwards.

Mr. OLIVER: The hon. member for South Cape Breton (Mr. Carroll), who is a member of the expeditionary force, stated in the House that when he was assisting in recruiting for a certain battalion in that locality they were not allowed to hold recruiting meetings in the vicinity, I understood, of the Sydney Steel works, because it was not desired that men should be recruited from that vicinity. I should like to know by what authority such meetings were prevented.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I really have not the slightest idea. I never heard of any such prohibition.

Mr. OLIVER: The Prime Minister is aware, I presume, that the hon. member for Cape Breton made that statement.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I was not at all aware of it, no.

Mr. OLIVER: He did make the statement, and I think it is a sufficiently grave statement to have either the Prime Minister or the Minister of Militia answer it, and either specifically deny it or show reasons why such instructions were issued.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Who is supposed to have issued them?

Mr. OLIVER: I do not know.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It would be rather important to find that out in order to investigate it.

Mr. OLIVER: The gentleman who was speaking is a member of this House; he is also a member of the Expeditionary Force; he was engaged in the work of recruiting. He made his statement on his responsibility as a member of Parliament. I do not think that any further steps need be taken to call the attention of the Government to the fact or to demand an answer in the interest of the country.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The hon. gentleman says that some investigations should be made. I asked who issued the instructions. Apparently the hon. member for South Cape Breton did not give that information.

Mr. OLIVER: No.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Until he does give that information I do not see how any investigation could be made.

Mr. CURRIE: About that time complaint was made by munition plants that unauthorized persons were holding recruiting meetings in the munition plants while the plants were in operation. That was becoming an abuse, because a lot of these chaps, instead of confining their energies to recruiting idle men on the street, were going into the munition plants and stopping the work, holding meetings, like revival meetings, on the floors of these plants. I understand that an intimation was about that time sent by the Munitions Board to these plants that unauthorized persons were not to be allowed into these plants to hold meetings. I know something about this war; I know how great the necessity for munitions was about a year ago, for steel for shells even more than for men. There were lots of men at the front, but we need more than brawn and muscle to hold the Germans back. I think it is altogether illogical for any person who wanted to enlist soldiers to hold recruiting meetings on the floors of munition plants, as they did a year and a half ago. But that was not what stopped recruiting. It was the great volume of political meetings that were being held all over the country by hon. gentlemen, with the call at once to put up candidates against the Conservatives. In my own case, I was not taking any part in politics, but an hon. gentleman, who shed crocodile tears over his leader in this House because recruiting had fallen off, and who had to part with his leader and vote for conscription, was up in my riding, nominating a candidate against me, who was of military age and should have volunteered. That checked recruiting far more than the preventing of recruiting in munition plants. Too much politics caused the trouble. If politics had been thrown aside, it would have been all right. Voluntary recruiting was progressing, and when it was at its height, immediately after the House closed last year, there was a wild rush to get candidates in the field, because it was said there was to be an immediate election. The public mind was diverted from the war to politics. I confess my own mind, after a while, was taken from the war, and I had to take part in a political campaign, in which we soundly trimmed our opponents.

Mr. OLIVER: What my hon. friend has said bears out my contention that a great deal more attention was given to the interests of the munition plant than to the interests of recruiting.

Mr. CURRIE: I did not say so.

Mr. OLIVER: That is what I gathered.

Mr. CURRIE: It was to the interest of the British Government, who had placed the orders, to have munitions turned out, but all these mattters delayed the manufacture of munitions. Clergymen were trying to stop munition work on Sundays. Recruiting agents were wanting to get into the munition plants, to get men away from the machines, and send them to the war. Necessarily, those in authority endeavoured to stop that practice. There is no change politically to be got out of that phase of the question.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not know why my hon. friend objects to political talk, when he uses so much of it himself, and when he claims to be so successful in its use. This is not a matter of political talk. We are dealing with a measure whose importance I need not attempt to exaggerate, a measure which, in its terms, in its introduction, in every argument that is used for it, is a slur against the patriotism of the people of Canada. I want to say that, in my humble judgment, the patriotism of the common people of Canada, as shown by the service they have rendered in this war, does not warrant a slur by anybody, whether they hold a high or a low position, and when this Government declares, in the preamble of the Bill, that it is rendered necessary because our people have not shown a sufficiently enthusiastic military spirit, I claim it is for them to justify that assertion, and not merely to declare it. They throw that slur against the people of the country, and demand the passage of this measure. There are other industries in this country, besides munition making. We have heard a great deal about the industry of agriculture. The district I come from is one of the leaders of this country in the matter of agriculture and production. To-day the need of food is as great as the need of munitions. The production of food is the great demand of all the Allies. But there was never any protest from the food producers of Alberta against enlistment in Alberta, and there was no slackening of enlistment in Alberta, because of politics, or because of anything else.

Mr. CURRIE: I would agree that in Alberta they did keep out of politics, and that they did more than any other section of the country on that account, but that statement did not hold good down in Ontario and other parts of the country, and that is one of the reasons why recruiting did not go on as it should have last year. I agree with the hon. member thoroughly. I should like to ask him, in all kindness, does he not know a number of men, even in Alberta, who should have volunteered, and did not do so, whom this law will take?

Mr. OLIVER: I know very few.

Mr. CURRIE: Everybody knows that he himself and all belonging to him have done their share in the war. His heart and soul have been in the voluntary system, and are in the national conscription law to-day, because he has said so in this House two or three times. He has been most urgent in favour of that system. We have tried to frame a Bill as nearly perfect as possible, although many features of it have been criticised by the hon. gentleman. Every man whose heart is in this war will pay deference to the hon. gentleman's province for its splendid record in recruiting. It has done better than any other province—because there were no politics there.

Mr. OLIVER: For myself and my province, I resent the spirit in which this Bill has been introduced and placed before the country. It is not warranted, and I am asking for justification, if justification can be given. In the province of Alberta, the production of food is the great industry. That production is more important in the winning of the war than anything else, except the supply of fighting men; yet there was no slackening of recruiting in that country, and no consideration was given to food production. Nobody in Alberta, so far as I know, has ever challenged the most extreme efforts of the military authorities to secure men in that province. I shall read a statement of the different corps of men enlisted from the city of Edmonton and surrounding country, to show how little regard was paid to food production, the basic industry of the country, in connection with voluntary enlistment. No such consideration was given to it as was given to the industrial enterprises mentioned by my hon. friend.

Mr. CURRIE: Any munition works there?

Mr. OLIVER: Yes, two small places where they machine shells. I will give the enlistments up to August 6, 1916. These are not men who enlisted and were discharged as unfit; these are men who went forward from Edmonton, as being fit at that time, whatever happened to them afterwards. The enlistments were as follows:

Name of Unit.	Number of Men.
Princess Pats	310
101st Fusiliers, Col., Osborne	1,358
19th Alberta Dragoons, Col. Jamieson	208
31st Infantry, Calgary	400

238th Forestry, Ottawa	200
Queen's Artillery, Kingston	50
Engineers	600
4th Canadian Pioneers	150
Army Service Corps	50
Army Medical Corps

The men of the 13th Canadian Mounted Rifles enlisted at Edmonton, but joined the unit at Medicine Hat. Those of the 61st Artillery, Lethbridge, enlisted at Edmonton for the Lethbridge Artillery. That gives a total of about 19,512 men who enlisted at Edmonton from August 4, 1914 to August 6, 1916. I read this list not only to show the number of men who enlisted, but to point out that the Government or the Militia Department in recruiting made absolutely no allowance for the condition of any industry in that country. They provided for the raising of ten full battalions; besides, everybody who wanted to secure enlistment for any form of service in any part of Canada was permitted to go to Edmonton and enlist—and no man in Edmonton complained or found fault. I mentioned this on a former occasion to show that the multiplicity of the demands for men in a certain locality tended against rather than in favour of successful recruiting. But no such condition prevailed at any time in Edmonton as certainly prevailed in and about those industrial centres in eastern Canada. Since it has become necessary to enforce conscription in the country at large, I desire to say that no necessity existed in the part of the country from which I come for compulsory service in order to secure a response to any reasonable demand that could be made upon that country for men.

Mr. CURRIE: I do not think the hon. member would say that half a dozen recruiting speakers and about a hundred of the riffraff of the streets should be allowed to go into munition plants that are under guard and hold meetings at the noon hour. That is what was objected to. Munition plants were being burned and blown up in the United States, and even in Canada. I think that the action taken by the British authorities in asking the manufacturers of munitions not to permit the holding of those irresponsible gatherings in the factories was amply justified. I do not think that that had any influence upon recruiting.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not know anything at all about what was done in munition plants. I have been alluding to the passage between the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) and the ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes). The latter has made certain definite statements which have been contradicted by the Prime Minister. But, the drop in recruiting synchronized—to use the expression of the Minister of Finance—with the dates given by the ex-Minister of Militia as to the official stoppage of recruiting.

Mr. CURRIE: In the section of the country in the vicinity of Parry Sound a large number of men were being rapidly recruited. The member for Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs) raised a fine regiment there and after he had gone to Niagara for training, recruiting was proceeded with. The member for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) the Chief Liberal Whip, called a meeting at Emsdale and proceeded to put a candidate in the field against the member for Parry Sound while he was on his way across the ocean with his battalion. Everybody asked: Is the war over? I happened to be in that section of the country at the time, and I heard the remark made: Do they want to defeat Colonel Arthurs, who is doing his duty, who has not taken any part in politics? This occurred not only in that district, but in the majority of the ridings in Ontario. The party press became violent, and everybody holding a view opposite to theirs suffered more or less from their attacks. One would have thought that the question bothering some people was not, win the war, but win an election. That was the chief cause of the stopping of recruiting in Ontario.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not know what my hon. friend has in his mind. There may have been isolated instances such as he speaks about.

Mr. CURRIE: They prove the rule. They were not isolated cases; there were a great many cases of that kind.

Mr. OLIVER: The hon. gentleman must be aware that when the Prime Minister made the announcement that 500,000 men would be raised, Parliament unanimously agreed to an extension of time so that there would be no need or reasonable ground for political action. That was the only ground upon which I, for one, agreed to the extension of the term of Parliament, so that political activities might be avoided and so that a fair opportunity would be given of fulfilling the pledge that I felt had been made not only on behalf of the Government, but on behalf of the country. So that if there was political activity, it must have been of an isolated character; it could not have been general. The members on this side unanimously voted to extend the term of Parliament for one year—contrary to fundamental Liberal principles—simply in order that there should not be need for political activity until the promise made by the Prime Minister should have had reasonable opportunity of fulfilment.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. gentleman is absolutely correct in that.

At six o'clock, the House resumed, and then took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill No. 95, to incorporate the Imperial Order Daughters of the Empire and the Children of the Empire (Junior Branch).—Mr. Macdonnell.

Bill No. 106, for the relief of Rozilla Lamb. (Without amendment.)—Mr. Douglas.

DOMINION GOOD ROADS ASSOCIATION.

Mr. M. STEELE (South Perth): I desire to move, seconded by the hon. member for North York (Mr. J. A. M. Armstrong):

That the Order of the Day for House in Committee of the Whole on Bill No. 96, (Letter E2 of the Senate), intituled "An Act to incorporate the Dominion Good Roads Association," be discharged and the Bill referred back to the Select Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills for further consideration.

He said: After the committee rose yesterday information was received from the representatives of the Ontario Government in Ottawa that they desired to make some representations on this Bill, and in order that those representations may be made to the committee I make this motion.

Motion agreed to.

SECOND READING.

Bill No. 109, for the relief of John Newton Salter.—Mr. Northrup.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT, 1917.

CONSIDERATION OF THE BILL IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE HOUSE.

The order for Private Bills having been exhausted, the House went into committee on Bill No. 75, respecting Military Service.—Sir Robert Borden.

Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Mr. OLIVER: When the House rose at six o'clock I was discussing the success of voluntary enlistment in the province of Alberta, and comparing the efforts made there on behalf of military service—the unrestricted efforts that were made to get men not only for the battalions that were being raised in that part of the country, but for every branch of the service and in every part of the country, these men being taken from a centre of agricultural production, which agricultural production is at the very foundation of our success in the war—with the restriction of efforts that were made in the collection of men from other parts of the country, especially in the eastern provinces and in those parts where industrial occupations are generally followed. It is a fact beyond all question that the Government in securing men to represent this country on the other side of the water was willing to take the men wherever they could most easily be got it followed the line of least resistance and took the men from those districts where they could most easily be got, without regard to the proportion taken from the population, and without regard to the basic importance of the industries thereby affected. That being a fact, I think, beyond all argument, when the conscription Bill is brought in, and when, so far from finding in the Bill any provision for equality of service I find that every provision is framed especially to avoid that essential principle, I am compelled to come to the conclusion that the policy of the Government in framing the Bill, and its policy in giving effect to it, will again be to follow the line of least resistance, taking the men where they can most easily be got. So that in this so-called selective system which my hon. friend calls conscription, and which he expects those who believe in compulsory military service to support, I find that the principle is the very same that was objectionable in the system of voluntary enlistment, namely, the principle of requiring the willing horse to carry the whole load. As it happens, our section of the country has played the part of the willing horse, and had voluntary enlistment been continued we were still willing to play that part. But when a compulsory service Bill is brought in, recognizing that the basis of any proper compulsory Bill is equality of service, we protest against this Bill, which most certainly does not provide for equality of service.

We must admit that enlistment had decreased, in our part of the country as in other parts, and there are many reasons for that. One reason which I propose to touch on here to-night concerns the peopeople of the western provinces very intimately, and I think it will be found to concern the people of many other parts of the country as well. In Edmonton, up to the 6th of August, 1916, we had enlisted altogether ten battalions, fully organized, with additional contributions to other units comprising almost 20,000. These battalions went forward from Edmonton as battalions, but to-day we have only one battalion at the front out of those 20,000 men. Every other battalion when it got overseas was broken up; the men were drafted into other units, and the officers who had organized the battalion were left without occupation, or at any rate without the position which they had expected to retain. Although we are through with voluntary service—the honour and glory that belonged to that service have been taken from us by the Bill now before the House—may I say that those who had charge of our military affairs, and who without the slightest compunction broke up battalion after battalion from every part of the country, seem to have been so utterly unable to understand those forces of the mind which cause men to offer for military service, and which accompany that offer, that it is almost inconceivable that they could have taken the action they did as they did. Men join the military forces in the expectation of risking their lives in military operations, and in those military operations it is a rule of war as old as the world itself that a man's welfare and safety depend upon his comrades. Comradeship and mutual confidence is the greatest security a soldier can have, and when men enlisted for military service have knowledge of each other's personality, character and antecedents, when they are really friends, they know they can depend on each other and they will go into the horrors of battle with all the greater confidence because they are fighting with men they know. But when these men who have enlisted in the expectation that they will go to the front under those circumstances are scattered hither and thither without any regard to promises or expectations, when they are compelled to go to the front with men they never saw before, and of whom they have no intimate knowledge——

Mr. BURNHAM: Would the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question? If under the very circumstances he has supposed he found a request calling on him to send a draft immediately, would he refuse that draft in order to carry out and complete the conditions he is now urging?

Mr. OLIVER: If I had charge of our military affairs I would not allow such a condition to arise.

Mr. BURNHAM: It is the generals at the front, and the enemy, who cause those conditions to arise. They are not caused by the people at home.

Mr. OLIVER: I must differ with my hon. friend. The generals at the front and the enemy do not control our conditions of enlistment. The handling of our military business as it has been handled, is absolutely detrimental to the efficiency of our forces, and whether that condition was or was not necessary, there can be no argument that the breaking up of the battalions and the breaking of the solemnly pledged word to the men and their relatives and friends, that a battalion once organized would go forward as a unit and the men would serve with other men whom they knew must have had a most important and detrimental effect on the securing of further recruits. It is useless to expect that men will make this sacrifice without regard to the conditions which surround them. We have killed voluntary enlistment in our country not because our people lacked enthusiasm or lacked the spirit of sacrifice, but because the administration of our military affairs killed military enthusiasm and the spirit of sacrifice, so far as it has been killed. We have sent ten organized battalions overseas. The officers of nine of those battalions are not now in military occupation, or at least not in the occupation for which they enlisted. Most of the men who raised battalions occupied positions of some importance in the communities in which they lived. They were given the responsibilities of raising battalions on the strength of their reputations and experience, or for some good reasons. In any event, they were men of account in their respective communities, otherwise they could not have been successful in raising the battalions. Those men offered themselves, their business, their prospects, and everything else, in sacrifice for the common cause, yet what can one of them say when he comes back? Their commands were taken from them. Why? The inference is obvious, and those men can never escape from that inference. This Government has put that disgrace upon them because of the system, or lack of system, with which it managed its military affairs. I have a case in mind which I will mention to the House. When war broke out a volunteer battalion then existing at Edmonton offered to go as a unit. Of course, it was not accepted as a unit, but it was allowed to enlist as an overseas battalion, which was done. It was one of the first battalions at Valcartier, although it came from a greater distance than almost any other. When it got overseas it was broken up and its commanding officer, Col. Osborne, was relieved from military duty. He is in civilian life in Edmonton to-day. In the late fall of 1914, or the early spring of 1915, the formation of the 49th and 51st Battalions was authorized. Both were authorized at the same time, and the work of recruiting was carried on at the same time by both colonels. It happened that the gentleman chosen to organize the 51st Battalion was the man who was then colonel of the local volunteer battalion. This gentleman was a French Canadian Roman Catholic. His name was Harwood, and he belonged to a family resident in the county of Vaudreuil. I believe it is a family of some distinction in that part of the country. I may relieve the mind of any person who has any doubt on the subject by saying that he was not a Liberal: As a matter of fact he was a very staunch Conservative. It may be that Colonel Harwood, who was a practising physician, had some idea of doing credit to the not undistinguished family to which he belongs by rendering military service to his country and to the Empire. In any event, the two battalions were recruited together, but for some reason or other Colonel Harwood was not as anxious as was the other gentleman to make a record in completing his battalion. He took more time about it, and was careful as to the men he accepted. The fact that he was a French Canadian and a Roman Catholic may have attracted eligible men of that religion or of that race to his battalion, so that he had rather the advantage over the other colonel in securing eligible men because he had a larger field to select from. It was admitted, after both battalions were up to strength that he had the finer body of men. The battalions were completed early in 1915. In May, or June, 1915, the 49th went overseas, and is to-day an embodied battalion, the only battalion existing from that northern part of Alberta. The 51st was held in Edmonton during the whole of the year 1915, and finally, in the spring of 1916, it went overseas with two other Edmonton battalions that had been organized in the fall of 1915. When it arrived in England, Colonel Harwood, who had hoped, I say, to add some credit to the family to which he belonged by rendering military service to Canada and the Empire, and who was no doubt competent in every way to render that service, was relieved of the command of his battalion; it was broken up into drafts, and Colonel Harwood has been given employment as a medical officer in England. The cruelty of that is, that so long as Colonel Harwood lives or his children after him, instead of his service to the country bringing credit or glory to his name, there is a stain against him from which he can never relieve himself.

Mr. BLAIN: Does my hon. friend suggest that Colonel Harwood was singled out more than any other colonel of other battalions in Canada? In my own county of Peel such a history may be written as my hon. friend has stated. When the Peel battalion arrived in England it was broken up also, and so were many others. Therefore Colonel Harwood was not singled out by the military authorities. I am quite sure that the officer commanding the Peel battalion, Colonel Hamilton, who has returned home, never thought that the breaking up of his battalion was any stain upon his military record. It was a policy adopted for military reasons, and a great many battalions had to come under the rule.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend would have avoided the interruption if he had followed what I said, that we have sent ten battalions from Edmonton, and only one of them is now maintained as a unit.

Mr. BLAIN: I gathered that my hon. friend had said that the Edmonton battalion was singled out from others in this respect.

Mr. OLIVER: I did not suggest that, I was giving instances of how this impolicy of the department operated.

Mr. BLAIN: Would my hon. friend suggest that the breaking up of the battalions in the Old Country was a wrong policy? They either had to go over and go into the trenches as units or else be broken up. Those in military authority, who knew most about the war, decided that the best policy was to have them broken up. Does my hon. friend differ from that policy?

Mr. OLIVER: I certainly do in this way, that we should not have organized battalions that we did not intend should go overseas and remain as battalions. We should have had enough business administration to recognize how many battalions were intended to be kept in the field, and having organized those battalions and sent them forward, then it was our business to find sufficient men to keep those battalions up to strength. That is the policy that should have been pursued.

Mr. BLAIN: But it was found to be in the best interest for the prosecution of the war that they should not be continued as units, but rather that they should be broken up.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend has a wrong understanding.

Mr. BLAIN: It is my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) who has the wrong understanding.

Mr. OLIVER: Is it my hon. friend's suggestion that there was any advantage or merit in breaking up battalions?

Mr. BLAIN: I do not think that my hon. friend, with all his knowledge, would set up his opinion and say that it should prevail in preference to the opinion of those who are controlling the prosecution of the war on the other side of the water.

Mr. OLIVER: It was not the people on the other side of the water who were to blame, but the people on this side, who authorized the raising of battalions that, if they knew anything, they knew could not remain as embodied battalions after they went overseas. They selected men—I am glad to say most of them their friends, but men generally of character and standing—authorized them to raise battalions, gave them to believe that they would serve overseas as officers of those battalions. I myself heard a Lieut.-Colonel appeal for recruits on the ground that he could assure the relatives of the men who would join his battalion that he would be in a position to see that they got justice wherever they went.

Mr. BLAIN: Granting that; were all correct—and I rather agree that possibly in some parts of Canada such a promise was given, although, for my own part, I know parts of Canada where no such promise was given—but suppose it be correct, does it follow that if, after a battalion went overseas, they found it was in the best interest for the prosecution of the war to change that policy, my hon. friend would say that the change should not be made, simply in order to carry out the promise made to the men when they enlisted?

Mr. OLIVER: I say the promise should not have been given to the men unless it was to be carried out, and it was the duty of this Government—if we had a Government—to know what promises they could make to the men and the officers before they made it. Heaven knows we have had enough officers on both sides of the Atlantic, enough men in supposed authority, carrying all kinds of titles and drawing all sorts of pay, who ought to have known, and if they did not know theirs must be the responsibility. That is one responsibility which they cannot shoulder on the British authorities. We have sent battalion after battalion of men who were enlisted on the promise that they would remain as parts of an embodied battalion under officers who were promised that they would have command of the battalion on active service, and when they got over there, without the slightest regard to promises of any kind, the battalion was broken up, the men were separated from their friends, and the officers were stranded, so far as their proper military occupation was concerned. We undertook to raise 500,000 men and attempted to do so, and it may be that in order to raise men quickly it was thought to be a good plan to make these promises, to establish battalions all over the country, to give Edmonton and other cities the idea that they were each to be represented at the front by eight or ten battalions, to give the gentlemen who would undertake to raise the battalions the same idea. But when the battalions were raised, when the men were overseas, when the battalions were broken up and the officers discredited, and when news of all that came back to Canada, what happened? Only one thing could happen: voluntary enlistment died a natural death—no it did not die a natural death, it was murdered by the policy or impolicy of the administration of our military affairs under our friends who are in control of them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I thought my hon. friend said it was a magnificent success in that same province where he has discredited it.

Mr. OLIVER: Surely it was when we sent 20,000 men. But it came to a finish in that province, as it did in other provinces where they did not recruit, in proportion to population, as they did in Alberta.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Nothing could be very much more than "a magnificent success."

Mr. OLIVER: It could continue to be a magnificent success, instead of a tremendous failure.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is a limit to everything.

Mr. OLIVER: While in the province of Alberta there was that measure of success in enlistments, it is not remarkable that in the province of Ontario, of Quebec, or in the Maritime Provinces, where the people are more rooted to the soil, and where they are more closely interwoven in their social relationship, such a policy, whatever effect it may have had in Alberta, had certainly an absolutely destructive effect. We have enlisted probably as many men as we can afford to enlist and carry on our productive industry.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How could the voluntary system continue to be a magnificent success, if you have enlisted as many as you can afford to enlist?

Mr. OLIVER: It was a magnificent success as long as it continued.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If all the men are gone, how could it continue longer?

Mr. OLIVER: I am speaking of conditions throughout the Dominion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am speaking of Alberta.

Mr. OLIVER: I am speaking of Alberta also.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman said it was a magnificent success.

Mr. OLIVER: So it was.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Until all the men who could be taken enlisted.

Mr. OLIVER: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How could it continue any longer?

Mr. OLIVER: It did not have to be a magnificent success in Alberta any longer, but it could have been a magnificent success in other parts of the country, where there were plenty of men.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman said it was murdered in Alberta.

Mr. OLIVER: Beg pardon.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is where all the crimes were committed.

Mr. OLIVER: I have instanced the crimes that were committed in Alberta, but I do not pretend that those were all that were committed, or that the commission of those crimes killed recruiting in Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, or Nova Scotia.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It could not have done any harm in Alberta, if all the men were got by voluntary enlistment.

Mr. OLIVER: I will admit it could not have prevented the enlistment of another 20,000 men, because the men were not there to enlist.

Mr. BRADBURY: Does the hon. gentleman suggest that it killed recruiting in Quebec?

Mr. OLIVER: I certainly think recruiting in Quebec could not be expected to succeed, under those circumstances. Perhaps there was some other reason for it. But I say, that being the fact, I would consider it would be little less than a miracle if recruiting had not failed in Quebec, or if it were a success in Ontario. It will be admitted—if my hon. friend is so anxious to get down to details—that there are a great many more available men in Ontario, and the Bill says the men are not coming forward in Ontario.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: Would the hon. gentleman be surprised to know that I have actually seen letters from soldiers who went over there, who were in a battalion that was broken up, who were very pleased, that, instead of being kept together, they had been distributed among seasoned men, who had been a long time in the trenches and under officers who had been there for some years. They were well pleased that the change was made.

Mr. OLIVER: They may have been. I do not know in what estimation my hon. friends's constituents hold each other, but that is not the attitude of my constituents, so far as I have heard from them. They prefer to remain with those of their own acquaintance.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: My constituents went over there to fight—not to have a convivial time.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not think the hon. gentleman need draw any comparison between his constituents and mine. Perhaps my constituents have been a little more unfortunate than the hon. gentleman's, and got a little closer to the front, and consequently have had more casualties to report. I have stated a certain case, according to my understanding of it, but I will not ask the House to depend on my word in the matter. I have here a clipping from the Ottawa Journal of June 30. It reads as follows:

(Special Correspondence to The Evening Telegram from Douglas S. Robertson.)

London, June 12.—England contains many dissatisfied Canadian officers to-day, and no doubt many have arrived in Canada with grievances. These are the senior officers, who, there being no vacancies for them, have under the now more stringently enforced regulations, either to revert to lieutenancies or go home.

It does seem hard, and it is hard, that captains, majors and lieutenant-colonels who have recruited enthusiastically in Canada, and rallied thousands of men to the colors, should on arrival find themselves in such plight. Many a colonel has told me his story. After gathering what he deemed with proper pride "one of the finest battalions in Canada" about him, spent much of his own hard cash on it, learned to know his men personally, and generally put his whole soul into the work, he is told that the battalion must be broken up for drafts, and stands broken-heartedly by as company after company is sent off to reinforce other regiments.

As for himself, failing some job at the base, there is only one finale. After a brief sojourn in England, perhaps a two-weeks' tour of the front, if he be lucky, and a taste of the real thing in the trenches, he must go home. A lieutenant-colonel cannot become a subaltern.

With the majors it is scarcely less hard. A lieutenancy is no small step down in pay, and for married men with families a positive financial barrier forbids the reversion. Majors, too, are generally on the elderly side for lieutenants' work. So they, too, unless one of the rare base jobs comes their way, must, after an interval, take ship back to Canada.

For captains there is less excuse. Most of them are youthful enough for subaltern duties, though in the case of captains with families the consequent reduction in pay is also a serious matter.

"They put it up to me," declared a Toronto captain not long over with a battalion which has been broken up. "They told me I would have to revert to lieutenant or go home. Well, I told them that I would revert if they could assure me that I would be sent to France at once, but they couldn't. Now, scores of lieutenants are waiting to go over, and some have been waiting months. I guess I will go home. I can't afford the long reduction in pay." This captain is a young married man with a wife and two children.

"Just picture me going back to Canada, back to the town where I recruited a battalion, and facing the mothers whose sons they thought would be under me at the front! What am I to tell these people? What will they think of me for not going to France?" Such was the lament of one lieutenant-colonel I talked to.

He goes on to say:

The whole iniquitous system of raising battalion after battalion in Canada with full complements of officers, in face of what was happening on their arrival in England, was the fault of the old regime at Ottawa. The reserve battalion system should have been adopted long ago.

I have a clipping from the Montreal Star which quotes an article from the New York Evening Post from Lieut.-Colonel Henry J. Trihey, who commanded the now disbanded regiment of Irish Canadian Rangers. He says in part:

At the end of 1915 the Canadian Government having given evidence of its desire to feature battalions representing different shades of national sentiment in Canada, with a view to encouraging voluntary enlistment, was asked by me for authority to raise an Irish Canadian regiment for overseas service. This authority having been granted, patriotic Irish Canadian citizens provided a fund of $40,000 to defray the cost of recruiting and of organizing.

In February, 1916, the organizing of the Irish Canadian Rangers was begun. The first poster issued bore the legend "Small nations must be free." The particular appeal was to those who desired to share in the honor of representing, in this unit, Irish Canadian loyalty to Canada, at the front, fighting for the principle proclaimed on the poster.

Two members of Sir Robert Borden's Cabinet—one of them Minister of Militia—from platforms, in the city of Montreal, stated that the Government of Canada pledged itself that the Irish Canadian Rangers would go to France as a unit representing Irish Canadians. This statement was made at recruiting meetings as a special inducement to Irish Canadians to enlist in this regiment. Relying on this pledge and animated by loyalty to Canada, Irish Canadians volunteered, despite the aftermath of the Irish rebellion of Easter, 1916. The Irish Canadian Rangers, fully organized, arrived in England on December 26, 1916. On January 3, 1917, I learned that the disbandment of the regiment had been officially decreed in England, but that it was the intention of the English Government first to send the Irish Canadian Rangers to parade through Ireland. On confirming this I tendered my resignation as officer commanding and returned to Canada. All efforts from Canada were unavailing; the parade through Ireland occurred and the regiment was disbanded May 23, 1917.

The disbanded men were scattered among English Canadian regiments.

Not one of the Irish Canadian officers, not even our Catholic chaplain was sent with the men. The officers were not used; they were simply ignored.

This is a case in the province of Quebec.

Mr. BLAIN: What authority made the change?

Mr. OLIVER: The military authority.

Mr. BLAIN: Where?

Mr. OLIVER: In England.

Mr. BLAIN: In spite of protests from this side of the water?

Mr. OLIVER: Yes.

Mr. BLAIN: And now my hon. friend is making an effort to place the responsibility wholly upon the Government in power here?

Mr. OLIVER: Surely.

Mr. BLAIN: Would my hon. friend say that the officials in Ottawa knew more about the conditions in England than the military authorities over there?

Mr. OLIVER: We had a Minister of Militia in England; I do not know whether he is there to carry out any duties—I suppose he must be; at any rate this transaction would take place under his administration. I think, therefore, that the responsibility may easily be properly placed. There is no argument as to why voluntary enlistment could not go further in Canada; the miracle is that it went as far as it did. The reason why it did not go further was the maladministration of our military forces by the Government now in power, which, having failed in administering our military forces on a voluntary system, now comes forward to enforce a conscription without the authority of the people.

I have touched on what strikes me as being the most outstanding fact in connection with the failure of voluntary enlistment. But I have during the discussions on the Bill gone over, in my mind, the events that have taken place since the war broke out and since Canada undertook to take part in that war, and I have taken the trouble to put down a list of the factors that, it seemed to me, militated against the success of voluntary enlistment and brought about the conditions which the Prime Minister and his colleagues declare to have existed and upon which they found this conscription Bill.

1. Party considerations taking precedence of military needs.

2. Officers appointed for political, not military, reasons.

3. Men offering service in earlier stages of the war treated as trespassers or as applicants for bounty.

4. Carnival of graft in outfitting contingents and in war contracts.

5. Unfit men enlisted to make a record in filling battalions and then discharged without consideration when fit men were secured.

6. Insufficient provision for and insulting treatment of dependents.

7. Inconsiderate treatment of disabled returned men.

8. Inadequate pensions and unsatisfactory administration by Pension Board.

9. Inadequate provision for totally disabled men.

10. Inefficient rifles and insufficient field equipment.

11. Refusal to allow recruiting effort in vicinity of certain industrial centres.

12. Breach of faith with officers and men in breaking up battalions.

13. Inefficient men taken overseas and carried on strength in England.

14. Officers kept on strength when useless or unfit.

15. The safety first brigade.

16. Censored and untrue reports of field operations.

17. Talk of preparation for peace by prominent public men and newspapers.

18. Talk of compulsory service a year before introduction of measure.

19. Favouritism, graft and inefficiency in all lines of military administration.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: My hon. friend has gone the limit in his criticism of the Government in respect to the conduct of the war. I do not think that I ever heard him say, on any single occasion in this House, since the war commenced that the Government have done properly one single thing in connection with the prosecution of the war. I do not expect him ever to say anything like that. This country—not this Government—has done a magnificent thing in sending overseas such a large number of troops; between 330,000 and 335,000 men. If my hon. friend had been in power; if he had been in a position to control all matters connected with the training, equipping and transportation of these men overseas, would everything that he did have been perfect? Would no one have had occasion for criticism? Does he take that position?

Mr. OLIVER: No.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Then I think he should be a little more generous in respect to those who have conscientiously tried to perform a service to their country. My hon. friend has sat in the House from week to week and from month to month during the sessions that have been held since 1914. We started out to recruit by battalions. The member for Edmonton knew that that was the system upon which we were working, but I never heard him say in this House at any time, as a military expert, that we were not pursuing the proper course. But we did pursue that course; for a long time after the war started, recruiting by battalions was considered to be the proper method. No one is more sympathetic than I, with the officers who have from a spirit of great patriotism recruited battalions, who expected to go to the front, and who were told that they could not do so owing to military conditions which were unforeseen at the beginning of the war. Among those officers are men just as brave as men who have been in the trenches for one or two years; if they had been able to get to the front they would have done just as good service, I believe, as the men who were fortunate enough to get there. Why were they not able to get to the front? Immediately after the outbreak of the war we started to obtain recruits. Prominent men were asked to organize battalions; others offered their services, and the work proceeded in that way. It never occurred to those men, nor did it occur to the member for Edmonton, that many things that have since happened would have happened during the course of the war. These officers, with their men, commenced to go forward after their battalions had been completed. They went to Valcartier, to Quebec to board ship, to England; gradually some of them got to France. As they got into the fight, their battalions became depleted. The morale of a battalion decreases in proportion as the battalion becomes smaller by wastage; this emphasizes the necessity of keeping the battalions up to strength. The military authorities in France adopted a policy designed to accomplish that end. They sent to England for reinforcements. I am sure that every hon. member was deeply impressed by the story told by the member for New Westminster (Mr. Taylor) one evening in this House. He was asked to send over 400 or 500 men, owing to a battalion, I think from Vancouver, having met with tremendous losses. He was the colonel of a battalion; he would have been glad to go to the front and do his duty just as other officers from Vancouver, Edmonton, or any other part of Canada did. Did he hold back? Did he say: No, I will not allow my battalion to be broken up? It is true that he might not have been able to control the situation even if he had said that, but he did not say it. He said: these men are needed to reinforce the magnificent battalion from Vancouver—and his battalion was broken up. Who can accuse the member for New Westminster (Mr. Taylor), the member for Selkirk (Mr. Bradbury) or any of those Canadian officers who did their best to assist recruiting and who did all the country asked them to do, with not having fulfilled their duty? I shall always contend that those who were not enabled to go to the front and who had to come back to this country did their duty just as well and just as honourably as the men who were fortunate enough to get to the trenches. They need not ask, in those parts of the country whence they came: what will the people say to me? Many of these officers have come back and I have met them and talked with them and I know how badly they feel about it. An officer came into my office yesterday, a splendid man; he complained because he had been asked to go back into private life for the reason that there was nothing further for him to do.

9 p.m.

He said, "I do not know why I should have been written to in such an unceremonious way." I knew that he had been at the front, although he did not say so. He is one of those officers who have been overseas and at the front. He won the Military Cross. He asked his boy not to go to the front, but after this officer went away with the battalion of which he was colonel, his son enlisted contrary to his wish, and his son won the Military Cross and later was killed. This officer said to me: "I am back here, and my fate is to be relegated to private life again. I thought that perhaps a more sympathetic letter might have been written to me in regard to this matter by the officer commanding the district in which I reside." I talked with him for half-an-hour regarding the situation. I said, "There are many surplus officers in England and in Canada, and they must of necessity revert to private life at some time, and the proper time seems to be now before demobilization of the whole force takes place." Finally he said to me: "I never looked at the matter in the way I do now." He thanked me for my explanation, and he said: "I am perfectly satisfied; I have no fault whatever to find with your explanation." That is the attitude of 49 out of 50 officers who have come back from overseas, many of whom have not been so fortunate in getting to the front as was this particular officer. We have done the best we could, and those officers, from the colonels down to the lieutenants, have done the best they could to serve their country. There are, proportionately to total enlistments, more casualties amongst the rank and file than amongst the officers, and as the gaps in the battalions had to be filled out, drafts had to be sent over. My hon. friend from Edmonton should have put himself on record earlier in the war in order to justify the criticism he has made here to-night in respect to the question of returned officers. He did not point out these things to us before, and he could not do so because he did not know, any more than any of us knew, that this situation would arise. Nor did any other hon. gentleman say to us: You are pursuing an improper course in raising a voluntary force by the battalion system. In my judgment, our course was the proper one because it enabled the voluntary system to be the success it has proven, and I believe that had we at the outset tried to recruit by drafts, as the hon. gentleman says we should have done, we could not have made the success of voluntary recruiting that we did, and we would not have been of such service in the war as we have been. I do not know that I need say any more on this particular point, but I want to repeat that the officers who were not fortunate in getting to the front, but who did all they could do and all that the country asked them to do, are in just as honourable a light before their fellow-countrymen as the officers who did get to the front.

Mr. OLIVER: I hope my hon. friend does not expect, by the strength of his voice, to place upon me the idea that I made any suggestion against these officers. I was making my suggestion against the administration of the Government that left these officers in that position. I made no suggestion against the officers. I quite agree with my hon. friend that those officers did the best they could. They offered themselves in good faith; they offered all they had and all they were in the service of the country. The fact that they did not get to the front was not their fault, but their misfortune, and that misfortune lies at the door of the administration of this Government. My hon. friend asks me why I did not tell this Government in years gone by how to carry on its administration. That was not my business; it was their business. If I had undertaken to instruct them as to how to conduct their military affairs I am sure they would have resented my action, and they would have told me that I was tampering with recruiting, and that I was interfering with the winning of the war. Therefore I did not offer any criticism. I am criticising now only in defence of the people of this country against the accusation made against them by the Government that they have failed in patriotic enthusiasm to the extent that they must be made subject to a measure of conscription, and be made to do that duty that they were doing enthusiastically and well and would be doing to-day if they had had the benefit of a sane and reasonable administration of military affairs.

Mr. BRADBURY: I do not intend to take up the time of the House. I really do not know what good the hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) thinks he is going to accomplish by a speech of this kind at this stage of the history of this Bill. The most important measure, perhaps, that has ever come before this House is before us at the present moment. The country is waiting to see this Bill put into force; the men at the front are waiting for recruits, and my hon. friend, hour after hour, and day after day, is taking up the time of the House in regard to matters that I consider utterly irrelevant to the question before us. As one of the officers, whose fate my hon. friend is bemoaning, who took a battalion across the seas and saw it broken up, I confess frankly that at the moment when I was informed that my battalion was to be broken up and my men were to be taken from me to go to the front, I felt hurt; I felt it was an injustice to myself and to my battalion. But as soon as I received an explanation from those in command, who knew more than I did, I immediately acquiesced in their decision, realizing that it was the only thing that could be done at the time. What were the conditions? When I reached England we had three divisions at the front, all that we could maintain. When those divisions went into action, serious casualties occurred from time to time. It was impossible to send out fresh divisions; it was not the policy of the British Government that such should be done. We were doing our best to maintain those three divisions, and recruits had to come from somewhere. The authorities did not want a whole battalion; they only wanted part of a battalion. Would my hon. friend expect that the officer commanding a battalion would be so unpatriotic as to say to the military authorities: You cannot have 500 of my men to send to the front; if you want any you must take my whole battalion. So far as I heard, not an officer in England, after he understood the circumstances, made any serious complaint in regard to what took place.

Mr. OLIVER: Would it have made any difference if he had?

Mr. BRADBURY: It would not have made the slightest difference simply because we were soldiers there to obey, and we did obey. My hon. friend has made a good deal out of the manner in which this whole matter has been handled. There is no doubt serious mistakes have been made. I remember speaking to some British officers about some of the mistakes I realized I had made. An officer, who had been in the service for 25 years said to me: "Colonel, for every mistake that you or your people have made, the British Government, which has been in this business for hundreds of years, has made twenty." Surely the hon. gentleman must realize that if the foresight had been as good as the aftersight, we would have known better how to take care of the different battalions. I agree with some of the remarks my hon. friend has made, but I do not think this is the place or the time to make them. After we had got three or four divisions in the field, it might perhaps have been well to cease taking over complete battalions. The officers who went over with the battalions have done their duty as the men have done theirs. I do not see what good can be done by such speeches as the hon. member has placed on record to-night. I do not think his speech was made for the purpose of assisting the Government; I do not think it will assist the Government in winning the war, and I am sorry he has seen fit to import it into this discussion to-night. He complained very bitterly about the officers who went across, and spoke of some gentlemen he knew himself. He insinuated only a moment ago that a large number of the officers were picked out and given commands for political reasons.

Mr. MOLLOY: So they were.

Mr. BRADBURY: They were not. My hon. friend is not well informed or he would not have made that statement. There are just as many Liberals as there are Conservatives occupying the position of commanding officers to-day, so the statement that commanding officers have been picked out for political reasons is utterly without foundation.

My hon. friend talked about the officers being relieved of their command and feeling hurt in consequence. It was mentioned here to-night that the battalion raised by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Taylor) was broken up when it got overseas. I know dozens of battalions that were broken up as soon as they landed in England—battalions from Winnipeg and other points in Manitoba, and from Ontario and from every other part of this country. Why? Simply because drafts were needed, and the officers were not needed. The casualties among the senior officers at the front were, of course, not so great as the casualties among the junior officers and the men, for the simple reason that colonels in command of battalions are not in front of their regiments. It was impossible to send to the front all the colonels who went over to England from Canada. I took a battalion overseas with the full expectation of going with it to the front. When I landed in the Old Country I was put in training at one or two camps for two or three months, which was absolutely necessary. I did not feel so very much hurt when I realized the conditions. I went over to France myself and visited the trenches. I saw what was going on and I should like to have commanded my battalion there. I really did not rise to make a speech, but I could not refrain from saying what I have said. In view of the critical condition this country is in at this moment one would think that an hon. member who knows the condition of affairs would try to assist the Government, but the hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) has not given the Government the support I think he ought to have given in connection with this Bill. His speech will not help to get recruits to assist the men in the trenches who are offering up their lives for us.

Slurs have been thrown across the floor by more than one hon. gentleman opposite regarding the colonels who have gone overseas. I should like to say to some of these gentlemen that they would occupy a much higher position in this country than they do occupy if they had done what some of these returned colonels have done. There are some sitting on the other side of the House who have been colonels longer than I have. I am looking at one now. The hon. member for Pictou has been a colonel for a good many years.

Mr. OLIVER: An honorary colonel.

Mr. BRADBURY: An honorary colonel who was always glad to parade himself in uniform and show his magnificent form.

Mr. OLIVER: An honorary colonel is not a combatant colonel.

Mr. BRADBURY: He might easily become a combatant colonel.

Mr. MACDONALD: I might say to my hon. friend that my boy went in my place.

Mr. BRADBURY: I give his son all the honour that is coming to him, but I might say that it would have been better if his son had gone a year sooner than he did, as he would have gone had he been allowed.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend does not know what he is talking about, and his statement is untrue. My boy was ready to go at the very beginning of the war, but he declined to go in the 17th Battalion, commanded by a political colonel, who, being a major in the 78th, asked the colonel of the 78th Regiment to give up his place, and told him that he could not go as a colonel because he was a Grit, and that he would take him as his major if he would agree to the change.

Mr. BRADBURY: People who live in glass houses should never throw stones. My hon. friend threw a slur across the floor of this House about my services when I happened to interject a remark in the discussion. I only want to say to him that with his experience—he was in uniform long before I was, and is seven or eight years younger than I am —he would have been in a much better position to criticise others if he had raised the battalion which he might have raised, and taken it across the seas in the defence of his country.

Mr. OLIVER: Might I ask my hon. friend what would be the chances of himself or some other gentleman recruiting another battalion in the district from which he raised his battalion?

Mr. BRADBURY: We have sent five battalions from that district and have drained it pretty well, but I know the feeling amongst the British and the Canadians there, and if a call comes I know there will be no hesitation on the part of our young men in responding again. I could raise half a battalion in that district in a very short time.

Mr. OLIVER: If that is a fact—and I certainly will not question the hon. member's word—he proves there was absolutely no necessity for this conscription Bill. If my hon. friend is correct, the statement that is made on the face of the Bill must be incorrect, and the Bill has no proper foundation. In regard to myself and the proper time to speak, the minister complained that I did not criticise the Government or give them the benefit of my views in the early stages of the war. And now my hon. friend complains because I venture to speak at this particular stage, when voluntary enlistment has ceased and is to be replaced by compulsory service. Surely this is the time and place and occasion to settle the responsibility for that change of conditions, and I have been rendering what little help I can towards the settlements of that question.

Would it be agreeable to the Government to allow the Bill to remain in committee until we get a reprint of the Bill? It could be reconsidered in its reprinted form tomorrow. I have been asked by the leader of the Opposition to make this request.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We are anxious to have the Bill reported, but we will not oppose the request the hon. member makes on behalf of the leader of the Opposition.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY.

House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Canadian Government Railways: Construction and betterments, $6,500,000; Dartmouth to Deans branch line, $65,000; to provide car ferry-construction terminals, etc., $310,000.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Will that complete this road?

Mr. COCHRANE: This $6,500,000 is on capital account. It is not to complete any road. It is a betterment.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I was referring to the Dartmouth to Deans branch line.

Mr. COCHRANE: That is the second item. It will complete that road, but that is not the item under discussion now.

Mr. SINCLAIR: As I understand, it is supposed to be sufficient to complete the road.

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Will the minister tell us something about that road? Is it turning out profitably?

Mr. COCHRANE: I cannot say it is paying very well, but still for a branch line it is doing better than we anticipated.

Mr. SINCLAIR: For a good many years it has been a question in the province of Nova Scotia whether the Intercolonial should not undertake the building of certain branch lines, and take control of the traffic in those localities. This was one of the branch lines that was put forward, and it would be very interesting to know how it has turned out. I have heard that it has been very successful and that it has been a profitable feeder to the Intercolonial railway. If this be so, it might be a reason why the minister should continue the good policy of opening up some other branches which are very much needed in our province, especially one in my own constituency which was projected at the same time as this. If the minister has the information as to how traffic has grown on this road, it will be very interesting to the House and to the people of Nova Scotia.

Mr. COCHRANE: The road has done very well. It only started last year, and we have not a full years' report on it as yet. The traffic has certainly been very encouraging, to say the least. I do not mean to say it has paid, and I do not think we can expect any of the branches down there to pay, but, as the hon. gentleman has said, it has been an exceedingly good feeder for the main line of the Intercolonial.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Has there been a telegraph line installed on that branch?

Mr. COCHRANE: I think so.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I wish to bring the matter of the naming of the stations on this railway to the attention of the minister. The line runs through what is known as the Musquodoboit valley, and there are three places in that valley of the same name, Musquodoboit Harbour, Middle Musquodoboit, and Upper Musquodoboit. For probably three-quarters of a century those places have been known by the names I have given. Some time last year the names of the stations were changed and it is very confusing to the public. I think protests have been registered with the department against the changes. I know personally of very serious inconveniences caused to travellers by reason of these changes, because the travellers did not associate their destination points with the new names of the stations. I know of no reason why these stations should not have the name of the locality. Very strong representations have been made to the minister to revert to the old names, and I think it should be done.

Mr. COCHRANE: It was to avoid confusion that the changes were made. Having three Musquodoboits was liable to cause trouble in orders, and so on.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: A good way to avoid confusion among the people who know a locality is to allow old places to retain their old names. Who suggested the change in the first place?

Mr. COCHRANE: The railway people.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: So far as I can gather from the correspondence, the whole matter was put in the hands of Mr. Hector McInnes of Halifax to determine.

Mr. COCHRANE: He was asked to make the change, as an old official.

Mr. MACDONALD: But he does not belong to Halifax county, he is from Pictou.

Mr. COCHRANE: He has not been in Pictou for some time has he?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not think that Mr. McInnes should be consulted as to the names to be given to railway stations in Halifax county. He wanted the name of a place in Halifax county named Chezzetcook changed to Joffre. The department did not carry that out.

Mr. COCHRANE: It was not in the interest of the railway that we should have three Musquodoboits.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It would not diminish traffic or hurt the business of the road.

Mr. MACDONALD: What special function had Mr. McInnes that would enable him to select the name?

Mr. COCHRANE: The change was made to avoid confusion, as I have said.

Mr. MACDONALD: Why did not the minister consult my friend from Halifax (Mr. Maclean)? Mr. McInnes is an estimable man and a good lawyer, but what he does not know about Musquodoboit would fill a good many books. My hon. friend from Halifax could have given better advice.

Mr. SINCLAIR: He might have asked the Prime Minister.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Does the Prime Minister, my colleague, concur in this?

Mr. COCHRANE: I do not know.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: You never asked him?

Mr. COCHRANE: No.

Mr. TURGEON: Has the minister given any consideration recently to the taking over of the Caraquet and South Shore railway?

Mr. COCHRANE: I have not given any consideration to taking over any road during the war. It has been well understood that Canada cannot borrow money except within her own borders, and how long we can continue to finance, even without buying railways, is hard to say.

Mr. TURGEON: I admit that the reason given by the minister is a plausible one under present conditions. Meanwhile we must not neglect our home trade and commerce, but should endeavour to do what is right in the interest of our internal trade. The taking over of that road would mean a considerable increase of trade to the Intercolonial. It already furnishes quite a quantity, but with a good service much more would be provided and the people would be better served. I hope that, notwithstanding what the minister says about financing, he will still look into the question.

Mr. SINCLAIR: This is a very large item, $6,500,000 for construction and betterments. If the minister is going to spend all that in war time, he is evidently not very short of money. What is it proposed to do with this very large sum?

Mr. COCHRANE: This $65,000 is one of the items. The next item is to complete the car ferry between New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island; that will take $310,000 more. Then the Halifax terminals alone will take $3,000,000 out of this vote. It is felt that with the need for overseas shipments we could not discontinue that work or I would certainly have closed it down before now. Last winter we were seriously crowded as we had not enough berths there. We hope to have the first unit finished this fall.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Will this amount complete it?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes. It may not complete the station, but it will complete the harbour end of it.

Mr. COCHRANE: The total amount under Government railways is as follows:

Construction and betterment, $6,500,000; Dartmouth to Deans branch line, $65,000; to provide car ferry, $310,000; total, $6,875,000.

The first item for construction and betterment, is subdivided as follows:

Intercolonial—Buildings, $571,000; roadbed and track, $333,000; bridges, $365,200; miscellaneous, which includes $3,000,000 for Halifax terminals, $4,158,000; total for the Intercolonial, $5,426,200.

Prince Edward Island—Roadbed and track, $7,600; bridges, $900; miscellaneous, $2,200; total, $10,700.

New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island Railway—Buildings, $14,500; roadbed and track, $64,000; bridges, $55,600; miscellaneous, $4,000; total, $138,100.

International Railway—Roadbed and track, $5,390; bridges, $1,010; total, $6,400.

National Transcontinental—Buildings, $118,900; roadbed and track, $151,100; bridges, $74,000; miscellaneous, $22,700; Winnipeg elevator, $425,000; total, $791,700.

Lake Superior Branch—Buildings, $3,800; roadbed and track, $15,400; bridges, $87,700; miscellaneous, $20,000; total, $126,900.

Mr. COPP: I think the hon. gentleman told me that $14,000 was provided for betterment on the New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island Railway?

Mr. COCHRANE: $14,000 for buildings; roadbed and track, $64,000; bridges, $55,000; and miscellaneous, $4,000.

Mr. COPP: If I recollect correctly, $14,000 for buildings was for the round house or repair shop at Sackville, which was recently burned. The road running from Sackville to Cape Tormentine is 36 or 37 miles in length. When that road was operated by the company, it was pretty well run down, as the hon. minister well knows, and at a number of the villages through which the road runs and serves the public there were no station houses. Some places there would be a shed-way, where a person could get shelter in a storm. Would it not be possible to provide small station houses in these localities, to give the people an opportunity to patronize the road? There is a number of villages along the road, and it is an important part of the community. I think there are only two station houses, one at Baie Verte and one at Port Elgin. Of course, there is a station house at each end of the line, but there are a number of stopping places where we should have some accommodation for the travelling public. I hope the hon. gentleman will see that the much needed accommodation for the travelling public is provided.

Mr. COCHRANE: It is better, first, to get the road in shape, so that we can run trains over it. We hope this season to have it completed and re-railed. We are getting 12,000 tons of rail rolled at Sydney, and intend to relay it with rails taken from the main line, and we want to get that in shape, so that when the car ferry is completed, which will be done in a short time, we can establish a proper service. I understand what the hon. gentleman has said in reference to the stations, and I thoroughly agree with him. If he will let me out this year, I will try to have the stations in proper shape next year.

Mr. MACDONALD: When we were in Supply before, the minister promised to give me some information in reference to the coal question.

Mr. COCHRANE: I have it ready. The hon. gentleman will remember that he got most of this information once before. The statement is as follows:

Bituminous Coal.

Orders have been given for coal required on Canadian Government railways for the year 1917-18 as follows:

American Coal.

W. H. Bradford & Co., Philadelphia—95,000 gross tons at $3.45 f.o.b. cars, mine; 50,000 gross tons at $3.25 f.o.b. cars, mine.

Buffalo & Susquehanna Coal & Coke Co., Buffalo—16,000 gross tons at $3.75 f.o.b. cars, mine.

Andrew Baille Ltd., Montreal—50,000 net tons at $6.70 f.o.b. cars, St. Lambert.

Canadian Import Co., Montreal—50,000 net tons at $3 f.o.b. cars, mine.

Century Coal & Coke Co., Montreal—100,000 net tons at $6.55 f.o.b. cars, St. Hyacinthe.

Gano Moore & Co., Philadelphia—9,360 net tons at $5.50 f.o.b. pier, Philadelphia and Newport News.

Valley Camp Coal Co., Cleveland—20,000 to 40,000 net tons at $2.50 f.o.b. cars, mine.

Canadian Coal.

Dominion Coal Co., Sydney—160,000 net tons at $3.79 f.o.b. cars, Sydney; 50,000 net tons at $4.60 (plus trimming if required), f.o.b. vessel, Sydney or Louisburg; 50,000 net tons screened at $4.02 f.o.b. cars, C. G. Ry., Springhill Jct.; 30,000 net tons at $3.79 f.o.b. cars, C. G. Ry., Springhill Jct.; 20,000 net tons slack at $3.79 f.o.b. cars, C. G. Ry., Springhill Jct.

Nova Scotia Steel & Coal Co., New Glasgow —3,010 gross tons at $4.25 f.o.b. vessel, N. Sydney.

Bras d'Or Coal Co., North Sydney—10,000 gross tons at $4.25 f.o.b. cars, Bras d'Or.

Milford Coal Co., Coalburn—5,000 gross tons at $4.25 f.o.b. cars, C. G. Ry.

Intercolonial Coal Mining Co., Westville—90,000 net tons screened at $4.02 f.o.b. cars, C. G. Ry. (what coal shipped to P.E.I. at $4.25 f.o.b. cars, their shipping pier, Pictou Harbour); 3,000 net tons slack at $3.73 f.o.b. cars, their shipping pier.

Acadia Coal Co., Stellarton—25,000 gross tons at $4.25 in pile.

Maritime Coal, Railway & Power Co., Joggins—100,000 gross tons at $4.25 f.o.b. cars, C. G. Ry., Caccan.

Minudie Coal Co., River Hebert—5,000 gross tons screened at $4.50 f.o.b. cars, Maccan.

[Mr. Cochrane.]

Jones & McKinnon, Caccan—8,000 gross tons screened at $4.50 f.o.b. cars, Maccan.

Sterling Coal Co., River Hebert—Small quantity at $3.79 net ton f.o.b. cars, Maccan.

Dr. M. F. Keith, Moncton—7,200 gross tons screened at $4.50 f.o.b. cars, Adamsville.

Mr. MACDONALD: The department paid the freight from the Pennsylvania mines?

Mr. COCHRANE: In some cases.

Mr. MACDONALD: I assume that the figures that the minister has given as to the prices of coal delivered at some point on his road indicate the amount that would be added to the cost of the coal f.o.b. cars in United States.

Mr. COCHRANE: I can give the hon gentleman the cases in which the freights were prepaid, and the prices. The Andrew Baille Company, for instance, 50,000 tons, delivered at St. Lambert, $6.70. Century Coal Company, Montreal, 100,000 tons, $6.55. The others, I think, are at prices which include freight and duty.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister has given us in certain cases the prices paid for coal at St. Lambert or St. Hyacinthe, delivered. The difference between that amount and the amount which he has given under other contracts for coal f.o.b. cars in Pennsylvania would indicate the amount of freight paid and thus give us some idea of the cost of coal delivered in Canada as compared with the cost of Nova Scotia coal.

Mr. COCHRANE: I think that the prices would be a litle cheaper on the American coal, including the freight from the mines to those places in Quebec. As I stated when we were on the Estimates before, we bought two boats for running coal up to Chaudiére and other places. We had to put one of them in the dry-dock, but it will be ready in a day or two. The other has made about six trips.

Mr. MACDONALD: Will the minister explain the changes that have taken place in the Intercolonial consequent upon the resignation of Mr. Gutelius? Did Mr. Gutelius leave of his own accord? There is some misapprehension about that.

Mr. COCHRANE: He left of his own accord; he is getting $5,000 a year more than we were giving him. The people with whom he has gone knew him; they had worked together before.

Mr. MACDONALD: What about the changes that have been made? Who has taken his place?

Mr. COCHRANE: Mr. Hayes has been appointed general manager of the Eastern Division and Mr. Brady of the Western.

Mr. MACDONALD: What is Mr. McNeilly?

Mr. COCHRANE: He is general superintendent. There has been no change in his position.

Mr. MACDONALD: What is Mr. L. F. Brown's position?

Mr. COCHRANE: Assistant to Mr. McNeilly.

Mr. MACDONALD: Over what territory has he jurisdiction?

Mr. COCHRANE: Over the Intercolonial and the Transcontinental east of Quebec.

Mr. MACDONALD: Does the minister expect to take over this autumn the operation of the connection between Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island by the use of the car ferry between Carleton Head and Cape Tormentine?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD: Will the minister discontinue the connection between Pictou and Charlottetown and between Summerside and Point du Chene when he does that?

Mr. COCHRANE: We have not decided that; the matter is under consideration. Perhaps we shall have to operate that service as well as the car ferry.

Mr. MACDONALD: I think the opinion of the people of Prince Edward Island is that it would be better to maintain steamboat connection between those points than to centralize the whole service in the car ferry. The car ferry is a very satisfactory steamer; it is a good boat and has done very well, particularly in winter. The minister has told us that naturally no one could expect during war time the tremendous expenditure that would be necessary for the changing of the grade of the Prince Edward Island railway. To make the connection between Price Edward Island and the mainland dependent upon the one link between Cape Tormentine and Carleton Head would, I am sure, not be satisfactory to Prince Edward Island; certainly it would not be satisfactory to the mainland. Although the adoption of a standard gauge on the Prince Edward Island railway would result in convenience in the moving of cars across the straits, the inconvenience and the dislocation of trade that would be occasioned in a province such as that province is, with its seaports at every part and with the well-settled lines of travel from Charlottetown and Summerside, by attempting to divert it to this particular point until new conditions had arisen, would be very great, and I suggested to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and I would like to suggest to the Minister of Railways, having regard to conditions during the war, the advisability of maintaining the communications by the old line until the time arises, if it ever does arise, when the standard gauge will be put on the Prince Edward Island railway. I hope the minister will take that course. It will be in the interest of the country, and there does not seem to be any reason why, under existing conditions, there should be any dislocation of the old passenger routes when you have not the facilities which you would have if the gauge were changed.

10 p.m.

Mr. COCHRANE: As I have said before, the matter is under consideration, and we will certainly remember what the hon. gentleman has said in reference to it.

Mr. BOULAY: Is there anything in this estimate for a tunnel or subway at St. Fabien?

Mr. COCHRANE: No.

Mr. BOULAY: Is there anything provided for a new station on the division between Campbellton and Rivière du Loup?

Mr. COCHRANE: No.

Mr. BOULAY: Is there anything provided for the building of a tank near St. Leon le Grand on the Intercolonial?

Mr. COCHRANE: There is not any in the Estimates, but if there was a tank there before, a renewal would have to be made out of earnings instead of out of capital.

Mr. BOULAY: In regard to St. Fabien, of course, while the war is on, I have not been insisting on that improvement, but it is such a dangerous place, and the people there have been annoyed for so many years by the trains crossing at that station, that as soon as possible after the war is over, I would like if the minister would provide a subway for the people to cross. I have travelled from Montreal to Halifax over the Intercolonial railway, and I have not seen another crossing where the people are so much bothered by the trains. During the winter they are compelled to wait half an hour or forty-five minutes, and any one who is accustomed to deal with trainmen knows that they are not always obliging enough to afford facilities for the people to cross. The poor farmers have to wait with loads for about half an hour before crossing on account of the road being blocked by the trains. I have complained to the superintendent several times, but the reply has always been that the matter will be seen to. There are many trains passing through every day, and the people, from the beginning to the end of the year, and principally in the winter time, suffer considerable inconveniences. This subway should have been constructed long ago. Some time in 1910 one was built, but it was not at the proper place, and we could have done without that subway for a few years more. The one that it wanted is at the station. I understand that some large expenditures are to be made at Halifax. I do not know much about the circumstances there, but from the criticism of my hon. friends opposite, I think perhaps it would not hurt them very much if a few thousand dollars were cut out of that amount and expended in my county. In regard to the tank at St. Leonard, it is greatly required. Nearly every day during last winter trains were kept about two hours behind time just on account of being obliged to take in water from a hose instead of from a tank. There is another improvement that should be made on the International railway, and that is that waiting rooms should be provided at two important stations, that is, Kedgewick and Anderson. The first village has a population of about 2,000, and the second about 3,000. The waiting room at each is only about eight feet square, and is for both ladies and gentlemen. For a small expense something could be done to improve the situation so that the people would have more convenience while waiting for trains. I have already spoken —and perhaps I have annoyed the minister—in regard to the personnel on the Intercolonial railway on the division between Campbellton and Mont Joli. I want to come back to his matter again, and I will do so until I get satisfaction. I see that there has been a change on the Intercolonial since the last time we discussed it in the House, but this change does not give me any more satisfaction than I had before.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I have heard it stated that the hon. member himself was slated for the general managership of the Canadian Government Railway system. Is that correct? If it is, I do not wonder that he is not satisfied.

Mr. BOULAY: I do not know where the hon. gentleman got the information, but it is not correct. I never asked for any position on the Intercolonial railway. I see that Mr. Louis Brown has been appointed assistant to the general manager. The poor Frenchmen in Quebec are no good for anything; they cannot be superintendents; they cannot be assistant superintendents. When there is a vacancy on the Intercolonial, officers to fill it are sought in New Brunswick or Nova Scotia. I am not jealous of my friends from Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, but what I want is justice for my province. It is all right for the Frenchmen to go to the front, to shoulder a rifle, but when we come to ask for positions on the Intercolonial, we do not get fair treatment. Other hon. gentlemen from the province of Quebec as well as myself have given plenty of reasons why the French Canadians are not as fond of enlisting as are the people of the other provinces. One reason is because we are not treated fairly.

We are not treated fairly as regards such positions as superintendent and assistant general manager, which positions our men could easily fill. I do not want to say anything against Mr. Louis Brown. I have known him for 33 years, and I was employed on the Intercolonial railway at the same time he was, but because he comes from New Brunswick or Nova Scotia, and does not speak French, is no reason why he should be given the position in preference to a French Canadian from the province of Quebec. The county of Bonaventure and part of the county of Rimouski have always been under the rule of New Brunswick. Why is it that the people of Quebec are not allowed to run their own affairs? When I spoke on behalf of some of my friends some time ago I was told that men qualified for the position could not be got in the province of Quebec. The Government never even tried these men; they did not even know who they were. In the province of Quebec we have men just as well qualified as the men of the provinces of New Brunswick or Nova Scotia, and we are just as jealous of our rights as the people of any other province. It was a good chance to give us fair play when the change was made in the management of the road, I do not see why justice is not done to our province, at least as regards these minor positions.

Only twelve miles of the road from Mont Joli to Campbellton is in the province of New Brunswick; the rest of the 105 miles is in the province of Quebec, and yet the despatcher's office is in New Brunswick. The line between Lévis and Rivière du Loup is controlled by the despatching office at Lévis. Every one who is familiar with this district knows what is the situation from Lévis to Rivière du Loup. The despatching office is at Lévis. For the section between Rivière du Loup and Mont Joli, the despatcher's office is at Rivière du Loup. Why is not the despatcher's office at Mont Joli for the division Mont Joli to Campbellton? Why not do justice to our province? Our men are quite competent to fill these positions. The despatchers know nothing about the condition of the road in the province of Quebec. Sometimes they do not even know the distance between the stations, except by referring to the sheets; they do not know the agents, and they do not know the grades. This is not in the interests of the road, because being unfamiliar with the grades they will put trains in the sidings needlessly for two or three hours. If the despatching was done from Mont Joli by men who knew the road this would not happen. It would be better for the railway, and it would only be doing justice to the population of the counties of Rimouski, Bonaventure and Matane.

Some justice has been done to our province as regards the less important positions. The conditions have improved in that respect since Mr. Gutelius became manager of the road. Previous to that, masons, foremen, carpenters, bridge repairers and so on would be sent from Moncton to repair our bridges and do the ordinary labouring work on the road. I spoke to Mr. Gutelius about this, and he agreed that it was only fair that the work west of Campbellton should be done by men from the province of Quebec. But the big positions are not given to the men of our province, and it is high time that we got satisfaction in this respect.

If it is impossible to make two divisions of the road between Montreal and Campbellton— the distance is 475 miles and the divisions in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia are a good deal shorter than that— let us have one division, and let the superintendent at Lévis have charge of the whole line from Montreal to Campbellton with an assistant superintendent, chosen from amongst the French Canadians of our own province. Let us have a board of telegraph despatchers at Mont Joli, as they have at other places, and we will be satisfied.

Mr. COCHRANE: There is no doubt that the subway is very much needed. I am very glad that my hon. friend is willing to put up with the present conditions until finances are a little easier. I have given some attention to having an assistant superintendent at Mont Joli, and I hope to accomplish something in that direction before long.

Mr. COPP: I think there is a great deal in the complaint made by my hon. friend from Rimouski in regard to the appointment of officials on the Intercolonial railway. I do not know that New Brunswick and Nova Scotia are to blame as regards the officials on that portion of the road running through the constituency of my hon. friend. The complaint I would make is that the high salaried positions on the road are filled by men from outside the Dominion. I am sure the minister will agree that we have men on the Intercolonial whose training and experience makes them quite competent to fill these positions. But this matter has been discussed in the House several times, and I do not propose going into it now. I understand that the Government systems of railways has been divided into two portions with a manager for the eastern section and another for the western section. Does this involve any increased cost, and what are the salaries of the managers?

Mr. COCHRANE: So far, the two men are receiving the salaries they got before, but there has been a demand for an increase in the salaries of both managers. Even if the proposed increase is granted, the total cost of the management will be less than it was before.

Mr. COPP: That is a matter for congratulation. I am sure that the promotion of Mr. Hayes from general traffic manager to general manager meets with the approval of the people along the eastern section of the road. Of course, he is a new man, and has not had much experience as a general manager, but his promotion is very gratifying to the people down there. I think that his salary as traffic manager was $10,000 a year with free house rent. I would suggest to the minister that, in keeping with the policy of economy which the Government has pronounced in favour of so very often, Mr. Hayes might very well get along on his present salary, especially during these war times.

Mr. COCHRANE: As a matter of fact he does pay rent.

Mr. COPP: Then, I beg your pardon. I understood the house was furnished him free by the Government.

Mr. COCHRANE: No, they all pay rent.

Mr. COPP: During the past few years, efforts have been made to avoid the grade between Sackville and Dorchester. Many surveying parties have been over that section of the line, but I have never heard of any conclusion being arrived at. Has the minister any report on the matter?

Mr. COCHRANE: We have spent considerable money in surveying to get the best route possible, and had it not been for the war I have no doubt we would have made the change before this. Of course the hon. gentleman understands we will have to build nearly 100 miles to get around the grade he speaks of. Last winter the line from Truro to Halifax was exceedingly busy. There is certainly not in Canada, and I question whether there is on the continent, a single track line that did as much business as that line last year. We would be very glad indeed if we could go on with the work, but it is impossible now. I think we have a grade there that will give satisfaction; it is four-tenths grade both ways.

Mr. COPP: I understand the Government has located a road that will eliminate the grade.

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Coming back for a moment to the Halifax expenditure, I have turned up the minister's speech of June 11th, and I find he did not give any estimate of the cost of the improvements made at the Halifax terminals. I notice the minister has his officers with him, and I have no doubt he has the information.

Mr. COCHRANE: $3,400,000, up to February last.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Does that include the branch railway?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Can the minister tell us how much that railroad cost per mile, or what was the total cost of the branch railroad.

Mr. COCHRANE: I have not the information to-night. I will get it for my hon. friend.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Are we to understand that the $3,000,000 we are voting now, in addition to the expenditure already made, will complete the terminals at Halifax?

Mr. COCHRANE: Complete that unit, which is all we propose going on with at present. It will not complete the station. It will complete the hydraulic work and the docks, but the station will have to be built afterwards.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What will the station cost?

Mr. COCHRANE: I believe the estimate for the station and train shed is something over $1,000,000.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is the station at Halifax to be near the docks?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: And, I suppose the old station will be abandoned?

Mr. COCHRANE: We will make use of it for something.

Mr. McKENZIE: When the minister was last before the committee on his estimates, I made a request for certain information in regard to cost of maintenance on the Intercolonial railway beyond the Strait of Canso and to Sydney, in two different years, for the purpose of comparison. Has the minister the information?

Mr. COCHRANE: The amount spent for betterments between Point Tupper and Sydney, both inclusive, for the fiscal year ended March 31st, was $180,600.

Mr. McKENZIE: I wrote the hon. minister a letter which is no doubt on his file. If he will consult it, he will find I asked for a good deal more information than he has given. Possibly the information may be forthcoming at some other time. I presume the figures just mentioned includes the building of the new bridge across the Grand Narrows.

Mr. COCHRANE: No, I do not think it would.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Has the minister had any request from the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to improve the appliances for the transportation of fresh fish from Nova Scotia to Montreal and Toronto?

Mr. COCHRANE: No, I have not had any request. In what way would the hon. gentleman suggest improvements should be made?

Mr. SINCLAIR: No doubt the minister is aware that a very lengthy and important investigation was held last year before a committee of this House on this question of improving the transportation of fresh fish. In the course of that inquiry we discovered that the business between the Eastern seaboard and the market is in a very backward state, and that it is not growing as satisfactorily as we would like.

Everybody knows that fresh fish is the most perishable of all products, and that if it is not quickly placed on the market it becomes useless. The Canadian Pacific railway have developed a very large trade from the Pacific coast to the eastern markets by means of improved facilities for carrying fish, which we have not yet in eastern Canada. It is a reproach to the Intercolonial that, after it has been running for forty years we are to-day not able to send a box of fresh fish in ice from the eastern seaboard to Montreal in an express train.

Mr. COCHRANE: You would not be able to do that from Vancouver.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I think so, they are doing it now.

Mr. COCHRANE: You can send a car, but not a box.

Mr. SINCLAIR: We will never be able to develop the trade in eastern Canada until we can do that. The western trade is carried on because it is handled in very large quantities. The fish is taken in refrigerator cars and the minister will find, if he looks into it, that it is delivered at proportionately a very much cheaper rate from western Canada to the eastern markets than it is delivered over the short haul from the eastern seaboard to the markets of Montreal and Toronto. Surely we can get some system by which small quantities of fresh fish can be sent in ice from the Atlantic coast to the cities in Canada. The system exists in all other civilized countries. In the United States, fish that is landed at Boston, one of the largest fish markets in the world, is distributed over the eastern states as far west as Chicago and delivered in good condition in express trains.

Mr. COCHRANE: By carloads.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Not all by carloads, by smaller lots also. The evidence in the investigation was that it was sent in small lots as well as in carloads and I do not think there can be any good reason why that cannot be done.

Mr. COCHRANE: Can you get fish now anyway? Is not the overseas demand so great that there is no surplus?

Mr. SINCLAIR: Of course the trade is a little abnormal at present on account of the war and the demand for fresh fish on the Atlantic coast is so large that it can hardly be met and the prices are good. But that will not last very long. That has been going on for the last year or so because frozen fish is being sent over to the troops on the other side. But we have to develop one or other market; we must get into the American market or into the Canadian market if we are to build up a large fish industry. We are depending on the Intercolonial to get into the Canadian market, and it is up to the minister to find some means of doing this. As it is at present, if you want to send a ton or half a ton of fresh fish from Halifax or Mulgrave to Montreal, you have to send it in a heated car. You put your fish in the box with the ice and put it on board a car where there are steam pipes, and by the time it gets half way the is ice is melted, the fish is soft and unfit for use. That is the present condition with small lots of fish. With a great railway system of that kind there must be some method of overcoming that difficulty. One proposal was what is called a peddler car by which these small lots could be delivered at various points along the road on some express trains. I am not able to propose a system to the minister, but if he will read the evidence taken by that committee he will find that the present conditions are not satisfactory. The Intercolonial should take that matter up and deal with it so as to enable us in Eastern Canada to get into the Canadian market with good fish. It is needed in those cities; it is the best kind of food, and it would be appreciated if the people could get it in good condition. Why is it that we cannot get a nice piece of fresh fish from Eastern Canada in any restaurant or hotel in the city of Ottawa?

Mr. COCHRANE: You cannot get it in Halifax.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Generally you can. I do not think it is the experience of the people of Ontario that they get the fish from the seaboard in good shape.

Mr. COCHRANE: I think that is quite right.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I mean the ordinary every-day fish such as mackerel, cod and haddock. Cod and haddock are caught practically the year round, and it should be delivered in such shape that you could depend upon getting it in prime condition in any hotel. The whole trouble lies with our transportation system.

Mr. COCHRANE: I shall be very glad not only to read the report of that committee myself, but to send it to my officers and have them read it and see if some system cannot be devised before the war ceases which will help out in the fish business, because there is no doubt that fish is an excellent food which is quite unfit for use if not in good condition.

Mr. COPP: Will the vote for the car ferry and construction of terminals for the Prince Edward Island ferry be part of the contract price, or is that an extra?

Mr. COCHRANE: That is to complete the work; it is part of the contract.

Railways and Canals—Chargeable to Capital. Hudson Bay Railway—Construction of railway terminals and elevators, $3,000,000.

Mr. ROBB: Can the minister inform the committee if the National Transcontinental has an interchange of rates with the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian Northern railway at points to and from the Northwest?

Mr. COCHRANE: There are through rates on each road. I do not suppose the Canadian Pacific would turn us over any freight, nor will the Canadian Northern. We have to depend on getting our freight from Winnipeg through the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. ROBB: I think the minister should have an official to look into the question. I understand the National Transcontinental railway and the Grand Trunk Pacific, like all railways in Canada, are very arbitrary in their dealings with other roads. I will give the minister a concrete case. They quote a rate on flour from Portage la Prairie of 36 cents a hundred pounds to Manuan, a short distance west of Quebec. The rate would be 34 cents from St. Boniface, but a mill situated 100 miles south on the Canadian Pacific, or Canadian Northern line, cannot get this particular rate unless they pay an extra ten cents, pay the local rate from the point of shipment to the nearest Grand Trunk Pacific point, plus the through rate from there. I suggest to the minister that this sort of thing should be stopped on all the railways in Canada, and it is up to the Government railways to compel the other roads to make a fair exchange of rates. It will help them to get business, and it will help the National Transcontinental railway, because they will have reciprocal advantages.

Mr. COCHRANE: That matter is under the Railway Commission.

Mr. ROBB: The minister should see that the grievance is remedied. Another matter in which the railways are very arbitrary is in regard to the exchange of cars on their different roads. All last winter, as the minister knows, traffic throughout Canada was practically tied up, and the railways were so arbitrary that you could not get stuff delivered from Montreal. I must say that the Canadian Northern gave as good service as any of them, but they arbitrarily stated, "You must take delivery of this stuff on our tracks. You cannot ship it out on any branch lines." I think that should be corrected. A shipper does not want to go to the expense of transferring from one car to another, and the railway should be compelled to have an interchange of business, so that we would not be tied up, as we were last winter.

Mr. COCHRANE: The trouble last winter was that pretty nearly every railroad on the continent was tied up for the want of cars, and it was practically, I won't say stealing, but getting hold of the cars, and keeping them as long as they could. I have tried this year to get our own road in such shape that we will be more independent of them in the lower provinces. We are in bad shape in that respect. There is so much pulpwood shipped down there that it takes our cars over to the United States, and it is almost impossible to get them back. We scarcely ever have less than five or six thousand cars over there, and it makes a big hole in our system of cars. It became so bad last year on all roads that we had to put an embargo on it. I will bring it to Sir Henry Drayton's attention and see what can be done.

Mr. ROBB: Part of this congestion was caused by the railways themselves, and they would admit it when you went to them. They had an inefficient staff in their offices. Their good men had gone away, and they were taking whatever men they could get. They were using very arbitrary methods, not allowing cars to go off their own tracks, because of the congestion, and it tied up their own yards. The minister should see that this practice is stopped, and that the railways shall allow traffic to flow freely. Let them look after their own cars.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The trouble was that there were too many cars. All the sidings were filled with cars from Montreal to Nova Scotia.

Mr. COCHRANE: That was after the embargo in Montreal. The Grand Trunk put an embargo on the cars, and would not allow a car to be taken away, and we had to run trains from Halifax to Montreal empty, on account of our overseas traffic.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I hope it will not occur this year. It was a great loss to the business people of Eastern Canada. I have known men who were getting a carload of pig iron to send a man to stay with the car, and when the car was placed on the siding, the man got off the train, and waited for days, till he managed, by giving tips and all kinds of schemes, to get the car on the track again, and finally, after several weeks' delay, he reached home with his carload of pig iron. If he had not been able to do that, his factory would have been closed down, and his hands idle. Those were the difficulties people had last year. I hope that if there is any way of preventing it, the minister will take care that it shall not occur this winter.

Mr. COCHRANE: I hope not.

Mr. OLIVER: I wish to bring to the minister's attention a condition that arose in Edmonton last winter, or last fall. It is under the jurisdiction of the Railway Commission, but we have no means of reaching that body. The three railroad systems, the Canadian Pacific railway, the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern all run to Edmonton and radiate from there. There are coal mines on all three lines in the neighbourhood of Edmonton, but it happens that there is only one of these mines, if I remember correctly, on the Canadian Pacific Railway line. The others are on the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Northern. It also happens that the Canadian Pacific railway has the largest system of distributing lines in the prairies. The coal mines sell their own coal, and the coal mine that is on the Grand Trunk line, we will say, sells coal on the Canadian Pacific Railway line or on the Canadian Northern, as the case may be. It is desirable that it should be so, and up to last fall there was no difficulty in getting the necessary cars. I do not know what the arrangement was previous to the time the condition complained of arose, but it was about the time of the coal strike in southern Alberta, when there was a pinch of cold weather. The coal mines in Edmonton had plenty of labour, and plenty of demands for their coal, and all of a sudden one bright day an order was issued by the railroads that they would not exchange cars. That is to say, the Grand Trunk would not supply cars to take coal from a point on their line to a point on the Canadian Pacific railway.

Mr. COCHRANE: How many miles is it from the mine to the Canadian Pacific railway?

Mr. OLIVER: From three to five miles; it is only a short haul. The mines that I speak of are within a few miles of the city. It had simply been a matter of shunting, and the companies had been co-operating amicably, with great benefit to the coal trade. Suddenly the companies refused to exchange cars. The Canadian Northern railway would take coal from one point to another on their own line, but they would not give a car to take coal from a mine on their line to a point on another line. It was the same all round, and businesss was shut out at once. The coal miners appealed to the Railway Commission, and an order was issued by that body. But even after the issuing of that order, the railways had apparently made up their minds to be ugly—why, I do not know. They obeyed the order of the Railway Commission, but so grudgingly as to make the order not as of much benefit as it should have been. I cannot understand why an enterprise like a railroad should take an attitude which is detrimental to their own business. The railroads should understand, great enterprises though they be, that their business is to serve the people.

Mr. MACDONALD: I saw in the press not long ago a report that 5,000 box cars had been ordered by the Railway Department. Where were they ordered, and when is delivery expected?

Mr. COCHRANE: 1,000 were ordered from the Eastern Car Company of New Glasgow, 1,000 from the Rhodes Currie Company, 3,000 from the Canada Car Company, Fort William, and 1,000 from the National Car Company of Hamilton—6,000 in all. We hope to get the greater portion of them before the end of the year. As my hon. friend knows, we are often disappointed in these deliveries, but they have promised delivery and have agreed to pay a penalty of 75 cents a day for each day of non-fulfilment of contract for delivery.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Is there a standard price?

Mr. COCHRANE: The price is whatever we can get the cars for. During the last month there has been a raise of nearly $300 on each car.

Mr. McKENZIE: Are these steel cars?

Mr. COCHRANE: Steel frame. It is impossible to get a steel car now.

Mr. ROBB: Are the railways making provision to get a sufficient supply of coal for next year's operations?

Mr. COCHRANE: I have been trying hard to get a good supply, but it is coming in very slowly. We are pressing the matter as hard as we possibly can. The Government has brought the matter to the attention of the Fuel Controller, and we have appointed a man on the other side to follow up the shipments and see that they come over. The Railway Commission has undertaken to keep the cars moving when they get on this side. We are directing our efforts to securing a supply not only for the railways but for the general public as well.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not know whether I have discussed with the minister the embargo that was placed by the railroads of Alberta last winter upon the shipment of grain east. From time to time the railroads refused to haul grain, and we were told that an embargo had been placed on the carrying of grain to Fort William. Can the minister give any reason why that condition existed and tell us whether it is within the law for a railway company to refuse to haul grain?

Mr. COCHRANE: Congestion on the railways or in the elevators is the only reason I can see for the placing of an embargo upon the carrying of grain to Fort William. Two years ago the Canadian Pacific railway absolutely refused to take grain shipped by the Grand Trunk Pacific, although there was room in their elevators. They controlled the elevator space as well as the tracks running to the elevators; so much so that in some cases we had to haul grain back from Fort William to Quebec or Montreal.

Mr. OLIVER: I can appreciate the difficulties of the year before last, when the crop was abnormally large. But last year there was no such crop to block the roads. According to the records in the Trade and Commerce reports, the elevators at Fort William were never in a condition that they could not receive grain. Nevertheless, the railroads refused to haul grain there.

[Mr. Cochrane.]

They would accept grain to be deliv-
11 p.m. ered at the interior storage elevators at certain times, but they would not furnish cars to be delivered at Fort William. A railroad, being a common carrier, must carry to order, subject to its ability to do so; but in this case there was a public announcement that the railroad had placed an embargo upon—that is, had refused to carry—grain from the local elevators to Fort William. Does the minister believe that the railroad is within its rights in doing that?

Mr. COCHRANE: I agree that if it is within their power to carry the grain, they must carry it. However, owing to my illness last winter I am not as familiar with the matter as I should be. I hope that this year there will be no such difficulties.

Mr. OLIVER: I desire, then, formally to bring the matter to the minister's attention and to ask his protection in the future, so that the railroads shall be required to discharge their duty to the public, subject to the ordinary limitations of possibility. It struck me as a most arbitrary action that they should publicly announce their intention not to haul grain after a certain date from one point on their system to another.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Where is the minister going to get his coal for the Hudson Bay railway? I assume that he intends to run it this winter.

Mr. COCHRANE: I am afraid that we will not

Mr. SINCLAIR: It is absurd that we should vote $3,000,000 to spend on the Hudson Bay railway when it will be of no use to anybody even if it is completed in November. At all events, it will be of no use during the winter season. It is an insane proceeding to spend money on a project of that kind at a time like this, especially in view of the fact that if it were ready, there would be no traffic and no possibility of getting coal to run the road.

Mr. COCHRANE: I do not agree that there is no possibility of getting coal to run the road after it is finished. I think the road will certainly justify its construction. In any case, the contracts were all let before the war, and it is sometimes hard to get out of a contract. The penalty is too heavy.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I do not take the ground that the road will never be of any use. I do not know. But my point is that at the present time when the minister is very properly saving money in other directions, this is a case in which he ought to save money.

Mr. COCHRANE: The contractors have their plant and a quantity of material on the road, and the penalty on us, if we were to shut down the work would be very severe. I admit that if we could shut down the work without too much expense, that matter would be well worth considering, but I am afraid the expense would be too great. The contractor would be justified, if we did so, in demanding a heavy bill of damages. I think the hon. member will understand that.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Does the minister intend to work the road this winter?

Mr. COCHRANE: I do not think we shall.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I understood, in the statement made to the House some weeks ago, that in November it would be ready to Port Nelson.

Mr. COCHRANE: That is true.

Mr. ROBB: Are many men employed at present in the construction of the Hudson Bay railway?

Mr. COCHRANE: I understand there are more men this year than there were a year ago. The contractor got the men early this year and he was more successful in getting them. The road was delayed considerably a year ago.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I suppose he will get some soldiers up there.

Mr. COCHRANE: No, I think the men are regular railroaders.

Mr. MACDONALD: Will the minister give us the last figures he has in regard to the cost of operation of the Transcontinental railway and the receipts?

Mr. COCHRANE: I gave a very full account of both the Intercolonial and the Transcontinental some weeks ago. The hon. member will find the figures on page 2296 of Hansard.

Mr. MACDONALD: Will the minister tell us whether he has been hauling grain on that road?

Mr. COCHRANE: We did not haul much last year.

Mr. MACDONALD: Has he hauled some?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes, we hauled some oats to Quebec.

Mr. MACDONALD: What has been the general character of the traffic? Has it been mostly from West to East or from East to West?

Mr. COCHRANE: At certain seasons of the year the traffic is mostly from East to West, and at other seasons from West to East.

Mr. MACDONALD: Have the terminals of the Transcontinental at Quebec been completed, and is the minister in a position to ship from the cars which he sends East?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: Will the lifting of the rails on the east end of the road interfere in any degree with traffic facilities?

Mr. COCHRANE: If I remember aright, I informed the hon. member that we replaced the sidings with second-hand rails. Of course, the facilities are not as satisfactory as they were before, because we had so much room not only at the sidings but at divisional points. The traffic is somewhat impeded, but we hope to overcome that as soon as the war is over.

Mr. MACDONALD: Has the minister settled all the claims in connection with the construction of the railway?

Mr. COCHRANE: No. There are still some at Winnipeg and some in Quebec, and, I think, at one or two other places. It seems almost impossible to get them settled. Some people do not want to go into the Exchequer Court, and I do not want to pay the big prices they are asking. The case of Mackenzie and Mann at Winnipeg went into the Exchequer Court, and then it was appealed. It has not yet been decided whether they will take it to the Privy Council or not. The claim is for quite an amount.

Mr. MACDONALD: A number of claims have not gone to court for adjudication?

Mr. COCHRANE: A number have not. Outside of Mackenzie and Mann's claim, the others are all small.

Mr. MACDONALD: Mackenzie and Mann's claim would be in regard to terminals, not construction.

Mr. COCHRANE: For right of way and terminals also.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister is asking for an appropriation for claims for right of way of $500,000. Will that amount pay all the claims for the right of way?

Mr. COCHRANE: I hope so, but I am not sure. As I say, there has been great difficulty in getting proper settlement with the claimants. As my hon. friend knows, if any person has a claim against the Government he wants to salt it. I want to do what is fair and right, and I hope this amount will cover all the claims.

Mr. OLIVER: Did I understand the minister to say that the lifting of the rails would not interfere with traffic?

Mr. COCHRANE: Not on the Transcontinental.

Mr. OLIVER: That is what I mean. Perhaps the minister has available the information in regard to the lifting of the rails west of Edmonton. I notice in the Edmonton papers that some of the Edmonton settlers who are on the Canadian Northern, the rails of which have been lifted to be transferred to the Grand Trunk, are making very serious complaints. Have those complaints reached the minister?

Mr. COCHRANE: Some of them have and we are investigating the claim of each settler to see what crop he has and what the damage to him will be. In some cases we are offering, if necessary, to take them out and put them in some other place.

Mr. OLIVER: The department is prepared to pay damages to these people.

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes, we shall have to do what is right with them in every case.

Mr. MACDONALD: Where does the minister get the recompenses for the rails and for the damages? Do they form part of the war expenditure, or are they paid by the Imperial Government?

Mr. COCHRANE: By the Imperial Government.

Mr. OLIVER: In the statement I saw in the newspapers there are some small timber limits which were operated by small local mills and which are affected by the moving of the track.

Mr. COCHRANE: There is one.

Mr. OLIVER: The timber will be taken into consideration also.

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: These people are my constituents, and I feel somewhat strongly in regard to their situation. They are pioneers. Their improvements, of course, are not very valuable from a money point of view, but they are all these people have, and they have been made in the expectation of railroad facilities. Although the distance between the track that has been lifted and the track that remains is in some cases short in miles, I want to impress on the minister that in the greater part of the country affected there is a very great deal of muskeg, and in many cases the building of a number of miles of road is involved in order that the settler may travel from the point he expected to reach on the old track to the point he is to reach on the new track. What I desire to impress on the minister is that the map does not tell the story of the difficulty that has been placed upon the settler by the lifting of the track. There should be taken into consideration not only the distance, but the actual difficulty of traversing that distance or of getting a permanent and suitable way of traversing it. The provincial government will ultimately provide the road, but they have a great many roads to provide, and they can hardly be expected to provide for the expenditure on this road which the people need, and need so suddenly by reason of the action of the Government. I hope that in dealing with this matter the Government will treat these people generously, having regard to their pioneer conditions, the enterprise that took them there, and the actual difficulties that face them as a result of the moving of the track

Mr. COCHRANE: I do not propose to be niggardly at all. I appreciate what my hon. friend has said about these people being pioneers with their all invested in that part of the country, and we shall bear that in mind in dealing with this matter.

Mr. OLIVER: There is a fairly large settlement called the Carrot Creek settlement.

Mr. COCHRANE: They get their mail from the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. OLIVER: Yes, at Peers. The distance is six or seven miles, but the map shows it to be only five, and I fancy it is a pretty bad road. There must be quite a number of settlers in that settlement, because they were there before the railway, I do not know what representations have been made to the minister, but I am just drawing to his attention that the pioneers of this settlement were there before the railroad.

Mr. COCHRANE: I think the mill was there before the railroad.

Mr. OLIVER: Very likely. I never travelled through that country before the railroad was built, but I have been on the railroad since.

Mr. MACDONALD: Referring to a previous item, last year and the year before a survey was made for a proposed short line leaving the Intercolonial at some point about Glengarry and making for the straits of Canso. Has anything been done in regard to the matter?

Mr. COCHRANE: Nothing has been done, and it is not likely that anything will be done until after the war.

Mr. COPP: About a month ago I drew the minister's attention to the taking up of the tracks leading to the Sackville wharf. The minister replied, reasonably enough, that the tracks had been taken up for shipment to France to be used by the Imperial Government. It is a matter of only a few hundred yards, and I think the officials of the road were a little panic stricken when they took up these rails, for they are pretty old, having been there for a number of years, and weigh 56 pounds. I have been home since last speaking to the minister about this, and I find that the people are absolutely held up because of the lack of this little piece of track. Is it not possible for the minister to give the people of that section this wharf accommodation?

Mr. COCHRANE: I hope to be able to do it very soon. We are getting 12,000 tons of rails rolled at Sydney, and I think most of them are ready now. As soon as we can get the rails out of the main line and put these in, we shall attend to this matter.

Mr. COPP: In the fall coal comes in by schooner, and it would be a very great convenience to the people of that section if the minister could get the rails put down at as early a date as possible.

Mr. COCHRANE: We will do it as soon as possible.

Progress reported.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Rogers, the House adjourned at 11.25 p.m.

Saturday, July 14, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

MR. O'CONNOR'S REPORT ON FOOD PRODUCTION AND COLD STORAGE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. OLIVER: May I draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) to the report that was laid on the table of the House yesterday and which was ordered to be printed? Apparently there has arisen a very interesting discussion in the public press in regard to the subject matter of the report. May I suggest that the printing be expedited as much as possible so that the House may be made aware of what it actually contains.

FISHERIES ACT, 1914, AMENDMENT.

House in committee on Bill No. 74 to amend the Fisheries Act, 1914.—Mr. Hazen.

Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Hon. J. D. HAZEN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): This Bill was submitted to the Standing Committee on Marine and Fisheries, which has considered and recommended it to the House with a few amendments.

On section 5—fishing outside territorial waters when fishing inside territorial waters is prohibited not to be carried on from Canada:

Mr. MACDONALD: Is this the Bill that my hon. friend (Mr. Hazen) introduced by way of resolution and on which we had a discussion?

Mr. HAZEN: It was introduced by resolution, discussed in the House and referred to the Committee on Marine and Fisheries, which considered and reported it to the House. The Bill provides that licenses at the nominal sum of one dollar shall be given to people operating fish canneries. They are to be required to take out a license and pay that nominal sum. That is the law now in regard to salmon and lobster factories, and it was felt that it was desirable that the same provision should apply to factories canning other fish as well in order that it might be uniform. When the Act was originally passed this provision was not necessary because there were no other factories besides lobster and salmon canneries, and they were specified. There was a provision in the Act that factories which are manufacturing oil from fish could not operate within fifty miles of one another. This has been found to be altogether unnecessary. No ill-effect has occurred because of their being nearer one another, and this Bill changes the law in that respect. The next section is in regard to fish guards. Fish guards are now compulsory in the case of irrigation ditches running into streams. It has been found that this is not necessary in some cases, and the law thus causes needless hardship. The Bill provides that guards shall be placed only where the minister, or the officers of his department, think it is necessary to provide them for the preservation of fish. Then, there is a section changing the name of dogfish to grayfish.

On section 6—returns of quantity of fish caught, etc.:

Mr. MARCIL: In view of what appears in to-day's paper to the effect that the food controller has taken it upon himself to appoint a special committee to look after the inland fisheries of Canada for the purpose of bringing the fresh fish supply within the reach of the consumers of Central Canada at reasonable prices and still give a legitimate return to the fishermen, is it contemplated to limit the operations of this committee merely to fresh fish, or is the same provision to be later on applied in regard to ocean fish?

Mr. HAZEN: I have seen the paragraph to which my hon. friend (Mr. Marcil) refers. It tells of some action taken by the food controller. We have had no communication with the food controller on the matter. When I saw this paragraph to-day I gave instructions to have the information we have in our department communicated to him, together with the intimation that we would be very happy to render any assistance we could. What the food controller apparently has in mind is the fish that are caught in the inland waters—whitefish, salmon trout and fish of that character. There have been complaints in the past that while very large quantities of fish are being caught in our inland waters, they are being shipped to the United States, especially the Chicago market. I presume the food controller, Mr. Hanna, has it in mind to make some arrangement by which these fish will be more available to the consumers of Canada and will be more generally distributed in this country. I gave instructions to send him the information we have dealing with the subject, and we will be very glad to cooperate with him in any way that seems practicable.

Mr. MARCIL: If the food controller should take similar action with regard to the ocean fisheries I suppose the department will co-operate with him?

Mr. HAZEN: We will give him any assistance we can.

Mr. SHEPHERD: I was under the impression that while this Bill was in committee paragraphs (b) and (f) of this section would be so amended as to provide that not only should a return of the number of fishermen and shore workers be given, but that the return should also include their nationality. Has the minister any reason to offer why the particulars should be omitted?

Mr. HAZEN: This Bill was before the Committee on Marine and Fisheries and was amended. Subsection "e" now reads:

The number of fishermen employed and their nationality.

That meets the hon. gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. SHEPHERD: Yes.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

MEAT AND CANNED FOODS ACT AMENDMENT.

House in Committee on Bill No. 73, to amend the Meat and Canned Foods Act—Mr. Hazen—Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Mr. HAZEN: This Bill was introduced by resolution, and was discussed in the House on the 7th June last, and was referred to the Committee on Marine and Fisheries, which considered the measure and made a report to the House, recommending the Bill, with certain amendments. I explained to the House that about two years ago the administration of the Meat and Canned Foods Act, so far as concerned canned fish and canned shellfish, was transferred from the Department of Agriculture to the Department of Naval Affairs. The work is carried on at the present time by the fishery inspectors throughout the country. But it was found that it was impossible for them, in addition to their other duties, to inspect the different canneries, and, in order to carry out the work of inspection, certain amendments had to be made in the Meat and Canned Foods Act. The committee made certain suggestions in regard to one section, and after consideration it was thought desirable to change the prescribed weights of meat in the cans.

On Section 12 D—contents and sizes of cans of lobster:

Mr. COPP: Suggestions were made in the committee with regard to the size and weight of the cans. Can the minister tell us if the section was left as the committee adopted it?

Mr. HAZEN: Section 12 D now reads:

Cans of lobster shall contain the following minimum amount of dry lobster meat:
A one-pound can, sixteen ounces avoirdupois;
A three-quarter pound can, twelve ounces avoirdupois;
A half-pound can, eight ounces avoirdupois.
A quarter-pound can, four ounces avoirdupois.
A picnic can, twelve ounces avoirdupois.
No other size of can shall be packed, unless the written permission of the minister has first been obtained.

The hon. gentleman will remember that that was the amendment agreed to, after discussion.

Section adopted.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

ST. JOHN AND QUEBEC RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. COCHRANE moved the second reading of Bill 91, to amend the St. John and Quebec Railway Act. He said: This Bill was introduced at the request of the New Brunswick Government, the object being to extend the time for the construction of this road.

Mr. MACDONALD: Where are the termini of this road?

Mr. COCHRANE: St. John is one of the termini and the road is constructed for about ten miles above Woodstock. This is simply extending the time within which the road may be completed. I had a consultation with the hon. gentleman from Carleton (Mr. Carvell) who has interested himself very much in this legislation, and he agreed that this was a very proper measure.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

On section 1—Time for completion of Gagetown to Westfield line extended:

Mr. MARCIL: Is it contemplated to take over this road as part of the Government system, or what is the reason of the Bill?

Mr. HAZEN: Time is being extended for completion in order to suit the convenience of the New Brunswick Government and to provide that subsidies voted to the road by this Parliament shall not lapse.

Section agreed to. Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

INTEREST ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. C. J. Doherty (Minister of Justice), Bill No. 99, to amend the Interest Act, was read the second time, and the House went into Committee thereon, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

On section 1—Manitoba added to the provinces where the rate of interest on judgments is fixed by statute:

Mr. DOHERTY: The purpose of this Bill is simply to include Manitoba with those provinces—Saskatchewan and Alberta, and the Northwest Territories—in which, under the Interest Act at present applicable to those provinces, interest runs on judgments at 5 per cent. It has been pointed out that in Manitoba judgments bear interest only at 4 per cent, that being the provision of the English statute at the time the English law became applicable to Manitoba. It has been further held—and I do not think that it can be disputed—that it is not within the power of provincial legislatures to legislate upon the subject of interest with a view to modifying that law as it stands. A general desire has been expressed that the rate of interest be increased in Manitoba and the purpose of this Bill is to increase the rate of interest to 5 per cent, assimilating the rate in Manitoba with that of the other two provinces that I have mentioned, and also with the rate of interest fixed by the Interest Act for all cases where interest is payable and where, by agreement or by law, the rate is not fixed

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My hon. friend has rightly stated that the provinces could not legislate in this matter. I assume that there have been communications with the governments of the different provinces on the subject?

Mr. DOHERTY: This affects only Manitoba. I cannot say that I have had any communications from the Government of Manitoba, but quite a number of communications have been received from people in Canada expressing a desire for this legislation. It seemed to me, upon its face, to be desirable that we should have uniformity.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

INSPECTION AND GRADING OF HAY.

On motion of Sir George Foster (Minister of Trade and Commerce), the House went into committee to consider the following proposed resolution. Mr. Rainville in the Chair:

Resolved, that it is expedient to provide for the inspection and grading of hay, the licensing of pressers of hay for sale or exportation, the charging of a fee of one dollar for such licenses, the labelling of pressed hay for sale, exportation or importation, and the imposition of penalties for violation of the law.

Mr. MACDONALD: What is the necessity for this amendment?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is to provide for the inspection of hay. Under the present law there is no provision for the inspection or grading of hay in the West. There have been several demands for such legislation. A year ago or more an officer of my department went through the whole of the western country and consulted the provincial governments and other authorities having to do with the matter; and the basis of the legislation was settled. The Bill will be brought in and printed, but it may not be proceeded with to a finality this year. There will be an opportunity of discussing it in the House, however, so that the country may know what is proposed.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Is the Bill intended to apply also to home consumption?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It has reference either to sale or to exportation.

Mr. MACDONALD: Is it to apply all over Canada?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes. There are provisions for the inspection of hay in Quebec and Ontario.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

SUPPLY.

House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Railways and Canals—chargeable to capital —Welland Ship Canal—Construction, $200,000.

Mr. GERMAN: The minister should explain why the work on the Welland Ship canal has been stopped, and what is to be done so far as the contractors are concerned, because I understand they are putting in claims for damages by reason of being stopped in their work. This canal will eventually cost $50,000,000, and about $10,000,000 has already been spent. There are large walls partly erected which, when I was on the spot recently, looked as though they might depreciate very considerably in value and usefulness unless they were looked after. In regard to such a gigantic undertaking as this, the House and the country are entitled to an explanation from the minister as to the situation of the whole work, and what the policy of the department is as to the future operations.

Mr. COCHRANE: Perhaps the hon. gentleman was not present when I made my statement to the House in reference to this work. I explained then that the work was stopped on account of financial stress. We feel, and the engineer feels, that the walls are not going to deteriorate while standing there. The time of starting the work again depends to a large extent on the war. The contractors have so far not put in any claim, although there has been some talk of their doing so.

Mr. GERMAN: Has the chief engineer, Mr. Weller, recommended that there should be any supervision of the work?

Mr. COCHRANE: Mr. Sullivan is looking after the work.

Mr. GERMAN: I understand the services of Mr. Weller have been dispensed with?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes, for the time being.

Mr. GERMAN: I doubt very much the advisability of dispensing with the services of an engineer of the capabilities of Mr. Weller, who initiated this great work and who has had the supervision of it from its beginning until the present time. His services may be obtained by some other Government or party. For the small salary Mr. Weller was receiving, he should be retained in charge of the work. I cannot believe that money would be improperly expended to retain him in the service of the Government in control of the work even during the time that active operations are suspended. Mr. Weller has been an official of the Government for many years, and he knows all about that work. I have never had any word with him about the matter, but, knowing the situation as I do, I think it is in the interest of the work and of the department that his services should be retained, and I would ask the minister to consider the matter very carefully.

Mr. COCHRANE: I appreciate what the hon. gentleman has said in reference to Mr. Weller, against whom I have nothing to say in any shape or form; but he is a large salaried man, in fact, he had the largest salary in the department, and as this is a time of stress, I think we should save all we can. Even if Mr. Weller should obtain another position, as I hope he will, the main part of the work is completed, so that with the officials we have we could really get along without him, although if Mr. Weller is available when the work is started again, I shall be very glad to retain him.

Mr. GERMAN: I must again enter my protest against this sort of economy. The Government is economizing at the wrong end. I think I could show them where they could economize to much greater advantage. There are several thousand employees in the Inside Service in Ottawa and, so far as I can see in going through the different departments, the offices are so full that outsiders can hardly get in.

Mr. COCHRANE: That is not the case in my department.

Mr. GERMAN: No. In the Militia Department, it is most extravagantly so.

Mr. COCHRANE: That is a very busy department at the present time.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: How does the hon. member know that is the case in the Militia Department?

Mr. GERMAN: In the Militia Department there are hundreds of employees who are doing nothing.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: There is not one who is doing nothing.

Mr. GERMAN: The offices are so full of employees that one can hardly get into them, and when one goes in, there is not a man that one can find who knows anything about what one wants to learn.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is an awful state of affairs.

Mr. GERMAN: It certainly is, and, to my mind, the Militia Department is the worst department I ever saw. The Department of Railways and Canals is, in regard to the number of employees, economically managed, but the minister is managing it too economically so far as the Welland Ship Canal is concerned, when he is laying off from duty the man who drew the plans and who knows all about the work. To my mind, the minister is mistaken when he says he can get along without this man when work starts up again. The Government is continuing to spend many hundreds of thousands of dollars on the Hudson Bay railway notwithstanding the war, and that road is not to be compared with the Welland canal in its usefulness to the country. The Welland Ship canal is a necessary and exceedingly important link in the transportation business of this country. The Hudson Bay railway, no matter who originated it, will be practically of no use when it is completed, and yet the Government are continuing to spend millions of dollars on it. The Government could well afford to stop work on that road, and continue with the work on the Welland Ship canal. The Public Works Department is spending money in Toronto for beautifying the harbour front.

Mr. COCHRANE: The city of Toronto is paying two-thirds.

Mr. GERMAN: Still, this Government is paying a large amount towards beautifying the city of Toronto. The Government have not stopped expenditure on that work.

Mr. COCHRANE: The work it to improve the harbour.

Mr. GERMAN: There is no necessity of this Government expending such a large sum there just because Toronto is a Tory stronghold. That work is not to be compared in usefulness with the Welland Ship canal. I cannot see why, when the Government is spending millions of dollars on public works which are of absolutely no benefit to the country at the present time, and will not be for many years to come, they should cease expenditure on such a necessary work as the Welland Ship canal. I protest most emphatically against the stoppage of construction there, and more particularly against the closing up of the engineer's office, which leaves the work without any protection so far as engineering supervision is concerned.

Mr. COCHRANE: There is an engineer in charge of it.

Mr. GERMAN: The minister says that Mr. Sullivan is in charge. The minister may know more about it than I do, but I have been over the ground, and Mr. Sullivan is the only man that I have been able to find there. To a layman, it looks as if the work which had been completed was deteriorating in value very rapidly. It seemed to me so serious a matter that I call the minister's attention to it.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not wish to enter into a discussion of the matter before the committee, but some of our friends seem to have a particular aversion to the Hudson Bay railway. At a certain stage of progress in that work, it would have been just as proper to stop construction on the Hudson Bay railway as possibly it was to stop construction on other important public works. But so much of the road having been completed, and so large a portion of the expenditure having already been made, I think it would be very unwise not to make the expenditure required to complete the work that is necessary to carry the rails to tide water. When that is done, the question of further expenditure must be considered. After the expenditure that has been made—which has created the road throughout, has built the two expensive bridges that were necessary, and provided the rails so that now it is only a matter of completing a little of the grading and laying down the rails—it is hardly fair to put that work on the same basis as other large works which were practically only beginning when the war broke out. I think it is only fair that it be thoroughly understood that there is a difference between the two conditions. Had it been decided to stop all great public works in Canada at the outbreak of the war which were in the stage the Hudson Bay railway was in then, I would have said: Certainly, it is quite proper to do that. But it was not decided to take that course, and I do not think it would now be the part or wisdom or of true economy to fail to complete the road after so much money has been sunk in the enterprise, and when the road is so near completion.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I ventured to criticise expenditure on the Hudson Bay railway last night, and the minister gave as a reason why the Government could not stop construction on that work, that it was under contract, and that the Government would be liable for damages if they stopped construction. That reason does not seem to hold good, because the Welland Ship canal is under contract and work has been stopped there. The minister made a statement to the House some days ago in which he said that the Government proposed to spend $50,000,000 on deepening the Welland canal, and of that amount $13,000,000 had already been spent. Now, there are four sections of the canal under contract, and all these contracts have been held up by the minister. So, I do not see why the same thing could not have been done in the case of the Hudson Bay railway. The hon. member for Edmonton gave, I think, a better reason than the minister's, when he said that construction on the Hudson Bay railway should not stop because the road was so near completion, and we could get the benefit of the road by spending the balance of the money. I do not think the minister's reason is a good one, because the Hudson Bay railway and the Welland canal were in exactly the same position when the war broke out. Contracts had been let in both cases, and part of the work had been done; the two works were on all fours, and it was as easy to stop work in the one case as in the other. The minister cancelled a contract for work in my own constituency shortly after the war broke out, and he does not seem to have suffered in consequence.

Mr. COCHRANE: There is a vast difference between the Hudson Bay railway and the Welland Ship Canal. The Hudson Bay railway covers a great distance, and a large amount of supplies have to be taken in there. The Welland canal, on the other hand, is very accessible and if we went on with that work the expenditure would be from $35,000,000, while the expenditure for the Hudson Bay railway is only about one-fifth of that.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Shall we get any advantage from the money that has already been spent on the canal, before the balance is paid?

Mr. COCHRANE: No.

Mr. GERMAN: The minister discussed the question of the closing down of construction on the Welland Ship Canal on June 11. He said:

> As we could not get a return upon our investment for some years we did not consider the continuance of construction justifiable under our immediate and pressing financial burdens.

The hon. minister must know that, so far as getting a return upon the investment is concerned, the only return the country can get will be by an increase of the shipping facilities.

Mr. COCHRANE: That is an income.

Mr. GERMAN: Certainly it is an income, and that income is immediately available. To my knowledge the canal is more used now than it has been at any time during the last thirty-five years. There are more ships passing through the Welland canal at this hour than there ever were before. The hon. minister and his engineer must know this. The canal is not being built for the purpose of providing a financial return to the Government.

Mr. COCHRANE: No, I did not say it was.

Mr. GERMAN: But, the minister says: "As we could not get a return upon our investment for some years." What does that mean?

Mr. COCHRANE: It means that we would have to spend from $35,000,000 to $37,000,000 more before we would get that return; and besides that, it would take at least four years to complete the work.

Mr. GERMAN: But, the minister must know the return is immediately available when the work is completed.

Mr. COCHRANE: But, it takes that much money and that much time to get it. It is altogether a different proposition from the Hudson Bay railway.

Mr. GERMAN: The minister's idea and mine are very different. The new canal is being constructed for the purpose of facilitating transportation, by allowing large ships to pass through the canal, through lake Ontario, down to Prescott and Kingston, where the cargo is transhipped to Montreal instead of being transhipped at Port Colborne in the Government elevator. The sooner the work is completed the sooner you get a return for the country. You have now spent $13,000,000, which is wasted until the work is completed. I really cannot see any justification for the minister closing down this work. I know the people in the Niagara district do not approve of this action, and if the people generally were aware of the circumstances I do not think they would approve of it either.

4 p.m.

Railways and Canals—Trent Canal—Construction, $600,000.

Mr. GERMAN: When is the Trent canal to be completed?

Mr. COCHRANE: All the canal excepting the last division will be completed this year, we hope. That division we have not yet started, and it will not be started until after the conclusion of the war.

Mr. GERMAN: That is the section from Lake Simcoe to Georgian Bay?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Mr. GERMAN: Has not the work been let?

Mr. COCHRANE: No, not the last section.

Mr. GERMAN: When was it started?

Mr. COCHRANE: The Lord knows.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Does the minister expect a return on his investment in this case?

Mr. COCHRANE: It will be more in the way of a rate leveller from Lake Ontario through to Peterborough. It has also developed a lot of power, which is a very important thing in a section like that.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Will there be any through traffic?

Mr. COCHRANE: I hope so. I cannot vouch for it. It will enable them to use barges on that division, and get a lower rate of freight than would otherwise be possible.

Mr. OLIVER: How much has the Trent canal cost so far?

Mr. COCHRANE: I don't know. I could get the information.

Mr. GERMAN: Does the minister intend to let the contracts for the remaining sections of the work?

Mr. COCHRANE: No, we have not let a contract since the war broke out. We are only cleaning up the ones that are left.

Mr. OLIVER: What size of vessel will be able to go through the Trent canal?

Mr. COCHRANE: One thousand tons.

Mr. OLIVER: What size of vessels now go through the Welland canal?

Mr. COCHRANE: Twenty thousand tons.

Mr. OLIVER: The Trent canal will be strictly a barge canal?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: What are the prospects of barge navigation between Georgian bay and Lake Ontario via the Trent canal?

Mr. COCHRANE: I think there will be considerable from Georgian bay to Peterborough, or the railways will meet the freight rates.

Mr. OLIVER: What freightage is likely to take that route?

Mr. COCHRANE: Grain and coal, largely.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What is the depth of the water?

Mr. COCHRANE: Part of it six feet and part eight feet. The part from Georgian bay to Peterborough will be eight feet.

Mr. OLIVER: I am informed there is what is known as a lift lock at one point.

Mr. COCHRANE: There are two, one at Kirkfield and one at Peterborough.

Mr. OLIVER: Are there any hydroplane stations on the canal?

Mr. COCHRANE: No, I don't think there are.

St. Peter's Canal—Improvements, $45,000.

Mr. KYTE: Has this item been passed?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes, it was passed on the 11th June.

Mr. KYTE: Is that work about completed?

Mr. COCHRANE: There is some cleaning up to do yet but it is nearly done.

Mr. KYTE: Will this amount complete the work?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Mr. KYTE: The work has been carried on with great satisfaction to the public generally and to the persons who are most interested in having it done. It will be a vast improvement to the water transportation of that part of Nova Scotia, and if all the work carried on by the department is carried on in the way in which that has been, the country might be very well satisfied with the expenditures of that department.

Mr. McKENZIE: I agree with what my hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Kyte) has said as far as the carrying on of the work is concerned. I have a matter to bring to the notice of the minister in connection with the construction of that work which has reference not to the carrying on of the work itself but to the personal obligations of the contractor. We have in Nova Scotia, as you have in Ontario, a Workmen's Compensation Act. One of the men who was working for contractor Weller, was sent by the contractor, or by one of his foremen, to operate a defective locomotive. While the man was in front of the wheels somewhere under the locomotive the engine started and the man was badly smashed up. His hand was smashed so badly that it will never be of any use to him, he has a stiff knee and he has not been able to do any work since. This occurred a year ago. My firm, which was dealing with the matter, undertook to get a settlement with the contractor and we agreed to settle without going into court. The contractor agreed to give this young man named Almond, who comes from Georges River, so much a month. Since I came here I have heard from the young fellow that the contractor is not carrying out the settlement and has refused to carry it out. That is absolutely unfair. We thought this contractor was a man of his word and we accepted a settlement. The boy was satisfied with the arrangement. Now, after the time has passed when we can bring our action, the contractor repudiates the settlement and declines to pay. I am sure that the department and the Government would not approve of conduct of that kind on the part of their contractors and would want Mr. Weller to know that this poor boy has somebody who is interested in him. I want the department to give this gentleman to understand that if he is working in any province of the Dominion for the department he must abide by the law of the province and the Dominion.

Mr. COCHRANE: I understand that the contractor himself has gone to the front, and I think that probably is the reason why his word has not been carried out as given to the boy. I will be very glad to bring the matter to the attention of those who are acting for him. I feel satisfied that if Mr. Weller promised to carry out the arrangement he will do so.

Mr. McKENZIE: He carried it out to a considerable extent but the payments dropped after awhile.

Mr. COCHRANE: I am not doubting the hon. gentleman's statement at all, but the only reason I can give is that young Mr. Weller has gone to the front.

Welland Canal—Heavy repairs, $30,000.

Mr. GERMAN: Perhaps the minister might state whether one particular section is included in these repairs, the section of the Welland canal feeder from Welland Junction to the Grand Trunk railway crossing. On the south side of the Welland canal feeder the bank is in an exceedingly bad condition. Petitions almost innumerable have been sent to the minister to have that section of the Welland canal feeder bank improved and stoned so that it will be passable. It is used as a public highway. I was wondering whether this was included.

Mr. COCHRANE: There is nothing in the Estimates this year for it.

Mr. GERMAN: Could not the minister include something for it?

Mr. COCHRANE: I would have to get a report to see what it would cost before I could make such a promise.

Mr. GERMAN: That is quite right, but I would ask the minister to get a report.

Mr. COCHRANE: I will get a report.

Department of Railways and Canals—chargeable to income—Miscellaneous, $405,300.

Mr. OLIVER: Has the minister any information in regard to the lifting of the rails west of Edmonton? The arrangement made is that the Pocohontas mine gets connection by a fifteen mile track of light rails. The difference of condition is, of course, a very important difference to the mine in the handling of its business. Instead of being on the main line, with direct haul both ways and with maximum load, all its access to the main line is by means of this fifteen-mile spur, which runs west from the mine to a connection with the main line track. That places the mine in a considerably less advantageous condition than it was before, in the ordinary handling of its business, especially on the extra haul of the coal shipped. It has thirty miles extra haul of the coal shipped eastward, as compared with its former condition. Has that been taken into consideration with a view to pay compensation to the mine, because of the changed conditions, or is there some arrangement with the railway companies whereby those companies suffer the loss?

Mr. COCHRANE: This has been investigated, and it is left to the Railway Commission to say what damages we will have to pay, I may say, also, that we are investigating now with a view to building across Brulé lake. That is a very shallow lake, and we can build across it very cheaply, but we have not investigated thoroughly, so as to be in a position to make a definite statement. The matter has been looked into with a view to cutting out the extra haul my hon. friend speaks of.

Mr. OLIVER: The point I had in mind was that the department was prepared to recognize the liability to the company for the less advantageous condition in which the coal mine is now operating?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Does the minister intend to put through the Railway Consolidation Act during the present session?

Mr. COCHRANE: I certainly hope so.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I have been watching to see it proceeded with. I suppose there must be some good reason why it has not been placed before us. The minister and other members of the House spent a whole month trying to whip it into shape, and I would not like to think that our work has been in vain. I hope he will have it on the statute book this year.

Mr. COCHRANE: My hon. friend knows that the House has been occupied for the past two or three weeks with the Military Service Bill, but I hope that in the coming week we will take up the Railway Consolidation Act. I do not think it will take very long, as the committee did splendid work on it.

Mr. OLIVER: What is the process by which the extent of damage suffered by the homesteaders and others along the line, as well as the damage suffered by the coal mines I have mentioned, will be arrived at? Is it a matter of litigation in the courts, or arbitration, or is it a matter for the discretion of the department?

Mr. COCHRANE: We propose to use the Railway Commission, where we cannot settle in a fairly decent way ourselves, and if necessary we may go to the Exchequer Court. I do not think there will be much trouble with the settlers or with the coal mines, because the department is supposed to deal fairly in all cases.

Mr. OLIVER: The department is the court of first instance?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes, if we can we make a settlement. If we cannot, then we go to the Railway Commission, and from there we may go to the Exchequer Court.

Mr. OLIVER: The department is the court of first instance. Then an appeal to the Railway Commission, and perhaps an appeal to the Exchequer Court.

Mr. GERMAN: There is an item here—

Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada, to pay expenses in connection with cases —$15,000.

Why should the department have to pay that sum?

Mr. COCHRANE: For instance, if there is a case before the Railway Commission, and it is thought advisable by the Government, or the commission thinks it advisable, to have a solicitor or lawyer to represent the Government, we can employ counsel. I do not think in any case we ever use the full amount, but it has been put in the Estimates and that is the reason for it. It did not cost us anything last year.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Who is the counsel who receives this money? I understand the commissioners have a solicitor whose business it is to advise them.

Mr. COCHRANE: If they want any extra legal advice to watch a case, or anything of that sort, a solicitor is selected.

Mr. SINCLAIR: There is an item here as follows:

To provide for inquiry and report on the railway situation of Canada—$120,000.

I presume that is the investigation which took place recently, and the minister has had the majority report and the minority report for some time. Has he made up his mind as to whether he is going to adopt either of those reports?

Mr. COCHRANE: I have probably made up my mind, but we have been so busy in our council meetings that it has been impossible to decide the question fully. I hope in a short time to be able to bring down the information asked for.

Mr. OLIVER: I desire to again refer to the question of these lifted rails. What is the position taken in regard to the property rights of the railway companies affected? I understand from the papers that there is a divisional point at Tollerton on the Canadian Northern, and that the other Canadian Northern divisional point at Lucerne will be abandoned in favour of the two Grand Trunk divisional points, Edson and Jasper. Is it a part of that understanding or arrangement that the Canadian Northern receives consideration for the loss in value of its property in that case?

Mr. COCHRANE: If the rails are ever relaid, the arrangement will go into effect, and there will not be any damage. In the meantime, the operating of the business of the two roads by one line will more than compensate any expense that had been made in connection with the arrangement. Take the Grand Trunk Pacific alone, where they run on the Canadian Northern line, for a short distance—they had to spend between $25,000 and $30,000 to shovel off the sand and stuff that rolled down on the road. My hon. friend will also realize that, in operating 200 miles, if he can operate one line instead of two, and get the same service, it will certainly be a saving to both of them.

Mr. OLIVER: Am I to understand that the railway companies do not receive any consideration?

Mr. COCHRANE: That is not settled. It has not been discussed with them in that view.

Mr. OLIVER: I would, of course, not expect the railway companies to take the view that my hon. friend has expressed. Is the view he has expressed the view that he proposes to take in the discussion that will take place?

Mr. COCHRANE: I do not know whether the railways will take that view or not, but it is a commonsense view to take.

Mr. OLIVER: Is that the view my hon. friend intends to take on behalf of the Government?

Mr. COCHRANE: I am not going to commit myself on that point. I say it is a commonsense view to take, but it may be that we will not be able to force it through.

Mr. GERMAN: The Minister of Railways and Canals is primarily responsible for the railway legislation of this Government. As he is asking Parliament to vote $120,000 to pay the expenses of that inquiry into the railway situation, which was a very searching and a reasonably effective inquiry, I think that he should state what action he intends to advise in regard to the report which has been made. Before we vote $120,000 to pay the expenses of this inquiry, we should know what effect the report of the commission has had upon the minister's mind.

Mr. COCHRANE: The vote was taken last year; this is only a re-vote.

Mr. GERMAN: That does not affect the situation. The money was voted last year because it was expected that it would be earned and paid. It was not earned last year; consequently it was not used. Now that the report has been made, the minister is asking Parliament to vote that money again. But, I repeat, the minister should state definitely, before the money is voted, what he proposes to do in regard to the report which has been made.

Mr. COCHRANE: I do not think that I should make my report until the Government has made up its mind on the subject. I am only one member of the Government; I am not going to give my opinion until such time as the Government has come to a decision in the matter. I do not think that my hon. friend, if he thinks it over, will ask me to do that.

Mr. GERMAN: You are the chief.

Mr. COCHRANE: But I am not the only one, by any means.

Mr. GERMAN: The minister's answer is not entirely satisfactory. The report of the Royal Commission appointed to investigate the railway situation in Canada has been before the Government for two or three months. The session is advancing and will soon, I hope, reach a termination. It is, therefore, highly important that we should know at a very early date, if not immediately, what is the policy of the Government with regard to the railway situation and particularly with regard to the report made by that Royal Commission. The country is anxious to know the policy of the Government on this question, one of the most important questions before the people at this time. The expenditure which has been made in aid of railways is really appalling, having in regard the enormous expenditure which the country is making in the prosecution of the war. Something must be promptly and effectively done to satisfy the people that nothing will be given to railway promoters and railway interests unless the interests of the public are absolutely and thoroughly safeguarded. I repeat that the minister should give us some idea of what the Government intends to do in this matter.

Mr. COCHRANE: I admit that the House should know and know very soon, what is the policy of the Government in this respect. But I do not think it is fair to ask me to state my own opinion until the Government brings down its policy, which, I hope, will be very soon.

Mr. MACDONALD: Has the Government made any advances or given any undertaking in respect of the interest upon the bonds of two railway companies which fell due on June 30?

Mr. COCHRANE: I cannot answer my hon. friend. In any case, that does not come under my department. The interest is handled by the Finance Minister.

Mr. OLIVER: From what the minister has said, is the committee to understand that the Government will declare its policy before the end of the present session?

Mr. COCHRANE: Oh, certainly, it will have to.

Mr. OLIVER: I think that some commendation should be offered or some recognition made of the action of the Chairman of the Railway Commission in returning to the treasury the amount of money that he was entitled to receive for his work on the commission appointed to investigate the railway situation. As a citizen of Canada, I should like to express my appreciation of that action of Sir Henry Drayton.

Mr. COCHRANE: I have already expressed my gratitude and the gratitude of the Government for Sir Henry Drayton's action in this matter. I appreciate what my hon. friend has said.

Mr. MACDONALD: Does the minister not know whether the interest on the debenture bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern that fell due on June 30, was met by the companies themselves, or whether the Government took any action in the matter?

Mr. COCHRANE: I understand that the interest on the Grand Trunk Pacific debenture bonds was paid out of last year's vote. As to the Canadian Northern, I do not know. The interest on their bonds did not fall due until 1st July. I have not inquired into the matter, and cannot make any statement.

Mr. GERMAN: We spent a lot of time discussing matters which have lasting importance, but this is one of the important questions occupying the public mind at this time, and we must have full information. The minister, therefore, should let this item stand until we receive all the information to which we are entitled.

Mr. COCHRANE: I will get the information for my hon. friend. I do not know that there is any use in letting the item stand.

Mr. GERMAN: After an item is passed, it is pretty difficult to get information.

Mr. COCHRANE: Not when I say so.

Mr. OLIVER: The House will be prepared to take the statement of the minister that this matter will be dealt with during the present session by the Government.

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: And we will also accept his statement that full information will be placed before the House at that time.

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: For my part, I am anxious to see the business of the House progress, and if it is agreeable under those circumstances and conditions, I would be glad to see the item disposed of.

Mr. MACDONALD: Were there any undertakings or commitments on the part of the companies affected when the interest payments were arranged on the 1st of July?

Mr. COCHRANE: I really must plead ignorance as to that. That matter comes under the department of the Minister of Finance, and I have not consulted him in regard to it.

Mr. MACDONALD: Has the report of the auditors been submitted to Parliament?

Mr. COCHRANE: Under the Act, that is not required to be done. The year from their appointment is not out yet. There is no objection to submitting the report to Parliament.

Mr. OLIVER: When will the year expire?

Mr. COCHRANE: A report is made every month, and those reports can be brought down at any time.

Mr. OLIVER: Perhaps it would be satisfactory if the minister would cause to be laid on the Table at an early day the monthly audits up to date.

Mr. COCHRANE: I will bring those down.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Who are the auditors?

Mr. COCHRANE: Price, Waterhouse, for the Grand Trunk, and Marwick, Mitchell, Peat & Co., of Toronto, for the Canadian Northern.

Mr. MACDONALD: Has the Intercolonial railway been placed under the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners?

Mr. COCHRANE: Not yet, but we are having an amendment to the Government Railways Act prepared, and I hope to introduce it this week and have it put through.

Mr. MACDONALD: Providing for that being done?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes, with regard to everything except expropriation of land; that is kept under the jurisdiction of the Exchequer Court.

Canadian Government Railways—working expenses, $25,000,000.

Mr. COCHRANE: Those are the operating expenses for the year.

[Mr. Oliver.]

Mr. MACDONALD: What are the total receipts and expenditures of the Intercolonial for the last financial year?

Mr. COCHRANE: The total receipts were $16,802,290 and the total expenditure $15,664,577.

Mr. MACDONALD: Leaving a surplus of what?

Mr. COCHRANE: $1,137,713.

Mr. MACDONALD: Is that a bona fide surplus or a paper one?

Mr. COCHRANE: I am surprised at my hon. friend asking such a question.

Mr. GERMAN: Knowing that it is a paper one?

Mr. COCHRANE: No.

Mr. TURRIFF: When the minister is asking us to vote $25,000,000, he ought to give us some explanation as to what his estimate is of the revenues from the different roads included in the item and other general information.

Mr. COCHRANE: This covers the operation of the road from Halifax to Montreal and from Moncton to Winnipeg; it also pays the wages of the men and the general expenses of running the railway. It would be difficult to give a detailed statement until the money is spent.

Mr. GERMAN: The minister in his statement to the House on June 11 in regard to the Transcontinental, says:

> The large deficit on the Transcontinental railway is due to the comparatively small amount of traffic offering for that railway and to the fact that we have been obliged to establish trains not at present warranted by the business offering.

Why should the Government run trains not warranted by the business offering?

Mr. COCHRANE: The transcontinental railway runs through a new country practically from Moncton to Winnipeg. The business is growing. The people are continually wanting better accommodation. I hope it will not be long before those trains do pay, but up to the present they have not paid.

Mr. GERMAN: That is a very trifling explanation, in fact, no explanation at all. The Intercolonial railway, if its earnings were figured on business lines, has shown large deficits not only under this Government but under a Liberal Government—under every Government. The Intercolonial has always shown a deficit, and shows a deficit now.

Mr. COCHRANE: No. There was not a deficit even before my hon. friend's party went out of power. They had a surplus too.

Mr. GERMAN: I beg to differ from the minister. If the earnings of the Intercolonial were calculated in the same way as the earnings of the Canadian Pacific, the operations of the Intercolonial would show a deficit. In my opinion the Intercolonial, ever since its inception, has been so operated as always to produce a deficit. The minister says that he has put trains on the Transcontinental which were not warranted by the business. If the business did not warrant it, why put the trains on? The private railway companies, which are run on business lines, do not put on trains unless they are warranted by the business.

Mr. COCHRANE: My hon. friend is wrong. There is not a railway in the country which does not run trains at a loss on certain sections. This is done to give a service to the people and to help build up traffic.

Mr. TURRIFF: What part of this $25,000,000 is for the Intercolonial, and what part for the Transcontinental?

Mr. COCHRANE: Intercolonial division, $16,000,000; Transcontinental, $8,000,000; Prince Edward Island division, $750,000; International Railway, $250,000.

Mr. TURRIFF: Will the minister say why, at this time, when we all know the Canadian Northern will shortly be seeking aid from the Government, hundreds of thousands of dollars have been paid to private-owned roads for carrying traffic that could just as well have been carried by the Government roads? Why was not the Government road made use of, for instance, for transporting soldiers between Montreal and Quebec?

Mr. COCHRANE: In the first place, we did not have rolling stock enough. It taxed us to our capacity to take the troops to Halifax. We might have taken some from Winnipeg to Montreal or to Quebec if we had had the rolling stock, but we did not have it, and have not got it yet.

Mr. TURRIFF: I have been up and down over the Transcontinental to Winnipeg, and on the Intercolonial, and I saw lots of trains that could have carried troops running practically empty. The Government was paying other roads for carrying the traffic and allowing their own road to starve. That, to my mind, is one of the most unsatisfactory features of the administration of the Government roads. What influence it was that enabled these companies to get the business that should have gone to the Government roads I do not know, but the fact remains that the people of Canada have had to pay hundreds of thousands of dollars to private railroads for carrying traffic that should have been carried by the Government roads.

Mr. COCHRANE: My hon. friend is absolutely wrong so far as the Intercolonial is concerned. Until a short time ago that road carried the troops right through to Halifax because, until the United States came into the war, the troops were not allowed to be transported by the Canadian Pacific Railway which has to run through the State of Maine to get to the seaboard.

Mr. TURRIFF: Lots of troops were taken from Montreal to Quebec by private roads that could have been taken just as well by the Intercolonial, and my hon. friend knows it.

Mr. COCHRANE: I do not know it.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Does the Government charge the same rate for transporting soldiers on the Intercolonial as the private roads charge?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Mr. SINCLAIR: How much was received from the Department of Militia and Defence last year?

Mr. COCHRANE: I will have a statement made up and send it to my hon. friend.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Is it a very large sum?

Mr. COCHRANE: Quite large. We ran as many as twenty-five trains a day.

Mr. GLASS: The observation of the minister as to having to pass up business through lack of rolling stock brings to my mind a statement made by Mr. C. J. McDonald, of the United States Railways War Board. The car shortage situation is not peculiar to Canada; they have the same difficulty in the United States. An investigation was held, and Mr. McDonald found that by reason of delay in unloading, the car shortage in the United States was increased by 515,000 cars per annum. If the cars had been unloaded promptly and proper facilities had been afforded 515,000 more cars would have been available during the year. Mr. McDonald also makes this significant observation: "Cars are being carried from destination to destination not properly filled." He says that if two tons additional were put in the cars it would not tax them at all, but would release a further 200,000 cars a year. These statements are very important if they are borne out by the facts, and I submit that a good deal of the difficulty in this country might be overcome if the prompt unloading of the cars was insisted on and also the filling of them to their proper capacity when going a long distance. A statement from so authoritative a source as Mr. McDonald, made after a thorough investigation, seemed to me to be worth giving to the committee.

Mr. OLIVER: This vote represents the amount of money that it is estimated will be necessary for the operation of the Intercolonial and Transcontinental during the year. What are the estimated earnings of these two roads for the same period?

Mr. COCHRANE: On account of the terrible cost of everything we have to buy I think we shall do well if we break even this year. The rise in wages during the last few months means an expenditure of $2,000,000 a year more on the Intercolonial and the Transcontinental. The extra cost of coal means over $1,000,000 more.

Mr. OLIVER: When my hon. friend speaks of breaking even, I suppose he means the roads will earn as much as this vote?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: That leaves the capital charges of both roads unprovided for?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes, but there are a lot of charges which are paid out of revenue in the operating of a road. We are running the railway on the same basis as it would be run by a private company. The only difference is we do not charge up interest on capital. I think it should be done, but it never has been done.

Mr. OLIVER: That is a very important item, which relates to the whole business of Government operation of railroads, and I think this is a good time to establish the point that in the case of railroads now operated by the Government, Government operation is not expected to provide for capital charges. We are faced with a problem in regard to certain of our private railway corporations, and it is suggested by some that Government ownership and Government operation are what the country needs. Are the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern paying their operating costs and any part of their capital charges?

[Mr. Glass.]

Mr. COCHRANE: I think the Canadian Northern is paying quite a portion of its fixed charges. I am not so sure about the Grand Trunk Pacific, but I think it is only about breaking even.

Mr. OLIVER: Then, those two "lame duck" railways of ours are really doing as well as our Government system is; in fact, one of them is doing better. I do not wish to make any reflection on the Government system or its management, I simply want to have the facts. It seems to me the general impression in regard to the railway situation is hardly in accordance with the facts as we understand them now.

Mr. COCHRANE: I think that is hardly correct. If my hon. friend read the statement I made to the House, he would see the rates on the Intercolonial are based on the mileage to Portland, which is 298 miles. The mileage to Halifax, where a large part of our business went last year, is 841 miles. The mileage over the Canadian Pacific railway, which runs through the state of Maine, is 481 miles. We are handicapped by a greater mileage, so it is hardly a fair comparison. As far as the Transcontinental between Moncton and Winnipeg is concerned, we are not under that handicap, but the road runs through a new country. We know if we had our agents through the West we could then route freight our own way, but as it is we must take it as we get it.

5 p.m.

Mr. OLIVER: Both the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern traverse entirely new country west of Edmonton, and on account of the proximity of another road to the Canadian Northern, that country must necessarily be almost non-productive of traffic, so that the difference is not very great in that respect.

Mr. COCHRANE: There is a great difference, because they are running through a country which is developed, and which is becoming more developed day by day. Through portions of Quebec and Ontario development is going on rapidly, but as yet the traffic is practically confined to wood products, and that is largely short-haul business.

Mr. OLIVER: It is an outstanding fact that there must be business offering, because my hon. friend says we are not able to handle the business on account of the shortage of cars. It seems deplorable that, having made this enormous capital expenditure, we are debarred from getting a return on it because of lack of cars.

Mr. COCHRANE: I stated we had about 6,000 cars last year.

Mr. OLIVER: The idea I wish to express is that the failure is not in the lack of traffic, or because money has been sunk where it should not have been sunk, but is due to the fact that we are not able to take the benefit of the traffic which does exist and which would grow up more rapidly if we were able to take care of it as it came.

Mr. COCHRANE: On the Transcontinental we have been able to handle all the traffic which has offered.

Mr. OLIVER: This is a question of such stupendous importance to the country, when we are on the eve of some great development resulting from the appreciation of the situation by the commission appointed to investigate the matter, that it is very desirable we should have a thorough understanding of the conditions, and how they come about. We have in the Transcontinental the shortest possible line from the prairies to tidewater, and a line which has the best possible grades and curves, and which I believe is very well constructed, so that we are in a position to handle traffic over it to the best advantage, so far as capital expenditure can place us in that position. It seems deplorable that in years past, even since the Transcontinental line was opened, such an enormous proportion of our crop should go forward by United States ports through United States channels.

Mr. COCHRANE: It largely goes over water.

Mr. OLIVER: Precisely. The argument which is generally used is that the water rate is so much lower than the rail rate that it must go that way.

Mr. COCHRANE: No, I think the reason of that is that we are handicapped in getting tramp boats. The tramp boats make the ocean rate and we have not been fortunate enough to get them to come to our ports to any great extent. The shipper is bound to ship his grain, particularly during the winter season, to a port that is always open and where he knows he can get shipping facilities. I do not suppose these times are any criterion of what we may have in the future. There is no money for any railway in hauling grain to Halifax or St. John. You cannot charge enough to make it pay to haul that distance. It is a good deal farther than it is to New York. Then, without making a criticism at all, I would say that the Transcontinental railway was not properly located to make money, or to give cheap rates. It would have been far better if it had taken the course of other roads. It has opened up new country in New Brunswick, Quebec and Ontario, but it would have been better to have built colonization roads, and then, if you were going to build a trunk line, to have built by the shortest route and in the most economical way possible.

Mr. OLIVER: I think I remember having gone over the question of mileage, and I do not think it is any farther to St. John than to New York from Winnipeg by existing lines of railway.

Mr. COCHRANE: But there are 700 miles of water and most of the grain is sent in that direction.

Mr. OLIVER: When the water rate was particularly low I could understand that being advanced as a reason, but this year and last year the water rate has been high and still the grain has gone that way.

Mr. COCHRANE: There is more shipping from New York than from our own ports.

Mr. OLIVER: There is no question about that, but still we have our ocean ports and we have shipping from these ports. I am speaking particularly of our summer port of Quebec. There is an enormous amount of shipping from the St. Lawrence, which passes by Quebec. When the all-rail rate from Winnipeg to Quebec is no greater than the normal lake and rail rate, and when the summer's grain is held up all winter at Port Arthur and Fort William, as it is under present conditions, in order to get the advantage of the lake rate, I am absolutely at a loss to understand why, instead of taking the 420-mile haul from Winnipeg to Fort William, you should not, during the winter time, take the 1,300-mile haul to Quebec at a time when the railways are doing less.

Mr. COCHRANE: Shippers rather object to going to Quebec instead of to Montreal. It is so much farther to haul to any port except St. John and Halifax. They can send their grain to Portland, New York, Boston and Baltimore so much cheaper than they can to St. John and Halifax. Montreal is a better shipping point in that respect with the exception of reaching St. John and Halifax. New York is 375 miles from Montreal and Halifax is 835.

Mr. OLIVER: I quite appreciate the disadvantage of having to ship to Halifax But the great bulk of the grain is shipped at a time of the year when it does not go from the ocean shipping port during that same season. They would have to hold it in storage either at Quebec or at Fort William. The rates being as low by all rail as by lake and rail in summer time, I cannot understand why that grain could not go forward to Quebec during the winter time and take storage there until navigation opens in the spring. It is a less rail mileage from Winnipeg to Quebec than from Winnipeg to Montreal by the present lines All the traffic must pass by Quebec.

Mr. COCHRANE: No, it does not have to; they ship to Portland and New York.

Mr. OLIVER: All ocean-borne vessels that go to Montreal must pass by Quebec. It seems to me that, instead of being in a disadvantageous position, we are in a position of tremendous advantage to handle our own grain crop through our own port, having a short line of railway and a shorter ocean haul. The route from Quebec to Europe is shorter than from New York or any American port. I cannot see why there is not some way of working out the problem so that, having all these facilities, and having provided them at enormous expense, we can get the benefit of them by sending forward our grain over our own lines and through our own ports. But the main point I have in view is that the grain shall be able to go forward from the prairie storage at any time of the year without distinction as to whether it is winter or summer. That is the essential point that will make an enormous difference to the producers of the West. The attempt to reach lake navigation in the fall has in the past always produced a grain blockade which must affect the price to the farmer because the grain that did not get through by water in the fall has to carry storage charges all winter. That condition lends itself to speculation which is contrary again to the interests of the producer. Whatever difficulties the minister may have found in the past, or whatever difficulties he finds before him at the present time, I desire to urge upon him the desirability of considering and using to the full the advantageous position which we occupy and which should give us an all-the-year outlet for our grain from the Prairie West instead of our being in the position necessarily of having a blockade every fall and having to carry storage charges on our grain thus creating conditions to the advantage of grain manipulators and to the detriment of the producer.

Mr. COCHRANE: The hon. gentleman forgets that in normal times the average rate will be probably three cents a bushel from Fort William down. We did give a rate of six cents from Armstrong to Quebes, but here was no money in it, and it was a question whether we could save ourselves. We could not to-day, haul grain at that rate. The combined rate for lake and rail would not be five cents from Fort William to Montreal.

Mr. OLIVER: The hon. gentleman must be in error, because for a part of the present season it was seven cents.

Mr. COCHRANE: I am speaking of ordinary times. Do not confuse the two things. I think five cents would be a fair rate; at all events six cents would be a very fair rate. Then another feature is that the Quebec section is not equipped yet. I do not know when we will get the money to equip it. There are ten boats going to Montreal where one boat goes to Quebec. I think when the Government gets its own boats, it will make a vast difference, and what my hon. friend has been trying to work out, to get a through rate in summer time, can be accomplished then; but it will not be accomplished until we get our own ocean tonnage.

Mr. OLIVER: This grain that comes forward at the five-cent rate by the lake has been held in storage at the head of the lakes, or at some interior elevator, or some other place, all winter, whereas if it could go forward all winter, it could pay all that increased cost of haul, by the saving in storage.

Mr. BRADBURY: In other words, the farmer could afford to pay a little more?

Mr. OLIVER: He could pay a little more for the haul, if he did not pay so much for storage.

Mr. GERMAN: In connection with the report of the Royal Commission on the railway investigation, the minister will remember that that report intimates, if it does not assert, that the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway company are freed from their local obligation to the Government to operate the National Transcontinental railway under the agreement entered into with the Government. Some weeks ago the minister suggested in the House, in answer to a question I asked, that in his opinion the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway company was not relieved from their leg l obligation by reason of any action of the Government. I should like to know if the minister had any legal opinion from the Justice Department, or from his own department, or if that is his own individual opinion.

Mr. COCHRANE: The hon. member is referring to the Grand Trunk Pacific?

Mr. GERMAN: Is the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway company relieved by any action of this Government, or the previous Government, from carrying out its obligations under the agreement entered into between the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Government, to operate the Transcontinental railway?

Mr. COCHRANE: No.

Mr. GERMAN: Has the minister had positive legal opinion on that question?

Mr. COCHRANE: No, I have not. I thought the hon. gentleman was first asking about the Grand Trunk Pacific, but I have not had a legal opinion on the liability of the Grand Trunk Pacific to operate the Transcontinental. I do not think, however, that we can hold them. I do not think we could compel them to operate the Transcontinental.

Mr. GERMAN: Why not?

Mr. COCHRANE: Because they are bankrupt.

Mr. GERMAN: I am not suggesting whether they are bankrupt or solvent. Without reference to their solvency or insolvency, is there still a legal obligation, binding on the Grand Trunk Pacific, to carry out the agreement entered into between the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Government to operate the Transcontinental railway.

Mr. COCHRANE: I could not give an opinion on that question.

Mr. GERMAN: I suggest to the minister that he should get a positive legal opinion, because that contention is opposed by the Grand Trunk Pacific, and through the Grand Trunk Pacific by the Grand Trunk—for the Grand Trunk railway is bound up with the Grand Trunk Pacific in connection with that agreement, and if the Grand Trunk Pacific is released, the Grand Trunk railway is released. The matter is very important.

Mr. COCHRANE: The Grand Trunk would not be released in any shape or form. they are not concerned with the Transcontinental at all. They are on the bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific, and that is why we could not hold the Grand Trunk in that respect.

Mr. GERMAN: That is quite right. The Grand Trunk Railway is only liable by reason of their guaranteeing the bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific, but if the Grand Trunk Pacific is released from its liability to carry out the agreement by some action of the Government of Canada, that certainly relieves the Grand Trunk Railway company from a serious responsibility, namely, the operation of the Transcontinental railway from Winnipeg to Moncton. If they are not liable to operate that railroad, by reason of some action of the Government which has freed them from liability, that has relieved them from a very great responsibility and placed them in a very much better position than they would be if that legal obligation still existed. And it places the Government of Canada in a very much worse position than it would occupy if that legal liability still existed. So, in view of the fact that the royal commission has not stated, as I recollect it, authoritatively, that the legal liability does not exist still, but have suggested that the Grand Trunk Pacific claims that they are relieved from their legal liability by reason of the action of the Government, it is highly important that we should know the position before the discussion comes up in regard to the whole railway situation. I think the minister should obtain positive legal authority, and the best legal authority he can obtain, on that very question.

Mr. COCHRANE: Speaking frankly, I think if they would assume the responsibility on the Grand Trunk Pacific, we would gladly relieve them of the balance. I cannot say whether technically they are relieved, but we have done nothing to release them. Whether by lapse of time or by our not taking any action they would be relieved, I cannot say. Speaking frankly, if they would assume and maintain their liability on the Grand Trunk Pacific, we would forgive them all the rest.

Mr. GERMAN: The minister understands that the Government would be willing to assume full responsibility for the Transcontinental from Winnipeg to Moncton and relieve the Grand Trunk Pacific from all liability in connection with it?

Mr. COCHRANE: From operating it;—yes, if they will assume their liability with respect to the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. GERMAN: From my present knowledge I would not agree with the minister in that, because the Grand Trunk Pacific entered into an agreement that they would operate the road and pay the interest for fifty years, I think.

Mr. COCHRANE: After seven years.

Mr. GERMAN: Yes. It is a matter which will have to be considered in connection with the whole railway system, and I think we should have a definite legal opinion in regard to the matter.

Mr. COCHRANE: I do not object to getting a legal opinion on it.

Mr. SINCLAIR: With reference to the shortage of cars, can the minister tell us how the road is affected by the interchange of cars with other roads? I remember seeing a statement made by officials of the Intercolonial that many cars belonging to that railway were going to the United States and were not coming back. Is our amount of rolling stock lessened by the interchange of cars with the United States?

Mr. COCHRANE: I think not; I think that we get about as many cars from them as they get from us. As to losing cars, it is seldom that ours are broken up by other roads, but sometimes they are returned rather badly broken, especially the wooden cars. The steel cars stand much more knocking around.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Do the company roads of Canada take and keep cars belonging to the Government railways? Do we lose cars in that way?

Mr. COCHRANE: A large amount of our wood product is shipped to the United States and the cars are sometimes detained. The roads co-operate in the matter of exchanging cars; if they can do so, they load them up and ship them off to other places.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Does my hon. friend refer to the company roads?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: My hon. friend has stated that it is the intention of the Government to put the Intercolonial railway under the Railway Commission. That, I suppose, is a provision of the measure which has been under consideration by a special committee during the greater part of this session. It was intimated to me by one of the members of the committee that provision would be made for bringing actions against the Government as owners of the road in the way that actions are brought against any other railway in Canada. I think that would be only right. In the operating of the Intercolonial Railway many matters arise which cannot be settled by arrangement between the parties, and the cases have to go to the courts. The Small Claims Act is very limited in its application. It does not cover all kinds of action and does not deal with claims exceeding $500. Claims involving a greater amount have to go to the Exchequer Court. We have no Exchequer Courts in Nova Scotia.

Mr. COCHRANE: There is no Exchequer Court at any other place than Ottawa, but the judges visit the different districts.

Mr. McKENZIE: Yes, but only for the trial. It is better for the party who has to go to court that he be able to institute proceedings wherever he may live and carry on those proceedings in a convenient court. That is the principle which has resulted in the establishing of courts all over the country; as a rule, trials take place where the actions are instituted. A Government operating a railway should be subject to the same conditions in the matter of actions for damages as any private company. There is no reason why there should not be the same remedy against the Government for damages sustained through the operation of Government railways as there is against the Canadian Pacific or any other company road in similar cases. I submit, therefore, that the Small Claims Act should be dropped and that provision should be inserted in the Government Railways Act to the effect that actions may be brought against the Department of Railways just as they may be brought against private companies. That is to say, all the remedies that the citizen has against any private concern he should have against the Government in respect of its railways. A provision of this kind would result in great convenience to those who have claims against the Government railways. A very striking case of claim for damages occurred in my county. A certain man's property was quite close to a newly-built section of the Intercolonial railway, where a large culvert had been constructed. The water rushed out in floods around his house. Frost came, the water got into his house, threw it out of position and smashed it up. The man brought action for damages under the Small Claims Act, but as the Small Claims Act covers only cases which arise by reason of the operation of the road, the court held that this case arose out of the construction of the road and that therefore, the claim could not be allowed. To that man, whose house and property were destroyed, the Government, on a mere technicality, refused to give anything. I am sure that the minister does not want to shield himself or the Government behind technicalities of that kind. Ample opportunity should be given to the people to obtain any remedies in respect of claims that they may have against a government railroad; they should be able to obtain those remedies just as readily as they can obtain them in similar cases from private concerns.

Canals—staff and repairs, $1,440,000.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Is there any revenue from the canals?

Mr. COCHRANE: No.

Mr. OLIVER: What is the reason for the increase in the cost of operation?

Mr. COCHRANE: Increase in wages.

Mr. OLIVER: The labour on the canals is done by permanent employees, is it not?

Mr. COCHRANE: Most of it, but for extra work we have to employ outside help.

Mr. OLIVER: Have the salaries of permanent employees been increased?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Mr. GERMAN: My hon. friend has not increased them too much; he could reasonably increase them a little more. The employees are not receiving wages which are commensurate with the present cost of living.

Trent Canal—compassionate allowance to the widow of late John Bakes, who was accidentally drowned on August 26, 1916, $2,000.

Mr. COCHRANE: John Bakes, in the employ of the Government as a labourer on the Trent canal, was accidently drowned while assisting to remove a stop-log on dam 19, near Campbellford, Ontario, on August 26, 1916.

Mr. OLIVER: I was wondering how he happened to find a place deep enough to get drowned in.

Mr. COCHRANE: There are places there deep enough for men to get drowned in.

Mr. COPP: I notice differences in the amounts of the compassionate allowances. There is a compassionate allowance of $1,000 to the widow of the late John F. Rogers, who was shot and killed recently at Moncton. This was a very sad circumstance, as the minister knows. The widow is a young woman, and there is a small child in the family. This man had no insurance, and his widow has no means at all. I think the widow is entitled to the full allowance of $2,000 that is allowed to the others.

Mr. COCHRANE: Where a man has been killed in the discharge of his duty, we feel that our liability is greater than it was in this case. We were in no way responsible in this case, and this is truly a compassionate allowance. In the cases of compassionate allowances of $2,000, the men were killed on active duty. This man was not.

Mr. COPP: This man was in the office or building where he was entitled to be. He went down into the basement. He was certainly in the employment of the Government and attending to his duties just as much as any of the others.

Mr. COCHRANE: No. We were in no way responsible.

Mr. COPP: I did not say the Government would be in any way responsible, but the man was attending to the duties of the office in which he was working. I suppose the minister has had a full report on the matter.

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes. The man was not at his duty at all; he was out in the corridor.

Mr. COPP: No, the evidence at the inquest was that he was down in the basement to get some papers from a locker there. He was attending to his duties when he was shot. I do not claim that the Government is at all liable or responsible, but under the conditions of this particular case, if it is possible for the Government to give a compassionate allowance of $2,000, the widow is entitled to it.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by asterisks.)

PORTSMOUTH PENITENTIARY.

Mr. EDWARDS:

1. How many convicts were confined in Portsmouth Penitentiary June 30, 1916, and how many guards were employed?
2. How many convicts were confined in same institution June 30, 1917, and how many guards were employed?
3. When did Robert McDonald resign his position as guard at Portsmouth Penitentiary, and for what reason?
4. How long had he served as guard, and what was his age at time of resignation?
5. How much money, if any, was paid him as gratuity at time of resignation?
6. Was he re-appointed or employed on the staff at the Penitentiary?
7. If so, how long has he been so employed, and at what rate of pay?

Mr. DOHERTY:

1. There were 566 convicts confined in Kingston penitentiary on June 30, 1916. There were 50 permanent and 2 supernumerary guards.

2. Number of convicts, 422. Number of guards 50.

3. Roderick (not Robert) McDonald never was a guard or in any way attached to the police staff of the institution. He resigned November 25, 1914, at which time his life was despaired of owing to an acute attack of heart trouble.

4. Service in the engineer's department 20 years and 6 months. Age, 62.

5. $1,500.

6. Yes, as temporary assistant in the engineer's department.

7. Since May 28, 1915, at the rate of $700 per annum.

COMMISSION ON MR. JUSTICE GALT'S REPORT.

*Mr. FORTIER:

1. Is Mr. Paul Lacoste, K.C., representing the Minister of Public Works before the Commission investigating the report of Mr. Justice Galt?
2. Has any counsel been appointed by the Department of Justice to represent the public before the aforesaid Commission?
3. If so, whom?

Mr. DOHERTY:

1. I am informed that the Hon. Mr. Rogers has retained Mr. Lacoste, K.C., in connection with the matter.

2. No. Under the Inquiries Act and their Commission, the Commissioners are authorized to engage the services of such counsel to aid and assist them as they may deem necessary in the public interest.

[Mr. J. J. Hughes.]

DISCHARGE OF PTE. J. I. SMITH.

Mr. TURRIFF:

1. Was Pte. J. I. Smith, No. 907,162, 195th Battalion, discharged on the 30th of September, 1916?
2. Was the discharge certificate withheld from this man until the 9th of March, 1917? If so, why?
3. Why does the certificate of discharge bear, as the date of its issue, second of March, 1917?
4. Is it a fact that everything that medical skill can devise is used to preserve the life of the man who has voluntarily gone forward and offered to give his life, if need be, on behalf of his country?
5. If so, did the authorities refuse to pay the hospital bill in full in connection with this case?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1. Yes.

2. No.

3. On February 20, Private Smith apparently applied for duplicate copy of discharge certificate to the officer commanding Military District No. 12, which was supplied under date of March 2.

4. Yes; as far as possible.

5. The hospital bill, including all accounts, has been paid in full, except the charge for private and semi-private wards, which special accommodation was provided at the request of Private Smith's father who was informed by the local military authorties, Military District No. 12, at the time, that the extra expenditure for a private ward would not be defrayed by the department. The department has paid the difference between the rate which would ordinarily have been paid, and the rate for the private and semi-private wards.

LESLIE E. BAXTER.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN:

1. In what capacity was Leslie E. Baxter, of Canning, Kings County, N.S., employed by the Department of Agriculture in connection with fruit inspection during the fall and winter of 1916-17?
2. How long was he so employed?
3. How much money did he receive for said employment?
4. Is the Government aware that said Leslie E. Baxter was convicted on the 23rd day of June, 1916, for unlawfully keeping for sale intoxicating liquor contrary to the provisions of the Nova Scotia Temperance Act?
5. Is it the intention of the Government to give employment to persons in Nova Scotia convicted of violating the Nova Scotia Temperance Act?

Mr. BURRELL:

1. As temporary assistant fruit inspector.

2. From September 15, 1916, to February 28, 1917.

3. $276.66 ($50 per month), and $334.69 expenses.

4. No, in so far as this department is concerned.

5. No.

ERNEST EATON.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN:

1. At what date did Ernest Eaton, of Canard, Kings County, N.S., enlist in the 219th Battalion (or one of the other battalions of the Highland Brigade)?
2. Where did he enlist?
3. At what date was he subsequently discharged as physically unfit?
4. For how long was he paid after he was so discharged?
5. Did he subsequently enlist at Halifax? If so, on what date?
6. When was he sent to the Provincial Sanatorium for Tuberculosis at Kentville, N.S.?
7. Was he suffering from tuberculosis at the date of his second enlistment?
8. Was he suffering from tuberculosis at the date of his first discharge?
9. Will the Government pay all charges for his care while in the Provincial Sanatorium at Kentville, N.S.?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1. Enlisted March 13, 1916.
2. At Wolfville, N.S.
3. Discharged August 31, 1916.
4. Not any.
5. No record of re-enlistment.
6. There is no record of his admission to the Provincial Sanatorium for Tuberculosis at Kentville, N.S.
7. Answered by (5).
8. Yes.
9. Yes.

ALDERSHOT CAMP—CORDWOOD SUPPLY.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN:

1. Who had the contract for the supply of cordwood to the Aldershot Camp, near Kentville, N.S., during the summer of 1916?
2. What kind of wood was required under said contract?
3. What was the price paid per cord?
4. How many tenders were received for the supply of cordwood to said camp during the summer of 1916?
5. What are the names and addresses of the several tenderers and the figures of each tender?
6. Did the tenders require delivery of said cordwood at Aldershot Camp?
7. Was any of the said cordwood hauled into Aldershot Camp during the summer of 1916 by the Army Service Corps?
8. If so, how much, and who ordered the Army Service Corps to haul said cordwood to Aldershot Camp?
9. How much did the Government or Department of Militia and Defence receive for services of the Army Service Corps hauling contractor's cordwood to Aldershot Camp during the summer of 1916?
10. Was any deduction made by the Government or the Department of Militia and Defence from the contract for the supply of cordwood to Aldershot Camp during the summer of 1916, for services performed by the Army Service Corps in transporting said cordwood to Aldershot Camp?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1. C. R. Bill, Jr.
2. Hard wood, either beech, black birch, maple or hickory. Soft wood, either pine, spruce or mill slabs of white or red pine.
3. Hard wood, 4 ft. length at $7 per cord (English measure); hard wood, 2 ft. length at $8 per cord (English measure); soft wood, 4 ft. length at $6 per cord (English measure); soft wood, 2 ft. length at $7 per cord (English measure).

4 and 5. Public tenders were called for, by poster, the latter part of April, for supplies for Aldershot camp, including the supply of wood, the posters being put up in conspicuous places in and about Halifax, Windsor and Kentville. The last day for receiving tenders was May 9. Although tenders for other supplies were received, none were received for the supply of wood.

On May 13, hand bills, inviting tenders for wood, were mailed to eleven different firms, whom it was thought might tender.

Only one tender was received, that of C. R. Bill, of Billtown, N.S.

6. Yes.
7. No.
8, 9 and 10. Answered by No. 7.

PENITENTIARIES' REPORT.

Mr. EDWARDS:

1. When was the report of the Inspector of Penitentiaries for the year ending March 31, 1915, ready for distribution?
2. When will the report for the year ending March 31, 1916, be ready for distribution?

Mr. DOHERTY:

1. August 15, 1916.
2. The report is in the printer's hands and will be distributed as soon as printed.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN.

Mr. BELLEMARE:

1. How many officers have been appointed as recruiting officers in the province of Ontario?
2. What are the names, the addresses, nature of duties and pay of such officers?

EXTENSION OF THE TERM OF PARLIAMENT.

MOTION OF SIR ROBERT BORDEN POSTPONED.

On the Order being called:

Sir ROBERT BORDEN:

Resolved, that an humble Address be presented to His Most Excellent Majesty the King, in the following words:—

To the King's Most Excellent Majesty:

Most Gracious Sovereign:

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Canada, in Parliament assembled, humbly approach Your Majesty praying that you may graciously be pleased to give your consent to submit a measure to the Parliament of the United Kingdom, to amend the British North American Act, 1867, in the manner following, or to the following effect:

"An Act to amend the British North America Act, 1867."

Be it enacted by the King's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords, Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:—

1. Notwithstanding anything in the British North America Act, 1867, or in any Act amending the same, or in any Order in Council, or terms or conditions of Union, made or approved under the said Act, or under any Act of the Canadian Parliament, the term of the Twelfth Parliament of Canada is hereby extended until the seventh day of October, 1918.

2. This Act may be cited as the British North America Act, 1917, and the British North America Act, 1867 to 1916, and this Act may be cited together as the British North America Act, 1867 to 1917.

All of which we humbly pray Your Majesty to take into your favourable and gracious consideration.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN (Halifax): With leave of the right hon. gentleman, I should like to make the suggestion to the Prime Minister that the consideration of this resolution be postponed for a few days at least. I do not pretend to speak for any other hon. gentleman on this side of the House. It strikes me personally, however, that it would be only fair that consideration of this resolution be postponed at least until the Military Service Bill has passed through this Chamber. The ultimate disposition of that measure may affect me personally very much in reaching a conclusion upon this resolution. I think my request is a fair one, and I trust that the Prime Minister and his supporters will accede to the suggestion.

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): I should have been glad if my hon. friend had communicated his desire to me a little earlier. I gave notice on Friday last that it was my purpose to proceed with this motion to-day, and I naturally supposed that any request for its postponement would have reached me before the House met this afternoon. I have come here to-day prepared to move this resolution. My hon. friend (Mr. Maclean) suggests that it would be only fair that it should stand a little longer. It has already been on the Order Paper for nearly two months. However, without making any promise as to future postponement, I shall let it stand until to-morrow. I will consider what my hon. friend has said with regard to further postponement.

Mr. OLIVER: I should like the House to understand that, so far as I am concerned, the suggestion of my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) has no support from me.

Mr. MURPHY: I desire to add that that is my position also.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I may add that it really has not any support from me either, but when an appeal is made to me by an hon. gentleman in this House, who suggests that it would be fairer to let the matter stand for a day or two, my usual good nature always impels me to give way if I can.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Mr. Speaker, may I express the hope that the wish expressed by my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Maclean) has not been prejudiced in the eyes of the Government in any way by the opposition of my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver).

Mr. PUGSLEY: I came here especially to-day to participate in this discussion, and I am very sorry indeed that the Prime Minister has decided to let the matter stand over. I think the sooner this question is brought up and decided upon the better it will be for the country at large.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: May I be allowed to say that, while I am ready to go on—my opinion is made up and I do not think any delay will change it—still, when an hon. gentleman of the importance of my friend from Halifax (Mr. Maclean) makes such a request of the Government, I am very glad that the Prime Minister agrees to it. I wish to say that this is a free Parliament, and every member is free to express his opinion.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

The House in Committee on Bill No. 13, to consolidate and amend the Railway Act. —Hon. Frank Cochrane—Mr. Blain in the Chair.

On section 5—to what persons, companies and railways applicable:

Mr. GRAHAM: The Drayton-Acworth report, if I remember correctly, recommends that Government railways be placed under the supervision of the Board of Railway Commissioners. That means that if the larger scheme of railway organization and control is undertaken by the Government, the Government railways will be subject to the jurisdiction of that board. If in this Act, however, no special provision is made in that respect, the Government railways will not come under the control of the Board of Railway Commissioners.

Mr. COCHRANE: It is our intention to introduce an amendment to the Government Railways Act to put Government railways under the control of the Railway Commission. I expected that the Bill would be drawn before this, but my law clerk has been ill.

Mr. GRAHAM: Will not such an Act conflict with this Act as it now stands?

Mr. COCHRANE: No, we are providing that it will not.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am not now expressing any opinion as to the advisability of placing the Government railways under the control of the Board of Railway Commissioners. But we are now passing an Act which provides that Government railways shall not be subject to the jurisdiction of that board. The minister says that later he will introduce an amendment to the Government Railways Act providing that Government railways shall be subject to that board. Should not the words "other than Government railways" be left out of section 5, if a Bill is to be introduced to put the Government railways under the Railway Act?

Mr. COCHRANE: We will let the section stand until the other Bill is introduced.

Mr. GRAHAM: In the first place, by the proposed amendment the Railway Act itself would be made applicable to the Government railways, and by an amendment to the Government Railways Act the latter would come under the Board of Railway Commissioners. To make the matter clear, both Acts should be amended. I agree with the proposal of the minister to let the section stand.

Section stands.

On section 6—Application to railways controlled or operated by Dominion companies.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The change is merely a reconstruction. The new words are:

Without limiting the effect of the last preceding section, extend and—

Then, on the 13th line, in paragraph (b), the word " every " is added. The whole of paragraph (c) is reconstructed in the present Bill.

Mr. GRAHAM: If a provincial company with a provincial charter were to be leased to a company with a Dominion charter, the former road, notwithstanding the fact that it was a provincial railway, would come under the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada.

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM: This also brings up a pretty large question, namely, the joint control of railways operated between the United States and Canada. At one time a proposition was made by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and approved, partially at least, by the late Mr. Justice Mabee, who was at that time chairman of the Canadian Board, that a joint board be formed of representatives from each of these boards, and that all international traffic be entrusted to this joint board. Several hearings were had before the then Minister of Railways as to the advisability of this, and while on a superficial investigation, the matter looked as if it could be worked out quite readily, when we came to the details, there were certain details with regard to the United States railways, particularly in the West, that were not wholly applicable to the Canadian railways. The head of the Railway Department at that time was convinced that the matter was one on which slow progress ought to be made, because there were many pitfalls that we did not see at first. Has the minister considered the possibility of having a board of that kind that would be governed by regulations that would be international and at the same time equitable to the Canadian railways?

Mr. COCHRANE: The matter has not been brought up in my time and I have not paid very much attention to it, but if the proposition could be worked out in a satisfactory way, it would be very desirable. As the hon. member says, it is a matter on which we would have to go slow.

Section 6 agreed to.

On section 7—railroads declared to be for the general advantage of Canada.

Mr. GRAHAM: Section 6, as I understand it, brings roads with a provincial charter under the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners, even if they are not declared to be for the general advantage of Canada, while section 7 brings such railways under the jurisdiction of that board by declaring them to be for the general advantage of Canada.

Mr. COCHRANE: Is it not better to have them under the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners?

Mr. GRAHAM: Most decidedly.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—Provincial railways connecting with or crossing Dominion railways.

Mr. GRAHAM: Is this section new?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The change in this section is to bring it into conformity with the decision in Privy Council vs. The Montreal Street Railway. The words "Street Railways and Tramway" have been taken out in view of the definition of the word "railway."

Mr. GRAHAM: That was a celebrated case.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not think this section differs from the old one to any great extent. I find that the changes that were in the draft Bill have all been struck out and the section is left almost exactly as it was in the old Act. I do not think there is any objection to it

Section agreed to

On section 11—Powers of Deputy Chief Commissioner.

Mr. CARVELL: Subsection 4, of section 11, is an addition or amendment to the original Act, and it is the same as it was in the draft Bill. I think the idea was that, in case of multiplicity of business, they would be able to divide the board, and sit in two or three places at the same time, if necessary, in order to expedite business.

Section agreed to.

On section 23—Duties of secretary.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The only change in section 23 is that in the 25th line the words "chief commissioner" are struck out, and in the 27th line, between the words "board" and "sealed," the words "duly signed and" are inserted.

Mr. CARVELL: That means that the secretary shall obey the directions of the board, as well as the directions of the commissioner. It increases the power of the Chief Commissioner, to a great extent.

Mr. MACDONALD: Is there any provision as to what will occur if the board arrive at a different conclusion from that arrived at by the Chief Commissioner? There might be a conflict, and we should insert a section to provide for that.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not remember the explanation given to the commmittee as to the change. There might be a conflict of authority there. These changes were suggested very largely by a gentleman representing the railway board at the sittings of the committee. This amendment was inserted at his request.

Mr. MACDONALD: I think we had better let this section stand.

Mr. COCHRANE: Very well.

Section stands.

On section 31—Annual report to Governor in Council.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: In the 2nd and 4th lines the word "March" is struck out, and the word "December" inserted.

Mr. COCHRANE: That change was made at the request of the railways; it corresponds with the American practice.

Section agreed to.

On section 33—jurisdiction:

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The words "under this Act or otherwise for carrying this Act into effect", in the twentieth line, are struck out. Then in the twenty-eighth line the words "conferred by this Act" are struck out. The last five lines in the clause are new:

> And wherever by reason of insolvency, sale under mortgage, or any other cause, a railway or section thereof is operated, managed or held otherwise than by the Company, the Board may make any order it deems proper for adapting and applying the provisions of this Act to such case.

Mr. CARVELL: It means that in case a railway is handed over to a receiver, the receiver is under the jurisdiction of the board. It only extends the powers of the board to cover the receiver.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: That is the idea. Under the general scheme of this Act, the Board of Railway Commissioners is dealing with a railway company. If the company is handed over to a receiver the question arises whether, as a matter of law it does not cease to be a railway company as a technical entity. It was therefore thought advisable to give the Board of Railway Commissioners jurisdiction over the receiver.

Section agreed to.

On section 34—power to make orders and regulations:

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The statement made by Mr. Price in regard to clause 34 to 44 is that they are as to the power of the board to make orders and regulations. Subsections 2 and 3 of clause 34 are made more complete in order to obviate any question being raised as to the powers of the board to make orders.

Mr. GRAHAM: It would strike me that provision is made in this Act to cover any of the provisions in any other Act that might be passed.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: That is what it says.

Mr. CARVELL: If there is an imposition or a penalty of any kind provided by any other Act, the Board of Railway Commissioners has jurisdiction to enforce it. It practically gives the board power over all legislation governing railways, whether included in this Act or in a special Act.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Where is there in the Act providing for its enforcement?

Mr. CARVELL: That is provided for later on; there is a section regarding penalties.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: But, where is the imposition of a duty upon somebody to enforce this Act?

Mr. COCHRANE: The Railway Commission will enforce it.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: If the Railway Commission see fit to enforce it.

Mr. NESBITT: That is what we have them for.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: But, is there a direct clause in this Act for its enforcement? We will shortly be dealing with clause 42, which refers to the employment of counsel in the public interests. According to this clause the board may apply to the Minister of Justice to instruct counsel.

Mr. COCHRANE: That is not at all for the enforcement of the Act.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Of course, there may be provisions later for enforcing the Act, but so far its enforcement is all done incidentally. It would be well for us to know the manner in which the board is to enforce this Act, and who should be held responsible for its enforcement. I dealt with the question in the House the other day, in connection with another Act. I also attended some of the meetings of the special committee which had this matter under consideration, andmet some of the men representing the brotherhoods. They said the great question with them was the enforcement of the Railway Act.

Mr. COCHRANE: Why did they not mention that to the committee?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: They did mention it, and I mentioned it also. I mention it now, and I hope the minister will consider it, so that we may have a direct and specific clause in the Act indicating that it is the duty of the Railway Commission, or the Attorney General of Canada, or somebody else, to enforce the Act. It should not be left to any one to go before the board and make an application that the Minister of Justice appoint counsel to conduct an investigation in order to bring out the facts in the public interest. This should be done by the Railway Commission of its own motion, and it should have power to employ special counsel at any time, and the duty should be imposed upon it to enforce and administer this law.

Mr. CARVELL: I understand that the hon. gentleman wants to have a public officer appointed whose duty it is to enforce the railway law of Canada. I am afraid he would have to have a whole army of public officers, as these matters come up in every portion of Canada. There are plenty of powers given to somebody. If the hon. gentleman will look at sections 43 and 44 he will find that 43 provides for a stated case to go to the Supreme Court and 44 gives effect to the judgment of other courts. Then section 49 provides that any court in Canada having the proper jurisdiction can make a decision of the board a rule of court, and then it can be worked out the same as any rule of court would be in any province in Canada. You go on to sections 51 and 52 and these provide for appeal and review. There is plenty of machinery, plenty of law. What my hon. friend wants is some officer whose duty it is to see that the law is enforced and the machinery is put into motion. That is done by the people in the different parts of Canada who are interested. I am a practising lawyer and a client comes to me and says: I feel that the railway company is not carrying out the law; I am damaged or I have a grievance against that railway company. On this I apply through the proper channel and call upon the company to remedy that grievance. If they fail to do so I take whatever action I may think necessary. If you appointed one officer to carry out the law, you would never have it done, because you would have such a multiplicity of cases that it would be impossible to go on with them all. You might have an officer who would say to me: I do not think that your client's case has very much merit and I do not know why I should bother my head about pressing it. He might in that way take away from my client the right which the law gives him.

We are getting along pretty well and I would be opposed to seeing an officer appointed who could take away from the ordinary resident of Canada the rights which are guaranteed to him by the Railway Act. He has rights now which enable him to go to the courts and enforce those rights under the law and machinery of the Act if necessary.

4 p.m.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: My hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell) has stated my case in another way. He says that the enforcement of this Act rests mainly upon the private prosecutor or the person who feels aggrieved; he must put the law in motion. It is all very well to allow that right to rest with the individual. His right is provided for and I have no objection to that. But I also want something else; I want to have the duty imposed upon the board to enforce the law or I want to do as they do in the United States—in legislation of this kind in the United States they insert a clause which says that it shall be the duty of the Attorney General of the United States to enforce this law, having in view the rights of the public. He is by the Act authorized to appoint special counsel, to engage experts and others who can supply him with information on the subject, and he is further voted a sum of money to be at his disposal at any time for the enforcement of the Act. We in Canada are passing Federal Acts year after year, some of them having very wide powers, but we make no provision for the enforcement of these Acts as they do in the United States. With regard to many of them, we are gradually finding a roundabout way of securing their enforcement. But I should like to see a provision inserted for the enforcement of this Act. There are many instances in which this Act ought to be enforced, but it is not enforced because there is no provision for enforcing it. When we are discussing these wide powers which are to be conferred on the board we ought also to impose on the board the duty of enforcing the law. Representatives of the brotherhoods, as well as individuals all over the country, say that it has been hard to secure the enforcement of this law. That is the line of argument that we have heard, and I would ask the minister to tell us, either now or a little later on, how he proposes to strengthen the uses of this Railway Act to the public by making provision for its adequate enforcement.

Mr. GRAHAM: If this were an ordinary Act that was only enforced through court proceedings there would be a good deal to be said in favour of my hon. friend's contention. But the object in establishing the Board of Railway Commissioners was not to make it a court, but to keep it as far away from being a court as we possibly could. It was to be a quick and ready tribunal before which anybody could state his case. When I was Minister of Railways the question of the appointment of a public prosecutor was urged many times, but in discussing it with the then Chairman and with a great many public men, who have large business interests in shipping, etc., I found that none of them wanted to have a public prosecutor appointed for this particular Act. Among the reasons for that opinion was the fear that it would be surrounded by all the formalities and red tape of a court, and that the ordinary individual would of necessity be compelled eventually to approach that court through the public prosecutor. The object of establishing this Commission was that any person, even a widow with a grievance about a crossing on her farm, could appeal, by letter, perhaps, without going before the tribunal at all, and get substantial justice. Hundreds and hundreds of cases have been disposed of merely by a letter from the secretary to the railway company. The difficulty about appointing a public prosecutor would be that we would possibly get into a condition in which we might as well not have a railway commission at all, but a regular court, to try these cases. This Board hears counsel in any case that is brought before it if the applicant desires to be represented by counsel, but at the same time the humblest individual in Canada can go before the Board, state his or her case, and have it decided.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I agree with what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Graham) says, but he does not meet my case. I do not ask for a public prosecutor. I ask that the duty be imposed on somebody to enforce this Act. I propose to make it the duty of this expensive organization, the Board of Railway Commissioners, to enforce it and to see that justice is done in any case where an individual brings before it a case of injustice. The enforcement of federal laws should not be left to the individual who feels aggrieved. We trust to the Minister of Customs to see that the customs law is obeyed and that the revenue is not defrauded. That minister makes prosecutions, and sometimes calls in, as he has a right to call in, the Minister of Justice to assist him. Under this Act the duty is not laid upon the Board of Railway Commissioners to enforce this Act. I ask that the Act shall say who is responsible for its enforcement. I am anxious to avoid, so far as possible, all red tape.

Mr. CARVELL: Has my hon. friend heard of a case in Canada since the Commission was created in which it has not enforced any order that was made?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: My hon. friend is talking about orders. I want enforcement of the law, not of orders.

Mr. COCHRANE: Do you want it enforced without being heard?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: No, it will be heard.

Mr. COCHRANE: Then they will enforce it.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Who will enforce it?

Mr. COCHRANE: The Railway Commission.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: It is one of the representations of the brotherhoods that there is lots of power but none of that direct enforcement which the people of the United States are finding necessary in connection with their federal legislation. I want some provision for the enforcement of the Act. If I cannot do any better, I shall submit the clause in the transportation law of the United States which places responsibility for the enforcement of the Act.

Mr. NESBITT: If the hon. member will draft a clause he will consider it when we have gone through the Bill. It will have to come at the end anyway.

Mr. ARMSTRONG: I know that in the United States many Acts passed by Congress have such a clause as the hon. member has mentioned, but it would be impossible to apply such a clause to this Bill. However, we will be glad to consider any clause he may draft.

Mr. COCHRANE: The hon. member has not mentioned one case where the railway commission have not enforced the law.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I will give you cases, and they have been mentioned before the special committee.

Mr. MURPHY: Where the board was asked to act and did not?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: No, but cases where there was difficulty in getting any enforcement of the Act.

Mr. NESBITT: If the hon. member will put his suggestion in concrete form we can consider it.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I will put it in concrete form, and it will be the first time in our fifty years of history that we have put direct responsibility on somebody for the enforcement of the laws of this country. I spoke the other day about the attainment of national unity. They are attaining national unity in the United States by federal enforcement of federal law. One great thing about their constitution as compared with ours—and I am not saying which is better—is that the President of the United States has very large powers, and so has the Attorney General of the United States, for the enforcement of federal laws. I will submit later on a specific proposal in this direction.

Mr. GLASS: Would municipalities affected by clauses of this Act have power to pass by-laws consistent with the provisions of the Act and to enforce penalties, also consistent with the Act, on a charge laid before a magistrate? I refer to such matters as the sounding of an alarm, the whistling at crossings, or the destruction of weeds on right of way. There are many matters of that kind upon which municipalities pass by-laws affecting individuals.

Mr. CARVELL: There is a clause dealing with that. I think my hon. friend will find it is all provided for.

Mr. COCHRANE: But it is not for a magistrate to enforce; it is for the railway commission.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not think any one would go so far as to give a municipality power to pass a by-law under the Act and to have it enforced by the magistrate.

Mr. GLASS: The municipality has power, under provincial legislation, to pass laws with relation to the cutting and destruction of weeds. Take that as a concrete case. A serious growth of weeds on a railway right of way running through a municipality is a serious menace to the surrounding farms. I have known cases where, through neglect, weeds grew in profusion on the right of way and the seeds were carried to farms nearby that had been perfectly clean. This Act provides a penalty if a railway does not destroy the weeds growing on its right of way. But would the municipality have the right, under their by-laws, to take action in the matter?

Mr. CARVELL: The municipalities have no jurisdiction whatever. Section 279 of the Act provides:

> Every company shall cause thistles and all noxious woods growing on the right of way, and upon land of the company adjoining the railway, to be cut down or to be rooted out and destroyed each year, before such thistles or weeds have sufficiently matured to seed.

If a railway company failed to carry out the provisions of this section, application could be made to the Board of Railway Commissioners for action in the matter. The Board would thereupon issue an order, and enforce it. If a municipality were allowed to interfere in this way with the operation of a railway company, the Railway Act would cease to be of any value.

Section agreed to.

On section 42—employment of counsel in public interest:

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: In this section we find all the provision that is made in the Bill for the protection of public rights under this law. The section is in part, as follows:

> The Board may, in any application, proceeding or matter of special importance pending before it, if in the opinion of the Board the public interest so requires, apply to the Minister of Justice to instruct counsel to conduct or argue the case or any particular question arising in the application.

That is, the public rights will be protected if in the opinion of the Board the public interest so requires. That is my whole case. The duty is imposed on private individuals and on private interests to take care of themselves, but in important cases counsel can be appointed to take care of the public interest. If the Board sees fit to make application for counsel, the Minister of Justice may grant it. A gentleman learned in the law will then state the case, and perhaps justice will be done. But I say that somebody—the Minister of Justice, the Solicitor-General: I care not who—ought to see to these things, and be responsible. I would impose upon the board the duty of enforcing the law and of seeing that the public interest is protected in all cases. We make provision for the protection of the public interest in cases where the board think those interests ought to be protected and where the Minister of Justice is a consenting party. But what about all the other cases? Should the duty not be imposed on the Railway Board of enforcing the law and of protecting the interests of the public, of the individual—of the widow, mentioned a little while ago? There is where the Act breaks down as a protection of the public interest. Later on I am going to ask the committee to insert in this Act a provision for its enforcement in every direction.

On section 49—rule of court:

Mr. CARVELL: There was a discussion before the committee as to the powers of this Parliament to direct a court (or an officer thereof) of a province to carry out the orders of the board. I expressed very grave doubt about our jurisdiction, and I still have grave doubt, but the answer given to me then was, we have been doing this—and, to use the vernacular, we have been getting away with it, so they did not see any reason why we should depart from the practice. I have strong doubt whether this Parliament has power to say that the Supreme Court of a province shall or shall not do a certain thing, or that the registrar of a province, who is purely a provincial officer, shall or shall not do a certain thing. This, however, has been the law in the past, and the special committee decided to leave it in this Bill, and I have no objection to it.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: We have had this in force for many years.

Mr. CARVELL: That was the answer I received.

Mr. MACDONALD: I agree with the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell). The fact that such orders have been made and put through in the past is no indication of the legal right to make such provisions in this Bill. At some time, in a very important case, the question will be raised as to the right of making the decisions of the Board of Railway Commissioners a rule of our provincial courts. The matter will form a subject of consideration, and possibly there will be a decision against the right of those courts to accept such rulings. It is the duty of the Minister of Justice to communicate with the attorney generals of the different provinces and ask them to pass ancillary legislation to make this effective. While the Minister of Justice reviews legislation passed by the different provinces, and, if necessary, calls the attention of the Provincial Attorney General to the validity of any measure, and also informs him whether the legislature have attempted to exceed their jurisdiction, there is no such revising authority over Dominion legislation.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: We have reached one stage further so far as the public interest is concerned. The jurisdiction of the provinces over certain matters has been called into question by two able lawyers, one from the New Brunswick courts and one from Nova Scotia. We may have to make provision in connection with federal legislation for the establishment of federal courts where these decrees will be recorded, and whereby they will be enforced. We are coming nearer to the issue that I have presented in this House. This shows how weak our system is after fifty years of experience. It has taken the people of the United States 150 years to find out that if they want to have effective legislation, and to protect the public interest, they must impose upon some federal officer or court the duty of enforcing that legislation, and they must constitute a federal court for registering their decrees and impose upon the officers of that federal court the duty of seeing that the decrees are carried out, not leaving their enforcement to the grace of some court or other organization in a province.

Mr. COCHRANE: I shall be very glad to bring the matter to the attention of the Minister of Justice, and to inform him of the remarks made by the hon. members for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) and Pictou (Mr. Macdonald).

Section agreed to.

On section 52—Governor in Council may vary or rescind:

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The only changes are in the first line. After the word "may" the words "at any time" are inserted. After the word "interested" on the third line, the words "or in his own motion," are inserted, and the words "within one month after the making of the order, decision, rule or regulation," struck out.

Mr. CARVELL: That leaves it practically as the old law stood—very slight change.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Yes. The words were struck out by the committee.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I want to read the section of the United States Act to the House, and I hope to be able to show the committee that there is something in the contention I have urged.

Mr. COCHRANE: The committee instructs us to draft a section, and we will frame it later on, so that the hon. gentleman need not take up so much time discussing it.

Mr. NESBITT: Why not state the point when you introduce the resolution?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I want to place it on record now. I have obtained the document, and it is only common courtesy for the House to allow me to read it. I desire to show how the Public Railway Act is administered in the United States. I will read the section and I hope the minister and hon. members will listen to it. Section 12 reads as follows:

> That the Commission hereby created shall have authority to inquire into the management of the business of all common carriers subject to the provision of this Act, and shall keep itself informed as to the manner and method in which the same is conducted—

Mr. GRAHAM: That is the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Yes. The section continues:

> —and shall have the right to obtain from such common carriers full and complete information necessary to enable the Commission to perform the duties and carry out the objects for which it was created, and the Commission is hereby authorized and required to execute and enforce the provisions of this Act;—

That is what I want in this country. I desire a provision inserted that the Railway Commission shall be required to enforce the provisions of this Bill, and I have not got it yet. All that is provided is that the provisions of this Act may be enforced, if the Minister of Justice, on the request of the Railway Board, appoints a solicitor to enforce the Act. The section continues:

> —and upon request of the Commission it shall be the duty of any district attorney of the United States to whom the Commission may apply to institute in the proper court and to prosecute under the direction of the Attorney General of the United States all necessary proceedings for the enforcement of the provisions of this Act, and for the punishment of all violations thereof, and the costs and expenses of such prosecution shall be paid out of the appropriation for the expenses of the courts of the United States; and for the purposes of this Act the company shall have power to require, by subpoena, the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of all books, papers, tariffs, contracts, agreements and documents relating to any matter under investigation.

We have no such provision in our Act, and I again direct the attention of the Minister of Railways to it and ask him, in all fairness, to consider this question; and I ask him to ask the Minister of Justice and the Prime Minister whether it is not time that he should enact for Canada a similar provision for the enforcement of our laws. We have spent a lot of time on this measure and I compliment the minister on the excellent Act which has been framed. I say that it is deficient in the essential that no provision is made for its enforcement.

Mr. CARVELL: I must confess that I have never read the United States Intercommerce law as carefully as my hon. friend, and I do not profess to know what the provisions are, and I have been wondering if that Act goes as far as our does.

Mr. GRAHAM: In many ways it does not.

Mr. CARVELL: There is no power that our railway commission does not possess in regard to requiring the railway companies to do anything that can be conceived.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: But where is the provision compelling them to do it?

Mr. CARVELL: They have the power to make rules and regulations. If a railway company is not observing the law and is granting exceptional advantages to one company over another—discrimination in traffic or in rates, or anything of that kind —the Board of Railway Commissioners has absolute power to take action. This Act was in force before I came to Parliament, and I have been before this board a great many times, and I have never heard a suggestion that it does not enforce its decree and orders, and I cannot understand why there should be any necessity for a provision of this kind.

Mr. COCHRANE: The commission would be useless if it did not enforce its orders.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: The hon. gentleman from Carleton (Mr. Carvell) is talking about decrees. They enforce the decrees, but supposing they do not make the decrees?

Mr. CARVELL: I will give an illustration. I got a letter within the last three weeks from a gentleman in New Brunswick, not in my own constituency, pointing out the fact that a certain railway crossing was not protected and that something should be provided in the way of gates or guards. I at once sent the letter on to the railway company, and asked them to give it their consideration. I received a courteous letter from them, stating that they would hand it over to their traffic department and would give me an answer. I have not received their decision yet, but if they fail to do what the people think they should do, all I have to do is to go to the Board of Railway Commissioners and if they order the company to put on guards or gates or watchmen, the commission will enforce such an order. It seems to me there is nothing to argue about.

Mr. NESBITT: We have given them absolute power to do every conceivable thing in regard to the railways.

Mr. CARVELL: I have never heard of a case where the board has not adjudicated on any matter submitted to them, and if they decide that a person is entitled to relief that relief is granted.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: This is an attempt to draw a red herring across the trail. I am not suggesting that the board has not the power, but in many cases they do not take action.

Mr. CARVELL: The hon. gentleman admits they have the power.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Yes, but there is no provision that they must exercise this power. If somebody calls their attention to it they may do it. The United States Act provides that the commission shall keep themselves posted in regard to the requirements of that Act.

Mr. COCHRANE: The hon. gentleman has not given us a case where they have not enforced it.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I will give cases later on, but I want to deal with general principles to begin with. I say that the Railway Commission should be empowered and ordered to enforce this Act, and that they should have the means placed at their disposal to carry out the orders. We could have the Act enforced if the Minister of Justice would appoint an attorney to look after its enforcement. I place this point before the people of the country as the difference between our Railway Act and the Railway Act of the United States. I would like to address a meeting of the farmers of this country, who are studying this question of transportation very closely, and point out to them the difference between the two Acts in the power of enforcement and the protection of the public rights. It should not be left to somebody, or to the Board itself, to ask for the appointment of counsel to assist in enforcing the law. It should be the duty of the Board to enforce the law. If permanent counsel are required I would not have any objection to their appointment, but I do say the responsibility should be with the Board. Apparently it is a hard thing to persuade this committee to see the question in that light, but that was the experience of the United States.

Mr. NESBITT: Will my hon. friend tell us when the Interstate Commerce Commission was appointed?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Many years before ours.

Mr. NESBITT: My impression was that ours was first.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I am quite sure the United States Commission was first. In any event, they have had a wider experience than ours. I would ask hon. gentlemen to secure a copy of the United States Act, and study it. Clause after clause of our Act has been taken bodily from it.

Mr. McKENZIE: As I understand the point made by the hon. member, he thinks this Commission, or court, should institute proceedings before itself. To my mind, that is not practicable in Canada. If it were done I fear the court would very soon lose its weight, influence and respect. I think it is as well to leave the matter as it is, and when any one has a grievance let the question be taken up in the proper manner before the Board. Perhaps I would go to the extent of agreeing with the hon. gentleman that there might be a public officer appointed whose duty it would be to institute proceedings before the Board.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: It is very hard to convince those able lawyers in regard to the jurisdiction of courts. I am only an ordinary layman—

Mr. GRAHAM; No, not an ordinary layman; you are better than that.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: For the instruction of the distinguished legal light from Nova Scotia (Mr. McKenzie), who was a judge and who knows a good deal about courts, let me direct his attention to the following:

> And the Commission is hereby authorized and required to execute and enforce the provisions of this Act; and upon the request of the Commission, it shall be the duty of any district attorney of the United States to whom the Commission may apply to institute in the proper court, and to prosecute under the direction of the Attorney General of the United States all necessary proceedings for the enforcement of the provisions of this Act and for the punishment of all violations thereof, and the costs and expenses of such prosecution shall be paid out of the appropriation for the expenses of the courts of the United States.

Mr. CARVELL: That is provided for in section 49 of our Act.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: But there is nothing to show whose duty it is to enforce the law. My hon. friend from North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) says we do not need any court, or we are imposing an unnecessary duty on the commission. In the United States they impose certain duties on the commission in connection with the enforcement of the law. They go further and say:

> Any district attorney may proceed in any proper court and sue and have due performance of what is called for under the Act.

And penalties are imposed and fines collected. We have not that clear-cut direction for the enforcement of our Act. It has taken me twenty-five years to get a hearing in this House in connection with the enforcement of the federal law. I have been side-tracked twenty times by men who were Ministers of Justice, trying to evade this point. However, this condition of affairs will not continue much longer. There are a number of federal laws on our statute book which are not being enforced and the duty of enforcing them is not placed on any one. After fifty years' experience, I think we ought to change the law in this direction, and I again draw the attention of the Minister of Railways to the fact that he may make this excellent Act of his still more effective by including in it a provision for its enforcement similar to the provision in the United States Act.

Mr. CARVELL: Has the hon. gentleman carefully read the provisions of Section 392 of this Act?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I know the provisions of the section.

Mr. CARVELL: What can be stronger than that.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: The hon. gentleman again begs the question. This is the greatest trick which has taken place this afternoon. That sections says "Whenever it is proved." What provision have you made for "whenever it is proved"?

Mr. CARVELL: An order of the board is all that is required.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: That is so, in cases where it is proved. But who proves it, or whose duty is it to prove it?

Mr. CARVELL: The interested party, of course.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: That is bringing it back again to the interested party. I want a provision in the Act that its enforcement shall rest with some responsible official of the commission, or the Attorney General of Canada, or somebody else.

Mr. NESBITT: If you had a provision in the Act that the Railway Commission should see to its enforcement, and the Railway Commission did not do so, what would be the result?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: We could bring them before Parliament.

Mr. NESBITT: Who would know they did not do it?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: You would know, as a member of Parliament.

Mr. CARVELL: Let me cite an instance. The law says there shall be proper fences and cattle guards. Does my hon. friend think there should be some official who would go around and see that those cattle guards are in their places, and, if they are not, institute proceedings against the railway company?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: The hon. gentleman raises a tu'penny-ha'penny case.

Mr. CARVELL: But, there is no difference in the principle.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I admit the board may make an order, and when they order that so-and-so shall happen the public will be protected; or, when the Attorney General of Canada sees fit to engage counsel to prosecute the case the public will be protected. But again, if that does not happen, who is to protect the public? I appeal to my hon. friend (Mr. Wright) who is a common, ordinary farmer—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GRAHAM: A real farmer.

Mr. NESBITT: He is not a common farmer.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Well we will say an ordinary farmer. I am a very poor farmer myself; I have not got to the high exaltation of being a farmer yet, but a farmer can see that it is one thing to make a law and quite another to enforce it. This is a good law and the farmers of the West as well as the farmers of Ontario are reading up these laws. We see the necessity of improving this law, and this is a vastly improved law, but it must be enforced. They have passed a law in the United States for the enforcement of railway legislation. They not only make provision in that law for its enforcement but they provide the money and they put the duty on the railway commission to keep themselves posted as to the objects of the law. It is their duty to enforce it and to go to the district attorneys throughout the United States and through them to lay information before the court. Why should there not be provision for the enforcement of this law which is based on the Inter-state Commerce Act?

Mr. CARVELL: I want to go back to my little case of a railway company that fails to keep proper guards in place at the highway crossing and I want to ask my hon. friend a question. Would he want a provision in the law that a farmer, or a man travelling along the road, could write to this officer representing the Attorney General and have him take charge of the case and present it to the board and then have the board issue an order. Does he want to have some official to see that the order is enforced, or does he only want to see that the order of the board is enforced?

5 p.m.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I only want to see that the law is enforced and I want to see that when the order is made it is carried out. I want the duty put upon somebody to carry out the law whether it is done by a clause similar to this clause in the Interstate Commerce Act or otherwise. It is very clear what I want.

Mr. NESBITT: Why not get your resolution ready so that we will know what you want?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I am going to get it ready but it takes a great deal of time to get an argument before this committee.

Mr. GRAHAM: You have to prepare the ground first?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Yes, the ground has to be planted and watered, but I think I have made some impression on the committee.

Mr. NESBITT: You sure have.

Mr. McKENZIE: How could this law be different from any other law? There is no person especially appointed to enforce the criminal law. I am sure the hon. gentleman would not like to see the judges of the Superior Courts of Ontario going out and starting criminal prosecutions and then getting these cases before them. Does he want the members of this board to look for trouble all over Canada, get the cases brought before them and then try them?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I want the board to protect the public rights. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McKenzie) says that we are satisfied with the way the Criminal Code is being enforced. Are we? I am not satisfied with the way that federal law is being enforced by local attorneys in various parts of the country. When I had this question up in another case the leader of the Opposition asked me why I did not go to Mr. Foy for the enforcement of a certain Act in Ontario. I said in reply: You cannot always get enforcement of the Criminal Code by provincial authorities. I want to give another specific instance of that. We have a law against combinations in restraint of trade. The whole prosecution devolves upon the private prosecutor. It is the old story; unload it on the private individual. Of course this federal Act declares that combines are illegal, but it does not say that it shall be the duty of the Attorney General of Canada to enforce this law against combines, nor is there a sum of money set apart for the enforcement of the law or the prosecution of combines against the public interest. Day after day we are passing Acts in this Parliament and making no provision for their enforcement. Of all the humbug Acts that were ever passed by this Parliament, the Acts in connection with federal elections are the most notable. Has there ever been any prosecution of any kind under those Acts? There have been lots of saw-offs and the people know all about that, but there has never been any enforcement of the election law of this country. That we leave to somebody else. I am talking right outside of this House now and to the people of Canada, and I say that when you are making laws in the public interest you must also make provision for their enforcement. I will give another instance where the United States has had to resort to a special federal law. They never could secure the enforcement of the law against some of the worst crimes that were ever committed in the United States in connection with labour troubles. There were lots of statutes in the various states against the perpetration of such crimes but no enforcement of those statutes. The danger to the public from the perpetration of those crimes was so great and the inability to get any of these laws enforced so evident that the Congress and Government of the United States were driven to the adoption of a subterfuge. They passed an Act providing that whoever employed a railway train for the conveyance of dynamite, or travelled on a railway train for the purpose of committing a crime of this kind, would be liable to be indicted in a court and tried for the crime which he committed. These crimes were put down in the United States by the enforcement of a federal law by the Attorney General of the United States, who had all the resources of the country at his back. They got prosecutions and convictions, and they put an end to these crimes. You ask: Why do you not get your criminal law enforced by means of provincial officials and courts? At times you get it and get substantial justice, but there are many cases where you cannot get that substantial justice because you cannot bring about the enforcement of the law. Again I come back to my argument that if this law is to be effective you must make provision for its enforcement and impose the duty primarily on the commission itself and also on the Attorney General of the country, because, perhaps, proceedings in a federal court may yet have to come. That is the question and it must be specifically dealt with in this Act.

Mr. WRIGHT: Do I understand the hon. member to advocate the establishment of two complete sets of legal machinery in the country, from constables up to Supreme Court, one for the Dominion and one for the various provinces?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I do not quite say that, but it is where the United States have landed now. There are United States federal courts and there are state courts. They have marshals of the United States courts who can go out and arrest men, and they have attorneys of the United States scattered all over the union to enforce federal law. They found it necessary to do so in order to protect the public interest.

Mr. COCHRANE: We have a federal court here; we have it under this Bill.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: What?

Mr. COCHRANE: Effective means of enforcing the law.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: We have and we have not. We have not the effective means, and I will give some specific instances later on. The Act is all right if the duty is placed upon somebody of enforcing it.

Section agreed to.

On section 52—Governor in Council may vary or rescind:

Mr. CARVELL: There is very little change in this from the original law. The first subsection provides that the Governor in Council may vary or rescind an order of the board; the second provides that an appeal shall lie to the Supreme Court on a question of jurisdiction. The third provides that an appeal shall lie to the Supreme Court, upon a question of law or a question of jurisdiction or both, provided leave is granted by the board. The idea is to discourage appeals, so far as possible, and to make the decisions of the board final. The later part of the section is the same as before.

Mr. GRAHAM: Are there many appeals, as a matter of fact?

Mr. COCHRANE: No. Taking the number of cases, the appeals are very few.

Mr. GRAHAM: There are not many appeals to the Governor in Council either, are there?

Mr. COCHRANE: No.

On section 97—calls, how made, etc.:

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: A change has been made in the numbering of the sections. Certain sections respecting calls have been taken from pages 41 and 42 of the Bill and inserted before the sections dealing with meetings of shareholders.

Mr. CARVELL: It was contended in the committee that the sections were not logically arranged; that they did not follow in proper sequence. It was thought that the provisions respecting calls should follow the provisions respecting the taking of stock by municipal corporations, the rights of shareholders, the keeping of the record of shareholders' names, etc. After you have authorized the issuing of stock you ought to provide some means of getting the money on that stock. In the original Railway Act the sections regarding calls do not appear as they appear in the reprinted Bill. Sections 121 to 126, inclusive, of the draft Bill before the committee are sections 97 to 102, inclusive, of the Bill as reprinted. Section 103 of the reprinted Bill was section 97 in the draft Bill.

Section agreed to.

On section 113—qualifications of directors.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The first three lines of subsection 3 of the old section—

[Mr. W. F. Maclean.]

If the company has received aid towards the construction of its railway or undertaking or any part thereof from the Government, under any Act of the Parliament of Canada.

—are struck out, and the word "its" is changed to "the" so that the subsection now reads:

A majority of the directors shall be British subjects.

On section 117—president.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: In the last line of the first subsection the words "one or more vice-presidents" are inserted in place of the words "a vice-president." In the second subsection, the words "be the chairman of" are inserted after the word "present." In the third subsection the words "or one of the vice-presidents, according to such priority" are inserted after the words "vice-president," and in the fourth subsection the words "or vice-presidents" are inserted after the word "vice-president."

Section agreed to.

On section 124—powers of vice-president.

Mr. CARVELL: The real object of the change is, in case of the absence of the president or even of the vice-presidents, that there shall be a presiding officer.

Section agreed to.

On section 132—securities, bonds, etc.:

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: There is a reconstruction in this section. More ample provision is made for the executing of securities. The arbitrary limit as to the amount of a single security which was complained of as inappropriate, has been removed, but this has no effect on the total amount authorized. In subsection 3, the word "five" is changed to "six," providing that the securities may bear 6 per cent interest instead of 5.

Section agreed to.

On section 135—mortgage deeds of trust:

Mr. CARVELL: The change in this section ensures that they can provide for more than one trust deed or mortgage, whereas as the Act read previously there was some doubt. The real change is that it provides for more than one mortgage or trust deed.

Section agreed to.

On section 138—other filing deposit or registration not necessary.

Mr. CARVELL: When the Act was codified in 1906 there might have been litigation pending, but it was thought that, after ten years had gone by, this litigation would be all out of the way, and it was best to strike out those last four lines.

Mr. GRAHAM: It is protecting litigation then under way.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 139—instruments deposited, evidence of.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: In the 6th line, after the word "Canada" the word "purporting to be" are added.

Mr. CARVELL: As long as the document purports to be certified, it can be received.

Section agreed to.

On section 146—regulation of stock and bond issues:

Mr. CARVELL: I should like to call the attention of the committee to the fact that section 146 of the draft Bill was struck out entirely by the sub-committee. Personally I had some objection to it being removed. I should rather have seen the section remain in the Bill. In general, section 146 provided that any securities issued by the company must be first approved by the board, but the sub-committee thought it might be better to throw that out entirely. I still believe there ought to be some regulation as to the amount of securities which a railway company can issue upon its undertaking. While I know that stock in the ordinary railway company of Canada has not very much value, because nobody puts any money in railways except the Government, still the principle of this section seems to be a good one. We are legislating for the future. The time may come when people will put up money for the railway companies, and I do not think they should be allowed to issue stock or securities, whether it be stock or bonds or whatever it may be, at their own sweet will. I think there should be some power to regulate the amount of stock they can issue on a mile of railway.

Mr. COCHRANE: Is it not regulated by the charter?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, but there is no fixed rule followed. The Railway Committee fixes the amount one year, and says, "We are going to keep this down to a certain amount," but the next year they will put it up to a certain amount. I do not think the railway companies should be allowed to pledge these securities, and then come back to some authority in the province, or to the Railway Board, and say, "You ought not to change the rates, because we cannot pay dividends unless we are allowed to charge certain rates." The railway companies may be asking to pay dividends on stock that is of no value, or upon securities which are sold for a mere song. It is the old, old story of watered stock, and I think there should be some regulation of the amount of stock and securities which a railway company can issue. I do not ask for any amendment, but I desire to call attention to that feature.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The railway Board appeared before the committee and said it would be impossible for them to undertake the work.

Mr. CARVELL: I know that, and I have heard the story many times as to how impossible it is to control those gentlemen who wish to issue watered stock, not only in connection with railways but in everything else. At the same time, I do not always believe what I am told about these things. I call the attention of the committee to the fact that this clause was included in the draft Bill and was eliminated by the sub-committee.

Mr. MACDONELL: There were two reasons, one being that the Railway Board expressed disapproval of it, and the other, that if the Board of Railway Commissioners authorized or approved of a certain issue of securities, that would be regarded by persons outside of the country as having put the imprimatur of the Board of Railway Commissioners of Canada upon the issue of that amount of securities, and in that way might mislead people who would buy those securities under the belief that the Board of Railway Commissioners, having authorized the issue, certified in a sense that it was a proper and a safe issue.

Mr. CARVELL: I believe that was the argument advanced. No doubt the minister has on many occasions been asked to buy branch lines, and I will venture to say that in every case he has been up against a bond issue which he did not believe to be genuine. The men who worked out the railways in the first instance, are dead, and have been succeeded by other gentlemen who come to him perfectly honestly and say: "Here are the bonds against this railway, and you must pay us sufficient to carry those bonds." If there had been some public body in the beginning, which would have said: "Thus far shalt thou go and no farther" probably this condition of affairs would not have arisen.

Section agreed to.

On section 162—limitation of time for construction.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Section 162 is the same as in the old Act except the last paragraph. It is reconstructed as subsection 2 as follows:

The tracks of every railway, the construction of which is hereafter commenced, shall be of the standard gauge of four feet eight and one half inches, unless otherwise permitted by the Board.

Mr. CARVELL: Heretofore all acts that were passed had in them a clause that the company might construct a railway of a gauge of four feet eight and a half inches. That had to be put in every special Act. By incorporating this clause in the General Act that will not be necessary in future.

On section 166—Commencement of the works.

Mr. COCHRANE: The change in this section is that the board approves the line instead of the minister.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock, Mr. Blain in the Chair.

On section 170—Sanction of plan, profile, etc., by Board:

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The third subsection of this section has been re-drafted.

Mr. CARVELL: There are two general changes. One is that the old law provided for a deviation of a mile; the present law confines that to half a mile. Secondly, the old law provided that there should not be a deviation of more than so much a mile "from the plan as filed." That, I think, means filed at the office of the registrars of deeds at different places. The new section provides that that plan shall also be filed with the Board. It means the filing of two plans instead of one, and cuts down the deviation from a mile to half a mile.

On section 186—Use of spur for another industry.

Mr. ARMSTRONG: At the beginning of this section, after the word "notwithstanding," the following words were struck out: "any agreement or arrangement made."

[Mr. Carvell.]

Mr. CARVELL: This is a new clause, which is not found in the Railway Act. In general terms, it provides that the Board shall have the power to allow a person or company to use a spur line that has been constructed in connection with the business of another person or company.

Section agreed to.

On section 193—lands of other companies:

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The last two subsections of this section have been reconstructed. The object is to prevent unnecessary cuttings into cities and towns and the multiplication of highway crossings. Subsection 4 gives the board power to order the company to take the proceedings provided for under the old section, and subsection 5 gives the board still further power as to ordering the joint use of rights of way.

Section agreed to.

On section 197—board may order compensation in certain cases:

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: This is a new provision; it seems to be a reasonable one. It is in conformity with the law that has existed in Ontario for some time.

Mr. CARVELL: The Board has the right to give the railway company occupation of whatever land may be necessary, but if there be valuable minerals under the railway line that cannot be mined because of the construction of the railroad, the company must pay compensation to the owners. I believe that the board have the right to assess damages.

Section agreed to.

On section 198—examination of mine workings:

Mr. GRAHAM: I see that the railway company is supposed to give the owner of the mine twenty-four hours' notice before entering upon his lands.

Mr. COCHRANE: That is enough.

Mr. CARVELL: Having obtained permission of the Board, the company has the right to enter upon the lands and see whether any condition exists which would be detrimental to the safety of the railway. They have the right, not to remove or change anything, but simply to investigate.

Section agreed to.

On section 200—where more ample space required:

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: In the thirty-fifth line, after the word "may," the words

"whether before or after the railway has been opened for the carriage of traffic" have been added. In subsection 7, line 6, after the word "railway," the words "but the deposit with the board and with the registrar of deeds shall be made as in this section provided" have been added. These are the only changes.

Mr. CARVELL: Under the existing law, the railway company has to file a plan and book of reference, having the right to take whatever land may be therein included. This provision in the present Bill leaves it open to the railway company, even after the railway has commenced to operate, to file a new plan and book of reference and take more land. Such a provision may be necessary, and I do not know that I specifically object to it; but it is a rather drastic provision.

Mr. COCHRANE: It is often very necessary for them to take more land. They would have to pay for it.

Mr. CARVELL: Subsection 7 provides that:

> The deposit with the board and with the registrar of deeds shall be made as in this section provided.

That is, the company have to make a new deposit, new plans, new book of reference, and have a new arbitration if they cannot come to an agreement with the owner of the land. This gives the railway companies very large powers.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The meaning is made more clear.

Section agreed to.

On section 202—Obtaining materials for construction or operation:

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Subsection 6 is new. It gives the powers of the board.

Mr. CARVELL: This section means that a railway company will have the right to lay a temporary track for the purpose of bringing material for the use of the railway. They lay that track practically under such directions as the board may issue. After the track has been used and the material provided, then it can be taken up and the company would have to pay as compensation whatever damages the owner of the land had suffered, but they do not have to expropriate. They are given the right to go on the land temporarily.

Section agreed to.

On section 206—Order of judge may be had:

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: This section has practically been reconstructed. The following proviso has been added:

> Provided that where any person interested is absent from the district or county in which the lands lie, or is unknown, the judge may order such substitutional service of notice as he deems proper or may dispense with notice.

Mr. CARVELL: Suppose a man died and left a will and all the terms of the will had not been carried out, and on account of minors or something of that sort, there was no person in a position to give a deed; this section provides that the trustee, or the executor under the will, or some person who occupies a fiduciary position is, in this case, authorized to give a deed, but the change is made that this can be done only by an order of the court. It also provides what notice must be given before the court can exercise the rights conferred upon it.

Section agreed to.

On section 214—disagreement.

Mr. BOULAY: Mr. Chairman, I think the sections are being run through too fast. I would like them to be read in French. As we are endeavouring to improve the law, I would like to have time to read over the sections in order to see what they are.

The CHAIRMAN: If the hon. member wishes a special section to be read, I shall be glad to read it.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: If there is any special section that the hon. member would like to have read, I am sure we shall be very glad to listen to it and have him make whatever remarks he pleases in regard to it; but might I respectfully ask him to consider the fact that this Bill was before a special committee of this House for seven or eight weeks? During that time people from all parts of the country representing different organizations and institutions, were invited to come, and did come, before the committee. They were given every opportunity of placing their views before the committee. As chairman of that committee, I want to take this opportunity of thanking the members on both sides of the House for the splendid work they did in assisting in every way possible to bring about suitable legislation. I hope the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Boulay) will not press his request.

Mr. BOULAY: Not only do I press my request, but I insist upon its being granted, because, not belonging to the Railway Committee I have until now had no opportunity of studying the Bill. There were several amendments that I was going to suggest when this Bill came into Committee of the Whole. I find now that the Bill is being put through in a very hurried manner, and I have no opportunity of suggesting amendments or even of knowing what the sections are. If the committee is willing to set some of the sections aside for discussion later on, I am willing to agree to that. There are quite a number of sections that have not been amended and that surely should be amended.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: I am sure the committee will be very glad to hear later on all the amendments that the hon. member for Rimouski cares to lay before it.

Mr. NESBITT: If the hon. gentleman will pick out the clauses, we can take them up.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: If the hon. gentleman will mention the clauses, we will reconsider them.

Mr. BOULAY: But all the other clauses were adopted. Important objections might have been made to clauses 9 and 10, but they have been adopted.

Mr. NESBITT: Even though they were passed by the committee, if the hon. gentleman desires to discuss them, he should have an opportunity.

Mr. COCHRANE: There would be no objection to that.

Section agreed to.

Section 215—Notice of expropriation to be served:

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The words "preliminary to proceeding to arbitration to fix compensation or damages" have been added in this section, and paragraph (c) is added so that the owner may have explicit notice of the rights of the company, and as to what he must do, so that he will not be prejudiced by letting the time go by in which he must act.

Mr. CARVELL: I think there has been a material change in that section. Any solicitor who has had much experience in expropriation proceedings must have found a great injustice in the present law in this regard. The present law provides that the railway company shall do certain things—they must serve notice upon the owner, giving a description of the lands to be taken, or the powers intended to be exercised with regard to any land therein described, and the notice must contain a declaration of readiness to pay a certain sum or rent as the case may be, as compensation for such lands or for such damages. But there is no provision to force the company to carry on the proceedings to a finality, and many a man has been held up for months—the railway companies have obtained an order from the judge and got possession through the sheriff, and allowed the matter to drift. Very few are able to realize what their real damages are by simply being told that the railway company is going to build a railway across the land. The railway must be constructed before the owners can ascertain their damages. This section provides that either the railway company or the owner shall have the right to have the compensation fixed by arbitration. It is one of the greatest boons that has been granted to the landowners in the whole Act, because it puts them in a position, immediately after the notice has been given, or within ten days, if the railway company do not proceed to have damages ascertained by arbitration, to compel them to move.

Section agreed to.

On section 216—Certificate of surveyor or engineer:

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The only change is adding, after the word "who" in the third line, the words "is not interested in the land, or in the amount of compensation or damages." The hon. member for North Oxford will remember that, in the reprint, they appeared to have marked the clauses one number ahead of the numbers appearing on the old Bill. One clause was dropped and that disarranged all the others. In paragraph (c), in the first line, the words "what sum is" have been added.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not raise objection to that section, but it does not mean anything. Any man who has had experience with these matters knows the railway company get a land surveyor and he signs the certificates. The provision may not do any harm, but it does not do any good, simply because, in my judgment, the certificate is no criterion as to the value of the land. The section reads as follows:

> Such notice shall be accompanied by the certificate of a sworn surveyor for the province in which the lands are situated or an engineer, who is not interested in the land, or in the amount of compensation or damages, which certificate shall state,—
> (a) that the land, if the notice relates to the taking of land, shown on the said plan is required for the railway;

(b) that he knows the land, or the amount of damages likely to arise from the exercise of the powers; and

(c) what sum is in his opinion a fair compensation for the land and damages as aforesaid.

I would feel better if the section were entirely expunged from the Bill. I think it does more harm than good. I have had a lot of experience with railway corporations—I doubt if there is any man in Parliament who has had anything like the experience I have had—and I have never found a case where I considered the certificate of the surveyor was any good, and I have often found cases where I thought it was an absolute absurdity.

Section agreed to.

On section 217—service by publication:

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: There is an important amendment to this section. At the end of subsection 3 the following words are added:

And in such other newspapers, if any, as the judge may direct.

Mr. BOULAY: Does that provide that the publication shall be made in both languages in Quebec, or only in English? Nothing is said about it in the Bill.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The hon. gentleman will notice that subsection 3 says:

The judge shall order a notice as aforesaid, but without such certificate, to be inserted three times in the course of one month in a newspaper published in the district.

If it is in the French district, it would naturally be published in the French paper, or if there is no French newspaper published in the district, then it would be published in a French newspaper in the adjoining district or county, and in such other newspaper, if any, as the judge may direct.

Mr. BOULAY: That is not sufficient to insure that it would be published in French. There might be a French and an English paper, and if the company chose to publish only in English, that would be their own business.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The judge has the decision as to the paper in which it shall be published.

Mr. BOULAY: But supposing the judge does not say anything about it, or suppose he decides it shall only be published in English, where will be the fair play for the other section of the population in the province of Quebec?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Do you think the judge would show any partiality in that regard?

Mr. NESBITT: Not in Quebec.

Mr. BOULAY: I think it better that it should be published in both languages in the province of Quebec, instead of leaving it to the decision of the judge.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: It might well be left to the judge.

Mr. BOULAY: The law provides for the manner of publication of such matter in the province of Quebec, and there is no reason why a Bill of this kind should not also provide for it. If there were a general proviso to the effect that it should be published in both languages in the province of Quebec, it would be different. Perhaps we might go back and insert some such clause in one of the first sections of the Bill.

Mr. GRAHAM: There is some reason for what the hon. gentleman says, but I would not restrict it to the province of Quebec, because there are parts of Ontario where at least half the population is French. I would support an amendment providing that where two papers are published, one in French and one in English, the advertisement should appear in both.

Mr. BOULAY: What I have said about the province of Quebec might also apply to the province of New Brunswick.

Mr. CARVELL: There is a great deal, of course in what the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Boulay) says. In case the owner of the land is absent, or cannot be reached, the notice should be published in such a way that it would cover him. If there were a French paper in the district it would be only fair that the notice should be published in French also. It would not involve any great expense or difficulty. I think it would be better to provide for this specially, rather than include it in the section regarding definitions, because there you might have to apply it to all notices, and there may be many cases in which it is not necessary to publish or serve a notice in both languages. I had a somewhat similar case a few years ago. Under the law of New Brunswick which has not been changed for a great many years and which was practically the law of Canada prior to about 1890, there was no provision for service upon a man by publication. In the case I refer to, it looked at one time as if a very great injustice was going to be done, because the railway company made an application without any notice at all, and the parties interested had no knowledge of the matter until after it was settled.

Mr. DESCARRIES: In the province of Quebec all legal notices in addition to being published in the local papers are published in the Quebec Official Gazette, which is printed in French and in English. I would suggest that these notices be published in the Quebec Official Gazette.

Mr. NESBITT: I think it would be as well to let the clause stand, so that the minister may give it further consideration.

Section stands.

On section 218—Notice may be abandoned:

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: There are several important changes in this section. In the sixth line the words "suffered and costs" have been added. In the seventh line, the words "and such damages shall be fixed and such costs taxed by the judge, or as he directs," are added. Subsection 3, paragraphs (a) and (b) and subsection 4 have been added.

Mr. CARVELL: The material change is this: The original Act provided that in case of abandonment the company shall be liable to the person notified for all damages and costs incurred by him in consequence of such notice and abandonment. You will see that in the new Act it is changed to make it explicit that he shall be indemnified for all damages and costs incurred by him. The reason is that there has been a good deal of litigation in various parts of Canada, both under the Dominion and local Railway Acts over the question as to whether the landowner was entitled to his costs or to his costs and damages. There have been decisions both ways. The object of the section is to make it clear that the landowner should get both damages and costs. Subsection 2 provides that in case they want further land, they can abandon the former notice and issue a new notice, but if an arbitration had taken place as to the value of the first land taken, that may be used as evidence in the second arbitration in so far as it is applicable.

Mr. NESBITT: It is to the advantage of the individual?

[Mr. Carvell.]

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, all these changes are intended to inure to the benefit of the landowner.

On section 219—Arbitrator; if sum offered not accepted; appointment of arbitrator; notice; service by publication:

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: In the second line after the word "or" the words "where service is made by advertisement" have been added. After the word "it" in the fifth line, the following words have been added:

Either party may apply to the judge of the county court of the county in which the lands lie, or, in the province of Quebec or in any other part of Canada where there is no county court, to a judge of the Superior Court for the district or place in which the lands lie, to determine the compensation to be paid as aforesaid.

Mr. MARCIL: Does the question of language come in there in connection with these advertisements?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The advertisements were mentioned in connection with the clause that has been left over.

Mr. MARCIL: Will that apply to 219 as well?

Mr. ARMSTRONG: I do not know that it would, because the added words have to do with the application and not with the question of language.

Mr. MARCIL: At the beginning of the clause it says "where service is made by advertisement." Will that advertisement be in an English paper or in a French paper? How would that affect a French district?

Mr. CARVELL: That was discussed on section 217, and the clause was allowed to stand for the purpose of providing that if there be both an English and a French paper it should be published in both. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Descarries) suggested that it also might be published in the official Gazette in Quebec which is published both in English and French.

Mr. MARCIL: Will that apply to section 219?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, because 219 is a necessary corollary of 217.

Mr. MARCIL: Then 219 had better stand?

Mr. COCHRANE: No, put in a clause to cover the whole.

Mr. MARCIL: The committee will appreciate the convenience of publishing a notice that the people will understand. There are some districts where there are no English papers at all.

Mr. COCHRANE: In that case you will have to publish it in French.

Mr. CARVELL: There is only one suggestion that I would like to make if section 219 is to stand, and it is that in the case of an absentee landowner, six days' notice in a newspaper is absolutely useless. I would suggest that the minister consider the possibility of giving the judge power to extend the time of notice, as well as to shorten it. You will see that subsection 3 of section 219 says:—

Provided that the judge may dispense with, or shorten the time or times for, the publication of the notice in any such case in which he deems it proper.

The judge should have the power to dispense with, shorten or lengthen the time.

Mr. NESBITT: It says that six days' notice shall be given by the company to the opposite party.

Mr. CARVELL: And vice versa. The law has been changed. Either party may move for an arbitration. The notice does not make much difference to the railway companies, because the railway companies are vitally interested; they have their solicitors and engineers; they are always ready and six days' notice to them is just as good as a month. But that will not suit the landowner.

9 p.m. Mr. COCHRANE: How many days would you extend it?

Mr. CARVELL: I should say ten days' notice.

Mr. COCHRANE: Change it from six to ten.

Mr. CARVELL: A farmer out in the country gets notice from a railway company that they are going in a short time to expropriate his land, and it takes him three or four days to wake up and realize what is going to happen. Then he goes to town and looks up his lawyer and it takes his lawyer some time to wake up. A notice of ten days is short enough.

Mr. COCHRANE: Make it ten.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Will you move that amendment?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, I will move:

That the word "six" be changed to "ten" in subsections 2 and 3 wherever it occurs.

Mr. MACDONALD: If there is to be an amendment made to the subsection I would like to suggest that provision be made by which a judge could direct that notice should be given to some relative, or to some other party, who would be in a position to know something about the absent proprietor. In the ordinary legal process, where you have to deal with absentees and you apply for substitute service of the documents or notice, the judge, in providing as to the publication in a newspaper of the advertisement calling attention to the matter that is to be served or that is under adjudication, usually provides that in the event of any relative or representative of the absentee being present he shall be notified

Mr. COCHRANE: Supposing there is not one there?

Mr. MACDONALD: Then you leave it to the discretion of the judge. You go to the judge and he gives an order allowing you to serve the absentee by giving notice in a newspaper for ten days. That may, or may not, be effectual at all. It is usually a fictitious thing any way. I think that my hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell) would agree that there is no reason why a judge should not exercise that same discretion which he exercises in an ordinary case in which he is dealing with substitute service of notice on some other person who is connected, or has some relation, with the absent owner of the land. This would be a real notice; in the other case it would not.

Mr. CARVELL: I would agree with that. I am speaking with a considerable personal knowledge of these things because I had a case within the last two years where the landowner was an absentee. Our statute in New Brunswick did not require notice at all when he was an absentee. The arbitration was practically over before we knew anything about it. Fortunately, we were able to get wise in time to get in there and we pretty nearly got our rights.

Mr. NESBITT: Would the absentee not have an agent in the district?

Mr. CARVELL: No, lots of men who own land are away; men are in the West, they are at the front or they are anywhere in the world. In a great many cases western lands are owned by people in the East. The railway company can honestly say: we have made diligent inquiry and have been unable to locate the real owner. It is only right that the landowner whose land is being taken should have notice, or that every reasonable attempt should be made to give him notice.

Mr. COCHRANE: Would you suggest some amendment to cover it?

Mr. CARVELL: I can show one case where the addition of two words would materially affect it. We might say "the judge may dispense with or shorten or lengthen the time."

Mr. COCHRANE: Why not change "shorten" to "lengthen?"

Mr. MACDONALD: There should be some further words there providing for personal service upon the agent of the owner or something of that kind. I should like the clause to be allowed to stand.

Mr. COCHRANE: Will you prepare an amendment?

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD: I will.

Section stands.

On section 220—Judge the sole arbitrator.

Mr. CARVELL: This is quite a change. It provides that the judge alone becomes the arbitrator, unless in a case where he is personally interested, when he can appoint another judge. That is a complete change.

Mr. COCHRANE: The change is not objectionable is it?

Mr. CARVELL: I am not so sure about that. I think the landowners in the vicinity are perhaps better judges of the value of land, or the damages that would be sustained by a farmer through having a railway cross his property, than a judge would be. This is taking away altogether the principle of arbitration.

Mr. COCHRANE: The judge would have to hear the case.

Mr. CARVELL: Under the old law he did not.

Mr. COCHRANE: He would under this.

Mr. CARVELL: He would under this. I should rather leave the law as it stands, and let this matter remain in the hands of the arbitrators. A lot of horse sense is required in settling the amount of damage in such a case, and I would prefer to leave it to the arbitrators. I doubt very much if the ordinary judge would be able to appreciate the probable damage as well as would men living in the neighbourhood. I have had some experience with judges in these things, and I must say that, from the standpoint of the owner, I would prefer the man who I know knows all about it. It is a very serious thing.

Mr. NESBITT: Would not a judge in a case of that kind call in witnesses to prove the value of the land? I cannot agree that the judge would not be a pretty good arbitrator. The ordinary county court judge with us is a very ordinary chap before he becomes a county court judge. He is generally a practising barrister, and has to do with these things.

Mr. CARVELL: Sometimes he does and sometimes he does not.

Mr. NESBITT: He knows a good deal about every deal from a horse trade up.

Mr. CARVELL: Many of these men come from towns and know nothing about damage to land.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: There are many cases where the county court judge would not be a suitable man. I do not think it would be advisable to make this change; it would be much better to leave it to some arbitrator who, by reason of his particular knowledge, would be suitable. Some old county court judges would make very good men, but remember that they are all new men at some time, and many of the new men coming in as county court judges are about the worst men you could get for that sort of work. The present law is better.

Mr. COCHRANE: I do not know; I feel like trusting the judge.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The judge has power to appoint arbitrators.

Mr. MACDONALD: Under what section?

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: Only in case he is interested, and that is the time when he should not appoint another man.

Mr. CARVELL: Under the old law the judge appoints one man and each side has a right to appoint one, and so you get a pretty fair tribunal.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The judge has the same power under this clause, has he not?

Mr. CARVELL: No. The judge is the arbitrator under this law; if he is interested in the case, he appoints another judge. I was not present at the meeting of the committee when these sections went through. I did not think for a moment that you would take from the farmer the right to be represented by another farmer on that arbitration. I object very strongly to that course. The average judge has no conception of the amount of damage done to a farm by its being traversed by a railway. I would not for $1,000 have a railway come across my farm—I suppose the judge would give me about $100, because he would not appreciate what the presence of that railway line on my farm meant. A farmer whose land is traversed by a railway line has to cross that line perhaps half a dozen times each day during the summer—and it is there, not for a year or two years, but for all time, for him and for his children, after him. By this provision we are taking away, without justification, one of the rights which, under the Railway Act, the citizen has had during the last forty years.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Under subsection 2, the judge has the power to call witnesses.

Mr. CARVELL: Certainly.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: And make a thorough investigation into the matter.

Mr. CARVELL: I realize that, but I do not think that a judge is in a position properly to appreciate the amount of damage that is occasioned to a farmer because of the presence of a railway line on his land. The farmer should have the right to be represented in that court by one of his own people—one of his own peers, I might say, who appreciate the real extent of the damage done.

Mr. NESBITT: They can give evidence to that effect.

Mr. MACDONALD: In the case of land expropriated for Government purposes, the law formerly was that the value of the land and the damage sustained should be determined by a board of arbitrators, appointed permanently by the Dominion Government, who had long experience in dealing with cases of that kind. This method was abolished and a judge of the Exchequer Court was given jurisdiction in such matters. The judges of the Exchequer Court have become very competent in dealing with these cases, being familiar with the exceptional circumstances which, as the member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) points out, arise in a great many cases. But when County Court judges deal with these arbitrations, they are dealing with a class of cases entirely different from those that ordinarily come before them. They are not, therefore, the best authorities for determining such matters. The change proposed is, I think, a very radical one, and my hon. friend is quite right in pointing out its importance and suggesting that the matter should be carefully considered.

Mr. DESCARRIES: Under this section a complete change is proposed in the method of arbitration in matters connected with the operation of railways. Formerly provision was made for three arbitrators; under this law provision is made for only one who, in the province of Quebec for instance, is to be a judge of the Superior Court. Under subsection 2, the decision of that judge is to be final; there is to be no appeal. Under section 224, the party whose property is expropriated has the right to present three experts or witnesses on his behalf, while in civil cases the party to a litigation has the right to produce five witnesses. The man whose property is taken from him by a railway company does not get the benefit of many of the advantages given to him by the ordinary courts. No doubt a judge is able to understand such matters better than the ordinary arbitrator; but valuation is a question not of law, but of experience. Many judges are not experienced in the valuation of land; they are not familiar with all the disadvantages which result to a farmer through his land being crossed by a railway. In view of the fact that only three witnesses are allowed to the person submitting a claim, I think that the provision is not fair; the section should not pass as it stands.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: I wish to read to the committee the reasons given by Mr. Price, who prepared these clauses, for making the amendments proposed in the Bill. He says:

Arbitration proceedings generally. This part of the Act has been almost entirely remodelled and very materially altered. There has been much complaint both from the companies and owners about the unsatisfactoriness and delays and excessive cost of arbitration proceedings, and the unsatisfactoriness of the appeal and proceedings allowed to impeach awards.

The County Court judge, and in the province of Quebec, a Superior Court judge, is now made arbitrator ex-officio. The costs of the arbitration are left in his discretion.

The absurd provision that if the award was not made within a time fixed, the amount offered by the company should be taken to be the compensation, is abolished, but provision is made to prevent delay.

The number of expert witnesses is limited to three for any one party.

The unjust provision that the owner could not appeal unless the award was over $600, even though he might be entitled to many times as much, is amended so that he may appeal when he claims more than $600.

Wider powers are given the court in the appeal and except where more than $10,000 is involved only one appeal is allowed and no other proceedings can be taken to impeach the award.

Mr. COPP: It seems to be taking a very radical step to take away the right that the people have had in the past and to put this matter into the hands of a county court judge. While a county court judge may be a very creditable individual to try special cases, he may hold his court twenty-five or fifty miles away from where the railway crosses the land and where the damage accrues to the owner. All that he has before him is a plan or profile of the land; he does not understand the situation at all, and it would be very much better to have as arbitrator a person who knows the district and all the conditions. The Intercolonial railway goes through a man's farm close to where I live, and not a year passes but from three to five head of cattle are killed. Last year this man had eight head of cattle killed on the railway crossing his farm.

Mr. NESBITT: Was he paid for the damage?

Mr. COPP: No, the Intercolonial did not pay him a dollar.

Mr. NESBITT: Why?

Mr. COPP: Because they claimed they were not liable.

Mr. CARVELL: They do not pay for such damages.

Mr. COPP: I am positive that on that farm alone during the past fifteen years twenty-five head of cattle have been killed. A judge living a distance away would not realize the great loss occasioned to a farmer residing in that particular locality. Where a railroad company wants to cross a farm with its railway it would be much better to have as arbitrator a man knowing the locality than any county court judge.

Mr. NESBITT: Does not the Intercolonial pay for animals killed?

Mr. COPP: They pay nothing.

Mr. COCHRANE: That is not correct.

Mr. COPP: In ordinary cases of damage the facts are left to be decided by a jury composed of people selected from the locality in which the damage occurred, and that is generally conceded by all interested to be the better way of deciding the matter. It would be a mistake for this committee at this time to make this radical change in this section.

[Mr. J. E. Armstrong.]

Mr. NESBITT: I do not care whether this section is changed back again or not. Although I am not a lawyer, I have had to make for other people a good many settlements for land damages, and I have never yet had occasion to go to arbitration. I have always found the railway companies very reasonable, if they are approached properly. I am much surprised that the minister, if he does not keep up his fences, does not pay damages for cattle killed.

Mr. COCHRANE: I think I can show by returns that the statement made was not correct.

Mr. CARVELL: That must be in other parts of Canada than in New Brunswick.

Mr. COCHRANE: No, in New Brunswick too.

Mr. NESBITT: If a county court judge knows anything about his business, if he does not know the locality, he will visit it and make himself acquainted with it.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH: This question affects the owner of the land as well as the railway company. There are many things that affect the amount of damages, for instance, where the railway station might be located, where streams might have to be crossed, how the railway would run across a farm. While I have a good deal of confidence in our county court judges, many of them know very little about farm lands, and if a county court judge is to be the sole arbitrator, the whole matter is taken out of the hands of the owner of the land. The owner of the land should have some little say in the matter.

Mr. NESBITT: He has.

Mr. STEELE: I quite agree with the hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. William Smith), the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) and some others who have spoken on this matter. We ought to avoid putting into the Railway Act anything that will interfere with the rights of the owner of the land. I, perhaps, have as much experience as most men have with the disadvantages and inconveniences of getting into places across railway tracks, where the railway track crosses a farm between the home and the highway, and I would hesitate a long time before buying a farm with a track crossing between the farm buildings and the highway. Any railway company seeking a right of way should be compelled by arbitration to pay the owner of the land just and generous recompense for the privilege of crossing his farm, especially in that way. A county court judge is not always to be relied upon to give a just judgment in matters of this character. Not intentionally would they be unfair, but such matters are out of their line of business, and in many cases they are quite unable to come to a proper decision as to the value of the land which the railway company is asking for the privilege of crossing. The rights and interests of the farmer should be protected in a better way than seems to be the case in this section.

Mr. SEXSMITH: We should be very careful before we make the change proposed in this section. The great complaint comes from the corporation, not from the individual farmer. The farmer asks what he thinks is a reasonable damage on account of a railway going through his property, and if the corporation thinks his price is a little too high, it may take two or three years before the farmer can get a board of arbitration and have the question decided. There has been a good deal of trouble on this acount in some districts, and the delay has never been occasioned by the farmer. I have no complaint to make about county court judges, but I do not think they are the proper people to appoint as the sole arbitrators in cases of this kind. Any farmer who has a railway crossing his farm knows what the damage is. The railway companies sometimes seem to think that all lands, fruit and farm, are the same, and that they can run through every part of a province paying the same rate of damages. The old arbitration was better, where the individual farmer had an opportunity of having appointed on the board a man knowing something about the local conditions, the value of the land and so on.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Might I call the committee's attention to the fact that changing this section will mean the changing of ten or twelve other sections of the Bill?

Mr. CARVELL: That is simple. There is another branch to this. In many cases railway companies go through timber lands in the rear of a man's farm. I do not know that that would apply to Ontario as much as to some parts in the East, but you would never get a county court judge to go out into the woods, and travel through the right of way, and examine the damage done. It would be impossible.

Mr. DESCARRIES: A Superior Court judge in Montreal would not go there.

Mr. CARVELL: If you have an arbitration composed of farmers, they will take the trouble to go and look over the right of way. I had a case where the company offered $110 damages for going through timber land, and the arbitrators went out to the district, took a competent man with them, counted the stumps, figured the amount of lumber that had been taken, and that farmer got $1,200 and costs. He would never have got that much from a county court judge in the world, because the judge would not go and look at it, and if you told him there was that much damage, he would not believe it.

Mr. COCHRANE: But the farmer could take an expert out there, to value the damage.

Mr. CARVELL: But the judge would not believe it possible that the damage would amount to such a sum. In the case I referred to they brought in a statement of the number of stumps, and the diameter of them, and figured out the superficial feet, and there was a unanimous award of $1,200.

Mr. COCHRANE: The same evidence could have been produced before a county court judge.

Mr. CARVELL: But the judge would not believe there was that much lumber growing on the right of way.

Mr. COCHRANE: He could not help believing it.

Mr. SEXSMITH: I must protest. It seems to me there is no advantage in leaving it in the hands of the county court judge. Why should it be left to him?

Mr. COCHRANE: To save expense.

Mr. SEXSMITH: Why take it out of the hands of the arbitration board, which we have had in the past, and put it in the hands of county court judges? Who asked for it?

An hon. MEMBER: The farmer.

Mr. SEXSMITH: I guess not. The companies have asked for it, and they put up the excuse. I remember of cases where there was delay after delay. The farmer was for months and months trying to hurry it up, and the company, with all their money behind them, tried to keep it back, because they thought they should only pay a certain amount.

Mr. NESBITT: That delay is fixed in a former section.

Mr. SEXSMITH: If it is fixed, why take it out of the hands of the arbitrator, and put it in the hands of the county court judge, who, perhaps, was never on a farm in his life? If a farmer in the country employed an expert who had an idea of the local value of land, and an idea as well of the damage caused by the railway running across his place, and placed the case before a county court judge who had no experience in such matters, I think it would be a great mistake.

Mr. McCREA: I think the majority of cases of this kind are settled between the parties without going to arbitration. If the railway company and the owner of the land can agree, they do not require to go to arbitration, but, in the event of having to go to arbitration, surely it cannot be argued that a judge, who perhaps lives fifty or sixty miles from the seat of trouble, could have as good a knowledge of it as men who go on the ground and examine it. It has been said that companies usually have to pay more when the cases are tried before arbitration. I do not think it will work that way always. I think you can get a just valuation of the damage actually caused. It may be as often in favour of the company as in favour of the individual, but where you have three men selected, one by the railway, one by the owner of the property, and the third appointed by the two as umpire, I think will work well.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is the old law.

Mr. McCREA: It should remain as it is. It seems to me a very much more just way of settling a matter of this kind, where the men who are going to appraise the damage go on the ground and examine it. A judge of the Superior Court is not going to run around examining lands here and there, and he would not know anything about their value if he did. He may know the law, but he would not know much about the value of timber or farm land, and it seems to me to be a mistake to change from the old system in this particular case.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: I think it is always dangerous to make exceptions. There is always better safeguard and more protection for parties interested if they have their disputes disposed of by the old law. As far as arbitration is concerned, in the province of Quebec I do not see that there are any dangers. There may have been complaints. We have had many complaints in regard to judges; that is the reason we have so many jurisdictions. We start from the jurisdiction of the simple justice of the peace up to the Supreme Court of Canada, and then we go to the foot of the Throne, to the Privy Council. I do not think human justice has been so perfect as to please all parties in this country, nor in any other country in the world. Something has been said in regard to the question of costs. If hon. members will look at the Quebec code of civil procedure they will find that every party is well protected, and even the railway companies, who are seeking to have this Bill passed, will be sorry for it after it becomes law, because judges may render decisions that appear favourable to them, but may be adverse to their interests, and they may be tied up. Section 411 of the Quebec code reads as follows:

> The court, of its own motion, or upon the application of either party, or the judge upon the application of either party may refer to the decision of the arbitrators, any case of dispute between relations, concerning partitions or other matters of fact, which is difficult for the court to appreciate, and also any other cases, if the parties consent to it.

I will not read the next section, but it concludes in this way:

> They may not award costs, unless the court has empowered them so to do.

So that, if the court should give power to the arbitration to pass a decree for costs, and if the costs are exaggerated, as the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Descarries) who is an expert in arbitration law, knows perfectly well, these costs may be reduced on a civil petition, and be brought down to a just and exact figure. It seems to me we should retain the old law, which is just as old as the first dispute which ever arose in the country. The more we make exceptions in the law the more cases will crop up. Of course, if you go to the lawyers with your disputes, they will not complain.

Mr. DESCARRIES: In the province of Quebec, in a case where it is a question of damages, our judges never decide by themselves. They appoint experts who go over the locality to see for themselves what the damages are. In these cases of disputes with railways, if a judge of the Superior Court were asked to leave the bench, and go far away into the county by himself to ascertain the amount of damage on a certain property, he would refuse to do it.

By this law he will have only three witnesses to present the case before him. I think it is a great advantage to the owner when some one wants to take his land, that he should be judged by his peers, by some one who knows the local conditions and all the advantages of which the owner will be deprived.

Mr. SEXSMITH: Under the old law there were three arbitrators, one selected by the owner of the land, one by the company, and the third by the other two. What could be more fair than this? Under this Bill they are allowed to have three witnesses. I suppose the landowner would have to bring those witnesses out to see the land, then the judge could hold his court where he saw fit, and those witnesses would have to be brought before the court, where they would be examined by the lawyer and so on. Every member of this House knows what that means. I think the old law was a great deal better and that it should be left to the arbitrators.

Section stands.

On section 222—Company may offer easement, etc.:

Mr. CARVELL: This simply provides that the company may offer an easement back to the landowner. It may be an under-crossing, or it may be an overhead crossing, or it may be a right of use of some kind. It does not make any difference what may be the nature of the court that arrives at the compensation, the principle is laid down there and they can work it out. Whether there is only one arbitrator, or whether there are three arbitrators, the principle is the same. Of course if there are three arbitrators, you will have to use the plural instead of the singular—"arbitrators" instead of "arbitrator."

Section agreed to.

On section 223—Costs of arbitration:

Mr. CARVELL: If you change the law you will have to change this section, because subsection 3 provides that the arbitrator shall not be entitled to any fee beyond his actual expenses.

Mr. PROULX: I would suggest that in cases where the amount asked does not exceed $500 there should be only one arbitrator. I have had cases in which only small amounts were involved, and the costs ate up pretty much the whole compensation paid by the company. The proceedings lasted over several days and a great deal of the evidence had to be given through an interpreter.

Section stands.

On section 224—proceedings of arbitrator:

Mr. COCHRANE: That is also in regard to the calling of witnesses. They want to call as many witnesses as they wish, and put on all the expense they can. This section will have to stand.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not think so. It is copied from the Exchequer Court Act, and it has worked very satisfactorily there. It only applies to three witnesses who are giving their opinions. It does not apply to facts. If you wish you may have half a dozen witnesses to swear to the facts.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: It means if there is only one arbitrator theoretically, practically there will be seven; three on each side, and the arbitrator.

Mr. DESCARRIES: It means there will be only three witnesses, or experts.

Mr. CARVELL: Three experts.

Mr. DESCARRIES: Three witnesses or experts, according to the French version; which says:—

L'arbitre doit interroger sous serment ou sous affirmation solennelle les témoins qui comparaissent devant lui, mais il ne peut être appelé, de la part d'une partie quelconque, plus de trois experts ou témoins exposant leur opinion. Néanmoins, l'arbitre peut, du consentement des parties, decider l'affaire, après avoir vu ou inspecté les terrains sans examiner de témoins; mais il peut être permis à toute partie ou à son représentant, dans ce cas, de signaler et d'expliquer les choses qui paraissent importantes pour sa cause.

That is, the arbitrator must interrogate under oath or under solemn affirmation the witnesses who appear before him, but he is not allowed to call more than three experts or opinion witnesses on behalf of one party.

Mr. CARVELL: Of course, that would be different from witnesses who were swearing to facts. You could have any number of witnesses on the facts.

Mr. DESCARRIES: If that be so it is contrary to what is ordinarily done before the courts, where there is only one judge. A witness has not the right to give his opinion on the merits of the case, which is solely within the province of the judge.

Mr. CARVELL: I will explain the difference. Say there is a farm crossing, which may be over a fill, or through a cut. You might produce three witnesses to swear what in their opinion would be the damage to the remainder of the farm because the owner would be compelled to operate it over that embankment or through that cut. Under this Act you are limited to three witnesses in regard to that, but if there were any question of fact to be decided you could bring as many witnesses as you wish.

This clause has been taken from the Exchequer Court Act and my experience with the Exchequer Court has been that it works out very satisfactorily. In the Exchequer Court you have a judge who is trained to decide this class of cases. If it were possible to have Judge Audette to try all these cases I would never ask for an arbitration, because he is a gentleman who has been trained for many years and who, after examining two or three witnesses and getting a description of the locus, can tell you what the damage is; but, unfortunately, a great majority of the county court judges have not had that experience.

On section 225—powers of arbitrator, etc.:

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: In the first line the words "in any case" are inserted and in the third line of paragraph (a) the words "or other thing." The rest of the clause is the same as section 201 of the old Railway Act.

Mr. WILSON: Why are these words inserted?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: To make the meaning plainer.

Mr. COCHRANE: This will have to stand the same as section 221.

Mr. NESBITT: There were a lot of changes in section 224.

Mr. ARMSTRONG: Yes, but that was different. Section 225 is practically the same as the old Act.

Mr. NESBITT: But it is "arbitrator" there.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Arbitrators.

Mr. CARVELL: There is no change actually between this section and the old Railway Act.

Mr. WILSON: As the question of grammar arises in connection with section 221, I would suggest that as 221 has been allowed to stand, the consideration of the whole chapter should be suspended.

Mr. COCHRANE: Section 221 stands.

Mr. WILSON: The chapter should be allowed to stand in order that the phraseology may be changed from the singular to the plural.

Mr. COCHRANE: Section 221 stands.

Mr. GRAHAM: But there are a dozen clauses depending on it. "He" will have to be changed to "they."

[Mr. Carvell.]

Mr. CARVELL: There is no real change except in section 221. The other is merely a matter of changing the singular to the plural.

Mr. WILSON: The change in that section might lead to some other amendment. If the principle is recognized in that section, I do not see any reason why we should spend time on this clause.

Mr. NESBITT: It would be better to allow them all to stand until we get these words changed.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Yes; you will have to allow them to stand down to section 234.

Mr. CARVELL: For fear that I will not be here when section 232 comes up, I would like to call the attention of the minister to what has given the solicitors a great deal of trouble. Section 232 deals with the question of appeals. It provides that where such party in his notice of appeal claims more than $600 or objects to some easement or other thing approved by the arbitrator without his consent under section 222, appeal from the award upon any question of law or fact may be taken. That has created an enormous amount of litigation in Canada. I have always felt that there should not be an appeal on questions of fact. There was a case that went to the Privy Council about 1895, and the Privy Council decided that unless the arbitrators had proceeded upon some wrong principle of law they would not review the question of fact; they would allow that to stand as it left the arbitrator, but they would review the question of law. That was followed for quite a number of years and the courts took the ground that they were bound by this case. But within recent years all our courts have sought on one ground or another the right to depart from that very salutary principle laid down in that case, and to hear argument and decide questions of fact as well as law. There was a case in Alberta within the last four or five years that went to the Supreme Court of Canada. There was a reversal of the finding on a number of questions of fact and the case proceeded until finally the Supreme Court confirmed the decision of the arbitrators. In my own province our courts for a long time held they had no right to review questions of fact, but in the last case brought before the courts they upset what had been the law for the past twenty years, turned down the findings of the arbitrators and found new facts for themselves. This has caused a great deal of litigation and trouble in Canada. I hope the minister will take the trouble to consult with the proper officials as to whether it would not be in the interest of all parties concerned if questions of fact were left out entirely and appeals were confined to questions of law.

10 p.m.

Mr. COCHRANE: What if they erred in the facts?

Mr. CARVELL: Questions of fact must be settled by some human mind or minds, and I think the ordinary arbitrator has just as good a mind as the Supreme Court when it comes to the question of fact as to how much damage the farmer has sustained by a railway going across his land. There is no one who is better able to decide those damages than the man who is on the ground and knows the conditions. I would like to see the law so changed that the Supreme Court, or any other appeal court, would have no right to review questions of fact. I entirely agree with Mr. Price in restricting appeals as much as possible. I am altogether in sympathy with subsection 3 of this clause, in which he provides that there shall be no appeals. In Ontario a man could appeal to the High Court or to the Court of Appeal. The Supreme Court decided not many years ago that as there was no appeal from the High Court to the Supreme Court, therefore, if a party decided to go direct from the appeal judge to the High Court, he could go no further. But if, instead of going to the High Court, he went direct to the Court of Appeal, he could then appeal to the Supreme Court and go from that to the Privy Council. That is actually what has happened. There are a great many incongruities as to this question of appeal. There have been too many appeals in the past. I would not only like to see the provision of subsection 3 carried out, but I would like to see the right to deal with the question of fact taken away, allowing the provision as to the question of law to stand.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: I do not agree with the remarks of my hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell), although I have the greatest respect for his opinion on the question. I see no reason why railways, who are so fully protected in this country, should have more protection in this respect than any other organization or any other citizen. The appeal is a great safeguard, and I believe in the clause as it stands.

Mr. CARVELL: It is the railway company that always exercises the right of appeal. If you examine the reports, where you will find one appeal by a farmer you will find a hundred by the railway company.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: Not necessarily, both parties may feel aggrieved by the award of the arbitrators.

Mr. CARVELL: I am asking the minister to allow this clause to stand, and to consider a real question that should be decided by the minister rather than by anybody else; that is the taking away of the appeal on questions of fact. For a great many years after the decision of the Privy Council, the courts refused to interfere with findings of fact, but within the last four or five years they have entirely thrown that to the winds and now every court in Canada is reviewing questions of fact as well as of law.

Section stands.

Mr. DESCARRIES: In article 218, in the French version, there is an evident misprint. The word "encourir" has been printed where it should evidently be "encouru." I would move that the section be amended so as to read "encouru."

Amendment agreed to.

On section 241—Procedure upon application for warrant in case of resistance:

Mr. CARVELL: An improvement has been effected by providing that the owner of the land shall have the right to bring on the arbitration; formerly he did not have that right. But if the owner of the land says to the railway company: I do not want you on my land until you settle the damages, the railway company can, under the existing law, pay into court fifty per cent more than the amount they have offered as compensation and secure from the judge an order enabling them to tear down a man's fences, turn his cattle out on the road and disturb his property generally. I have always contended that the judge should not be enabled to give this order under these conditions, because a railway company may offer an amount which is grossly inadequate, pay an additional fifty per cent, and then take possession of the land. The fixing of the amount of which due notice should be given should be left to the discretion of the judge.

Mr. DESCARRIES: In response to the demand of the company, the landowner should have the right to present either his own affidavit or the affidavit of an expert, setting forth his opinion as to what the valuation should be. The judge, who would have beside him the two sides of the case—the company's side and the owner's side—concerning the value of the property, would then be in a better position to come to a sound decision in the matter.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: Would my hon. friend favour the giving of security by the company in lieu of the payment of an extra 50 per cent?

Mr. DESCARRIES: I would suggest that, instead of limiting the judge to the acceptance of the extra fifty per cent, we leave the matter open

Mr. CARVELL: I find, upon a careful reading of the Act, that the judge has the right to demand more than fifty per cent from the company. The provision is that the amount shall not be less than fifty per cent. That takes away much of my objection.

Mr. DESCARRIES: But the land owner should have the right, as I say, to present affidavits setting forth what he considers to be the proper valuation of the land.

Mr. COCHRANE: He can present any evidence he likes.

Section agreed to.

On section 244—respecting wages:

Mr. GRAHAM: Subsection 1 of this section agrees with the general Act and is the basis of the fair-wage clause in contracts. Subsection 2 is as follows:

> In the event of a dispute arising as to what is the current or a fair and reasonable rate, it shall be determined by the minister, whose decision shall be final.

In times past a question has arisen between the Department of Labour and the Department of Railways and Canals as to who should deal with the application of this section. When this section was first inserted in the Railway Act, Canada had not a Labour Department or the machinery which is now available for the settlement of disputes. I suggest that this question of wages be left as are other matters of a like character, with the Department of Labour.

Mr. MACDONALD: Why should there not be a fair-wage schedule as there is in regard to all Government contracts?

Mr NESBITT: Why not leave it to the board?

[Mr. Descarries.]

Mr. GRAHAM: The practice has been to put a fair-wage clause in the contracts? I think that the interpretation and enforcement of this fair-wage clause might well be handed over to the Labour Department.

Mr. COCHRANE: The Minister of Railways would have to enforce it.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The minister would have the responsibility.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am not sure of that.

Mr. COCHRANE: We have never had any trouble in that respect.

Mr. GRAHAM: I would not use the word "trouble," but on one or two occasions in my time the employees appealed to the Department of Labour that their wages under the contracts made for construction under the Railway Act were not satisfactory. The Labour Department would refer them to the Minister of Railways, who would have to start investigating, without having the regular machinery that the Labour Department has, to see if the men were getting the regular wages paid in that locality.

Mr. COCHRANE: I have always accepted what the Labour Department has recommended.

Mr. GRAHAM: There is no provision here to refer the matter to the Labour Department. The provision is that the Minister of Railways shall determine the matter himself.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The suggestion is a very good one. The Minister of Labour will have all the information, and he will be in a better position to decide. This section can be amended by simply adding after the word "Minister" in the last line, the words "of Labour."

Mr. COCHRANE: I have no objection to that.

Mr. GRAHAM: It would be better to leave the matter over until to-morrow, and not to make the change too hurriedly.

Section stands.

On section 251—Passageway for public:

Mr. ARMSTRONG: Subsection 6, passageway for public, is new. This was fully discussed before the committee.

Mr. CARVELL: And fully opposed by the railway companies.

Mr. ARMSTRONG: Yes, and accepted by the committee.

Section agreed to

On section 252—Leave of board:

Mr. ARMSTRONG: The word "railway" is inserted before the word "company."

Mr. GRAHAM: Why is the word "railway" inserted?

Mr. CARVELL: In section 2, the interpretation section, subsection 4 says:

"Company" includes a person, and where not otherwise stated or implied means railway company unless immediately preceded by "any", "every" or "all," in which case it means every kind of company which the context will permit of; and "railway company" or "company" when it means or includes railway company.

Therefore, in order to get away from a telephone company, or a telegraph company, or something of that kind, we insert the word " railway " so as to show that a railway company is referred to.

Section agreed to.

On section 255—Railway on highway:

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: In the third line after the word " authorized " these words are inserted:

But shall not, without such leave, be carried upon, along or across any existing highway. Provided that the company shall make such compensation to adjacent or abutting land owners as the Board deems proper.

In line 13 of the same section, after the word " town," there is inserted this provision:

Provided that where leave is obtained to carry any railway along a highway the Board may require the company to make such compensation if any to the municipality as the Board deems proper.

This section was very fully discussed, and these important changes were made on behalf of people interested along the highway.

Section agreed to.

On section 257—Powers of Board as to existing crossings.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Subsection 3 is new.

Mr. STEELE: Is any additional provision made for the protection of crossings in the country districts? In the country there are some very bad crossings, and accidents are continually happening, but it seems to be impossible for the municipalities and the railway companies to come together for the protection of such crossings.

Mr. COCHRANE: The Board has the right to order crossings, and every year an amount is placed in the Estimates to pay for them.

Mr. STEELE: There does not seem to be any provision if the municipality and the railway company, after the intervention of the Board fail to agree to protect the public who are still suffering from the dangers and accidents. It might be well to make the matter compulsory.

Mr. GRAHAM: Under the present Act the Board is fully authorized to order any protection it thinks proper at any railway crossing. Its additional power is that, if it sees fit, it may apportion the cost between the municipality and the railway company.

Section agreed to.

On section 258—Preventing obstruction of view:

Mr. ARMSTRONG: Mr. Price says that this section provides a more simple procedure for preventing obstruction and fixing compensation for what may be ordered to be done than formerly. It is a reconstruction.

Mr. GRAHAM: This is a new clause. They cannot put up a new building any closer that the law says.

Section agreed to.

On section 262—Appropriation for safety of public at highway crossings at rail level:

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: There is a change in the third line. Instead of the words "one thousand nine hundred and ten" being used the words are 'one thousand nine hundred and seventeen".

Mr. GRAHAM: There is an error in the reprint of that section.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: We amended it to make it read "one thousand nine hundred and seventeen." That makes it extend ten years from now.

Mr. SINCLAIR: It is a misprint in the Bill before us, but we amended it in committee, and I think we can amend it now.

Mr. COCHRANE: I am advised the committee had no power to amend it without a resolution.

Mr. GRAHAM: When I had the honour of introducing the Railway Bill some years ago, I introduced an amendement under resolution, if I remember correctly, and I think the minister will have to introduce a resolution to amend this section, because it possibly means an extra expenditure of $20,000.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Let it stand.

Section stands.

On section 266—Inclination of approach:

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: That is struck out in the Bill before me.

Mr. NESBITT: It is the old 268.

Mr. GRAHAM: Section 267 in the draft Bill is struck out.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The old 267 is struck out of the new Bill entirely.

Mr. GRAHAM: And 268 becomes 266.

On section 269—if drainage insufficient:

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Paragraph (c) is reconstructed, and reads as follows:

Whenever,—

(c) The railway company desires to obtain means of drainage, or the right to lay water pipes or other pipes temporarily or permanently through, along, upon, across or under any lands adjoining or near the railway.

Two lines below that the words "or of the company" are added, and the words "or permit" are added. In subsection 2 the word "shall," after the word "and" in the fifth line, is replaced, with the word "may," and the words "fix the compensation, if any, which should be paid to any owner injuriously affected, or may direct the compensation, if any, to be determined under the arbitration sections of this Act," are new.

Mr. CARVELL: It all means that the board has the right to provide for efficient drainage.

Section agreed to.

On Section 277—Board may order railway to be opened:

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: That is new.

Mr. GRAHAM: Would that mean that the board could compel the operation of a road yet technically under construction.

Mr. COCHRANE: I think so.

Mr. GRAHAM: I suppose that is to apply to railways which very often are kept technically under the contractor for a long time, although practically finished for operating purposes?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On Section 288—Animals not to be at large near highway crossings:

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: That is the same as the old section.

Mr. CARVELL: I pointed out to the committee that I very much doubt the power of this Parliament to provide that cattle should be impounded, say, in the province of New Brunswick. They may be handed over to the proper officials, but it is a different question when you come to impound them.

Mr. SEXSMITH: I was always under the impression that the impounding of cattle was a matter for the municipalities.

Mr. GRAHAM: Municipalities get their power from the province.

Mr. SEXSMITH: In this section we have stepped in over the heads of the municipalities.

Mr. GRAHAM: One effect of this is possibly to provide, not so much for the impounding of the cattle as that, if the section were violated and the cattle killed, the man who owned them could not claim damages for them. There are other clauses dealing with the killing of live-stock on the track. This refers only to cattle on the highways.

Mr. SEXSMITH: Have we the right to prohibit cattle from running on the highways?

Mr. CARVELL: No.

Mr. SEXSMITH: Then why do we attempt it?

Mr. NESBITT: Just for a bluff.

Mr. SEXSMITH: It seems to me it is a very poor bluff.

Mr. CARVELL: While this Parliament has not the right to prohibit cattle from running on the highway, the courts have held that if a man allows his cattle to run upon a highway within half a mile of a railway crossing, unless they are in charge of some competent person, and an accident happens, it is considered as evidence of negligence on the part of the owner of the cattle, and he is not entitled to recover from the railway company.

Mr. SEXSMITH: But, if a man's cattle break out of the field?

Mr. CARVELL: That is provided for in another section, which practically states that the railway company must fence their right of way, protect it with cattle guards, and insure the farmer that his cattle will not get on the right of way.

Mr. GRAHAM: But, the farmer must keep the gates shut.

Mr. CARVELL: Of course. Heretofore, if it could be shown that the farmer was guilty of any negligence whatever, he could not recover for the loss of his cattle. Supposing a farmer allowed his cattle to run around his buildings—did not have them closed up—and they got on the railway, even if there were no cattle guards, the courts held that, inasmuch as the farmer was negligent, he had no right of action against the railway company. This has been changed.

Section agreed to.

On section 279—thistles and weeds to be kept cut.

Mr. GLASS: What would be the proper method of procedure if a farmer found his lands were being menaced by the spread of noxious weeds?

Mr. NESBITT: Write to the board.

Mr. GLASS: If those noxious weeds are allowed to remain for a week or ten days, at a certain season of the year, the menace becomes serious. I understood my hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell) to say this afternoon that, notwithstanding the fact that a municipality may have passed by-laws affecting this same matter, they have no jurisdiction so far as the right of way of the railway is concerned.

Mr. CARVEL: Neither the municipalities nor the provincial authorities have anything to do with the railway's right of way. That is entirely controlled by this Parliament.

Mr. GRAHAM: It would be a good idea if the railway commissioners would issue orders for the cutting of weeds at a certain time. If they let them go a week longer than they should they might as well not cut them at all as far as the spreading of weeds is concerned.

Mr. SEXSMITH: I thing that would be very wise. The railways have been very good in keeping their right of way properly cut.

Mr. NESBITT: Better than the municipalities have.

Mr. SEXSMITH: Yes very much better, but yet the railways are the greatest distributors of foul weeds that we have in the country. You will find grain from the West strewn all along the road and I know of scores of foul weeds brought into the country as a result of grain sifting out of the cars en route. The railways generally make one cutting do if possible, but if the Board would jog their memory about looking after these foul weeds instead of allowing them to grow up and go to seed it would be well.

On section 281—Fire protection:

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: There are several important amendments in this section. particularly paragraph (e) requiring the company to make reports and returns of fires occurring upon or near its right of way. Subsection 2, provides that:

> Any such orders or regulations may be made applicable during or after the construction of the railway, or during such time and in such manner as the Board deems proper.

I think it may be wise to place on Hansard the statement made by Mr. Price in regard to this section. It is as follows:

> This, for the most part, is a rearrangement. Paragraph (e) has been added giving the Board power to require the company to make reports of fire. Strangely the provisions relating to fire guards were duplicated in part in 1-2 George V, cap. 22 s. 10 (4) and old section 30 (f). For provisions respecting proper equipment of locomotives, see section 289 (f). By an addition at the end of subsection 1 it is now expressly stated that the orders and regulations may be made to apply during construction of the railway as well as afterwards. This power had already been assumed by the Board in the making of its regulations, but there was some doubt expressed on the point.

Mr. SEXSMITH: Are the railway companies compelled to supply fire rangers?

Mr. COCHRANE: They are in a new country.

Mr. SEXSMITH: They do considerable damage in the old country.

On section 282—Packing:

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: That is the same as the old Act except that subsection 5 is struck out.

Mr. GRAHAM: Why?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Subsection 5 is as follows:

> The Board may, notwithstanding the requirements of this section, allow the filling and packing therein mentioned to be left out from the month of December to the month of April in each year, both months included, or between any such dates as the Board by regulation, or in any particular case, determines.

This was fully discussed by the trainmen and different organizations who came before the committee.

On section 285—Notice to be sent to Board:

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The following words have been added to the section:

Any conductor or other employee making a report to the company of the occurrence of any such accident, shall, as soon as possible after such accident, notify the Board of the same by telegraph.

Mr. GRAHAM: Under the old Act all he had to do was to notify the company?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Yes. This is an added provision that the railway men requested.

On section 287—Orders and regulations of Board:

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: In the 8th and 9th lines the committee struck out the words " and may in any case limit the rate of speed of trains and locomotives as it deems proper." At the end of paragraph (g) the words " all persons travelling upon His Majesty's services " are added. Paragraph (h) is entirely new; it says:

With respect to the length of sections required to be kept in repair by employees of the company, and with respect to the number of employees required for each section so as to ensure safety to the public.

A portion of paragraph (i) is new. After the word " trains " the following words are added " with a view to the safety of the public and of employees." (j) Is entirely new:

Limiting or regulating the hours of duty of any employees or class or classes of employees, with a view to safety.

Mr. GRAHAM: In the other sections you say " with a view to the safety of the public and employees " while here you only say " with a view to safety." The obvious intention of this is that no one should be overworked so that the safety of the employees and of the public shall not be endangered. We do not say that in this paragraph, we just use the word "safety." Would it be worth while to add "safety of the public and employees "?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Do you not think that the wording of the first part of paragraph (j) would indicate the meaning?

Limiting or regulating the hours of duty of any employees or class or classes of employees, with a view to safety.

Mr. GRAHAM: Safety of whom?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Of these employees.

Mr. GRAHAM: The purpose of paragraph (j) is to limit the number of hours of duty with a view to the safety of the public and of the employees. If you overwork an employee you endanger the life of the employee just as much as you do that of the public. To be uniform why not say " the safety of the public and of employees " in this case just as well as in the others?

Mr. COCHRANE: There is no objection.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: You think it does not mean that now?

Mr. GRAHAM: No more than in the other clauses, and if we make a distinction in this one, some hair-splitting lawyer may say that if it was intended to protect the safety of the employees and the public we would have said so as we did in the other clauses. I would move that in paragraph (j) the words " to the public and to employees " be added after the word " safety " in the third line.

Mr. STEELE: This clause deals quite effectively with the protection of the public and of employees against accident, and there is some reference to the health of employees but I see nothing to protect the health and comfort of the public. With the advance of sanitation in the last fifteen or twenty years, the railways should be compelled by this Act to keep up-to-date in that respect. In many of our best trains the sanitation is all that could be desired, but on some of the local trains on the branch lines the lavatories are unfit for human being to occupy. This is a matter of sufficient importance to have a clause inserted giving the Board the power to compel the railway companies to keep all portions of their cars up-to-date, thoroughly clean, and pure.

Mr. COCHRANE: I think the Railway Board have power to deal with that now by regulation.

Mr. STEELE: Is it especially referred to in the Act? I think it is of sufficient importance to have it specially mentioned in the powers of the Railway Commission. In that way it could be more effectively dealt with.

Mr. BOULAY: I desire to move an amendment to section 287 obliging railway companies operating passenger trains in Quebec to have on those trains only employees who understand both languages. I have seen rows and disputes of all kinds, and have sometimes seen passengers ejected from trains because they were not understood by the train men; and I have seen others unable to make themselves understood by ticket agents, so that they had to call in interpreters. I think it would be well to give authority to the commission to oblige such companies to have on their passenger trains only men understanding both languages. This would work favourably for those speaking either language and it would be a great improvement in the operation of the railways in Quebec. Section 302 compels the companies to have their circulars and everything printed in both languages and it seems to me a great anomaly to have the men who are supposed to see to the observance of these circulars, laws or rules, unable to make the passengers understand them. There is no railway company in Quebec that cannot afford to do this among their personnel.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: This clause is of vast importance to the railway men, that is the men who are operating the trains. This clause has been carefully drafted to meet their views. They did not express a desire for such a provision.

Mr. BOULAY: We could add that to section 302. This would be binding on the company only.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Have the railway employees ever suggested anything of the kind?

Mr. BOULAY: It is not the employees who complain, but the passengers.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Possibly when we come to section 303 we could investigate it further.

Mr. WRIGHT: Would it not be better to confer that power upon the Railway Commission? Trains made up in a foreign country, the United States for instance, might come through a portion of the province of Quebec and take on a new crew at a divisional point. Common sense should regulate all such matters. The commission could be empowered to make such regulations as they might deem wise.

Section agreed to.

On section 289—Payment of wages:

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: This is an important amendment. The railway men are very anxious that this section should pass.

Mr. GRAHAM: What became of the Senate Bill dealing with this matter?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: It was withdrawn, owing to the fact that this Bill was dealing with the matters dealt with in their Bill.

Mr. BOULAY: Will this apply to Government railways?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Mr. BOULAY: This will surely increase the expense of the managing department. If this provision is adopted the railway companies will have to pay out more money each month. I can understand that employees who receive small wages should be paid fortnightly, but I do not think that those who get big salaries should be paid oftener than once a month.

Mr. COCHRANE: I move that the words " On and after January 1, 1918 " be inserted at the beginning of this section.

Amendment agreed to, and section as amended agreed to.

On section 291—Penalty may be prescribed:

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: This section was fully discussed in the committee. At one time it was decided to strike out certain portions of it, but after discussing the matter at some length the committee decided to leave the section as it was.

Progress reported.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Cochrane the House adjourned at 11.27 p.m.

Tuesday, July 17, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

EXTENSION OF THE TERM OF PARLIAMENT.

MOTION BY THE PRIME MINISTER FOR ADDRESS TO HIS MAJESTY.

Rt. Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister) moved:

That an humble Address be presented to His Most Excellent Majesty the King, in the following words:—

To the King's Most Excellent Majesty:

Most Gracious Sovereign:

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Canada, in Parliament assembled, humbly approach Your Majesty praying that you may graciously be pleased to give your consent to submit a measure to the Parliament of the United Kingdom, to amend the British North America Act, 1867, in the manner following, or to the following effect:

"An Act to amend the British North America Act, 1867."

Be it enacted by the King's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords, Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:—

1. Notwithstanding anything in the British North America Act, 1867, or in any Act amending the same, or in any Order in Council, or terms or conditions of Union, made or approved under the said Act, or under any Act of the Canadian Parliament, the term of the Twelfth Parliament of Canada is hereby extended until the Seventh day of October, 1918.

2. This Act may be cited as the British North America Act, 1917, and the British North America Act, 1867 to 1916, and this Act may be cited together as the British North America Act, 1867 to 1917.

All of which we humbly pray Your Majesty to take into your favourable and gracious consideration.

He said: In rising to present this motion to the House, I beg to call to the recollection of honourable gentlemen that on the 8th of February, 1916, I presented a similar motion. That motion for the extension of the term of Parliament from 7th October, 1916, to 7th October, 1917, was unanimously adopted at that time. In the speech from the Throne this year reference was made to a similar resolution, which would extend the life of this Parliament from the 7th of October, 1917, to the 7th October, 1918. Accordingly, the resolution which I now have the honour to propose was placed upon the Order Paper in the latter part of May, and it now becomes my duty to present it to the House, in order that it may be considered and dealt with.

In my judgment, the reasons for proposing this motion are quite as strong today as they were in 1916, and perhaps stronger. They are fully set forth in the remarks which I addressed to the House at that time. I need only summarize them now. In the first place, there would be, consequent upon a general election, disunion and discord throughout this country. There has, up to the present time, been at least a seeming unity. Outside and inside of Parliament men have worked together without regard to party or race or creed. I believe that party political questions have not been very much in the minds of the people during the last three years, and I would hope that we might, on this occasion, arrive at some conclusion which would prevent the controversy and distraction consequent upon a general election. More than that, the minds, the thoughts, the energies of the people would be diverted and turned aside from the supreme purpose of aiding in this war, and would be concentrated on political issues of relative insignificance. In short, a general election would leave, at least might leave, a divided nation. Besides that, I desire to emphasize the fact that the time and the energies of the ministers of the Crown during a general election would necessarily be diverted from the conduct of our country's participation in the war to the activities of a political campaign. It goes without question that members of the Government could not remain silent under attack. They would be obliged to speak and to use their best efforts to justify themselves and the administration for which they are responsible. In short, they would be obliged to take one course or the other; either to devote their energies largely to the necessities of a political campaign, or to let that campaign take care of itself, and continue, as they have been doing in the past, to devote their entire energies to the duties which are imposed upon them by the necessities of the war.

More than that, there is the fact that we have about 300,000 men overseas at the present time. It is impossible for any one of us to anticipate with any reasonable degree of certainty what proportion of those men would have the opportunity of exercising their franchise, and what proportion would not have that opportunity. That would depend altogether upon the character of the operations in the field at that particular time. These men are the best elements of our population. They assuredly have a right to be heard in the selection of a parliament which will control the affairs of this country during the next five years; and, indeed, I might ask, what right would we have to entrust the affairs of this country for five years to a Parliament in whose selection these men might have so comparatively small a voice.

More than that, I believe that the discussion of political issues, the intrusion of party politics upon the gallant and heroic men fighting our battles at the front and walking daily hand in hand with death, would be regarded by them as odious and indeed insulting.

There is another consideration I must place before honourable gentlemen of this House, and to me it seems of some significance. Very eloquent appeals have been made by honourable gentlemen, chiefly, I think, from the other side of the House, that before the Military Service Bill, which has been under the consideration of Parliament for some time, shall be put into operation, there shall be a united and earnest effort of all parties and all interests in this country for the purpose of endeavouring to obtain by voluntary enlistment the reinforcements which we seek to raise by the Military Service Bill. I have listened to those appeals with a great deal of interest. I have given very attentive thought to them. I should be willing to give them every consideration consistent with the certainty of providing the necessary reinforcements for the Canadian troops at the front, but I do not understand how it would be possible to have a united and earnest appeal of that nature, or how it could possibly be effective, under the imminence of an approaching general election. I hope, therefore, that hon. gentlemen, in coming to a conclusion upon the resolution which I am now proposing, will bear that in mind. The unity which would be necessary to make that appeal possible or effective could not be expected during a general election, or during the imminence of a general election; and so it would seem to me that if an election is forced upon the country at the present time, such a proposal must be abandoned.

As to precedents, I alluded to them when I spoke in this House on February 8, 1916. The Parliament of Great Britain has extended its life on three successive occasions, and its term now stands extended until November 30, 1917. New Zealand has extended its parliamentary term to December 19, 1918 — a very long extension. Australia was precluded from carrying out an extension by disturbing political conditions which unfortunately prevented her representation in the Imperial War Cabinet. I referred, in speaking on the motion of last year, to the precedent in Great Britain, when in 1716 a Parliament which had been elected for only three years, extended its term to seven years. In every self-governing nation of this Empire since the commencement of this war it has been found impossible to preserve the same regard for constitutional conventions as in time of peace. Extraordinary powers have been conferred upon the Governments of each of these nations by their Parliaments, and indeed, hon. gentlemen in this House know that here in Canada powers of a very extensive character have been conferred upon the Governor in Council by the War Measures Act of 1914, an Act which reposes in the Governor in Council practically all the powers that could be exercised by Parliament under the British North America Act, except the power of taxation and of appropriation of public revenue.

It may be urged that this proposal involves an alteration of the constitution. I regard it rather as a temporary suspension of but one feature of the constitution. Surely it is not a very serious step, for it merely provides that in Canada during the necessities of the war we shall have a parliamentary term of seven years instead of five years. Great Britain had a seven year term for her Parliament during a period of more than 150 years, and I am content to accept in that connection the view expressed by my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) who in speaking on this motion in February, 1916, said:

> It is not proposed here to alter the principle of the constitution. It is not proposed to override the control which the people have over Parliament. It is simply proposed to suspend for the time being the operation of the constitution. If it were proposed to make away altogether with that principle which is embodied in the Constitution, certainly I would oppose such attempt with all my might. But no such thing is proposed. This measure simply proposes that the constitution shall be suspended for twelve months, at the expiration of which time it will resume its full force.

It is not necessary, I am sure, that I should dwell upon the gravity of the situation with which this country, the whole Empire, and, indeed, the whole world, are presently confronted. When I spoke in this House on the 8th of February, 1916, we had sent 125,000 men overseas. To-day, our casualties are rapidly approaching that figure, and since my return from Great Britain on the 14th of May last, just about two months ago, they number 12,000. Since the extension of the term of Parliament sanctioned on the 8th day of February, 1916, Canada has sent no fewer than 200,000 men across the ocean to fight for liberty and civilization. We must realize, in dealing with this resolution, that our country, in common with the whole Empire, is facing a supreme test. The existence of the Empire, its institutions and liberties, are in peril. More than that, the foundations of civilization itself are endangered.

It would be impossible to overstate the transcendent issues which are hanging in the balance, and I am content to have them portrayed in the eloquent words which my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) addressed to this House in February, 1916, when he spoke thus upon this motion:

> There was nothing for Canada to do but to do what she did; to place at the disposal of England all her resources in men and money. Men there are to-day who sneer at the thought of Canada exhausting her resources to defend the Empire. Sir, who talks of the Empire to-day? There are other things greater even than the Empire, great as it is. Civilization is greater than the Empire, and civilization is the issue.

And further, he said:

Who can doubt but that if Germany were to win it would be the end of all we hold sacred. Who can doubt that it would be the end of that individual liberty, that personal dignity, that independence of thought and action which citizens of all British countries value more than life itself. For my part, I re-echo the words lately spoken by that workman of the docks of Liverpool: who, discussing compulsion in England put an end to all doubts, by exclaiming: "If Germany should win nothing on God's earth would matter."

So, I would ask my right hon. friend, in so terrible and unprecedented a situation, with the destinies of Canada, the fate of the whole Empire, the fate of the whole world, hanging in the balance, whether we should seriously consider technical adherence to every constitutional convention. In such conditions, are we to weigh carefully the advantage of a five year parliamentary term as compared with a seven year parliamentary term?

But in speaking as I do, very earnestly upon this subject, I desire to make it perfectly plain that this Government in proposing this resolution does not come before Parliament as a suppliant. Whenever it becomes desirable or necessary in the public interest that the record of the Government should be submitted to the judgment of the people, we are quite prepared and willing to abide by the verdict of the electorate. During the past three years the responsibilities and burdens imposed upon those to whom is entrusted the administration of public affairs have been greater than can possibly be realized by any one who has not been called upon to grapple with and fulfil them. We have discharged those responsibilities to the best of our ability; we have not spared ourselves in the effort to achieve their just accomplishment. In all our endeavours there has been no regard for any consideration but the conscientious performance of our duty; otherwise we should have been entirely unworthy of the trust reposed in us. To admit that mistakes may have been made is simply to admit that the members of the Government are human and therefore not infallible; but I am confident that as few mistakes in the conduct of the war have been made in Canada as in any part of the Empire.

I, therefore, hope that it will be thoroughly understood that the Government does not propose this motion through any fear of an appeal to the electorate, if that should prove necessary; but they feel it their duty to present this motion to the House for the purpose of avoiding the distraction, bitterness, and strife which would inevitably ensue if the parliamentary term were not extended for another year.

I hope hon. gentlemen will remember —and I am absolutely confident of the fact as I state it—that political questions and party differences have absolutely no place in the minds or hearts of those who are holding Canada's line beyond the Vimy Ridge in France, and who are slowly pressing back the invaders until they shall no longer desecrate the soil and decimate the population of France and Belgium with their horrible and barbarous methods of warfare. Among those brave Canadians there is but one great over-mastering purpose—the winning of the war for liberty, civilization, and humanity. That common purpose animated this Parliament in August 1914, and in February 1916. If it still inspires us, then I have reason to hope that the appeal which I am now making to this House will not be in vain.

It is with the deepest feeling of responsibility that I present this proposal to Parliament, and I hope that no word of mine will be wanting to impress upon the House the like sense of its responsibility. I realize fully that my right hon. friend who leads the Opposition has also a great responsibility devolving upon him. Upon an occasion like this in 1916, he spoke of himself as one who was the servant of the State and of the people, who owed duties to the State and to the people; duties and responsibilities of a character different from those appertaining to members of the Government, but, nevertheless, not of an inferior character.

In coming to the last consideration with which I shall trouble the House I should like to say that many communications have come to me from almost every part of this country, as to the course which this Government ought to take, and which I myself should take, with regard to the passage of a resolution such as this. Those communications in very large number have urged upon me the desirability of enforcing and securing the passage of this resolution by a party majority, thus preventing the evils of a war election. The disadvantages of a war election I have already emphasized. I am as fully conscious of them as any hon. gentleman of this House, but there are some things worse even than a war election. I have considered very carefully indeed where my duty lies in this respect. I have striven most earnestly to realize and to fulfil it, and I have reached a definite, and, I believe, a wise conclusion.

In speaking on this subject in the House on February 8th 1916, I said at the commencement of my remarks:

> It is hardly necessary to say that it is a motion which we should not press if hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House should oppose it as a party. In that case I should feel it to be my duty to withdraw the motion, and then it would naturally be for the Government to consider its course.

I also said:—

> I entirely admit that no extension should be asked for by a Government in Canada, or should be approved, unless it appears to have the support of public opinion, and unless it is approved by both political parties.

My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, speaking on this subject upon that occasion, dwelt upon the necessity of practical unanimity in this House, and in doing so he used this language:—

> If this resolution was adopted unanimously, even though carried by a majority of this House, and even if my right hon. friend himself were to carry it to the foot of the Throne, I have no doubt whatever that in the face of such a minority as would be arrayed against it, the British Parliament would never grant the power sought. The British Parliament, I am sure, will never, under any circumstances, alter the Constitution of this country, except upon a unanimous resolution of the two branches of the Canadian Parliament.

It is quite apparent from the principle which my right hon. friend laid down at that time, that if this resolution should pass this House by a majority only, the controversy would not end here, but would be taken up beyond the seas, and the Parliament of the United Kingdom, in the midst of the greatest struggle that humanity has ever known, would be confused and distracted with conflicting cries from the two political parties in this country. It seems to me that an issue such as that which I have thus outlined is one that we ought not to contemplate for a moment.

This matter must be determined, it seems to me, in this Parliament by a unanimous, or practically unanimous, vote. If the resolution cannot be carried in this Parliament by a unanimous, or practically unanimous, vote, then I adhere entirely to the position which I assumed on the 8th day of February, 1916, and I would not seek to urge this motion upon the House. In saying that, however, I do once more most earnestly appeal to hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House to give to this resolution the sanction of their unanimous approval. I need not urge again the considerations which I have already expressed; they must be apparent to the mind of every member of this House.

I should like to see in this country an extension of the parliamentary term, and a government, formed by a fair union of both political parties pledged to carry on the effort of Canada in this war until it shall be crowned with a victorious conclusion. I should like to see the efforts of both political parties in this country thrown in that way into this great struggle in order that the issue which we all pray for may be brought about. I should like to see that done, and if that were done I am sure that we could have by unanimous agreement in this House an extension of the parliamentary term, and the carrying out of every measure which is necessary to the winning of the war.

I realize fully that the conditions under which I propose this motion to-day are not precisely the same as those which prevailed in February, 1916.

There has been raised in this Parliament and in this country the question of the means by which the necessary reinforcements for the Canadian troops at the front shall be provided. My right hon. friend who leads the Opposition has not seen eye to eye with me in that regard. I hope the House and and the country will realize that for 18 months before that measure was proposed in this House I had been urged in the most cogent and forcible terms, by representative men from every part of this country coming here in large numbers and in great delegations, to enforce compulsory military service. I sincerely desired to avoid taking that step unless it were absolutely necessary, but in the end I did take the step, because in my heart I believed and I still believe it to be absolutely necessary in order that we may fulfil the whole duty of this country in the war. I realized that the raising of that question placed upon my right hon. friend a great responsibility. I realize that the proposal of this motion imposes a great responsibility on me, and that it places an equal or perhaps even a greater responsibility, upon him.

As I said before, I do not purpose to press this motion if it is opposed in the way I have spoken of. I think there ought to be practical unanimity in this House before we should go to the Imperial Parliament for the purpose of obtaining the necessary legislation, and I once more appeal to hon. gentlemen in this House to avoid the evil —the very great evil—of a war time election. In placing this motion before the House and the country to-day, I am discharging as best I can the responsibility and duty thus devolving upon me.

It will be for my right hon. friend to see for himself the path of his duty, and under the responsibility which appertains to him to act as he may think that duty demands. So, my final word of appeal to this House is that this motion may be passed with that practical unanimity which will enable us to present it to the Imperial Parliament for necessary action and ratification, and I believe in doing so we shall take a course which none of us, at any time in the future, can regret, a course absolutely in the interests of this Dominion, of this Empire, and of the great cause for which our gallant troops are to-day fighting at the front.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (South Renfrew): I trust none of the hon. members of this House will think I am unduly intruding myself at this juncture in the discussion. What the right hon. gentleman has said concerning the desirability of Canada prosecuting this war so far as in her lies, until it is brought to a successful conclusion, finds an echo in the heart of every man. Canada did not enter this war lightly. She entered it of her own free will, without compulsion —I might say, without invitation—fully believing that on her, as part of the Empire, rested a duty, and on her shoulders as a young nation there rested also a privilege to join hand in hand with the free citizenship of the world in doing her best to maintain the rights, the privileges, and the liberties, for which our fathers and our grandfathers fought. We are in the war, and we propose to stay in it until victory finally perches on the banners of the Allies. There is no desire, no thought, of shrinking from what is before us.

Our experience during the past three years has been sad, but it has been stimulating, it has been encouraging, because we in this part of the Empire, we in this young nation of Canada, have discovered ourselves during these three years of great struggle. We have discovered within us those elements of greatness, of manhood, and of citizenship that always were there, but were, in a measure, allowed to remain latent until this great opportunity was given to us to bring them forth in all their grandeur and in all their strength. We have risen to the occasion. I am not of those who believe, or who hint for a moment that Canada has not risen to the occasion. She has sent her men, she has sent her women, she has sent her money, she has made sacrifices great and voluntary, and she is prepared to make any sacrifice that may be requisite for the completion of this war in a proper manner.

I do not propose discussing what my right hon. friend has said, because I intend moving an amendment to the resolution. It is possible that we are losing our sense of proportion. The great question before us is the winning of the war—the Prime Minister has made that very plain—and we ought as a Parliament to support all measures necessary to accomplish that end for the cause of civilization. The Prime Minister has rightly and eloquently said that the conditions at the front demand our greatest energies. With that I absolutely agree. But, they demand our energies in more ways than one. I said a moment ago it was possible that for the moment we were losing our sense of proportion. We have discussed, and passed almost to completion, a measure of military service for the providing of men—and though we have differed on it, yet Parliament has acted. Before that is quite completed the Prime Minister introduces a resolution for the extension of the term of Parliament, which term does not expire for nearly three months. While the discussion of the extension of the term of Parliament is necessary and right, while the introduction of that measure is proper, I submit there is a duty incumbent upon the Government which demands more immediate action than the discussion, or passing, or withdrawal, of such a resolution. We have three months yet before this term expires, and during that three months—yes, even now—this Parliament ought to manfully grapple with the conditions at the front and with the conditions existing in Canada, and prove itself equal to working out a plan by which the conditions will be fully met.

One part of that programme has been dealt with. The other part has been left in abeyance. The second part of the programme, to my mind, is of little less importance than the first. The winning of the war being our great object, we should not be so desirous, three months ahead of time, to discover whether we are going to extend our own term or not. Our chief business to-day is to see that we are going to stand by the boys in the front in every particular. I have supported, and I intend to support to its conclusion, one branch of this programme and I am going to ask this House seriously if it is not their duty now to proceed with the inauguration and the completion of the other part of the programme which is necessary for the carrying on of the war.

The amendment which I intend to move has not been sprung upon this House. I gave notice of it several weeks ago, intending to move it on going into Committee of Supply but, not succeeding, as an opportunity was not afforded me to move that resolution, I take the opportunity of moving it to-day. I may say frankly that I did not care to move this on the third reading of the other Bill to which I have referred. Had I done so, a great many hon. gentlemen would have said that the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) was retarding the Military Service Bill. Consequently, I am moving it to-day in the proper place and, I believe, at the proper hour, and I would ask serious consideration of the few observations I am going to make.

It is useless to send men to the front, either voluntarily or forcibly, unless we are prepared to back them up. We must feed, finance, equip and clothe men.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: Is the hon. gentleman still of the same mind as he was the other night, that the pay of the soldiers should not be increased as proposed by the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Copp).

Mr. GRAHAM: I never made any such suggestion or gave any intimation to that effect and the hon. gentleman knows it.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman had a chance of voting for it.

Mr. GRAHAM: The hon. gentleman speaks more frequently than I do and he takes it for granted that if one does not speak on a resolution one way or the other he must be counted against it. My hon. friend will allow me to proceed. I do not know on which side he is on any of these questions. We not only have to finance, feed, clothe and equip these men at the front, but we have to finance ourselves, and we have to feed the people of Canada. In addition to that, we have to produce all the food possible to asist our Allies. In all the discussions that have taken place in the United States, in Great Britain and in France, the questions of food supply and finance have been considered only secondary to the question of the supply of men. We in Canada appear to think that we have done our duty if we have passed a measure providing for the raising of a certain number of men. We are not helping the Allies one iota if we provide men and do not provide to fully feed and equip them. Instead of helping the Allies, we are placing a burden on them.

Let me take up the question of finance for a moment. Hon. gentlemen will see, when I move the amendment, that it is merely to defer the discussion of the question raised by the Prime Minister. There is plenty of time to discuss it before the term expires, while we deal with something that is more important, to Canada and to the boys in the trenches. I am not going to say that the finances of Canada are in an unhealthy state. Canada has powers of financial recuperation, has resources, has virility in her people, has energy, courage and ability to carry her through any financial responsibility that may be placed upon her by reason of this war. Nevertheless, the fact remains that at the present moment we are incurring very heavy financial liabilities. And rightly so. But the question arises: Should we not, at this time of what may be called artificial prosperity, take advantage of the situation to more nearly pay our way as we go during this war? Why should we leave all the expense of this war to be borne by posterity, by the men who come back from the front, and by the sons and grandsons of these men? Why should we not, at the moment, look about us and see if there do exist sources on which the people of Canada can draw in order to meet the expenses of this war. There is not a man in this House who will not agree with me that in his own circle of acquaintances there are men who are able to pay and who are not paying according to their ability.

The hon. the Finance Minister (Sir Thomas White) said the other evening that the time might come when an income tax would be imposed. The time has come now when something ought to be done along the line of securing from those best able to pay their full share of the financial burden of carrying on this war. That has not been done in its entirety. You ask me what I would do? I do not intend to keep the House more than a very few moments, because I discussed this question at great length some two weeks ago; but this I do say—that the men enjoying large incomes ought to be taxed on those incomes. It has been said that those receiving smaller incomes and those with small deposits in the banks have become alarmed. There is no need of alarm on account of any action that I would propose or on any action that this Parliament would take. No person understands better than I do the necessity and desirability of financial stability, and of doing nothing which will interfere with the financial progress and commerce of the country, because to do that would be to interfere with our financial status at home, and make us a burden instead of a help to the Allies. But, there are in this country many men who are not contributing their share. The poorer men and poorer women of the country are contributing their share. There is not a man in this House, there is not one man of ordinary means, who is contributing at all in comparison to what the washerwoman is contributing who pays fifty cents to the Patriotic Fund, and there are many of them. I do not minimize for a moment the splendid contributions that have been made to the Patriotic Fund, the Red Cross and other worthy objects. Many Canadian men and women have risen nobly to the requirements and have contributed liberally. But there are still sources that ought to be tapped, and this Parliament will not be doing its duty if it ends this present session without devising means by which every man, and every woman, in Canada, who is able to contribute, is made to contribute his or her full share towards the cost of carrying on this great war. There are men who receive large incomes from mortgages and other securities, and on these incomes they are not paying one farthing towards this war.

True, they are paying some small amount to the municipality, which is given authority to collect such a tax by provincial legislation. But I say again there are men in Canada with large incomes, drawn from sources which relieve them absolutely from contributing one farthing for the carrying on of this war—and you will find them in every community. They do contribute to the Patriotic Fund—all honour to them—but in most cases, if a well-graded income tax were imposed, we could afford to let them keep all they give to the Patriotic Fund, and we would gain a thousand fold by adopting the other method of collecting. I would not impose a tax on the man of the ordinary income. Heaven knows he has all the troubles he can carry now, under the high cost of living, in keeping his family. But men who enjoy the larger incomes, I would compel to pay into the coffers of this country in order that we might borrow less and approximate more nearly our revenue to our expenditure as we go along. We are mobilizing men. That is proper, absolutely right. But if we quit with the mobilization of men, our duty is half performed and we are not doing what in us lies to make the issue of this war a success for the Allies.

I spoke the other evening of several things. Allow me, without wearying the House, to mention one or two. First, the transportation facilities of Canada. To win the war, as the Prime Minister has well said, is the transcendent issue in the Dominion of Canada. Nothing should be allowed to stand in the way of our transportation facilities being so efficient that our produce of the farm and from other sources can be carried with all speed to the place of embarkation. No matter who criticises or who does not, this Parliament will be responsible if we do not see that the railway companies of Canada are equipped with the rolling stock to carry the crop of 1917 to the seaboard. The fact that the heads of the companies or the Board of Railway Commissioners give as a reason why that was not done that they had not rolling stock, will not excuse this Parliament for not seeing to it that they have the rolling stock—and differences can be settled afterwards. Then, when we get the food to the seaboard, we only have it partially to the Allies and to our boys at the front. To-day the British Government, through the Imperial Munitions Board, is manufacturing ships all over Canada. This is proper and right; but I opine that, even if all the shipyards of Canada are busy, we in Parliament ought to sit down and devise a scheme whereby ships for the carrying of Canadian produce for our own boys will be built, and built without delay. That should have been done months or even years ago. It is useless for the farmer in the West or in the East to raise immense crops; it is useless to cry "production," unless we devise a scheme by which the products of Canada can be taken to the point of consumption across the sea. The discussions that have taken place in the press during the last few days of certain reports indicate to us that we have a work to perform along other lines in the matter of food production at home. I submit—and I want to give the Government full credit—that during the past few weeks they have started out along a line that the people of Canada have been discussing for a year or more. A food controller has been appointed; a fuel controller has been appointed. I am not going to criticise because this was not done before, but we seem to be working without concentration of effort, every man for himself. Some scheme should be devised by which all this would be co-ordinated and all would work, one with another, to attain the best possible results, with the minimum of expenditure.

4 p.m.

I could discuss natural resources as I did the other evening, but I do not want to detain the House. But I do want to impress on the House that the winning of the war being the chief object, the great thing in view of all Canadians, of all lovers of the liberty which we enjoy, is that we should devote our energies to first things first; and I submit that the question which I have outlined in a very few words comes before the discussion of the extension of Parliament. If the winning of the war is the great object which we have in view, I ask the Government to accept this motion: to defer further discussion of the resolution for the extension of the parliamentary term and to bring in legislation along the lines which I have suggested. Let us get it on the statute books of Canada and proceed to operate under it. I may say, in all friendliness, that I believe there is nothing that could be done by this Parliament which would bring as great satisfaction to the people of Canada as would be given us if, after passing the other measure to which many objections have been raised, we were to proceed to show that we were in earnest in this matter and pass a measure providing for the mobilization of all our forces in order that no effort may be lacking to carry on this war to a successful issue. Believing this, I have the honour to move this amendment, seconded by Mr. Pardee:

That all the words after the word "that" in the said resolution be struck out and the following be substituted therefor.

'.In the opinion of this House the consideration of the terms of said resolution should be deferred until the Government brings before Parliament measures providing that those best able to pay will be asked to contribute their full share to the cost of the war and by which all agricultural, industrial, transportation and natural resources of Canada will be organized so as to insure the greatest possible assistance to the Empire in the war, and to reduce the cost of living to the Canadian people.

Mr. SPEAKER: I shall put the amendment, which is entirely new to me, reserving the right to rule later as to its relevancy.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have listened attentively to my hon. friend (Mr. Graham), and I must express my feeling of great disappointment at the small amount of really definite suggestion that has resulted from his fifteen or twenty minutes' talk. From beginning to end it has been generality, generality, generality. I ask any member on either side of this House to take his pen or pencil and Hansard to-morrow morning, and go over the address of my hon. friend, and try to find in it one single lineament of a definite proposal to be carried out by definite methods and in a definite manner, and if he succeeds then he will find what I have been unable to find whilst I have been attentively listening to it. As to the relativity of this motion and its pertinence, I have been cudgelling my brains to ascertain where they came in. As to its consistency with the stand the hon. gentleman has already taken, I am equally puzzled.

This Government to-day, and this Parliament, as a working body behind the Government, has a lease of a little less than three months of life. Perhaps one might easily answer the question in any line of business as to how much vigour, how much strength, how much optimism, and how much real action he could put into a new proposition, faced by the fact that within three months his vital cords will have been severed, and he himself will have ceased to exist. He would be trying to make peace with his Creator; his remaining time would be spent in endeavouring to forget, if possible, his sins, and in coming to a recognition of better ways of living, so as to better the prospects of his future. My hon. friend has very well stated that there are three things that are necessary for the carrying on of the war. The first is men, the second is food, and the third is munitions and equipment. The Bill upon which we have been most earnestly engaged for the last two months in this House has been framed to provide the first great essential, men. We took that up first. We pursued it definitely and uniformly, because in our heart's heart, whatever may have been upon our lips, we felt that the one thing needed at the present time at the front, as far as Canada is concerned, is men. There are our four divisions; they have no recess and no holiday. Day after day, night after night, they take their places in that grim struggle, and not an hour passes by day or by night that death does not visit their ranks, and men fall, never to rise again. They are in the trench, in the dug-out, going over the top, passing No Man's Land, bombing the trench where the enemy, when the barrage of fire is lifted, is to be found. Death faces them at every step, and casualty sows every path they tread. How long—and every man's heart responds to the question—will those four divisions of ours at the front, under that constant pressure day and night, week in and week out, month in and month out, with no surcease, be able to sustain their own courage, to maintain their faith in the country that sent them there and pledged to them its support? As man after man goes down by death or casualty, and none come to take his place, hope and courage are apt to sink. My hon. friend says that Canada has risen to the occasion. God grant that we may stay risen to the occasion.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Of all the pities and of all the deep disgraces, no pity would be greater and no disgrace deeper, having once risen to the occasion, than that we should cease on the path of duty, of fervour, of courage, of sacrifice and of support. I agree with him when he says that Canada has risen to the occasion. My prayer now is that Canada may not decline from that lofty, proud, honourable and glorious position. But let there be no mistake at all. My hon. friend felt that we might have a disproportionate idea of these different factors in the contest. So we may. But to-day we will not have a disproportionate idea of the different factors in that contest if we stand by the conviction of these last three years, and the conviction of most men's hearts to-day, that what is needed on the other side at the present time is men prepared and skilled for the work of the trenches. Although it is a fact that no man can fight without arms and without food, yet neither arms nor food are of the slightest use, unless the men are there to use the equipment and the food which is produced for them.

Let Canada make no mistake about her position, and the supreme factor in the long line of factors which are fighting for liberty and civilization on this long battle front. Let Canada make no mistake that for her, and for the cause for which she is fighting, the important thing to-day is men, and every delay, dilatory or otherwise, which intervenes to prevent the calling of men, the drilling of men, the transport of men, the preparation of them for the final trench work, is just so much which impedes the path to victory, and delays the coming peace, which can only follow a victory on the front fields of battle. Just at this moment, when we have passed the Military Service Bill which my hon. friend (Mr. Graham) supports, and which he, as others, declares is necessary in order that there should be no gap, what is this that I see in the paper to-day, if it rightly states what the dissident Liberals have concluded as their pronouncement, to fill the gaps without delay? Will my hon. friend tell me how it is possible for this Government, with a bare three months of life left (unless this Parliament extends its term) to organize, to gather, to drill, and to send to the front men to fill these gaps, which are daily becoming wider, and which the men at the front are calling upon us to fill up instantly? How is it possible for the Government, which has but three months of life left to it, unless Parliament extends the term, to go forward and fill those gaps without delay? If there is one thing which is pressing, if there is one thing, above all others, in this Parliament that is now pressing, it is to know whether or not the term of this Parliament is to be extended, and the Government of the present day, or the organized Government which shall come afterwards—if a reorganization there be—should know at once what its term of life is to be. Without that knowledge it seems to be impossible for strong, vigorous and effective action to be taken, and yet when we come to decide that question, my hon. friend interposes with this motion of his. It seems to me that he might have put that motion into a chink where it would have greater relationship to some question in hand. He might also have placed it where it would not have stood in the way as a delay to this very necessary motion now before this House. I do not want to characterize my hon. friend's speech in strong terms.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is immaterial to me.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend has been a politician so long that his hide is thick. I do not wish unnecessarily or strongly to criticise his speech, but it struck me as being but one of the very many generalities which are glittering in themselves, but which, not being brought down to definiteness, have no weight or meaning.

Broadly speaking, my hon. friend's speech is twofold. He wants accumulated wealth to give an immediate and effective contribution. The motion of which he previously gave notice was in those very words. The first part of that motion he has changed somewhat, but the meaning is probably just about the same. His first branch then is this, that accumulated wealth should give immediate and effective contribution to the cause of the war. That is based upon the assumption that accumulated wealth has, up to the present time done little or nothing in the way of contributing to the war. The same assumption is made by others than my hon. friend. It is an assumption which is made too much in general and at large, probably mainly from a lack of thinking out what has been done in Canada during the last three years and the part that accumulated wealth has played in doing what has been done.

What has accumulated wealth contributed during the last three years of war? It seems to me to be a baseless assumption that it has done nothing, and almost equally baseless that it has done little. A fair statement to make would be that accumulated wealth in Canada is doing and has done wonderful things in the last three years of war. Has there been in Canada a period of greater activity than that which has intervened between the opening of the war and the present time? Has there been a time in which the manufacturing industries, the producing industries of nearly every kind in Canada have been busier at work, and have made greater outturns and output than during the last three years? And what, Sir, pray you, has been one great factor in that activity and outturn? It has been the factor of accumulated wealth. There was capital in this country, and when the war broke out that capital applied itself to the resources of the country and worked with enterprise and skill, and with the splendid co-operation of labour, in order to produce that astonishing wealth of production which it has turned out from the 1st of August, 1914, until the present date. I am not going to labour that question. Hon. members know that this has taken place, and that accumulated wealth, by virtue of its employment as capital in all these different lines of production, has contributed not a small, but, on the contrary, a very great share towards the general output and special war equipment of the country.

Accumulated wealth has done more than that. It has paid its share of a large and increasing general taxation. The war tax, the increased customs tax, the increased excise tax, have all been imposed on this country since the war commenced, and accumulated capital has paid its share of those taxes under the general law of consumption, and payment for that which is consumed, and accumulated wealth is notably a large consumer in this country. Outside of customs and inland revenue taxation, special financial taxes have been impased upon banks, upon corporations, upon different enterprises and industries, upon instruments of credit, upon the various things upon which they have been imposed, and from those taxes revenue has been taken in. That is therefore a contribution that has been made by accumulated wealth. I noticed in a speech made not long ago by the Minister of Finance the statement, that the added taxation imposed in those different ways on this country for the purposes of the war will this last year total some $200,000,000. That amount of taxation has fallen on accumulated wealth as well as upon other branches of industry, production, and earnings. Then there is the special profits tax, the business mens' profit tax which is heavier than any similar taxation imposed by any other country of which I know. Leaving out agriculture and insurance, it takes in every business which has a capital of not less than $50,000, and it takes in businesses which have a capital of less than $50,000 if over 20 per cent of the business of the corporation or person has to do with war equipment or war munitions. It allows 7 per cent of a profit to the business corporation. All the profits over 7 per cent in the years 1915 and 1916, it taxes 25 per cent. You may look through taxation schemes, high and low, and you will find no taxation scheme on business profits which takes in a larger percentage than is taken in by the Canadian legislation of 1915 and 1916 in that respect.

By the legislation of 1917, a profit up to 7 per cent is allowed to the business corporation or person. Of profits from 7 per cent and up to 15 per cent, 25 per cent is taken by the Government; of profits between 15 and 20 per cent, 50 per cent is taken, and profits over 20 per cent 75 per cent is taken. Therefore, there is no doubt or dispute that there is no business profits tax that I know of, or that I think is extant in the world to-day, which approaches in severity the business profits tax in this country. In 1915, that tax produced $15,000,000. In 1916-17, it will produce $20,000,000. In 1917-18, it will produce $20,000,000 or over. That is a direct tax upon accumulated wealth.

Taking all these things into consideration let us modify our views, at least to this extent, that we shall not run away with the idea in general that accumulated wealth has done nothing to aid the Empire or to carry on the war during these three years.

But accumulated wealth has done a very special work. To whom would we go for loans if not to accumulated wealth? Since the war began, the Dominion of Canada has issued, and the people of Canada have taken, $350,000,000 in domestic loans. Before the war, how much of the money that Canada required for her great expenditures was raised by loan in this country? How many of our people thought, before the war, that Canadian accumulated wealth was able to bear the burden of loans to that extent? It is because there was accumulated wealth, and because appeal was made to it, that $350,000,000 of loans have been raised in Canada for the purpose of the war and the purpose of the nation. But that is not the end of it. Accumulated wealth well knows that there are more loans to be issued, and accumulated wealth in Canada is willing to take more loans, and still more loans, as necessity demands. That much must be allowed to he accumulated earnings which make the wealth of the country. I state these things simply for the purpose of correcting an impression which, perhaps, is too widespread in this country, that the accumulated earnings of the Dominion have contributed little or nothing to the general work of the war and to the general interests of the Empire.

Let me go a little further along that line. What is accumulated wealth? Can we separate it into divisions which will be fairly definite? I think we can. We can take the first division of accumulated wealth as consisting of cash, liquid money which a man owns and keeps in the bank, or invests in short loans. That is cash more or less completely liquid, which the individual owns and uses as he pleases. That division of the accumulated wealth of Canada is not touched by our present special taxation.

The next division of accumulated wealth may be taken to consist of that property which belongs to an individual or to companies, and which is in a fixed condition. Take as a simple illustration the home a man owns and lives in. His earnings have accumulated and have been invested in a home for himself and his family. To that extent those earnings have become wealth, but it is wealth that is not productive in the economic or business sense. That wealth is the home which shelters, nourishes, and feeds the man, and gives him strength and vitality for his daily work; but the investment itself is fixed and is not productive of yearly returns. You can apply that illustration to numerous other things which appertain to the individual and to the aggregation of individuals the whole country through, and which form a vast portion of the accumulated wealth of the country—wealth which is in a fixed condition, which produces nothing, and which cannot readily be turned into productivity.

The third division is that portion of the accumulated earnings and wealth of a country which invests itself in resources, and each year produces more or less of earnings, and consequently adds to the sum of the accumulated wealth of the country. These, I think, without being too nice about it, are the three great divisions of accumulated wealth.

Now what does my hon. friend propose to do? If he wants to make accumulated wealth in those three divisions contribute immediately and effectively to the work of the war and of the Empire, how does he propose to go about it? Will he conscript the fixed wealth of the individual?

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend has been arguing for fifteen minutes about a term that appears nowhere within the four corners of my resolution. There is nothing about accumulated wealth, near or remote, in the whole resolution. It says, "those best able to pay shall contribute."

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is very good. My hon. friend gave notice of his resolution, and a copy of that resolution was put in my hands at 11 o'clock this morning. It dealt with accumulated wealth, and demanded that accumulated wealth should make an immediate and effective contribution to the cost of the war; that was his confirmed and reasoned meaning of his resolution. My hon. friend since then, perhaps feeling himself impelled to get his resolution a little more into relativity with the question in hand, has changed the first part of it. But between the first part as it now is, and the first part as it was, there is no generic difference, and the argument I am making is the argument used by my hon. friend himself and by many others all this country over who have argued in like manner. I prefer to keep the term "accumulated wealth," my hon. friend's own choice in his cool moments. I propose to stick to that in order that my argument may be even with the argument which has been made by members of this House and by people outside of this House.

It is a perfectly proper use of the term and quite germane. What were the actual words of my hon. friend's resolution as originally proposed? To-day is July 17. On July 16, a letter was addressed by Hon. George P. Graham to Sir Robert Borden, giving notice of the resolution which he proposed to move to-day. It is in these words:

That in the opinion of this House it is desirable that steps should be taken forthwith by the Government to provide that accumulated wealth should contribute immediately and effectively to the cost of the war.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is not the resolution before the House.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The resolution which was fixed a month ago, which was unchanged and on July 16 has within a few hours been changed to read:

That in the opinion of this House the consideration of the terms of the said resolution should be deferred until the Government brings before Parliament measures providing that those best able to pay—

That is a euphemism for accumulated wealth.

—will be asked to contribute their full share to the cost of the war.

I do not think I need tarry any longer by the way with these two companions. A little ribbon or a bit of feather may have been taken out of the hat of one and put in the hat of the other, but essentially they are the same; the cap-piece is a little different, that is all.

Now my hon. friend proposes that accumulated wealth should contribute, or to use his euphemistic language, that those best able to pay shall contribute their full share. How does he propose to do that? Is there more than one way in which it can be done? My hon. friend may be perfectly clear in his mind that there is only one way, and I will do him the credit of thinking he believes there is but one way; but that is not the impression which is very general in the country. There is a general opinion—too general—in the country that in some way or other you ought to conscript wealth, and that it is possible to conscript it, and that it ought to be conscripted forthwith, and that unless it is conscripted justice will not be done by the Government and Parliament to the people. Then it is pertinent for us to ask the question: How are you going to do that? Will you take a man's fixed property, which is unproductive, and have a certain part of it appropriated by the state and made part of the property of the state, to be, if possible, immediately transmuted into money and used for the purposes of the state? To ask that question shows it is an impossible proceeding to adopt. Are you going to take a portion of that accumulated wealth which exists in timber lands, in agricultural lands, in mineral lands, in fishing rights, in any other form of natural resources—are you going to take a certain share of those lands, those privileges, those possessed rights and forfeit them to the Crown, and if possible transmute them into current coin to be used for the purposes of the war? To ask that question, is to answer it.

Now, do not the answers to those two questions drive us back irresistibly to this —that the only things you can properly lay your hand on in this country is the earnings of property and of wealth? If you conscript capital—if you take a portion of capital from the aggregate of that actively employed, what are you doing? You are by that much depleting and depressing the productive power of the country, you are taking away its working capital. Without labouring that for a single moment more, is it not indisputably true that the only way in which you can economically and wisely tap the national resources of property and capital is by ascertaining their earnings and taking the state's fair share of them, leaving the capital to go on and do its work of production? Otherwise you would be in the position of the farmer who instead of keeping his productive stock to produce more, and estimating his financial position by his production, should sell off or do away with one-half of his stock and yet expect to have his earnings just as high in the end. It is against the interests of the individual, and of the community and the nation to deplete the capital of the country even by one single dollar. It is to the public interest to keep capital active, that its earnings may be as great as possible. Then the nation may take its share of those earnings for the services and expenditures that are necessary.

That brings me down to this—and with it I conclude, that if you are going to get after that small number of persons who are not to-day taxed under any of the present forms of taxation, and who do not give their proper quantum to the State for its purposes, the only way you can reach them is by an income tax, and an income tax it is the intention of this Government to introduce in this Parliament at its present session and pass through this House.

That is all I have to say on that branch of the question. I come now to the second branch touched upon by my hon. friend, the organization of the resources of the country. In the remarks made by my hon. friend with reference to the crying, pressing necessity for the organization of the resources of this country, I leave it to the judgment of the House if he did not seek to create the impression — and otherwise his argument would have had no force at all —that nothing, or very little, had been done in that respect up to the present time, and that by some method or other we should put on the shelf all the urgent legislation which presses upon us to-day, and takes up the elementary work of organizing the natural resources of this country. That is a large phrase to use. It is a splendid talking phrase. I have used it myself, and so have most of the hon. members of this House. There is a vast truth lying in it. Has nothing been done in the organization of the natural resources of the country up to this day when my hon. friend asks for this delay—while he keeps the gaps from being filled up in the trenches, in order that we might take some days or weeks to organize the natural resources of this country? Is there not the natural, the methodical, the sequential organization of the resources of the country which has been going on from primeval times, and which has grown up in a natural way? Take for instance agriculture. Agriculture cannot be learned by rote. It cannot be put on a full-fledged and economical basis just at an hour's notice. What are we to do to re-organize the agricultural industry of this country? All the farmers in Canada are at work, and have been most diligently at work. All the societies, agricultural and otherwise, for mutual improvement, help and co-operation, have been at work, and are to-day most diligently at work. All the local Governments I know anything about have their bureaus, their administrators, their experimental farms, their teachers, their experimenters; and in every province of the Dominion the farmers are to-day, and have been for years past, as busy as nailers on productive work along agricultural lines.

What has this Government been doing? My hon. friend never has given and never will give this Government the least credit for having done anything. But, suppose I take the agricultural interests, and ask my hon. friend to cast a glance over what has been done. Have we been entirely negligent? Have we delayed in doing anything? My hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell) has been a wide-awake, and persistent, and tireless Minister of Agriculture. I know a good deal of what he has done, and I can give him that credit which is his due. The Minister of Agriculture has done many things, which I will not take time to detail to this House. I will, however, mention two or three. In 1914, after the war had commenced, we had the misfortune of having a bad harvest. In our Northwest we not only had a bad harvest but we had a harvest so ill-dispersed that large sections were absolutely without seed and food. The Minister of Agriculture, and the Minister of the Interior, backed by the Government, spent $12,000,000 in buying and distributing seed, in giving food where there was poverty, in giving feed where there was none for the animals that do the work of agriculture, with the result that in 1915 these wide waste districts were seeded, the farmers with their animals in good condition got upon the land and in these very districts the greatest harvest was gathered that Canada has ever known I think all this is greatly to the credit of the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of the Interior That is only one of the many things in which they have co-operated. But does my hon. friend (Mr. Graham) wish this, or any Government, to go to the agriculturists of this country and say: You are not doing your business properly; we are going to organize the farming industry; throw down your tools and let your machinery stand idle; we will take this land, put it under cultivation and hire you to do the work if you will come in and take our wages? There is only one thing to do, and that is to retain the skill and the brains now devoted to agriculture, to retain the men whose interest it is to stay by the farms and make them productive and to co-operate with these men teaching them by experiment, by example, and by the help of other men, to enable them to do the best work possible. But, let the farmers do it. Do not let the Government take the agricultural land and put the organized farming industries, under the control of the Government. The best results will be gained under the natural method. What holds in reference to agriculture, holds in reference to industrial business as well. It is much better for those industries, aided as they have been in various ways, to work out their own salvation under as favourable conditions as may be given them, than that the Government should undertake to run these industries. I know there are people in this country—there may be some in this House—who, under the pressure of this war, are trying to realise a pet theory of their own, that the Government should own, manage and operate everything for the benefit of the State and that individual effort, and all individualism in industry should be blotted out. I am not one of these. I do not believe that that is the proper policy. I do not believe that it has been or ever will be successful. I think that all these industries are organized upon sound lines. One proof of this amongst others is that within the last thre years these different industries have had larger outputs than they ever had before. I have not time to go into that subject, but if any man will trace the history of the manufacture of military equipment, munitions and supplies of war during the three years that have passed, he will be astounded at the amount of the outturn, as well as at the organization and methods of co-operating one with another which have led to this great production.

My hon. friend mentioned two other things. First, he said that the railways should be co-ordinated. The railway question will be before this House within a very short time, and some of its phases are to be discussed and settled. But if my hon. friend means by the motion that the railways shall be taken by the Government, organized, furnished, controlled and run by the Government for the benefit of the state, he is face to face with some questions, financial and economic, which he had better carefully solve before he begins the work he proposes. He must know, if he has watched things, that there is a co-ordination of railway work and activity in this country under that admirable board the Board of Railway Commissioners, and that the benefits of that co-ordination have been manifest in the added effectiveness of the railways. But my hon. friend says that the Government should immediately equip these roads with locomotives, cars and everything that is necessary. Let my hon. friend be made "controller of railways" and given authority to go out into the wide world and give an order from any manufacturer who will undertake, under contract and bond, to supply him with the amount of rolling stock that is necessary to fully equip all our roads, and do it inside of two years—say nothing of the delay of this Bill meantime. My hon. friend, light and airy as usual, says that this Government ought to build ships enough to carry the products of Canada. Will he sit down and with pencil and paper and tote up the products of this country that go over the water, tote up the number of vessels that are ready to carry them, estimate the length of our season and find out just how many vessels of from 3,500 tons to 11,000 tons will be necessary to carry these products? Then let him search this wide world through, like Japhet in search of a father, to find out the manufactories and workers anywhere that could give him, not the ships, but the steel for the manufacture of those ships, in anywhere from 18 months to two years from the date he places the order. Though my hon. friend has been a member of a Government, he has at the best a very faint idea of the financial responsibilities which are facing this country. It is so easy for a man who has no financial responsibility to talk glibly of $100,000,000 or $200,000,000 being put into arrangements for the building of ships for Canada—when you cannot get the steel; when you cannot get the labour; and when, if you had the money, you could not get your ships inside of two years. Even if you could find the men and material for such a work, you might perhaps be surprised at what it would be necessary to pay for them. Before we talk so glibly about organizing the resources of this country, we must take into account the conditions as they are.

Now I have spoken altogether too long, and I am going to stop almost immediately. My hon. friend proposes all this for the sake of the war, for the sake of the Empire and for the sake of reducing the cost of living. I had intended dwelling a little upon that last item. I shall content myself with this simple remark: From what study and thought I have given to what is called the high cost of living, I really do not think that any prescience or organization or knowledge of human beings within the bounds of the Dominion of Canada could have had any very material and tangible effect in keeping the prices of staple foodstuffs and articles at lower figures than they have been in this country. No matter how diligently men put their minds to the task, no matter how wisely they organize, there are certain great world conditions that must govern. You cannot take forty millions of combatants out of the field of ordinary world's work and expect production to go on as before. You cannot subtract twenty or thirty or forty millions more as subsidiary helpers, doing nothing but aiding those who are combatants by furnishing equipment and expect beneficent production to go on as before. You cannot tread with hoofs of war some of the finest producing portions of the world into powder and mud and muck and expect that productive capabilities will be as great as before. You cannot abstract all those virile men and leave old men and women and children to do the work of agriculture and expect it to be as well done; you cannot kill off your stock; you cannot deny your fields the nourishment of fertilizers; you cannot militate, as you do in war, against everything that tends to successful agriculture and yet have as great productivity in the world as in times of peace. Facts are indisputable There are more to be fed than there is food to give. The supply is less than 5 p.m. the demand. And in the wild waste of this war, added to everything else, there is the menace of the submarines, with all the attendant cost of transport, and loss of supplies. So it is impossible for us to go on normal lines through a period of three years of war and not expect food prices to be raised.

I have no sympathy whatsoever with the food hog or the food hoarder—either of these is a reprehensible being, who ought to be condemned and suppressed by the whole nation. But to my mind there has been remarkably little of that in this country. We have already appointed a food controller. My hon. friend gave us credit for that, but said it might have been done earlier, although he said he would not criticise that particularly. We must take into account the fact that food eaten by somebody is raised by somebody else. Somebody else will not raise it unless the inducement is sufficient to make it profitable for him to do the work. For 3,500 miles our country is bounded by the fields of a great agricultural people, with their prices, their profits, their modes of living and their methods of trade. It would have been well nigh impossible for us to have done much in the matter of controlling the price of staple foods raised by farmers unless there could be co-ordinate action between ourselves and the people to the south. That co-ordinate action is now within sight. As soon as Congress shall have given the powers that are under way, I believe that the conditions will be such that, by agreement and co-operation between these two countries, the prices of staple foods can be regulated and controlled in some fairly effective way. But do not let us come to the conclusion that we could go through a world-wide devastating war and not pay in food and in every other means of the sustenance of life.

Hon. WILLIAM PUGSLEY (St. John): Mr. Speaker, it certainly is very depressing to hear the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) express the view that, after all, it is doubtful if anything effectual can be done, or rather if anything can be done without the co-operation of the United States, to reduce the cost of living in this country. I intend to make some reference to this phase of the question as discussed by the minister. I desire first, however, to deal with the resolution which my right hon. friend the Prime Minister has presented, and to endeavour to express the reasons which I think ought to influence the House in refusing its consent to its adoption. My right hon. friend has, it is true, said, and I have no doubt said with great propriety, that he would await the declaration of the opinion of my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) as to the desirability or otherwise of passing this resolution, before he would take action upon it, either by putting it to the decision of the House or withdrawing it. The Prime Minister, as I have said, very properly stated that. Therefore in the expression of my views, I shall have no expectation that my opinions will have any very great influence, either upon that side of the House or upon this, in arriving at the decision to which my right hon. friend refers. Nevertheless, I have very strong views upon the question, and I think it desirable that I should state them to the House. My right hon. friend refers to the speeches which were made last session by himself and by the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). He said at that time, and very truly, that there was an unanimity on the part of members on both sides of the House. He referred to the fact that during the progress of the war there had been great unanimity among the members of the House and among the people of this country. The reason for that was that there had been some respect paid to and some appreciation shown for the views of a large number of members of this House and a large section of the people of this country. The reason for that condition of affairs was that there was a manifest desire to avoid great controversial questions; questions which would divide province from province, and one section from another section, upon racial lines.

There was evidently, up to that time at all events, a desire to avoid any such action as this, and that was wise, Sir. My right hon. friend proposed that Parliament should grant to the Government an extension, because that is what it amounts to. It was not granting to this Parliament a further term of life, but it was granting to the Government, which had the confidence of the majority of this Parliament, an extension of its term. My right hon. friend asked this House to grant the Government a renewal of their confidence. There did not seem to be any important questions which would divide the people. Parliament and the people of this country had a right to expect that the same policy which had been pursued previously in this war should be continued, but the position to-day is entirely different. My right hon. friend, without any notice, without any consultation with the people of this country, and I believe without any reason to justify such a course, has thrown upon this House a measure more controversial, more calculated to array one section of the country against another, more calculated to array one class of the people of this country against other classes, and more calculated to raise racial cries in this country than any other question which could possibly have been precipitated. Yet the right hon. gentleman asks this House to give this measure its unanimous support. Notwithstanding the fact that the Government has acted contrary to the solemn pledges which the Prime Minister made to this House, and has more than once made to the people of this country, the right hon. gentleman comes forward with a coolness which, in any one else but my hon. friend, would excite surprise, and asks this House to pass a resolution renewing the confidence of this Parliament in his Government. It is astonishing that the right hon. gentleman should do that, when he knew perfectly well, before he presented the resolution, that it could not, by any possibility, be accepted by the unanimous judgment of this House. I say to my right hon. friend that, no matter what might be his views, with all his power and all the influence which he is entitled to command among the people of this country on account of the long and valued service he has given to the State, no matter how much he might endeavour to influence public opinion with his great persuasive power, I doubt if he could convince any large number of the members sitting on this side of the House —and I am sure, Sir, that he would not be able to convince a majority, even of the people of this country—that it would be desirable to renew the confidence of this Parliament in the gentlemen who sit upon the treasury benches.

My right hon. friend says that he has been urged by many influential people to press through this resolution as a partisan measure, and send it to the Imperial Government, and ask the Imperial Parliament to pass it. No one knows better than my right hon. friend that if he were to have this resolution adopted against the views of any large section of this country, the Imperial Government and the Imperial Parliament would refuse to carry it into effect. That is why the right hon. gentleman will not risk the passing of this resolution by a majority vote of this Parliament. They could ask a majority of the members of this House, which they command, to pass it, if they dared to do so, but they know it would be waste paper when it was passed. It might cross the ocean, but it would never find a place upon the statute books of the Imperial Parliament. My right hon. friend, in view of the pressure which has been behind him in certain quarters, makes the announcement that he will withdraw the resolution, unless it meets with the unanimous approval of this House, because he knows that it would not be carried into effect. And why? The reason was well stated by my right hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), and his words were quoted by the Prime Minister, that the Imperial Parliament would not think, for a single moment, of altering the constitution, unless they had evidence that it was with the unanimous, or practically unanimous, consent of this Parliament, which would mean the consent of both sides of the House. My hon. friend says we ought to bring our minds to a conclusion to adopt this resolution, because in times of war people ought not to pay special attention to the provisions of the constitution, and that these constitutional rights should not be regarded too solemnly. Well, Sir, that is exactly what the Kaiser said after the war broke out. The Kaiser made up his mind that it would be of enormous advantage to get through Belgium on the triumphant march of his army to Paris. Belgium refused to let the German army pass through, and the German Government said: "Oh, in times of war, treaties are but scraps of paper, we will have no regard to the treaty under which we are bound to protect Belgium, because these are war times, and in war times one is justified in resorting to any measure in order to accomplish one's end." And so my right hon. friend says these are war times, and no regard should be had to the constitution. I regard the British North America Act as a compact between the different provinces of Canada, which cannot be broken, except by the consent of every province which became a party to that compact. That is the view which has been taken by great public men who have addressed themselves to the question since Confederation. That is the view which has been held by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, the highest appeal court in the Empire, and that is the view which generally prevails among constitutional lawyers. It is a pact, and cannot be broken by the voice of three or four or five or six of the provinces of Canada, but it can only be broken by the unanimous vote of all the provinces which entered into the pact under which Confederation was formed. As I am taking a different position to-day from that which I took when I agreed to an extension of the life of Parliament at the last session, I desire to say that one of the grounds upon which I take my stand to-day is that this Government, in utter breach of the pledge which was made to this Parliament, at a time when the Prime Minister of Canada knew what was the view of one province of this country as to the necessity of standing by the constitution, that there would be no compulsory service in Canada, is attempting to force upon the country a measure of compulsory service, without the people of Canada being allowed to have any voice in it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Under these circumstances, as I indicated when speaking on the motion for second reading of the conscription Bill, I will vote against the resolution for the extension of the life of Parliament. At last session, we took an extraordinary course; but as I have said, up to that time, all was harmony; there had been no discord; there had not been thrust into the political arena any questions calculated to arouse our people either upon national or upon racial issues. But it was a step which, even for the other considerations I have mentioned, one ought to hesitate long before taking. The fact that we took that step once ought to be no precedent for our taking it again.

Why was the term of five years fixed in the constitution under which the provinces of Canada were united? Why was it not left to this Parliament to determine what should be its life? The Imperial Parliament can determine its period of life; the New Zealand Parliament and the Parliament of Australia can do the same thing; but for good and substantial reasons, for reasons which at the time seemed to be sound, the Fathers of Confederation placed in the constitution the provision that it should be beyond the power of this Parliament to extend its life. The circumstances in this country are peculiar. We have two races of equal prominence and with equal rights, two races which stand equal before the law. It could not be foreseen what might be the action of Parliament in reference to questions in which either race might be particularly concerned, and the Fathers of Confederaion therefore determined that there should be a limit to the life of Parliament, and that from time to time at periods not longer than five years apart, Parliament should be dissolved and Government and Opposition should be obliged again to appeal to the people That safeguard was put into the constitution, and it should not lightly be interfered with. My right hon. friend said that it would be objectionable to have an election because it might be impossible to take the votes of the soldiers at the front. Not many sessions ago a Bill for taking the soldiers' votes was under consideration day after day, and when hon. members on this side doubted the possibility of taking their votes, hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches replied that it would be the easiest thing in the world to do, and one prominent member of the Government declared publicly at that time that the whole country was crying in thunderous tones for an election and that the soldiers' votes must be taken. The Soldiers Voting Act was therefore passed to make ample provision to that end. Yet when hon. gentlemen opposite do not want an election; when they are afraid to submit their record to the people; when there is this issue, unclouded by any other issue, when they think they can raise questions which will enable them to speak eloquently of the sacrifices of our brave boys at the front; when they think they will be able to sway the multitude by waving the Old Flag and thus making the people forget their wrong-doings during the past six years during which they have held the reins of office in this country—they introduced this compulsory measure, and at the same time they ask us to extend their parliamentary lives. They are doing this as a means of escape from the wrath of the people in case the extension should be refused, as they knew when they introduced this resolution that it was not unlikely to be refused. We were elected for five years. It is now pretty nearly six years since the people sent us here as their representatives. Many seats are unfilled; thousands of people in this country have never had an opportunity of voting for members of this Parliament, and they are entitled to representation. My right hon. friend, in connection with the taking of the soldiers' votes said: Many of our brave boys at the front will not have an opportunity of voting if a general election is brought on. Of the 300,000 men who have been sent across the seas, how many have ever had had an opportunity of voting for the present members of this Parliament? The last census was taken in 1911, six years ago. Of the boys who are now from 20 to 25 years of age and who are at the front not one has had an opportunity of voting for members of this Parliament. They were boys of from 14 to 19 when the census was taken and when the lists of 1911 were prepared. They are like thousands of other young men in this country of similar age who have never been permitted to exercise the franchise. They are entitled to exercise it. This Parliament does not represent them.

Let me present the matter in another way. What right have we, of our own motion and by our own votes, to extend our term of office? Hon. gentlemen on the other side who think they are little political gods, who think that they and they alone are capable of managing the affairs of the country, who think that they and they alone have a proper conception of the duty of a government in these war times, say it is for the best interest of the country that they should continue in office. That is exactly what the late ruler of Russia thought. He thought he could rule Russia much better than the people could rule. He thought he knew much better than the people of Russia what was in their best interest. But Romanoff is now doing garden work inside the walls of a prison in southern Russia, endeavouring to increase the production of that country. His fate, however, does not dampen the ardour of hon. gentlemen opposite, nor does the fate of other autocrats who have endeavoured, without a constitution, to rule the people. I can imagine no greater evidence of a desire to continue a state of autocracy in this country than that this Government and this Parliament should refuse to consult the people. Hon. gentlemen opposite say: Oh, the people do not know nearly so well as we what is in their best interest; it is in their best interest that we should manage the war for them without consulting them; we set ourselves up above the people, and, therefore, because we think we can manage far better than they, it is desirable that the life of a Parliament should be extended for another year. If it is extended for another year, why not extend it still for another year? Does this Government give us any assurance that the war will end in one year from now? When the war broke out they thought and by their do-nothing policy they acted as though they thought, the war would be over in a few months. But they can give us no assurance now that the war will be over in a year. We all pray that it may be, but if it continues for still another year, will they again ask for an extension? And if the war continues for two years, will they come again and ask for a still further extension? If they are the only people capable of governing this country, why not? If they are the only people who know how the war should be carried on, why should not they come again, and again, and again, although ten years may have passed away since the people have had an opportunity of casting their ballots?

For these reasons, I do not hesitate to say that I, for one, shall find it impossible to vote for this resolution, if I am to do justice to my conscience and perform what I believe to be my duty to the people. While I have not been over many parts of Canada, I have had an opportunity of meeting quite a large number of people of my own province, and I have not met one single man who thinks it desirable or proper that the life of this Parliament should be further extended. That remark applies to Liberals and Conservatives alike. They say: "Let us have an election; the people ought to rule in this country; you gentlemen at Ottawa are only the servants of the people, who have chosen you for five years, and no longer, to do our work. This is our country, not yours; the interests at stake in this great war are ours, and not yours alone, except as you are part of the people. We have given you a mandate for five years, at the end of which time you are to come back to us and render an account of your stewardship, allowing us to decide who shall represent us in Parliament for another term of five years." Does not that strike you, Sir, as a reasonable proposition in this democratic country? I think it should appeal to you and to every man in this country who has the faintest idea that it is the right of the people to rule.

I should like to address a few remarks to the amendment moved by my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham). If this amendment should be accepted by the Government and effect be given to it, I think it would be very much in the interests of Canada, and would do a great deal towards winning the war. I therefore hope the amendment will be carried. My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), in view of the magnificent things which he says and of the few things which he does, is entitled to be regarded as the most eloquent dreamer that we have in this whole Dominion. He says that this resolution is general in its character.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It was the remarks of my hon. friend, and not the resolution, that I characterized as general.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am glad that my hon. friend, when he came to consider the amendment, saw that it was in concrete form and not so general in its character.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have not passed any opinion on that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend was to keep clear of that. Let me read the amendment, which strikes me as being a mighty good one to propose at this time, and one which will commend itself to the people of this country:

> That all the words after the word "that" in the said resolution be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> In the opinion of this House the consideration of the terms of the said resolution should be deferred until the Government brings before Parliament measures providing that those best able to pay will be asked to contribute their full share to the cost of the war and by which all agricultural, industrial, transportation and natural resources of Canada will be organized so as to ensure the greatest possible assistance to the Empire in the war and to reduce the cost of living to the Canadian people.

I am particularly glad to be able to support this amendment. It seems to me to be particularly in the interests of the Canadian people. I am glad to support it because it breathes the spirit which ran throughout all the speeches which were delivered by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House in favour of compulsory military service. They, with hardly an exception, while supporting the Bill for conscripting the man-power of this country, took the ground that there were other things beside the man-power of Canada to be sacrificed; that there should be a mobilization of the resources of Canada as well; that the man-power of this country should be diverted into the best channels for the production of food, for increasing transportation facilities, for the putting of fuel on the market at lower prices, and for reducing the cost of living, which has risen at an appalling rate in this country. The first part of this resolution urges that consideration of the Government's resolution be deferred. Surely no harm could come from that. As has been pointed out, it will be some three months, or even more, before the term of Parliament will expire, and Parliament can be kept together very easily without any one suffering greater inconvenience than any man should be willing to put up with in the interests of the country. The amendment urges that consideration of the resolution be deferred until the Government brings before Parliament measures providing:

> "That those best able to pay will be asked to contribute their full share to the cost of the war and by which all agricultural, industrial, transportation and natural resources of Canada will be organized so as to ensure the greatest possible assistance to the Empire in the war and to reduce the cost of living to the Canadian people."

My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce says: Oh, Mr. Speaker, is it not a horrible thing to ask us to do this, when we have only three months of life before us? —when we can actually see our graves yawning before us, waiting for us to fall into them, is it not horrible to ask us to undertake this great work? Why did not the Government undertake it long ago? This war has been on since the 4th of August, 1914, but these gentlemen thought it was going to be over in a very few weeks or a few months at most. They have told this House on more than one occasion that there was danger of the Empire being at war with Germany. They told us so when they wanted us to engage in that chimerical scheme, the building of dreadnoughts by Canada. They told us in the August session of 1914 that Germany had been preparing for this war for forty years. Well, if they had kept in touch with the British military authorities, as was their duty, they would have known that such was the case. Do they pretend that they did not know? Did they think the war would be a triumphal march to Berlin within two or three months' time? Sir, as reasonable men they ought to have known that this war was likely to last a number of years; but whether certain that it would last a number of years or not, it was their duty to prepare for whatever eventualities might occur. Ought they not to have known that as millions of people were diverted from productive life into the ranks of the consumers, food products would become scarcer and the cost of the necessities of life would be likely to rise?

And if there is any advantage in appointing a Food Controller and a Fuel Controller to-day, was there not the same need of appointing such guardians of the people's welfare shortly after the war broke out, and was that not the time to appoint them—long before prices had soared to the enormous figures they have reached, figures which have become so alarming and which are so out of all proportion to what they should be that people in ordinary circumstances find it difficult to keep body and soul together because they are unable to meet the cost of the necessities of life.

My right hon. friend says: What could we have done in the way of transportation? Should they not have thought for a moment that Canada is capable of becoming the granary of the world, and that with proper production and proper transportation Canada could supply the allied armies with all the flour they might require? As prudent men should they not have thought of the future, and should they not have taken steps to endeavour to increase production, provide more transportation, and decrease its cost as far as possible? But, they have done nothing.

During last season the farmers in the West had the greatest difficulty in getting the cars necessary to transport their products to the markets of the world. My right hon. friend says: "Are we to take charge of the railways and operate them?" Not at all. Hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House are now fond of referring to what has been done in the United States —although it was not always so with them. What was done in the United States immediately after the war broke out? Within a few days the Government wired to the ninety-one presidents of the railway companies in that great country, asking them to meet at Washington in order to confer upon the steps that should be taken to make the railways of the country as efficient as possible. On the day appointed 86 out of the 91 presidents attended. The representative of the United States Government said: "Now, gentlemen, we want you to put all the railways in this country under one control. We want to operate all the railways of the United States just as if it were one great system, and if cars of one road are not particularly needed, but are required on another, these cars may be transferred at a moment's notice, irrespective of the wishes of the particular railroad. The 86 railroad presidents said: "We will gladly meet your views." By six o'clock that evening an agreement had been drawn up and signed, embodying the wishes of the Government, and since that time the railroad systems of the United States have been operated as if they were controlled by one company. An executive board was chosen consisting of five of the ablest railway men in the United States. They have their offices in Washington, and everything is directed by them. In this country there has been a shortage of cars or a shortage of locomotives on one railroad, and a surplus on another, but there is jealousy between the companies here, and there is no disposition amongst them to assist one another. The Government has no control over them, and no agreement with them. I think the example of the United States in this particular instance might very well be followed. Perhaps I should not say followed, although it may not be too late to follow it. In any event, that is the course which ought to have been adopted by this Government at the beginning. If this had been done the Government would know what rolling stock was available, and the railways should have been induced by persuasion or by assistance to procure all the equipment necessary to meet the transportation demands of the country. It would not have been costly to the Government, because this rolling stock could have been placed with the companies under the trust system, by which the Government would have been properly secured.

My right hon. friend says, "Think of the great number of ships which would be required to transport food to the Allies." Is not that the very reason why we should have done our part? Surely the more ships required, more obligatory would it be upon the Government of Canada to do their share of the work necessary to facilitate and cheapen transportation across the ocean. However, the Government has not done anything. Hon. members on this side of the House have pleaded in our humble way. We have pleaded especially with the Minister of Trade and Commerce to engage in building ships in Canada, as a government undertaking. Unfortunately our appeals fell upon absolutely deaf ears. One would not have known that the Minister of Trade and Commerce was born in a maritime section of the country. One would not have known from his inaction—I will not say his action—that he was familiar with shipbuilding. One would not have supposed for a moment that he came from a country where twenty-five, or thirty, or forty years ago there were not only hundreds, but thousands, of wooden ships constructed, which were the pride of that portion of Canada, and which sailed upon every sea, carrying commerce between Canada and all the countries of the world. Yet in the city of St. John, even since he and I were boys together at college, I have seen 1,200 able-bodied men working in one shipyard. There are scores, hundreds—nay, I am almost safe in saying, thousands—of places in the Maritime Provinces which could easily be turned into yards for the building of wooden vessels. The hon. minister says: We could not do anything, so many were required. Is that an answer to make at this late date? Consider the way in which our people are suffering from the high cost of fuel. Take the cities in the Maritime Provinces facing upon the ocean, in open water communication with the great anthracite mines of Pennsylvania. It costs far more to bring the coal by water from the mines to those cities than it costs to buy coal at the point of production. This is simply because vessels are so scarce.

We have pleaded with my right hon. friend to engage in the building of ships even for the coastal trade of Canada, even to save our people from being frozen to death in the winter, or from being reduced to a state of poverty by the high price of fuel. Coal can be bought at the mines for $6 a ton, yet it has cost our people between $15 and $16 a ton. Notwithstanding this, the Government feels that no duty rests upon it to engage in the building of ships, either for the coastal service of Canada or for service across the Atlantic.

Take the cost of the other necessities of life. I will not refer to the cost of goods kept in cold stores, because quite recently we have had a very strong report upon that subject. Take the cost of flour, for instance. My right hon. friend says, in effect: We could not control the cost of flour because some people must produce what other people eat; therefore, as somebody must produce the wheat, somebody must grind it into flour and take $15 a barrel for it, because it must be raised and milled. He promises what he is going to do when the war is over; he is going to build ships. After the war is over, he is going to have a great programme for shipbuilding, but during the war the task is too mighty for him or his Government to undertake.

Take the case of flour. It is beyond all reason, it is a disgrace to this Government that it has been allowed to jump from dollar to dollar, to jump by leaps and bounds, until it has reached a cost beyond the means of the people to pay. There was no need of it if this Government at the start had taken the proper steps—I do not mean by compulsion—but had taken steps to supervise production. If the farmers and those great associations of grain growers had been seen, a harmonious arrangement, to which they would have been glad to agree, could have been made by which the price of wheat would have been fixed at a reasonable sum. Then the Government should have seen the millowners, and they should have arranged that the cost of milling would have been so much. The millers are patriotic if you approach them in the right way. They would have made a proper arrangement. If they had known that you were to approach them altogether, they would have agreed to such an arrangement—so much for the wholesale dealer in flour, so much for the retailer, so much for the baker, and all along the line from the point of production upon the farm until the flour reached the house of the consumer. In this way you could have made an arrangement which could have materially reduced the cost of living. That is the process that is being undertaken by the very eminent controller of food in the United States, Mr. Hoover. He feels that by that system he can enlist the sympathy and support of the whole people, and that the cost of production can be kept down.

The amendment speaks of organizing the industrial resources of this country. Why should that not be done? It should have been done long, long ago. Why, Sir, we have in this country great Government workshops, situated at Transcona, near Winnipeg, at a point near Quebec, and at Moncton. These could have been enlarged to such proportions as might be necessary; they have the most improved machinery, and in these shops the manufacture of munitions for the Empire could have been undertaken and carried on as a national work, paying the men a reasonable wage for their work, and allowing no profits such as have been allowed to the manufacturers of munitions under the arrangement which has been made.

Mr. LALOR: Is any country in the world doing that to-day?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not care whether there is any country in the world doing it or not. In other countries the influence of the profiteers may be as great as it is in Canada but there is no reason why it should not be done. I will tell you why it is not done in Canada. The Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) says: Let us make this war pay for itself. He does not do it, of course, because he is putting the burden upon posterity, but he says: Let us make the war pay for itself. He says to the manufacturers of flour: "If you can get $15 a barrel for your flour, take it. Then you have to render to me an account of your profits. I will let you have twenty, forty-five or fifty per cent and I will take the balance and put it into the treasury? Then, I will boast to the people the enormous revenues that we are getting from the business interests of this country." What does it mean to the Minister of Finance if the Lake of the Woods Milling Company makes $1,200,000 or $2,500,000 excess profits? The larger the excess profits, the greater the revenue to the country, the more satisfactory is the Budget that he brings down and the louder will be the cheers from hon. gentlemen opposite. If there were no excessive profits, there would not be this large business tax, and there would not be this vainglory on the part of the Minister of Finance who is making this increase in his revenue out of the misery and the want of the common people of this country.

Mr. LALOR: Where does that want or misery exist?

Mr. PUGSLEY: That want and misery is all over this country—not with the canners —no—but with the common people. That is where it exists. My hon. friend has to do nothing more than go into the homes of the people of Canada, to go to the mothers, the wives and sisters often of the soldiers who have gone to the front, to visit families who are receiving an allowance, to find want and complaints as to the high cost of living which exists among the ordinary, common people.

With regard to the industrial resources, why should not the Government in a reasonable manner have taken control of the industries which are more especially engaged in making goods for the nation? Why should they not do it now? It was not the policy of this Government that they should do it. You will remember that only a year ago, on information which I had received, I made the statement in this House that under the contracts which had been given by the old Shell Committee, the baby of the then Minister of Militia, upwards of $80,000,000 of the money of the people of the Empire and of Canada had been uselessly spent and that that large amount might have been saved if economical, prudent and businesslike methods had been pursued. I made that charge standing in my place in this House and I risked my seat in Parliament upon my ability to prove what I had stated. Hon. gentlemen on the other side, led by hon. gentlemen sitting on the treasury benches, laughed me down or tried to do it. They said: We will have none of that, why, that is not a crime; that is only want of judgment; that is only waste of public money; you fellows upon the other side are charging us with extravagance and waste; why should we bother about that; $80,000,000; what is that; unless you charge that somebody stole it, we will not investigate the matter because we do not think it worthy of being investigated. I referred to a gentleman in Hamilton who had received such enormous profits that he actually became surfeited with them and became ashamed to continue making them. He offered his munition plant to the Government when Mr. Thomas was here from England. The Government did not accept his offer and they ridiculed the idea of his making these enormous profits. But later on when the same gentleman sent to the Government his cheque for upwards of $700,000, representing the enormous profits that his conscience would not permit him to keep, they took off their hats to Mr. Bailey and said: This is a great patriot and his conduct is deserving to be followed by a great many of the other munition manufacturers in this country.

So far as I have seen in the public press, that example has not been followed by others. I have just a few words to say after recess, and perhaps we had better call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL.

SECOND READING.

Bill No. 111, to incorporate the North American Accident Insurance Company.—Mr. Pardee.

EXTENSION OF THE TERM OF PARLIAMENT.

The order for Private Bills having been exhausted, the House resumed consideration of the proposed resolution of Sir Robert Borden (Prime Minister) for the extension of the paliamentary term, and the amendment thereto proposed by Mr. Graham.

Hon. WILLIAM PUGSLEY (resuming): Before recess, I was endeavouring to reply to a statement by my right hon. friend, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) that this Government could not do anything more than it had done. It seems to me that, so far as shipping is concerned, the Government has utterly failed to discharge its duty to the people of Canada and to the Allies. It has been stated on several occasions by members of the Government that, because the Imperial Munitions Board are building some ships in Canada, the Government is relieved of any obligation in that direction. I take a view entirely contrary to that. A great many people think that this Government is building ships, and are disposed to give it some credit for this action; but the Government are doing nothing of the kind. They absolutely declined to do anything, though they were urged over and over again by members on this side of the House to engage in this most important work. The work has been, to a limited extent, taken up by the Imperial Munitions Board, who have laid down the standard, and are having some vessels, mostly wooden vessels, built in Canada. But they are by no means exhausting the facilities which exist in Canada, or the men who are available. I have the knowledge, Sir, that quite recently different people have communicated with a shipbuilding director of the Munitions Board offering to build ships, asking for contracts, and they have been told that the board are not in a position to give any more contracts at the present time, and that they have no authority to give contracts, and only to-day I met some gentlemen from the Pacific coast, who informed me that the same statement was made to them by the Imperial Munitions Board. That corroborates the statement which was made to gentlemen in the Maritime Provincese who are very desirous of engaging in the work. If this Government, even at this late day, were to offer contracts for the building of wooden vessels, to be owned by the Government—so that the freight rates could be kept down within reasonable limits, which would perform enormous service to the country—I have no doubt they could find plenty of people, both on the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts, on the St. Lawrence river and on the Great Lakes, who would be willing to engage in the work, and who would gladly accept contracts from the Government. Therefore, when the Government, through its Minister of Trade and Commerce, says that it can do nothing in the way of shipbuilding, it is confessing its own inability to carry on in an ordinary businesslike way the affairs of this country.

With regard to the farming interests, the minister says: Oh, see what we have done for the farmers. They have done only what they were doing in peace times; they have not changed in any way from what they were doing before the war broke out. They have been following largely along the line laid down by their predecessors. It is true they have been giving encouragement to agriculture, but that is all. There has been no organization of labour, no special encouragement given to the farmer, nothing more done for the encouragement of agriculture than has been done in peace times, when there was not the same demand for food.

The minister asks: What can be done? The question is, what has this Government not done for the farmer? What they have not done would fill volumes, and what they have done would fill only a page or two. In the matter of fertilizers, other countries are giving great encouragement. We know what Germany and Australia have done. So far from doing anything to encourage farmers to get cheap fertilizers and abundance of them, this Government has actually imposed a tax upon fertilizer, taxing the most essential raw material of the farmer. Is that giving proper encouragement? Is that stimulating food production? Then any one who has given any attention to agriculture to-day knows there is nothing of greater importance, as far as food production is concerned, than the extensive use of tractors. I do not mean the large tractors used by wealthy people, but the smaller tractors which can be bought at a reasonable price, a price which the ordinary farmer will be able to pay. But when a farmer attempts to obtain one of these tractors, he finds he is met with a duty of from 25 to 30 per cent. I am within the knowledge—and I am sure within the judgment—of my hon. friends who come from the West when I say that a reasonable encouragement by taking the duty off these tractors would enormously stimulate the production of grain in our western country. The Government have not responded to the demand made by the farmers. Not long ago the hon. member from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) introduced a resolution in the House urging that the duty upon farm implements, including tractors, should be removed. That resolution met with a determined opposition from the Government and its followers, and it was voted down by the Government majority in this House. Is that the way to encourage the farmer? Yet that is what this Government has done. They have imposed this heavy burden for the protection of one or two large manufacturers who are making these large tractors in Canada, preventing the farmer from getting them in from the United States on the easiest terms possible. To-day we have in every province in Canada hundreds and thousands of men who are not familiar with horses, men living in the cities, towns and villages, who would be glad to get on the farms and be glad to operate these tractors, in order to do this essential work of farm production. Yet the Government give no encouragement whatever in this direction.

Then, with regard to the development of the West, if the Government, early in this war, had placed wheat and wheat products, and oats and cattle upon the free list—particularly wheat and wheat products, which would have ensured a free entry for those products into the markets of the United States—it would have had the effect of encouraging the farmers to engage more vigorously and enthusiastically in farming upon a larger scale, because they would have had assurance that, even if the English and Canadian markets were to fall off, there would still be a market in the United States, and when prices went down there would be a demand which would always ensure a fair return for their products. It would have had an enormous effect, and yet because these gentlemen are tied to the principle of a high protective tariff they refused, and have refused over and over again, the offers which have been made on behalf of the people of the West by members upon this side of the House, and they have voted down resolutions urging that encouragement in this direction should be given to agriculture.

With regard to men, what have they done? Have they endeavoured in any way to organize the man power of this country for the purpose of assisting in agriculture? Not at all. They make admirable speeches upon the subject; they make appeals to the farmers to produce all they can; but, so far as organization is concerned, they have utterly failed to do anything. How easy it would be to look over this country and find out where farm labour could be secured, and have that farm labour distributed where it is most needed. That is a way in which something might be done to organize the agricultural forces of the country. Only to-day I saw in the newspapers that the Prime Minister, having been waited upon by farmers from Ontario, made an appeal to the young men of the cities to go on to the farms and assist the farmers. But, so far as organization or effective work is concerned, the Government have failed to do anything.

Having made these remarks with regard to the amendment, which, as I have said, commends itself to me as one member of this House, and which I shall be glad to support, I should like to revert to the resolution itself. My right hon. friend has put forward, as a reason why we should extend the political lives of the members of this Parliament and the life of the Government, that an election at the present time would be very objectionable because it would distract the people's attention from work in connection with the war. If this Military Service Bill goes into effect, there will be no need of any voluntary effort on the part of the people. The mandate of the Government has gone forth virtually stopping voluntary enlistment in this country. Unfortunately they will not want the people at large to pay any special attention to voluntary enlistment, because the young men of the country, if this measure goes into effect, are to be compelled by force of law to enlist in the army. The services of the Government will not be required very much in connection with the working out of the Military Service Bill, because there are provided throughout the country tribunals which will determine questions of exemption. The Government have created a Hospitals Commission; they have created a Returned Soldiers' Commission; they have Sir George Perley as overseas Minister of Militia; they have commissions for everything which can be conceived of under the sun to attend to all matters to which a Government would ordinarily be supposed to attend. Therefore, I do not see any great reason why the services of some of the ministers at all events might not be given for the purpose of enlightening the people of the country in case a general election should come on.

A suggestion has been made that a general election will divide the people. Can the people be more divided than they have been by the compulsory measure which has been brought down in this Parliament by the Prime Minister? A general election, as compared with the enforcement of the Military Service Bill by a moribund Parliament with no mandate of the people—legislation which a large section of the population of this country believe this Parliament has no right to enact—would be, in comparison with the present condition, like a Sunday school picnic as compared with a circus. I do not fear any disastrous results from a general election. Why should there be? The people of this country know their rights; they know it is their right to go to the polls and deposit their ballots silently for the candidates of their choice.

They will, under ordinary circumstances, do that quietly as good citizens, and therefore I see no reason in the world to fear any great disturbance amongst the people in case of an appeal being made to them. A general election is the only safe course to pursue. A majority in this House, in the exercise of its judgment, has determined that the question of compulsory service shall not be left to the people to decide by means of a referendum. Some of us think a referendum would have been the better course to pursue, because, after all, if you want to have a peaceful, well-satisfied and contented people, you must let them realize that they are the rulers of the country, and that their voice is to prevail, Had this question been left to the people by means of a referendum, the most beneficial results would have been brought about; but as a large majority of this House has thought otherwise, the only solution of the important questions which have arisen is to submit those questions to the people at a general election.

The view that I am compelled to take is that this Government must in the national interest dissolve Parliament and go to the country. To take any other course would be disastrous to the future of Canada. I do not see why, when an election comes on, it should be necessary to incite the people to any action which might be regretted. I do not see why all the people should not go to the polls quietly and prayerfully, in view of the great crisis which confronts this country as a part of the Empire, and exercise their right with a just regard for the welfare of Canada. They have a great and solemn duty to perform, and I believe they will perform it prayerfully and in the best interest of Canada and of the Empire. I feel most sincerely and deeply that if this Government attempts to bring into force this compulsory measure, to which a vast section of our people is bitterly opposed, it will lead not merely to national trouble, but to national disaster. It is unfortunate that that should be the case; but it is the case; and are we, as members of this Parliament, who, although we are living beyond our term perhaps have the right to speak for the people, to leave it in the power of these gentlemen to plunge this country into that dreadful condition which for generations would be deplored? The only hope of the country is that these gentlemen shall face their master and ours; that they shall go before the people in order that the people may have an opportunity of saying who shall govern this country in the future. These gentlemen know that while they are temporarily in command of the ship of State, they are driving towards the breakers. They are like drunken sailors in charge of a ship who are wilfully running their ship on the wrong course and directing it towards the breakers. It is the right of the people—and I as one member of this House, purpose doing my part towards allowing the people to exercise their right—to remove these gentlemen from the ship and place in charge of it men in whom the people will have confidence.

[Mr. Pugsley.]

Mr. BURRELL: Might I be permitted to make a small correction of a remark made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster)?

Mr. GRAHAM: You are not going to try and correct all his mistakes, are you?

Mr. BURRELL: The Minister of Trade and Commerce was good enough to refer to my department in his remarks this afternoon, but unfortunately he gave me credit in regard to a certain feature where credit was not really due. It is true I was in the West at the time of the drought in 1914, and at the Prime Minister's request investigated conditions and discussed the situation with the provincial governments. I recommended a vigorous system of relief, and our officers ably assisted in the seed inspection, but it is to my hon. friend and colleague, the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Roche) and his department, that the credit for administering this relief work was due, which practically resulted in the economic salvation of the southwestern portion of the western provinces.

Mr. MURPHY: It was within the family anyway.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, there has been standing on the Order Paper since the 23rd of May the resolution which the right hon. leader of the Government moved this afternoon, after this long delay. For three years this country has been engaged in a great war and has called upon her citizens to contribute an enormous number of men to assist in the cause of the Allies. My hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) presents a resolution this afternoon urging that before the House proceeds to consider the terms of the resolution introduced by the Prime Minister, the interests of the country and our position with regard to the war demand that certain steps should be taken. To that the Minister of Trade and Commerce makes an answer in which he eulogizes the services that have been ren dered by our men at the front, and declares in the apt and eloquent language of which he is a master, that the necessity for putting into force the Military Service Act is very great indeed which was no answer at all to the argument made by my hon. friend from South Renfrew; in fact, it was entirely irrelevant, and particularly inapropos in view of the reasons advanced by the Premier as to the imperative necessity of passing the Military Service Bill. If that Bill is of such an imperative character why has it been laid aside since last Friday? Its third reading has been absolutely postponed and its passage through this House and Parliament delayed in order that my right hon. friend might move his resolution for the extension of the parliamentary term.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It was postponed at the request of the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), who said that he spoke on behalf of the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier).

Mr. OLIVER: May I mention for the information of the House that my request on behalf of the leader of the Opposition was that the Bill be left in committee until hon. members had a reprinted copy.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That is what I mean.

Mr. OLIVER: So there was no need for the Bill to stand beyond Friday.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD: It was well understood that the only reason for asking that the Bill remain in committee was that hon. members might have a reprinted copy showing what changes had been made. The Bill was printed and circulated among hon. members on Saturday, and my right hon. friend could have gone on with the Bill on that day, and it could have received its third reading; but he delayed the consideration of this imperative measure to submit this resolution which has been standing on the Order Paper since the 23rd of May. I am sure hon. gentlemen must be struck by the peculiar circumstances surrounding my right hon. friend's action. His suggestion that the delay is due to my hon. friend from Edmonton is one which will hardly be taken seriously by hon. gentlemen behind him. The House well knows that that was not the true reason why the third reading of the Military Service Bill was not proceeded with. I repeat, the Bill should have been disposed of before this resolution was introduced, and my right hon. friend should have stated to the House what legislation he proposes to introduce before prorogation. Surely this Parliament has a right to know what action is contemplated by the Government in regard to such important legislation as the railway situation—a situation which the Minister of Trade and Commerce had already told the House would be dealt with by a measure to be submitted to Parliament. The introduction of this particular resolution at this particular juncture, having regard to the Military Service Act, does not indicate that my right hon. friend has altogether forgotten the art of playing politics.

What have we done in the last three years? We have given liberally of our men. The call to service made throughout this land has been responded to in a magnificent manner, and when at the end of three years of war my hon. friend from South Renfrew asks Parliament to declare that certain things are essential and must be done, can any hon. gentleman complain that his resolution is unreasonable? In his resolution he asks that those best able to pay shall contribute their full share to the cost of the war. The Minister of Trade and Commerce argued eloquently that there should be no contribution from these gentlemen, and then wound up by anncuncing that the Government proposed to bring down an income tax. Now, if an income tax is a good thing today, if it is right that the wealth of the country should contribute towards the carrying on of the war, why is it that the Government have postponed dealing with this problem until they were compelled at the point of the pistol presented by the hon. member from South Renfrew? Three months ago hon. gentlemen on this side of the House urged the Minister of Finance to deal with this question of accumulated wealth. We urged that the men of wealth who had not contributed in man-power should be made to contribute of their wealth; in other words, as my hon. friend from South Renfrew proposes in his resolution, we urged that those best able to pay be made to contribute their full share to the cost of the war. And what did the Minister of Finance say? He said that some time, perhaps, in the future they might take up this question, but he was opposed to an income tax; it would cost too much to collect. Do you want me to tax a few wealthy men in this country, he asked, and he argued that the municipalities were already taxing the people, and this Government, therefore, should not tax them. We have been told frequently since the war began that everybody should carry on business as usual. We have heard hon. gentlemen opposite speaking in laudatory terms of the Minister of Finance, telling us that he had done wonderful things in connection with financing the war and that he was in fact a paragon of financial wisdom. In the face of such a record as that, in the face of his declaration repeated over and over again in this House that he was opposed to making those best able to pay contribute more than they were then doing, the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to-night that it was the Government's intention to introduce an income tax requires a little more explanation before hon. gentlemen in this House can accept it with any degree of certainty. If it is the Government's intention to introduce a measure of this kind, why does not my hon. friend tell us just what they propose to do?

If you follow what the Minister of Finance indicated he would do, you would have a measure so absolutely parsimonious and so absolutely incomplete that it would be a taxation measure in name only, because I assume the Minister of Finance talked by the book and laid down what he deemed to be his policy when he spoke here in May, and that we are not going to have another complete somersault upon this question and another taxation measure put in force entirely different from the one the Minister of Finance asserted never could be put on the statute. It seems to me that this proposition is one of such a serious character that before this House passes upon the matter as to whether extension should be given to this Government we should know whether or not that class of people are going to be compelled to do their share in the war, either under the Military Service Act or by the conscription of wealth. As to what will be done we have nothing to go upon but the record of the Government during the last three years, and the House and the people will not have to be told what that record means.

In regard to the question of organization referred to in the amendment, what has been the situation for three years? Absolute and complete disorganization in every matter that relates to national welfare and national interest. When the United States entered the war, there came across the ocean experts from each of the Allied countries, who consulted with the United States experts representing the Government. They laid down a programme in regard to agriculture, industry, transportation, and natural resources, which includes minerals. The United States, in conference with all these gentlemen representing the Allied countries, proceeded to organize the country to render the fullest service in every one of these matters. Up to date that has not been done in Canada. My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce told us what the Government had done in regard to the farms. Does any one seriously suggest there has been any organization, either in regard to agriculture or in regard to anything else, whereby we should render the best possible aid to the Allies? My hon. friend cannot be serious in that suggestion. Why have we not done in Canada what was done in the United States? Why did not those delegations which came across from the Allied nations visit Canada? Why was not a conference held, not merely with one gentleman down in Washington, but with all the representatives of the varied interests in Canada, so that we might be able to organize to send food and minerals to Great Britain and the Allies? But the Government stands before the country with reference to every one of those propositions absolutely without any organization, absolutely without any combination by which the full services of Canada might be rendered to the Allies.

So in regard to the question of the cost of living. The Minister of Trade and Commerce argued that you could not deal with the problem of the cost of living during the war, and with that amplitude of language which is at his command at all times, proceeded to declare the task was an impossible one. Yet there has been laid upon the table of this House and placed in the hands of the hon. members a document prepared by this Government's own officials declaring that in regard to the production of bacon and ham one concern alone has been permitted to make over three million dollars of profits which they should not have been permitted to make. Still this Government sits supinely, and has sat since that report was brought down.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Does my hon. friend hold by that word "profit" or does he wish to revise it?

Mr. MACDONALD: I hold by the word; as far as I can gather from the documents I perused, and from other information I have obtained, which indicates to my mind that there was a profit of two and a half cents per pound over and above the cost of production, cost of storage, and cost of handling, upon 95,000,000 pounds of bacon sold by that concern. That is the meaning of this report, if it means anything.

Mr. GLASS: I noticed in the paper a statement from this concern, saying their profits were less than one cent—.95 of a cent.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend has only made a suggestion which indicates the necessity of having this matter cleared up. The statement I speak of was not made by an opponent of this Government, but by an official of the Department of Labour who was appointed for the specific purpose of making an investigation into the whole problem of the cost of living. If there are any errors in the statement, why did the Government give this document to the House and to the country and stand behind it? After finding the conditions as disclosed in this report the Government did nothing for a week—did not even verify the facts. They should have acted upon the report of their official at once, if they had confidence in him, and should have dealt with this subject in such a way that the poor man would know that profiteering was not to be mixed with patriotism in war time. Go to the figures given by the Department of Labour, go into the homes of the people, and you will find second only to the question of the war as a problem of pressing practical importance is the problem of the cost of living. Yet this Government says through the Minister of Trade and Commerce: We passed an Order in Council some time ago. He said nothing whatever about Mr. O'Connor's report, but practically concluded by saying: We can do nothing. My hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) in the light of these facts, asks this House to declare that legislation for the purpose of providing against these conditions and for remedying these abuses should be placed upon the statute-books of this country before this Government asks for an extension of term. I say the proposition is one which is so reasonable that this House should be bound to agree with it, and if the House does not agree with it, I think the country will.

Mr. F. F. PARDEE (West Lambton): I wish to occupy the attention of the House for a very few minutes only. In the first place, to my mind the resolution which was introduced by the Prime Minister to-day should not have been introduced. These are times when, as we all know, there is much unrest politically, socially and otherwise, and it does appear to me that in view of the grave question which has been before the House for some considerable time, and upon which the minds of all have been focussed, it would have been only right and proper and in the national interest that a motion for the extension of the life of this Parliament should have been postponed until the Bill had passed its third reading and become law of the land.

Had the motion of my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) declaring that the consideration of the extension of the term of Parliament is inopportune at this time, been brought in on the third reading of this Bill, it would have been considered by the Government, and rightly so, a want of confidence motion, and it would therefore have been voted down. But let me read this amendment as it stands:

> That in the opinion of this House the consideration of the terms of said resolution should be deferred.

That is all the motion asks and that is all my hon. friend asks—that it should be deferred. I claim the right to say what I propose saying in the light of my remarks upon the second reading of this Bill. May I as one who voted for conscription, for which I make no apology, say that this House and this Government should not, when declaring that they should spill the blood of men, be afraid to spill the rich man's money. That position I take to-night just as absolutely, as consistently, and as sincerely as I did on the occasion to which I have referred.

I listened to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) this afternoon. I always listen to him with interest. But, during his speech to-day, it did appear to me that he put up straw men simply to knock them down. He accused my hon. friend from South Renfrew of saying that there should be taxation of accumulated wealth and then he asked: "Would you take the mines, the minerals, the timber, the capital and all those various other things, how could you tax accumulated wealth as far as they are concerned?" In that I wholly agree with him but within the four corners of this amendment there is not one word or sentence about the taxation of accumulated wealth. The only thing that the resolution does say, and properly say, is that those who can pay shall pay. The Minister of Trade and Commerce says: "I admit the sentiments are good but they are entirely irrelevant to this motion; in my humble opinion what we need is men and more men and the men must go." Now, I absolutely and entirely agree with him but I want to ask him in all seriousness if men and more men are to go, if men are to be drilled, equipped and sent overseas for the defence of this Empire, as they ought to be, where is the money coming from to do these necessary things? The minister says: "You will see that we have in reality conscripted wealth; look what we have done by our business tax—in 1915-16, $20,000,000 and in 1916-17 another $20,000,000!" I want to ask any hon. member within sound of my voice if he thinks that throughout the great and broad Dominion of Canada $20,000,000 a year is the sum and substance of what the rich men ought to give by way of a tax for the purpose of carrying on this war. Where is Canada and where is her wealth?

In so far as the Minister of Trade and Commerce has to-day declared on behalf of the Government that an income tax will be instituted in this country and will be brought before this House, and in view of the further fact that a food controller has been appointed by this Government, a man of ability who ought to do well, I am quite free to admit that the Government have gone some considerable way down the road towards the amelioration of conditions and the shaping of affairs as they ought to be. Provided that income tax is fair and equitable, I shall have no hesitation in supporting that particular measure.

Speaking for myself personally, as the only one for whom I can speak, I have been for a long time, and am to-day, in accord with the idea that union, or national government should have been instituted in this country. I do not believe that with the great problems that have confronted us since the war broke out, and that are facing us to-day, Canada has any right to be governed by a partisan, or party, government. The issues are large, the issues will be larger, and had it been possible, I believe we should have had, call it a union, national, or other kind, of a government, in which the very best brains of the Dominion should be united for the purpose of taking care of the affairs of this country, neither for one part nor the other, but purely in the interest of Canada and the Empire. Although I have been strongly in favour, and perhaps an advocate, of that system of government, I believe honestly and sincerely that with the different elements on both sides of the House of Commons to-day, a national, or union government is not possible.

One reason, and not the only reason, why it is not possible is that this Parliament has now continued for six years; it has outlasted its time longer than any other Parliament in the history of Canada. Many great questions have come up for consideration, and the mandate with which we were sent here in 1911 has expired. The Government have been in power for the same length of time, and their actions have not been submitted to the people for approval nor has their mandate been renewed. This Government has been in power for that length of time and has endured such a stress and strain as no other Government has endured. It has had to deal with new questions, great questions, greater than have come before any other Government in Canada. I say that the people of this country are of the opinion, whether rightly or wrongly, that there are many questions upon which they desire to pronounce. They say that, in so far as this House is concerned, in view of the recent redistribution of seats, there are forty-three seats vacant in this House to-day; in other words one-fifth of the great Dominion of Canada is unrepresented. Taking all those things into consideration, the firm and well considered judgment of the people of Canada is, that, whether we have national or party Government, the will of the people should be asked and the will of the people should be obeyed, whatever it may be. I utter those sentiments and those opinions in absolutely no party spirit whatever.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. PARDEE: My hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. W. H. Bennett) could not understand that line of talk; his mind is too narrow.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, just by way of personal explanation, I did not laugh at the hon. gentleman, although I will confess that it is the first time I have not laughed at him whenever he has addressed the House.

9 p.m.

Mr. PARDEE: I would expect absolutely nothing better from the hon. member from Simcoe. His thoughts and his ideas are so built that he cannot change them. Let me say that I offer those observations in absolutely no party spirit. I have endeavoured, as a member of this House, upon whom some responsibility rests, to feel the opinion of this country as well as I might, and more especially to feel the opinion of the province of Ontario, a portion of which I represent. and I may say to you that I am firmly convinced that the great heart and will of the people of the province of Ontario is for the war and in favour of doing whatever may be done, in men or money, to win the war. I believe that they desire to give their verdict at the polls and to say—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. PARDEE: The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) this afternoon referred to the declaration of some Liberals, who had met. He said that we had said to fill the gaps. Let me say to him now, Sir, that no man stands more ready, irrespective of political life, to fill the gaps than I do, but that I do believe sincerely that to put upon one portion of our people the sacrifice of life and blood and to leave to the rich man who is enjoying his riches by reason of the fact that those men are bleeding to death to protect those riches, is not what a House of Commons, or a Government should do.

For those reasons, Sir, I believe that the amendment moved by the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) is in the right interest, that it is in an interest that helps the boys at the front and their mothers and daughters and wives. We and they should at least know that, if the sacrifice of life is asked of them, we in this House of Commons are men enough to ask, to demand, and to insist upon the sacrifice of the rich men's money.

Mr. RICHARD BLAIN (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I do not rise for the purpose of making a speech, but simply to make a statement in respect to the issue now before the House. I listened to the remarks of the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) this afternoon as he presented a request to the Parliament of Canada that the term of this Parliament should be extended for twelve months. I shall read the main part of the resolution:—

1.Notwithstanding anything in the British North America Act, 1867, or in any Act amending the same, or in any Order in Council, or terms or conditions of Union, made or approved under the said Act, or under any Act of the Canadian Parliament, the term of the Twelfth Parliament of Canada is hereby extended until the seventh day of October, 1918.

I regard that as the only question before the House this evening, and no matter what hon. gentlemen opposite may say, no matter what efforts are made to becloud the issue, this House and the people of Canada understand that this is the issue before them now for consideration and settlement. I differ with my hon. friend, and I say that the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) does not speak for the people of the province of Ontario when he says that the people of Ontario are in favour of a general election in war time.

Mr. PARDEE: I did not say that.

Mr. BLAIN: I say that, in so far as I can gather the expression of opinion from the people of Ontario on both sides of politics, and I have given it consideration for some months, there is an overwhelming opinion in Ontario that no election should be held while the war is on.

I say also that the people of Ontario, on both sides of politics are in favour of the motion before the House moved by the Prime Minister of this country. Speaking for the county of Peel—and I know I speak for those who differ from me politically—I say the people are in favour of a resolution such as the Prime Minister has submitted that the life of Parliament shall be extended for twelve months, and it is their desire that we shall make every possible effort, both in and out of Parliament to win the war, and that the election shall be postponed until after the close of the war.

The House divided on the amendment.

The amendment moved by Mr. Graham was declared lost on the following division:

[Mr. Blain.]

Mr. SPEAKER: The question is now on the main motion.

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister this afternoon, in introducing this resolution to extend the life of this Parliament for another year, made a strong appeal to me; in fact, he virtually laid upon my shoulders the responsibility for the resolution, as he hinted that if it were not to carry by a unanimous or practically unanimous vote, he would not feel warranted in giving it effect. My right hon. friend referred to the attitude which I took last year on a similar motion, and he recalled my words on that occasion when I stated—and in this he is quite agreed with me—that in the position which I occupy on the floor of this House, my responsibility before the people is almost equal, if not equal, to that of a Cabinet minister. I can say truly that upon this occasion I feel as strongly as I did then the responsibility that is upon me. I can assure my right hon. friend that I have no intention at all of shirking that responsibility; indeed, I am prepared to accept the responsibility to the full. I can say truly that since the war began, never did I rise with a firmer determination to be guided in the attitude which I am going to take by any other consideration than that of the welfare of the country and the supreme issue of doing our full share in this war.

The problem before us, which is involved in this resolution, is whether the call of the country will be better served and the cause of the war will be better promoted by agreeing to this resolution and extending the life of this Parliament for another year, or whether the call of the country will be better served and the cause of the war better promoted by forcing on an election which, by the letter of the constitution, must come off within a few months.

The situation to-day is not the same as it was last year. Since a similar motion was passed last year, many things have happened and many circumstances have arisen which had not arisen then, and those circumstances make it incumbent upon me to take a different attitude from the attitude I took then, having regard to the interest of the country and the prosecution of the war which we all have at heart. The question has long been debated in the press of the country—not of late, because the press has recently been devoting its attention to the question of conscription which is before the House—whether or not we should have an election during the war, and the ministerial press has taken the ground that an election during war time would be practically, if not absolutely, a national crime. Such a proposition, of course, is altogether too strong; it cannot be justified because, if accepted, it would mean that if the war were to last two, three or five years, the people would be powerless to pass judgment upon their own affairs. On the other hand, in another school of thought, many have been of the opinion that not to have an election at the proper time appointed by the Constitution would also be a national crime. The test, and the only test, to apply to a question of this kind is the old Roman maxim, Salus populi suprema lex—the welfare of the people and the good of the country alone is the supreme law. The cause which we all have at heart should be the only thought inspiring us in approaching this question.

The problem before us is not confined to the Dominion of Canada. It has presented itself in nearly all the dominions of the British Empire. It has presented itself in Great Britain, in Canada, in Australia, and in New Zealand, and in no two countries has the solution been exactly alike. In Canada we have had one year of extension, but we have had no by-elections for two years except such as were made necessary by a member of this House accepting a position of emolument under the Crown. There are to-day more than twenty vacancies in this House. On the other hand, in England, the Prime Minister has observed that there have been three extensions, all, by the way, for short periods, and all granted by Parliament with more or less misgiving. But in England there have been by-elections whenever a vacancy occurred; no seat was allowed to stand vacant without an appeal to the people.

The last of these appeals was held under very peculiar circumstances. It was held in the county of Clare to fill the vacancy caused by the death of William Redmond, who fell gloriously on the field of battle. William Redmond had been for 20 years, if not more, a member of the British Parliament and a strong advocate of Home Rule. When the war broke out he gave up his parliamentary duties and donned the King's uniform, and no soldier rendered better service. He never appeared in Parliament since, so far as my knowledge goes, except on one occasion recently when the question of Home Rule was before the British Parliament. Then he came back from the front and took his seat in the House to urge with all his might the cause of unity in Ireland. Having discharged his duty he went back to the front, and only a few weeks afterwards was fatally wounded in battle. It so happened that he was found lying on the battlefield by men of the Ulster division, and he died in their arms as they carried him off the ground. Sir, if I recall this, may I be permitted to express my own wish that this incident between this ardent Home Ruler and the Unionist boys from Ulster may be an inspiration to that Convention which is to sit in a few days in Ireland. May it help to bring together Home Ruler and Unionist, Catholic and Protestant, for the good of England and the good of Ireland. May it serve as an example to all parts of the British Empire.

In New Zealand there was an election in the fall of 1914 in the first year of the war That election came naturally by the efflux of time, according to the letter of the constitution. It was fought upon party lines, but after the election was over a reconciliation took place between the two parties and a coalition Government was formed. In Australia, everybody remembers that an election took place only a few weeks ago, and that it took place in consequence of the Government's attempt to force conscription upon the people of that country. The conscription issue was defeated, but the country is going on with participation in the war.

What lessons are we to draw from these different examples? The lesson we are to draw is that in any country the question whether the term of Parliament should be extended or whether the constitution should be allowed to take its course should be decided by the circumstances of the day and the best interests of the country. At the same time I am free to admit—everybody knows it—that in all the belligerent countries, not only in the British Empire, but in Italy and the other countries of the Allies, there has been a strong conviction that no election should be held unless conditions were such as to make it absolutely imperative in the interests of the country. That has been the rule everywhere except in Canada, in the minds of the gentlemen who occupy the treasury benches. It is well known, it cannot be gainsaid, that on three different occasions—in the fall of 1914, in the spring of 1915, and in the fall of 1915— the Government did everything they could to bring on an election, and an election on party lines for party advantage. We have not definite proof of the Government's intentions with regard to an election in the fall of 1914, but we have proof of their intentions in the spring of 1915.

In the spring of 1915 the Government brought in a Bill to give the soldiers the right to vote during the war. The title of the Bill was: "An Act to Enable Canadians on Active Military Service During the Present War to Exercise Their Electoral Franchise." Section 12 of this Bill says:

> This Act shall remain in force during the present war.

What did this mean, if it did not mean that the Government was at that time determined to have an election? And what was the purport and the object of this election? I assert now the design was to have an immediate election, and if I wanted any proof of that it would be sufficient for me to recall the famous words of the Minister of Public Works, when he stated on the floor of this House on the last day of the session of 1915 that the people of this country demanded an election in tones louder than thunder, in order to protect their liberties which were in danger. In danger of what? In danger because the other branch of the legislature had ventured to amend a Bill presented and passed by this House. That was the reason for which we were to have an election. As soon as Parliament had been prorogued they set to work to prepare for the election. The special ballots which had been authorized by the Bill were printed, and were sent with the boxes to England, and a gentleman appointed by the Government followed them. This gentleman was Mr. Daly, of Winnipeg, a disciple of the Minister of Public Works, and like the Minister of Public Works well versed in the art of winning elections.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I know my right hon. friend does not wish to do any injustice to the young gentleman. He came from Vancouver.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My hon. friend is wrong in his facts. The gentleman may have come from Vancouver at the time, but he had been brought up under the aegis of the Minister of Public Works, and from him he learned the lesson in the art of winning elections. There is an art of winning elections. We do not know what it is. Men of the age of my hon. friend and myself—if I may put him in the class in which I am—were taught in our day that elections meant simply the expression of the voice of the people, and nothing else. But the art of winning an election is to have not the voice of the people but the voice of the manipulator of the election.

Sir SAM HUGHES: If the leader of the Opposition will permit me, he is using language, quite unwittingly, which I am surprised to hear him use. I am very much surprised to hear him talk so of Major Daly, who is as straight and as honourable a young gentleman as is to be found in the Dominion of Canada.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: If I have offended the feelings of my hon. friend, it was unintentional. I can assure him I would not offend him or any one else under any circumstances. However, that is neither here nor there. I was saying that in 1915 the Government intended having an election, but the voice of the people spoke, and spoke in another way, and the expression of their feeling was so loud and unmistakable that the elections had to be put off.

Then there was a complete somersault, and the gentlemen who had been asking for an election came back to this Parliament with a request for the extension of the life of Parliament. I had to pronounce upon it, and I pronounced myself in favour of the extension. The same request comes to us to-day, and again I have to pronounce myself upon it. I have already stated that the conditions are not such as they were last year. My right hon. friend to-day made a special appeal to me, and stated his ultimate object would have been to have, if possible, a coalition government and an extension of the term of Parliament. As far as a coalition government is concerned, if my right hon. friend wanted to have it, I can only repeat what I told him on a previous occasion, that I regretted he did not speak to me sooner than he did. My right hon. friend will permit me to tell him that the way he should have proceeded if he wanted to have a coalition government was not to frame a policy by a party government first and then present it to me to accept it. That was what was done. My right hon. friend announced on the floor of the House that it was his intention to introduce a measure of conscription, and when he had committed himself he called upon me to assist him in carrying it out. I do not want to take any party political advantage out of this, but I may say to my right hon. friend in all sincerity, if his intention had been to have a coalition government, and if he had asked me before he had committed himself to the policy of conscription, I would have told him with all the energy I possessed to abstain from conscription and to try and find some other basis upon which a coalition could take place. I would have told him it was possible—and I still believe it would have been possible—to get by voluntary enlistment all the assistance we could have wanted in order to carry on our share of the war. I say to my right hon. friend that when he introduced the policy of conscription, in my humble judgment—and time will tell whether I am right or wrong—instead of helping the cause he did it the greatest possible injury he could. There is something more important even than the object which he has sought, that is to maintain the unity of the nation, and the unity of the nation is seriously compromised to-day. At this very moment my right hon. friend asks me to give my support to the resolution he introduced extending the life of the Government. My right hon. friend knows full well it is impossible for me to give my consent to such a proposal.

I told my right hon. friend, and I repeated it on the floor of this House, that it was an injury to the country to have this Conscription Bill passed by this moribund Parliament. I told him this moribund Parliament had the power to pass the Bill, but it had not the right. So long as a Parliament exists, so long as it is not exhausted either by efflux of time or the will of the Governor General, it has the right to pass all the measures it can pass for the compulsion of the country or for any other nefarious design, but it has not the authority. Having taken that position I would be recreant to my own convictions if I were to consent to the extension of the life of a Parliament which has so abused its authority and its power.

But, there is much more than this. The condition to-day is not the same as it was last year, because last year there were many things which were suspected, but of which we did not have the proof. To-day we have the proof in the dismissal of the ex-Minister of Militia. The correspondence between the ex-Minister of Militia and my right hon. friend the Prime Minister has opened the gates, and a flood of light has shown us that the administration of the Government is responsible for the enormous losses in blood and in treasure which would have been avoided by proper administration. Is the indictment too strong? Is it not justified by the language which was used by my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Militia on the floor of this House within the hearing of every one now listening to me, and by the letters he addressed to the Prime Minister? Did not the ex-Minister of Militia say, within the hearing of every member now within the sound of my voice, that from the time war was declared until the time he left office he had been interfered with by his colleagues; that his recommendation to Council as to contracts had been held up in Council in order to get increased prices? That all the purchases of equipment which he made, and all the equipment he sent over to England had been rejected and scrapped, although it was not only serviceable but better than the material by which it was replaced? Did he not state moreover that the financial loss caused to the country amounted to millions of dollars? Did not everybody hear this? Those things have been said. Some of them have not been denied, some have been denied mildly. They have not been probed, and I say until those matters are probed we should not grant the motion which is now before us for an extension of the life of this Parliament.

All these are things which we have to take into consideration when we are asked to vote upon the resolution now before us. But, there is still far worse than that. We would count our losses small if they were only losses in money, but there have been losses in blood for which this Government cannot escape responsibility—losses in blood which should not have taken place, and for which I charge the Government of the day, and I think I shall prove my statement by what has occurred, and what is on the table of the House already. When our troops crossed over they were equipped with the Ross rifle. Everybody knows that from the time the Ross rifle was first manufactured it was subject to very serious attacks. It was a matter for experts. Some experts condemned the rifle, others approved highly of it. Amongst those who approved of it highly was the hon. member for Victoria and Haliburton (Sir Sam Hughes) who was afterwards chosen to be Minister of Militia in the Government by my right hon. friend. To his credit it must be said he was always loyal, and spoke with a seriousness which characterized him. He defended his opinion, and stated over and over again that the rifle was serviceable, and one of the best weapons and perhaps the best weapon of the kind. He was a member of the Militia Council which helped it from Mark I to Mark II and from Mark II to Mark III. When war was declared, our soldiers went to the front equipped with the Ross rifle.

It must be said, and everybody knows it, unfortunately, that in most of the engagements in 1915 the Ross rifle did not give satisfaction, and that it jammed in the hands of those who held it. The truth was known to the Government; in fact, reports were made by experts and others, who said that, at the most critical time of the battle of St. Julien, when the Germans were coming and when they had to be repelled, the rifle jammed and our soldiers were unable to use it. They could not advance because their weapons were useless; they would not retire, but with tears of rage and grief in their eyes they threw down their rifles in the mud and took the Lee-Enfields that their comrades could dispose of.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Where did that occur?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I was told that it was at St. Julien.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Not a word of truth in it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: If it was not at St. Julien, then it was at some other battle.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is the right hon. gentleman not aware that it is known beyond peradventure that the ammunition was at fault and that the English rifle jammed worse than the Ross rifle?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I will come to that. Of course, my information is not official; it is such information as I can collect and such as comes to me through correspondence and otherwise. If I am wrong as to the battle, if it was not St. Julien, it was some other battle in which the soldiers in tears and rage threw down the Ross rifle and took up the Lee-Enfield. To quote from the poet, Walter Scott:—

> But woe awaits a country, when
> She sees the tears of bearded men.

The Government saw the tears of these bearded men, but they did nothing to correct the condition of things that existed. The commander in chief, Sir John French, had to take notice of the situation. He did not wait to report to the War Office, but he instituted an inquiry, and on the 19th June, 1915, he made his report. After having stated that rumours with regard to the Ross rifle had come to him, and that he had appointed a committee to investigate, he proceeded:—

(1) To the unanimous opinion of my committee that the Ross rifle could not be relied upon to work smoothly and efficiently in rapid fire with any ammunition other than that of Canadian manufacture;

(2) to the fact that no ammunition of this nature was available in this country, and that sufficient supplies could not be obtained from England, and,

(3) to the want of confidence in the rifle which a large number of the infantry evidently felt, as evidenced by the fact that over 3,000 had, without authority, exchanged their rifles for those used by their British comrades, and taken from casualties on the battlefield.

I did not feel justified in sending this Division into battle with the Ross rifle, and ordered the re-arming of the infantry of the Division with the Lee-Enfield rifle, which was carried out before they went into action on the 15th instant.

Sir John French said that he armed one division with the Lee-Enfield rifle. Now, I come to the interruption made by my hon. friend from Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes). Sir John French goes on to say:—

6. I would, therefore, suggest that the Army Council should send to this country one or more of the most highly qualified experts obtainable to make the necessary tests under service conditions and report whether ammunition of British manufacture is or is not suitable for use with the Ross rifle. For this purpose a supply of ammunition of Canadian manufacture should be brought out for comparison.

I have expressed and acted on my opinion, that, so far as I can judge, the ammunition of British manufacture is not suitable for use with Ross rifles, and that there is a large and growing feeling of want of confidence in their rifle on the part of the men in the Canadian Division, which is amply justified by the report of the committee.

My hon. friend (Sir Sam Hughes) was right. It was not the rifle which was condemned, but the dissatisfaction arose from the fact that it was not supplied with the proper ammunition. The fact is that the Ross rifle jammed, and the men were left without any weapons to defend themselves. That is the charge I make against the Government. The General Commanding wanted a test made, and a commission was appointed to make that test, but to this day, in so far as my knowledge goes, and in so far as the information brought before the House shows, there never was a test made of the Ross rifle with proper ammunition.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is my right hon. friend not aware that there were three brands of British ammunition that failed when used with the Lee-Enfield rifle, and that not one division but fifty divisions of British troops were shot to pieces by the failure of the Lee-Enfield when using these three brands of British ammunition? These same brands were supplied for use in the Canadian rifle.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is not an answer to the charge I make. The charge

I make is that the Ross rifle did not give satisfaction, and there never was any ammunition sent over to make a proper investigation. Upon this point I should quote the testimony of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) himself. During the present session, in the month of January last, my right hon. friend, speaking upon this question, said:

> The situation which confronted the Government in the summer of 1915 was this: We knew that Sir John French had concluded that the First Canadian Division ought to be re-armed with the Lee-Enfield rifle. He based that conclusion very largely upon the consideration that the men of the First Division, or a considerable number of them, had lost confidence in the Ross rifle. He took the view, in which I am sure we all concur, that no rifle, however effective, would be useful to the men if they had lost confidence in it. He said, in that same report, that he did not condemn the Ross rifle—that he had no data upon which he could condemn it; and he said further that the difficulty had arisen by reason of the fact that the ammunition supplied in this country, which might have made the rifle useful, could not be supplied in sufficient quantities.

What a statement to make! In the first place, I must say that Sir John French had not condemned the ammunition made in this country. Quite the reverse. He asked that the rifle should be tested with ammunition made in this country, but my right hon. friend stated that ammunition could not be supplied in this country. So that there may be no ambiguity, let me repeat his words:

> He said, in that same report, that he did not condemn the Ross rifle—that he had no data upon which he could condemn it; and he said further that the difficulty had arisen by reason of the fact that the ammunition supplied in this country, which might have made the rifle useful, could not be supplied in sufficient quantities.

What a statement to make, Sir, that we could not supply cartridges in this country! We have established no less than two hundred plants for the manufacture of shells. Is it more difficult to manufacture cartridges than shells? If we can manufacture shells, why not cartridges also? We have a cartridge factory in Quebec; it has been there for years, and yet we are told that ammunition could not be supplied for use with the Ross rifle. No test was made of the Ross rifle.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is that General French's statement?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is General French's statement commented upon by Sir Robert Borden.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: What page of Hansard is that?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Page 148. This matter went on during the whole campaign of 1915. The report of Sir John French was not acted upon. Instead of having the Ross rifle tested with the proper ammunition, there was an order made to have the rifle fitted with new chambers.

10 p.m.

The attempt was made; new chambers were manufactured and the Ross rifle was tried again with the new chamber. The consequence was that, instead of being useless, it became dangerous, and some of the rifles exploded. That is my information. At all events, nothing was done during the campaign of 1915; and the Canadian troops, except one division, in the campaign of 1916 again took the field armed with the Ross rifle. On the 28th of May Sir Douglas Haig sent the following letter to the War Office:

> Sir,—I have the honour to inform you that I have satisfied myself, after extensive inquiries carried out throughout the Canadian Corps, that, as a service rifle, the Ross is less trustworthy than the Lee-Enfield, and that the majority of the men armed with the Ross rifle have not confidence in it that it is so essential that they should possess. The inquiry on which these conclusions are based, was the outcome of an urgent application from a battalion of the 3rd Canadian Division for rearmament with the short Lee-Enfield rifle, in consequence of a high percentge of jams experienced with their Ross rifles during a hostile attack on May 1, 1916.

This report was such that it should have moved the Government to take some action; yet nothing was done, so that on the 28th of June Sir Douglas Haig again wrote as follows:

> I have the honour to inform you that the efficiency of the Ross rifle has been thoroughly tested by actual fighting in the field, and the application conveyed in my O.B./174 of May 28, 1916, was made after very careful consideration of all the evidences available.
> 2. I have again consulted the General Officer Commanding Second Army in case any fresh points have come to light during the recent heavy fighting by the Canadians near Ypres. He tells me that his experience of the working of the Ross rifle during the last fight has only confirmed him in his opinion that the Canadians, in the 3rd Division at all events, have lost confidence in their rifle and he recommends that the rifles in this division be exchanged.

This was on the 21st of June, 1916. That should have moved the Government to take some action, but again nothing was done. On the 24th of June the following telegram was sent by Sir Robert Borden to Sir George Perley:

> Most confidential, secret.

Mark the gradation—confidential, most confidential, secret. You can imagine that there was something very important when so much discretion was required—confidential, most confidential, secret. Well, it was perhaps not so much the importance of the despatch as the novelty of it which suggested this secrecy. Sir Robert Borden telegraphed to Sir George Perley:

We have had under consideration since January last an order for one hundred thousand additional Ross rifles, none of which can be delivered before April, 1917. If we decide to order the additional one hundred thousand company requires nearly a year's notice before commencement of delivery in order to secure necessary material of various kinds for which there is great demand at present. Several months ago the Master General of Ordnance strongly recommended immediate action, but we have delayed by reason of doubts raised as to efficiency of rifle. Time has now arrived when immediate decision should be made.

"Time has now arrived when an immediate decision should be made." On the 24th of June, 1916, nearly two years after the war broke out, the time has arrived for a decision as to whether the Ross rifle should be continued or some other substituted! The time has arrived for some action, and apparently some action was being considered, but there was immediate repentance, because the despatch continues:

To this end it is important that we should have a definite, reliable and thorough report upon the merits of the rifle.

Here we had the communications of the two commanders in chief, General French and General Haig, asking that some action be taken. No action had been taken, and after two years the Government ask for another report. Sir Robert Borden goes on:

If it is so defective as to forbid its use at the front, or if confidence in its efficiency has been undermined in our troops, it would be a waste of public money to give further orders. Please consult Aitken, with whom I have had much correspondence on this subject and advise me whether any such report as above mentioned exists. If not, it should be made immediately for our guidance.

That was on the 24th of June, 1916—a request for further reports. The answer came from Sir George Perley that all hesitation was at an end and that the change must be made:

Sir Douglas Haig remarks that although reports from Second Division not to same effect he is of opinion Lee-Enfield rifle should be issued to all three Divisions Canadian corps. Army Council agree with this opinion and have his proposal to exchange rifles Second and Third Divisions for Lee-Enfield pattern and steps will be taken forthwith effect exchange.

[Sir Wilfrid Laurier.]

So at last, after two years vacillation and hesitation, and nothing done, the exchange was made of the Ross for the Lee-Enfield. We may be thankful that at last a decision was reached, but I am far from sure it was a wise ending. The ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) stated over and over again, stated in this House not long ago, that the Ross rifle was the best rifle in existence and should have been kept. I charge against the Government this, that the experiment which was asked by Sir John French never was made, so far as this correspondence shows, and I charge therefore that no justice was done to—

Sir SAM HUGHES: May I say a word?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SPEAKER: Except with the consent of the right hon. gentlemen—

Sir SAM HUGHES: I asked his permission. If he does not choose to give it I will be silent, but if I have his permission I wish to speak.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, you can speak to-morrow.

Mr. SPEAKER: The right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has given permission.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The right hon. gentleman will remember that a report was presented to this House of the official tests in England, rifle for rifle, in the hands of experts for both rifles, in the hands of possible point, accuracy, rapidity of fire, freedom from jamming and everything else, the Ross rifle, out-distanced the Lee-Enfield three to one.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I said I believed the hon. gentleman was right. I believe the Rosss rifle was the better of the two, but I have to say to my hon. friend that for some reason or other they came to a different conclusion; and I have to say further—and in this he will agree—that the test which was asked of the rifle with proper ammunition never was made, and therefore it is no wonder the rifle was condemned. But this is only reinforcing the point I make against the Government, that they did not discharge the duties they should have discharged. They should have ordered that test and applied it to the rifle and then we should have known which was the best weapon. There was no Canadian ammunition available and so the decision had to come that the rifle of the troops should be a Lee-Enfield. Be this as it may, this in no way discharges the responsibility of the Government, and I say to them that they are responsible for the blood which was lost on the battlefield when the troops were either not supplied with proper rifles or not supplied with proper munition. Is it conceivable that these troops were sent to the battlefield, that they were sent to meet the Germans, not properly equipped and not properly armed? They should have had not only the rifles but the ammunition as well. They had the one but not the other. And what was the consequence?

The Government, in the face of these things, come and ask for an extension of time. Have they any right to it? Can they say: We have done our duty to the country. Do they come to Parliament with clear consciences that they have done everything they could? The record is against them, and, Sir, against that record no defence has been made which can relieve them from the strong condemnation which they receive at the hands of the Canadian people. Sir, there are many other things which I might urge against the Government, but I do not wish to press them.

Charges of graft have been made, but I do not intend to deal with them, and I will simply pass them over. I shall deal with the main point that I placed before the House, and that is that the Government cannot escape the responsibility for blood lost on the battlefield, which might have been spared, nor for the suffering of brave men who went to the battlefield, and gave up their lives and who were not properly supported by the Government that sent them.

But there is another matter, to which my hon. friend referred to-day in his speech. He made a statement in which I agree with him: that the country is in a dangerous position. In consequence of what? In consequence of the policy which has produced to-day this conscription measure. There is division among the people, and an election may create a further division. I say to my hon. friend that, for my part, I believe all these evils can be remedied by an appeal to the people. I agree with my hon. friend that there is to-day a cleavage among the people in the country. The fact is there, and we cannot ignore it. It is too late to lament, and we must face it as resolute men. In a free country the only way to decide a question, and to cure all the evils that arise, is in an appeal to the people. I know that if we are to have an election, it will be one based largely upon appeals to passions and prejudices. This is not the first time that such a thing has happened. It has happened in every election since I have been in public life, in my province and other provinces. We have been accused in one end of the country and in the other, but notwithstanding all this, it does not shake my faith in popular institutions, and I maintain that the only thing to do is to appeal to the people and ask them to pass judgment. We pretend to fight for democracy, and indeed we are fighting for democracy. The issue of the conflict which is now going on in Europe is democracy, and it is the voice of democracy which has inspired my attitude towards the Government on this question. My heart was very deep in this question, and when war broke out I stated, without hesitation, that Canada was in the war to the end, and I repeat, after almost three years of war, that Canada is in the war to the end. But when I stated that I did not believe in compulsion—nor do I yet—it was not under compulsion that we went into this war. We went into it from higher and nobler motives, to take our share of the sacrifice to promote a good cause. We did not go into it under compulsion, and I would have hoped that, to the end, we should have remained in that position, and acted upon those higher principles, never resorting to compulsion, in order to do our share in this war. I still believe it would be possible to do our share by voluntary enlistment, by appealing to the great heart and soul of the Canadian people, all provinces included, I except none whatever.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The Government have come to another conclusion. They said that they would resort to compulsion. When they made that statement, I said that, for my part, I did not believe in that policy. I would rather stand by the policy of the Australian people, who rejected conscription, but are in the war, as we shall ourselves be, to the very end. I asked them to refer the question to the people, after the method of the most advanced democracy, and that request was rejected. Not content with rejecting the request which I made for a referendum, to-day we are asked to discard altogether the sacred right of the people which is guarded by the constitution. These are no longer British institutions; these are simply, not German, but Prussian institutions, and to agree to the resolution of my hon. friend under the circumstances would be an abdication of responsible government and a denial of democracy and of the rights of a free people.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): I rise to put myself on record in opposition to a considerable portion of the views which have been advanced by my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I do so, Sir, as I think every one in the House will admit, with perhaps the clearest record for consistency upon this question. My right hon. friend has referred to the fact that there was a great deal of evidence at certain times during the war, that there was a disposition, on the part at least of some of the hon. gentlemen who sit opposite, to have an election. It would be pertinent for me to ask my right hon. friend, did he approve of that disposition when it was shown on the other side of the House? I do not think he did. There was a time when every one in this House was in agreement with me on this question, and at that time my right hon. friend disapproved of the election tendency of certain hon. gentlemen opposite. He now fixes his approval by imitating their course of action. Personally, I have no brief to defend those who wish for an election during war time. They sit upon that or upon this side of the House. I am certain that the course of this debate will be viewed with very considerable surprise by the people of this country. Those of our people who are gifted with any fair amount of imagination and of memory cannot fail to contrast the proceedings in this House a year ago with the proceedings which have taken place to-day. Up to a certain point, I am bound to say that the proceedings to-day were an exact replica of what happened a year ago. I do not think the Prime Minister of this country has ever delivered a speech with which he should have more reason to be satisfied than the speech with which he presented this resolution to the House. It was a consistent speech. It was cogent in its argument. It was manifestly sincere, and when the events of to-day are read and weighed by the people of this country, I believe the opinion of the people will be recorded in favour of that potent and consistent speech.

I do not want to amplify—I am sure I could not improve—most of the arguments in the speech of the Prime Minister. I will, however, take the liberty of referring to a few of them and in doing so try to meet some of the points that have been raised by my right hon. friend. There was much that he said to which I can take no exception. The position of this question is not quite the same as it was last year.

[Sir Wilfrid Laurier.]

We cannot go on extending the term of Parliament indefinitely. But, if so far as the battle-front is concerned, there is any difference between the position of last year and that of this year, it is that the position of Canada's troops on the battle-front to-day is vastly more precarious this year than it was last year. This being the fact on the battle-front, I am bound to say to my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) that I personally have not the necessary acrobatic qualities to take a position diametrically opposed to that which I took last year.

My right hon. friend, in the course of his remarks, said that he did not attach undue importance to the constitutional question. In his impassioned and eloquent peroration, he made the constitution everything. He stood upon the constitution of this country and upon it alone. That is an inconsistency which I leave with himself, but I take the liberty to refer, nevertheless, to the constitutional question. Does my right hon. friend, or does any hon. member on this side of the House, contend for a moment that they have no regard for constitutional or parliamentary procedure in Great Britain? Where did we—where did the world learn constitutional and parliamentary procedure? I have heard my right hon. friend discourse, in terms the most eloquent, on the mother of parliaments, which we all imitate. What are the facts about the mother of parliaments? The people of Great Britain do not forget the constitution there. They have Zeppelin raids over the city of London. They have bombs dropped amongst the children in the schools there. They know what the war means, and they are apprised, as my right hon. friend was for two years apprised, of the war's seriousness. The Parliament sitting in Westminster to-day has been seven and one-half years in office, and next November, when its present terms expires, it will have been eight years in office. That is my answer upon the constitutional question. They knew something of constitutional and parliamentary procedure in Great Britain, and that is what they have done.

I want to pass on to endorse a few more of the positions of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister. He said, very correctly, that the inevitable result of a general election would be a division of the country. We have that now, I admit, and the fault for it does not lie in Alberta, but I am prepared to contend that we would have not only a divided country, but a paralyzed country as the result of a general election.

My hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) says that we have division now, and that an election would be a Sunday school picnic compared with the division we have. He says that the business of getting recruits has been taken out of the hands of the Government; that it has been taken out of the hands of Parliament; that it has been taken out of the hands of the people. Is that the only war work that is going on in the country? What about the Patriotic Fund, a fund in support of which Liberals and Tories throughout this country, forgetting their party differences and centering their activities only upon the great issue which is before the world to-day, the greatest which has ever occupied the attention of civilized man and civilized nations, have united in public meetings and are uniting every week, almost every day of every week, in public meetings and in picnics to raise money voluntarily, and so shoulder at least some of the terrible burden that is being borne by our boys in the trenches? Does my right hon. friend contend that during the two months during which an election is going on those meetings will be held? Those people who are at present engaged in those meetings will then, on the contrary, be engaged perhaps in the discussion of the respective blame attaching to the two parties as to the merits of the Ross rifle. Has my hon. friend from St. John not heard of Red Cross work? Has he not heard of Belgian Relief? I contend that the inevitable result of a general election during the war will be to paralyse the efforts of our people along all those lines, yes, and to paralyse them in a way which will make it almost impossible to resume them.

I go further that that. What is to be the issue in an election? What is the dividing issue upon which we are to fight? On the great and overwhelming question of to-day there is only one issue. It is "Win the War." Every one on that side says so—not every one on this side says so. But, my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) says so. He has said so in so many words in the speech which he has delivered to the House to-night. Then, there can be no issue before the people on the main questions, the only questions which are engaging the attention, not only of this country, but of the civilised world to-day. Then, what will be the issue? What is the alternative policy to winning the war? There is only one possible answer. It is "Winning the elections." If we analyse these things down to the bottom, we are compelled, with all charity, to conclude that this election is being forced on at this time by a refusal of extension, with a view, not to helping the war, not to saving the Empire, but to exchanging the people who are in office for those who are opposed to them for the purpose of securing the sweets of office. In other words, those who are notoriously doing least to win this war are forcing this country into the turmoil of a general election, when the world and all that is best in it are being animated by the spirit of service, of sacrifice, and of unselfishness, and those people are doing so for the most selfish of all reasons—the satisfaction of petty, personal ambitions, when the safety of the world and of civilization is at stake.

I, Sir, should hesitate to stand as one of a group of the only utterly selfish men to be found in the British Empire or in the civilized world at the present time. If there is no issue of policy in an election, upon what does an election necessarily turn? We have not been left in any doubt in this House to-night as to that point. The election necessarily turns on personalities. It must do so. If there is no difference of principle—and there is not between my two right hon. friends, because they both say: We want to win the war—the election inevitably degenerates into a strife of personalities. We have had ample evidence of that to-night. The die is cast on the principle laid down by my right hon. friend (Sir Robert Borden) and endorsed by my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). We are going to have an election. The leader of the Opposition has got his work in early; he has delivered his first election speech to-night. I do not purpose following his example very far. At the same time, the merits of the Ross rifle constitute a subject upon which my right hon. friend is skating upon very thin ice. I do not know exactly what he thinks about the Ross rifle, because in one breath he told us that its use had cost us the lives of many of our boys, and then in the next breath he agreed with the ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) that it was the better rifle of the two. I suppose he remembered at that moment that the Ross rifle was the precious pet of an hon. gentleman now gone from us who for many years was Minister of Militia in the Liberal Government. If he does not remember it, I remember very well hearing the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) engage in an impassioned defence of the Ross rifle in this House of Commons, and indulge in jeers at those in England who ventured to question the omniscience of the Government, it being the Government of my right hon friend who now leads the Opposition. I do not say that to get the other side of this argument right, I say it to give an illustration of what is going to happen in a general election. If you cease to fight on principles you descend to personalities. Does my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) view that with equanimity? That question is bound to be asked. If we come to that point, does my right hon. friend contend that with the driving force behind him, if he becomes Prime Minister of this country, he will have a more coherent force, a more determined force for the winning of the war than is now sitting behind my right hon. friend the Prime Minister? Does the coherence of his force, does the strength of the determination of one considerable portion of his force, show itself by driving a Cabinet Minister who is at present in favour of winning the war into the refuge of a cabin on board a steamer, for taking a particular view as to how it should be won. Does my right hon. friend contend that he will derive enormous strength for the conduct of this war from people who chase a British soldier from Fletcher's Field in Montreal, into a tramcar, and then break the windows of the car? There will be many more subjects arise when we descend to a personal fight than the subject of the Ross rifle. If it was left to the question of the Ross rifle, I am not at all sure that my right hon. friend would not have the better of the argument.

But the question will inevitably be asked, if you determine to settle this on the line of personalities: Who are the people most likely to conduct this war to a satisfactory conclusion? And I venture to say that, so far as clearness of motive is concerned, so far as determination is concerned, so far as working in season and out of season, day and night, with a single eye to victory, for the great principles that are at stake upon the battlefields of Europe to-day, there is no man in Canada who is fit to stand in the same company as my right hon. friend the leader of the Government.

We have ample evidence given to us that the faults of the Government will be the main subject of a general election. Will the exposure of the faults of the Ross rifle from the Atlantic to the Pacific, will the detailing of incidents or supposed incidents such as have constituted the first electioneering speech of my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, help to win this war? Will it encourage recruiting? I venture to think that a campaign conducted by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, pure as are his own motives, great Imperial statesman as he has been—and I say it without one single reservation, I say it with a full heart and with full sincerity—but pure as are his motives he knows that to expose these facts from one end of the country to the other must have the effect of deterring recruiting and making people wonder whether this war is worth pursuing; and paralysed as his hands will be during the war by what must be one of the main origins of his power; lacking the driving force on grounds that I do not want to amplify, but which I look upon with sorrow, he will not be in a position, he cannot be in a position, to go on with this war with the determination that has characterized the composite supporters of the war.

For the good of the country, for the purity of our politics, the next general election ought not to be fought upon the faults of the Government. Every Administration suffers for its faults, and this Administration will be no exception to that rule. But when the exposure of the faults of the Government take the mythical form of stories of the jamming of rifles and the weeping of men in the trenches, it constitutes not only an ignoble campaign but an obstacle to the further successful prosecution of the war, and I venture to think that a general election carried on by my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) along the lines that he has taken to-night will not only divide Canada, but will paralyse Canada; it will put Canada out of the war and mark her as a degenerate and inferior portion of the British Empire.

Now I come to another of the arguments of my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) as to the absence of the soldiers and the impossibility of taking their votes. My right hon. friend descanted eloquently upon democracy. Has he no regard for that portion of democracy that is across the seas? Has he no regard for the 400,000 men who have given up everything they have, or are prepared to give it up? My deepest rooted objection to an election in war time —and this was the ground upon which I opposed the Soldiers' Voting Bill, because I held there should be no election during the war—is that we propose to conduct an unseemly wrangle for jobs from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and concerning how the country should be governed in the absence of those heroes but for whose efforts we should not have any country to govern.

I have tried to amplify a few of the arguments of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister. I have said that in the presentation of those arguments, the debate lost nothing in dignity from its character of last year. This afternoon when the Prime Minister sat down, I expected a repetition of what happened last year. I expected a repetition at least to this extent: that my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition would have followed the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government. I thought we had come to the moment of abdication on the part of my right hon. friend. Last year the speech of the Prime Minister was backed up by the leader of the Opposition in a speech of moving and stately eloquence. Canada was committed to undivided efforts for the winning of this war, and that speech of moving and stately eloquence was so able and so cogent that it deprived the rest of this Assembly of any desire to speak. But what happened this year was that a lieutenant (Mr. Graham) of my right hon. friend arose and made what I venture to characterize as a dilatory and by no means straightforward motion; that is why I voted against it. Everybody in this country, fortunately for myself, knows that I favour the substance and principle of his amendment, but it was a right amendment introduced at a wrong time. Having so far endeavoured to attain, and I think having attained, some character of straightforwardness in the minds of the Canadian people, I thought I could venture to run the risk of any misinterpretation that might come by my vote, by being straightforward still and running no risk of being thought to have taken part in what after all was more trickery than statesmanship. I am naturally precluded by the rules of this House from saying anything on that amendment, and I had no great desire to speak to it because I have spoken on it again and again, and the people of this country know where I stand on the question of direct taxation and the conscription of wealth to the war. Following the speech of the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) we had a speech from my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley), and then finally we come to the main subject before the House.

I did think when I rose, that I would make an appeal to the right hon. gentlemen who lead the respective sides in this House. I cannot help contrasting what happened last year with what has happened this year. No one can turn his back upon his previous opinions with more delightful grace than my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Long practice brings one to perfection along certain lines. However, I am bound to say that if the people of this country will read the speeches of last year and will read the speeches of to-night they will come to the conclusion that the Prime Minister's position is the same, that the conditions are the same in the main, that the needs are the same, but that the change is in my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. What that change is, I have already characterized, and I do not think the people of this country will be in any doubt about it.

I wish that, even now, the two right hon. gentlemen who lead the respective parties in this House would consider a moderate proposition. I have stated, taking my illustration from what was said by my right hon. friend who preceded me (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), that an election on the grounds I have mentioned would be a misfortune for the country; I have said that it should not be fought upon the faults of the Government; I have said that it cannot be fought upon a difference of issue as to policy, because both sides pretend to have the same policy. It would be a splendid thing for this country if, even now, moderate counsels should prevail, and a course of procedure that would redound to the lasting honour of Canada. What should the next election be fought upon? When the war is nearing an end, of which there is no sign at the present moment, the question of the reconstruction of Canada will come up for consideration, because it must be remembered that the party returned to power in an election now will be in power for four or five years and will have the direction of the destinies of this country along certain lines of policy. When the war is nearing a conclusion, and when the passions raised by it are being hushed by the process of time, the issues of reconstruction will arise; and then old divisions, old landmarks dividing the one party from the other would re-appear. I say it would be a splendid thing for this country if we have maintained our union as to the war to the finish—such union as we have had—if we had kept our people at least united, because after all it must be remembered that any disunion there is, is largely inside this House. Our people are still united. I get as many protests against an election in war time from Liberals as I do from Conservatives. I may say I get even more, because Liberals naturally write to me. Our people are still united, and it would be a splendid thing to have kept that union up until the end of the war, and not allowed those other issues to arise. Fix a time—a more limited time than the Government proposes, if you like—and let those issues be debated at another session of Parliament, knowing that those are the things which divide the two sides of politics in this country; and having put our policies of reconstruction before the nation, go to the country upon them.

The Government is asking for a year's extension. The longest extension which has ever been given in the Old Country is eight months. The two right hon. gentlemen have a great responsibility. One has discharged his responsibility. I leave my right hon. friend beside me (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to deal with his in his own way. They enjoy in an unparalleled degree the confidence of their fellow-citizens, and I say it would be a great thing for Canada and the Empire if they could get together yet and agree to an eight months' extension, which would take us over until next June. In all probability by that time the war will have passed out of its acute stages, and the considerations which arise to-day will not then exist. I put this to my right hon. friends in the best spirit, as a patriot, as a lover of the country, as a lover of the Empire, and as a lover of the great cause at issue in this war. I feel, however, the appeal will be in vain. If they do not come together, we are going to have a general election. Well, in that case, we shall have to say, let it come. Let the graves of our dead be desecrated. There are twenty thousand or thirty thousand Canadian soldiers at present lying in British and French hospitals. Let their hearts be wrung, as their bodies have already been wrung—so that we may settle which side is most to blame for the Ross rifle, and whether it would not be well to have a change in the personnel of the Government at the present time. My views as expressed in these few words are perhaps better put in an article in the London Daily News and Leader, of April 18 last; which I will read to the House,—The Daily News and Leader is not too indulgently friendly to the present Government at Westminster, and April 18 was the day after the extension was carried in the British House. It said:

> The Bill further prolonging the life of the present Parliament passed its second reading yesterday. There was no serious opposition to the proposal, and there should be none. An election at the present time would be an outrage, which the country would very justly resent. There is no issue before the constituencies, and there is only one task for Parliament. It is to get on with the war. An election, so far from promoting this object, would very gravely interfere with it, and would raise political issues which the country does not want to see raised now and which cannot be settled in the midst of the dominating preoccupations of the war. We hope this will be the last extension necessary, but this extension is, on every ground, imperative.

As I said, I have not much hope of my appeal bearing fruit, after the very firm and determined stand taken by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, and we shall have to face an election. We shall have to go on with it. Well, the responsibility will be fixed by the people of this country, and I do not think that, after the issues are fully debated and the circumstances fully understood, there will be much doubt as to where to place the blame or how to judge the motives which have brought about the election. For my part, I would say, if the die is cast the sooner this debate comes to an end the better. Let us clear our minds of cant, and let us clear our conduct of sham. Let us get to the election. If there is to be an issue, let us get to it. If this matter should go to a vote, I would vote for the extension of Parliament. I should be afraid to do otherwise. I should be afraid to take any step, and I have not taken any step during nearly three years, which would cast any doubt anywhere that any but one public object I cared for at the moment, and that is the winning of the war.

I should be afraid to take any step which would lead me to fear that the thirty thousand Canadian corpses in France and Belgium might possibly rise out of their graves in the shape of ghosts and point their gaunt fingers at me as having at the end of the third year of the war given up the great task, or tried to persuade Canada to give up the great task of being a united country and doing her full share for victory, peace, freedom, justice and humanity.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, it has certainly been a most interesting experience to find our most pronounced and thorough democrat in this House (Mr. M. Clark), or, I suppose he would claim, in the Dominion of Canada, appealing to the dead in France and Flanders as the justification for his opposing the most elementary principle of democracy. For all of my hon. friend's approval of the speeches and actions of the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden)—and I am willing to agree with him as to the high motives and great ability of the Prime Minister—I want to say to him that it is not the Prime Minister, it is not this Government, it is not this Parliament that is fighting this war. It is not they who are paying for this war. It is the people—the common people—of Canada, the taxpayers, the men and women who have fought the war as far as it has been fought, who will have to fight it as far as it will yet have to be fought, and whom we will have to trust to fight it. Surely these are people whom we can trust to govern themselves. Are the people of Canada to be guided by the precedent of England in all matters political? It has seemed good to the people of England to go through a portion of this war experience without a general election, although a general election was due.

It has seemed good to us in Canada to do the same up to the present time. But there is this radical difference. In England every constituency that became vacant has been filled at a by-election. The opinion of the people has thus been taken from time to time. But there are twenty-three seats in Canada vacant to-day; some of them have been vacant for a year or two years, and there has been no by-election.

11 p.m.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Whose fault?

Mr. OLIVER: I think it must be the fault of the Government, the fault of those who have the direction of our affairs. I cannot imagine whose fault it can be if not theirs. Certainly, I must say, on behalf of the members of the Opposition, with whom I am sorry to say my hon. friend is so disassociating himself, it is not our fault.

Why is it we have no responsibility in the matter if the people of Canada have not yet been consulted? The urgency of united action is greater to-day than it was a year ago because of conditions at the battle line. Because the administration of the affairs of Canada, in military as well as in civil matters, has been such as to bring about a condition for which it is the right and the duty of the leader and members of the Opposition, and people of this country, to hold responsible those who have been given the responsibility. There is no escape from the conclusion that if our system of voluntary enlistment of men for military service has broken down, it is because of the lack of foresight, the lack of management, the lack of inspiration, the lack, Mr. Speaker, of common honesty and common decency on the part of the Government. Are the people of Canada to be blamed? Is their patriotism to be challenged? Is their willingness to sacrifice to be challenged? Are the people who, in the face of such mismanagement as has disgraced this country, military mismanagement as well as civil, have sent nearly 350,000 men across the seas, to be challenged, or is their patriotism to be called in question? I say, no. It is not against the people of a country which has sent so many men, which has sent such good men, which has stood the sacrifices that Canada has made, that such a challenge can be thrown. It is because the Government has failed to give that leadership, that inspiration, that direction to our affairs, both civil and military, that would enable that enthusiasm, that spirit of sacrifice to still go forward, that the condition has arisen with which we find ourselves confronted to-day.

My hon. friend has suggested that it is beneath the dignity of the people of Canada, that it would be a calamity to our country, if not to the Empire and the world, if the question of the efficiency of the weapon with which our soldiers were armed should be considered or discussed, or should be laid at the charge of the Government at the present time. Is that a light thing, is that a subject for the laughter with which my hon. friend's very witty sallies were greeted on the other side of the House? Is it a subject for laughter that we placed in the hands of our sons, our brothers and our fathers, a weapon that failed them in the hour of danger? Is it a light thing, I say, that having the authority of a General of the British army that that was the condition of affairs, we send division after division into the field to face the Germans armed with the same rifle and suffering the same losses, and keep that rifle until a second general made the same report a year after the first report was made, and when we had lost thousands of men in Flanders, beginning with the battle of Langemarck and ending with the battle of Zillebeke? My hon. friend has, may I say, peculiar ideas as to what is matter for light consideration. These are not light considerations, as far as I am concerned. And, charged as I have been in this House during past years with some measure or share of responsibility for the direction of the affairs of this country, the knowledge lies heavy on my soul that I did not take stronger measures to bring this state of affairs to the attention of the country, and to cure that terrible condition sooner than it was cured.

We are not to have an élection because if we have an election we shall not be able to collect for the Patriotic Fund, for the Belgian Relief Fund, for the Red Cross Fund. Is that a reason why the people of Canada should not enjoy the same right of self-Government as the people of any other part of the British Empire? Surely the reason given is not sufficient. We need an election so that we shall not have to gather money for the Patriotic Fund, so that we shall not have to pass the hat and dispense charity, charity to the dependents of those who are giving their lives for that liberty that we profess to prize so highly. If there is one thing of which more than another Canada should be ashamed in connection with this war it is the fact that the dependents of its soldiers have to depend on benevolence, on charity, for a considerable portion of that which is necessary to their actual existence. I do not know what is the case in England, I find no fault with the conditions in any other country; I care not what they may be. We owe the men who are fighting our battles a debt; we owe a debt to their dependents; and we have not been paying that debt as we should have paid it. We should not dole out charity to the dependents of the men who are giving their lives; we should not send busybodies around to the houses of these women to find out whether they spend a dollar here or a dollar there, and threaten that if they do not spend to suit us what we have given them, they will be deprived of it in the future. Supposing our men at the front were to take the same attitude as the gentlemen and ladies who dispense the Patriotic Fund and say: We will go over the top if we like, and we will not if we do not like. If they dealt by us as we have dealt by their dependents, the credit of Canada would not stand so high in the estimation of the world. We want a general election; put it up to the people of Canada whether or not they want to do the right thing by their own people. We cannot get an assurance of that from the Government of the day. When such a proposal was made to the Government we were told that it was a dilatory motion. We were told that we were delaying the sending of men to fill up the battle line in France because we wanted to get the assurance of the Government that the dependents of soldiers would be protected.

An election is spoken of as a calamity, something that will do permanent injury to the country. What has happened to the people of Canada since 1911? What has happened to the people of Canada, who have made such sacrifices as they have made in the years that have intervened, that they are not to be trusted to cast their ballots, to express their opinions? Surely, if any people in the world ever earned the right to govern themselves, the people of Canada have earned that right. Surely the people of Canada have earned the right to do as a nation what they have done by provinces in nearly every province since the war began. Why should not the same people in British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec—in every province but one—why should not these same Canadians who are able to conduct their provincial elections during this time of war without any catastrophe occurring to the country—oh, I beg pardon, there was catastrophe, and that was it. I understand that that is where the calamity is to occur. What happened in Manitoba, what happened in New Brunswick, what happened in British Columbia is liable to happen in the Dominion, and it would be a calamity that it should happen? It was not a calamity that the people turned the rascals out in British Columbia, it was not a calamity to turn them out in Manitoba, it was not a calamity to turn them out in New Brunswick—and it will not be a calamity to turn them out in the Dominion.

My hon. friend made a suggestion as to what would happen in the prosecution of the war because of the character of a portion of the support upon which the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) would depend if he were called to power. It seems to me that the allusion was somewhat unfortunate, because, if there was anything wrong with that support, that is to say with the support of the French people from the province of Quebec, surely it has been wrong with our friends who are in office to-day. They had the support of twenty-eight out of sixty-five seats in the province of Quebec. And does my friend recall how they got that support and held it? They got it by proclaiming that Canada owed nothing to England. They persisted in that claim, and they are claiming it to-day, and the men who are most vociferous in claiming it to-day are the very men who by their claims in 1911 were able to place the friends of my hon. friend in power and to keep them there. There is a difference, however. The right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) does enjoy the support of the majority of the electors of the province of Quebec, has the support of a majority of the representatives of that province in this House; and my right hon. friend knows, and every reading man in this country knows, that the men who support him were elected on the policy of active assistance to the British Empire on land or sea in case of war, elected against every effort, every eloquence, every misrepresentation, that those from that province who support my hon. friends on the other side could bring to bear—financed in large part by those others supporting our friends on the other side who trade, year in and year out, on their loyalty to Great Britain.

Mr. McKENZIE: And knighted for doing it.

Mr. OLIVER: Yes, knighted for doing it

Mr. PUGSLEY: And raised to the peerage.

Mr. OLIVER: Yes. There we have, in a nutshell, the difficulties with which this country is faced at the present time, in this present crisis—we have had a party in power who, before they came to power, but still more since then and since they have had control of patronage and control of means to gain support, have systematically in one part of the country cultivated a campaign of race and religious prejudice, and in another part of the country cultivated the same kind of a campaign in the opposite way. And after that Government has been in power for six years, they are still assiduously cultivating those two campaigns, one centering in Toronto and the other centering in Montreal. During the period of the anguish and agony of the world, they did not stop. They kept going a little harder on that account; and at last we come to the point that an election must be faced, or the people of Canada will be deprived of their rights and liberties. It is because of this condition, which our friends on the other side deliberately created, that the difficulties of to-day exist. That may be a reason why my hon. friend, as a loyal Britisher, as one who wants to win the war, thinks that this Government should be retained in office, that these people should be maintained in positions that will enable them to still further and longer carry on their campaign. I am sorry that I have to disagree with him.

I believe that the time has come when Canada needs, as it needed in 1896, a leader who can direct by union, and not by disunion. A Government that holds power because of its ability to create strife between section and section must give place to a Government whose business it is to bring about union between section and section in this country, because by disunion comes depression or destruction, just as by union, and by union only, can success come. We all have the light of past events to guide us in the present crisis. In 1896 the condition was almost parallel to the present condition. Our country was in a state of terrible economic depression, and our people were animated by race and religious prejudice in the same two sections of the country where those factions are governing to-day. Fortunately, when the issue was put to the people, they made a wise choice. They selected as the leader of the Government my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), who has devoted his life and his attainments to the great work of building up a united Canada. And when in the fullness of time the power was placed in his hands, from 1896 to 1911, under a policy of union there was progress, and Canada made her greatest development since Canada was Canada. She progressed from greater to greater, until in 1911, when my hon. friend was defeated at the polls, he was defeated on the cry "Let well enough alone." May I hope that this condition will be repeated when this election which my hon. friend refers to takes place, because surely, if we needed a change in 1896, we need a change ten times more in 1917. We did not have to face those world conditions of crises that we face to-day. But we must face those conditions to-day, and we can only do so with credit to ourselves by the establishment of union and efficiency, and we can only get that union and efficiency by retiring from office those whose business it is to create disunion, and those whose administration from the day they took office to the present time has been an example of inefficiency such as this country never saw before. I will not discuss the inefficiency of this war time Administration, but I say that, when the election is held, no amount of flag-waving, and no amount of shouting patriotism, will prevent the people of Canada, who have made their sacrifices of money and blood, from demanding an accounting from those who are responsible for the conduct of our affairs during these years. We make no apology for demanding an accounting at their hands.

My hon. friend was worried about the impossibility of the soldiers at the front being able to cast their votes in any election that might be held. It is deplorable, and it is unfortunate if they cannot cast their votes, but I will submit this thought to him: if the man who has made up his mind—and all who have gone to the front should make up their minds—that his responsibility requires that he shall risk his life and everything he has or hopes to have, to be of service to his country, does the hon. gentleman think that the question of whether or not that man casts a vote is a serious matter? He is not casting a vote for any candidate, because he can only vote for the Government or Opposition. Does the hon. gentleman think that it is a material injury to that man, or that he is deprived of a serious portion of the right that belongs to him? If he thinks that it is a serious matter to disfranchise these men at the front, what does he think of the disfranchisement of the whole of the people of Canada, which is the condition in which we are to-day, which condition my hon. friend proposes by his vote to keep us in for eighteen months longer?

If it is a terrible thing for the soldier to be disfranchised, it is a very much more terrible thing for the people of this country to be disfranchised, because while the soldier is doing his work at the front, we have our work to do here. The soldier depends upon us for the support that he receives, and unless we conduct our business here as it should be conducted, we cannot give him that support; and just as we have a right to look to him that that sacrifice to which he has pledged himself shall be made when the occasion demands, surely he has the same right to look to us to see that the affairs of this country are conducted, in principle and in detail, in the large and in the small, in such a manner as shall be to his benefit and to his credit.

For what is the soldier fighting? For the good of the country, for its safety, for its honour, for its welfare now and in the future. And yet we are to sit here and are not to criticise the Government; we are not to question anything the Government does; we are to permit the food of the people to be stolen by the profiteers to the amount of millions upon millions of dollars, and we are to say nothing. We are not to criticise—we are to take no action. If we do our duty here, we shall ensure to our men at the front that there is good and efficient government in this country, and when those who are fortunate enough to come back, do return, there will be a country for them to come back to. Heaven knows whether they will really have a country to come back to when the war is over, if matters continue on the same course as at present. For the policy of this Government since they took office—and no man knows it better than my hon. friend (Mr. Michael Clark)—has been to make the rich richer and the poor poorer, and at no time and on no occasion was that more true than it is at this moment, and it is becoming increasingly true every day. When this Government itself brings down a report to say that the men who handle a large part of the food of the people have made profits of untold millions, and when the reports of the milling companies, which handle another large part of the food of the people show the profits that they show, are we justified in sitting here and failing to take such action as will protect those for whom our men are fighting and protect the rights and interests for which they are fighting? We have a duty to perform as well as they.

It is our business to see that this country is governed honestly and efficiently. It is the business of us who are in Opposition to hold a check upon the operations of the Government. No condition could be more dangerous to the welfare of the State than a combination between both sides of the House that would prevent effective criticism of the actions of the Government. I am not given to much overpraise; I am not one who goes heavily on laudation; but I want to say this, that when the leader of the Opposition refused the proposals of the leader of the Government—and I am not criticising the motives of—the leader of the Government in any degree—and preferred to stay in Opposition and to do his duty to taking office, if I never was proud of my leader before, as one of his humble followers, I was proud of him then. I knew that there rested the true principles of Liberalism that could be depended upon in time of stress, in time of temptation, if such a proposal might be a temptation, as well as in time of prosperity. I am sorry to say I have not been able to follow all the remarks made by my hon. friend. He made very many, and they were very clever. The first remark he made—I regret that it has almost slipped my memory.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: It has slipped mine too.

Mr. OLIVER: It had relation to—I am afraid after all that my hon. friend made so many turns in his argument—

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Do not blame me for your bad memory.

Mr. OLIVER: I am afraid my hon. friend made so many turns in his argument that some of the corners have escaped my memory. I was so interested in following my hon. friend, whom I had known as the most pronounced pacifist, the most pronounced free-trader and the most pronounced advocate of sound and honest Government and British precedent, in his reversal of all those positions, that I am sure he will pardon me if I have not been able to recall all of the many turns in his argument.

Main motion agreed to.

On motion of Sir Robert Borden, the House adjourned at 11.58 p.m.

Wednesday, July 18, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by asterisks.)

FOOD CONTROLLER'S OFFICE.

Mr. KAY:

1. Has the Government come to any decision as to the number of secretaries, assistants or office employees which will be required in the office of the Food Controller?
2. Have any appointments been made?
3. If so, what are the names of the persons appointed?
4. What salary is paid to each?

Mr. HUGH CLARK:

1. No.
2. Yes.
3. S. E. Todd, B.S.A., W. A. Willison, and F. W. French.
4. S. E. Todd, $4,500 per annum; W. A. Willison, $4,500 per annum; F. W. French, $250 per month, and living expenses, not to exceed $100 per month.

MATHESON POST OFFICE.

*Mr. McKENZIE:

1. Was the post office removed from the residence of John Matheson, blacksmith, of Matheson, C.B., to that of Murdock McLeod?
2. If so, for what reason was the change made?
3. How long has said John Matheson been Postmaster?
4. What was the distance between the office held by John Matheson and the nearest offices on either side?
5. What is the distance between the same office now at Murdock McLeod's and the offices on either side of it?
6. What is the distance between John Matheson's house, where the office was formerly, and Murdock McLeod's house, where the office is now?
7. Was there any petition or any other request or demand of a public nature asking for the changing of the above office?

Mr. DOHERTY:

1. Yes.
2. Inconvenient location of the post office.
3. From 1876 to 1st June, 1917.
4. Less than a mile from Little Narrows and about three and a half miles from Whycocomagh portage.
5. Nearly two miles from Little Narrows and about two and a half miles from Whycocomagh portage.
6. About a mile.
7. Letters were received by the department from people representing the inconvenient site of the post office and that the change should be made in the interest of the proper distribution of the mails.

[Sir Robert Borden.]

POINT TUPPER MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. KYTE:

1. Who has the present contract for carrying the mails between the post office and the I.C.R. train at Point Tupper, N.S.?
2. When was the present contract entered into, and what is the amount paid annually to the contractor for such service?
3. Who was the previous contractor, and what was the amount which he received for such service?
4. Were tenders called for the service previous to awarding present contract?

Mr. DOHERTY:

1. Roderick Dumphy.
2. 1st July, 1917, $150.
3. Joseph McDonald, $50.
4. Yes. The young man who was performing this contract made arrangements with a man named Henessey to perform the contract during his absence, as he had to leave the locality, inasmuch as he was going to attend college at Antigonish. After commencing attendance at college the man whom he had employed to perform the service was taken ill, and the young man stated was unlikely to recover, and as no person else could be obtained to carry on the service, he asked that he be relieved from it so as not to interfere with his college course. The contractor was therefore liberated, public tenders invited and the contract awarded to the lowest tenderer. The department was more willing to release him inasmuch as it was felt that he had taken the contract at a price below what it could be performed for.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN.

Mr. KYTE:

1. What is the number of officers who have been in England nine months or more and who have not been to France?
2. How many went to England with the 1st contingent who have not yet been in active service in France or elsewhere?
3. What is the number of (a) officers, (b) non-commissioned officers and men who have been discharged to Canada and who have not been in active service in France or elsewhere?
4. What is the number of officers who are holding permanent appointments in England who have not been in active service in France or elsewhere?
5. How many officers went to England with the 1st contingent who were not attached to any unit, and who subsequently returned to Canada without being in active service in France?
6. What pay and allowances were paid to these officers, and what is the estimated cost of subsistence and transportation to the time they resigned in Canada or received other appointments?
7. Has separation allowance been paid to persons who were not entitled to receive the same?

8. If so, to what amount, and have such payments been cancelled?

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS.

Mr. BOULAY:

For a return giving a list of the different Commissions created since the beginning of the war, concerning the soldiers, their pensions, hospitals, etc., showing the names of the various Commissioners who have comprised said Commissions.

Mr. McKENZIE:

For a copy of all correspondence between the Post Office Department, or any officer thereof, and any person whatsoever in reference to the removal of the post office from the residence of John Matheson, blacksmith, Matheson, C.B., to the residence of Murdock McLeod of the same place, and the dismissal of the former Postmaster, John Matheson.

MOBILIZATION SCHEME.

On the notice of motion:

Mr. MURPHY:

For a copy of the mobilization scheme for the Canadian Forces compiled (or published) in the year 1913.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I would like the member for Russell (Mr. Murphy) to be good enough to let this motion drop. In this country, as in other countries, it has not been deemed advisable to make mobilization schemes public.

Mr. MURPHY: Dropped.

Motion dropped.

DAYLIGHT SAVING.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. BOIVIN: The Daylight Saving Bill has been awaiting its second reading since June 15. I have just received a personal letter from a prominent employee of the Grand Trunk Railway company, part of which reads:

May I also ask if the Government will do anything with the Daylight Saving Bill? If it is brought in for Canada and not for the United States, it will, of course, quite considerably affect train schedules. I would like to be informed thereon as far in advance as possible, as we are quite seriously interested.

May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if it is the intention of the Government to put this Bill through during the present session? If so, in view of the fact that the summer season is quite far advanced, will the proclamation bringing the Act into operation be issued this year, or will it be held over until next season?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is a matter for the House to decide. I intend to introduce the Bill at the first convenient opportunity and to make a full explanation of it. Undoubtedly a large part of the season has passed during which a daylight saving measure would be useful. In the United States a similar measure has passed through the Senate and will come into operation next year. It may be advisable for us to take up the discussion of the Bill with a view of keeping in line with the course followed by the United States.

CIVIL SERVICE INSURANCE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX: Since the Military Service Bill came before the House I have received several letters from young men who are liable to be called upon for military service, inquiring whether the Government intends to amend the Insurance Act with a view to fixing a maximum amount of premium, covering war risk, payable on their policies. The insurance companies, as my hon. friend knows, charge a higher premium for war risks. There is a feeling among these young men that when they are called they will be unable to keep up their insurance policies because of the extra premium. I would ask the Prime Minister—I do not see the Minister of Finance in his seat—to consider this matter. When the Bill is before the House for third reading, I intend to bring the matter up again.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I shall direct the attention of the Minister of Finance to what my hon. friend has said. I am not sure that the matter has not already been under his consideration.

FORBIDDEN CIRCULATION IN CANADA.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. FRANK OLIVER: I have here a book called "The Fiddlers" by Arthur Mee. It was sent to me through the mails; I believe that copies have been received by a number of other members of Parliament. As I heard some question about this matter I looked up the Canada Gazette of Saturday, July 14, and on page 104 found the following:

Censorship Notice.

Consolidated Orders Respecting Censorship.

Department of the Secretary of State of Canada,

Ottawa, 11th July, 1917.

Notice is hereby given that, in pursuance of the Consolidated Orders respecting Censorship, dated the 17th day of January, 1917, passed under the provisions of section 6, of the War Measures Act, 1914, a book entitled "The Fiddlers," by Arthur Mee, published by Morgan & Scott, Limited, 12 Paternoster Buildings, England, has been declared by the Secretary of State of Canada, to contain objectionable matter as defined by the Consolidated Orders respecting Censorship, and that the possession within Canada of any issue or copy of the said "The Fiddlers," whether heretofore or hereafter published, has been prohibited by a Warrant of the Secretary of State of Canada, dated the 12th July, 1917, and that, as provided by paragraph 3 (1) of Order 111 of the said Consolidated Orders respecting Censorship, any person guilty of an offence against the said Orders shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding five thousand dollars or imprisonment for any term not exceeding five years, or to both such fine and such imprisonment.

Thomas Mulvey,
Under-Secretary of State.

Mr. PUGSLEY: And you have a copy there?

Mr. OLIVER: I have the book and I have read it in part. It is a powerful arraignment of the liquor traffic in the United Kingdom. I have read the order in council of Wednesday, the 17th of January, 1917, consolidating orders respecting censorship, and I desire to ask the Government under what paragraph of these consolidated orders this notice has been issued, and in respect of what portion of the matter contained in this book?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am afraid that I am in the same unfortunate position under the law as my hon. friend, because a copy of the book has also been sent to me. Possibly I may have shifted the responsibility, as I handed over my copy to one of the officers of the department to peruse until I should have an opportunity of doing so myself. The prohibition of the book did not come to my notice until a copy of it was sent to me, inviting me to peruse it and see whether there was any good reason why it should be prohibited. I shall make inquiries as to the matter about which my hon. friend asks for information, and let him know the result at a later date.

Mr. OLIVER: May I ask that the Secretary of State be instructed to suspend proceedings against members of this House until the Prime Minister has reached a conclusion in the matter?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am very much interested in that request myself.

[Mr. Oliver.]

EXTENSION OF THE TERM OF PARLIAMENT.

STATEMENT BY THE PRIME MINISTER.

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): With reference to the resolution for an extension of the parliamentary term, which was under debate yesterday and was voted on last night, hon. gentlemen will have observed that I did not make any motion that the resolution should be sent with a message to the Senate for the purpose of securing concurrent action there. My failure to take that course was due to the reason which I set forth when moving the resolution. I then declared that I did not think it should be acted upon unless there was unanimity or practical unanimity in the House with regard to it. The result of the vote upon the resolution showed something very far short of either unanimity or practical unanimity, for the vote stood 82 in support of the resolution and 62 against. Under the circumstances, therefore, and having regard to the course which I laid down in moving the resolution, I desire to announce what must already be apparent to hon. gentlemen in this House, that the Government do not purpose taking any further action upon the resolution, as it was carried by a majority of only 20.

FARM LABOUR IN WESTERN CANADA.

MOTION BY MR. TURRIFF IN REFERENCE THERETO.

Mr. J. G. TURRIFF (Assiniboia) asked for leave to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the farm labour question in western Canada.

And leave having been granted,

Mr. TURRIFF: I shall detain the House for only a few moments. The securing of farm help is of very great importance to the people of the West. We are now in the middle of July, and usually harvesting begins within two or three weeks of this date. In order to bring the matter quickly before the House, I shall read an article that appears in the Manitoba Free Press of July 11th, 1917, under the heading, The Farmers' Forum:

Farm Labour Problem.

Every few days letters arrive for this column, commenting on the extreme shortage of labour for harvest and threshing and suggesting methods by which the shortage may be met. The same suggestions appear in varying forms in all the letters received.

These suggestions, stated broadly, are:

First: "Conscript the slackers in cities and towns, place them in the army and return to the farms sufficient numbers of farmers and farm labourers to take care of the crop. In other words conscript man power and send it to do the task for which it is best fitted."

Second: "Conscript alien enemy labour and compel them to do the farm work at something like reasonable wages; a few suggest that as they would be fed on the farms they should be paid army wages only, others, however, ask merely for a reasonable rate of wages, and some security that these men when hired will live up to their contract."

The object of this editorial is not to discuss either of these proposals, but rather to discuss the methods which are being adopted to secure help, more especially with reference to Manitoba; also the outlook for help for all three provinces.

First, as to what has been done. Louis Kon, the head of the immigration department for Manitoba, who has this matter in charge, as soon as the spring rush was over began to lay plans for harvest. With a view to ascertaining the requirements of the farmers, he circularized the secretary of every municipality in Manitoba, suggesting that the council appoint one or more reliable men in each municipality, who would act as agents for the free distribution of labour, who would ascertain the needs of the municipality and transmit them to the immigration office, and who could be applied to to look after the men when they are ready to go out and see that they reach their proper destinations. The ready and general response to this suggestion is an excellent indication of the feeling in the country that help will be short and that there will be difficulty in securing it. It may be assumed that there will be on record in the immigration office, in the course of the next three weeks, a very complete list of the requirements of the province.

A careful review has been made of the source of possible supply, and frankly the outlook is not encouraging.

The sources, roughly, are: Homesteaders within the province, a limited supply of agricultural college student labour from the United States and possibly a percentage of regular farm labour from those States with crops which mature at an earlier date than our own.

A certain percentage of the labour employed in large establishments in the cities and towns, which volunteered last spring, and when not called upon for spring work, was asked to hold itself in reserve for the greater needs of harvest.

A possible percentage from the province of Quebec, the large alien population in the west available only at very high wages.

With regard to homesteaders, many of whom are aliens, it must be remembered that while a large number of them were available last spring, there will not be so many this harvest for the simple reason that last spring these men doubled up, and one man put in the crop of four or five while they went to help with the seeding elsewhere. In harvest it will take from four to five men to take off what one man seeded, and it is just as important that their crops be saved in good order as any other.

Student labour from the United States will be highly efficient, but it is not yet sure that it will be available in any large numbers as it may be needed at home. If any large number can be secured these young men will work in groups, moving from point to point as they are needed, and will, no doubt, be of great value, as they will work with trained brains as well as trained hands.

Regular farm labour from the United States is a very uncertain quantity at present. It will not be available from the States immediately to the south, the Dakotas and Minnesota, as their crop is almost as late as our own. There is a possibility, however, some may be secured from the winter wheat states. The provincial immigration office is in communication with Assistant Secretary Vrooman, of the Department of Agriculture, Washington, seeing what it may be possible to do along this line.

With regard to help from industrial concerns and large city establishments, many of these are already working with a very short staff, so that the number from this source cannot be large. It may be found necessary to close all the industrial concerns for a few weeks, with the exception of the munition works and industries manufacturing foods either for home consumption or shipment overseas, and send every available man and every able-bodied woman employed in these industries to the country.

Help from Quebec is highly problematic, unless it is conscripted for the purpose. Already signs are not wanting that Quebec is preparing to refuse work in western harvest fields in retaliation for western members of Parliament voting for the Conscription Bill. The alien labour at home is equally problematic until it is definitely known whether or not these men are to be conscripted, if the Bill goes through. Nothing short of compulsion will make many of them work at all, or any of them work for less than the very highest wages which necessity may drive farmers to pay. At least this is the information furnished by very many farmers and farmers' organizations.

From interviews in the papers, on the return of Sir George Foster from Washington, it appeared as if he had made arrangements with regard to help from the United States, but upon inquiry it is learned that nothing but generalities were discussed and no plans laid by the federal minister.

Inquiry also reveals the fact that nothing is being done or planned along this line by the head of the National Service Commission. It would have been reasonable to expect that the information gathered from the National Service cards would have been available for the purpose of ascertaining the various classes of labour available, but up to date so far as the public have any knowledge this has not been tabulated. The indications are that so far as farm labour is concerned each province is to be allowed to shift for itself.

This is not as it should be. The shortage of labour is so very great that the only way of meeting the difficulty is to have available supplies mobilized and moved from point to point as needed. This can only be effectively accomplished by federal authorities. They too are the only people in a position to deal with the matter of transportation. Labour should be carried at the very lowest rate from point to point and with the minimum of red tape about securing this transportation. Last spring low rates could only be secured for groups of five or over, from points outside of Winnipeg, whereas they should be equally available for one man if that one man is all that is needed at a given point. Moreover, transportation should be useable on any train, passenger or freight.

The foregoing gives some idea of the gravity of the labour situation. It is not a matter of securing help for the farmers in order that they may make a profit out of their crop; it is something vastly more important. It is the need of securing help for the farmers to save the crop, in order that our men, fighting in the trenches, may be properly supplied with food that we may have sufficient for our own tables and also that we supply as far as possible the needs of Britain for bread. Everything from Britain indicates that rationing is steadily becoming tighter.

The crop of every homesteader, who may have in no more than 20 or 30 acres, has suddenly become of national and indeed of Empire-wide importance. The west, in times of peace, claimed boastfully that she was the bread basket of the Empire. Now is the time to make good that boasting.

I also received the following telegram:

Winnipeg, July 11, 1917.

J. G. Turriff, M.P.,
Ottawa, Ont.

Please see Manitoba Free Press of Wednesday morning page 10, Farmers' Forum article on farm labour problem. Suggest you take this matter up in House and get statement from Government as to intentions and plans for securing men and providing transportation. Situation is regarded as quite serious here and to be in time action should be taken immediately.

This telegram is signed by G. A. MacDonald, who, I understand, is in charge of that class of work in the province of Manitoba.

The article I have read deals with the matter so fully that I do not think it is necessary for me to add anything further than to say that this is a very very serious question. If we have wet weather during the next few weeks the crop in many parts of the provinces will be fairly heavy, and a good deal of labour will be needed, and there is very little extra labour there at the present time. I bring the matter to the attention of the House in order that the Government may be seized of it, and may relieve the minds of the people of the West by showing what steps have been taken, or what steps are being taken.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am very glad indeed that my hon. friend (Mr. Turiff) has brought this matter to the attention of the House, as it is appropriate that the steps which have been taken by the Government with regard thereto should be known. The subject has been more immediately under the attention of my colleague the Minister of the Interior who will give, on certain aspects of the question, more detailed information than I can offer at the moment.

I may, however, say that negotiations have been going on for some time between the Government of Canada, through our Department of the Interior, and the Government of the United States, through one of its departments, for co-operation in the supply of labour, so that what is not required in one country may at a particular time of need in another country be used as far as is reasonably possible in the last-named country. As a result of negotiations between the officers of the Department of the Interior and officers of the United States Government a memorandum to carry out this purpose was drawn up, which was submitted to the Government of Canada and approved immediately. It has also been approved by the Government of the United States, and it will come into operation at once. My hon. friend the Minister of the Interior will explain it more fully.

So far as other steps are concerned, there was a meeting called last week, at my instance, which was attended by representatives of the Canadian Pacific railway, the Grand Trunk railway, the Grand Trunk Pacific railway and the Canadian Northern railway. I also asked the attendance of a representative of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, a representative of the Canadian Bankers' Association, and representatives of the Imperial Munitions Board. The meeting was held on Saturday last.

The object of asking representatives of the Bankers' Association, the Manufacturers' Association and the Imperial Munitions Board, was to ascertain whether or not some means could be contrived by which, during the brief period of the harvest, when labour is so urgently necessary, some men might be spared from the activities of those carrying on industries and banking, and it was thought also that the Imperial Munitions Board could co-operate to some extent. The meeting was also attended by Mr. Peterson, secretary of the National Service Board. While the article to which my hon. friend has called the attention of the House is very instructive and useful, I think the writer was under a misapprehension in one respect. The returns received by the National Service Board have been tabulated and Mr. Peterson informs us that there are 250,000 people, or thereabouts, in Canada, who, in returning their cards, stated that they would be willing to go to some other part of the country upon the condition that their remuneration should not be less than they were then receiving and that their transportation expenses should be paid. Of course, I do not mean to suggest that anything like 250,000 people would be available for this purpose, but it would seem to indicate that the information obtained by the National Service Board in that regard might be of use. There was a very hopeful feeling as to the provision of necessary labour expressed at this meeting and especially by the representatives of the railway companies who have had such questions before them year after year, and who say that the grave apprehensions entertained from time to time have not been realized. They believe that sufficient labour will be provided this year.

The meeting was also attended by several of the ministers whose departments appertain especially to this matter. When we had completed the conference of an hour, the representatives of the railways, of the associations to which I have alluded and of the Imperial Munitions Board and the National Service Board, spent some further time in devising the best means of co-operation. They have embodied their conclusions in a memorandum setting forth the lines along which they purpose to act, and included in the course which they intend to take is an effort by the secretary of the National Service Board to get in touch with the persons who have indicated their willingness to transfer their labour to other parts of the country, especially such as are not engaged in industries that are vitally essential to the carrying on of the war. It is not intended to apply to those whose skill in a particular industry or service would be of more advantage than in any other occupation. That, briefly stated, is the situation as I understand it at present. We are keeping in touch with the railway companies and the boards and associations represented at the meeting. It was in pursuance of a suggestion made at this meeting that I placed the situation before the people of Canada generally, and asked for their good will and co-operation in order that the harvest now ripening may be gathered and that there may be no loss to the country by any failure so to gather it.

Mr. BUCHANAN: I am quite sure that the remarks of the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) will be encouraging to the farmers of the West, who have been in doubt as to the supply of farm labour. I am not going to speak of the West as a whole, but I wish to make a few remarks about the obstacles which face the farmers of the southern part of Alberta. As the House knows, there was a coal strike in the spring and many miners were available for farm work. Now that the mines have resumed operations, and will, we hope, be busily engaged for the rest of the year, there is no possibility of any labour from that source being available for farm work. We have been accustomed to get some labour from the United States, and this was particularly so last year. Our harvest is coming on almost at the moment that the United States is calling men up under the selective draft, and there is no doubt that the supplies from that source will be depleted. In the southern part of Alberta the acreage under crop is 10 per cent greater than it was last year, and consequently the demand for help will be heavy. Some effort should be made to organize farm labour for the harvest, and to this end the co-operation of the provincial governments should be secured. If it is possible to transfer men from one section of Canada to the other in order to carry on farm work that system should be adopted. In some parts of the country the harvest will be earlier than in others, and the men might be shifted from one place to another. If such a system were adopted it would be of considerable assistance. In the past the men have gone to one district, remained there until the work was concluded and then they have drifted away, but frequently not to the places where there was a demand for their labour. By the proper organization of the men that situation would be relieved. I appreciate what the Government is doing to meet the situation. The chief trouble at present is that farmers are afraid that they will not have any labour, and if they could get an assurance that there is the possibility that labour will be provided as it is needed it would help to relieve their apprehension on this score.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE (Minister of the Interior): My right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) has already pretty well covered the arrangements which have been undertaken by the Government in order to secure the necessary farm help. But possibly I might elaborate a little the arrangement that has been made between the United States and Canada. When my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) was in Washington he took the matter up informally with representatives of the United States Government. We sent down the Deputy Minister of the Interior and the Inspector of Immigration agencies in the United States to consult with the authorities at Washington. They had an interview with representatives of the labour, agriculture and immigration departments of the United States and a tentative arrangements was made to be submitted to the respective governments for their approval. Pending its consummation, an official was to be appointed by both Governments to carry out the operations under the arrangement. The arrangement is, in short:—

1. That the Canadian Department of the Interior will place no obstacles in the way of the entry of the United States across the Canada-New England boundary of agricultural and lumbering labourers, not needed at the particular time in the lumber and agricultural industries of Canada, to take part in the harvesting of the potato and other crops in New England and elsewhere, and in the cutting and rafting of timber in the New England woods, as hereinafter mentioned, or in the way of the entry into the United States across the boundary between Canada and the States of Minnesota, North Dakota and Montana, of farm labourers to participate in the harvesting of wheat in the States mentioned; but, on the contrary, the said Department will, through its immigration officials and in all other ways open to it, encourage the coming of such surplus agricultural and lumbering help into the portions of the United States specified, and in pursuance of that policy will endeavour to have conveyed to Western Canada, sufficiently in advance of the opening of the harvest season there, such harvest helpers as may hereafter be reported to them by the United States Department of Labour to be needed in the States of Minnesota, North and South Dakota and Montana and other States, so that such helpers may promply cross the line and assist the forces mobilized by the United States Government in the harvest fields of the said States.

2. That the United States Departments of Labour and Agriculture will not only permit but encourage such surplus agricultural labourers among those now mobilized for harvesting purposes in the middle West, as rapidly as the need for them in the harvest fields of the United States decreases or disappears, to cross the boundary into the provinces of Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan and there assist in the harvesting of the wheat crop, and that appropriate instructions will be given all immigration and other officials of the United States looking to the end that the surplus supply of farm labour in the middle western portion of the United States may be made available to western Canada in the manner and for the purpose stated.

3. That Canada and the United States will mutually enforce, through their Immigration Services or otherwise, such precautionary measures as may be needed to insure that all persons whose departure from the respective countries is permitted will be required to return to the country of origin immediately that the temporary purpose involved in their admission to the other country has been accomplished.

4. That as soon as this tentative agreement is approved by the appropriate officials of the respective Governments an officer or officers will be selected by each Government to devise and execute the details of a plan of operation.

This has been approved by the Canadian Government, and we have information that it has been approved by the American Government, and the officials herein mentioned will be appointed to carry out the arrangement. I quite agree that there is a great shortage of farm labour in the West. At the same time, we have had the same cry for many years past on behalf of the Provincial Governments and of the farmers, and I can say without exaggeration that usually they do not err on the side of asking for less than they really require. On the contrary, I think that their needs have been supplied by considerably less numbers than the estimates of the respective Provincial Governments. For instance, this spring an arrangement was made between the Provincial Governments and the Dominion that certain immigration officials were to be sent to the United States by the provincial authorities to act in co-operation with Dominion officers in securing farm help to put in the crops. The Provincial Governments estimated a much larger number than they required. By reason of a very active publicity campaign in the United States, we were able to secure several thousand additional helpers from the United States, sufficient to supply the demands. Owing, however, to the United States since then coming into the war, we could not, of course, in justice to that country, inaugurate a similar campaign for harvesters, and therefore the arrangement I have just read has been made on the basis of co-operation between the respective Governments to help fill the requirements of the farmers and others in the respective countries. Last year it was estimated that we would require from 35,000 to 40,000 harvesters in the three provinces of the West. There were sent in by the transportation companies from the East, in round numbers, 27,000 men. About 4,000 of those came from the United States. Somewhere in the neighborhood of 3,000 entered through the western ports and nearly 2,000 through the eastern ports. The transportation companies allowed a special rate of $10 to Winnipeg and the men were distributed to the various portions of the three provinces at a rate of half a cent a mile. There was a return rate of, I think, $18. I have asked the transportation companies to grant an even lower rate if possible for the ensuing season, and, while they have not committed themselves, they are considering it, and I hope that a cheap rate may be secured.

The article read contains some very practical suggestions, of which some have already been acted upon, while others I think will be rather impracticable. For instance, the suggestion is made that we should conscript the alien enemies and the slackers and compel them to work at a fixed maximum wage. An effort was made to do this in connection with spring work in Manitoba, and I understand that there was a proposition from the Grain Growers to the Provincial Government to fix a maximum wage, so that each farmer could secure help at a reasonable wage. The Provincial Government, however, could not see their way clear to accede to that request. You may take a horse to water but you cannot compel him to drink; and while you can conscript men to fight in defence of their country, while they will fight because they are fighting in defence of their own lives in the trenches, it is another thing to compel men to go into the harvest field and work there. I am afraid that if we compelled men to work in that way the farmer who employed such men would obtain very little result from their labour. The Prime Minister has already said that a conference was held here a few days ago between the various bodies he mentioned. We are going to leave no stone unturned in order to secure the necessary help. All of these bodies have promised to use their influence in their respective spheres to release as many men under their jurisdiction as they possibly can, in order to provide the necessary amount of help. The Deputy Minister of Agriculture for Saskatchewan visited Ottawa and had an interview with me last week, and we have promised co-operation, so far as possible, with his Government. The Provincial Government are willing to distribute any help that goes into that province. They are also carrying on a propaganda locally to secure men. Last year there were ticketed out from towns and cities in Saskatchewan, 3,700 men for farm work. In Alberta there were ticketed out from cities and towns 3,200, and from Winnipeg about 5,000, so that the local supply was quite large. However, we do realize that there were a number of soldiers in Canada last year. There were some 16,000 in Camp Hughes and some 3,000 at Sarcee Camp, who were released, nominally to help on the farms. I do not say that all went to farm work, in fact I know that many did not. But owing to the fact that there are comparatively few troops in Canada to-day, we cannot draw on this source as we did last year. Every possible thing that can be done will be done by this department in the interest of the farmers, in co-operation with the Provincial Governments and those other bodies that have been mentioned.

Mr. OLIVER: Do the plans of the Government in this connection include the acceptance of the suggestion of the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs) that 12,900 men now on service in England but unfit for service in France should be returned to Canada for the purpose of engaging in their ordinary vocations?

Mr. ROCHE: That would come under the jurisdiction of the Militia Department. I do not know that the views expressed by the Minister of Militia (Sir Edward Kemp) quite harmonized with those of the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs), as many of those men have already gone to France, and many others have been given employment on construction and fortifying work.

Mr. MARCIL: Has the minister considered the idea of asking that the conscription Act be suspended in order to get men to carry on the work in the harvest fields?

Mr. ROCHE: No, we have not considered that: the conscription Act takes first place.

Mr. ROBB: The shortage of labour anticipated in western Canada is now on in eastern Canada. In support of his argument for labour to reap the crops of western Canada, the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) quoted an article in the Winnipeg Free Press. One feature of that article struck me, that was the statement that the people of Quebec were refusing to work in the western wheat fields as retaliation for the imposition of military service. That is only in line with a lot of other misrepresentation of the province of Quebec that have been spoiling paper and ink for the last few weeks throughout this country. All throughout eastern Canada to-day, while the haying is on, as every hon. gentleman from Ontario and Quebec knows, labour is almost unobtainable. Farmers are now offering $3 to $5 a day for help and are unable to obtain it, and you will find women working in the hayfields of eastern Canada. My hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) has said that western Canada is the bread basket of the Empire, and perhaps this is true. But I hope that our friends in the West will not forget that eastern Canada provides the cheese and the butter to put on that bread. And providing cheese and butter does not mean work for three or four weeks in the springtime, and three or four weeks during the gathering of harvest; it means hard and slavish work every day of the year, and many farmers of eastern Canada have lessened their herds because they were unable to obtain labour to take care of them. While it is important to have labour to put in and gather the crops, it is equally important to have labour to move that crop to market. Last year, in western Canada, they raised a pretty fair crop of grain that would have been useful for the feeding of cattle in eastern Canada, but, owing to the shortage of labour to operate the railways, to get out coal or supply fuel for the engines, that crop was allowed to remain during the winter, and they were unable to move it until the grass was growing in eastern Canada, and it was not required. The result of the shortage of labour was that throughout eastern Canada the canners of this country were buying cattle at reduced prices, because the farmers had no feed for their cattle. I say it is equally as important that the Government should provide labour for the coal mines, and labour to operate the railways of this country to move the crops as it is that they shall provide labour to gather the crops. We heard a good deal of complaint about Canada not being able to produce potatoes for the requirements of her people last year, but many people know that there were thousands of bushels of potatoes left on the railway sidings in Montreal, because there was no labour to move them until the frost came along and spoiled them. Those are the conditions we are faced with, and I think the Government should take these matters into account when considering the labour question. While the labour conditions may be acute in the western country, it is more so in eastern Canada. Industries are nearly closing down or they are running shorthanded because there is no labour, and it is a libel upon the province of Quebec to say that labourers refused to work on account of the conscription measure. Labourers in Quebec are ready to work wherever they can get a day's pay, and there are more men wanting to help than there is labour offering.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: I desire to call the attention of the Government to a matter which came to my notice last fall. The Minister of the Interior speaks about labour sent out from Camp Hughes. That labour was very useful in our part of the country, but it had a very disturbing influence in another way. A great many of us who were running threshing outfits were dependent on some of those recruits for helping to run the threshing outfit, and in the middle of the threshing season they were taken off, and the work was not completed. The result was the work dragged along, and practically no fall ploughing was done at all, and we have much less wheat in crop this year than in other years. I know it from experience. I have had men taken away from me, and I know how it works.

Mr. NESBITT: I may say that every year in Ontario we suffer a great deal in the fall of the year from the advertisements for labour for the West. They take our men away from us in the fall of the year, when we require them very badly, and I was going to suggest to my hon. friend that, in his organization, he should look after the taking of labour from one place to the other more by organization than by wild advertisements as to high prices and that sort of thing, because that has a tendency to make men restless and make them leave their work. If a man has two or three men employed, or perhaps only one man, we know they simply leave when they like. Very frequently you dare not say anything to them. They get up and leave you, and that is caused a great deal by advertisements which appear in the fall of the year for labour in the West. My hon. friend who preceded me spoke of the necessity for labour for various industries and for transportation. He is absolutely right, and labour in our section of Ontario is just as scarce as it is anywhere else. I quite appreciate that it is necessary to move the harvest in the West, but it is also necessary to move our crops in the East.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: You antedate the work out there.

Mr. NESBITT: So far as harvest is concerned, we do, but then follows the preparation for fall wheat, which is just as important, for the next year, and then follows the root crop harvest, which is equally important, if not more so, in a way, in Ontario, and then you have the corn harvest. Our great harvest, after all, nowadays, is the corn harvest in the fall of the year. Our fall wheat and corn harvest immediately follows our grain harvest. We require more men in corn harvest than we do in grain harvest.

Mr. SPEAKER: Shall the hon. member have leave to withdraw his motion?

Motion withdrawn.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I desire to say a word—

Mr. SPEAKER: I put the question to the House whether leave should be given to withdraw the motion and no protest having been made, the motion was declared withdrawn. It is too late for the hon. member to speak on that motion now.

PRIVILEGE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. PUGSLEY: I desire to bring before the House a matter of privilege, which I mentioned some days ago, but allowed to stand, so that it would not block the Military Service Bill. That Bill is now taking a rest, and it will be quite in order to draw attention to the matter.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: What is the subject?

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is the reference to a statement made by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, on June 6, when he announced the appointment of a commission to investigate the judgment of Mr. Justice Galt—

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The Prime Minister is not in the House and is engaged on very important business, and I do not suppose the hon. member from St. John would wish to take it up in his absence.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I will allow the matter to stand, and when I take it up, I desire the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and the Minister of Labour to be present.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We will endeavour to have them here, if the hon. member promises to be short.

Mr. PUGSLEY: And my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce is interested, because he proved himself a letter writer.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am always here.

PAIRS ON YESTERDAY'S VOTE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. THOMPSON: I wish to call attention to an error in yesterday's Hansard. I am represented as having voted on the motion for the adoption of the resolution, moved by the Prime Minister for the extension of the term of Parliament, and also as being paired with the hon. gentleman from Charlotte (Mr. Hartt). I did vote for the motion, and the statement that I was paired is not correct.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—INCREASE OF FREIGHT RATES ON COAL.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. PUGSLEY: About the time that the fuel commissioner was sent to the Maritime Provinces to investigate the high cost of fuel, the Intercolonial railway authorities added an extra freight rate of 50 cents a ton upon coal, thus considerably increasing the burden of the people. May I ask the Minister of Railways and Canals if that rate still continues, and if so, whether the order bringing it into force will be rescinded?

Mr. COCHRANE: It is true that the rate was increased. The reason was that we had to increase the wages of our employees within the last two months to the extent of over $2,000,000. We also had to meet an increased cost of coal of over $1,000,000. Upon representations, however, made by the fuel controller and other persons, we have agreed to allow the old rate to stand until the 1st of August, after which an increased rate—between 30 and 40 cents a ton less than the first increase—will be put into effect.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

The House in Committee on Bill No. 13, to consolidate and amend the Railway Act. —Hon. Frank Cochrane (resumed from Monday, July 16.)

Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

On section 302—Regularity in train time.

Mr. HERMENEGILDE BOULAY (translation): Mr. Chairman, allow me to call your attention to subsection 2 of section 302 which is of very great importance to the travelling public, in the province of Quebec. Monday last, when we were in committee on the Bill, I stated that it would be proper to amend this subsection, so as to make it more satisfactory to the travelling public in my province. The proposed amendment would affect exclusively the province of Quebec and I fail to see that it could cause any inconvenience in the other parts of Canada. I hope the suggestion will be considered to be in the best interest of the public. I do not expect that any member from the province of Quebec will oppose the amendment; I rather believe that it will meet the views of all.

The amendment that I suggest affects only the province of Quebec. Members from that province know the inconvenience that has been suffered in the past by the travelling public in that section of the country by reason of the fact that a great many of the conductors, brakemen, baggage masters, station agents and ticket agents cannot understand the language of persons boarding and leaving trains. This amendment would effect a great improvement over present conditions. Several times I have acted as interpreter on behalf of persons who were travelling, because railway employees were unable to understand them. Every company moving trains in the province of Quebec should require its employees to understand both languages. They would have no difficulty in selecting from amongst their own employees persons who could speak both languages. Subsection 2 of this section reads:

Every railway company shall print in both the English and French languages the time tables that are to be used along its lines within the limits of the province of Quebec.

I move that this subsection be amended by adding thereto the following words:

And all employees coming in contact with the travelling public shall understand both official languages of the country.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: We all appreciate the splendid motive of the member for Rimouski (Mr. Boulay) in submitting this amendment. But I direct my hon. friend's attention to subsection 2 of this section, which he has just read, also subsection 3 of section 303 is as follows:

Such notices—

Referring to the blackboard notices at the stations.

—shall, in the province of Quebec, be written in the English and French languages, and in the other provinces in English.

Subsection 4 of section 347 is as follows:

Railway companies shall print in both the English and French languages the bills of lading that are to be used along their lines within the limits of the province of Quebec.

If the amendment proposed by the hon. gentleman were adopted, some difficulty might be experienced by railway crews, especially those on trains running in and out of Montreal. On the trains, for instance, running between Montreal and Toronto, the crews would be obliged to speak both languages. The same would apply to the crews on Canadian Pacific railway trains running from Montreal to Ottawa, New York and Portland.

The Transcontinental line, both east and west of Quebec, and the Intercolonial would require crews who were able to speak both languages. While we should all be glad to know that the crews could speak both French and English, we must not forget that if this amendment carried it would mean that the crews of the trains leaving such cities as Montreal and Quebec would have to be composed entirely of French Canadians, and that might seriously interfere with the crews in the other provinces. I have been speaking with the representatives of the different railway brotherhoods since the hon. member proposed this amendment a few days ago, and they were unanimously opposed to it. They claim that if the crews leaving the large cities of the province of Quebec are to be composed of French Canadians, the labour organizations will likely demand that the crews in the English-speaking provinces be entirely English-speaking. I respectfully urge my hon. friend not to press his motion at this time.

Mr. NESBITT: In clause 302, with which we are dealing, there is a provision that the time tables and instructions shall be printed in both languages. What more do we want?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Boulay) has moved an amendment to clause 302 to the effect that both languages shall be spoken by the crews on the railroads running through the province of Quebec.

Mr. NESBITT: Is there any serious trouble under the present system? We have had it for a long while.

Mr. PAQUET (translation): Mr. Chairman, I approve entirely of the amendment moved by my hon. friend from Rimouski (Mr. Boulay). I have myself witnessed of late unfortunate occurrences due to the fact that the railway employees could not understand what the passengers meant. Now the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) has just made a statement; but I think we could request the hon Minister of Railways and Canals to do his best to have that amendment inserted in the Act, for the greater convenience of the travelling public in the province of Quebec.

Mr. BOULAY (translation): Mr. Chairman, I think the point raised by the hon. member for Lambton can very easily be met. He states that he has been conferring with people connected with organizations of railway men; I admit that if he has been conferring with English-speaking people only, he may well have found that they did not favour such an amendment to our Railway Act. I can readily understand that; but I am satisfied that he has not met any of the French-speaking employees or representative members of the railway associations in the province of Quebec. I am positive as to that. So his objection may hold good as regards the other provinces, but we in the province of Quebec we know what our requirements are. We know the requirements of our province. Although it might be objectionable with regard to the other provinces, there is no good reason why all the employees of the railroads running through the province of Quebec should not speak both languages, especially as the time tables and instructions are printed in both English and French. It is very inconvenient when employees who are coming in contact with the travelling public every day cannot speak the French language. There is not much force in the objection that the men coming from the United States would have difficulty in understanding the French language, because if the proper class of men cannot be got in the United States, they can be got in Canada, and that would be to the advantage of this country. I am not proposing that the railway companies be taken by the throat. I would be quite satisfied if this amendment were to come into force on January 1, 1919. I travel through the province of New Brunswick nearly every week during recess, and I know that in Campbellton it has been found necessary to employ men speaking both languages. This has been found to be a great convenience to the travelling public, and in the interests of the Intercolonial itself. If we give the railroad employees time to qualify themselves in both languages I do not see what harm can come to this amendment, and it would certainly be a great convenience to the travelling public and the country as a whole.

Mr. MARCIL: To appreciate this question properly, our friends from Ontario should think for a moment of the condition passengers would be in if a Frenchman who could not understand English was in charge of a train running through Ontario. That would not be in the interests of the passengers or of the country. In the province of Quebec, although a large number of our people speak the English language, unfortunately a great many do not, especially those from the rural parts of the province, and the district of Quebec in particular. The result is that a conductor in charge of a train may have a car full of people with whom he is unable to communicate. Having regard to the fact that railroad companies operating in the province of Quebec already print their time tables, bills of lading, posters, and so on in both languages to facilitate the transaction of business, I see no reason why the train crews should not be required to speak both French and English. It is very awkward for people who are stranded at a railway station and are unable to make themselves understood.

Mr. NESBITT: Do not nearly all the railway men understaand French?

Mr. MARCIL: The ticket sellers, of course, are able to speak both languages, and the conductors as well; that is elementary. I do not want to be harsh; a certain length of time should be allowed the railway companies in which to make this change. My experience is that a large number of the old conductors who have been employed on the roads in the province of Quebec for the last thirty or forty years can speak both languages, but men are being brought in more and more from western Canada who are unable to speak French, and that is a great inconvenience to the travelling public and the public generally.

If the matter were properly placed before the Canadian labour unions and if they understood it, I certainly think they would not object to the encouragement of the learning of both languages, especially in the province of Quebec, because it is evident that it is to a man's own interest if he wants to do any business that he should be able to speak both languages. I think it should be encouraged on the railways, because after all the railways deal with the public. The Minister of Railways might give the companies fair warning that in a year or a year and a half the ticket seller and the conductor at least—those who come in direct contact with the public—should understand the two languages.

Mr. PROULX: I am strongly in favour of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Boulay).

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: I do not want it understood that I am opposed to the crews being able to speak the French language. I should think it would be a very great advantage if they could do so. I merely called the attention of the committee to the position in which the railroads are placed at the present time, especially on the main lines in and out of important cities in Quebec. To pass this amendment would be to say that nobody but French Canadians should be employed on railroads in the province of Quebec. The result would be that the railway unions, the large majority of whose membership are English-speaking, would be sure to retaliate and prevent French Canadians from being employed outside the province of Quebec.

Mr. MARCIL: There are a large number of English-speaking Canadians in the province of Quebec who can speak both languages. It is a great mistake to imagine that only the French Canadians speak both languages.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: I am quite well aware of that fact. What I called the attention of the committee to is the fact that the representatives of the railway unions are strongly opposed to an amendment of this nature being placed in the Bill.

Mr. WRIGHT: When the matter was up before I suggested that it might very well be left in the hands of the Railway Commission, and if they had not the power to deal with it, such power might be conferred upon them. We can very well see it might be a great hardship to put a clause of this kind in as an ironclad rule. Take, for instance, a train leaving Halifax for Vancouver; because it ran through a portion of Quebec for an hour or two, would it be right to compel the crew to be able to speak the French language? Might it not be a very great hardship indeed, and interfere with the running arrangements of such trains? On the local trains running between cities in Quebec it would be no great hardship to a railway if it had to have men who could speak both French and English, and I can understand that such an order might very well be made. At the same time I think it should be left in the hands of the Railway Commission.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I wish to thank my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. Wright) for the very sensible remarks he has made, and I think it would be well if my hon. friend from Rimouski were to accept his suggestion. If a provision were placed in the Act whereby the Railway Commission might regulate this matter, we would come to a satisfactory conclusion, because the province of Quebec is represented on the commission and I am sure the interests of the province would be well looked after. I may assure the committee this question is not brought forward with the idea of raising a vexed question. There is a real grievance in some cases. I quite agree with my hon. friend that we cannot expect a bilingual crew on a train leaving Halifax or St. John for Vancouver, yet one must recollect that on a long-haul train partial changes of crews are made. A conductor might take the train from Halifax to Montreal, and be relieved there, so it would simply be a matter of arrangement. It might be arranged that when a train reaches the boundary line between New Brunswick and Quebec a conductor speaking both languages would be put in charge. Certain grievances on this subject have been made public. Two cases were given a little more publicity than the others. One concerned some young boys coming home from college, and the other was a case of gross misconduct on the part of a conductor on the Canadian Northern Railway. In the first instance, some students were going from Rigaud to Montreal. They were threatened with arrest by the conductor of the train because they could not understand him, and he insisted that they should understand him. The doors of the car were locked, and had it not been for the intervention of a gentleman whose name was mentioned, those boys would have been arrested when they reached Montreal, because, according to the conductor, they had refused to pay their fares. The case which happened on the Canadian Northern was on a new line in a new district. The conductor was ignorant of the language of the passengers, and on the occasion referred to he handled very roughly one of the passengers who did not understand him. When the remonstrance was made to the company in Toronto they took the matter up and the answer was very satisfactory. Apologies were made, and the company promised that such conduct would not be renewed. These are only two instances which occur to my mind at the present time as tending to show there certainly are grievances.

But as the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. Wright) stated, the local conditions could be looked after if the power was given to the Railway Board to deal with such conditions. I would be agreeable to accepting that suggestion, and I would suggest to my hon. friend from Rimouski that he amend his motion accordingly. It is well that this grievance be met before the committee, because certainly there has been some wild talk of late about it on the various trains.

Mr. GREEN: I am not in favour of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Boulay), nor am I in favour of the suggestion made by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. Wright). This is a matter that should be left as it is. I see no reason for making it the law that the people in charge of the trains should speak both languages. I quite agree that it would be an advantage, and that it is just and right that where necessary the train officials should speak both languages. But surely that is a matter that should be left to the railway company who are handling the business of the road. If it is necessary to their business to have men speaking two languages, whether they be French and English or other language that may be necessary in some particular portions of Canada, surely we can leave it to the railway companies to see that the public is being served. I do not think it would be right for this House to put upon the statute books a law making it necessary for the railway companies in all cases, either in Quebec or any other province, to have men in their service who could speak both languages.

Mr. MARCIL: I approve of the suggestion made by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. Wright), and supported by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux). I think the Railway Board would have no hesitation in declaring that local trains should be in charge of a conductor, and that the tickets should be sold by a ticket seller, who could understand the passengers. I am prepared to leave it to the board to say how trains running beyond the limits of the province of Quebec should be manned.

Mr. COCHRANE: There is a certain degree of unfairness in insisting upon this. Many trains leaving Montreal get out of the province of Quebec long before the time comes for changing the conductors and other officials. There are three or four trains a day going out of Montreal on the Canadian Pacific and Grand Trunk, and there will be on the Canadian Northern, in regard to which the conditions are as I have described them. It is not as it is with the Intercolonial. For the Intercolonial, I would accept the proposal right off as far as running in the province of Quebec is concerned, because we run several hundred miles through that province. But, it is a different proposition in regard to the trains running out of Montreal. Unless there is a wide latitude given to the Railway Commission, I would not want to agree to the amendment. On Intercolonial trains running through the province of Quebec, it is all right, but on trains running between Montreal, Toronto and Ottawa it would be very objectionable.

Mr. MARCIL: I understand the minister to agree that with reference to local trains in the province of Quebec the amendment might apply but that the question with reference to trains running outside of the province should be dealt with by the Railway Commission.

Mr. COCHRANE: I did not say that.

Mr. MARCIL: I did not quite understand the hon. gentleman.

Mr. COCHRANE: I said that with regard to trains in the province of Quebec there was no objection to it, but that with regard to trains running out of Montreal to Toronto, Ottawa and the Coast it is unfair to ask it. These trains are only in the province for three or four hours, at the most, after leaving Montreal.

Mr. BOULAY: The hon. member for Kootenay (Mr. Green) said a few moments ago that we had better leave it to the company. It has been left to the companies for the past forty or fifty years and no improvement has been made yet. We start from Ottawa and at the car door we meet a man who speaks only one language. When we start from Montreal to come to Ottawa, although it is in our own province of Quebec, we meet the same man, we are confronted with the same situation—and if we speak only French how can we be understood? These companies that are running trains from Ottawa to Montreal have been running them for a great many years. Of course they do not lose passengers; they have the same number of passengers all the time; it does not cause any harm to their traffic, but it causes harm and annoyance to the passengers. Those of us who travel in the province of Quebec have witnessed the annoyance caused to the passengers and this has been going on for the last forty or fifty-five years. We do not ask this change for the province of Ontario or New Brunswick; we are asking it for our own province. If the companies running trains from Montreal to Ottawa cannot of themselves see that it is nothing but just to give us men who understand both languages, it is up to the Government to force them to do it. I do not say that those operating trains from Montreal to Toronto or Hamilton or Vancouver should be able to speak both languages, but those who are running trains from Montreal to Ottawa or from Ottawa to Maniwaki in the province of Quebec should be able to understand the passengers who board their trains. I appreciate the remarks of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane) as to the Intercolonial, and I thank him for what he has done. At the present time we do not lack these advantages on the Intercolonial; we have men on the trains of that line who are able to understand both languages. If the Intercolonial, starting at Montreal, and running through the province of Quebec, has been able to get men who can understand both languages, it is just as easy for the Canadian Pacific, the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Northern to get the same class of men. I heard the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) the other day saying: Let us know what other grievances you have in the province of Quebec and we will be ready to remove them at once. This is one of the grievances we have. Imagine the difficulties on board a train of a poor lady or a man who does not speak any English. They are confronted with a conductor, or a station agent, or ticket seller, who does not understand what they say, and if they do not get what they want they are displeased.

Quite often disagreements and even serious quarrels arise because these two people cannot understand each other. Members of the House, I think, will realize that I am right in my contention, and I do not think that members from other provinces should interfere in a matter of this kind, which relates only to the province of Quebec.

Mr. MARCIL: The section and the amendment might both stand in order that a provision may be drafted which will satisfy every one.

Mr. COCHRANE: If the amendment referred to local trains wholly within the province of Quebec, I should accept it, but it does not seem desirable to apply such a provision to interprovincial or international trains.

Mr. MARCIL: Probably the Board of Railway Commissioners would order that on local trains in Quebec the conductors at least should understand both languages.

Mr. COCHRANE: That is not the proposition.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It is quite possible that we could agree on an amendment which would not interfere with international trains. So far as local trains are concerned, I think we can agree.

Mr. COCHRANE: So far as local trains are concerned, I would agree to it right away.

Section stands.

[Mr. Boulay.]

On section 303—Posting information about late trains.

Mr. BOULAY: This section provides that the station master must write up the time when a train that is late will arrive at his station. I think that that information should be posted up at every station in relation to all trains, whether they are late or not.

Mr. COCHRANE: The time the train is due is always put there.

Mr. NESBITT: The time the train is due to arrive is marked on the board, and if the train is late they mark on the board the time it will arrive.

Mr. BOULAY: Not at all the stations.

Mr. NESBITT: In the country stations they are not very particular about marking the time on the board, but there are very few people at those stations, and they get the information from the stationmaster.

Mr. CARVELL: Has the hon. gentleman ever found any grievance over this? It is the first time I have heard the question raised. On all the roads I have had anything to do with they have the time placed on the board in different columns. The first column is headed "due to arrive," or "due to leave," and then another column is headed "will arrive at." When trains are on time they will simply say "on time." Every passenger is entitled to a time table, and he knows when the train is due to arrive and due to leave. It is only necessary to mark the board when the train is not on time. It seems to me the section goes far enough. The section provides that if the train is not going to leave when it is scheduled to leave notice should be given.

Mr. BOULAY: It is all right for the hon. gentleman from Carleton and those who travel much, but I am speaking for the common classes. At the very large stations the time of arrival is placed on the board, but that is not done at the small stations. At the present time a stationmaster is not obliged to mark the time the train is due, and therefore it will not be reported until the train is late. But the poor traveller who comes ten or twenty miles has no time table in his pocket. Many times when we ask the stationmaster for a time table he has none. I asked for a time table here at Ottawa to get the time of the trains running from here to Montreal and I could not get one.

Mr. CARVELL: I think it is provided in the law that there must be a printed timetable at every station. My hon. friend is thinking about the Intercolonial. It is only a sort of half railway anyhow. When the hon. gentleman gets on a railway where they run trains properly, he would not find any difficulty, and this law does not affect the Intercolonial. I think the section is all right as it stands.

Section agreed to.

On Section 310—Trains or cars moving reversely.

Mr. ARMSTRONG: The words of the first part of the section have been transposed and the words "which is not adequately protected by gates or otherwise" have been inserted. In committee we struck out the words in the second line of the old Act, "moving forward in the ordinary manner," and also in the fifth line "or of the tender if that is in front." This matter was fully discussed by the representatives of the Brotherhood, and it was decided that in the general interest this should be struck out.

Mr. CARVELL: It does not change the meaning at all, but the committee thought it would be much clearer if the section read as it appears in the Bill. Under this section it makes no difference whether it is the tender or freight car that is foremost on the train, the part of the car which is foremost shall have a man stationed on it.

Section agreed to.

On section 311—Obstruction of highway traffic.

Mr. MARCIL: Is there anything stipulating the time a train may be held up when crossing a road?

Mr. ARMSTRONG: Five minutes.

Mr. MARCIL: It does not apply to the Intercolonial. I know at Matapedia the trains are held up for some time.

Mr. NESBITT: They are held up all over.

Mr. COCHRANE: The Intercolonial is not the only road where the trains are held up.

Section agreed to.

On Section 312—Traffic, tolls and tariffs: Accommodation for traffic.

Mr. ARMSTRONG: There are changes of more or less importance, largely at the suggestion of Mr. Hardwell, the traffic expert of the Railway Commission, after discussion with the board. While in committee an important change was made in the wording. The following words are added as paragraph (e) of subsection 1:

> Furnish such other service incidental to transportation as is customary or usual in connection with the business of a railway company.

This was thought in the public interest, and referred to the milling in transit matter which was brought before the committee at the instance of several prominent men from different cities in Canada.

Mr. CARVELL: When that came up it was to be handed over to the traffic manager of the board. I have not had an opportunity of comparing the two. Were any changes made in the section as it left the committee?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: This is placed in the reprinted Bill as paragraph (e). The clause formerly read:

> Furnish such other service as may be customary or usual in connection with the business of a railway company.

It was amended to read:

> Furnish such other service incidental to transportation as is customary or usual in connection with the business of a railway company.

Mr. CARVELL: That is right; I was present when that amendment was made.

Section agreed to.

On section 314—Equality as to tolls and facilities.

Mr. MARCIL: Is it under this clause that the Board of Railway Commissioners are authorized to permit branch railways to charge very high rates in the winter season?

Mr. COCHRANE: They cannot put on a tariff without submitting it to the board.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Branch line railways, especially some in the province of Quebec, that can now make almost any freight charge they like, will, after this Bill becomes law, be brought under the jurisdiction of the Railway Commission, because of their being connected with the Transcontinental lines.

Mr. MARCIL: I refer to the railway line in Bonaventure and Gaspé counties. The rates on this line are certainly higher than they are on the main line of the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. COCHRANE: Has it a Dominion charter?

Mr. MARCIL: Yes.

Mr. COCHRANE: Then it must submit its rates to the board.

Mr. CARVELL: This section provides only that there shall be equality of rates and tolls upon each road. For instance, the railroad that my hon. friend speaks about must charge all persons the same rate or toll. Another section provides that all rates shall be subject to the control of the Railway Commission.

Mr. MARCIL: What I wanted to know was under what principle the Board of Railway Commissioners authorized these small lines to charge rates almost double those charged on the main line. The minister must appreciate the disadvantage to the people which results from the imposition of such high freights.

Mr. COCHRANE: You have the right to go to the commission and demand that the rates shall be made right.

Mr. MARCIL: Under this clause?

Mr. COCHRANE: No.

Mr. MARCIL: Has the section so providing been adopted?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 323—Tariffs; general provisions.

Mr. MARCIL: May I again ask why there is such a difference between the summer and the winter rate on some of these branch lines? Can an extra rate be imposed by a company of its own authority, or must any proposed increase be authorized by the Board?

Mr. COCHRANE: All tariffs of all roads have to be authorized by the commission.

Mr. MARCIL: Why should freights be higher at one season of the year than they are at another?

Mr. COCHRANE: It costs more to run a short line than it does to run a long one.

Section agreed to.

On section 331—Special freight tariffs.

Mr. COCHRANE: I move that subsection 3 of this section be amended by adding thereto the following words:

Provided that where objection to any such tariff is filed with the Board, the burden of proof justifying the proposed advances shall be upon the company filing said tariff.

Amendment agreed to. Section as amended agreed to.

[Mr. Cochrane.]

On section 332—Competitive tariffs.

Mr. CARVELL: I have often wondered by what process of reasoning the Board will allow a company to give a rate to or from a competitive point very much lower than the rate charged for a greater distance to a non-competitive point.

Mr. COCHRANE: It is because of the water tariff.

Mr. CARVELL: No, there are hundreds of places in Canada which are called competitive points; that is, they are touched by two railways. The Railway Board allows the companies to charge 50 cents a hundred, we will say, from these competitive points. Now, I cannot see why the companies should not be compelled to carry the same quantity of freight, no matter whether in carload or broken lots, for the same rate from a non-competitive point, but instead of that the companies are allowed to charge a very much higher rate for carrying the freight a considerably less distance. I know enough about railways to know the arguments they put forward in justification of this. They say that it is necessary to give a lower rate at a competitive point in order to get the business. They lose money, they say, at some of these competitive points, and must be allowed to make up for it at some other place, and so they strike at the poor fellow who does not happen to be at a competitive point. I know the arguments that the railways advance, and the facts as they exist. Does not the minister feel that some change ought to be made? I know I am raising a big question, but I know the minister is able to handle it.

Mr. COCHRANE: I do not know so much about competitive points as about rail and water points.

Mr. CARVELL: The same principle is involved.

Mr. COCHRANE: For instance, you can get the same rate from Montreal to the Soo as from Montreal to Sudbury, although the Soo is 180 miles further. The reason for that is that shippers can send their goods by rail or water. I suppose it is about the same with competitive points on the railways. One road establishes a rate, and another company can come along with a cheaper rate.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not think the minister catches my point. We all know that water transportation is cheaper than rail transportation. There is no doubt whatever that during the navigation season freight can be delivered from Montreal to the Soo much cheaper by water than by rail, and if the railways are to do business at all they must be allowed to file a tariff to meet the water rate. But that is not the point I am making. The Railway Board will allow the companies to quote a lower rate from Montreal or Ottawa to Vankleek Hill, for instance, than the rate charged to a non-competitive point which is at a considerable less distance. I have often wondered why that was allowed. I know that the business with which I was connected in my own province some years ago, a foundry and machine shop, was practically driven out of business through our competitors in the lower part of the province being able to send their products to Edmundston very much cheaper than we could send ours to points a hundred miles nearer. We were not at a competitive point, and had to pay a local freight rate to get our goods in, and another local freight rate to get them out. Our competitors could get their freight to the distributing point at Edmundston very much cheaper than we could, alhough it had to be hauled twice as far. That has been going on ever since I was a boy, and I presume that unless somebody like the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Boulay) raises a big row about it—and I think if he took this matter up he might achieve some results—the same condition will continue. It does not seem to me to be right; I think there should be some levelling up of the rates. I cannot see why a man who lives at a non-competitive point should be compelled to pay from twenty to thirty per cent more in freight rates than his competitor who lives a few miles further on at a competitive point.

Mr. NESBITT: It is no doubt true, as my hon. friend says, that a proportionately higher rate is charged at a non-competitive point than at a competitive point, but I have sometimes seen a proportionately less rate at a non-competitive point than at a competitive point.

Mr. COCHRANE: I never saw that.

Mr. NESBITT: I have had the experience.

Mr. WRIGHT: I think my hon. friend should file that case, and mark it as Exhibit "A."

Section agreed to.

On section 346—Members of Parliament and Board, etc., free.

Mr. CARVELL: Why was that change made? Why should a member of Parliament furnish his card? If he happened to leave it at home he might be put off the train unless he paid his fare.

Mr. COCHRANE: How would the conductor know him?

Mr. CARVELL: The conductors should surely know a member of Parliament. However, I think I can see the object of making the change. There is one point I want to bring up, not that I advocate it, but I think there should be some discussion upon it. In the rural sections of Canada it very often becomes necessary to travel on trains other than the ordinary passenger trains. I have frequently found that I would like to travel on accommodation trains, or even on freight trains. The railway company with which I have to deal has been very nice about it. I would simply send a wire or a telephone message to the superintendent and the privilege was invariably granted. I have to comply with that formula, or the conductor would be infringing his regulations, and it would only get him in wrong if I had not the authority. I would like to know if the question has ever been raised as to whether our certificates entitle us to ride upon freight trains as well as on passenger trains. The law says "free transportation on any of the trains of the company." That is very broad.

Mr. McCRANEY: I have had occasion to travel on freight trains in western Canada, and I always offered them my pass as the certificate of my right to do so. It has never been questioned. The conductors in our part of the country take it for granted that we are authorized to ride on freight trains.

I would like to ask the minister if there has been any trouble over the showing of the certificate of a member of Parliament. I think if a member of Parliament is known to a conductor there is no reason why his pass should be shown. If he happened to leave it at home, why should he not be carried without it, if he is known to the conductor?

Mr. NESBITT: As a matter of fact if they know him they do not look at his pass.

Mr. McCRANEY: I know they do not. What I want to know is why should this be in the Act? A member of Parliament gets on a train and, although he is known to the conductor, the Act says he shall not be carried unless he produces his certificate or pass.

Mr. COCHRANE: I do not think it is very unfair to ask a passenger to produce his ticket or his pass. I think the railway companies are only asking what is their right, and it would be going rather far to ask them to forego it.

Mr. McCRANEY: Of course, the pass is not taken up.

Mr. COCHRANE: But it is a voucher for the transportation. The conductor takes the number of it. How many of us know the numbers of our passes? I certainly do not know mine.

Mr. GRAHAM: You have a bagful of them.

Mr. McCRANEY: It is all very well for ministers who travel in private cars, and who do not need passes. I know I have frequently left my pass at home, and I do not want to be under any obligation to the conductor to produce it. I am satisfied no member of Parliament would be so unreasonable as to refuse to show his pass if it were required.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: One reason for this change in this Bill is that conductors complained that occasionally they were put in an embarrassing position when passengers claiming to be members produced no cards of identification. In addition to that, the rules laid down by the railways are very strict.

Mr. McCRANEY: If I got on a train and did not have my pass, and the conductor did not know me, I would pay my fare, take a voucher from the conductor, and ask for a refund, under the section as it stood before. I would not be entitled to a refund under the section as it stands now. If a member of Parliament is not known to the conductor, and has not his certificate, it is only proper that the fare should be paid, and the member entitled to a refund.

Mr. CRUISE: Has the conductor the right to lift your pass?

Mr. GRAHAM: If he suspects it is presented by any person but the rightful holder.

Mr. CRUISE: The conductors on the Canadian Northern lift your transportation.

Mr. NESBITT: On the Canadian Northern they are the quintessence and boiled down essence of a nuisance.

Mr. CRUISE: I was coming down to Winnipeg not long ago, and the conductor lifted my pass and forgot to give it to me in the morning. I had to come through to Ottawa without it. I happened to be with the hon. member for Edmonton, who vouched for me to the conductor on the Grand Trunk Pacific, and I came through in that way. I do not think every time we get off a train we should have to go to the conductor or the porter to get our certificates back.

Mr. GRAHAM: I think they lift the passes in order to avoid arousing the passengers when a new conductor comes on.

Mr. CRUISE: Why would it not be sufficient to simply take the number?

Mr. GRAHAM: They make an arrangement between themselves by which conductor No. 1 hands the transportation on to conductor No. 2, so that the new conductor does not disturb the passengers.

Mr. COCHRANE: They do it for your comfort. It is the fault absolutely of the new conductor if you do not get back your pass. The object of taking the pass is to make it unnecessary to arouse the passenger from his sleep.

Mr. NESBITT: There is only one road in Canada that insists on taking up your card when you go to bed at night.

Mr. COCHRANE: There is not a road that does not do it.

Mr. NESBITT: There is only one road that does it—the Canadian Northern. Every other conductor takes the number of your pass and hands it back. That is the way they do on the Canadian Pacific and the Grand Trunk everywhere in Canada. The Canadian Northern only have coloured men on their cars and they insist on taking up your card. It is absurd. They could take your number just as well as they do on the trains of other companies. The Canadian Northern ought to correct their instructions because they are a nuisance. They are liable to leave you in the lurch in the morning and not give you back your card because the porter is off duty and some other fellow is in his place. While this includes the Clerk of the House of Commons, it does not include the assistant clerk. I see no reason why it should not.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Rainville): It does not include the Clerk.

Mr. NESBITT: No, it does not; I read that wrongly.

The CHAIRMAN: They should be included.

Mr. NESBITT: I should think that the Clerk of the House of Commons and his assistants might be included.

Mr. COCHRANE: It has never been done; I do not object to doing it.

Mr. NESBITT: I do not see why they should not be included, Mr. Minister. Will you make a note of that?

Mr. COCHRANE: All right.

Mr. McCRANEY: Will the minister hold up this clause? I do not want to be unreasonable with the officials on the trains or to say that because a man says he is a member of Parliament he should be allowed to travel free. My hon. friend from Dauphin (Mr. Cruise) claims that the porter on the train holds the transportation of a member of Parliament, and if the member gets on another train without his card, under this section he has no redress. I think that ought to be changed.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I have no sympathy with the position of my hon. friend from Saskatoon (Mr. McCraney). I think a member ought to carry his pass in his pocket, and if he is too careless to keep it in his pocket he should pay. If he does not get it back it will not do very much harm. It would be a very good thing if he did pay something to the railways now and then. I do not see any reason why this section should not be adopted.

Mr. MARCIL: I remember that the late Mr. Bergeron, then member for Beauharnois, raised this question before the opening of the doors because it was a question of privilege and he wanted it discussed before the galleries were occupied. He made the suggestion that there should be one card issued to the members for the whole of Canada so that members would not have to carry about twenty-five or thirty different passes, and the suggestion was accepted by the late Mr. Blair, then Minister of Railways. I think it is only reasonable that a member should carry his one pass; in the old days a member had to carry a whole pack of cards.

Mr. CRUISE: I would like to know whether the railway conductor has a right to lift transportation or not.

Mr. COCHRANE: I do not think he has a right to do it. He only does it for your comfort. If the conductor changes in the night it saves you from being awakened.

Mr. CRUISE: There is something wrong about the situation. They have a habit of lifting my transportation and not giving it back. On the train from Dauphin to Winnipeg there is only a porter, and there is no change of porters during the trip.

Mr. COCHRANE: Is there a conductor too?

Mr. CRUISE: There is no pullman conductor but there is the regular train conductor. They have known me perfectly well for twenty years, and still they insist—

Mr. GRAHAM: That is the reason.

Mr. CRUISE:—still they insist on lifting my transportation. I have no objection if they have a right to do so.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: I do not think any of these porters or conductors claim to have that right. I took the question up with one of them on one occasion and he said: We have no right to do it, but if we take your certificate we will not have to call you up. I do not see any reason for taking up the certificate merely because some other conductor is coming on; the fact that you produce your certificate to one conductor should be sufficient. Sometimes the pullman car conductor claims that he is obliged to satisfy the conductor of the train that my certificate is all right and that therefore it is necessary for him to take it. Of course they admit that it is my property, not his, and he has no right to hold it. I see no reason why they should hold that certificate, because any official who is placed in the train should be such a thoroughly reliable man that the conductor could depend on him; otherwise the company have no business having him there. When he satisfies himself that you have a certificate, that should satisfy the company. He is the servant and agent of the company, and if it is necessary we should have a further measure to make this obligatory on the railways. The officials have no right to disturb you after you have once produced your certificate.

Mr. WRIGHT: I want to refer again to the point as to whether members of Parliament have the right to travel on freight trains. I was absolutely refused the right to travel on a freight train and the conductor informed me he had special instructions from the company to permit no member of Parliament to ride on his train. I discussed the matter with the late member for Lincoln, Mr. Lancaster, who was considered a railway authority. He said that in his judgment I would never succeed in any action I might take against the railway company for damages. He thought that the interpretation that would be put upon the clause by any court would be that the right of a member of Parliament to travel would apply only to passenger trains.

Mr. GRAHAM: The advice was right.

Mr. WRIGHT: I did not think it was at that time. If that is the law I am satisfied, but I think it ought to be made perfectly clear what our rights are in that regard. I happened to be passing backward and forward to and from my home, and arriving at a junction I had to stay there, within 16 miles of my home, for eight or nine hours. A freight train passes at such an hour that I could make close connections, which would save me all of that time every time I go to my home. I should like to know my rights in that regard.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend has no rights on a freight train.

Mr. COCHRANE: It says "on any of the trains of the company."

Mr. GRAHAM: He has the rights under this pass that any man has who buys a ticket, except that perhaps he could not claim damages. No other citizen can be carried on a freight train, and consequently I say that my hon. friend has no right, on his pass, on the freight train. The presence of a passenger in a caboose on one of the modern heavy freight trains might divert the attention of the crew from their duties, and it must be remembered that if the right were granted to members of Parliament to travel on freight trains, citizens who purchase tickets might demand the same right, and what answer could we make to them?

Mr. BOULAY: I do not entirely agree with my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham), because this section of the law applies to all trains. It is sometimes very convenient and in the interests both of the member of Parliament and of the public that he should be able to reach some small place in his constituency that can only be reached at a convenient time by travelling on a freight train. I see no objection to a member of Parliament riding in a caboose, if he wishes to take the risk of boarding and alighting from it, and so on. I should like to know what rights the railways have in the matter of charging for excess baggage. We have all a considerable weight of baggage sometimes.

Mr. GRAHAM: Particularly going home.

Mr. BOULAY: You do not mean that we are robbers?

Mr. GRAHAM: No, I was just suggesting that we nave the baggage one way or the other.

Mr. BOULAY: I understand from the reading of the Act that we are allowed to carry all our baggage, but should it exceed the amount allowed to the general public the railways charge excess on it. Then, too, if we leave our baggage in a station for more than twenty-four hours, we are charged storage.

Mr. GRAHAM: I cannot see why there should be any charm about the baggage of a member of Parliament any more than about that of the ordinary man paying a fare. Why should I ask a railway to carry for me a piece of extra baggage when my neighbour, who has paid for his ticket, has to pay for his extra baggage? If we get for nothing the same privileges that the ordinary man pays for I think we are going as far as we ought to ask. As to the contention that the law contemplates that railways shall carry members of Parliament on freight trains, I think that my hon. friend in any court would find that the meaning of " any train " in this clause is any train that carries passengers.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I share entirely the views expressed by the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) about this privilege enjoyed by the members. It is a very liberal law, indeed, which allows members of Parliament to travel free on all railways in Canada. I have some sympathy with the case brought up by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Cruise). I understand from the Minister of Railways that this is a matter for regulation, and that the companies are not entitled to the privilege of lifting the certificate of a member. As to baggage, the allowance in Canada, in fact on this continent, is very much more liberal than it is in Europe, where you have to pay for any baggage in excess of a handbag.

Mr. CARVELL: In Europe they take the rest in the car with them.

Mr. LEMIEUX: They allow only a certain amount in the car. The treatment of the Canadian public by the railways in this respect is exceedingly liberal.

Mr. CARVELL: I did not intend to precipitate a discussion of this kind to-day. It is all very well for members in the millionaire class, like the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) and the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) to talk about these matters as they do; they do not care whether they have a right to travel on railways free or not. But consider the ordinary poor solicitor-farmer member, the common people—it means something to us.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I hope my hon. friend will repeat that at the bank.

Mr. CARVELL: As to the right of a member of Parliament to travel on freight trains, or on any except regular passenger trains, I wish to say a word.

I have no fault to find with anything. I have never been refused transportation, and have received every courtesy from the railways. Sometimes they do not ask me to sign the release, but I always insist on signing it. I have taken the view of the hon. gentleman from Renfrew (Mr. Graham), that I have not the legal right to travel on a freight train, but I thought I would like to raise the discussion. The Railway Department may know something about the view the railway companies take of this question.

Mr. COCHRANE: I do not think the hon. member is entitled to ride on freight trains, and I do not think he should be allowed to do it.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

On section 302—regularity in train time.

Mr. COCHRANE: I move that the following be added to this section:

All railway employees on local passenger trains running in the province of Quebec, having to deal with the travelling public, shall be conversant with the English and French languages from and after January 1, 1919.

Amendment agreed to; section as amended agreed to.

On section 346—members of Parliament and board, etc., free:

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: If the minister does not adopt the suggestion of the member for Saskatoon (Mr. McCraney), this section ought to stand. If a member loses his pass or it is taken away from him, I do not think that he should have to pay for his transportation.

Mr. COCHRANE: I think we get enough privileges without asking for any more.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: That is not a privilege. If in ordinary cases a man pays when he should not pay, he may recover from the railway company. If a member mislays his certificate or leaves it behind him, the railway company is nothing out, even if it does make a refund. In any case, I do not see why they should not be compelled to make refund in such cases.

Mr. COCHRANE: I do not think so.

Section agreed to.

On section 348—dangerous goods:

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Sections 348 and 349 refer to the carrying of dangerous commodities. They have been amended to provide that when carrying dynamite, etc., railway companies must conform with the regulations made by the board. The board has issued exhaustive regulations in this matter.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I was shocked some months ago when travelling from Montreal to Ste. Agathe to find that dangerous explosives were being carried on the train. I hope that the Railway Commissioners have adopted very stringent regulations respecting the carrying of such dangerous commodities.

Section agreed to.

On section 350—carriage of mails, troops, equipment, etc.:

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The commission struck out after the word "Canada," on the sixth line, the words "the Commander of the Forces" and inserted the words "the Minister of Militia or the Deputy Minister of Militia."

Mr. GRAHAM: We have two Ministers of Militia now. Does that apply to both?

Mr. ROGERS: This Act only applies to Canada.

Mr. REID: There is only one Minister of Militia. The other is the Overseas Minister of Militia.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is a rather fine distinction to draw in a statute. The Overseas Minister of Militia has all the powers of a minister.

Section agreed to.

On section 358—traffic by water:

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: This section deals with a matter in which I have taken a deep personal interest—water-borne traffic. I hope that at no distant date we shall be able to place the boats on our inland waters under the control of the Railway Commission.

Mr. NESBITT: I think the Toronto Board of Trade wanted section 358 amended.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Possibly the hon. gentleman refers to the amendment which I attempted to have the committee accept. It has been struck out.

Mr. GRAHAM: The Boards of Trade were against it.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: A number of them were.

Mr. GRAHAM: Toronto was.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: It was an organized attack, I believe.

Section agreed to.

On section 373—Lines and wires on highways and public places.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Here an important change is made. It had been held by the Privy Council that "company" in former section 247 was confined to railway company, and that power companies, etc., which were given powers in their special Acts to construct upon highways, could, where there was no restriction in the special Act, do so without any consent or leave and without being put upon any terms or conditions. Old section 248, subsections 2, 3 and 4, put certain limited restrictions on construction of telephone lines, distinguishing between highways in cities, towns, and villages, and highways in other places; and between long-distance or trunk lines, and other lines. The committee struck out after the phrase "line or lines" in the fourth line the clause "for the conveyance of light, heat, power or electricity." Then in paragraph (d) we have the new words "nor without giving at least ten days' previous notice to the owner thereof or to the municipality, nor in any case where forbidden by the board, cut down or mutilate any shade, fruit or ornamental trees, but the board may when it deems proper dispense with such notice and may in any case make any order or direction it deems fit respecting such trees."

Mr. GRAHAM: Cutting down of shade trees by the telephone and telegraph companies is very troublesome to the municipalities. You may have as beautiful a shade tree as you like planted by yourself on the street in front of your house, and then along come the telephone men and cut off perhaps the finest limbs on the tree. It is very difficult to get any satisfaction, and the damage is apparently so small that people usually put up with this practice. In our town many very beautiful elm and maple trees have been practically ruined by the telephone and telegraph repair gangs. These gangs are in many cases composed of men who do not live in the municipality, but are here to-day and gone to-morrow; they spoil your shade tree and away they go, and there seems to be no recourse.

Mr. NESBITT: Why was that line struck out in section 373? Was it not this section the Toronto people were here about?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Section 374 is the one the Toronto people are most interested in.

Mr. CARVELL: Why were the words in subsection 1, "for the conveyance of light, heat, power or electricity" struck out?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: These words were struck out in three different lines of this section. The matter is dealt with in particular, if I remember rightly, in the following section. The telephone and telegraph people were present at the committee and took a very great interest in section 373. Mr. McCarthy of Toronto was also present, and after listening to his argument in favour of the amendment, which was very necessary, he said, the committee struck out the words my hon. friend refers to.

On section 374—company:

Mr. CARVELL: There is a very important change in this section. These two clauses are read together, as was stated by the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. J. E. Armstrong). The first clause of the section gives a definition of a company. It says:

(1) In this section,—
(a) "company" means any person or company having legislative authority from the Parliament of Canada to acquire, construct, operate or maintain works, machinery, plant, lines, poles, tunnels, conduits, or other means for receiving, generating, storing, transmitting, distributing or supplying electricity or other power or energy, but does not include a railway company, or a telegraph company or telephone company.

That is it simply refers to electric light and power companies. It separates telephone and telegraph companies from the others, and cuts it down to dealing expressly with electric light and power companies. I have no hesitation in saying it is the grossest piece of class or local legislation I have ever heard proposed, much less enacted in law, since I came to this Parliament thirteen or fourteen years ago. The Railway Committee in Parliament has for a great many years been trying to carry out the general provision, which says that nothing shall be done in any municipality without the consent of the municipality, and if the parties interested cannot agree they appeal to the Railway Board, and the decision of the Railway Board is final.

That is the only fair and decent way I can imagine of settling these matters. Some difference arose between the city of Toronto and the Toronto Electric Railway Company. There is the Toronto Electric Light, Heat and Power Company, which is closely bound up with the Toronto Electric Railway Company and also with the Toronto and Niagara Power Company, which, I may say, is the father of them all. The explanation given to the committee was that the Ontario Hydro-Electric Commission had spend about five million dollars in the city of Toronto developing the light, heat and power situation, or the city of Toronto, acting under the Hydro Electric Commission, had expended that amount of money. In any event that much money had been spent, and because they had dealt entirely with the Hydro Electric Commission, they ought to be placed in a position different from any other company or any other corporation or municipality in Canada.

Mr. COCHRANE: No, that is not right.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, it is right.

Mr. COCHRANE: The policy is that the municipality should control its own streets.

Mr. CARVELL: But that is not the policy in any other place in Canada, and I challenge the minister to put his finger on a solitary statute where any municipality has the right to control its own streets unless it is subject to an appeal to the Railway Board. I know they will tell you this case stands out by itself, but that does not alter the fact that this company got powers from this Parliament, and started operation in good faith. They spent millions and millions of dollars, and now, because the Hydro-Electric Commission, or the people of Toronto acting under the Hydro-Electric Commission spent about five million dollars, they ought to have the right to say the Toronto Electric Light Company cannot extend their plant or works unless the municipality gives them permission. The municipality told us in so many words they would not give that permission, because they did not want them as competitors, and the sub-committee of this House introduced clause 5 into this Bill simply to give the municipality of Toronto the absolute right to prevent this company from doing business. I protested against it then, and I protest now. I do not suppose my protest will have much weight, but I could not allow class legislation of that character to go through without objection. You may say the city of Toronto ought to have the right to control their own streets. If my hon. friend will take that attitude with every corporation and every municipality in Canada we will discuss it. If he will say there is no appeal of a municipality to the Railway Board, it is debatable, but to say there is an appeal except in the case of Toronto, to prevent a company which has been doing business there for eighteen years from continuing business, I say is class legislation and should not be allowed. The real cause of the trouble is in the definition given in subsection 1, and the amendment in subsection 5. This is so cunningly worded that unless one had been before the sub-committee and had listened to the arguments of the lawyers on both sides one could not tell what it meant. You could not take that section before any court in Canada to-day and get an intelligent interpretation of it unless you had some outside evidence to buttress it up and show what it means. Let me read it:—

(5) The provisions of the last preceding subsection shall apply to and restrict the powers of any company heretofore incorporated by Special Act or other authority of the Parliament of Canada notwithstanding that such provisions may be inconsistent with the provisions of such Special Act or other authority, and notwithstanding the provisions of section three of this Act; and it is hereby declared that the powers of any such company have been so restricted since the date of the enactment of chapter thirty-seven of the Revised Statutes of Canada 1906, that is to say, the thirty-first day of January, 1907.

The only way they could work this out was to make this clause retroactive by ten years. I do not believe such a proposition was ever even mooted, let alone attempted to be enacted in law in this Parliament, and I can only say that so far as I am concerned I shall vote against this subsection.

Mr. NESBITT: Mr. McCarthy and others who appeared with him when this clause was originally before us protested against the introduction of the amendment. They stated that they had sold bonds in England of the Toronto Niagara Power Company for $15,000,000, and we are practically confiscating these bonds.

Mr. COCHRANE: No.

Mr. NESBITT: We are taking away their rights to supply power in Toronto where they are established and that is practically the same thing. I, like my hon. friend (Mr. Carvell), voted against it at the time and I certainly will vote against it now. I voted against it then with a full understanding of what we were doing. We are practically confiscating the rights of the Toronto Niagara Power Company and we are largely reducing the value of the bonds in England if we are not entirely destroying it. That is not fair. The people have invested their money in good faith.

Mr. COCHRANE: No, they had to act in bad faith to get to Toronto. The Toronto Electric Light company agreed that they would sell out to the city. And to get there they virtually sold out to the Toronto Electric Light Company.

Mr. NESBITT: In 1917 the city had the right to take over the works.

Mr. COCHRANE: Not of the Electric Development Company but of the Electric Light Company.

Mr. NESBITT: We have no proof of that. We just had a statement to that effect. The solicitors for the Hydro-Electric and for the city of Toronto made that statement but they furnished no proof to the committee that it was true. They only surmised that might be true. But, in the meantime, they ask us to enact clause 5 to take away the rights of the people who put their money into these bonds. I see no reason why Toronto should not buy out these corporations if they want to take them over.

Mr. COCHRANE: They will buy them out, but they do not want to buy out the Electric Development Company.

Mr. NESBITT: What good is the Electric Development Company?

Mr. COCHRANE: That is not part of the agreement. They are buying out the Toronto Electric Light Company and this is an attempt to get in there in perpetuity and to secure an eternal franchise by improper means.

Mr. NESBITT: That is purely a surmise. They have furnished no proof that that statement is correct. In the meantime they ask us to enact a clause to do away with a statute passed by this Parliament. They said that Parliament did not know what it was doing. I believe that the Parliaments that have gone before knew what they were doing just as much as we do now. I have no doubt that the people of Toronto were very glad to get that power transmitted to them at that time. Now they have other power and they want to cut off the rights of this company which were acquired 10 years ago.

Mr. COCHRANE: The Toronto Electric Light Company got their franchise in Toronto long before the Niagara power was developed. They developed their power by coal. Then the Toronto Niagara Power Company had a franchise for Niagara. The franchise which they got was only for a certain number of years. The Power Company conceived the idea that if they got control of the Toronto Electric Light Company they could have a perpetual franchise and develop electricity at Niagara. That is a different thing altogether. If this Parliament gave them that right they gave them something which was unfair. The municipality has the right to control its own streets and if we did wrong once there is no reason why we should perpetuate it.

Mr. NESBITT: The other part of the clause makes it impossible for anybody to interfere with the streets of a municipality in the future. I believe that the municipality has the right to control its own streets

Mr. COCHRANE: Ever since I have had anything to do with the Railway Committee there has been a clause in every Bill protecting the rights of the municipality. For the last six years this Parliament has not given a charter to any company carrying with it the right to interfere with the streets of a municipality. We have put in a special clause to protect the municipality. In this we are doing nothing but what is fair and just to the people.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I sympathize with the views of the hon. member for Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell) and the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) and I voted against this clause in committee. I am still of the same opinion. I am especially opposed to that part of the section which has a retroactive effect. I agree with the minister that a city ought to have control of its own streets. But when we go back for ten years for the purpose of taking away from a company right, which they acquired in a proper and legal way from this Parliament, and which they have exercised ever since, I think we do something for which there is no justification. Their title to the rights which they claim was sustained by the highest court in the Empire, the Privy Council. We are undertaking in the latter part of this section to take away and nullify the rights that were given the Toronto and Niagara Power Company under a decision of the Privy Council. That is confiscation. While I agree with the minister that in the future the city ought to have the right to control its own streets, and while I would vote for that, I do not agree with him that we ought to put this retroactive clause in because it would mean taking away a right that was given to this company by an Act of Parliament, and a right which has been sustained by the decision of the highest court in the realm. There is no doubt that it is confiscation. A letter explaining the position was written to the chairman of this committee which I do not think has yet been placed on Hansard. It is as follows:

National Trust Company, Limited,
Toronto, May 26, 1917.

Joseph E. Armstrong, Esq., M.P.,
Chairman of Committee sitting on Revision of Railway Act,
Parliament Buildings,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir,—

We are trustees under a bond mortgage dated March 1, 1903, securing an issue of bonds of The Electrical Development Company of Ontario, Limited, maturing in 1933. The total amount of this issue now outstanding is $9,669,500, and of this amount approximately $2,500,000 were issued directly to the British public, and an additional $5,014,000 is held by the British Empire Trust Company, Limited, of London, England, as security for the debenture stock of the Toronto Power Company, Limited, which debenture stock was issued to the British public. The practical situation, therefore, is that the loss which would be occasioned by any impairment of the security for the bonds of The Electrical Development Company of Ontario, Limited, would primarily fall upon British investors.

As trustees under the said bond mortgage, we hold here as part of the mortgaged premises the whole of the $1,500,000 of bonds and practically all of the capital stock of the Toronto and Niagara Power Company. By reason of these holdings, the bondholders of the Electrical Development Company are entitled, as one of the most important parts of their security, not only to the benefit of the physical assets of the Toronto and Niagara Power Company represented by its present and future transmission and distribution lines and other properties but also to the benefit of all its franchises, rights and corporate powers.

The Toronto and Niagara Power Company is a Dominion company incorporated by Chapter 107 of the Statutes of Canada, 2 Edward VII (1902). We are advised that under its Act of Incorporation the Toronto and Niagara Power Company has, amongst other rights:

(a) The right to supply hydraulic, electric or other power by means of cables, machinery or other appliances;

(b) The right to acquire, construct, maintain and operate works for the production, sale and distribution of electricity and power for any purpose for which such electricity or power can be used;

(c) The right to construct, maintain and operate lines of wires, poles, tunnels, conduits and other works in the manner and to the extent required for the corporate purposes of the company, and to conduct, store, sell and supply electricity and other power and with such lines of wire, poles, conduits, motors or other conductors or devices to conduct, convey, furnish or receive such electricity to or from any person at any place, through, over, along or across any public highway, bridges, viaducts, railways, water courses, or over or under any waters, etc., and

(d) To erect poles, construct trenches or conduits or do other things necessary for the transmission of heat or light as fully as the circumstances of the case may require, provided the same are so constructed as not to incommode the public use of streets, highways or public places, or to impede the access to any house or other building erected in the vicinity thereof, or to interrupt the navigation of any waters, the company, however, being responsible for all damages which it causes in carrying out or maintaining any of its works.

The powers of the Toronto and Niagara Power Company including those above mentioned, may be exercised without the consent of any municipal corporation, the right of the company to so exercise them having been, as we are advised, affirmed by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the case of the Toronto and Niagara Power Company v. Corporation of the Town of North Toronto, 1912, A.C. page 834.

We have been apprised that your Committee is now considering Bill No. 13, an Act to consolidate and amend the Railway Act, certain provisions of which, if enacted in the form in which they appear in the copy of the Bill which we have seen, would seriously limit and impair the rights, powers and privileges of the Toronto and Niagara Power Company, and would correspondingly affect the security for the bonds of The Electrical Development Company of Ontario, Limited.

It is, of course, obvious that the value of the undertaking of the Toronto and Niagara Power Company depends wholly on its ability to market the power which it transmits from Niagara over its transmission lines, and an impairment of its ability to effect such distribution would, therefore, result in serious loss to the holders of the bonds of the Electrical Development Company.

As trustees for the bondholders of the Electrical Development Company of Ontario, Limited, under the circumstances above set out, we beg respectfully to submit that the provisions of the draft Act to consolidate and amend the Railway Act, above referred to, should be so amended as not to impair or limit the charter rights of the Toronto and Niagara Power Company, or that the Toronto and Niagara Power Company, should be excepted from their operation, so long as any of the bonds of the Electrical Development Company of Ontario, Limited, remain outstanding.

Yours faithfully,
Trust Officer.

I have no brief to act for any of these parties. I never had any consultation with any of them. I never heard anything in connection with this question except what I heard publicly before the committee. My objection is that we are confiscating a right to which this company is legally entitled. I am surprised that the minister is making such a proposal to the House. I have great faith in his fairness, and I was able to agree with him on nearly everything in connection with this Railway Act while we were considering it, excepting this one thing. I cannot make up my mind to agree to the course pursued by the minister in regard to this matter, and I want to put myself on record as opposed to it, and to vote against it.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am not sure that there is any reason why I should take up the cudgels for Toronto, but I want to state the other side of the case. The minister has briefly outlined the situation, but it must not be forgotten that in Ontario, under a Provincial Act, there has been undertaken a work that has not been undertaken elsewhere. The Hydro-Electric Commission, acting by virtue of a statute of Ontario, has undertaken and put in force what is without doubt the greatest public work of this kind anywhere in the world, controlled by the province and by the municipalities. It can be understood that in connection with such a scheme as that difficulties will be met with in the way of vested rights held by companies, and it must not be forgotten that privileges granted to companies by this Parliament and by the Legislature of Ontario previously, never contemplated the situation that has arisen; and, in justification of this amendment and of some very drastic legislation, perhaps in some instances too drastic, passed by the Ontario Legislature, it must be remembered that the object of all this was to remove obstacles from the way of the full development of the Hydro-Electric system. In a large measure that accounts for this amendment, although the explanation may be a little intricate and might not be of interest to this House. In view of the object contemplated and of what has been accomplished and what is to be accomplished in the future in the way of bringing electric power not alone to the cities and towns but to the doors of the farmers throughout the country, I am prepared to go a long way in voting for legislation that will remove impediments from the path of that great enterprise.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend talks of the great work the Hydro-Electric has done, and with that I have no quarrel. He talks about the objects of the Hydro-Electric, and no doubt they are the very best in the world. But the Hydro-Electric Commission are not the only people in Canada who are taking electric power to the people in the cities and towns, and to the farmers as well—and others are delivering it a great deal cheaper than the Hydro-Electric Commission. They are not the only philanthropists in Canada. Because Ontario as a province is trying to work out a great scheme which they say will be for the benefit of the people of Ontario, does that give them a legal right to step in and confiscate property which men have honestly acquired and for which they have paid good money? A public corporation like the province of Ontario should be the last class of people to do a thing like this. I could understand a private corporation attempting to do it to get the better of a competitor. But here is the great province of Ontario, according to the statement of the hon. member for Renfrew (Mr. Graham), wanting to confiscate private property and to create class legislation. If they want these properties why do they not buy them and treat the owners as any white man would?

Mr. COCHRANE: Why do not your people carry out their agreement?

Mr. CARVELL: My people?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Mr. CARVELL: I have never spoken to a man about this. I was not even here when Mr. McCarthy presented his case. I have never had a conversation with any one with respect to the Toronto Electric Company or the Toronto-Niagara, or anything in connection with this case. I am protesting against this as a matter of principle, and trying to point out to the minister the terrible consequences that may follow legislation like this, and, worse than that, surreptitiously smuggling it in in a general Act.

Mr. COCHRANE: How is that?

Mr. CARVELL: Putting it in at the end of a general clause. By section 374, subsection 1, "company" is defined. Then subsection 2 provides as follows:

(2) Notwithstanding anything contained in any Special or other Act or authority of the Parliament of Canada or of the legislature of any province, the company shall not, except as in this section provided, acquire, construct, maintain or operate any works, machinery, plant, line, pole, tunnel, conduit or other device upon, along, across, or under any highway, square or other public place within the limits of any city, town, village or township, without the consent of the municipality.

Subsection 3 provides:

(3) If the company cannot obtain the consent of the municipality or cannot obtain such consent otherwise than subject to conditions not acceptable to the company, the company may apply to the Board for leave to exercise its powers upon such highway, square or public place.

The board holds an investigation and makes an order which is binding on the company and on the municipality. That is the general law of Canada. That is the law that hereafter will apply to every corporation in Canada incorporated by this Parliament. And then what? They stick on two clauses after that, I say, surreptitiously—and I use the word advisedly—two clauses which no man in the world would understand unless the special circumstances were brought to his attention. Toronto is not mentioned; the Toronto Electric Light is not mentioned, the Toronto-Niagara is not mentioned, the Hydro-Electric is not mentioned—one of the finest pieces of underground grafting I ever heard in my life. And the Minister of Railways wants this Parliament to enact that and make it the law of the land. It is an outrage, nothing short of it.

Mr. BARNARD: I consider this legislation objectionable on two grounds. I do not pretend to speak from an intimate knowledge of the facts, but from a hasty perusal of the proceedings which took place before the Special Committee on this Bill, it appears to me that this particular company whose rights are in question obtained certain charter rights in connection with the city of Toronto from Parliament. Those rights were the subject of litigation, which was carried to the Privy Council, and in the result the rights of the company were upheld. On the faith of that decision I presume the company has made certain expenditures. It is important, if those rights are going to be taken away, that before they are so taken away the company should receive compensation. I object to subsection 5 upon another ground. If this Parliament sees fit to take certain rights away from a particular company, the Toronto company, let them say so.

Mr. CARVELL: That is right.

Mr. BARNARD: But to frame a general clause and say that every company which had charter rights since 1906—

Mr. COCHRANE: Thi is not for Toronto alone. It is for Ontario.

Mr. BARNARD: Well, for Ontario, but I venture to say that this legislation is hitting at one particular company. I may be wrong in that; I speak subject to correction. If the legislation is intended for the province of Ontario, the fact should be stated. I object to firing a charge of grape shot when you don't know where the pellets are going to land, and that is what you are doing here. You are dealing with every company incorporated in Canada since 1906, and taking away certain rights which may have been given, and, on general principles, I submit the legislation is altogether objectionable and should not be adopted.

Mr. COCHRANE: A power company from Montreal came here last session and they had the same rights as these people have. The Railway Committee took those rights away from that company and inserted a clause similar to this section. There was not any squeal about it then.

Mr. NESBITT: But they had not done any work

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes, they had, but these people had not.

Mr. NESBITT: Yes, these people have built the line.

Mr. COCHRANE: What line?

Mr. NESBITT: The Toronto-Niagara Power Company.

Mr. COCHRANE: That is not for Toronto alone.

Mr. NESBITT: I do not know what other locality it can serve.

Mr. COCHRANE: There are lots of places between those two points that it can serve.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Can the hon. minister inform us if there is any other company affected by this section, except the Toronto company?

Mr. COCHRANE: The other companies thought their powers were taken away from them.

Mr. SINCLAIR: This section reads:

> Notwithstanding the provision of section 3 of this Act, it is hereby declared that the powers of any such company have been so restricted since the date of the enactment of Chapter 37 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, that is to say, the 31st January, 1907.

It not only applies to the Toronto-Niagara company, but it applies to any company that dates since that time, if there are any such companies in Canada. We were informed that no other companies were affected by this section, excepting the Toronto-Niagara company. I do not know whether that is the case or not, and I question if the minister or any hon. member can say whether we are interfering with the rights of any other company by this legislation or not. But the legislation is certainly vicious, inasmuch as it is retroactive. I do not want to be misunderstood. I want to vote for a clause that will give the city of Toronto the power to deal with this question for the future, but I do not want to vote for a clause that dates back to 1906, and takes away certain rights which that company legally and properly enjoyed at that date, and enjoys to-day. If it is right that the city of Toronto should have the right in the future in the public interest, let us give that right, but let us not, in order to do so, introduce such a section into the General Railway Act of Canada when we do not know who will be struck by it. We are not certain how far this provision goes, and I want the minister to consider that point. There may be other companies that have obtained rights as far back as 1906, which rights may be affected by the legislation we are passing here.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: I had the privilege of listening to the representatives of the Toronto and Niagara Company and representatives of the Hydro Electric Commission. These representatives were before us on two or three occasions, and they gave a great deal of exhaustive evidence in support of both sides, but let me call attention to the fact that while this legislation is somewhat retroactive, it is also legislation in the public interest. Let me read from a letter the hon. gentleman from Guysborough quoted a few moments ago, and look at the powers the Toronto-Niagara Company had granted to them by the Parliament of Canada in 1902, and then consider whether you would agree to extend similar powers to any other company in the Dominion of Canada. The powers granted to that company were as follows:

(a) The right to supply hydraulic, electric or other power by means of cables, machinery or other appliances;

(b) The right to acquire, construct, maintain and operate works for the production, sale and distribution of electricity and power for any purpose for which such electricity or power can be used;

(c) The right to construct, maintain and operate lines of wire, poles, tunnels, conduits and other works in the manner and to the extent required for the corporate purposes of the company, and to conduct, store, sell and supply electricity and other power and with such lines of wire, poles, conduits, motors or other conductors or devices to conduct, convey, furnish or receive such electricity to or from any persons at any place, through, over, along or across any public highway, bridges, viaducts, railways, water courses, or over or under any waters, etc., and

(d) To erect poles, construct trenches or conduits or do other things necessary for the transmission of heat or light as fully as the circumstances of the case may require, provided the same are so constructed as not to incommode the public use of streets, highways or public places, or to impede the access to any house or other building erected in the vicinity thereof, or to interrupt the navigation of any waters the company, however, being responsible for all damages which it causes in carrying out or maintaining any of its works.

I should like the committee to pay particular attention to the following paragraph:

The powers of the Toronto and Niagara Power Company including those above mentioned, may be exercised without the consent of any municipal corporation, the right of the Company to so exercise them having been, as we are advised, affirmed by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the case of the Toronto and Niagara Power Company v. Corporation of the Town of North Toronto, 1912, A.C. page 834.

If this legislation was not brought forward at this time and placed on the statute book, this same company could go into any town, city or village in Canada, erect poles and carry on their operations in direct opposition to the wishes of any of the municipalities in Canada. They can carry on all these operations, in spite of any of the men who represent these municipalities, or the people who are living in them. We believe that that is not in the public interest. Therefore, the committee decided that they should insert this section, which will compel them to do as subsection 4 of this section of the Bill compels them to do. That section reads:

(4) Nothing contained in this section shall be deemed to authorize the company, nor shall the company have any right, to acquire, construct, maintain or operate any distribution system or to distribute light, heat, power or electricity in any city, town, village or township; or to erect, put or place in, over, along or under any highway or public place in any city, town, village or township any works, machinery, plant, pole, tunnel, conduits, or other device for the purpose of such distribution without the company first obtaining consent therefor by a by-law of the municipality.

We are asking them to come under the same law which all other companies are compelled to come under to-day, which requires them to obtain the consent of the municipality, before they are allowed to erect their poles and continue their operations.

Mr. NESBITT: As far as I am personally concerned, I was one of the first members of the Railway Committee that insisted that what we call the standard clause should be put in all railway charters. I also insisted upon that when they came back for a renewal of charter. The member for East Lambton read subsection 4 as if we were objecting to it. We are not objecting to subsection 4. We have put in all recent Acts a provision giving the municipalities the absolute control of their own streets. I think the member for East Lambton unintentionally misled the committee by reading that clause and saying that we objected to it.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: I hope the hon. gentleman will not put into my mouth words that I did not utter. In the early part of my remarks I called particular attention to the fact that this was retroactive legislation.

Mr. NESBITT: I think my hon. friend said, a kind of retroactive legislation. Certainly the latter part of his remarks tended to give the impression that we were opposed to giving the municipalities absolute control of their own streets. That is not the case. What we object to is subsection 5, which reads:

> The provisions of the last preceding subsection shall apply to and restrict the powers of any company heretofore incorporated by Special Act or other authority of the Parliament of Canada notwithstanding that such provisions may be inconsistent with the provisions of such Special Act or other authority, and notwithstanding the provisions of section three of this Act; and it is hereby declared that the powers of any such company have been so restricted since the date of the enactment of chapter thirty-seven of the Revised Statutes of Canada 1906, that is to say, the thirty-first day of January, 1907.

We contend that it is not fair to have allowed these people to invest their money under that Act——

Mr. COCHRANE: They never invested their money under that Act.

Mr. NESBITT: What did they invest it under?

Mr. COCHRANE: The Toronto Electric Light Company have invested their money.

Mr. NESBITT: The Toronto-Niagara Power Company built their plant.

Mr. COCHRANE: They built it long after they got the franchise and long after they invested their money in the streets of Toronto.

Mr. NESBITT: They built it under that special Act. That is what we are objecting to. My hon. friend wishes to make that provision retroactive, practically confiscating the bonds sold by the company in England on the credit of this country.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not accuse the member for East Lambton of trying to mislead the committee, but when he takes the trouble to read all the clauses of the special Act under which this company was incorporated twenty years ago he unwittingly misleads the committee. I am afraid—I do not say it offensively—that my hon. friend has not grasped the real contention. We do not ask that any company have the right to use the streets of any municipality without the consent of that municipality. All we ask is that the provisions of section 374 be left alone. Make them general; do not make any special cases or discriminations.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: If the retroactive clauses are left out, will this same company not have the power to go into any municipality in Canada, erect poles and carry on operations without the consent of that municipality?

Mr. CARVELL: No, certainly not; that is what I am pointing out. The section as drawn is a perfectly reasonable section and should be applied to every corporation in Canada. First, it defines "company." Secondly, it provides that the company shall not erect poles, plant, or lines without the consent of the municipality. Subsection 3 provides that if the company cannot agree with the municipality, reference is had to the Railway Board. That is all that we ask in this case. We ask that the Toronto Electric Light Company shall be placed in the same position as any other corporation in Canada. The member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) has pointed out that this company received its charter from this Parliament eighteen or twenty years ago. It is in evidence before the committee—and this, I think, is absolutely undisputed—that the company sold bonds in England to the extent of $15,000,000.

Mr. COCHRANE: There is no evidence of that.

Mr. CARVELL: That statement was made by a reputable solicitor; I forget his name. My hon. friend did not challenge the accuracy of his statement at that time, and I am sure that he will not do so now. They expended that money in good faith under their charter. If the Parliament of Canada provides that this company cannot go on any further without the consent of the Railway Board, that is all right, because they are being treated the same as every other corporation in Canada. Twenty years ago Parliament gave rights to corporations that they would not think of giving now, and it is quite right that some of these provisions should be abridged. But it is monstrous to take away from one particular company the rights on which they borrowed money and sold their bonds; to hold them up, and say: You cannot proceed even if the Railway Board says you can; you are entirely bound by what the municipality says. The principle of appeal to the Railway Board in such cases is exactly the same as the right of expropriation on the part of a railway company. If the railway company did not have the right of expropriation, you would never have a public work in Canada; somebody would always be selfish enough to hold up the enterprise because they could not get what they wanted for the right of way.

Mr. CURRIE: My hon. friend knows that in the United States there is no such right as he speaks of.

Mr. CARVELL: They have the right of eminent domain in the United States. No railway on earth could be built without that right.

Mr. CURRIE: Not a bit of it.

Mr. CARVELL: They have the right of eminent domain in the United States. A gentleman who knows as much as my hon. friend does ought to know that.

Mr. CURRIE: You do not know everything.

Mr. CARVELL: But you do; that is why I think you ought to know this. If my hon. friend will look at any of the works on eminent domain published in the United States, he will find not merely books, but volumes, on the exercising of that right. What applies to the farmer in respect of right of way ought to apply to the municipality. We must have electric light and power companies. The world is moving; Canada is moving; but we cannot move properly unless we have all the modern appliances that make life better. But you will run up against a selfish municipality just as you will run up against a selfish farmer, and you should have some power to prescribe the conditions under which this right of expropriation shall be exercised. The first three subsections are perfectly fair; the city ought to have control of its own streets. But if the municipal authorities are unreasonable; if they want to live as they have lived for fifty years, somebody ought to have the right to step in and decide the matter. All we ask is that the law be applied to this company the same as it is to all other companies. I move that subsection 5 be struck out.

Mr. NICKLE: Before I came to the meeting of this committee, I had not an opportunity of giving very careful consideration to section 374. But reading it here this evening it seems to me that subsection 4 is diametrically opposed to subsection 3.

Mr. CARVELL: There is no doubt about it.

Mr. NICKLE: Subsection 3, as I read it, seems to vest in the Railway Board the discretionary right of determining whether or not a company shall have the right to exercise its powers, providing the municipality and the company cannot agree.

Subsection 4 however, seems to override subsection 3. It says that, unless a by-law of the municipality is passed, then no matter whether the board consents or not, it is impossible for the company to go on with its work. If I were asked to construe that section it seems to me that I would be driven to the conclusion that the two subsections were so antagonistic that it would be very difficult to know exactly what was meant. But my inclination at the present time would lead to the construction that subsection 4 was the prevailing subsection, and that nothing could be done even if the board consented.

Turning to subsection 5, it seems to me that the latter part of that subsection contains a very dangerous clause—the clause that states that no matter what a company may have done subsequent to a certain date that work were illegally done if the consent of the municipality had not been obtained, even although the provisions of the company's private Act may have been respected. I do not know the particular case that was aimed at by this section, if, indeed, there be any particular case, but certainly it seems to me unreasonable that we should legislate in such a way as possibly to deprive certain companies of the value of their property. Because unless they had obtained the consent of the municipality any works they had erected subsequent to 1907 they would have no right to continue, even although such work might have been done pursuant to their private Act. This might turn out to be legislation of the most radical kind in certain cases; it might be confiscation. I think this matter should be carefully considered before the committee gives its consent to the enunciation of a principle as broad as I consider this to be.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend has raised a very important point. On first thoughts I would ask to have both subsections 4 and 5 struck out. Subsection 4, or the first part of it at all events, although not in the same words as subsection 2, is of the same legal effect. In the latter part of subsection 4 my hon. friend will find one of these little gentlemen again, the meaning of which nobody knows unless he happened to be present at the meetings of the special committee and heard it explained. It says:

> Provided that this subsection shall not prevent the company from delivering or supplying such power by any means now existing or under the provisions of any contract now in force for use in the operation of any railway or for use by any other company lawfully engaged in the distribution of such power within any such city, town, village or township.

That in plain English means this: The Toronto Electric Light Company have at the present time wires for bringing energy from Niagara Falls to Toronto for distribution to the Toronto Street Railway Company. They also supply power to certain industries, and to some extent supply electric light. Now that corporation, or the gentlemen who represented it, were willing that they should be allowed to continue doing what they have been allowed to do up to the present time. Their attitude was: "Thus far and no further shalt thou go. You can still supply power for the railway, still supply power to the industries you are already serving, still go on supplying electric light, but you cannot expand. You have to stop right there, and never go one step further unless the city of Toronto want you to." That was the reason for the introduction of subsection 4. In my judgment both subsections 4 and 5 should be struck out. The clause would be perfectly intelligible and perfectly fair without them. I think that if subsection 4 is allowed to remain in the Bill it will still be regulated by subsection 3. If they could not agree upon the location of the poles, or whatever it might be, they could apply to the Railway Board. I think that subsection 4 is dangerous and ought to come out in toto.

Mr. NICKLE: I do not want to follow my argument any further, but I should like to know what the hon. member for East Lambton thinks of my contention with regard to the construction that should be put on the latter part of subsection 5. I am thoroughly with him to the extent that municipalities should control their streets, but I want to know whether in his opinion the latter part of subsection 5, as drafted, would make it legal work that had been done pursuant to a special Act, if the consent of the municipality had not been obtained under subsection 4.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: I do not know that it is up to me to attempt a legal argument, but I may say that I have gone over the evidence that was presented to the committee very carefully, and I am satisfied that this legislation is in the public interest.

Mr. McKENZIE: I have listened to the hon. member for Carleton and the hon. member for Kingston, and I think I understand the points they are making. I understand them to say that this company had the right under their original charter to erect poles and construct other work without consulting the city. We are now asked to pass an Act which will make it incumbent upon them to have obtained that consent; the clause is retroactive. Are we not making the company trespassers ab initio as regards all the work they have done?

Mr. CARVELL: They have to get the consent of the municipality.

Mr. McKENZIE: This legislation is to have effect from the time they got their charter.

Mr. CARVELL: Not when they got the charter, but a few years afterwards.

Mr. McKENZIE: Under this Act the provision that the consent of the municipality shall be obtained will be deemed to have always been in their charter. We are creating them trespassers from the very beginning, for having erected these poles and done all this other work without authority, and that is a very awkward position for them to be put in. They will be subject to all the drastic penalties that companies are liable to who violate their legislation. The Attorney General of Ontario might obtain an order confiscating their charter, because if this provision is to be made a part of their charter then their charter has been violated, and they are subject to confiscation of everything they have done under it. That is of far-reaching effect, and we should certainly hesitate before putting a retroactive clause of that kind in their charter.

Mr. CARVELL: It is being put in the general Railway Act of Canada.

Mr. McKENZIE: This general Act covers the special Act of the company, and therefore it is just the same as if this provision was in their charter. We are attempting to pass very drastic legislation which will cause the company to forfeit their rights because they have violated the law of the country.

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL: I was not able to be present during the early part of this discussion, but I took a very active interest in this Bill, as hon. members who were present will remember, when it was before the special committee. I do not know to what extent the section has been explained this evening, but I can assure the committee it received most thorough consideration by the special committee to whom the Bill was referred. Part No. 16 of the Proceedings of the special committee appointed to consider this Bill gives a record of the people who asked to have this clause put in. It is dated the 18th of May.

The people who came to that meeting asked the committee to pass this legislation. Among others present and made this request were the united municipalities of all Canada. The municipalities have organizations in the various provinces, and a Dominion organization. They came here as a Dominion organization and asked to have it inserted. The Hydro Electric Power Commission of the province of Ontario asked to have it inserted. They represented more than one hundred municipalities which have money in similar enterprises. The Ontario Government sent a man down here to advocate the insertion of this clause, and subsequently a very lengthy and able memorandum was presented by the Ontario Government which was read by the chairman of the committee, and which will be found in No. 22 of the proceedings of the committee held May 31. The city of Toronto and other municipalities were represented. This is not a local matter concerning Toronto, or concerning the province of Ontario. It is Dominion-wide. On general principles I am opposed to retroactive legislation, but this is the only thing to meet the present condition, and I think its passage is justified. The different interests which asked for this legislation did so in part upon these grounds: In the year 1902 a company was formed and given a charter by the Parliament of Canada, under the name of the Toronto and Niagara Power Company. Under sections 12 and 13 of that Act this company can go anywhere and erect poles. It is true they are operating in the Toronto and Niagara district, but they are not confined to that, and by their charter they can go anywhere in Canada without consent of the municipalities through which they go.

Mr. CARVELL: Will my hon. friend allow me to ask him a question? Is it not true that by the provisions of subsections 2 and 3 of section 374, they could erect poles only by permission of the Railway Board, if the municipality objected?

[Mr. Macdonell.]

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL: No. My hon. friend is not correct, because that is not the question involved.

Mr. CARVELL: Then let me read what it says, because I do not think my hon. friend has read it aright:

> Notwithstanding anything contained in any special or other Act or authority of the Parliament of Canada or of the Legislature of any province, the company shall not, except as in this section provided, acquire, construct, maintain or operate any works, machinery, plant, line, pole, tunnel, conduit, or other device upon, along, across or under any highway, square or other public place within the limits of any city, town, village, or township, without the consent of the municipality.

Section 3 says if they cannot agree they go to the Railway Board.

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL: Let me point out to my hon. friend that power companies have two objects in view, and the general Railway Act provides for those two different classes of operation. The first is transmission lines—poles—which is not in any way touched by the clause now under consideration. This is absolutely under the general provisions of the Railway Act, and it is in the same position as the lines and poles of any other power company or of any telephone or telegraph company. What is aimed at here, and what is provided for, is the distribution of power, which is the second thing a power company does. The amendment under consideration in no way interferes with, impedes, or touches that transmission right. All that is dealt with in subsections 4 and 5 is the distribution of power, which is prohibited for the reason that this company had authority to distribute power without consulting anybody or any municipality, and is the only power company which has that right.

Mr. CARVELL: Does my hon. friend mean to say that the words "shall not, except as in this section provided, acquire, construct, maintain, or operate any works, machinery, plant, line, pole, tunnel, conduit or other device upon, along, across, or under any highway, square or other public place" do not mean the distribution of power?

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL: That is the general law to-day.

Mr. CARVELL: Of course it is. That is what I say.

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL: There is nothing new in that. The only new thing we are dealing with here is subsection 5, which makes it retroactive.

Mr. CARVELL: Then you get away from your distribution.

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL: No, I do not. What those who came before the committee asked was that power lines and power distribution should be separated from telephone and telegraph distribution because there has been so much litigation and such contradictory decisions with regard to the transmission and distribution of power under the Dominion Railway Act. In section 374 we are dealing entirely and exclusively with power. It is better so, and any court can so understand it, because it is not mixed up with other distribution systems. As my hon. friend from Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell) has just pointed out, subsection 3 is the same as the General Railway Act. The amendment under consideration in no way affects the transmission of power. It simply deals with the distribution of power. Subsection 8 of section 247 of the Railway Act, 1906, makes this provision with regard to the distribution of power and the erection of poles for that distribution.

> Nothing contained in this section shall be deemed to authorize the company to exercise the powers therein mentioned for the purpose of selling or distributing light, heat, power or electricity in cities, towns or villages, without the company having first obtained consent therefor by a bylaw of the municipality.

That has been the law for years, and that is the law to-day, for the protection of municipalities. The highways of the municipalities were sacred to the municipalities and could only be invaded for the purpose of running lines of poles for the distribution of power with the consent of the municipality. For main lines, such as this company has, provision is made in the very section which we are now discussing. There it will be found that provision is made for the transmission through municipalities of power by use of main lines and if the municipality does not consent, then the Railway Board is consulted and an arrangement is made. This company has, and will always have, the right to transmit power and to have lines wherever it wants to put them subject to the approval of the Railway Board, but the company shall not act as a distributing and selling company without the consent of the municipality.

Mr. NESBITT: What will they do with the power then?

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL: That has been the law always. The municipality has the right to say whether a company shall act as a distributing and selling company within its confines or not. That is a proper law. The Toronto and Niagara Power Company is not a general distributing company. It has main lines and it sells its power wholesale as I understand it. The section which is now under consideration in no way impairs or takes away one iota of business or the right which it has exercised in the way of transmitting power because it does not act as a general distributing company. It is a wholesale company producing power at Niagara Falls and transmitting it to Toronto and other places. It has main lines to accomplish this purpose and there is no interference with its operations in that respect. It goes on with its main lines just as it did before.

Mr. NESBITT: If it does not interfere with them why does the hon. gentleman want this clause in?

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL: I will come to that. This company was incorporated in 1902 before the Railway Commission was appointed. The Railway Commission was appointed in 1903 and there was no tribunal to which reference could be made in an Act of Parliament to settle disputed points between a municipality and a railway or power corporation. They were given wonderfully wide powers to go anywhere they chose, not only to carry their main lines through any municipality with or without the consent of the municipality but also—and here is the rub—to act as a distributing or selling company in any community and to sell their power without the municipality's consent. That is what this section is aimed at. The Toronto and Niagara Power Company commenced operations in North Toronto. They were running their lines wherever they chose and the corporation of the town of North Toronto said: You cannot do that; you will have to comply with subsection 8 of section 247 of the Railway Act 1906, which provides that the company shall not do these things without the consent of the municipality. The Toronto and Niagara Power Company declined to accept that view of the matter and in defiance of the municipality proceeded to erect poles. The municipality of North Toronto pulled down the poles, litigation followed, the case went to the Court of Appeal of Ontario and the Court of Appeal decided in 1911 that the company were bound by the Railway Act, that the Railway Act applied to railway, telephone, telegraph and power companies and that no power company could invade the streets of any municipality without the consent of the municipality. The Court of Appeal decided that and the matter was thought to rest there. It did not. The Toronto and Niagara Power Company took the matter to the Privy Council.

Mr. CARVELL: Would my hon. friend read the law of Canada under which that appeal was taken to the Privy Council and then compare it with subsection 2 of section 374? I have not the Act before me, but I would like to have a comparison of the two.

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL: I have the Railway Act, 1906, and section 247 is the general section providing for "lines and wires on highways; consent of municipality; travel and access; wires; poles; trees; supervision" etc., etc. That is the general law in regard to wires, lines and poles in municipalities along highways, public places, etc. Section 247 has eight subsections and the eighth subsection is the one which has caused the mischief. I have already read it. It is as follows:

> Nothing contained in this section shall be deemed to authorize the company to exercise the powers therein mentioned for the purpose of selling or distributing light, heat, power or electricity in cities, towns or villages, without the company having first obtained consent therefor by a bylaw of the municipality.

That is the general Railway Act. The Court of Appeal of Ontario decided that it bound the company notwithstanding the fact that the company by its special Act has power to erect poles, lines and so on without consent.

Mr. CARVELL: How would you have to read that subsection of section 247——

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL: If my hon. friend will please——

Mr. CARVELL: I thought my hon. friend wanted to get the whole story as we went along but if not I will not interfere with him.

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL: My hon. friend is also my learned friend and we both understand court proceedings and I would prefer to proceed. As offsetting the Railway Act the company set up the charter it had.

This is the only company that still possesses its original wide power of going everywhere or anywhere without license. A number of power companies have been incorporated by the Dominion Parliament, and they have come here from time to time—I am talking now within the knowledge of members of this committee—to get amendments to their charters in various ways, extending their powers, adding to their borrowing powers, adding to their capital and so on. And in every case where they have come here, they have been saddled with these public-safeguarding clauses, because many of these charters are old charters. During this present session the Continental Light, Heat and Power Company of Montreal, which was I think incorporated in 1897, came here and was saddled with half a dozen of these public-safeguarding clauses. They had a charter very similar to this charter. Since this Toronto and Niagara Power Company never came here to get an amendment, there has been no opportunity to amend its charter by adding the safeguarding clauses, anad therefore it became essential that some provision be made in some way to restrict these wide powers. The company was not satisfied to be bound by the general Railway Act of Canada, as interpreted by the Court of Appeal of the province of Ontario, and, as I said, appealed to the Privy Council. The case is reported in the Law Reports, Appeal Cases, 1912, at page 834. In this case the Privy Council reversed the decision of the Court of Appeals of Ontario, and held that the Toronto and Niagara Power Company was not bound by the general Railway Act, and that it did not need the consent of a municipality to go anywhere, that it was absolutely at large to go where it pleased, without leave or license, under the special Act of 1902. Does any member of this committee agree that that is a safe or fair thing to permit, that a power company should have the right to go anywhere in Canada in any street, highway, square or public place, cross it, to do as it pleases, without any consent, and to set up in that community as a distributing company selling power? In this case the Toronto and Niagara Power Company were the plaintiffs, and the corporation of the town of North Toronto, defendant, on appeal from the Court of Appeals for Ontario. The head note is as follows:

> Held that by sections 12 and 13 of their incorporating Dominion Act, II Edward VII, chapter 107—

That is the Toronto and Niagara Power Company incorporating Dominion Act.

> —the appellants—

That is the Toronto and Niagara Power Company.

> —were empowered to enter upon the streets of North Toronto without the consent of its municipal council for the purpose of erecting poles to carry power lines for the conveyance of electricity.

Held, further, that section 90 of the Railway Act of 1888 as amended by the Railway Act of 1899 and by section 247 of the Railway Act of 1906,—

That is the section I have read twice.

—the effect of which would be to give the respondents—

That is the municipality.

—a veto upon the appellants' exercise of their powers, is inconsistent with the said sections 12 and 13 of the special Act, and consequently by section 21 thereof—

That is the power company Act.

—is rendered inapplicable to the appellants; section 247, moreover, applies only to companies within the definition clause of the Act of 1906, that is, railway companies; while subsections 3 and 4 thereof save the appellants' powers under their special Act.

What the Privy Council decided was this, that although our Railway Act is burdened with definitions of a company and what constitutes a company coming under the Act and being subject to the Act, a power company, according to the Privy Council, does not come under the Railway Act. The Privy Council held that, inasmuch as this was not a railway company, it was not bound by the word "company" as defined by the Railway Act, that the Railway Act, in so far as power companies were concerned, only referred to or related to railway companies that were selling or distributing power, and did not have any reference to the general power companies, and this I submit is entirely contrary to the spirit and intention of the legislation. Let me read a paragraph from Lord Haldane's judgment on that point, in which he admits that the intention apparently was that all these companies should be included under the term "railway company," and that a railway company in the definition of "company" included these companies, yet the strict meaning of the Act, according to the Privy Council, excluded a power company from the operation of the Act, and the power companies were not bound by the Act at all. Lord Haldane said:

The Parliament of Canada, not unnaturally, anxious to avoid dangers of this kind,—

That is the kind of conflict that arose in this case.

—accordingly passed general statutes conferring upon the municipal authorities large powers of control. Section 90 of the Railway Act 1888, was amended by the Railway Act of 1899, which added to it a subsection illustrative of this kind of control.

This is important. The Railway Act of 1899 was afterwards embodied into the Act of 1906.

The new subsection enacted that when any company had power by any Act of the Parliament of Canada to construct and maintain lines of telegraph or telephone or for the conveyance of light, heat, power, or electricity, such company might, with the consent of the municipal council or other authority having jurisdiction over any highway, square or other public place, enter thereon for the purpose of exercising such power. . . . If the powers conferred by this section displaced the less restricted powers of entering without any consent conferred by the Act of incorporation the appellants are in the wrong.

That is the power in the special Act.

Their Lordships have, therefore, to determine this question. They have to bear in mind that a Court of justice is not entitled to speculate as to which of two conflicting policies was intended to prevail, but must confine itself to the construction of the language of the relevant Statutes read as a whole.

Now, under that reading, they excluded the intention which Lord Haldane recites was the spirit and foundation for the section of the Railway Act which I have read, but he says he must construe it literally, and the court construed it literally according to their interpretation, and the effect of that was that the appeal was dismissed and the Toronto and Niagara Power Company was left absolutely at large.

That is, it is free to go where it pleased, without leave or license. It is not bound by the Railway Act, according to the judgment of the Privy Council. It is not bound by any of the safeguards of the Railway Act. It has never come to Parliament for a moment, so that it can be reached and safeguarding provisions enacted, and there it is to-day. The only way of reaching it is by the provision made in this legislation. As I have said, this legislation was asked for by the united municipalities of Canada, not only Ontario, but outside of Ontario, by the Ontario Government, and by various other municipalities and communities, including the Hydro-Electric Power Commission, because, unless this clause is enacted this company can invade any place without anybody's consent, or leave or license. The necessity for making the section retroactive was this: this power company is not selling retail power; it is a producer of power.

Mr. McKENZIE: Has it got the power, although it is not exercising it?

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL: They have the power, but I believe they are not exercising it.

Mr. McKENZIE: We have to deal with them as they are constituted at present. We cannot take advantage of the fact that they are not selling it.

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL: This is simply a matter of fair dealing. We are not taking away from the company any of its business or curtailing its power, and the concluding part of subsection 4, which is aimed at preventing this company from acting as a distributing company without the consent of the municipality, reads as follows:—

Provided that this subsection shall not prevent the company from delivering or supplying such power by any means now existing or under the provisions of any contract now in force for use in the operation of any railway or for use by any other company lawfully engaged in the distribution of such power within any such city, town, village or township.

So that nothing is being taken from them, and their status is preserved to them. They cannot extend, and the reason why the retroactive clause is asked for is this: It does not hurt anybody to begin with. It is a precaution. I am a member of the committee and I am not advocating anything special except that I want to see what the committee has done, by a vote of nine to three, goes through the House. This clause was explained at length and questions were asked, and it was proved to the satisfaction of the committee that the Toronto Electric Light Company, and the Toronto-Niagara Power Company, and a number of other kindred companies, are practically an association of companies under one aegis or management, or whatever you like to call it. I do not ask hon. members to take my word for this; it is contained in the memoranda submitted to this House by the Government of Ontario, which was sent to the chairman of the committee and read by him. There was only one arrangement. The Toronto Electric Light Company had a contract with the city of Toronto, which expires in two or three years, and what is apprehended, and it was alleged before the committee, and the statement was actually made, that the Toronto Electric Company, which has an expiring and perishable franchise, expiring in two or three years or thereabouts, will, it is expected, turn over to the Toronto-Niagara Power Company all its business, poles, plant, machinery and equipment, and then the Toronto-Niagara Power Company can continue ad infinitum to operate the Toronto Electric Light Company the same as if there had been no contract between the Toronto Electric Light Company and the city of Toronto, and this retroactive clause is inserted to prevent that improper act. It hurts nobody. It is an insurance, a precaution, and a public safeguard. The same thing might happen in other communities. The Toronto-Niagara Power Company may go elsewhere and purchase electric light or power companies that have perishable and expiring franchises and then the business will pass over to the company with a permanent franchise forever. I have tried to make myself understood; I do not know whether I have done so or not, and I appeal to the fairness of the committee to pass this legislation to protect municipal rights, to protect municipalities and the public. The people came here from all over Ontario and from some parts of Quebec to ask that this be done, and there is nothing wrong in it. It is a safeguard. We are not saddling this company with any more safeguards than any other company is saddled with, but we ask that this clause be retained, for the purpose of carrying out the wishes of the people to whom I have referred, who came here with their counsel, and argued the matter at very great length, and answered every question put to them by the members of the committee. No matter was more fully or fairly dealt with by that select committee, and I appeal to this committee to carry out what was done by that committee, and to pass the section as framed.

Mr. CARVELL: I am afraid I cannot pay the hon. gentleman from Lambton the same compliment as I paid the hon. gentleman from Toronto, because the hon. gentleman from Toronto knows what he is talking about personally. That is not intended to be offensive in any way, but my hon. friend from Toronto is a good lawyer and has followed the case.

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL: I have taken public interest in it.

Mr. CARVELL: A perfectly proper interest. My hon. friend has spent half an hour arguing before the committee, as though we were the Supreme Court, showing us what the Privy Council decided, and he said that unless something was done, the company had power to extend its lines as it liked, into Toronto or any other municipality. That is true. But my hon. friend forgot to tell the committee the law on which the Privy Council made its decision. My hon. friend knows it all right, but I want to give it to the other members of the committee. I refer to section 247 of the Railway Act of 1906, which reads as follows:

When any company is empowered by special Act of the Parliament of Canada to construct, operate and maintain lines of telegraph or telephone, or for the conveyance of light, heat, power or electricity, the company may, with the consent of the municipal council or other authority having jurisdiction over any highway, etc.

Then it provides that they can do certain things, and here are the conditions. First, there shall be accessibility of traffic to the public, then a provision that the wires shall be not less than 22 feet above the ground. No trees shall be cut down unless it is necessary. Then it is provided that the opening of any street, square or other place for the erection of poles or for the carrying of wires shall be subject to the supervision of such person as the municipal council may appoint, and there shall be temporary removal of wires, and all that sort of thing. All these things are when the company is authorized to do certain things under a special Act. Subsection 8 provides:

Nothing contained in this section shall be deemed to authorize the company to exercise the powers therein mentioned for the purpose of selling or distributing light, heat, power or electricity in cities, towns or villages without the company having first obtained consent therefor by a by-law of the municipality.

But unfortunately the special Act incorporating the company did authorize them to distribute, and the Privy Council held, and rightly, I believe, that as this section 247 refers to special Acts, and as the special Act of this company gave it the actual power to distribute, they had a right to distribute it. That is the law. I want to call attention to the fact that the gentleman who prepared this Bill, Mr. Price, was not before the committee. Evidently he is a lawyer of distinction, because he has put in our hands a memorandum showing the legal effect of every amendment or change that was made in the Railway Act. When Mr. Price drafted this section he included telegraph, telephone and power companies all in one section. The subcommittee, I think for the purposes of my hon. friends from Toronto, divided it up and put telegraph and telephone companies in one section and electric light and power companies in another. Mr. Price says:

The provisions of this present section requiring telegraph, telephone and power companies within the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada to get consent of the municipality or leave of the Board before putting their wires upon, along or across any highway or public place will apply notwithstanding anything to the contrary in any Special Act or in any other Act and notwithstanding any power or authority conferred by or under any Act.

My hon. friend has spent half an hour setting forth the decision of the Privy Council under a special law referring only to the special Act of this company. But subsection 2 of section 374, as presented to this committee, is as follows:—

Notwithstanding anything contained in any special or other act or authority of the Parliament of Canada or of the legislature of any province, the company shall not, except as in this section provided, acquire, construct, maintain or operate any works, machinery, plant, line, pole, tunnel, conduit or other device upon, along, across, or under any highway, square or other public place within the limits of any city, town, village or township, without the consent of the municipality.

Mr. Price absolutely met all the conditions of the Privy Council case. He provided that notwithstanding anything in the special Act a company may not erect a pole, line, or conduit, whether for distribution or transmission—

Mr. MACDONELL: When Mr. Price drew that memorandum no attention had been drawn to the Toronto-Niagara Power Company or the Privy Council decision so far as I know.

Mr. CARVELL: I am not prepared either to affirm or to deny that. If my hon. friend says that is true I accept his assertion.

Mr. MACDONELL: He may have dreamt it, or had it in his mind, but no public decision or reference had taken place.

Mr. CARVELL: These cases dragged on for three or four years; Mr. Price is too good a lawyer not to have known that they had been before the Appeal Court of Ontario and the Privy Council. My hon. friend (Mr. Sinclair) tells me that Mr. Price refers to the Privy Council case in his memorandum. Mr. Price says:—

Putting lines and wires upon highways and public places. Here an important change is made. It had been held by the Privy Council that "company" in former section 247 was confined to railway company and that power companies, etc., which were given powers in their Special Acts to construct upon highways, could, where there was no restriction in the Special Act, do so without any consent or leave and without being put upon any terms or conditions. (See judgment Privy Council given July, 1912, in Toronto and Niagara Power Co. v. North Toronto (1912) A.C., 834.)

So that Mr. Price knew all about it. My hon. friend's argument, therefore, comes to an end.

Mr. MACDONELL: That does not alter the case at all.

Mr. CARVELL: His argument goes up in smoke. The first three subsections provide that the company cannot erect a pole or string a wire, either for transmission or distribution, without the consent of the municipality. My hon. friend draws a distinction between transmission and distribution, but that is only a technical point. Usually a line which has high voltage is called a transmission line; when the voltage is somewhat reduced, it is called a distribution line. However, under the provision as drafted by Mr. Price, a company may not erect a line, pole, or anything that carries electricity, in any municipality without the consent of the municipality. And, if the municipality is unfair, the right of appeal to the Railway Board is provided, and it is for the Railway Board to set out the conditions under which this distribution and transmission shall take place.

Mr. MACDONELL: I did not know that Mr. Price had been aware of the case. But Mr. Price's opinion, as quoted by my hon. friend shows that the Privy Council was wrong in its decision; that it gave a decision against the spirit and intent of the Railway Act. What is asked for here in the retroactive clause, is that that decision be repealed, dating back to the date of the coming into effect of the law.

Mr. CARVELL: I cannot accept any such argument as that. The Privy Council is the last court of appeal in this Empire, and it ill becomes my hon. friend to say that its decision was wrong.

Mr. MACDONELL: Did Mr. Price not try to put it right, in the language that my hon. friend read?

Mr. CARVELL: No. As a result of the decision of the Privy Council, Mr. Price found a condition which, in his judgment, ought to be remedied. This Parliament is the only body having power to remedy that condition, and Mr. Price drafted this section of the Railway Bill with a view to remedying it. But my hon. friends from Toronto are not satisfied that matters of this kind should, in case of dispute, be left to the Railway Board. Notwithstanding the fact that in every other like case the matter is referred to the Railway Board they want it differently in Toronto. Therefore they put in two extra clauses, declaring what the law should have been ten years ago and absolutely preventing the companies concerned from going to the Railway Board. They take it out of the power of this company to extend its lines except with the consent of the city of Toronto—and they know that the company cannot get that consent. Knowing that, they refuse that, appeal to the Railway Board which may be had in all other cases. In no case that came up during the whole discussion of this Bill did I not say: leave it to the Railway Board. I gave my vote on numerous occasions, and in those cases where the matter did not come to a vote, I gave it as my opinion: leave this to the Railway Board.

I believe the Railway Board is one of the finest institutions in the British Empire. I think they are trying to work out the railway law of Canada on just as good lines as they possibly can. I have such faith in them that no matter what railway matter comes up I would say, leave it to the board. I say so to-night. If a question comes up between the Electric Light Company and the city of Toronto, I would say, leave it to the board. There is no more reason why Toronto should not be governed by the general law any more than my little town of Woodstock, or any other town in this Dominion.

There is just one other observation I cannot refrain from making. My hon. friend says, "If you don't put in these retroactive clauses the company may go to some other town and buy a plant there and give the people electric light." What a crime that would be! Think of allowing any company to go to another city and supply people with light at competitive rates. Why in Montreal they are fighting rings around one another just to get competition; it is the very thing they want. Down in our country those gentlemen who have been unfortunate enough to invest their money in electric light are in constant fear that the municipalities will come into competition with them. But in Ontario, for Heaven's sake keep away from competition! If you don't put in these retroactive clauses these men will go to some other town and give the people cheaper light than the Hydro Electric. What a crime that would be! I only need to refer to these matters to show the absolute unfairness of the whole transaction.

Mr. NICKLE: I am considerably impressed by the argument advanced by my hon. friend from South Toronto. If I correctly understood him, the effect of this legislation will be this: In so far as the transmission line goes, that is the line for the carrying of power from one part of the country to the other, if municipalities cannot agree with the company then there is an appeal to the Railway Board for the purpose of determining the terms and conditions upon which the transmission line shall be constructed.

Mr. CARVELL: Does my hon. friend find the word "transmission" or any definition of either a transmission or distribution line in subsection 2 of section 374?

Mr. NICKLE: No, I do not find it there. It seems to me that this is an omnibus clause that defines in general terms the rights of the company and the methods of procedure. Subsection 2 of section 374 is restricted by subsection 4 of the same section. Proceeding with my argument, if I understood the member for South Toronto, the rights of the company for the purpose of the construction of a transmission line depend on subsections 2 and 3 of section 374. If they are able to make a contract with the municipalities through which their line passes then the contract is legal and binding, but in the event of any municipality acting, to use the expression of my hon. friend from Carleton, as a dog in the manger to prevent the construction of a transmission line, then there is an appeal to the Railway Board to determine the terms and conditions upon which the transmission line shall be constructed.

When it comes to the question of the distribution of power, that is the selling of power within the municipality, subsection 4 governs, and the principle is there recognized that the municipalities shall have control of their streets, and if they are not disposed to make a contract with any company there is no right of appeal to the board. This Bill recognizes, so to speak, the autonomy of the municipality. That was the point which I overlooked in my original remarks.

The hon. member for South Toronto made two statements, and I should like to know if he is very sure of his facts. In the first place he said that there is no other company with similar powers under a Dominion charter. I also understood him to say that this company has no distribution plant, the value of which will be affected if the second subsection of section 5 is enacted and becomes law; in other words, there is no distributing plant owned and constructed by the Niagara Power Company pursuant to the terms of the special Act, such construction being illegal provided this Act is retroactive.

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL: With regard to the first point, I have searched myself, and have had the clerk of the Private Bills Committee search through the records and the statutes of Canada to ascertain if there is any other company outstanding, so to speak, and the information I gathered for myself and which was confirmed by him, was to the effect that there is no such company. I recollect that this session we had the Continental Light, Heat and Power Company of Montreal with power largely similar to this company's appear before the committee and have five or six of the public safeguarding clauses inserted in their charter. Last session the only outstanding company that I know of this kind was the Edwards Company here in Ottawa, and they were treated in the same manner. The Railway Board, ever since its appointment, has been named in the various Acts as the tribunal to settle these matters in dispute. Hon. gentlemen will remember that the late Mr. Conmee, when in the House, had a protracted dispute in the committee with regard to this very matter, and his company was saddled with the same thing, and the St. Lawrence Power Company also. I have made every effort to ascertain if there is any outstanding company, and I believe the Toronto & Niagara Power Company is the only one there is.

Mr. NICKLE: My second question was this. The last paragraph of subsection 5 says:

> It is hereby declared that the powers of any such company have been so restricted since the date of the enactment of chapter thirty-seven of the Revised Statutes of Canada 1906, that is to say, the thirty-first day of January, 1907.

If that becomes law, anything done by the Toronto & Niagara Power Company under its special Act for the purpose of constructing a distributing plant would be illegal if a by-law had not been passed. Have I the assurance of the hon. member that the company has no distributing plant in any municipality that will be illegally constructed provided this section becomes law?

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL: I know of no such plant whatever. I believe the facts are these: The Toronto & Niagara Power Company supply the Toronto Railway Company and the Toronto Electric Light Company with power. I know of no distributing plant they may have; I am not saying that they have not any.

Mr. CARVELL: Was it not stated before the special committee that the company was supplying industrial concerns with power?

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL: The concluding part of subsection 4 preserves all these existing contracts.

Mr. SINCLAIR: It was stated before the committee that the Toronto & Niagara Power Company were supplying power in the city of Toronto, and that they had erected poles and were proposing to sell them to some other company. It was stated that this legislation was introduced for the purpose of enabling them to sell the poles to the other company.

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL: My hon. friend is quite correct in saying that they had erected poles. The litigation that provoked this amendment arose out of their action in erecting poles, but those poles were, I believe, for the transmission of the power to the Toronto Railway Company and the Toronto Electric Light Company.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I do not think there is any doubt that what we are trying to do is to take away the right of distributing power in the city of Toronto. The transmission of power does not enter into the question at all. The only question is whether we shall make the legislation retroactive. We all agree that for the future we do not want to give them the right to put a single pole in the streets of Toronto without the consent of the municipality.

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL: Neither in the streets of Toronto nor anywhere else.

Mr. SINCLAIR: But the question is should we go back ten years. That is the point we disputed in the committee, and the point we are raising now.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Blain): Shall the section be carried?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. CARVELL: I move that subsection 5 be stricken out.

Amendment negatived on division. Yeas, 13; nays, 32.

Section agreed to.

On section 376—Provisions governing telegraphs and telephones.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Subsection 8 has been added. It says:

> No order made under the preceding subsection shall apply to the interchange of local conversations between persons using the telephones of two competing systems or lines where such systems or lines terminate upon switchboards located within the municipal limits of the same city, town, or village, except in the case of rural party line telephones in non-competitive areas, and then only when the Board shall deem such interchange to be desirable and practicable.

Mr. GREEN: In line 42, page 151, of the draft Bill, the words "as to compensation" appeared. On the motion of the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) these words were stricken out. There was quite a discussion over this amendment, and there seemed to be some question as to what the striking out of these words meant. The legal gentlemen on the committee said, if the word "compensation" was struck out, it would mean that the board would not have power to award compensation in any case, whether they thought it justifiable or not. The hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. A. C. Macdonell) said:

> From a layman's point of view Mr. Nesbitt's argument is irresistible, but the present Act has the word "compensation" in it. I am simply taking the middle course in this matter as far as I can see it. The word "compensation" is in the Act now, and if we strike it out any court interpreting that amendment would say we intended to remove absolutely any compensation whatever. The word "terms" would mean physical conditions. So that, if we retain the word "compensation" and add the words "if any," we make it plain to the Board and everybody that we do not intend there shall be compensation unless in the opinion of the Board it is justifiable to allow it.

Some of the lay members took exception to the reasoning of the hon. member for South Toronto, and other members argued along the same lines. In my opinion, the words "as to compensation" should have remained in as the Act was drafted. That seemed to be the opinion of quite a number of the members of the committee. The hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt), understanding it differently, said:

> As mover of the amendment I may say it was not by any means my intention to take away from the Board the power to order compensation if in their discretion they thought it ought to be allowed.

Since the committee passed upon that particular section I have made inquiries in many quarters as to the meaning of cutting out the words "as to compensation," and all the legal gentlemen with whom I have had an opportunity of discussing the matter have agreed that the effect is that the board will have no power to award compensation even if in their opinion it is right it should be awarded. I therefore move:

> That subsection 7 of section 376 be amended by inserting after the word "terms" in line 42, page 151, the words "as to compensation if any."

That will leave the matter in the position that if the board is of the opinion the companies are entitled to compensation, it may award compensation.

Mr. NESBITT: My hon. friend (Mr. Green) has stated the position I took excepting that, when I asked that it be reconsidered, I stated that my reason for doing so was that the Bell Telephone man said that he did not have a fair opportunity to be heard and I had no idea of withholding the privilege of being heard from any person.

Mr. CARVELL: I have very great pleasure in supporting this amendment because I believe that if these words were not added the evident intention of the subcommittee would not be carried out. This clause appeared first in the Railway Act, 1906, and it provided that the board might order the terms upon which one company might have connection with another. It said that the board might order the company to provide for such connection or communication upon such terms as to compensation or otherwise as the board deemed just and expedient. A number of telephone companies came before the subcommittee and claimed that they should have the right, even if they were competing lines with the Bell Telephone company in Ontario, to have such connection. It would not be the Bell Telephone Company in the Maritime Provinces or in the West, but we will call it the Bell Telephone Company because it was Ontario people who were making this claim. They contended that even if they were competitors of the Bell in the local business they should have the right to connect with the Bell system and have the use of their long distance lines without paying anything for it. Many of us contended that it should be left to the board. I believe in leaving all these things to the board. The board should have the right to say whether there should be any compensation or not. I think that was the intention of the committee. My hon. friend from North Oxford suggested that we should leave it as it is and if left it would read in this way:

> The corporation may apply to the Board for relief, and the Board may order the company to provide for such use, connection or communication, upon such terms as the Board deems just and expedient.

I think the argument of many of the legal gentlemen, and I entirely agree with it, had a great deal of force that if the word "compensation" appeared in the former Act and was left out of this, the court would necessarily and logically say that Parliament must have some object in leaving this word out. Therefore, the committee took the view that the terms that the board might impose would include compensation and would not have merely to do with the physical connection, the height of the poles, the number of the wires or something of that kind. By leaving out these words we expressly excluded from the board the right to award compensation. I think it is a proper amendment.

Mr. NESBITT. Every rural telephone company in Ontario practically was represented here and they all wanted these words struck out. I want hon. gentlemen representing rural sections to understand that the rural telephone people were here unanimously demanding that these words be struck out.

Mr. GREEN: If they were here asking that these words be struck out they were here asking something that was unfair to other people who had their money invested, and who had a right to be compensated if, in the opinion of the Board, they should be compensated.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I think the principal thing is to leave the Board free to determine it one way or the other. There are cases where there should be no compensation and it was contended that if we left the word " compensation " in, the Board would be under obligation to give compensation in every case. That was not desirable. I note that the proposed amendment has the words " if any " at the end, and if that means that it is left to the discretion of the Board to give compensation or not it may get over the difficulty. As my hon. friend from North Oxford says, this was regarded as a matter of great importance by the rural telephone companies of Ontario. There were eight or nine hundred of them represented, and they were all deeply interested in having these words left out. I do not know what view they would take of the amendment of my hon. friend, because it is written a little differently from the language of the old Act. It may mean that if there is a case for compensation then the Board may give it.

Mr. SEXSMITH: I agree entirely with the sentiments expressed by the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt). The rural telephone people were here and they were very anxious. I thought that what they asked was perfectly right and just. We are all well aware that the Bell Telephone Company is a great company. We know that this company would crowd every other company off the earth if they could. I understand that the section as it was passed by the committee was satisfactory to the rural telephone companies. I think it should remain as it was.

Mr. THORNTON: The matter was, as the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) said very fully threshed out here and the independent companies that were represented went home satisfied with the decision of the committee. The word "compensation" was struck out. The section provides that:

> The Board may order the company to provide for such use, connection or communication, upon such terms as the Board deems just and expedient, and may order and direct how, when, where, by whom, and upon what terms and conditions such use, connection or communication shall be had, constructed, installed, operated and maintained.

That fully covers the ground. The conclusion was that if the word "compensation" was in the Act the Board would be compelled to compensate the company that had the trunk line. As a matter of fact, the local lines bring an immense amount of business to the Bell company.

Mr. COCHRANE: That is only where there are two lines in competition.

Mr. THORNTON: That is true. They do not say that the local company should not be compensated in that case. But the whole ground is covered by the clause which I have just read. The representatives of the independent companies went home fully satisfied with the decision that was reached that day after it had been threshed out before the committee for two days. I think it would be very unfair to those people if at this last moment this snatch verdict should be attempted in this committee.

Mr. SEXSMITH: It would be hard to decide what the Bell Company would call competition. If they have a central office out in a township, does that mean that no other company can go on and organize? I do not think the Bell Company have any reason to find fault or complain about this clause, and I would urge that it remain as it is.

Mr. BOYCE: The amendment does not bind the board to award compensation, but gives power to award it in cases where it is called for. If the word "compensation" is omitted, having been in the old statute, then any court will interpret that as taking away from the board jurisdiction to award compensation.

Mr. THORNTON: The board in cases that came before them took the ground that because the word "compensation" was there they were bound to award compensation. The local company had to pay not only the ordinary long distance rate but had also to pay a surcharge based on the number of their subscribers.

Mr. SEXSMITH: As I understand it, the independent companies are perfectly willing to pay the long distance rate, but the Bell Telephone Company ask a surcharge in accordance with the number of patrons that a private company may have, that charge sometimes running up into hundreds of dollars. That is absolutely unfair to the private company. It shows that the Bell Telephone Company want to have a monopoly, a continuing monopoly, and to make it impossible for any independent company to put up a rural line and have the same service.

Mr. CARVELL: Oh, no

Mr. SEXSMITH: Oh, yes.

Mr. THORNTON: All the power that the board requires to control the situation is to be found in the clause in this Bill. The Bell Telephone Company is amply protected by that clause. I protest strongly against the insertion of the words proposed.

Mr. SEXSMITH: Who is to determine when compensation is due?

Mr. GREEN: The Railway Board will have the right to decide and will decide under the conditions laid before them. My hon. friend (Mr. Thornton) is speaking of the physical conditions as to how the connection shall be made. There is no question that if the word "compensation" is left out, having been in the old law, no compensation will be permissible under any circumstances. I am not asking that the word be put back as it was before, as it might then be claimed that compensation must always be given. I am asking that the Board of Railway Commissioners may be the judges of all the terms, including compensation, if any. I am making it clear, I think, that it is not compulsory to give compensation, that they may be the judges, having all the circumstances before them and, under those circumstances, they may award compensation if, in their judgment, it is necessary.

Mr. THORNTON: That is all provided for right here in the Act.

Mr. GRAHAM: Can any one tell me why, even in the draft Bill, there seems to be a serious omission from the old Act? The section says, "Upon such terms as to compensation that the board deems just." In the old Act I think it says, "As to compensation or otherwise." Why was the word "otherwise" left out? That meant terms as to compensation and otherwise, which would include everything else, the physical condition and so on. Having had something to do with the introduction of this law in the first place, and putting this matter under the Board of Railway Commissioners, making it possible for the local companies to have connection with the trunk lines, I am greatly inclined to the view that we ought to be as lenient as possible, and make terms just as easy as we possibly can for the rural companies. It is only a few years since these rural companies were inaugurated throughout the whole country, and these systems have been paid for by the farmers themselves, largely by the organization of small companies, and these companies have brought the farmers to the market. They can sit in their own houses and find out what the market is every morning, if they like, and keep track of business in a general way, without coming to town. The information is brought to them direct. If the committee, after fully considering the details and hearing all the parties, decided to strike that out, I am inclined to vote to leave it out.

Mr. COCHRANE: The trouble is that the men who moved to put it in went back on it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I was not on the committee which had the drafting of this Bill in charge, but I know something of the conditions affected by these two words that it is moved to insert in the Bill. The rural telephone companies in the district from which I come have been victims of these two words that it is moved should be inserted, and every subscriber on the rural lines in the vicinity of the town of Ingersoll, has had to bear the expense of the charges that have been made by the Bell Telephone Company on the local companies. The hon. gentleman who has moved the amendment got the word "compensation" and "competition" somewhat mixed up. I believe there is a connection between the two words, and that the Bell Telephone Company discriminates against competing companies, which are in operation in places where the Bell Telephone Company is doing business. The Bell Company makes them pay a bonus. That is the object of inserting those words, and I do not think it is fair. I do not think there is any argument to justify allowing the Bell Telephone Company, which has been given every possible freedom and franchises that any company could naturally expect and much more, to bring pressure to bear on these local companies to keep them outside of the district where the Bell Telephone Company are doing business, when they themselves refuse to extend their lines out into the country. These local companies have developed, and some of them have amalgamated, and today they are actually competing, in some of the smaller towns, with the Bell Telephone Company. The Bell Telephone Company are exacting a heavy compensation from the Ingersoll Telephone Company, and the Ingersoll are unable to get redress from the Railway Board, and I think it is unfair and unjust to insert those two words in the Bill. I think the committe who have had this matter in hand have evidently looked into the wisdom of eliminating them, and have acted on the evidence that was submitted to the committee, and I think when they have the evidence there that we should hesitate before adding to this section the words which they eliminated.

Mr. GREEN: I do not want to delay the committee, but I do not want the committee to misunderstand the situation. It is true this matter was before the special committee for a long time; it is true there were representatives of both sides there, and it is true they put their cases forward as strongly as it was possible for them to do. It is also true that the committee, on a vote of four to two, finally struck out the words which were in the original draft "as to compensation". If that particular meeting had been more numerously attended, I have an idea that those words would not have been stricken out. My hon. friend says I was a little mixed as between the words "competition" and "compensation." It is true, when I meant to say the one, my tongue slipped, and I said the other. But I want to point out to him, and to the other members of the committee, that all that the rural telephone people are asking for has been granted them in the Bill, with the exception of where they come into competition with the Bell Company or with an established company. Why is it that it is not fair to give them, these connections without compensation? Because it would put them in this position, that just so long as they are doing a rural business, and in territory that would not be covered by the other companies, they get all these connections without compensation, and they come into a town where there is already a telephone exchange, which telephone exchange may have long distance lines built with their capital, serving a long distance public. You give these independent telephone companies the right to go into that town and in addition to that, if you give them the right without compensation to use the long distance lines of the company that are already constructed, you put them in the position that they can offer to the public their phones at a lesser rate than the other company can afford to, because the other company has a large investment not only in the phones in the town, but in the long distance line. The independent companies can have the right to use those lines without compensation if these words are not put back.

Mr. WRIGHT: Does the Bell Telephone Company not charge the general public a fee that is sufficient to cover all the expenses of those lines?

Mr. GREEN: Yes, it is presumed they do, but at the same time, why should another company be allowed to use the Bell Telephone Company's long distance, or any other company's long distance line?

Mr. WRIGHT: Because that long distance is practically a monopoly.

Mr. GREEN: It puts the independent company in the position in the town, of competing with the Bell Telephone Company, or any other company that is in a similar position, and offering to their subscribers their phones at a lesser rate, with all the privileges of the established line.

Mr. THORNTON: No, the hon. gentleman is wrong there.

Mr. GREEN: I was before the committee and listened to the arguments, and my judgment is that that is the position they are in, and if we refuse to put those words in, you are putting the independent company in a position to use the other man's capital for the purpose of competing with him, because the independent company has no overhead charges, and no investment in the long distance line, and therefore can sell a cheaper service to the public in the same territory that these people are in.

It is only fair and right that the Board of Railway Commissioners, when these matters are put before them, would be in a position to judge of them as they find them. If they find that in competitive fields the Bell Telephone Company or any other company are entitled to compensation, that compensation should be given.

Mr. SEXSMITH: I cannot understand my hon. friend's argument. He says that this provision will place an independent company in a position to do rural business cheaper than the Bell Telephone Company could do it, owing to the fact that the Bell Telephone Company have overhead charges to meet in connection with their long distance service. The hon. gentleman will surely admit that the Bell Telephone Company charge enough for their long distance service to cover all overhead charges and to pay dividends.

Mr. NESBITT: Do they not place a surcharge upon the long distance service?

Mr. SEXSMITH: Suppose a municipal telephone system having four or five hundred subscribers wants to be connected with the Bell Telephone Company at Peterborough. The Bell Telephone Company say: Even though you agree to pay long distance charge, we are not willing that you should use our lines unless you pay a surcharge or an overhead charge in proportion to the number of subscribers you have on your rural route. If this amendment goes through, instead of having a surcharge you will have this compensation. There is in my own riding a large township that could not get any telephone service until the municipality took hold of the matter; now they have a service. Of course, they made amicable arrangements with the Bell Telephone Company.

Mr. CARVELL: Under this Bill they have legal right to connection without the payment of compensation.

Mr. SEXSMITH: Yes, and without the surcharge. But will this compensation take the place of the surcharge?

Mr. CARVELL: No.

Mr. EDWARDS: Do I understand the hon. gentleman to argue that the local company should be entitled to use the Bell Company's long distance line at the same rate as that which the Bell Telephone Company charges to its own customers?

Mr. SEXSMITH: Not exactly. I am a subscriber of the Bell Telephone Company. They ask me, as one of their subscribers, to pay a certain charge for long distance service. Why ask the independent company to pay an extra charge?

Mr. GRAHAM: The man who has not a telephone at all can get the long distance service at the same price as you can.

Mr. SEXSMITH: Exactly; the man who has not a telephone walks into a city telephone office and uses the long distance service; he pays the same as I do. The same may be said in respect to the independent companies. A man who has not a telephone walks into the telephone office at Peterborough, talks over the long distance wire, and pays the same amount for the service as the rural subscriber. The independent people are willing that that be done; I do not see that there is anything wrong about that.

Mr. NESBITT: The compensation that the rural companies object to is for the right to use the long distance lines. For instance, the Ingersoll Telephone Company has to pay $300 a year for the right to connect with the Bell Telephone Company. But an additional charge is made for each conversation, the amount being divided between the rural company and the Bell Telephone Company. I have a connection on my farm with a rural telephone company. We pay an additional ten cents to the Bell Company for long distance conversation; half of that goes to the rural company with which I am connected and half to the Bell Company. The Ingersoll company and the other companies that appeared before the committee did not object to that, but they did object to paying compensation for the right of having conversation over their lines that were connected with the Bell Telephone Company's lines.

Mr. SEXSMITH: Suppose I go to a long distance telephone office in Ottawa and ask to be connected with Montreal. I inquire as to the charge and am told that it is fifty cents. Suppose, then, somebody living outside the city and being served by an independent company ask the Bell Telephone Company to allow him to use their phone to Montreal. They say: We want you to pay fifty cents, the usual charge; but, because you are on an independent line, we ask you to pay an additional ten cents.

Mr. CARVELL: That is subject to the board. If the board says that the extra ten cents shall be paid, it has to be paid. Otherwise, the charge cannot be made.

Mr. SINCLAIR: My objection to the proposal of the member for Kootenay (Mr. Green) is that it will be taken advantage of to prevent competition. The wording of the law as it exists to-day is: "upon such terms as to compensation and otherwise as the board may direct." When there is no competition, the rural company connects with the other and you get your message through at the same rate as the general public pay. If there is competition in the locality, then the extra charge is put on. If an independent company asks for the right to send long distance messages, the Bell Telephone Company says: Are you going to compete with us for local business? If they answer yes, the Bell Telephone Company says: In that case, you must pay an additional charge. If you agree not to compete with us for local business, we will let you connect with our lines and send your long distance messages at the same rate as the general public pay. That is the difficulty I find in supporting my hon. friend; the present section will be used for the indirect purpose of preventing competition.

Mr. GREEN: The other sections give the board the right to make the connection; the only question, therefore, is as to the terms upon which the connection is made. I do not look upon this section as interfering with competition or as being intended to prevent competition.

I think my hon. friend will agree with me, if he has ever tried to do business in a city where they have a competitive telephone system, that it is a nuisance to the subscriber and to the man who tries to do business over it; the people do not get nearly the same satisfaction they would get from a single telephone system. I have no intention whatever of preventing competition, but, generally speaking, I think the day for competition in telephone lines within a circumscribed area in a city is over. The public have tried it on more than one occasion, and it has nearly always failed.

Mr. GRAHAM: Is not this a fair way of putting it? If there were two trunk telephone lines they would both pay a bonus to these independent companies for their business. As there is only one, the penalty of an extra charge is imposed.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: This is evidently a club that is being used by the Bell Telephone Company to keep the local telephone lines out of the district now being served by the Bell. The hon. member for North Oxford has stated that they exact a charge of 10 cents for the use of a long distance phone, and that the charge is equally divided. I think the local company gets 3 cents, and the Bell Company 7 cents.

Mr. NESBITT: Yes, as regards the Ingersoll Company.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: These two words in the section enable them to exact from the Ingersoll Telephone Company $300 a year. The Bell Company wish to keep the local companies out in the country. The Bell Company and every other telephone company is a public utility. They have received a franchise from the people on the understanding that they are going to serve the public.

Mr. GRAHAM: They are on the highways too.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: And on the streets of our cities and towns, and a nice mess they do make of our streets with their telephone poles and wires strewed all over. The municipalities are absolutely helpless; they cannot control the companies to whom they have given a franchise. I think this was a very wise provision on the part of the committee, and I think it would be folly on our part to reinsert the two words which have been eliminated.

Mr. CURRIE: Evidently the Bell Telephone Company was primed and getting ready for this amendment, because in various places all over the country where there are independent lines they have been extending branches of their own from the cities and towns into independent territory. So that if this law is passed they can say that nearly all the country is under their jurisdiction. I have in mind a number of places into which the Bell Cimpany have extended their lines from the city and towns and where they give the same service as they give in the town without any extra charge. Independent telephone companies are also operating in those sections, and they are entitled to some consideration, and should not be crushed by this amendment. The only argument that can be made for this amendment is that there is possibly some mythical connection between the man with a local telephone and the long distance lines. It is well known that any man can go into any of the pay telephone stations in the cities and towns and get a long distance call for exactly the same price as the man who subscribes $40 or $50 a year for a local phone service. So far as the cost of lines is concerned, it is also well known that the best machines you can get only cost about $15, and $2 or $3 worth of wire will string a whole lot of telephone poles. So there is nothing in the story that the Bell Telephone have made a big investment in plant which entitles them to receive, as my hon. friend here says, the privileges of a beneficent monopoly. They get their money back the first year. The day has not yet come when we in this Parliament are prepared to stand up and vote for any concern establishing a monopoly. We are not going to vote, I hope, that any one who enters into competition must pay a monopoly charge. If we are to do that, we shall be legislating next that nobody can run against us as candidates for this House unless they pay a certain amount by way of compensation.

Mr. GRAHAM: I believe we could put that through.

Mr. CURRIE: Perhaps. I believe that the time is coming in the province of Ontario when all the local phones will be owned and controlled by the municipalities. and the municipalities will give as good a service as the Bell Telephone Company for less money. Then why should the Bell Telephone Company be allowed to extend their operations from the villages, as I have described, and then say that the farmers lines must be shut off as they are competing in the Bell area? That is not the intent of this Bill, and I think it would be very dangerous legislation for this House to acknowledge that the Bell Telephone Company has any rights above any other company.

I think this Parliament went a little too far in the first place in granting the right to the Bell Telephone Company to extend their lines all over the country without compensation of some sort. The Bell Telephone Company at the beginning paid a fee for a franchise in every town in which they operated, but to-day they are paying no fee because they have established a monopoly; they are not even paying taxes. They now have the hardihood to ask Parliament for compensation if somebody starts a system in competition with their own. There is no argument in favour of the insertion of these words, and I trust that Parliament will not support the amendment which, if carried, would practically kill off all the local telephone systems in the country.

Mr. T. J. STEWART: I am surprised at the sympathetic attitude of my hon. friend from Kootenay towards the Bell Telephone Company. I do not think he knows as much about them as I do. There has never been a bigger monopoly in this Dominion than the Bell Telephone Company. They will get all there is coming to them; no matter what we do, they will not get the worst of the deal. They use our streets in Hamilton and do what they like. If we accept what compensation they offer us for the use of our streets, they give it to us; but if we do not, we go without anything. They charge us $45 a year for an office phone, $30 for a house phone, and $2 a year for the use of a desk phone that costs them about 75 cents. If we move to a summer home in the country, we have to pay $16 for a telephone, no matter how short a time we use it. This is the company that the hon. member for Kootenay is sympathizing with. I can assure him that I have no sympathy with that company. They are the biggest robbers that ever existed in this Dominion, and if this Parliament did what it should the Bell Telephone Company would have no trunk lines in this country. We would own them ourselves. We have paid for them over fifty times already, I believe. I say that the Bell Telephone Company are not deserving of the least bit of sympathy from this Government.

Mr. GREEN: I was not expressing any particular sympathy with the Bell Telephone Company. I do not know anything about the Bell Telephone Company, good, bad or indifferent, except that I use their phone in the city of Ottawa. This legislation is Dominion-wide. It will apply to the telephone companies in every province, and not in Ontario alone. I cannot see why we should legislate for the whole of Canada to keep some particular law you have here or think you have.

Mr. NESBITT: Before the question is put I would like the committee to understand that this compensation is for the right to be connected, not an additional charge for messages. I have the statement of the Ingersoll Company. The messages "in" were 9,371, the messages "out" were 5,019. The total revenue was $1,436.05, out of which the Bell Company got $1,007.30 and the Ingersoll Company $431.70. The Ingersoll Company had to pay $300 for the right to get that, and that is what they object to.

Amendment negatived.

Section agreed to.

On section 387—Cattle getting on railway.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: There have been very frequent changes in this part of the Act in years past, and while there does not seem to be very great objection to the companies' liability for damage under the present law, serious objection has been urged where it is the custom to have cattle and horses running at large. Therefore, several changes have been made in regard to "exceptions," "gates not kept closed," "gates wilfully left open," and "fence taken down."

Mr. SEXSMITH: Would it not be wise to let this clause stand? I think there are many members who would like to discuss it.

Mr. COCHRANE: The Bill has stood for a long time now.

Mr. NESBITT: I think section 387 is pretty well corrected to cover our country interests.

Mr. SEXSMITH: There has been a great deal of loss in the past because the crossings are not very well protected.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: That was very well threshed out in the committee.

Mr. CARVELL: I will explain to my hon. friend the change which has been made, and I think he will be perfectly satisfied. Section 294 of the old law provided that:

> No horses, sheep, swine, or other cattle shall be permitted to be at large upon any highway, within half a mile of the intersecton of such highway, with any railway at rail level, unless they are in charge of some competent person or persons, to prevent their loitering or stopping on such highway at such intersection, or straying upon the railway.

Subsection 3 says:

> If the horses, sheep, swine, or other cattle, of any person which are at large contrary to the provisions of this section are killed by any train at such point of intersection, he shall not have any right of action against any company in respect of the same being so killed or injured.

Subsection 4 provided:

> When any horses, sheep, swine, or other cattle at large, whether upon the highway or not, get upon the property of the company and are killed or injured by a train, the owner of any such animal so killed or injured, shall, except in the cases otherwise provided for by the next following section, be entitled to recover the amount of such loss or injury against the company in any action in any court of competent jurisdiction, unless the company establishes that such animal got at large through the negligence or wilful act or omission of the owner or his agent, or of the custodian of such animal or his agent.

Section 295 provides that no person whose horses, cattle, or other animals are killed or injured by any train shall have any right of action against any company in respect of such horses, cattle, or other animals being so killed or injured, if the same were so killed or injured because of any person leaving the gates open.

Mr. SEXSMITH: That is a private crossing.

Mr. CARVELL: That is a farm crossing, what you call a private crossing. He has no right of action if the gates were not kept closed, or if they were wilfully left open, or if the fence was taken down, or if the cattle were turned within the railway enclosure, or if they were on the railway without consent. It was decided by the courts of Quebec, Ontario, and I think, Manitoba, that if a man allowed his cattle to run around his buildings and they got on the track and were killed, he had no action against the railway company. I know of a case where a man had his cattle in an ordinary farm-yard, in the winter. He did not keep the bars up, or the gates closed, and the cattle got out and got on the track, and were killed. The courts held that he could not recover because he had been guilty of negligence, and should not have allowed his cattle to roam at large. If my hon. friend takes section 387 of the Act as amended, he will find the railway company is practically an insurer, and practically must pay for any damage occasioned, unless it can show it kept proper gates and lawful cattle guards. Of course, if it does that, and an animal gets through the company should not pay. To all intents and purposes you may say the company now insures the lives of the animals, provided they maintain proper gates and lawful cattle guards.

Mr. SEXSMITH: What is a lawful cattle guard?

Mr. CARVELL: The board has the power to prescribe what shall be a lawful cattle guard. I cannot tell offhand what the regulations are, but I have sufficient faith in the board to feel that they will provide the best cattle guard known to them.

There have been a great many thousands of dollars spent by the Government, and I know it has been a question as to which is the best cattleguard. I think they have all come back to the old slat on an inclined plane. However, that is the general principle of law. You will find that all the rights of the farmer are protected. Of course, if he leaves his gates open, or throws down his fences, or turns his animals loose upon the highway, he has no right to claim compensation and the company should not be liable.

Mr. SEXSMITH: There has been a great deal of loss suffered by farmers. I remember a man who had twelve or fifteen cows; they got out on the line during the night through accident and were killed and he got no compensation. They talk about having a cattleguard. The hon. member for Carleton says that they have wooden slats in some places and that in others they have iron. Of course, these guards are frequently out of repair. They have another kind constructed of square sticks and the cattle walk right over it.

Mr. GRAHAM: The cross-eyed steer did not stop for that.

Mr. SEXSMITH: No.

Mr. CARVELL: I had a stronger case than that in the last six months. A client living within thirty or forty rods of a small country station and siding lost some stock. In New Brunswick our farms are not fenced on the road. We have no highway fences, and this man's cattle were around his premises as they ordinarily were. They got on the track where there were neither fences nor cattleguards. When I came to go into the matter I saw by the authorities that I had no chance of winning the case. The farmer was guilty under the decisions of allowing his cattle to stray away and he had no right of action.

Mr. CRUISE: It is a great hardship to have to fight a railway company before the courts. In my own constituency there have been a lot of cattle killed in years gone by, farmers have suffered great losses and very seldom have they been able to get compensation for those losses. I would like to read a portion of a letter to explain what has happened in the constituency of Dauphin. The writer says:—

> A few years ago there were several horses killed on the track at Valley river inside the fences and the case was taken to the Commission, asking for damages. Chairman Mabee ruled that the claim was just but it was beyond the power of the Commission to compel the railway to put in guards that were of any use or to recompense the farmer for loss sustained.

While the Railway Commission ruled that the guards were inefficient and that the railway should pay damages for the animals that were killed; they had no power to force the company to pay. The Railway Commission should have power to make a railway company pay a farmer for cattle that are killed. If the railway company are liable there is no reason why the Commission should not have power to compel them to pay damages and not put the farmer to the expense of enforcing his claim in the courts. The writer goes on to say:—

There has been at least five times the stock killed on the main line between Dauphin and Ashville as there has been between Dauphin and Valley River. The line to Valley River has no fence and the Ashville line is fenced.

The reason for that is that the cattleguards are absolutely useless, and if the cattle get over the cattleguard and stray upon the railway, when the train comes along, they are fenced in there and cannot get out. I am speaking of wild, unsettled land. Where the railway track is not fenced there is not so much danger. The letter continues:—

The stock walk across the cattleguards and are then trapped between the fences. The slaughter has started this year again. Two horses were struck Saturday morning; one killed; the other had its leg broken. As a precaution we farmers are going to fence across the road at the crossings, putting a gate at each side. How long that will be allowed to stay I don't know, but something has to be done if we are going to have any use of the thousands of acres of vacant land that the settler has to pay the taxes on, both school, municipal and patriotic, and build roads past. In our school district there are over twenty quarter-sections that do not bear taxes and a number more that the tax is very light. The same with the war appropriation; it is distributed to the districts in proportion to amounts received so the only way to get anything off this vacant land is to keep stock and pasture it. We get a lot of advice about keeping more stock, producing more, our duty to our country, etc., but very little about our country's duty to us. There is very little encouragement to keep stock if the railway is allowed to slaughter them as they have in the past.

The Railway Commission should have power to force the railway company, where they find they are liable, to pay the farmer without putting him to any more expense. It is very important that the farmer should get protection along that line to encourage him to increase his stock. I am sure that hon. gentlemen opposite know what it is to fight a railway company. Any farmer of small means has no chance whatever if he goes into court against a railway company. They will beat him if they can. I would respectfully ask the Minister of Railways to consider this matter and see if he cannot give the commission more power to force the railway companies to pay for any stock that they are entitled to pay for.

Mr. SEXSMITH: The other evening we passed a clause prohibiting cattle being allowed to run on the road within half a mile of the railway, although we admitted that we did not have authority to do that. We assumed that we had that right, and now we give the railway companies the benefit of another clause here which says that:

Where any such animal, by reason of being at large within half a mile of the intersection of a highway with any railway at rail level contrary to the provisions of section 278, is killed or injured by any train at such point of intersection, the owner of such animal shall not have any right of action against any company in respect of the same being so killed or injured.

It seems very extraordinary that, having passed one clause, which we practically admitted the other night we had not power to pass, we give the railway company the benefit of another section, that if cattle are running within half a mile of the railway and accidentally get on the track and are killed, the owner will not have any claim for damages.

Mr. CARVELL: Does my hon. friend realize that these cattle are at large within half a mile of the railway crossing, that they get on the track at the crossing and are killed at the point of intersection? The railway company must run their trains, and the man who permits his cattle to run at large with nobody looking after them and to get on the highway crossing should not have any right to come back on the company.

Mr. SEXSMITH: That is not the point.

Mr. CARVELL: That is what the subsection does.

Mr. SEXSMITH: I know, but we passed that other clause making it illegal to allow cattle to run within half a mile of the railway, and we could not pass this clause if we had not passed the other. Because we assume in this section that since it is illegal for an animal to be on the road within half a mile of a railway, if it strays on the railway and is killed it is illegally at large and the company have no liability.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not agree with my hon. friend. If the animal is killed on the intersection of highway and railway the company is not liable, but if the animal strays from the highway on the railway right of way, unless the company have competent gates or cattleguards, the company is responsible. That is provided in the first part of section 387. Thus, even if you allowed your animals at large within half a mile of a railway, and they got across a defective cattleguard and were killed, you could still recover from the company. But if they were killed at the point of intersection they would have no business to be there and the company would not be liable.

Mr. SEXSMITH: My observation has been that cattle have no difficulty in getting over the guards; they simply walk over. It seemed strange to me that we should make reference to that clause in this one.

Section agreed to.

On section 388: Fires from locomotives —liability for fire caused by locomotives.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: This has been amended by inserting in the part of the first section providing that the insurance on property destroyed by a fire caused by a locomotive shall be deducted from the total amount of damages sustained by any claimant, the words:

Where the company has used modern and efficient appliances and has not otherwise been guilty of negligence.

It was thought unfair that the railway company should have the benefit of the owner's insurance against fire in a case where the fire was due to the company's negligence.

Mr. DEMERS: I beg to move an amendment to the first clause of this section. The section begins:

Whenever damage is caused to any property by a fire started by any railway locomotive, the company making use of such locomotive, whether guilty of negligence or not, shall be liable for such damage.

I would propose to strike out the words "making use of such locomotive" and to substitute: "operating the railway on which the locomotive is moving," and to add at the end of the first paragraph of this clause the following proviso:

Nothing in this clause shall prejudice the right of the said company operating the railroad to recover such damages from the company whose locomotive caused the fire.

My reason for proposing this amendment is that there are many companies having only a right of way on other lines. For instance, in my riding the Delaware and Hudson and the Central Vermont have a right of way on the Grand Trunk, and the Rutland has a right of way on the Canadian Pacific. Two years ago I had a case against the Grand Trunk for damages to property caused by fire started by a locomotive moving on the Grand Trunk railway line. The Grand Trunk especially pleaded that it did not make use of that locomotive, but that that locomotive was owned and used by the Delaware and Hudson. As it happened, I won the case, although I do not know what would have happened on an appeal. It is quite impossible for a farmer, for instance, to determine which company is making use of the locomotive which caused the fire. If the words of this clause as it stands now were to be interpreted literally, the right of action would be illusory, and I think we should make it clear in order to remove, if possible, all ambiguity.

[Mr. Sexsmith.]

Mr. GRAHAM: Then you would sue the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk would come back against the Delaware and Hudson.

Mr. CURRIE: Why did not my hon. friend sue both parties?

Mr. DEMERS: Then I might be called on to pay costs if I did not succeed against one of the companies. I had a case of that kind and my clients were obliged to pay $300 or $400 costs.

Mr. NESBITT: I think that ought to be considered. The law clerks should look into it.

Mr. THORNTON: This clause was pretty fairly discussed by the special committee some weeks ago, and whilst I was somewhat interested in it, the more we looked into the matter, the less objection could be taken to the clause as it stands. I quite recognize the difficulties that the hon. gentleman has referred to, but railways have some rights which should not be altogether overlooked, and my principal objection at the present time is that, whilst the railways have rights, owners of property along the railway have rights as well, and they are up against a great many difficulties. Insurance companies do not consider them very good risks, and in that way do not care too well to take them. My principal objection is to subsection 2, which reads as follows:

No action shall lie against the company by reason of anything in any such policy of insurance or by reason of payment of any moneys thereunder.

If any of these properties are insured and a fire occurs, the owners of the properties have to get their insurance money. In the meantime the owner of that property might find that some of the locomotives were defective, and that these defective locomotives were the cause of the fire. I would be quite satisfied if we struck out the words "or by reason of payment of any money".

Mr. NESBITT: I should think the clause suggested by the hon. gentleman would have to be submitted to the legal department. We threshed out the insurance matter pretty fully in the committee.

Mr. COCHRANE: I think it had better stand, and I will keep the amendment till the next sitting of the House.

Section stands.

On section 392—Limitation and defences.

Mr. ARMSTRONG: Mr. Prices's note in regard to this section is :

In subsection 1, the words "and notwithstanding anything in any special Act may" are inserted, to ensure, uniformity as far as possible.

The company's right to plead not guilty by statute, without giving any particulars of its grounds of defence as is required from ordinary litigants is taken away by subsection 3. It was felt to be unfair that the company should have special privileges in this regard, and such defences, at all events, seem out of keeping with the simplicity and non-technicality of modern legal procedure. In the fourth line we change the word "one" to "two," and make the same change in the sixth line.

Mr. CARVELL: It is a pretty important change.

Mr. ARMSTRONG: Yes, it was pretty fully discussed.

Mr. CARVELL: You are extending the time in which to bring an action to two years.

Mr. ARMSTRONG: Yes. The Railway Brotherhood were most insistent in that request. They urgently pressed their claim, and were able to show that it was practically impossible, where a man had been seriously injured, in a year's time to be able to show exactly what was likely to occur, and they wanted it to be extended to two years.

Section agreed to.

On section 393—Disobeying orders of the board.

Mr. ARMSTRONG: This is a new provision, intended to make the powers of the board more effective.

Mr. GRAHAM: We have proceeded too rapidly on some of these clauses, not however on the one relating to telephones. However, we will not lose any time by adjourning now.

Mr. COCHRANE: Let us go on for 15 minutes.

Mr. GRAHAM: Supposing I talk for fifteen minutes, what will happen?

Mr. NESBITT: Let us stop.

Mr. COCHRANE: Let us go on.

Mr. GRAHAM: Section 393 is altogether new. We have had no explanation of what the new provisions mean. The chairman reads three or four lines, and asks us to take Mr. Price's statement. We want to know what this clause means, and not what Mr. Price says it means. Whoever is in charge of the Bill should tell us what it means.

Mr. COCHRANE: It is not all new.

Mr. GRAHAM: It is marked new.

Mr. ARMSTRONG: It merely calls attention to the disobeying of the orders of the board, and the liability of the officers of the company, and the liability of the officers of the municipality or corporation, and other liabilities, and prosecutions. I might call the attention of the committee to the fact that, in the tenth line, after the word "director" we inserted the word "and," between "director" and "managing director" and struck out the words "and superintendent" in the same line. These are the only changes.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is a change from the draft, but this is a new clause.

Mr. ARMSTRONG: Merely a reconstruction.

Mr. CARVELL: It is not a reconstruction; it is an entirely new section. To some extent it is a reconstruction of the clause in the draft Bill, but it has not appeared in the Railway Act before.

Mr. COCHRANE: Part of it has.

Mr. CARVELL: No, it is all new. Subsection 2 provides:

Wherever it is proved that any company has neglected or refused to obey an order of the Board made under the provisions of this Act, the president, the vice-president, each vice-president where there are more than one, and every director and managing director of such company shall each be guilty of an offence for which he shall be liable to a penalty of not less than twenty dollars and not more than five thousand dollars, or imprisonment for any period not exceeding twelve months, or both, unless he proves that, according to his position and authority, he took all necessary and proper means in his power to obey and carry out, and to procure obedience to and carrying out of, such order, and that he was not at fault for the neglect or refusal to obey the same.

Suppose a divisional superintendent or district superintendent was ordered to do a certain thing. Would it be proper to submit him to a penalty of $5,000 when he was really carrying out the instructions of his superiors? It seems to me that this is rather drastic provision.

Mr. GRAHAM: If I had had opportunity during the last few minutes, I would have called your attention, Mr. Chairman, to the fact that there was not a quorum present. I think that we had better adjourn.

Progress reported.

THE MILITARY SERVICE BILL.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

On the Order being called:

House again in Committee on Bill No. 75, an Act respecting Military Service.—Sir Robert Borden.

Mr. GRAHAM: In reason, I ask that the House adjourn. It is now ten minutes after twelve; we have sat on the Railway Bill since three o'clock. It is easy for hon. gentlemen—I do not mean any member of the Government; they are always busy—who have not been in the committee to come in now and wish us to go on sitting for some time. No one on this side of the House dreamed that this Bill was going on to-night in committee. I think that is absolutely unfair, and I protest most absolutely against going on.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not think that the Government, or any member of it, can claim that any member on this side has unduly tried to prevent the passage of this Bill through committee. The Solicitor General himself must agree that the criticism has been fair; that there has been no unreasonable criticism. It is after twelve in the morning. The leader of the Opposition and gentlemen who have taken a very active part in the discussion of this Bill are not here. So far as I know they had no knowledge or intimation that the Bill was to be taken up at this stage. It seems to me to be very unfair to ask us to take up this Bill this morning.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is needless for me to say that there was no intention of being unfair to the Opposition, or to any member of the Opposition. I understand that the intimation was given that the committee would sit on this Bill and go out of committee to-night. Apparently that intimation did not reach hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. CARVELL: I never heard of it. My hon. friend (Mr. Tobin) came in about five minutes ago and said to me: do you know that the Government intends to take up the Military Service Bill to-night? I said: surely not. He said: I was told so in the lobby. I said: it cannot be possible, we have had no notice; I do not believe that the Solicitor General would do it.

Mr. TOBIN: I got that information from the chief whip.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am sure that that information did not reach hon. gentlemen opposite. I simply wish to explain. As the Bill has been amended in committee, we could not get the third reading to-day without a day's notice, and it would seem to me that hon. gentlemen might, if we do not go on now, raise no objection to our going on with the third reading this afternoon. The Bill has been reprinted and is in the hands of hon. gentlemen, so that there should be no objection this afternoon to our going on to the third reading if we do not now proceed in committee, but wait for committee until this afternoon.

Mr. GRAHAM: This is the most important Bill that has come before the Parliament during many years. Personally, I would prefer that the Bill should have a third reading to-morrow—I can only speak for myself; I have not had an opportunity of consulting with any person.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You mean this afternoon.

Mr. GRAHAM: On Thursday; I would not have any objection. I can only speak for myself, because I did not dream that the matter would be brought up at this stage. Personally, I would rather have the third reading on Thursday, because I have to leave on the eleven o'clock train to-night.

Mr. MEIGHEN: At the request of the leader of the Opposition, the Bill was not taken out of committee. If, therefore, it is understood that we go on with the third reading to-day, I certainly shall not ask the committee to go on now, against the protests of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. CARVELL: I would like to put myself on record as the member for South Renfrew did. I would have no objection to the Bill being read this afternoon if it were understood that the vote, if there be one, be not taken until after eight o'clock. Some hon. gentlemen, not knowing that the matter was to come up, having received no intimation in that regard, have some very important business affairs to attend to in Montreal to-morrow afternoon, but will be back here at eight o'clock. I know that the Government cannot meet the wishes and convenience of every member, but to my knowledge these gentlemen have gone away, having, as I say, received no intimation whatever that this Bill was coming up. It would be only fair, therefore, to put off the vote, if there is one, until after eight o'clock.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I see no objection to that.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: It is only fair to say that at eleven o'clock on Wednesday morning I informed the chief Whip on the other side that the Bill would be taken out of committee on Wednesday in order that we might have the third reading on Thursday. If there is no objection to taking the Bill up in committee and having the third reading to-day, that is satisfactory.

Mr. GRAHAM: Personally speaking—the leader of the Opposition may take objection, I do not know—I may say that if the Whips made an arrangement that the Bill be brought in on Wednesday, that arrangement was not kept.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: That the Bill be taken up in committee at this sitting, so that we would be within the rules.

Mr. GRAHAM: I leave it to the Chief Whip himself whether sitting until twelve o'clock on another Bill would be complying with that arrangement.

Mr. W. S. MIDDLEBRO: The agreement was the we should have the third reading at the next sitting of the House.

Mr. GRAHAM: A man may write a letter and if you do not reply and state your objections, it is taken for granted that you agree with him. The hon. member for North Grey has said that we could have the third reading. For myself I would prefer it that way, but the leader of the Opposition and other hon. gentlemen who are not now present might take some other view. When the Prime Minister was asked last night what business would be taken up on Wednesday he said: "The Railway Bill, and any other Bills on the Order Paper, and then Supply," which would indicate that he had not the Conscription Bill in his mind.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: One of the reasons for desiring to go on with the third reading now is that otherwise it would have to be postponed probably until next Tuesday in order to take a vote.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT, 1917.

CONSIDERATION OF THE BILL IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE HOUSE.

House in committee on Bill No. 75, respecting Military Service.—Sir Robert Borden (resumed from Friday, July 13).

Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Mr. GRAHAM: I protest again. It is absolutely unfair, and as far as I am concerned I shall take no part in the discussion. I have supported this Bill at every stage and propose to support it, and I do not think I am entitled to treatment of this kind from the Government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I stated on behalf of the Government that I did not feel like pressing this over the protest of hon. gentleman opposite, but in view of the arrangement made by the whips I say that hon. gentlemen should undertake that no objection will be raised at the next sitting of the House on the technicality that we did not give notice of the third reading coming up. It could be no more than a technicality, because the Bill would have been reported the other evening but for the request made on behalf of the leader of the Opposition. The Bill has been reprinted, and is in the hands of the hon. members of this House, and I do not think, it is asking too much to go on with it. However, we are ready to defer to the wishes of hon. gentlemen opposite, even in the face of an arrangement that has been made; I stated that plainly before the Speaker left the Chair. But I think we should have an understanding clear and definite that we will not be held up at the next sitting of the House and asked to defer the third reading until next Tuesday. Surely that is not unreasonable.

Mr. CARVELL: I am in the same position as my hon. friend from South Renfrew. I have given the Government all possible assistance in the passage of this Bill. I had not the slightest intimation that it was coming up to-day. We went into committee on the Railway Bill at three o'clock, and I think the hon. member for South Renfrew and I have given the Government every possible assistance in getting it passed. There are no two members in this House, except the Minister of Railways and Canals and the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. J. E. Armstrong) who have sat here so continuously since three o'clock as the hon. member for South Renfrew and myself, and in view of that and our attitude towards this Bill, I do not think it is fair to ask us to bind people who are not here.

Progress reported.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Reid, the House adjourned at 12.20 a.m., Thursday.

Thursday, July 19, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by asterisks.)

WAR SUPPLIES—CLOTHING.

*Mr. MURPHY:

1. Has the Government purchased, in England, cloth for Canadian soldiers' uniforms?
2. If so, in what quantity, and from whom?
3. (a) Has the cloth so purchased been sent to Canada for inspection? (b) And afterwards shipped back to England to be there made up into uniforms?
4. If the cloth so purchased in England was not inspected in Canada, where and by whom was it inspected?
5. Has cloth purchased in England been shipped to Philadelphia or to any other place in the United States to be there made up into uniforms for Canadian soldiers?
6. If so, what was the total number of carloads so shipped?
7. Since March 1, 1917, how many Clothing Inspectors have been dismissed, and what was the reason for dispensing with their services?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1. Yes.
2. 28,998½ yards, from Mark Fisher & Co., Huddersfield and Montreal.
3. (a) Yes, (b) No.
4. Answered by 3 (a).
5. No.
6. Answered by 5.
7. 18 inspectors employed in the inspection of clothing of one kind or another have been discharged since March 1. Of these only 8 were employed in the inspection of uniform clothing; their services were dispensed with because there was no work for them to do.

SALT FOR FISH CURING.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. G. W. KYTE (Richmond): I desire to direct the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to this telegram which I received yesterday evening:

> Not a bag of salt is available on south shore of Island and fishermen compelled to tie up boats unless something done immediately; say situation desperate at Gabarus, Louisburg, Forchu.

[Mr. Carvell.]

Has the minister been able, since the matter was brought to his attention some months ago, to make any arrangements for the importation of salt into Nova Scotia?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Communications passed between the British Government, my department, and the Marine and Fisheries Department, and arrangements were made by which, it being almost impossible to get private vessels, Admiralty transport vessels coming from the other side would bring salt when the salt was at such ports that it could be taken on those transports without too much delay. Instructions were given and advice sent that all the importing companies or importers should, through their agents, get into communication with the High Commissioner in London and, through him, with the Admiralty Office, so that details could be arranged on the spot. Various cargoes of salt have under that arrangement been brought by transport to Newfoundland and to Nova Scotia, but as I understand it, some difficulty arose as to the charge that was made for the freight, the Nova Scotia importers contending that the charge was too great and that it was really prohibitive. The Newfoundland importers, however, paid the charges and got their salt—plenty of it. I think it would have been possible for the Nova Scotia importers to have received theirs if they had agreed to the Admiralty charge. That arrangement is still open and can be taken advantage of by any importer under the conditions that I have mentioned; but the Government itself has not even a peck of salt and cannot supply any.

Mr. KYTE: I understand that the Government of Newfoundland does not deal in salt either, but has succeeded in getting salt imported. Have any cargoes actually been delivered in Nova Scotia by virtue of the arrangement that the minister mentions?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I understand that one or two have. I will make definite inquiries about that, and give my hon. friend the particulars later.

TRANSPORTATION OF FISH.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Rouville): Might I call the attention of the Minister of Railways to this despatch that I received this morning from the manager of a fishing firm in Gaspe county:

> Grand River, July 19, 1917.
> Fish striking in plentiful on the coast. Cannot get enough of cars to ship our fish. Railway here refuses to give us I.C.R. cars, would you please take matter up. If we cannot get the Government cars, it will be impossible to get through our work and it will also hurt the poor fishermen to a large extent.

(Sgd) James Walsh.

I think Mr. Walsh represents the Robin firm, or another of the large fishing firms. The railway to which he refers is the Atlantic, Quebec and Western. Will the minister take the matter up and see if Intercolonial railway cars cannot be sent for the transportation of that fish?

Mr. COCHRANE: This is the first time the matter has been brought to my attention. If the hon. gentleman will let me have the telegram I will immediately make inquiries by wire.

INSPECTION AND GRADING OF HAY.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 112, to amend the Inspection and Sales Act, Hay Inspection. He said: The resolution was passed four or five days ago, and this is the introduction of the Bill founded on the resolution.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT, 1917.

House in committee on Bill No. 75, respecting Military Service.—Sir Robert Borden (resumed from Friday, July 13th).

Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I report the Bill?

Mr. MARCIL. May I ask the Solicitor General a question? I have a letter from a young professional man of Montreal, who is of military age. He wants to know if there is anything in the Bill which permits of a certain delay to settle up their business on the part of men who are called to service, as he states has been done in England.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is a provision in the Bill which permits of that. It may be conditional as to time—indeed it has to be conditional as to time in all cases such as my hon. friend mentions, and a man may complete whatever business arrangements he may be engaged in.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I drew the attention of the right hon. leader of the House to the question of insurance premiums. Several young men who are liable to be called under the Act have written stating that the insurance companies find it necessary to raise the premiums. For instance, a young man who has agreed to pay a premium of, say, $200 a year, is subject to the war risk if he is called, and he may have to discontinue paying the premium, and lose whatever payments he has made. This is a very serious condition, and I would like to know if it is not possible to devise a means by which the extra cost of the premium might be paid by the Government, or if legislation should not be enacted fixing a maximum rate or obliging the insurance companies to maintain the present rates. I have seen this question discussed in the public press, and I am sure many hon. members have received such representations from their constituents who are liable to be called. It seems to me the Government should take the matter in hand, and either assume the excess rate of premium or amend the Insurance Act in such way as to fix a maximum premium. The right hon. gentleman (Sir Robert Borden), in the absence of the Minister of Finance who administers the Insurance Act, was kind enough to inform me that the question had engaged the attention of the Government. What statement has the Government to make on the subject?

Mr. GRAHAM: Before the Prime Minister speaks, may I point out the difficulty in the way of the proposition made by my hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux). Insurance companies are for the protection of a vast number of widows and orphans, and they must keep faith with those who are insured and must maintain themselves in a position to carry out their contracts. Most of the companies in Canada have for those who insured before the war, a war clause in their contracts, and if they have gone to the front they have gone under the same conditions as existed before and do not pay any extra premiums. Since the war broke out every risk taken has a clause which says that if the insured goes to war the rates shall be war rates, and the amount is stated in the contract.

Mr. LEMIEUX: As an expert in insurance, would my hon. friend (Mr. Graham) kindly inform me what is the extra premium for war risks on, say, $1,000 of insurance?

Mr. GRAHAM: The rates differ with different companies. Some companies, particularly the smaller ones, have practically placed themselves in the position that they do not care to take war risks, because they feel they cannot do it without impairing their financial stability. The increase is considerable. If the Government wishes to take the responsibility of assuming the extra liability, I have no objection; but if the Government were to pass an Act saying that all companies must carry these war risks at a certain rate, notwithstanding the contract with the insured, they might as well ask many of the companies to give up their charters and go out of business. That would be altogether unfair to the insured, because life insurance is not like an ordinary business. A life insurance company is a protector, and it charges so much for the protection it offers. Its first duty is to protect the widows and orphans of the insured. I would protest against the passing of an Act to compel insurance companies to carry these risks at a lower rate than they now carry them, because it would mean that many of the smaller companies might as well hand over their whole business to the Government.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I ask the Minister of Militia if it is true, as I have seen stated in some of the United States papers, that the United States Government has decided to effect insurance to the extent of $4,000 upon all those who enlist, the Government paying the premium? It has occurred to me that that is a very proper thing to do, and if it has been done the example might very well be emulated here.

Mr. BRADBURY: Would that apply to the 400,000 men already at the front?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not see why it should not.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: With respect to the inquiry of the hon. member from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), I may say the Minister of Finance has been absent, and only returned at one o'clock to-day, so that there has been no opportunity of conferring with him. I shall bring it to his attention at the earliest opportunity. It is not a subject that can be dealt with in this Bill, but there is a great deal of force in what my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) has urged.

I think he has outlined the situation fairly well. If anything of that kind were done, it could hardly be accomplished by imposing on the insurance companies a liability which they were not willing to undertake and which might result in ultimate disaster to persons interested in the companies as shareholders or as insured. There is matter for consideration in what the hon. member for Rouville has mentioned and I shall be glad to take it up with the Minister of Finance. In reply to my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley), I am informed by the Minister of Militia and Defence that he has no such information about the course pursued by the United States, but we will make inquiry on the subject.

[Mr. Graham.]

Mr. MARCIL: With regard to the insurance matter, a concrete case came to my attention last year. A young boy from my constituency, having enlisted, was killed at the front. After his death his father and mother received a letter which had been written hurriedly by him in lead pencil and in which he said: My life has been insured for $1,000. He did not mention the name of the company and they have not been able to claim the amount. I would like to know if it is possible for the Government to require insurance companies taking out risks on soldiers to report that fact to the department.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I dare say it would be possible but it would be hardly necessary because one would imagine that any one effecting insurance would leave the policy in care of some relative or friend and consequently there would be knowledge on the part of those whose duty it would be to see that the amount was collected.

Mr. MARCIL: This boy did not have the opportunity. Coming from the shanties he enlisted here and his parents, who lived in Gaspé, never saw him. They did not know in which company he had been insured.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If the hon. gentleman would write a letter setting out the information he has, possibly an inquiry could be made which would elicit the desired information.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Shall we take the Bill clause by clause?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would think it not necessary to go through the Bill clause by clause. What the Government has to suggest in regard to the Bill is brief. In the first place, I wish to refer to clause 13. This is the clause which makes the Militia Act, the Army Act and the Kings Regulations and Orders applicable. It has been represented to me with considerable force, chiefly from the legal standpoint, that it would be better to leave out the words " applicable and." The clause reads now that these acts and regulations:

Shall so far as applicable and not inconsistent therewith apply to and form part of this Act.

The subject was called to the attention of the committee by my hon. friend from North Perth (Mr. Morphy). There have been decisions on the subject and when we are making an Act——

Sir SAM HUGHES: Upon what subject?

Mr. MEIGHEN: On the question as to the effect of the words "so far as applicable". When the legislation itself makes the Act applicable, it is better to leave out the words "so far as applicable".

Mr. GRAHAM: It might raise a doubt?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. I therefore move to reconsider clause 13.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I beg to move that the words "applicable and" be struck out.

Mr. MORPHY: Is the word "therewith" intentionally used there?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. MORPHY: It seems to me it should be "herewith".

Mr. MEIGHEN: I remember my hon. friend drawing that to my attention. It seems to me that "therewith" is the proper word. You might read it in this way: "The Militia Act . . . shall form part of this Act so far as not inconsistent therewith." The intention is clear and "therewith" appears to be the proper word.

Amendment agreed to.

On the schedule, subsection 6—Divinity students:

Sir ROBERT BORDEN moved:

That subsection 6 of the schedule be reconsidered.

Motion agreed to.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: This exception in its original form read as follows:

6 Clergy, including members of any recognized order of an exclusively religious character, and ministers of all religious denominations existing in Canada at the date of the passing of this Act.

In committee the words "divinity students and" were added, so that the clause reads:

6. Clergy, including divinity students and members of any recognized order of an exclusively religious character, and ministers of all religious denominations existing in Canada at the date of the passing of this Act.

On further consideration it has been found that the words "divinity students" covered a wider class than was contemplated. As pointed out by the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil), it would include a great many who would also be included in the word "clergy" which is also used in this section. Moreover, it has been represented that it covers a class a very considerable portion of whose members would not desire to be included in the exception. The question arose as to whether or not this particular class of students ought to be included within the terms of the exception or left with other students to take advantage of the exemption clauses. There is reason to believe that those who are not included in the term "clergy" would be so situated as to entitle them to favourable consideration for exemption by one of the tribunals. In the circumstances it is thought best that the clause should be restored to its original form and I therefore move that the words "divinity students and" be struck out.

Mr. MARCIL: I understand the right hon. gentleman to say that students who already form part of the clergy are within the exception?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes.

Mr. MARCIL: Or would that be left to the tribunal?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Those who are not covered by the exception established by the word "clergy" could of course apply for exemption to one of the tribunals.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: This is not a very clear explanation. What are we to understand by "clergy"? The interpretation may be very wide or very narrow according to the views of those who may discuss the question. The clergy, as I understand, are regularly ordained priests or ministers of any religious denomination. We have several religious bodies. Taking two great denominations of the Christian religion, the Roman Catholic and the Anglican, they have regularly ordained priests, and these are recognized as part of the clergy. But do the ministers of more democratic forms of religious government, such as the Presbyterian and Baptist, come under the description of "clergy"?

Sir SAM HUGHES: What about the Methodists?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I see no definition of clergy in the Bill.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In order to remove any possible doubt these words have been inserted in the clause:

Ministers of all religious denominations existing in Canada at the date of the passing of this Act.

As to the definition of "clergy," with regard to the Roman Catholic church, I have followed the interpretation presented to the House by the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil), and I think that the definition which he gave is sustained by the meaning attributed to this word in any of the standard dictionaries.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I have consulted Murray and Webster and I find the following definitions of the word "clergy": Murray says:

The clerical order, the body of men set apart by ordination for religious service in the Christian church, opposed to laity.

According to Webster clergy means:

The body of men set apart, by due ordination, to the service of God, in the Christian church, in distinction from the laity; the clerical order; in England, often by restriction, the ministers of the Established Church; rarely all members of religious orders, male or female.

If my right hon. friend will look at the regulations adopted under the conscription law of the United States, in the official bulletin of Monday, July 9, at page 6, he will find the following:

The following are the only grounds for exemption:

1. That you are an officer, legislative, executive or judicial, of the United States, a state or territory, or the district of Columbia.
2. That you are a regular or duly ordained minister of religion.
3. That you were, on May 18, 1917, a student preparing for the ministry in any recognized theological or divinity school.

I suppose that May 18 is the date of the sanction of the Bill in the United States Congress. That is the regulation adopted as stating one ground of exemption in the United States. Can we do less in Canada? I do not suppose we should, and I think that the amendment which was adopted the other day should remain. It seems to me to be more in accord with the legislation passed by the United States.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I made some inquiry on the subject and I have satisfied myself that if we were to adopt the United States amendment, with a date fixed by the time when the Act comes into force, it would be of no practical service because it would not include divinity students in this country. The reason is that the divinity course in this country begins in September and ends in June. Any person who would have completed that course would have been admitted to the minor orders to which my hon. friend from Bonaventure alluded. The word "ordination" which is used, I think, in the extract read, obviously means the admission to an order. There is more than one order of the clergy in different churches. For instance, in the church to which I belong, there are bishops, priests, and deacons. They are all clergy as distinguished from the laity. In the Roman Catholic church, as I understand, there is perhaps a greater number of orders. At all events, I accepted the interpretation which the hon. member for Bonaventure put upon the word. In view of the circumstance I have mentioned, that the words "divinity students" would include a great many who would come under the definition of "clergy," it was thought that those who were not within the meaning of that word might be left to exemption by tribunals instead of absolute exemption under this clause.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I am seeking information as to who will be included under the word "clergy." There are certain religious denominations in which the word "clergy" is well understood. The Presbyterians and Methodists, I think, have regularly ordained clergy, and that is well understood. I do not know whether the Quakers have clergy or not, or any regularly ordained ministers. I do not know whether the Baptists have regularly ordained clergy, although they have clergy, and upon this point I should like some information.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In England the word "clergy" alone is used. We, perhaps, have a wider range of denominations in Canada than they have in England, but we use the same word as is used in Great Britain, and add, so that there shall be equal treatment of all recognized religious denominations in this country, the words: "and ministers of all religious denominations existing in Canada at the date of the passing of this Act." Therefore, it seems to me, whatever may be the meaning of the word "clergy"—and I think it must have a well defined meaning or it would not have been included in the statute in Great Britain—we have made it sufficiently wide to guarantee equal treatment to all recognized religious denominations.

Mr. LEMIEUX: So that the clause, according to the latest amendment, will read:

Clergy, including members of any recognized order of an exclusively religious character, and ministers of all religious denominations existing in Canada at the date of the passing of this Act.

How does this affect the ecclesiastics? Before becoming a priest, a young man has generally completed his course of studies in our classical colleges. I speak from experience, as I was educated in one of the Quebec colleges. The course of studies begins with the Latin course, and continues until the student has attained the class called rhetoric. That is in the sixth year.

Then there are two years of philosophy, the course beginning in the sixth year and being completed in the eighth. Many of these young men, having thus completed their course, become what I might call junior professors in these colleges—I am speaking of the Catholic institutions, of course. These professors are considered as belonging to the minor orders, because it takes from three to four years more before a student can be ordained for the priesthood. I would like to know if these professors in our colleges will be granted exemption. There is another point. The section says, "Clergy, including members of any recognized order of an exclusively religious character." We have in the Catholic church what are called contemplative orders—and my hon. friend from Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) is, no doubt, very familiar with this class of our religious orders.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I do not know what my hon. friend means by "Catholic." Does he mean Roman Catholic?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Oh, yes. We have contemplative orders such as the Trappists and others. There is one Trappist monastery in the province of New Brunswick, and there are two or three in the province of Quebec. These Trappists, although belonging to a contemplative order, devote a considerable portion of their time to farming; in fact, one of the finest farms between Montreal and Ottawa is the Trappist farm at Oka. The Trappists have there an agricultural college which is subsidized by the Government of the province of Quebec, and also, I believe, by this Government. Will these Trappists, who are not members of an order of an exclusively religious character, but who devote themselves to farming in the public interest, be amenable to military service under this law? I now come to the main point. Might I not suggest to the right hon. leader of the Government that the committee might very well adopt, without offending anybody, exactly the same language as was used in the United States conscription measure? Here is the text of the American regulation granting exemption to "students preparing for the ministry in any recognized theological or divinity school." If there is any apprehension, as was stated, that there will be a rush of young men to the theological colleges, you could insert a provision that those who were divinity students at the date of the passing of this Act shall be exempted? At least, the law would not apply to those students who entered our theological colleges without any idea that this legislation would be placed on the statute books. It seems to me that is a very reasonable suggestion. I do not think there would be any agitation against this privilege being accorded to this class of our fellow-citizens.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Why should the clergy be exempt? There are 250 clergymen of the church of which I have the honour to be an outside pillar, now fighting as combatants at the front, and hundreds more are there as chaplains. I do not see why any clergyman should be exempt. They are a splendid lot of men. Certainly I do not see why any student should be exempt.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: As far as the word "clergy" is concerned, I wish to correct a misstatement that I made. I said that the word "clergy" was used in the British Act, but that is not so; the words used in the British Act are "in holy orders." But in our Militia Act the word "clergy" is used. Our Militia Act excepts "clergy and ministers of all religious denominations."

In reply to my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) I think the words "members of any recognized order of an exclusively religious character" are perfectly plain. I do not care to express any opinion in advance as to what the tribunals will determine. Certain it is that if there is any inconsistency in the interpretation it can be corrected by the Central Appeal Judge. With regard to theological students, it was largely the view expressed by my hon. friend from Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) for whom I have great respect, that led me to reconsider the matter as I did. He is my guide in this respect, and I am content to place his authority against that of my hon. friend from Rouville.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I had not the pleasure of hearing the observations of my hon. friend from Bonaventure on this subject, but whatever his observations may have been, there is evidently a want of knowledge in the House upon a subject with which we in the province of Quebec are all familiar. The other day my right hon. friend (Sir Robert Borden) introduced an amendment including divinity students in the exempted classes. To-day he proposes to remove them; in other words, divinity students will be liable to military service under this Act. This will include a very large number of young men in my province who, I believe, should be exempted. I do not know whether the hon. member for Bonaventure conveyed to the Prime Minister the idea that these young men are part of the clergy. They certainly are not, and upon this point I can safely appeal to my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty). In our province the system of education varies somewhat from the system followed in the other provinces. In the province of Quebec the higher education is in the hands of the classical colleges. The course in those colleges consists of eight years, and embraces some of the subjects in the curriculum of the universities of other provinces. The classical course includes Greek, Latin, all forms of art, literature and so on. After the eight year course those who elect to do so can take their degrees in other professions, such as the law and so on. Quite a number of young men elect to become theological students and take a further course.

They are preparing themselves for the priesthood, though they may not become priests until after a certain number of years. These men who are devoting themselves to the priesthood but who are not yet part of the clergy make up a large class that ought to be exempted under this Act. The ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) says that priests or members of the clergy should not be exempt; that all citizens should be liable to this law. I believe that for about 20 years all citizens of France, no matter what their profession, have been liable to military service and, in time of peace as well as in time of war have been required to spend two or three and a half years in the barracks for military instruction. Although this law was adopted in France, it has always met with strong objection on the part of a large section of the community. To me it is a matter of doubt whether the French republic was well inspired when it took that position. The French republic might have been well advised if in this matter it had followed the example of its neighbour, the British nation, by exempting religious orders from military service.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Fifty thousand of them, good men, are in the fighting line to-day.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It is to the great credit of all these religious orders that they have responded nobly to the call of duty. No citizens of the French Republic have done better or have shown greater courage than these men have. I believe that even if they had been exempted, large numbers of them would have come forward and offered their services. But although these men have been doing their share in defending the soil of the French Republic from invasion, they have always believed, and still believe, that they should be exempted from military duty. At all events, that is the French view. On the other side of the channel they hold a different view. In France they have conscripted everybody, without exception. In England they have not conscripted everybody; they have made certain exemptions amongst which have been included religious orders. We live in a British country and in a matter of this kind it seems to me that we would be right in following the precedent of British freedom and British legislation rather than that of the French republic. I regret exceedingly that my right hon. friend has departed from the provision that he put in the other day and has come back to the Bill as it was originally printed; that is, that he has decided not to exempt divinity students. These young men are preparing for a calling which is supposed to take them away from the thing we have in view, and I hope that my hon. friend will not persist in his decision, that he will agree to leave the Bill as it stands.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My right hon. friend has commended the British example, which he regards as the highest expression of the freedom of the individual in such matters. I would point out that in Great Britain the exception reads as follows:

> Men in holy orders or regular ministers of any religious denomination.

We have gone further than that. If, as has been suggested by hon. gentlemen on the other side, we had proceeded under the Militia Act instead of bringing in this Bill, what would have been the result? That Militia Act was passed under the Administration of my right hon. friend. He says that a clause exempting divinity students should be included. He did not include it in 1904. His exception then was: " clergy and ministers of all denominations," which is not as wide a clause as that which we have introduced. If, then, the view that he entertains is a wise one, it is astonishing that it did not occur to him in 1904. If we had proceeded under the Militia Act to select men by ballot and that selection had included divinity students, what would their position be as compared with their position under this legislation as I propose to leave it? Under the Militia Act there would be no possible exemption for any such person. He would not be within the exception, and there was no provision for exemption in the Militia Act. Under this legislation such divinity students as are not included in the minor orders of the clergy might be called out, but they would still have the right to go before a tribunal and claim exemption under one of the appropriate clauses. In doing that they would have a privilege which they could not have exercised under the legislation which my right hon. friend passed in 1904.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: When I referred to British institutions it was in reference to the comparison which the ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) made as to the practice in France. In that respect British institutions are certainly, in the matter of the preservation of human freedom, ahead of the institutions of the French Republic. As to the Militia Act, we discussed that matter before, and I shall not now refer to it at length. The Militia Act of 1904, which was introduced by the Government over which I presided, was simply a consolidation of English Acts. I do not know that many changes were made; so far as I remember, no change was made in that clause, which goes back to 1868. But we are not now in the year 1868; we are in the year 1917 and we are legislating for a practical purpose. We are legislating to bring in a Conscription Act, a thing unknown in Canada up to the present time so far as active service is concerned. I think my hon. friend was well advised when the other day he introduced a provision exempting that class of young men who intend to devote themselves to the priesthood. To-day, for reasons of his own, he thinks that he should not do so. All I can say is this: he may carry out his present intention, but in my humble judgment he will be making the Act even more difficult of execution than it was before.

4 p.m.

Mr. EUGENE PAQUET (L'Islet) (translation): Mr. Chairman, I agree entirely with the opinion expressed by the right hon. leader of the Opposition. I hope that the Government will comply with the wishes so well stated by one of our statesmen who knows to perfection the province of Quebec. Therefore I could not too earnestly beg the Prime Minister to give satisfaction to the wish just expressed by the right hon. leader of the Opposition.

As our province will have enough to suffer under this bill, I hope the Government will do all in its power not to raise therein any religious strife.

Mr. PROULX: The Prime Minister gave good reasons the other day for amending the exceptions by including therein divinity students. In this connection he consulted the law of the United States, in which divinity students are specially exempted. He now wants to make another amendment taking out of the Bill the exception which he asked the House to adopt the other day, giving as his authority the position taken by the member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil). I am not very sure that my hon. friend from Bonaventure is right. He is only a layman like the rest of us in this House, and he is not a doctor of divinity. I prefer to accept the opinion of the leader of the Opposition—

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: They are making my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) a Doctor of Divinity.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Yes.

Mr. PROULX: I am inclined to the view that divinity students, so far as the Roman Catholic church is concerned, who are not ordained, would not in this Bill be included in the word "clergy," so what would be the objection to making the section more explicit by the addition which my right hon. friend had the other day in the Bill? My hon. friend from Rouville said that the wording might be changed and the wording of the United States law adopted. I prefer the amendment made by my right hon. friend, and I would prefer that the section should stand as it was amended the other day. If the language is going to be changed, the amendment suggested by the hon. member for Rouville does not go far enough.

Mr. MARCIL: I wish to thank the Prime Minister for the kind allusion he has made to me. The remarks I made on this matter were after the right hon. gentleman had introduced his amendment, and they were practically in support of that amendment. I was a member of this House in 1904 when the Militia Act was passed, and amongst other exemptions we had these two: Clergymen and ministers of all religious denominations, and professors in colleges and universities and teachers belonging to religious orders. I supported the amendment the right hon. gentleman suggested because in the Roman Catholic faith a young man has to go through a course spread over four or five years before becoming an ordained priest; and I wanted to make sure that this class were included in the clause of the section now amended by the right hon. gentleman.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think they are.

Mr. MARCIL: The hon. member for Rouville has referred to the Trappist Order. The Christian Brotherhood is another religious order in Canada; its members devote themselves to the cause of education. Christian Brothers will be found in all countries of the globe doing yeoman service. I suppose a member of the Christian Brotherhood would also come under the term "religious orders," although their special work is teaching and is not exclusively religious. The Trappists devote special attention to agriculture. In view of this particular situation, I would ask the right hon. gentleman to allow the section to stand as he amended it the other day.

Mr. OLIVER: In my judgment, there is a vast difference between the Militia Act and the present Bill, inasmuch as the Militia Act was passed for the purpose of raising men for military service, whereas, as I understand the present Bill as presented by the Prime Minister, its purpose is to exempt men from military service. I would like to say further that, as I understand this present Bill, its exemption provisions are ample to protect the divinity students of any church whom the Government may see fit to protect.

Mr. GRAHAM: I may be put out of my own church for what I am about to say—

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Are you sure you are in?

Mr. GRAHAM: My right hon. friend raises a question of public policy to which I cannot reply. So far as the church to which I have the honour to belong, is concerned, I would not exempt the clergy, and I am saying that on the authority of the clergy themselves. Some of the heads of the different conferences have written me suggesting that they do not wish to be exempted in this Bill, even although they are ordained clergymen. I have another reason for my statement, and this is treading on ecclesiastical ground. This is war time, and I am speaking for those who have written to me when I say that sacrifices ought to be made by all equally, and the clergy who have corresponded with me assure me that they are anxious to do their full part. So long as there was on the statute book no law asking that others, who perhaps are in a less influential position, should go, they did not feel it their duty to go although many of them have enlisted.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Two hundred and fifty.

Mr. GRAHAM: But if the necessity at the front is imperative, they want to be classed the same as the other men. I have another reason. In the Methodist church we have in many places two congregations where one minister, particularly in war time, could serve all the people, because out of those churches have gone many young men, and some older men. I see no reason why we should not have a concerted effort by which the clergy and the congregations of the Methodist church would worship together with the two ministers used where only one is required.

Mr. BLAIN: My hon. friend will understand, of course, that there is in the Bill nothing to prevent any clergyman or any other person from going to the front if he wants to go.

Mr. GRAHAM: I have read the Bill and I understood that before, but it is a great responsibility—

Mr. BLAIN: I understand the hon. gentleman takes no objection to that. The Bill does not prohibit any Methodist minister or any clergyman of any other denomination going to the war if he wants to go.

Mr. GRAHAM: The purpose of this Bill is officially to exempt them, and that makes a difference, because a man, if he is exempted, must have twice as much enthusiasm about going to the front as he would have under other circumstances. The Bill says to the clergymen: The country does not expect you to go. The clergy of the Methodist church do not want to be exempted.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: There are exemptions and exceptions provided for in this Bill, and under them the parties affected may claim exemption or they may not, just as they please. There is in the section which we are discussing nothing to prevent any member of a church from enlisting if he chooses to do so, and taking his share in the fight. There are, however, exemptions for the protection of the consciences of those who have conscientious objections to fighting. We have in section 11, paragraph (f) this exemption:

> That he conscientiously objects to the undertaking of combatant service and is prohibited from so doing by the tenets and articles of faith, in effect at the date of the passing of this Act, of any organized religious denomination existing and well recognized in Canada at such date, and to which he in good faith belongs.

That is nothing new. It is part of the English legislation which has been in existence as far back, I think, as Charles II, and was enacted for the Quakers, who had objection to military service. It was done because under the common law every citizen in Great Britain was liable at any time to military service to repel invasion or if the country was in danger. But even then the liberty of conscience which is always so strong in Great Britain led the British Parliament to exempt the Quakers because they had religious objection to spilling blood, and for two hundred or three hundred years the Quakers have been exempt from military service. Divinity students do not come in that category, but the same reasons which would apply to the Quakers would also apply to those young men who, I think, can claim as a matter of conscience that they should not be called for military service. I regret exceedingly that my right hon. friend has not persevered in the amendment he brought in the other day. If the present amendment is carried, it will not assist in making this Act more popular in certain parts of the country, but will have the reverse effect.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The United States has no more state church than we have in Canada, yet they have decided to exempt students. We are allies of the United States in this war, our cause is theirs, and I do not see why we should not do as they have done. I will therefore move in amendment to the motion made by my right hon. friend: That the words "divinity students" be struck off and replaced by the following:

> "Students preparing for the ministry in any recognized theological or divinity school."

These are exactly the words of the United States Act. I move this amendment because, as has been explained by the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and as my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) knows full well, the divinity students in the church to which he and I belong are the professors in our colleges. In the province of Quebec we have something like twenty classical colleges. I am speaking from memory and may be wrong as to the exact number. The body of professors is made up of those young theological students, and if the exemption does not cover them the colleges will be deprived of the services of these young men as professors. As I explained a moment ago, when a young theological student has taught his pupils during his theological course, which lasts three or four years, he becomes an ordained priest, and is then attached to the institution, if he is a man of marked ability in the course of studies, or he takes a vicarage and later on a "cure", in the diocese, and thus becomes a regular member of the diocesan clergy. He is the spirtual head of a parish, and as such is exempt in any event under the bill. If you refuse exemption to young theological students in our colleges you prevent the youth of our province from obtaining their education at those classical colleges. If the United States, where out of a total population of 103,000,000 there are barely 12,000,000 Roman Catholics—I am not exact as to the proportion—congress has thought proper to include this exemption in their Conscription Act, it seems to me in Canada, where 45 per cent of the population is Roman Catholic, we should not be afraid to accept what concession they have made on the matter. It was stated during the course of the debate that there would be a rush towards theological studies by the young men if such exemption were included in the Bill. That is a very poor argument indeed and I protest most strongly against the insinuation. No man of honour would desecrate himself to the extent of accepting Holy Orders with a view to avoid a duty imposed by legislation of Parliament. No young man with any conscience would attempt to do such an immoral act—the qualification is not too strong—in order to avoid service under the present legislation. I hope the committee will at least accept the text of the United States legislation on this subject.

Mr. GAUVREAU, (Temiscouata) (translation): Mr. Chairman, not only shall I vote for the amendment moved by the hon. member from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), but moreover, I deem it incumbent on me to say a few words in this connection, after all, it is well that the country should know where we are at in regard to this clause.

The original clause as it was amended at the request of the Prime Minister, the proposer of the Bill, must have been good since it was agreed upon by the House, and if my memory serves me right, when the amendment moved by the Prime Minister has been submitted to the approval of the House, the hon. members on the other side were pleased to come and ask us not only to refrain from putting difficulties in the way, but even to further its enactment, for they said they had found it hard to have it agreed to. Consequently I believe it is well that the people of this country should be acquainted with what is going on here and with the reasons which may have induced the Prime Minister to so amend his own amendment and to turn about. I deem it my duty to say that the clause as amended by the Prime Minister himself should remain in the Bill and that there is no reason whatever to revert now to the former clause as the amendment which he had moved was the one which in his own words was to be retained in the Act.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) is not quite frank in quoting in his amendement the words to be found in the United States Act. The wording of the United States Act is:

Students who at the time of the approval of this Act are preparing for the ministry in recognized theological or divinity schools.

My hon. friend proposes this amendment and wishes us to understand it to be the same.

Including students preparing for the ministry in any recognized theological or divinity school.

This is not the same thing as the United States enactment, and my hon. friend knows perfectly well it is not the same. If he proposes that the exact enactment of the United States should be followed, he might be good enough to consider what the effect would be. If we follow the precedent of the United States, we must strike out the words: "members of any recognized order of an exclusively religious character." Does my hon. friend desire to have these words excluded? I do not think they are found in the United States Act.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I will send the official bulletin to my right hon. friend.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have the Act before me.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I have a copy of the official bulletin containing information for persons registering under the selective draft issued at Washington on the 9th. I will send it to my right hon. friend.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I will leave that for a moment until I investigate. My hon. friend says that he has some information which is not consistent with my view. But he has not adopted the provisions of the United States Act for he is leaving out the limitation to which I have alluded and which confines the operation of the section in the United States to those who were recognized students in a divinity school at the time the Act went into effect, a very different thing indeed from what my hon. friend suggests.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I had penned my amendment before suggesting a moment ago——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is the matter? I had penned my amendment and had put it into the hands of the Prime Minister before I suggested that date might be fixed. I have no objection to a date being fixed, if the committee will accept the American text.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If the date were fixed as the 6th July, according to my information, it would be of absolutely no service whatever because it would not include persons who are divinity students. According to my information, after they have been engaged in study for a year as divinity students, they pass to the minor orders of clergy and they are covered by the word "clergy".

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Not necessarily.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am so informed. My right hon. friend's information would possibly be more reliable than my own, but I think my information is accurate.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The criticism offered by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister to the amendment proposed by my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) is purely verbal and technical. If we accept the idea it is easy to frame a clause which will express it. The only thing that my hon. friend from Rouville contends—and I venture to affirm and support his contention—is that theological students, a class which is well known at least in one province of the Dominion, should be exempted as they are exempted by the words in the amendment which was adopted the last time we had this Bill before the committee. Whether the amendment is accepted or not makes a vast difference. In the United States that class of young men is excepted from the operation of the law. In the United States they exempt divinity students and students in theology. Under this Bill, if my hon. friend's amendment is not adopted, they will not be exempted. I would suggest to my right hon. friend that the relations between the United States and Canada are very close. The system of self-government is very much the same; the interchange of commerce is becoming every day more diffused; we are fighting for the same cause, and I would suggest that this is creating a great contrast between the legislation of the United States and our own legislation.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We have made an exemption in this Act which is not to be found in the United States enactment at all, and we have done it because we thought it was a reasonable thing to do. I repeat that I can find nothing of the same character in the United States Act.

Mr. LEMIEUX: In regard to which?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In regard to religious orders. Does my hon. friend desire that we shall so amend this Act as to make it conformable in this respect to the United States Act? If we fixed a date under this Act it would be of no practical service for the purpose which my hon. friend has in mind; it would even defeat that purpose if we were to strike out the provision in regard to members of religious orders. I think my hon. friend has taken a very unfortunate position. If we accepted his suggestion and followed the precedent of the United States, I think he would have a great deal more cause for criticism and complaint than he has to-day.

Sir SAM HUGHES: What is the meaning of subsection (c) of section 11 which exempts students?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It means that students, whether divinity or medical, or science, or any other quality of students, can make claim for exemption before the tribunals. I have pointed that out already. I think it is generally understood.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Let us compare the legislation of the United States with our own legislation. Here is our clause:

> 6. Clergy, including divinity students and members of any recognized order of an exclusively religious character, and ministers of all religious denominations existing in Canada at the date of the passing of this Act.

Now, take the United States Act:

> Sec. 4. That the Vice-President of the United States, the officers, legislative, executive, and judicial, of the United States and of the several States, Territories, and District of Columbia, regular or duly ordained ministers of religion, students who at the time of the approval of this Act are preparing for the ministry in recognized theological or divinity schools—shall be exempt. I recognize that in one respect our legislation is more liberal than the United States legislation and I give credit to my right hon. friend for that. I refer to the provision whereby we exempt religious orders—the United States has not done that. But, it must be admitted that in another respect the legislation of the Americans is more liberal than ours, in that they have exempted divinity students.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: They have not exempted divinity students except those enrolled at a particular date,—"students who at the time of the approval of this Act."

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: In this section which I have read there is no mention of a date. It says: "students who at the time of the approval of this Act are preparing for the ministry in recognized theological or divinity schools." They are counted from the time at which the Act goes into force.

I was simply stating that in this respect, so far as students are concerned, the legislation of the United States is more liberal than ours. The Government proceeded in that direction the other day, but they have changed their mind, and now they propose to undo the very thing which they proposed to do the other day, and which is provided for in the United States legislation. The other day they proposed to except divinity students; to-day they are prepared to emasculate their Bill to that extent. I can only repeat that I am sorry it is so. If the Government persists in that intention, we must abide by their judgment. I am no friend of this legislation, I admit frankly; but at all events if it is to become law let us make it as acceptable as it can be made so that the country will be more likely to abide by it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am no theologian, but I beg humbly to differ with the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) when he challenges the statement of the Prime Minister that our legislation is more liberal than that of the United States, in respect to the exemption of the orders of the church. In the Roman Catholic church the clergy is divided into secular clergy and regular clergy. What is called the regular clergy comprises the religious orders, and the secular clergy are the diocesan clergy, the priests, the ecclesiastics. The Minister of Justice will certainly agree with me in that distinction. The United States legislation uses the distinction of the church. Section 4 of the United States Act mentions the exemptions. They include:

> The Vice-President of the United States, the officers of the legislature, executive and judiciary of the United States and of the several states, territories and the district of Columbia, regular and duly ordained ministers of religion, students who, at the time of the approval of this Act, are preparing for the ministry in recognized theological or divinity schools.

Therefore there is no distinction as between the American and the Canadian exemption, except that we use different words. In Canada, as well as in the United States, the regular and the secular clergy, are both exempted. There was no necessity, in my judgment for making the distinction in section 6 of the schedule. At all events it is there, but it is also in the American legislation. As to the theological students, every one who knows the training given to young men in our colleges by the ecclesiastics will appreciate that they are the only professors in our classical institutions. Therefore, if you do not grant them the exemption, you deprive our young men of their professors.

Mr. DOHERTY: I regret that the hon. gentleman has moved this amendment. With all respect I may say that he, as well as other gentlemen who have spoken on the subject, seem to be under some misapprehension as to the meaning of the words used. It was pointed out that the reason why the amendment was dropped was that the words "divinity students" covered a very large class of people, quite beyond the class of people now under discussion, and with regard to whom there was no desire for exemption, and, on the contrary, a good deal of opposition to the idea of exemption. Furthermore, as has already been said, and as the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) has pointed out, the word "clergy" has a perfectly clear and perfectly defined meaning, and I have no hesitation in saying, after satisfying myself on the subject, that the word "clergy" covers anybody who has holy orders of any kind, including the minor orders, as the hon. member for Bonaventure says. The right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) will recognize that the theological student, from the moment he gets his tonsure, or minor orders, which he does at the end of his first year—or, at all events, that is the general practice—enters and forms part of the clergy. My right hon. friend shakes his head? I am not making that statement without having verified it on the very best authority. I have satisfied myself beyond peradventure on that subject. So that that leaves, under the class to be covered as divinity students so far as the Catholic colleges are concerned, only the young men just coming in, before they have got any orders. Let me point out that if we adopted the American system and said we excepted divinity students actually such at the time of the approval of this Act, that would not affect young men entering the colleges in this coming September, and that would be the only class of young men who would have no orders at all. Any young men, being students, who would not yet have received their orders, are, in view of the provisions we have for their addressing themselves to the tribunal and the grounds which they may urge before these tribunals—amply and perfectly protected in every proper case. Of course, nobody can disguise the fact that the class of people we are speaking of are my friends in the closest sort of way as they are the friends of other gentlemen who have spoken. I think that people who look to the protection of these gentlemen in legitimate cases would perhaps do well to realize that, as regards the very small number affected, there is no injustice being done in their being submitted to putting the circumstances of their case before the tribunals, just as everybody else does. Sometimes one suffers from one's friends' zeal, and it is not always useful to the friends you want to help to try to differentiate them from the rest of the population within which they are called upon to live. I understand the delicacy of this question, and I think hon. gentlemen do too. There are marked differences of opinion about this matter. But we have all got to try to live together, respecting, and where needed maybe protecting, each other's feelings, and where that can be attained without taking the position of claiming for a particular class special privileges, it is surely much better to do so—much better in the interest of that very class itself. So I venture to say that if hon. gentlemen would accept what is being done instead of endeavouring to insist on putting the class of persons of whom we are speaking into an especially privileged position, they would in reality be acting in a manner much more likely to be of real service to the class concerned, and at the same time they would avoid giving unnecessary offence to others who may entertain very strong opinions against exceptions and exemptions in general.

Of course this Act has not been prepared without knowing just what the words in it really mean. Judging by the observations that have been made, I think I may venture to say that the hon. member for Bonaventure, at all events, has looked more carefully into the exact meaning of the words than perhaps the right hon. leader of the Opposition and other hon. gentlemen have done. I am convinced that this motion is being moved under a complete misapprehension. I am convinced that it will not serve the purpose that it is sought and may have effects that are very undesirable. The hon. gentleman knows as well as I do that all classes of theological students go into their class some time in September or October. Those who are entering their second year, having had the tonsure, are clergy and do not need special mention. Those who are only beginners will not have become divinity students until they so enter in September or October, so that if we were to exempt those who were divinity students on the date of the approval of this Act we would not be reaching this last class at all. I do not think it is wise to discuss the reasons that lead people to take sides on this question, because it all depends upon a person's point of view, and discussions of that kind rarely end in converting one or the other, but rather in creating a certain feeling which certainly is not desirable to be created. I do not think I should be overstepping the bounds if I appealed to the hon. member for Rouville to reconsider the advisability of his insistence upon the specific words which he now suggests, which, as I have already pointed out will produce no good results, and which, if persisted in, will tend to create a feeling of irritation which under all the conditions under which this measure is being passed and under all the conditions under which it will have to be enforced, it is highly desirable to avoid by every means in the power of each of us.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have very great difficulty indeed in knowing how to vote on the amendment suggested by the hon. member for Rouville, after hearing the remarks of the Minister of Justice. If I apprehend him aright, what he says is this: It is not desirable to press the amendment because under the section as amended at the instance of the Prime Minister, divinity students in one church will be exempt.

Mr. DOHERTY: Clergy will be exempt.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Divinity students, my hon. friend said.

Mr. DOHERTY: Some people are both clergy and divinity students.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister said that after the students have been at college a few months—certainly not more than a year—they become members of a religious order, and ipso facto they would become exempt from the provisions of the law.

Mr. DOHERTY: They come under the exception as clergy; that is not taking them out of the provisions of the Act making the exception.

Mr. PUGSLEY: They do not become clergy in one year.

Mr. DOHERTY: They certainly do.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I understood the minister to say that the divinity students, after a certain number of months not exceeding one year, become attached as divinity students to one of the minor religious orders.

Mr. DOHERTY: They become clergy.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister says that under this section, " members of any recognized order of an exclusively religious character," would be exempt. It follows from the reasoning of my hon. friend—I do not know whether he intended it or not—that striking out these words would prevent divinity students of all churches in this country except one from being exempt. Not being familiar with the subject I should like to ask what is meant by " any recognized order of an exclusively religious character?"

Mr. DOHERTY: There are different religious orders existing in this country, and the question whether it was a recognized order on the date of the coming into force of this Act, is perfectly susceptible of being established. I do not think there would be any use in my giving a list of the orders. Their names do not occur to me at the moment, but they are the Redemptorist order, for instance, and a variety of others. The members of these orders are mostly clergymen anyway. They live in communities together instead of living as individual priests. The hon. gentleman confuses "order" in the phrase "any recognized order" with "holy orders." These men are clergymen whether they belong to any religious order or not. An aspirant to the priesthood takes a succession of orders one after the other. My hon. friend will notice that the term is in the plural "holy orders"; a man takes more than one order before he becomes a priest. Notwithstanding any doubts that have been expressed there is no question that from the moment a man takes one holy order he comes within the designation of "clergy."

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister says that there are orders which are entirely distinct from what are known as orders of a religious character.

Mr. DOHERTY: I did not say that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: This section does not limit religious orders to such orders as the Jesuits and Trappists.

Mr. DOHERTY: That is the kind of order it refers to—exclusively religious orders.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What does the minister mean by saying that after a divinity student studies for a certain period he becomes attached to a certain order?

Mr. DOHERTY: I did not say that. There is what is known as holy orders, that is to say, of ordination, which make a man a clergyman, and ultimately a priest if he takes all the holy orders. That is spoken of as the sacrament of the holy orders. It is not an order in the sense of a gathering of people at all. The phrase "religious order" means a society or body of men joined together for an exclusively religious purpose. The words have no connection whatever with "holy orders," though it is usually true that the member of a religious order has taken "holy orders," just as a person who is not a member of a religious order may have taken them. In the former case the man would be both clergyman and a member of a religious order. The word "order" in the phrase "any recognized order" means an association or community of people who live together under religious rule—the Christian Brothers for instance.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is there anything to prevent divinity students from at once becoming attached to any one of these religious orders?

Mr. DOHERTY: As I tried to point out, there is no connection whatever between divinity studentship and religious orders; I cannot make it clearer.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My religious training has not been along the lines of that of the hon. member of South Renfrew (Mr. Graham). If divinity students of all denominations are to be treated alike, I would rather see the words "divinity students" left in.

Mr. PROULX: The amendment of the member for Rouville has reference only to persons who are attending divinity or theological schools. I understand that he has used these words in order to meet the objections made by some hon. gentlemen on the other side. Some one has suggested that if divinity students were exempted there might be a rush towards these orders or to the ministry. By the addition of the words suggested by the member for Rouville, the exemption would apply only to bona fide divinity students. For that reason I approve my hon. friend's amendment.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My hon. friend (Mr. Doherty) suggests that this question should be approached with an endeavour not to create any more irritation than has been already evidenced in this debate. That is my view also but I must take exception to something that he said. This question is a technical one. Our legislation is more liberal than the American legislation in that it exempts religious orders. The member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) has on several occasions mentioned the Christian Brothers. The Christian Brothers are not priests, but they are a religious order, and under the terms of this Bill they are exempted. I quite approve of that; it is a concession to the liberty of conscience, which should be a guiding principle. But, I see no reason why the exemption which was introduced in respect to divinity students, should not be maintained. I must say to the Minister of Justice that I do not pretend to be a divinity student—I was much flattered, when a moment ago, I was accused or charged, or lauded, on that ground. However, that expression has never been applied to me before this day—and I am a pretty old man now. But may I point out to my hon. friend that the clergy commences with the priesthood; all divinity students are preparing for the priesthood; minor orders confer nothing at all. They are not even a vow; they are a ceremony and nothing else. That minor orders are part of the clergy is a thing I never heard of. If you provide in the law that they shall be considered as part of the clergy, all right; otherwise it is incorrect to say that they are included in the law.

Mr. HERMENEGILDE BOULAY (Rimouski) (translation): Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the amendment now before the House read in French. I did not have the pleasure of receiving a copy of it and I would like to know exactly what is the subject matter of the debate.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Rainville) (translation): It is moved by Sir Robert Borden that the words "divinity students" be struck out in subsection 6 of the schedule.

Hon. Mr. LEMIEUX moved in amendment that the words "divinity students" be struck off and replaced by the following: "Students preparing for the ministry in any recognized theological or divinity school."

Mr. BOULAY (translation): I thank you, Mr. Chairman. It seems to me that we have been discussing this famous conscription Bill long enough without devising new means, not only to further extend the debate but to increase the uneasiness which is now felt by our population. I have always held in high esteem the hon. Prime Minister who is at present guiding the destinies of this country; I have always believed him to be a broad-minded man and in every way qualified to fill the lofty position which the country has entrusted to him, but I must say, in all sincerity, that if he ever had an unfortunate hour in his career, it was that very one when this famous conscription Bill was introduced.

The other day, while the Bill was in second reading, we discussed the different clauses and it was agreed that there should be inserted an amendment which seemed acceptable to all of us. I certainly do not know what occurred during these few days, but there must have been in the meantime certain occult influences at work, or rather there must be certain people who are just now exercising a nefarious influence and a pressure most detrimental to the union of the two principal races who form our country's population. As long as that class of people were kept away from any meddling in this country's affairs, we have enjoyed the blessings of peace and never have we observed the wranglings now apparent in our beloved Canada.

It is unfortunate that a certain class of our population should to-day have the ear of and free access to those who are guiding the future destinies of the Dominion of Canada. It seems to me that this class, such as it was, should have been accepted bona fide, for, after all, let no one charge our priests, those who are in the religious orders, with cowardice in the present war.

See what is going on in France and in Belgium! Who are they who give the start, who set an example to all the troops, to the soldiers and who shed their blood upon the battle fields, if not the French and the Belgian priests? Can anyone say that our priests in Canada are more cowardly, than these men who are now upon the battlefields of France? Surely, no one would be justified in making such a statement, Mr. Chairman, for we have among our clergy, priests who have enlisted as chaplains, and we shall always find within the clerical ranks men ever ready to fill any position they may be called to occupy whether as chaplain or otherwise. So then, what we are opposed to and what the province of Quebec is opposed to, what we take exception to in our religion, is that this class of men who are ready to sacrifice themselves freely should be compelled to do so through a simple amendment, or enactment. Let none get away with the idea, among a certain class whom I have just designated a moment ago, that if the French Canadians have not enlisted in as large numbers as we would have wished it; let no one believe that we are trying to exempt as many people as possible from the effect of this Bill; if anyone should get that idea into his head, it is safe to say he would have a wrong conception of the French Canadian mentality. We are just as ready to perform our duty in the province of Quebec, as in any other province. We have stated, at the very outset of the discussion upon this Bill, the reasons wherefore we have somewhat kept aloof.

What are the reasons which have provoked such hostility in the province of Quebec? If one may form an opinion from the various speeches made during the debate in this House, if that faction who are so much against Quebec would only go to the pains of looking into those very reasons, if they really meant to have peace and harmony in this country, they would be the first to pray for the discarding of all motives of hatred and of all such questions as tend to set against one another the two great races peopling this country.

Instead of eliminating from the exemption clause a certain portion of our clergy, as meant by the amendment proposed by the Prime Minister, I would be rather disposed, Mr. Chairman, to make subject to conscription as all others hon. members of this House who are of military age. For my part, I am glad to state that I have tendered my services, although I am fifty-six years old, and I am still ready to renew the same offer; many gentlemen are showing a feeling of pronounced hostility to the province of Quebec, why could they not do as I have seen fit to do myself? I mention these facts in order to show that the province of Quebec is not afraid of doing its duty, but she does not want to be compelled to commit any injustice or acts which completely revolutionize the old system established years ago in our country. Since, as stated by my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), the United States, a country whose population is nine-tenths Protestant, have seen fit to insert in their military service law a clause exempting the clergy and all religious orders, why should not Canada—where half the population is Catholic—do the same? It seems to me that right and justice demand that the amendment such as presented by the hon. Prime Minister should not be accepted, but that, on the contrary, the amendment by the hon. member for Rouville should meet the approval of this House.

Mr. TURGEON: Coming from a province by the Atlantic seacoast where harmony has, for so many years, reigned supreme, in the preservation of which harmony it has been my lot during my life-time, so far as my capacity has permitted me, to co-operate, may I be permitted to appeal to the leader of the Government as earnestly as I have ever done that, in view of the explanations given by the leader of the Opposition and by my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley), if he lets the Bill stand as it read last Friday when it was returned to the printers to be reprinted in its present form, he will not cause any disappointment in the country. If he does not accept the suggestion of the leader of the Opposition, I hope he will at least accept the amendment of the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux)? In New Brunswick, which is comparable with Quebec, so far as the Roman Catholic faith is concerned, the young men who to-day are students of theology, are attached either to the Order in which they are studying or to the bishops to whom they have allied themselves. Every bishop in New Brunswick, Roman Catholic as well as Anglican, is depending on those young men's services which would be available in a year or two. If we take away ten, twenty or thirty of those young men from the clergy of New Brunswick in each diocese we impede the proper exercise of the civilizing effect of Christianity on humanity for which cause we are fighting.

Hon. Mr. SEVIGNY (translation): Mr. Chairman, I have heard several members state that the clergy of certain religious denominations have asked that they should not be exempted. On the other hand, I hear my compatriots who belong to my own religion, declare that the clergy of the province of Quebec should be exempted. I carry no brief, any more than my hon. colleagues of the province of Quebec, to speak here on behalf of the clergy, but I do sufficiently admire the Catholic clergy to declare here, in this House, and anywhere in this country, that they are just as brave, as loyal and as courageous as the clergy of any other religious denomination in Canada.

I do not pretend to be any more of a Catholic than any of my colleagues; but I have for my faith all possible respect and confidence; I follow it and it is that same worship I shall teach my children, I state that no one in this House is justified in saying that the Catholic clergy are not ready to do their duty as well as the clergy of the other denominations in this country. Besides, the clergy of the province of Quebec, as well as the clergy of the rest of the country, are exempted under this Act. It is well known that, in the Catholic religion, as soon as a young man has become a subdeacon, he is considered a member of the clergy.

Mr. GAUTHIER (St. Hyacinthe) (translation): Will the hon. minister allow me to ask him a question?

Hon. Mr. SEVIGNY (translation): Certainly.

Mr. GAUTHIER (translation): What do you do with the—the first of the minor orders—are they exempted or not by this Bill?

Hon. Mr. SEVIGNY (translation): I beg your pardon, I did not catch on.

Mr. GAUTHIER (translation): When the theological student puts on the cassock, he generally enters college in October, and at Christmas he is admitted into the minor orders; is he exempted by your Bill, yes or no?

Hon. Mr. SEVIGNY (translation): I do not believe he is. As for me personally, I am in the sixth class and, although I am a married man and have some responsibilities, when I am called, I shall do my duty, and I am convinced that my colleagues on either side of the House, shall do likewise, when called. Many of us are married, are fathers of several children, having high responsibilities, however, all of them are ready to perform their duty, should they be called upon to do it; and now we have a young man who has decided to enter into some religious order, who has no responsibility, I will put the question to my hon. friend from St. Hyacinthe, is it not only fair that this young man, in a crisis like this, should be called to serve just as myself who have children and consequent responsibilities? That is the question I put to him. I know that my hon. friend from St. Hyacinthe and my other colleagues from the province of Quebec are fair-minded enough to answer me that in a case like that, the youth of twenty or twenty-two—for the young men referred to by my hon. friend are about that age—should be called upon to do his duty with the others.

I do not believe that the clergy of my province and of my religion would object to it, because the Catholic clergy of the province of Quebec know their duty, they see the gravity of the situation and they are ready to advise our population to respect laws passed by this Parliament.

Therefore, as a Catholic, having for the clergy of my province all possible respect, knowing that the priests, the vicars, the curates, the deacons and the subdeacons, as well as the clergymen of other religions, are exempted by the Bill, I declare that it is only fair to ask the young philosophy students as well as those in their first year in theology to perform their duty just as the labourers, the farmers and the married men of my province or of my race who are apt to be called under this Act.

Mr. PROULX (Prescott) (translation): When the hon. minister mentions the deacons and the subdeacons, does he understand that they are included under the term "clergy"?

Hon. Mr. SEVIGNY (translation): I understand that the deacons and subdeacons are part of the clergy and, by that very fact, they are exempted.

Mr. PROULX (translation): Does not the term "clergy" include only those who have been ordained as priests?

Hon. Mr. SEVIGNY (translation): I base that statement on the definition given to the House by the hon. member for Rouville and which I have before me.

Mr. BELLEMARE (translation): Mr. Chairman, allow me to say a few words in connection with the definition which is so often given to the word "clergy."

Under the canon law, as far as I am acquainted with it, those who would come under the definition of "clergy" are not only the deacons and subdeacons, priests, but also those who are only tonsured. By the very fact that you wear a cassock as an ecclesiastic, and by the fact of being tonsured, you belong to the clerical order; then you have the minor and major orders, and the priesthood. Therefore, if the privileges of the clergy are to be respected and if they are to be exempted from military duty, I say that not not only should the priests be exempted and those members of religious orders who have made monastic vows, but also divinity students who are tonsured.

But I shall go still further. Under the canon law, the clergy should be exempted from serving as soldiers. Such is the doctrine of the Catholic Church. I am not any more orthodox than the Pope is, but I know that those who form part of the clergy, as I have just explained, are forbidden, under the canon law, to serve as soldiers and to go on battle fields, except in extraordinary cases, as in the capacity of chaplains, field-hospital orderlies, etc. Such is the teaching of the Church. I give you that information sincerely and I speak knowingly.

Mr. GAUVREAU (translation): Would my hon. friend allow me a word?

Mr. BELLEMARE (translation): With pleasure.

Mr. GAUVREAU (translation): What about those young men who, on leaving college, in June last, meant to wear the cassock in September? Should the Bill be in force then, they shall be called out, will they take the cassock or comply with the provisions of the Bill?

Mr. BELLEMARE (translation): My answer to my hon. friend is that as to those who on the enforcement of the Bill, did not yet wear the cassock, or those who were not yet tonsured or in the minor orders, I understand that they will be included in the ordinary class.

Therefore, I believe that, as divinity students come under the definition of "clergy" in the Bill, those words should be left in the clause, as they make it more explicit.

But the fact should not be lost sight of that as in the English-speaking provinces—and this I say with all due deference to them—judges will be found with a different frame of mind from ours, and who are not familiar with our tenets, I submit that mistakes might be made to our prejudice in the construction of that clause.

Therefore, the clearer the clause will be, the easier it will be to do justice to every body, not only to the French Canadians but also to the Catholics of Ontario and the other provinces, as well as to our good friends, the Irish.

Amendment to the amendment (Mr. Lemieux) lost on division.

Yeas, 30. Nays, 74.

Amendment (Sir Robert Borden) agreed to on division.

Yeas, 72. Nays, 32.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I desire to explain that I did not vote on account of being paired with the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe).

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I did not vote because I was paired with the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Robb). Had I voted I would have voted against Mr. Lemieux's amendment to the amendment and in favour of the amendment of my right hon. friend the leader of the Government.

Mr. JAMESON: I am paired with some hon. member.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Rainville): Order. There are no pairs on a vote in committee.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I would like to direct the attention of my hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) to section 11. I think it is very desirable in the public interest that there should be publicity given to the applications which are made to the local tribunals for exemption and the decisions which these tribunals give from time to time. I propose that the following be added, as subsection 8, to section 11:

Every local tribunal shall, at least once a week, cause to be published in the Canada Gazette a list of all applications dealt with by such tribunal during the preceding week with a short summary of the grounds of the application in each case and the decision arrived at with a statement of the reasons for such decision.

These local tribunals are to be appointed by a Board in which this Parliament—which means, of course, the Conservative majority, the party controlled by the Government—will have the determining voice. While it is stated that it is to be appointed by a joint address, or resolution, of the two Houses of Parliament, that means that it will be the Conservative, or the Government, majority in these two Houses that will make the appointment. I do not wish to suggest that there will be anything unfair in the selection made. The Chairman reminds me that I cannot properly move this amendment unless the Solicitor General moves the reconsideration of the clause. I would hope that objection would not be made, for I understood that there was to be opportunity to take up any particular section. Will my hon. friend move the reconsideration of the section? I would not have the right, because, under the rules, such a motion can only be made by one of the majority.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have no objection to doing it, but if my hon. friend would continue his remarks I would like to make a few remarks myself, and when he has heard what I have to say, perhaps, he will not ask for a reconsideration.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Very well, I would not suggest for a single moment that that power would not be exercised in such a way as to have a fair board appointed for the selection of the local tribunals; yet I think every hon. member will agree with me that it is extremely desirable that the public should have the most implicit confidence in the decisions come to by the local tribunals on applications for exemptions made to them. There is nothing that would tend to give more general satisfaction, or cause the public to support the law more heartily, than to feel that in the administration of the Act fairness and impartiality have been shown. There is nothing like publicity to give the public that impression. It is most desirable that these tribunals should give to the public—not at great length, but from week to week—a statement of the applications which are made, the names of the applicants, the grounds of application for exemption, the decisions arrived at, and a short statement of the reasons for those decisions. If the applications are kept from the public, if the grounds of application and the decisions of the tribunals are kept secret, there will be every opportunity for suspicion in the public mind that the principles of the law are not being carried out fairly and impartially. That suspicion will be aroused in the public mind even though there may be the utmost impartiality and the greatest possible fairness. There is nothing like publicity to remove a misapprehension, the extent of which may be very great. Publication in the Canada Gazette would not cost the country anything, because the country owns the Canada Gazette, and it would be the mere expense of setting up the type and perhaps a little extra cost for paper. I would suggest this amendment most earnestly for the consideration of the Government. It will be time enough to determine whether I should move it when the Solicitor General has favoured us with his views in regard to the question.

Mr. MEIGHEN: On the general principle of the wisdom of publicity with a view to establishing in the public mind a conviction that the tribunals are acting fairly, I have no disagreement with my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley). With that end in view the Bill was framed so that the amplest provision might be made for such publicity as would be necessary. But the amendment is to the effect that the tribunals should be enjoined to publish in the Canada Gazette once a week a list of all applications dealt with, a list of the reasons in support of the applications, and a list of the reasons for the decisions of the tribunals.

Mr. PUGSLEY: A summary.

Mr. MEIGHEN: A summary. Between the ages of 20 and 35, which are the limits of the first class, there must be hundreds of thousands of young men in Canada. I cannot give the numbers, but they must run into several hundred thousand.

Only 100,000 are to be enrolled under this Bill as reinforcements and consequently there will be hundreds of thousands who will be exempted. If the Canada Gazette were to be burdened with the names of all applicants and summaries of their grounds of application and the reasons for the decision in each case, I fear that, with the present price of news print, a serious expense would be imposed upon the country, to say nothing else. Of course if it should be decided later that publicity should be given to individual applications, that could still be done, and done in the locality in which the application was made, which would be virtually the only locality interested. The Canada Gazette, on the other hand, would carry the details of each case all over Canada, and in most districts they would have no meaning. Regulations may be made at the instance of the central appeal judge, and under the regulations to be made by the Governor in Council under section 12 of the Act this matter may be fully dealt with. We cannot well provide here the limits of publicity for each application. There might be cases, as of physical infirmity, where it would be a gross injustice to publish the reasons, of a personal and private character, that would rightly prevent a man from going.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I mentioned the Canada Gazette because I thought if we left the publication to local newspapers a large expenditure in the way of patronage might be involved.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I am sorry that my hon. friend did not see fit to accept the suggestion. The argument of the hon. member for St. John seemed to me conclusive, that publicity is the best guarantee we can have of the fairness of the application of this law. I still hope that my hon. friend will think well before finally rejecting it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do think well of the idea of publicity, but I think the right hon. gentleman will see that we could not enjoin publicity of each individual application and the reasons in support of it or against it. It is expected that all tribunals will hold their meetings in public except in such cases as a court would hear in camera, and that, of course, will give a great deal of local publicity.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: There is some force in the objection that there may be cases in which it would be not only invidious but unjust to the individual that there should be publicity. But the law is always applied with some common sense, and in a case of that kind what publicity was given would be so arranged as not to cause injury to the individual. If the degree of publicity is left to regulations, that is uncertain, but if it is inserted in the statute it is certain.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Under regulations a much better and cheaper method may be worked out than we could devise here. The same argument can be made against leaving anything to regulations as against leaving this. We have left as little as possible to regulations, much less than is left in the Militia Act; and what is left seems can be done better by regulation than in this House.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The matter having been drawn to the attention of the minister, I am content to withdraw the motion.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I wish to suggest an amendment, to section 6, which I think the minister will accept. It deals with the constitution of the local tribunals. I would move it after subsection 5. The section provides for the organization of the tribunals. They are to be created in different manners according to provinces, and then certain duties are imposed on them by sections 4 and 5. Section 4 says:

> The names and addresses of all persons appointed on a local tribunal shall, as may be provided by regulations, be communicated to the minister.
> (b) The minister may by telegraph or otherwise appoint one or both members, as the case may be, of any local tribunal, if he has not received, within such period before the tribunal is to sit as may be fixed by regulation, the names and addresses of members duly appointed,
>
> (c) A vacancy occurring shall be filled by the authority who appointed the member vacating, and if not so filled or if communication of same as aforesaid has not been received by the minister within such period as may be fixed by regulation, the minister may fill such vacancy.
>
> (5) Any person duly appointed a member of a local tribunal shall, unless relieved in writing by the authority appointing him, perform his duties as such member, and any person who without reasonable excuse fails so to do shall be guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding five hundred dollars.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That has been amended.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I would have preferred that the members of the local tribunals should be judges, but the Government have thought otherwise. The Bill provides that laymen may be appointed to the tribunals, as well as judges. I have here an amendment which I hope the Government will accept. It is as follows:

> Every member of a local tribunal unless he is the judge of a court shall before entering upon his duties make oath before a judge that he will faithfully and impartially perform his duties under this Act. That oath may be taken before a judge of any court of record or commissioner appointed to receive affidavits or a justice of the peace.

The judge, of course, would be bound by his oath of office, but under the Bill the layman is not compelled to take an oath at all. My hon. friend knows that very wide discretionary powers are vested in the tribunals. They have to use their best judgment as to whether this or that man can better serve the country in his usual vocation at home, or fighting at the front. An unusual degree of latitude is allowed, and it seems to me that if we bound the members of the tribunals by oath it would simply be a further guarantee of impartiality and fairness. If my hon. friend agrees to this, I will move accordingly.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The proposal of the leader of the Opposition meets with no objection at all from me. I thought of that point before, but I apprehended a little difficulty in compelling a member of the tribunal to take an oath. But we are here compelling him to act, and I think we might compel him to take an oath that he will act fairly. The question seemed to me to be surrounded with some difficulty but I do not think the difficulty is insuperable. If he is compelled to act, he is compellable to take an oath or such other affirmation as is consistent with his beliefs. I think well of the suggestion of my right hon. friend. I would suggest that the committee reconsider the clause on the motion of the leader of the Opposition, and that I be given an opportunity to look over the drafting so as to make it parallel with the drafting of the other clauses of the Act.

Mr. McKENZIE: It will be noticed that subsection 4 of section 4, and subsections 1, 2 and 3 of section 16, create criminal offences which are triable by a tribunal or by a court having criminal jurisdiction. In the preceding paragraphs of the section it is held out that those committing any of these offences have the right of appeal. I submit that subsection 6 of section 5 takes away any such right, because it says in effect that you cannot get away from any of the tribunals. I do not think that was the intention of the Government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is not the intention at all. I fully understand the argument of my hon. friend. He argues that as subsection 6 of section 5 prevents habeas corpus and prevents the review of any proceedings of a tribunal, consequently any tribunal which tries a man who fails to report for duty, even though it is an ordinary court of justice, is protected and its proceedings restrained from review. I do not take that view, for this reason. Section 6 is the section that establishes tribunals. It establishes first local tribunals, then appeal tribunals—that is, a Central Appeal Judge. Then it proceeds, "Any tribunal may hear evidence," and so on, and the Governor in Council may make regulations as to how these tribunals shall act. Then it says that any tribunal may have such procedure as it may determine for itself, if not otherwise governed by regulation. Then it says that no member of any tribunal shall be responsible, and then that no proceeding authorized or pending before any tribunal shall be restrained, etc.

I submit to the committee—at all events, it is very strongly my own view—that "any tribunal" means any tribunal covered by the section, just as "any tribunal" in subsection 2 means any tribunal in the section, and just as "any tribunal" referred to in subsection 3 means any tribunal in the section. The word "tribunal" consequently cannot be interpreted in clause 6 as being any wider than the tribunal in clause 2. They are all in the same section. That is the intent, and that is the law. If there is any chance, however, of it being wide enough to include a court of justice the Bill will be amended to meet the view of hon. members. I will give the point further consideration before eight o'clock.

Mr. McKENZIE: I wish particularly to draw the Prime Minister's attention to this matter, because I think it can clearly be argued that the word covers any tribunals.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I disagree entirely. I do not think the word "tribunal" has any special legal meaning as used in this Bill. You could not have the word "tribunal" meaning one thing in the first five subsections, and meaning something more in the last subsection; that would be contrary to all principles of interpretation that I am familiar with, and therefore I would not imagine, although I suppose members of our profession can argue almost anything, that any court will give it that interpretation.

Mr. McKENZIE: All I say is that a county court is a tribunal; a magistrate's court is a tribunal. I think we are making it unnecessarily fine when we ask the judges before whom these cases come to say: this is a tribunal, or this is not a tribunal.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If you take the word "tribunal" in its widest sense, you might say that the Parliament of Canada is a tribunal or that the Board of Railway Commissioners is a tribunal. I am speaking of the legal interpretation of the word. I do not imagine that this section can be interpreted in any other way than the Solicitor General has suggested. However, we will give it consideration.

Mr. McKENZIE: If the provision is confined to that section, it is all right, but it may be considered as having general application to the whole Act. That is what I would like to have made clear.

Mr. MARCIL: Is there any provision in the Act, aside from publication in the Canada Gazette, for returns being made or information being submitted as to what has been done under the Act?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There is no special provision for it in the Act, but the ministers responsible for the administration of the Act—and, indeed, the Government generally—would naturally give to Parliament in the ordinary administration of public affairs all information on the subject that would be available and desirable.

Mr. LEMIEUX: May I ask the right hon. gentleman that the Minister of Finance, who is back from Washington, be made acquainted with the subject of our conversation across the Table this afternoon concerning the insurance feature of this Conscription Bill?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend has taken up so much of my attention this afternoon that I have had no opportunity of speaking to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I would ask him, before we dispose of the third reading, to ask the Minister of Finance whether he has considered some legislation along this line. I assure my hon. friend that the matter is engaging the attention of many young men who are liable to be called. If the Minister of Finance has in contemplation some legislation along this line, it might facilitate considerably the administration of the present Bill.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BURNHAM: Before this Bill goes out of committee, I should like to say a word on an entirely non-controversial subject. One of the abuses, if I may call it so, of the whole military system in Canada, and one which has brought most unmerited punishment upon the Administration, is the case of a man who attests at a different age from his real age. That has been a favourite trick. Men have said that they were of a certain age, and since the Army Act does not provide that swearing to a false age is perjury, but provides the opposite, they escape punishment. The consequence is that many of those men referred to by hon. gentlemen opposite, who landed in England performed various functions there and then returned or were rejected, got there solely because they said they were forty-four years of age when they were really fifty-four; and when they were ready to return, they said that they were fifty-four, and were returned accordingly. There are officers who are beyond military age and who know it. They were not rejected, and at any rate before 1917, they had in many cases good grounds for supposing that they could get to the front because the case of officers is somewhat different from that of men.

Mr. OLIVER: What is the age limit for officers?

Mr. BURNHAM: I am not aware that it is different from that for the men. In many cases it has happened that officers, well up, good men in good health, have got away to the front and have done nobly. Their eagerness has excused their age. Other officers, whether non-combatants or otherwise, who have been most willing and determined to go to the front, did not get to the front because of being beyond military age. Other officers again, who did not want to go to the front, did not get to the front, but remained in Canada, and those men are occupying preferential positions to which they are not entitled. I am prepared to excuse, and I am sure all hon. members will excuse, the Administration in this regard, because no remedy is provided. I am bringing the subject up in order that this House which, so far as I am aware, is the only authority which can provide a remedy may provide one. This means more or less the adoption of an amendment to the Army Act which, as hon. members are aware, is adopted every year by Parliament in order to incorporate it in the law, since no longer is there a standing army in England or in the British Empire. The condition of affairs I have described has caused great and perennial scandal. Here are men and officers who know full well they will not be available, but they are occupying positions, whether as non-commissioned officers or as commissioned officers, drawing good fat pay which they could not get in other callings and blocking the way so that other men cannot rise to those positions. There are numerous cases of men who should be brought back from the front and put into those positions that are occupied by men in Canada who are not entitled to them, and who know full well they are not entitled to them. They may be high up, but they do not intend to go to the front. They will plead their age just as soon as it suits them and as soon as they require a stop-gap, but in the meantime they are floating about, and they are doing this country and this Government a great wrong. I have many times thought of bringing up this subject, and I hoped some one else would bring it up in the House; but since this military legislation is about to pass, I do not think it would be excusable longer to delay in bringing this matter to the attention of the House; nor do I think it would be excusable, after this legislation has passed, to bring it up again. Nothing is so much antagonizing the young men of the community and, indeed, the people generally, as seeing those men taking pet positions who have no intention of going to the front. I beg the Government to put a stop to this condition of affairs in the interest of recruiting and of the country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the motion passed to reconsider section 6. That being the case, I am pleased to accept the amendment moved by the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), I have worded it slightly differently, and perhaps it would be better if I made a motion amending the section. I, therefore, beg to move:

That the following be inserted as clause (5) of section 6, and that the present clauses (5) and (6) be numbered (6) and (7) respectively:—

(5) Each member of a local tribunal shall unless he be a judge make oath or affirmation that he will faithfully and impartially perform his duties as such member. Such oath or affirmation may be made before a judge, a justice of the peace, a commissioner for taking affidavits or before such other person as in any special case the minister may direct.

There is no change at all except in the last part of the sentence. It has occurred to me that there may be remote places where it would be a great inconvenience to compel the parties to travel to any of the officials named, and consequently, it was felt better that the minister in such case might direct some one else, such as the mayor or reeve of the town or village, to administer the oath. In this regard I may direct the attention of the committee to section 12 which provides that the Governor in Council may by regulation prescribe forms for the keeping of records. Consequently, it will doubtless be provided by regulation that a definite form will be sent to each tribunal, and also that a record of the oaths so made shall be kept.

Amendment agreed to.

Section 6 as amended agreed to.

Mr. OLIVER: I desire to draw the attention of the House to section 16, as I propose offering certain amendments thereto for which I think there are very good reasons. This section provides penalties for interference with the work under the Act. Subsection 3 says that any newspaper, book, periodical, pamphlet, or printed publication containing matter prohibited by subsection 2 may be summarily suppressed. A newspaper, which is a business organization, and which involves a large investment of capital in many cases, is in a very different position from a book or pamphlet. The suppression of a book or pamphlet because of its containing objectionable matter merely destroys the investment made in the production of the book or pamphlet, but the suppression of a newspaper or periodical amounts to the confiscation of the established business of that newspaper or periodical. I submit the conditions are so different between the newspaper and the book that they should not be placed in the same category as to suppression. While I do not think there is good or sufficient reason for the presence of this provision in the Act, still as the Government in its wisdom has decided to include it, I suggest as an amendment that instead of the business of the newspaper being summarily confiscated by suppression because it has been found to contain objectionable matter, the single issue of the newspaper or the periodical containing the objectionable matter might fairly be placed on the same level as a book or pamphlet, and the single issue of the newspaper or periodical might be suppressed summarily, as is provided in the section. The newspaper property should not be destroyed until after the owners have been given fair opportunity to argue their case and to bring whatever evidence they may see fit in support of their position, or in protection of their interests, just the same as any citizen is entitled to do in the protection of his personal liberty against the provisions of this section.

I move, seconded by Mr. Graham, that section No. 16 be reconsidered.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. OLIVER: I move, seconded by Mr. Graham:

That section 16 be amended by striking out subsection 3 and substituting the following: "Any issue, edition, or number of any newspaper, periodical, book, pamphlet or printed publication containing matter prohibited by subsection 2 of this section, may be summarily suppressed, and further printing or publication of the said matter in any future issue of any newspaper, periodical, book, pamphlet, or printed publication, may be prohibited for any term not exceeding the duration of the present war, provided no action shall be taken under this subsection or under subsection 2 of this section without the approval of the Central Appeal Judge.

That replaces subsection 3 as it stands now, and provides only for the suppression of the single edition or issue of the paper or periodical. Then I would add, as subsection 4:

Any newspaper or periodical containing matter prohibited by subsection 2 of this section shall be deemed to be a person within the meaning of said subsection 2, and shall be guilty of an offence and shall be liable upon indictment before a Superior Court of the province in which the newspaper or periodical is published to be summarily suppressed by order of the presiding judge, and further printing and publication thereof may by such judge be prohibited for any term not exceeding the duration of the present war; provided that the editor, manager, or such other person as may be so designated by the owner or owners thereof shall be deemed by the judge to represent in person such newspaper or periodical in any proceedings that may be taken under this subsection.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am sorry my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) did not give me notice of so important an amendment as this—an amendment involving consideration line by line. Subject to my inability to grasp the full effect of the amendment exactly, arising the moment he sits down, I would say that the amendment to clause 3 provides only for the suppression of the single issue which contains matter prescribed by the previous clause. I cannot see any value at all in the suppression of an issue of a newspaper after the contents of that newspaper have reached the Central Appeal Judge, because when the contents have reached the Central Appeal Judge and he has been able to come to a decision, the matter has reached everybody else in the country, and all the harm is done, and the newspaper would not care a fig whether you suppressed that issue or not. Under this amendment one might suppress until one was tired, and it would not do any good.

Then the amendment provides that the same matter which was objectionable in one issue must not be published in a future issue. I should not think it would be. Newspapers do not publish the same thing over and over again.

Mr. GRAHAM: Sometimes they do.

Mr. OLIVER: May I suggest that this relates to the publication of the objectionable matter by any other newspaper.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But, that is forbidden anyway. What is the good of forbidding it over again. Previous sections forbid the publication of the objectionable matter even by the first newspaper. Consequently, it is forbidden to the second newspaper or the third. It is repeating what the Act says before. It provides that the same matter shall not be published by any other newspaper or by the first offending newspaper. As far as it affects the other newspapers, such forbidden matter is already forbidden, and more language is merely surplusage. In so far as it affects the first offending newspaper, there would be no object in publishing the same thing over again. They would change the verbiage, but the effect would be the same, and they would pursue their course unmolested. As soon as their newspaper gets into the hands of their readers it is like snow in May, it is gone, the work is done, and suppression after the first offence is a purely futile punishment.

Now, as to clause 4; it says that once a newspaper commits this offence and publishes this objectionable matter, that newspaper is subject to prosecution just as a person is subject to prosecution under the previous section, and is liable to such punishment as befits a corporation or company. If the first clause were to remain, and if we were to adopt the futile methods which that clause prescribed, the second might be of some value rather than having nothing at all. But, inasmuch as in my judgment the first clause cannot remain, and we must retain the power of suppression or retain no effective power at all, then, of course, the fourth clause is of no value. So long as we have the power of suppression, there is no value in proceeding against the newspaper publishers as a company or as a newspaper. The power of suppression is quite sufficient. We have to retain that power of suppression or we have no power that is of any value for such a purpose at all. Let me draw attention to this fact: right up to this date, and ever since the war began, or since shortly after the war began, we as a Government have been empowered under the War Measures Act to take the proceedings which we ask to be authorized to take in this particular case. Under the War Measures Act, we have been authorized by Parliament to do that all along. Acting under the authority of the War Measures Act, we have passed an Order in Council that enables a minister of the Crown, that enables the chief censor, on the authority of the Secretary of State and the Minister of Justice, to suppress a newspaper which contains matter in violation of that particular Order in Council. We have had that power all along, and we have had it unrestrained by any provision requiring us to obtain the approval of any central appeal judge or of a judge at all. Parliament felt at the opening of the war that that trial was necessary, and gave it to the Governor in Council. The Governor in Council passed an Order in Council enabling the Minister of Justice and the Secretary of State to do this. Up to the present day no one has unjustly suffered and there has been no restraint. Unless we proceed by suppression we cannot proceed effectively because if we must proceed through the courts, a newspaper might conduct its objectionable campaign until the whole purpose of the Act, in so far as it was in its power, was defeated. Then, perhaps, we might get a decision of the court. It is an ineffective remedy as applied to this particular violation of law. If we are going to suppress this particular violation of law the remedy must fit the offence. It will, of course, be exercised most sparingly. Any power exercised under the Order in Council up to this date a regards these matters has been exercised very sparingly, every hon. gentleman will admit. The power will be exercised under the most definite restraint that a judge of the Supreme Court must first approve of its exercise, and I think Parliament may rely upon it, and it does rely upon it, that no judge of the Supreme Court will harshly, hastily or without sufficient reason, suppress any newspaper in this country and thus bring great loss upon its owners. I think the protections are sufficient. Experience has shown they are sufficient, and the essential features of the case show that the power is necessary.

Mr. GRAHAM: People always feel more secure if they have in their defence a statute rather than the protection of even an honest and painstaking Government. If they have a law on the statute book which says they are protected by certain action that must be taken, they feel a little more secure even if taking of the action is altogether left to the discretion of the Government.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It is not left in this case

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend the Solicitor General points out that to suppress the issue of a newspaper would be no punishment, as the harm had been done. That is very true in a large measure, but the same argument applies in a certain degree to the suppression of a book.

Mr. MEIGHEN: A book is a more permanent form of literature.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The difference is very plain. The newspaper is read every day and the reading of a book may extend over months or years.

Mr. GRAHAM: I said in a certain degree. The contents of the book are not known until the book is circulated quite freely. The suppression of the book does not recall the harm that is done; it only provides against the harm being continued in the future. As far as the suppression of a book is concerned, in the first instance, no good accrues because the damage has been done, just as in the case of the newspaper in a measure. My hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) yesterday called attention to a certain book that had been suppressed. Every member of this House had a copy in his possession. As far as influencing members of Parliament is concerned, that seems to have been one of the objects, the harm had been done and the suppression of the book did not cure that harm. As far as the issue of this book was concerned, the suppression was no punishment at all to the publishers. May I make the practical suggestion to the Solicitor General that in case a paper offends the issue offending be suppressed, and if the paper offends again between the time of the publication of its issue and the time of the trial before the judge, the censor would have the power of suppressing the paper altogether. That would be a medium course to take and the cause of the war would not have been prejudiced, because between the time of the publication of the first issue and the trial by the judge, this paper would be precluded altogether from publishing anything else of the same nature. I make that suggestion to the Solicitor General as a way out of the difficulty with full protection, I believe, to all parties. It is a little stringent to say that the goodwill in the entire business may be confiscated for the mistake of some individual on the staff, perhaps without the knowledge of the proprietor at all. It does seem a little harsh that the censor should have the arbitrary power to confiscate all the property.

Suppose that a farmer or any other citizen issued a seditious circular or made a seditious speech, would he not think it harsh that the censor should have the right not only to punish him for the speech but to confiscate his farm or other property as well? All the property the newspaper publisher has—and the great majority have not full equity in that—is found in his newspaper plant, and under this Act he can be punished individually for what he says in his paper, and his entire property can be confiscated. Great offences require drastic remedies I admit, but in this case I think it is not unfair to say that suppression should not take place until the newspaper and the proprietor of that newspaper have had an opportunity to have a trial before a judge to see whether the matter complained of is seditious or not. The suggestion I make to the Solicitor General is, I think, not unreasonable, that the issue in which the seditious matter is found shall be suppressed and the newspaper restrained from publishing any seditious matter between the time of the first publication and the time of the trial before the judge. It strikes me that every interest would be protected if that could be done.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The suggestion of the hon. member is not at all open to the same objection as the former one. At the same time, it would hardly be an improvement. It really amounts to this, that the first offence goes unpunished, and only after a second can punishment be imposed. There is no such thing as suppressing an individual issue of a newspaper.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend says it goes unpunished. But if it is proved before the trial judge that the article did properly come under the ban, the law takes its course.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That future punishment remains under the Bill. But, in so far as effective action is concerned, it goes unpunished, because suppression is purely nominal as applied to a single issue. You simply cannot suppress a single issue. There would arise cases where it would be proper to warn a newspaper, and I do not think there has been one case where a newspaper has been proceeded against without previous warning. Often there have been repeated warnings, and that will undoubtedly continue to be the practice. It is quite conceivable that a case might arise of brazen, flagrant defiance of the whole Military Service Act, when the punishment provided in the Act should be properly applied. It would not be applied except in such cases. I do not think it is fair to ask that the hands of the Government be tied in this regard, and that the paper should be permitted to flagrantly, openly and defiantly declare its intention of violating this Act consistently, the Government's only power being to say: Well, you have done it now, we invite you to do it once more. The amendment would leave the Government practically helpless in the face of such a situation.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend forgets his old friend "sub judice" in this matter.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No, we have the judex there.

Mr. OLIVER: It makes a good deal of difference when you are out shooting which end of the gun you are at, and I have no doubt that my hon. friend the Solicitor General feels much more comfortable at his end of the gun than I do at mine; so he will perhaps excuse me if I express my sentiments from my point of view. As with many other newspaper men, everything we have in the world is in our newspaper, and it is not the plant that is of serious value, it is the good-will that is of most material value. A newspaper is in one respect like a member of the animal kingdom—as soon as its circulation stops it dies. The stoppage of the publication of a paper amounts to confiscation of the property, and I cannot see, as a newspaper man, any good reason why my property should be put any more in danger than that of any other man, or why the newspaper business should be considered so exceptionally dangerous to constituted authority that rights which are elementary and universal as applied to every other human activity and interest should be withdrawn from the newspaper. If it is true that there has been no exercise of that very great authority vested in the Secretary of State by the present stringent and drastic censorship regulations, and therefore the Government is entitled to credit for its careful exercise of this authority, may I suggest that on the other hand the newspapers, speaking of them as a whole, have been just as careful to conduct their part of the public service with due regard to the public interest in time of war. Except in one or two flagrant instances, I think that it must be accepted that the press of Canada have accepted in good spirit and in good faith all the regulations and instructions issued by the censorship, although I am bound to say, speaking as a member of the press, that for some of those regulations and instructions I could see no good and sufficient reason.

I think there is nothing in the history of the press of Canada to give cause for making it subject to a law which deprives it of the most elementary rights of citizenship, and treats it as though it were some objectionable institution which was dangerous to the welfare of the State. My hon. friend has made the suggestion that a newspaper which flagrantly defies the law should be suppressed. Surely there is nothing in the amendment I have offered to the House that would suggest the contrary. I am admitting the right of the Government to exercise its authority to suppress for well defined and established reasons, but I am protesting with all the strength I have against this position being assumed; that my property is absolutely subject to destruction by the Government without proof or evidence of offence on my part, and without the possibility of defence on my part. If this law is put into force my newspaper may be suppressed and my property confiscated although I have committed no offence against the law. I cannot admit that in this country of Canada there is any condition or any probability of any condition that would warrant a law being placed on the statute-book that would put that power in the hands of a party Government to be exercised against their party opponents; that is the position.

I do not wish to go over the ground that I traversed on a former occasion here, but there is just one point I wish to emphasize. This Bill does not deal with offences against the State. It does not deal with treason, sedition, or giving information to the enemy. It deals and deals only with an offence against a law passed as a partisan measure by a partisan Government; and to give such a Government the power of destruction over their partisan opponents in the enforcement of such a law is to my mind by all means the greatest derogation from the liberties of the subject that has been perpetrated in this or any other country, so far as I know, up to the present time. I maintain again that there is nothing and has been nothing in the conduct of the press of Canada, as a whole, that warrants any such steps being taken.

As a matter of fact, this Bill was introduced into the House and received its second reading without containing these provisions depriving the subject of his liberty and of the right of free speech. It was only after the Bill had received its second reading that these provisions were inserted, and they were in such form and of such character that they were withdrawn and other provisions, certainly more understandable, inserted in their place, and it is with these provisions that I am dealing.

We are told that the Government may be trusted to exercise this terrible authority in the public interest alone. I took the liberty of bringing to the attention of the House yesterday an instance of the exercise of the authority vested in this Government under the War Measures Act, through the regulations regarding censorship. I showed that a pamphlet printed and published in England had been suppressed by order of the censor, and under the Order in Council and under the proclamation every man who holds a copy of that pamphlet renders himself liable to a fine of $5,000, or imprisonment, or both. What is the offence for which this pamphlet is placed under the ban? Is there treason within its covers? Is it an attack upon the welfare of the State? Sir, it is the most powerful arraignment of the liquor traffic of Great Britain that I believe has ever appeared in the English language or any other language in any country at any time, and because that traffic has more friends than have the people of this country this pamphlet has been placed under the ban, and the authority of the censorship established, under the War Measures Act has been invoked for the purpose of preventing its circulation in this supposedly free country of Canada. And it is this Government that asks the newspaper press of this country to accede to a law that deprives them of the right of defence when accused, deprives them of the right even of hearing the accusation against them, and makes them subject to summary suppression at the hands of the Government.

I recall that it was my hon. friend the Solicitor General who brought in provisions to incarcerate a free citizen of this country in the tower of the Parliament buildings. I recall that it was my hon. friend the Solicitor General who introduced the closure into Parliament, and I direct the attention of the country to the fact that it is the Solicitor General who makes himself sponsor for this provision under which he and his colleagues during the election that is about to take place can hold out the threat of suppression against every newspaper in Canada and make the threat good. I recall that in Manitoba in the year 1912, under the administration of the law as it prevailed in that province, men were thrown into jail without a charge, and, after being held there through the election, were released without trial. I recall that when that question was raised in this House, every man on the other side, from the Prime Minister down, voted in justification of that action.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: What action is my hon. friend talking about?

Mr. OLIVER: I am speaking about the maladministration of justice during the Macdonald election in Manitoba in the year 1912.

Mr. MORPHY: May I ask the name of the man who was put in jail?

An hon. MEMBER: Wagner.

Mr. MORPHY: Sullivan, was it not?

Mr. OLIVER: I do not recall the name. Perhaps it was Sullivan; I do not remember. I do know, however, that three men were put in jail under those circumstances, and my hon. friend stood up in his place and justified by his vote that maladministration of justice; that deprivation of the liberty of the subject. On the eve of a general election, I shall be excused if I recall these events and assert that this provision was put in this Bill, after the second reading, with a view to the forthcoming general election and for the purpose of gagging the press of this country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps I should apologize to the committee for daring, after so long a series of crimes against the liberty of the people, to rise to speak before a free Parliament. I am depicted by the member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) as author of the incarceration of one Miller, who, against the law of the land, refused to answer questions respecting his conduct as a beneficiary of the moneys of this country and took the punishment which the law of the land entailed. I am not the author of the provisions under which he received that punishment. They are older than myself, older than the hon. member for Edmonton, as old as the British constitution. I trust that they will be in full force and buoyancy when both of us shall have passed from the earth.

Mr. OLIVER: That is a good Tory wish.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I had something to do with, though I did not introduce, the closure resolution to which the hon. member refers. I took some small part in the debate, and my memory is green enough to enable me to recall some of the incidents that took place during that debate. I remember that the member for Edmonton was, perhaps, the loudest among many in proclaiming to what he thought was an outraged country that Parliament was to be throttled; that free discussion was to be murdered; that he spoke then for the last time in a free Canadian Parliament. He could not have brought to the committee a better illustration to make plain to every one the folly of his own predictions now. Let him reflect for a moment on the prognostications that he made four years ago when the closure resolution was introduced. Free discussion was to be a thing of the past. Parliament was to be gagged just as he says now the press is to be gagged. Hon. members could no longer feel the freedom that they had felt before; he looked forward to a time when he would not be allowed to stand in this House and discuss the subjects of the day as he had done in days gone by. The member for Edmonton himself is the very best of many illustrations of the folly and the failure of his own prognostications.

In this legislation we are not departing from any British principle that I ever heard tell of. It is not departing from British principle to say that if a man disobeys the law he shall then and there 9 p.m. be forbidden to disobey again, and if necessary prevented by physical restraint from disobeying. That is the law of the land, imbedded in almost every criminal statute. If a man runs amuck and commits murder he is not told to go ahead and commit murder until the first offence is brought before a tribunal and he is tried for it. No; he is taken in hand by the physical arm of the law and he is put behind bars, where he can no more commit what he has committed. There he awaits his trial, long before he is proved guilty. The same holds true of every offence that a man may commit.

Mr. PUGSLEY: But he is not punished until he is tried.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, he is punished before he is tried, by the punishment of restraint.

Mr. PUGSLEY: But you propose to take authority to suppress a newspaper, without notice and without trial.

Mr. MEIGHEN: A newspaper is suppressed because that is the only restraint which forbids its committing the offence again. Why is a man incarcerated the moment it is found that he has committed murder or theft? Because if he is not incarcerated he will likely go on in the same way, pending his trial. The same principle applies here.

If a man commits murder, the principle advocated by the member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) does not apply. He is not quietly told: For a few minutes we will not let you run at large, but after that, it is all over; we say to you, however, that if you commit murder again, you will be brought to trial. For gross offences of this kind, liable to repetition, the law of every civilized country has deemed it necessary to put the physical arm upon the offender at once and to see to it that he cannot commit the offence again.

This is not a partisan measure; if it were, the amendment introduced by the member for Shefford (Mr. Boivin) would not be attached to the end of this clause. That provision forbids this Government to lay its hand on a single newspaper unless its action is first approved by a judge of the highest court in the land—a judge elevated to his position by the member for Edmonton himself, in association with his colleagues. Would such an amendment have been accepted if this were a mere partisan measure? If the course of the Government in respect to newspapers were dominated by party considerations, would the newspapers have rendered to the Government every co-operation in the carrying out of the censorship regulations? I admit that the member for Edmonton is right in that regard. The newspapers of Canada, with very few and relatively insignificant exceptions, have most faithfully and actively co-operated with the censorship authorities and have rendered the Government of Canada almost universal assistance in all matters pertaining to this war.

Would that have been the case if the regulations had been administered in a partisan spirit? I appeal to the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), who is the publisher of a newspaper: has his newspaper been interfered with? For almost three yeaers we have had the power to suppress the Bulletin of Edmonton at any time we believed that it exceeded the restrictions of the Order in Council passed in accordance with the War Measures Act. We were not restrained by the opinion of any judge of the Supreme Court of Canada; the matter was solely in the hands of the Governor in Council. The hon. member's newspaper has never had its peace or quietness disturbed for an hour since the war began, and I can assure him here and now in so far as the Bulletin is concerned, that while for all those months up to a very recent date it has been supporting conscription we have never interfered with it, so from that time on, while it just as vigorously opposes conscription, the same spirit will animate and control us. And the principles that have governed us in relation to the Bulletin of Edmonton will govern us in regard to all the other newspapers of Canada. I do not think he shows becoming respect for the distinguished members of the Supreme Court when he says that they will give their approval to such exercise of the powers vested in the Governor in Council by these regulations as would be dictated by partisan considerations and against the interest of the State.

Mr. OLIVER: I have very great respect for the judges of the Supreme Court, but a judge of the Supreme Court does not give judgment against me on the most trivial offence or in the most trivial case without my having an opportunity of stating my case or of having it stated for me before him; but under this measure a judge of the Supreme Court will render his decision on a statute made by the Government or its friends without my having any opportunity of stating my case.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why does the hon. member say that?

Mr. OLIVER: Where does the Bill say that a judge of the Supreme Court will give me such an opportunity?

Mr. MEIGHEN: He certainly will in any first case.

Mr. OLIVER: There is no provision whatever for his doing so. It is not contemplated in the Bill that there shall be any such notice or any such opportunity, and every argument that my hon. friend has made here within the last hour indicates that there is no such intention. This, he says, has to be an exercise of authority on the instant, or there can be no sufficient protection of the public interest. I maintain that there is no such condition as requires my being deprived of the most elementary right of a citizen in dealing with a judge of the Supreme Court.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If my hon. friend were a judge of the Supreme Court, would he render a decision without giving the newspaper proprietor an opportunity of stating his case?

Mr. OLIVER: I would not.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Then why does he imagine that any judge of the Supreme Court would do so?

Mr. OLIVER: Because a judge of the Supreme Court is given a statute—

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: So would my hon. friend.

Mr. OLIVER: But a judge of the Supreme Court is given a set statute in which there is no provision for, nor any suggestion of, any right of representation by the newspaper, and therefore he would be in duty bound to act upon the recommendation made to him by the Secretary of State or by the Government or by its agents. There is no provision in the Bill for calling in the newspaper proprietor to make a defence. It would be absurd to suppose that a judge of the Supreme Court would go so far outside of the provisions and the evident intent of the statute, no matter how just he might think it would be to do so. My hon. friend made much of the fact that criminals were not allowed to run at large; that when an offence was committed the criminal was at once seized and prevented from committing the same offence again. My hon. friend's suggestion in regard to the administration of the law reminds me of the Englishman who was frequently called on a jury, and he was asked how, in his large experience, he made up his mind as to the verdict he would give. "Well," he said, "I looks him over, and I says to myself: If he did not do it, why is he there?" So my hon. friend places before the House the suggestion that the procedure with criminals is to punish them whether there is a trial or not. I should think that in the profession he follows, he would recall that there are such things as trials; that there is such a thing as a prisoner being allowed out on bail; that there is such a thing as a jury of twelve men standing between the law and the criminal before the law can be enforced; and that the incarceration of a suspected man in jail is not the same as the suspension of a newspaper. The parallel case would be, just as my hon. friend sketched it to the House—that the prisoner was executed, and then a trial was held. He proposes that the newspaper shall be destroyed, and then—well, that is all there is to it. The newspaper will then be out of the Government's way.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Not for a few minutes. I will not detain the committee long. There is a vital objection to this section in that it provides that summary action will be taken and a newspaper may be suppressed without any notice to the proprietor. It is not enough for the minister to say that any judge having common sense would give notice. There is no provision for notice being given. There is nothing in the section which would indicate to the judge for a single moment that it was the intention of Parliament that notice should be given. If this section passes in its present form, it indicates the clear intention of Parliament that the proceedings should be ex parte, and that the judge should act in an ex parte manner without the proprietor of the newspaper having any opportunity of being heard. That is contrary to the most elementary principles of justice; it is allied with what this Government have asked Parliament to do when they have taken away the sacred right of habeas corpus, a right which was wrested from the authorities by the British people over three hundred years ago and which has existed in every British country since then. If the ministers had given any thought to this question, they would have provided that before this summary action should be taken the proprietor of the newspaper man should have notice, should be summoned before the judge, and should be given an opportunity of stating his objection to the action being taken. It might be that he could show that the article complained of did not bear the meaning attributed to it by the authorities. He might be able to show that the article complained of was published without his authority, without his knowing anything about it, or during his absence. Surely this law ought to provide that he should have an opportunity of stating his defence to the proposed action, but this section provided that his newspaper may be destroyed. That is the effect, because we all know that when you have destroyed even the one issue of a newspaper, you inflict upon the proprietor an irrevocable damage. What would be the objection to provide in this section, just as is proposed by the amendment, that notice should be given to the proprietor of a newspaper before action is taken? This section provides that, simply on the approval of the Central Appeal Judge being obtained, the newspaper may be suppressed; and an order may be made preventing its republication at any time during the period of the war.

My hon. friend the Solicitor General says if a man commits a crime he is not left at large, but is arrested. That is perfectly true, but the law provides that he cannot be kept in prison without a preliminary examination which must take place almost immediately, and which must be held in a public court, when he will have an opportunity of being represented by counsel and of cross-examining the witnesses who may be called by the prosecution. That is an opportunity which the law has provided for the benefit of every man, no matter how vile a criminal he may be. If there is a long or unreasonable delay in bringing him before the magistrate for preliminary examination, he has that sacred right under the Habeas Corpus Act, and he can apply to the judge who will issue an order to the jailer compelling him to show cause why that man is held in custody. In this case no such right is accorded to the proprietor of the newspaper. Proceedings may be taken against him summarily, and his whole property may be destroyed without notice. This is a provision entirely contrary to every principle of justice, and it is an unnecessary provision, because no great harm can be done by delaying for two or three days, or even a week, before final action is taken, thereby giving the man who is charged the same opportunity as is afforded to a criminal no matter how low or how vile he may be, the opportunity of making his defence before final action is taken against him. It seems to me that the Solicitor General would be well advised if he would so frame this section as to have some regard for the principles of justice which prevail at this day in connection with the ordinary administration of law so far as any criminal is concerned. It is truly said that those whom the gods wish to destroy they first make mad. I think they have made this Government mad, when they have come to Parliament and taken away the most sacred right and the most sacred privilege that a British subject enjoys today, the right of appearing before a judge to determine why he is being held in jail. They have taken away that right, when they have provided that one of the greatest safeguards of liberty in this country—the press—may be summarily silenced and summarily put out of existence without any opportunity of being heard.

Amendment (Mr. Oliver) lost on division.

Mr. MURPHY: Might I ask the Solicitor General a question? Possibly the matter has already been explained, but I would like to be informed regarding it. The marginal note to subsection 5 of section 11 says: "Penalty for applying to more than one local tribunal for certificate." In what cases is it apprehended that more than one application will be made for a certificate?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We give every man the privilege of choosing his own tribunal in his own province. The object of this subsection is to prevent a man passing from one tribunal to another—say, having his application rejected by one and then trying another.

Mr. MURPHY: From one province to another?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. From one tribunal to another in his own province. Once a man selects his tribunal he has to abide by his selection.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I report the Bill.

Mr. McKENZIE: I think the Solicitor General should at least outline in Hansard the rules of procedure by which a man will come before a judge for the suppression of a newspaper or for taking any action. I think the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) is quite right in saying there should be some procedure provided. We know ex-parte motions are made every day, and I think there should be some procedure by which a notice will be given to the other side, giving them an opportunity to come before the judge and show cause why they should not be punished. We are in the dark as to what line of procedure should be followed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think there is any particular procedure about it. If it were to be taken as a matter of legal procedure and formality there would be no practical way of preventing the continued publication of objectionable and illegal matter, particularly in distant newspapers. For example, a newspaper in Vancouver would have to lay its case before the judge in Ottawa, and by the time they did that a very great deal of harm might be done in Vancouver. I apologize to Vancouver for even suggesting that any such literature might appear in that city; I only mention it by way of suggestion.

As an illustration, there is an Order in Council dated, I think, November 5, 1914, which proscribes a certain class of literature from publication and circulation in Canada. That Order in Council provides that the Secretary of State may, if such literature is published in a newspaper, take possession of the newspaper plant, prevent publication, place a censor in the plant if he desires, or compel the editor or proprietor of the paper to submit all articles to a censor before such articles are published. As a precautionary step this Order in Council provides that before the Secretary of State takes that action he shall first secure the approval of the Minister of Justice. The procedure is simply this: The Secretary of State has a case under consideration. He lays the facts before the Minister of Justice by way of memorial, and if the Minister of Justice approves of the intention of the Secretary of State as expressed in the memorial, he simply writes across it that he so approves. I presume much the same procedure would be followed here, that the facts of the case—and the facts would consist of the article itself—

Mr. McKENZIE: If my hon. friend will pardon me. The Prime Minister said, in answer to the hon. member for Edmonton: "Does the hon. member suppose that any judge would grant such an order without hearing the other side?" That implies there shall be a hearing. How is that hearing to be brought about?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I presume the facts of the case would be laid before the Central Appeal Judge by way of memorial, and the facts would consist, in my judgment, of nothing more or less than the article itself. All the Central Appeal Judge would have to do would be to compare the article with the law, and I do not see how an argument would have very much place, although it might have some.

He would compare the article with the law and he would be guided by his common sense and a regard for the interests of the state as to whether or not the violation was such as to call for a summary remedy. Where there was no open defiance or flagrant challenge of the power of the law, or where there was perhaps some doubt as to the real intention of the writer, the judge might consider it a case in which the writer should be heard, and possibly warned. All he would have to do would be to telegraph the writer or the newspaper publishers and state that up to a certain time he would be willing to hear them as regards this offence. That is all the procedure that would be necessary. Or, he might communicate with them in some other way. It would be very ill-advised if we were to set about legislating any particular machinery into the operation of this Act in this regard by the Central Appeal Judge.

Mr. GRAHAM: Has the Government considered the advisability of placing the censorship under the Department of Justice rather than under the Secretary of State as it now is?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The Minister of Justice has control of effective action in the way the Solicitor General has already mentioned, for dealing in a summary way with a newspaper. The Secretary of State, under the terms of the Order in Council, must submit to the Minister of Justice the considerations upon which the proposed action is based, and the Minister of Justice must approve. The censorship is dealt with almost altogether by the officers appointed for that purpose, and we have little to do with it. These officers come to us for direction whenever it is necessary. I do not remember that on more than half a dozen occasions during the last three years has the subject been brought to my attention. But in order that there might be definite safeguards, we did, a year or nine months ago, appoint a committee of the Privy Council. The Solicitor General is convener of that committee. Whenever any matter of importance, upon which the direction of the Government is desired by the censors, is brought up for consideration, it goes to that committee of which the Minister of Justice, the Solicitor General and the Secretary of State are members. I think there are one or two other members of the Government who are on that committee, but I cannot recollect who they are. These matters are really dealt with altogether in that way. I would not like my hon. friend from North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie), or my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), to understand, or to regard it as essential in every case, that notice should be given. There might be a case so absolutely glaring, so malicious, so dangerous, that the Central Appeal Judge would consider that he should not even wait for a copy of the paper but would be willing to deal with it upon a telegraphic report of a deputy censor or other reliable authority. But in ordinary cases matters are not dealt with in that way. The newspaper has been warned two or three times, perhaps, or even oftener, that its course is not in accordance with the regulations laid down. We all know, of course, that a newspaper may introduce matter in its columns when those who are responsible for its management know nothing about it. It might be done altogether inadvertently and, in so far as that newspaper is concerned, it would be most harsh and unjustifiable to deal with a case of that kind without some injury as to the way in which such a thing had happened. No such practice has ever prevailed, and I am quite confident that it never would prevail—certainly, it would never prevail with my consent or approval. The whole question is more or less surrounded with difficulties and perhaps there were in the earlier part of this war more difficulties in this country than in most countries, more difficulties obviously than in Great Britain. There were many matters which it would be very inadvisable in the public interest to have published, and yet for nearly 4,000 miles our boundary ran along that of the great neighbouring nation which was neutral in the war and in which, of course, no censorship regulations prevailed. The difficulty was to create such conditions in Canada as would prevent the publication of undesirable information in the United States. There was a good deal of difficulty about that. We had to take rather extreme powers under the War Measures Act for the purpose of preventing it. I think I am justified in saying to the committee that the censorship regulations have been so effective, and the press of the country and all the news agencies have worked so loyally in co-operation with the Government, that I myself am told of important incidents that have happened in this country and were never published, were never known even to the members of the Government generally, and which it was extremely important should not be known by the public. I could, if it were desirable, give to the committee a great many illustrations of that, and I have been very much impressed from time to time, when matters of this kind were brought to my attention, with the splendid, effective way in which the press and the news agencies of the country have, with occasional trifling exceptions, co-operated with the Government and the censorship authorities in bringing about such a condition.

Mr. McKENZIE: It is well worth while to have the views of the Prime Minister and the Solicitor General upon this matter. It is not a light thing to put such a drastic power in operation without giving the object of it at least an opportunity of defending himself. I am sure the Solicitor General and the Prime Minister are quite familiar with the practice in this matter in our courts. What is proposed to be done here, if it is done at all, is nothing more or less than the parallel of a perpetual injunction proceeding. No perpetual injunction is granted without first, if necessary, an interim injunction for the purpose of giving an opportunity of going into the case and seeing whether the interim injunction should or should not be made perpetual. If there was any urgent call an interim order could issue stopping the publication in the meantime and an opportunity could be given at a later date to make the interim injunction perpetual if necessary. Why should it be made perpetual in the first instance? That is what we are protesting against.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I wish to welcome my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) back from his trip to Washington. During his absence I called the attention of the right hon. leader of the House to a vexed question which has some relation to this Bill; indeed it arises out of the enactment of the conscription law. Several young men who under this legislation are liable to be called out have written me stating that they carry life insurance, and that if they are forcibly enlisted the insurance companies will immediately raise their premiums to the standard of their war risks. Has the minister decided to implement the present legislation with a view to either paying that premium out of Government funds or fixing by amendment to the Insurance Act a maximum premium? I understand, in fact I know, that the insurance companies would not relish the idea of carrying insurance on the lives of soldiers at their normal rates of premiums, but, on the other hand, I would ask the minister if it is fair in such a case as this that a young man who carries insurance should be compelled by the effect of this legislation to pay perhaps double the premium on his life insurance. It seems unfair that a young man should lose all the benefits of all his past payments upon an insurance policy or that he shall have to incur heavy liabilities for the payment of his premiums in future. It may be that a young man will find some friend or relative who will make the payments in his absence and agree to pay the extra premium, but that must be the exception. What does the Government intend to do under those circumstances? We are told that it is the will of the country that 100,000 men should be secured to reinforce our boys at the front. We are told that this legislation, while drastic in its nature, is absolutely necessary. We are told, indeed we know, that as a result of this legislation young men will have to don the khaki and go into the trenches and possibly never return. I quite realize this condition of things, but at the same time, as was well proven in the course of this debate and notably on the occasion of the amendment moved the other day by the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham), it is established beyond peradventure that there are men in this country making huge profits, and those profits are made because of the war conditions. Not later than last week a report was published on the authority of the Government in which it was established that certain cold storage companies were piling up huge, scandalous profits. Will not my hon. friend take heed of what public opinion is demanding at the present time, and if it is necessary to recruit or to enlist under this law 100,000 young men, and if as a result of that enlistment the savings of those young men as represented by their insurance policies are lost or threatened, will he not see to it that the war profiteers shall pay enough out of their profits to make up the difference between the ordinary premium and the war premium which is being asked by the insurance companies? I am in earnest in making this plea. The United States, on the occasion of the conscription legislation passed by the United States Congress, adopted a measure which meets the condition I have already described. The Prime Minister yesterday gave us to understand that this question had received the earnest and serious consideration of the Minister of Finance. This Bill is now practically passed. It will in a few moments be reported to the House to be taken into consideration for its third reading on Tuesday next, I understand. Perhaps my hon. friend is not in a position this evening to give out to the country the decision which has been arrived at on this question of premiums. If he is not ready to make a full statement just now, I would ask him to do so before the third reading, after he has taken into consideration the facts which I have brought to his attention.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The matter drawn to the attention of the committee by the hon. member is one of great importance and also of great difficulty. It is not possible for me to make a definite announcement upon this subject, which I have had more or less under consideration for some time past. At my request the Superintendent of Insurance has been looking into the whole matter of the insurance of soldiers, with a view to ascertaining the nature of the insurance contracts covering soldiers' lives, and the increased financial responsibility which would devolve upon the companies by reason of the additional risk of carrying the policies of soldiers at the front.

I gather from what my hon. friend has said that it was made clear to the House yesterday that there would be very considerable additional financial responsibility upon insurance companies. The rates of insurance companies have regard to the risk, and if the risk is greatly increased the companies, subject, of course to the terms of their policies, would naturally desire to increase the premium or terminate the policy. This is not a new question. It came up in connection with the voluntary enlistment system, and I do not think the question to-day is any different from the question that arose in connection with the insurance of those who volunteered their services.

The Canadian Patriotic Fund has been keeping on foot the policies of hundreds of soldiers who have gone to the front, for the benefit of their families. It must not be overlooked that the Government is providing pensions for the families of soldiers who fall in this war, and that fact must be taken into consideration when the question of insurance is being considered. When in civil life a citizen insures his life for the benefit of his family; if he dies the insurance policy is a very valuable asset to his estate, but there is no pension from the estate. When a citizen enlists, however, and goes to the front and falls in battle, there is a pension for his family and that is a consideration which we must bear in mind.

It would not seem to me off-hand that the insurance companies should be compelled to assume a greatly increased risk without some consideration from the Government. I cannot speak off-hand as to the terms of the policies. In some policies, I presume, there is a voidance clause in the event of war and the insured enlisting and being killed in battle.

My hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) has mixed up with this question of insurance—and to that extent weakened what was otherwise a strong argument—some references to profiteers and the duty of the Government to provide money in connection with this insurance by taking away the profits of those who have made money during the war. I would like to say this to my hon. friend: The Government has not been neglectful of its duty with regard to the taxation of profits made by those engaged in business in this country. I say further, and this cannot be controverted, there is no war tax in the world to-day in any country that is now at war that is heavier than the Business Profits War Tax brought in under the Budget of this year. I say that with the most absolute confidence; it cannot be contradicted. The United States is considering a taxation measure at the present time which does not begin to approach the Business Profits War Tax of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What about the income tax in the United States?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is a different matter. The income tax is a small tax as compared with the Business Profits War Tax. It may be two, or three or four per cent, but in Canada we are taking, as my hon. friend knows or ought to know, one-quarter of the profits from seven to fifteen per cent, one-half of the profits from fifteen to twenty per cent, and seventy-five per cent of the profits over twenty per cent. That is a very heavy tax indeed. It is the heaviest taxation in the world to-day upon war profits, and that fact cannot be over-emphasized because it has been misrepresented to the country. When I introduced the Business Profits War Tax I was severely attacked by hon. gentlemen opposite on the ground that it was too severe a tax—not because it was not severe enough. Let us be perfectly fair and frank about this matter. I laid it down in the Budget that those who make profits out of this war should contribute most to the expenses of the war, and that policy we have carried out.

My hon. friend, I think, impaired his argument with respect to insurance by dragging in this irrelevant question of undue profits, of which we have heard so much in this House. What I object to is that when I bring in a measure, as I did in the Budget, for the taxation of business profits in this country, hon. gentlemen opposite object that the tax is too severe, and then afterwards accuse me of being too considerate with respect to the profits made in this war.

Coming back to the question which I assume my hon. friend has most at heart, namely, the insurance of soldiers, I am not able to make a definite statement to-night, nor do I think it necessary that this Bill should be delayed until a definite statement is made. The situation is not materially different from the situation that existed with reference to those who went forward under the voluntary system; they also had insurance. As I stated, this whole matter is under consideration by the Superintendent of Insurance, and after I get his report and know precisely what are the various elements involved, I shall be in a position to deal with the matter.

Mr. GRAHAM: If the Finance Minister will do me the honour of reading the few remarks I made on this subject when the hon. member for Rouville brought it up yesterday, it will save my repeating them now.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I shall be very glad to.

Mr. GRAHAM: I have been requested to ask the Prime Minister this question: Is he sure that the wording of the clause referring to exemptions, where the word "minister" is used, would include the officers of the Salvation Army, for example? They are not called ministers; they have the designations of officers in the army—captain, lieutenant, and so on. Is my hon. friend sure that they will be included in the exemptions under the clause as it is now worded?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I support my hon. friend's contention that the officers of the Salvation Army ought to be exempt.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Any one who as a matter of practice officiated in the Salvation Army as a minister officiates in relation to his congregation would come under the terms of this provision, because the Salvation Army is a religious denomination. Any one in the Salvation Army who acted the part of minister, even though he might not be known as such, would be entitled to the same exemption as any one acting in a corresponding capacity in another denomination.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. GRAHAM: Let us take time to consider this matter; if it should happen that some very influential body suffered an injustice, every member of this committee would be sorry that he hurried. If the Government is sure on this point, I have nothing more to say. Could not the language be changed so that it would include any person in any denomination acting in a capacity corresponding with that of minister in a regularly constituted denomination? For instance, in one organization those who officiate are called readers; the word "minister" is not used.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think there is any doubt at all that the effect of the exception is to include such persons. A man does not need to be known as a minister to come under its provisions. I am not very familiar with the terms used in all denominations, but I think that in the Anglican Church the person known as minister in some other denominations is known by another name. No one would suggest for a moment that persons acting in that capacity were not exempt.

Mr. GRAHAM: Perhaps they would be included under the term "clergy."

Mr. MEIGHEN: They may be included in the definition of clergy; undoubtedly they would also be included in the term "ministers of all religious denominations." Consequently, any one acting in a similar capacity in the Salvation Army is clearly included. I recognize that this matter is one of great importance; that it would be the greatest injustice if the Salvation Army should be treated differently from other denominations. However, in my judgment the Act clearly covers that denomination.

10 p.m.

Mr. GRAHAM: Perhaps it is not a denomination, legally speaking.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think they disaffirm the idea that they are a denomination.

Mr. GRAHAM: I believe that they are incorporated; those who officiate amongst them have power to marry, as other ministers have. Could instructions be given to the tribunals that the word "minister" includes all such persons?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That could be done by regulation under the clause which provides for uniformity. It would only be a matter of uniform application.

Mr. LEMIEUX: If you are to draw regulations—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. LEMIEUX: No, not carried.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The motion before the committee is to report the Bill. Upon that motion there is not very much latitude for discussion.

Bill reported, amendments read the first and second time and concurred in, on division.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the Bill be read the third time?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Now.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The Bill can be read the third time now only with the consent of the House, as it has been reported with amendments. I should be glad to go on to-night if my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has no objection. I understand, however, that he prefers that the third reading be postponed.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It will be difficult to proceed with it this evening, as several members have to leave in a few minutes. I ask, therefore, that the third reading be postponed.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: To-morrow and Saturday are rather inconvenient days upon which to take up the third reading if there should be debate or division. I understand that the Senate adjourned to-day until Tuesday next; therefore the Bill will not be delayed by postponing the third reading until that day. I propose to take the third reading on Tuesday next.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

The House in Committee on Bill No. 13, to consolidate and amend the Railway Act. —Hon. Frank Cochrane. (Resumed from Wednesday, July 16).

Mr. D. Stewart in the Chair.

On section 393—Disobeying orders of board.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Subsection 2 renders the officers of the company—the president, vice-presidents and managers—liable to very heavy damages for disobeying the orders of the board. Subsection 3 provides a penalty for municipal officers who do not obey the orders of the board, and subsection 5 shows that the board has full charge of all prosecutions in connection with the matters involved.

Mr. GRAHAM: This section, I presume, would apply to a railway company that declined to give the required information for a statistical report?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Undoubtedly.

Mr. GRAHAM: I suppose the minister has had the experience that others have had before him of the difficulty of securing such information from some of the railway companies. This section applies to that disobedience to the orders of the board?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Not only does it apply to any railroad corporation, but it applies to any corporation or municipality over which the board has any control.

Mr. GRAHAM: Has the board any control over municipalities?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The section says very distinctly—

Mr. GRAHAM: It says so, but has it any right to say so?

[Sir Robert Borden.]

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Subsection 3 says:

> Wherever it is proved that any municipal or other corporation has neglected or refused to obey any order of the Board made under the provisions of this Act, the mayor, warden, reeve or other head of such corporation, and every member of the council or other ruling or executive body of such corporation, shall each be guilty of an offence for which he shall be liable to a penalty of not less than $20 and not more than $5,000.

Mr. GRAHAM: We have taken a chance for several years trying to control municipalities that are under provincial control; I suppose we shall keep on doing so until we are stopped?

Mr. McKENZIE: What procedure is provided for the enforcement of the penalty?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Nothing more than the procedure provided for in subsection 3 which I have just read. In addition to that, the section compels the president, the vice-president—each vice-president, where there are more than one—and every director and managing director—

Mr. McKENZIE: I am not asking the hon. member about that; I quite understand that; but I presume there is a method of enforcing those penalties provided somewhere in the Act?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: Penalties may be enforced summarily in an ordinary court; or they may be enforced by indictment. How are those penalties enforced?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The board have the machinery to carry out the provisions of this section.

Mr. McKENZIE: The penalties will not be inflicted by the board. The cases would have to go to the courts of the country to have the penalties imposed.

Section agreed to.

On section 395—Purchase of railway securities.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The committee amended the first subsection. After the word "Act" in the eighth line, the words "or the Special Act" are inserted. The committee will understand that this Act refers to the Special Act in many cases, and in this one in particular where the words have been added.

Section agreed to.

On section 399—Removing industrial spurs without leave.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: This section has been recast and made negative as well as positive. The effect will probably be to increase the powers of the board, but it is conceded it is difficult to know what the meaning of the former section 365 was.

Mr. CARVELL: This section provides a penalty for removing a spur or branch line constructed under or pursuant to this Act. An industrial spur is always put in at the expense of the company or person who wishes it. The railway company furnishes the rails on the ordinary standard agreement by which the company or person pays the cost of the labour and the ties. The local parties pay interest or rental on this spur. The spur becomes the property of the company or person using it. If they have paid for it and it is their own property, why should they be liable to a penalty if they remove it?

Mr. COCHRANE: I understand the penalty is on the railway.

Mr. CARVELL: The section reads:

Any company or person who, without consent or order of the Board, removes any spur—

I am not objecting to the section, but I never could understand it. There may be a previous section which provides that the board has the right to allow a second corporation or person under such terms as it thinks proper, the right to use a spur that is being put down for another person. I know of a case—and I am not going to say anything that will cause the minister any unpleasant thoughts—where the Intercolonial took up a spur without any trouble at all.

Mr. COCHRANE: I received a very large petition for the removal of that spur.

Mr. CARVELL: I have not heard that the Intercolonial have paid any penalty for removing that spur. If the Intercolonial came under the authority of the Railway Board, if they remove a spur again, they will be liable to a penalty.

Mr. COCHRANE: There was no authority for putting down that spur, and it inconvenienced many people. I have in my office a large petition for the removal of that spur.

Mr. CARVELL: I am not going to argue that. I have seen the petition, and I have travelled over every part of the locality in which the spur was. Nobody was inconvenienced, and there was no earthly reason why that spur was taken up except political reasons. A young man started in to do business in competition with three men who, for fifteen years, had carried on all the business in that community. He paid his money and got his spur put in, and he was shipping potatoes and doing a nice business. In three weeks his spur was taken up. There was a street leading down to the wharf, and there was also a private way leading to the wharf, and there were three or four houses on this private way. You cross over the street and go up to the railway station without crossing the track at all, or, if you came up the private way you simply had to cross this spur. I just want to tell the minister, there is no amount of objection no amount of sophistry, and no argument or anything that can be said, which for one moment would justify the taking up of that spur. However, it was done by the Intercolonial and not by a private company, so I suppose there is no use discussing it.

Section agreed to.

On section 404—Improper use of highways.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The only change made in this section is in the last line. The words "nor more than $5,000" have been added.

Mr. CARVELL: That limits the damages.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: That is the penalty for improper use of the highways.

Mr. CARVELL: I was wondering whether it was advisable to include that amendment. The law as it stood provided that the railway company should be liable to a penalty of not less than $40, and there was no maximum. It is now provided the maximum shall be $5,000. I can quite understand there might be circumstances under which a railway company would be willing to pay $5,000, and even more than $5,000, to get the right to use a street.

Mr. COCHRANE: Would that give them the right?

Mr. CARVELL: I will give my hon. friend an illustration. About twenty years ago, in the town in which I lived there was a mill-owner who wanted to get a spur track from the railway siding into his mill. In order to do this he had to go about forty rods along the main street of the town. The town authorities objected very seriously. About the end of April or the beginning of May, when he got through with his driving operations, and had a crew of about 150 men in town, we all went to bed in a peaceful way one night, as we do in that country, and when we woke up in the morning we found a railway running through our main street. It was there for some years. Under present conditions the board would have power to deal with it, but there is an instance where this mill-owner would have been glad to get that right for $5,000. As a matter of fact he got it for less than that because he simply built the spur during the night. Were any reasons given why the penalty was limited?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: There were no reasons given.

Section agreed to.

On section 405—Failure to erect signboards at crossings.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The only change is that the word "railway" is added after the word "every" in the first line.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend (Mr. Pugsley) asks me whether I do not think there should be something more than the ordinary sign "Railway crossing." I am not sure whether the law provides what the sign shall be. I know the Canadian Pacific railway invariably put up two boards, one across the other. I think that is really more effective than any printing you might have on the boards. I do not know whether it is provided for by statute or not.

Mr. COCHRANE: Why do you think it is better than the other?

Mr. CARVELL: If you simply have two boards, with nothing on them, I think they would arrest the attention of the average traveller more than if you had the words "Stop! look! listen!" on a single board.

Section agreed to.

On section 407—Safety and care of roadway, etc.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The only change is the addition of the word "wilfully" after the word "or" in the third line of subsection (d).

Mr. SEXSMITH: In case some one passing through left the gate open and the cattle got in and were killed, who would be responsible for them?

Mr. CARVELL: The farmer.

Mr. SEXSMITH: Is he supposed to keep the gate locked?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: That is covered in another clause.

Mr. CARVELL: If my hon. friend will go back to section 387 he will find it specifically stated that the company is not liable if somebody leaves the gate open. I think that is only fair. The railway company must provide suitable gates, and if they do not the Board will compel them to do so I know in many cases the gates are not what they should be. However, the farmer has his redress by coming before the Board and having an order issued to the company to install suitable gates. If a tramp comes along in the night and leaves the gate open I do not think the railway company should be held responsible for it. It seems to me that would be carrying the thing to extremes; it would be making the company an insurer against every man's negligence and almost against his criminality.

Mr. SEXSMITH: I think that is fair enough. A farmer could keep the gate locked.

Mr. STEELE: Where land is being taken, that should be considered in fixing the compensation. It is a great inconvenience to the farmer to watch these gates.

Mr. CARVELL: That goes back to the question of compensation at the time the right of way is taken. There are a great many times that the poor farmer, in settling for the right of way, does not realize what it means to be compelled to drive his stock and operate his farm across a railway, but still the principle involved in settling compensation is that once settled that is an end to it.

On section 413—notification of accidents:

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The only change is the insertion of the word "railway" after the word "every" in the first line.

Mr. CARVELL: That runs all through the Bill, and the reason is that in the old Act the word "company" only meant a railway company by the definition. Now the word "company" means every company over which the Parliament of Canada has jurisdiction—electric light, power, telegraph or telephone company. Therefore, in these particular sections, it is necessary to insert the word "railway" in order to make it intelligible.

Section agreed to.

On section 416—blackboard; notice of overdue trains:

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The changes are these: The word "railway" is inserted after the word "any" in the first line; the words "or telephone" are inserted after the word "telegraph" in the second line, and the words "or telephone" are inserted in the last line of paragraph (a).

Mr. CARVELL: I do not think that is fair to a railway company under certain conditions. If any railway company, upon whose railway there is a telegraph or telephone line, does not put a blackboard up and give notice of the time at which trains will arrive, or as to whether they are late or not, it shall be liable. That would be all right in the case of a railway company that is operating its road by telephone or telegraph. That is becoming very prevalent. There are many railways that are being operated by telephone and I think on some portions of the big railway systems they are using the telephone almost exclusively, and, I believe, with very great benefit. But in eastern Canada practically all the telephone companies have instruments in the railway stations. I happen to have a little knowledge about telephone matters in New Brunswick. There was a time when our telephone instruments were put into the railway stations practically without any compensation, but an arrangement was made by which they pay a certain rental. I have known cases in which an independent telephone company feels that it is to its interest to have an instrument placed in the railway station. For the purposes of my argument, it does not make any difference whether they are put there at the expense of the company or put there for the benefit of the telephone company and its patrons; the telephone is there. But the telephone, in this case absolutely plays no part whatever in the operation of the railway. You are providing that a railway must do certain things if they happen to have a telephone in their office. The section ought to be so worded as to provide that the railway should do these things when the telephone is there and is used, instead of the telegraph, by the company for the purpose of operating trains. I do not know whether this has been brought to the minister's attention.

Mr. COCHRANE: No, it has not.

Mr. CARVELL: All over the country you will find telephones in railway offices which are there purely for the accommodation of the public and play no part whatever in the operation of the railway.

Mr. ARMSTRONG: They are installing the telephone to a great extent on the main lines, and this clause must be taken in connection with clause 304 dealing with blackboards at stations, overdue trains and further notice in English and French.

Mr. CARVELL: That is quite true.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: I quite understand what the hon. gentleman means when he says that telephones are frequently placed in the stations, and we compel the companies to allow them to be placed there for the convenience of the people. The hon. gentleman thinks that possibly there might be an unfair advantage taken of the railway under this clause?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, unless the telephone is owned or leased by the railway company for the purpose of operating its trains.

Mr. COCHRANE: There would not be many branch railways in your country operating by telephone.

Mr. CARVELL: To a certain extent. My own town is a divisional point and trains are operated by telephone nearly 150 miles each way from the station. I happen to know one point on that line within two or three miles of town. It is a junction point, and they have telephonic communication between that junction point and the despatching office. When a conductor on that particular line reaches the junction he telephones in to the head office. As far as that particular line is concerned they are operating by telephone. That case would come under the provisions of this section. But that same office has another telephone in it—a telephone of what is called the Farmers' line, and it has no relation whatever to the operation of the railway. I do not know that this is putting very much of a burden on the railway company, but I felt like pointing out the difficulty. I am sure that if the railways had noticed it there would have been some discussion.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: I do not think it would operate to their disadvantage in our district. I am sure it is the proper thing to do in the more thickly settled portions of the country.

Mr. CARVELL: It means that the railway must at once put telephones into the offices.

Mr. WRIGHT: It would only be objectionable to apply this provision where there was no station house, and we might limit it to places where there are station houses occupied by the company.

Mr. SEXSMITH: It is all in the hands of the railway company because it is optional with them whether they allow a telephone company to install a telephone in their station. In Peterborough they have a public telephone, but the Canadian Pacific can compel the Bell Telephone to take the instrument out.

Mr. CARVELL: Then the public have some rights. The Railway Board has the right to order the railway company to install that telephone. Let me give an illustration. At this same junction point to which I have referred, up to about ten years ago they had a station house, an operator, and all the equipment of a regular railway station. The railway line was diverted for six or eight miles to avoid grades; the station house was abolished and the junction moved to a point a mile from the former location. Now there is a small building, simply a shelter, but yet it would come within the definition of this section. There is undoubtedly a station house at that junction point, but there is nobody in charge of it, and no one to keep the blackboard. If this were passed the Canadian Pacific might be compelled to keep a man there to keep the blackboard.

Mr. WRIGHT: My suggestion would cover that point.

Mr. CARVELL: I think so.

Mr. NICKLE: I would move to substitute for the words "in operation" the words "for the operation of the railway".

Mr. McKENZIE: That would only apply to a station in which there was a telegraph or telephone installed.

Mr. CARVELL: They have a telephone in this one to which I refer. When the train on the branch line arrives at the junction the conductor calls up the head office by telephone and gets his orders in that way, so that all of the requirements of this section are found there.

Mr. COCHRANE: Then we would be only emphasizing the trouble by saying "for the operation of the road".

Mr. ARMSTRONG: Do not the words "in operation" cover all the points that have been made?

Mr. CARVELL: Oh, no.

Mr. ARMSTRONG: In the operation of the line.

Mr. CARVELL: No, if a telephone is workable it might be said to be in operation.

Mr. SEXSMITH: Section 303 says that every railway company on whose railway there is a telegraph or telephone line in operation shall have a blackboard, and so on.

[Mr. Sexsmith.]

Mr. WRIGHT: Would such a building as my hon. friend has referred to be considered a station? It might be held that there would have to be some one resident in the station or in charge of it before it would become a regular operating office.

Mr. McKENZIE: I think it would be a pity to begin scratching up this section now. It looks very well as it is and seems to be quite satisfactory.

Mr. CARVELL: I am not very strong on the point, only I felt that we should make this as correct as possible. I have called attention to it, and if difficulties arise I shall have discharged my duty.

Section agreed to.

On section 420—Penalty for failure to sound alarm.

Mr. ARMSTRONG: This section deals with the penalty for failure to sound the whistle and ring the bell, and the damages and exceptions. Subsection 3 is altered to correspond with the change in section 309, subsection 2. While this was in committee the words "if approved by order of the board" were inserted between "by-law" in the third line of subsection 3 and the word "shall." It now reads:

> Such by-law if approved by the order of the Board shall, to the extent of such prohibition, relieve the company from any penalty or liability under this section.

Mr. CARVELL: That is all right.

Section agreed to.

On section 422—Operation of trains.

Mr. ARMSTRONG: Section 422 deals with the care and operation of trains. Paragraphs (g) (e) and (f) are new, added to correspond with provisions added by section 13 of chapter 32 of the statutes of 1909. The paragraph was changed to correspond with changes now being made to section 311. While in committee they decided to strike out certain words in the second line of (g): "moving forward in the ordinary manner." Then again, in the same paragraph, in line 6, after the word "train" they struck out the words "or of the tender, if the tender is in front." The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) will remember that the Brotherhood came before the committee and dealt with this question very fully and were very anxious that these changes should be made in this clause.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, I remember. Of course I have always felt that all of these clauses are violated all the time, and I do not think you could successfully operate a railway unless you did violate them. However, if the committee is willing to leave them there, I have no objection.

Section agreed to.

On section 423—Obstruction of highway.

Mr. ARMSTRONG: Section 423 deals with the penalty for obstructing a highway. Subsection 2 is new. The object is two-fold; first, at the request of the representatives of the municipalities, to prevent obstruction so far as possible.

Mr. STEELE: It says in the third line "officers, agents or employees." Would the station agent of the company be held responsible if a crossing within the yard limits was obstructed by a train?

Mr. HANNA: His duty is to order the crossing cleared within five minutes, and he is therefore responsible to that extent.

Mr. CARVELL: I am not sure what the rules of the company are as to who is responsible, but certainly somebody should be held responsible. I think it is the trainmen who would be responsible for the blocking of a crossing.

Mr. COCHRANE: The station agent has control of the trains while they are in the yard.

Mr. STEELE: If "agent" does not include station agent I have no objection, but I think it would be very unfair to hold the station agent responsible for the blocking of a crossing, because, when he is busy at his post, it is impossible for him to know whether the crossings are blocked or not.

Mr. CARVELL: If the station agent is responsible for holding the trains within the yard limits and blocking the crossings, it is only right that we should get after him.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: He has always been held responsible. That part of the clause has not been changed at all.

Mr. STEELE: In a village where there are one or two crossings within the yard limits and the trainmen are shunting cars, a crossing may be blocked without the station agent knowing anything about it. I think it is unfair to hold him responsible.

Mr. CARVELL: But somebody must be held responsible; the public have certain rights. A railway company has absolutely no right to obstruct a crossing. If, under the rules of the company, the agent is the responsible man, then I think the public should have the right to get after the agent. If he is not the responsible man, let us find the man who is responsible. The public have certainly a right to make some one responsible for obstruction of the crossing.

Mr. STEELE: I quite agree that obstruction of the crossing is a perfect nuisance, but I think the company should be held responsible.

Mr. COCHRANE: But the company would not be there, while the agent would.

Mr. STEELE: How can an agent be held responsible when he is not in a position to know whether the crossings are blocked or not?

Mr. CARVELL: Assuming that the station agent has control over the trains while they are within the yard limits, then even if he does not know that the crossings are blocked, he should be held responsible because he ought to know it.

Mr. SEXSMITH: I think the point taken by my hon. friend from South Perth (Mr. Steele) is a good one. I know a place where trains are going in and coming out perhaps fifty times a day, and the crossing will perhaps be blocked twenty times during the day. It is impossible for the agent to know when a crossing is blocked when he is busy at his post. I think it would be unfair to hold him responsible.

Mr. COCHRANE: He has been held responsible for years.

Mr. SEXSMITH: That does not justify us in still holding him responsible if he should not be held responsible.

Mr. WRIGHT: I think clause 2 should be dropped. Somebody must be held responsible for blocking the crossings in the station yard. If an employee is to be allowed to shift the responsibility to the company he could say, "I have instructions from the company to go on with the business," and nobody could get after him. At present the agent knows that he is responsible for keeping the crossings clear, and I think it would be unwise to make a change now. If the company is to be held responsible, in nine cases out of ten no one would bother to enter an action against them, but when the agent is held responsible he can be got after right away.

Mr. CARVELL: They can always get after the superintendent; he is always around.

Mr. MORRISON: If the agent is responsible, I do not see why we should make any change in this clause.

Mr. WRIGHT: Why insert clause 2? It is absolutely unnecessary.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Clause 423 says:

> Whenever at any highway crossing at rail level any engine, tender or car, or any part thereof, is wilfully allowed by the company, its officers, agents or employees to stand on any part of such highway for a longer period than five minutes at one time, or, in shunting, to obstruct public traffic for a longer period than five minutes at one time, every officer, agent or employee of the company, who has directly under or subject to his control, management or direction any such engine, tender or car, shall be liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding fifty dollars, and the company shall also be liable to a like penalty.

Clause 2 was inserted at the request of the railway employees in order to relieve them from responsibility when the company is at fault, and not the employees; it is a case between the employees and the company. This clause is inserted to give the employee an opportunity of coming before the company or before the courts to prove that he is innocent.

On section 432—sending of explosives:

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The penalty here is made more severe. After the word "exceeding" in the third line of paragraph (b), we have added the words, "$2,000 or imprisonment for any period not exceeding two years." The next clause is also amended.

Mr. CARVELL: A very wise provision, indeed.

Section agreed to.

On section 433—Carrying dangerous goods.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: This section provides a penalty for carrying dangerous goods. It has been amended to correspond with the change in section 349.

Section agreed to.

On section 437—Failure to furnish returns to minister.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: This section deals with statistics and returns. It is amended to correspond with the change made in section 2, chapter 32 of the statute of 1909, and with the changes now being made in sections 379 and 380. The committee decided to strike out after the word "company" on the second line the words "and every carrier by water." That was necessary owing to the change made in section 380.

Section agreed to.

[Mr. Morrison.]

On section 438—Returns to minister.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: This section deals still further with statistics and returns. It has been amended in conformity with changes made by section 14, chapter 22, statute of 1911. The words "and any carrier by water" are struck out after the word "company" in the second line. The words "or carrier," wherever they appeared in the section were struck out.

Mr. CARVELL: Where is the section providing that the conductors shall make a return in case of accident?

Mr. COCHRANE: We cut out the conductor.

Mr. CARVELL: I thought that was left in.

Mr. COCHRANE: I think you objected to it.

Mr. CARVELL: I think not. We agreed that the conductor should send to the board a copy of the report which he made to the company.

Section agreed to.

On section 439—Refusal to make returns required by board.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: In the second line the words any "railway, telegraph, telephone or express company" have been added. Before the word "company" the word "such" has been added in eight or ten different places. These are the only changes which have been made.

Section agreed to.

On section 442—failure of constable in duty.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: On the last line of subsection 3, after the word "jurisdiction," the words "wherein the railway passes" were struck out and the following words inserted, "of the province wherein the offence was committed."

Section agreed to.

On section 443—Various offences.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: This section is the same as the old, except that in the second last line the words "with or without hard labour" were added after the word "imprisonment."

Section agreed to.

On section 444—Penalties not otherwise provided.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: This is a further section dealing with penalties. In the third line after the word "company," the words "or any contractor or other person having to do with the railway or other works of the company" were added. In the seventh line, after the word "orders," the word "regulations" was inserted, making it a little clearer.

Section agreed to.

On section 448—Procedure.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The only change in this section is that in the second line of subsection 1, the words "order, rule or " were inserted after the word "any" and on the fifteenth line the words "or any order, rule or regulation of the board" were added.

Section agreed to.

On section 449—Railway constables.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Paragraph (a) has been redrafted and made appropriate to present conditions. The requirement of being a British subject has been added in subsection 1. The committee thought it wise to strike out after the word " Quebec " in the fourth line, the words " or a commissioner of a parish court in the province of New Brunswick." On the eighth line the words " British subjects " were added and on the ninth line the words " recommended for that purpose by such company, clerk or agent " were struck out.

Mr. CARVELL: That was done at the request of the Brotherhoods.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: In the form of the oath, the committee thought it wise to insert after the word " I," on the third line, the words, " am a British subject."

Mr. McKENZIE: A certain form of oath is given here by which certain officials are to be sworn in. Where these affidavits to be filed?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Does the board not make provision for the filing?

Mr. CARVELL: I do not think so.

Mr. McKENZIE: When a municipal officer is sworn in, his affidavit is filed in the municipal office, where access may be had to it if one is desirous of finding out whether or not he complied with the law. As the committee has thought it worth while to provide that this affidavit shall be made, there should be some means of finding out afterwards whether or not the law has been complied with.

11 p.m.

Mr. NICKLE: Does the subsection 3 cover that?

Mr. CARVELL: No, that does not meet the suggestion of the member for North Cape Breton that the affidavit should be registered. In the committee there was a great deal of discussion about this, very largely on account of what took place at Fort William some years ago when a strike was on. The Brotherhood contended that the railway company brought in a lot of foreigners, went to some magistrate who was friendly to the company and had them sworn in—and I suppose they had a serious time. They contended that that should not be allowed; that only a British subject should be eligible for appointment as railway constable.

The affidavit was changed so that he must swear that he is a British subject, but there is, as my hon. friend has pointed out, no provision made for filing a certificate of that oath. The difficulty, of course, would arise if a person felt aggrieved and wanted to bring an action in order to obtain satisfaction in the courts. He would be at a loss to know whether this man had a legal right to act as a constable or not. If a record of this oath were filed in some public office, he could go there and find out that information.

Mr. COCHRANE: Is it not filed in the office of the company?

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend referred to it as being filed with the clerk of the peace or some muncipal officer.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Does the hon. member think the person administering the oath would not have a record of it filed?

Mr. CARVELL: If I feel I am aggrieved by the act of a railway constable, and I want to start an action against him, I am at sea. If the man were a duly qualified railway constable and were acting within his right, he would be immune, but as the law stands, I have no way of finding out whether this man was a duly qualified railway constable or not. By filing a certificate of his oath, he justifies his appointment. If his appointment is regular, and he has not exceeded his duties, I lose my case and have to pay the costs. My hon. friend suggests that there ought to be some provision whereby a record of this oath should be filed in the registry office or something of that kind, so that any member of the public may go to that office and satisfy himself beforehand whether this man had the authority or not.

Mr. COCHRANE: The registry office may be a long distance away.

Mr. CARVELL: There is a registry office in practically every town.

Mr. COCHRANE: There is not a registry office in every town.

Mr. CARVELL: There are mails and telegraphs and telephones.

Mr. SEXSMITH: In a railway station the record might be filed.

Mr. COCHRANE: If the registrar refuses to register for you, you cannot compel him to register.

Mr. CARVELL: No, I do not think you can.

Mr. NICKLE: Why could not you file it with the Railway Board?

Mr. CARVELL: That raises the objection of my hon. friend again; the Railway Board is still farther away. I do not, however, think there will be any difficulty.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: This section has been in force now for many years, and there has been no complaint.

Mr. CARVELL: Before the committee where this matter was threshed out very thoroughly, only one instance was given where any difficulty had arisen, and that was in the case of a very serious strike at Fort William some years ago.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am not taking any serious objection, but there is really no sense in requiring a public officer of this kind to take an oath unless a record of it is kept somewhere.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: I can readily understand the force of the argument made by the hon. gentleman. Perhaps he might make a suggestion whereby the section could be amended.

Mr. McKENZIE: I do not want to change the Act now, but it might be provided that those records should be filed in the municipal office nearest to the place where the man was sworn in, or the nearest office to the terminus of the road, or something like that, so that any person, by making inquiry, could find out whether the man was sworn in or not.

Section agreed to.

On section 215—Notice of expropriation to be served.

Mr. COCHRANE: I have decided to yield to the temptations of my colleague on this committee. This is the section referring to expropriation proceedings. I am willing to adopt the old section 196.

Mr. CARVELL: I am glad my hon. friend has had a change of heart. The present is always the time for a man to repent. Section 196 of the old Act reads:

> If within ten days after the service of such notice, or within one month after the first publication thereof, the opposite party does not give notice to the company that he accepts the sum offered by it, the judge shall, upon the application of the company, appoint a person to be sole arbitrator for determining the compensation to be paid as aforesaid; provided that the judge shall, at the request of either party, on such application, appoint three arbitrators to determine such compensation, one of whom may be named by each party on such application.

Now, the law as proposed provides that instead of appointing three arbitrators, the county court judge or the district court judge would be the sole arbitrator.

Mr. COCHRANE: But, do we not have to change more than that?

Mr. CARVELL: That is the law as it has been for probably thirty or forty years. The intention of the new Act was to make the county court judge the sole arbitrator.

Mr. COCHRANE: I think it is cheaper. Still the committee did not think so, and I agreed to change it.

Mr. McKENZIE: The only question is, how many sections you have to substitute.

Mr. CARVELL: You would have to change a great many sections. You would have to get back to the old section 196. After that, there are only clerical changes, for instance, "arbitrators" instead of "arbitrator." However, if section 219 is changed, it will be all right to allow the minister or any of the officials of the Government to work out the rest of it; it is very simple.

Mr. COCHRANE: I would be very glad to do so.

Mr. CARVELL: I am satisfied with that.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Is it understood that section 219 is passed?

Mr. CARVELL: With that understanding, yes.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: May I call the attention of the committee to the fact that section 215, dealing with expropriation proceedings, was allowed to stand until this matter was disposed of.

Mr. CARVELL: Was not that the section in which we decided ten days' notice should be given instead of six days?

Mr. COCHRANE: I proposed that we adopt the old Act. That provided for ten days' notice, did it not?

Mr. CARVELL: That was six days.

Mr. COCHRANE: Would you rather have ten days?

Mr. CARVELL: In my practice I have found six days' notice is very short. I also wish to point out to the minister that in the changing of these sections there is one very important change in the new Act that should be retained. Under the old law it was only the railway company that had the right to proceed to the arbitration. Under the new law either the railway company or the landowner has the right. The officers of the Government will follow that out in redrafting the sections.

Mr. CHAIRMAN (Mr. Dugald Stewart): Do I understand that all those sections relating to arbitration proceedings, from 219 to 237, will be carried?

Mr. McKENZIE: With the distinct understanding that the old law is to be restored.

Mr. COCHRANE: And, there is one to be added.

Mr. McKENZIE: Your legal adviser will see what is necessary to restore the old law.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The chairman informs me that section 215, dealing with expropriation proceedings, was allowed to stand owing to the connection the committee thought it had with section 219.

Mr. CARVELL: There is no change there.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: He had it marked "passed," but wrote the word "stands" on the other side.

Mr. CARVELL: There is no change.

The CHAIRMAN: All the sections from 219 to 232 are marked in the same way.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The committee is now prepared to pass section 215.

Section agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Sections 217 and 218 were also allowed to stand.

Mr. CARVELL: Was not subsection 3 of section 217 one of the sections referred to by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Boulay)?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Subsections 3 and 4 of section 218 are both new.

Mr. CARVELL: There are two instances there where you would have to change "arbitrator" to "arbitrators." I take it the officials of the Government will work out all these details.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: It is understood then that in the sections dealing with expropriation proceedings the officials will notice that the word "arbitrator" is changed to "arbitrators."

Mr. CARVELL: And any other necessary changes along that line.

The CHAIRMAN: Is section 217 passed?

Mr. CARVELL: I think there was a question about that which we might as well settle now. It struck me as being a pretty reasonable request and one which should be agreed to by the committee, that in case service was being made by publication in the province of Quebec, if there be papers printed in French and in English, the railway company must publish the notice in both languages. I thought it was a fair provision because, while probably in many cases these notices do not reach the parties interested, still, if you are attempting to give a man notice the idea of the publication is that the relatives or friends of some interested party may see it and may notify him. If in the province of Quebec they publish this notice only in an English paper, in all probability it never will be seen by the man interested.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: It was understood by the committee, after listening to the hon. member for Rimouski, that he could readily bring it up at any session of Parliament as an amendment to the Railway Act, and that it could be discussed later.

Mr. CARVELL: I did not so understand it. However, he will probably be here at the third reading and he will have an opportunity then.

Section agreed to.

On section 219—Arbitrator.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall this section pass?

Mr. ARMSTRONG: Carried.

Mr. COCHRANE: I think the old Act was different from many of these sections that you are carrying.

Mr. ARMSTRONG: Yes, but the committee have asked that the minister allow his law clerk to make these clauses to conform with the old Act.

Mr. CARVELL: We are willing to trust the minister and his department to work these out; or we will go on now and work them out ourselves.

Mr. COCHRANE: You have adopted the old Act and all you want to do is to insert its provisions instead of the provisions with regard to the arbitrator here?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Yes.

Mr. CARVELL: In the beginning the question which we were discussing was as to whether the arbitration should consist of three men as provided by the old Act, or of the county court judge alone. The minister has now decided that he will take the old Act. But, if we change subsection 1 of section 219, we must make certain minor changes in a great number of sections. Outside of those minor changes there are some fairly important changes in those sections which are to remain as they are now. For instance, under the old law only the railway company could bring the matter to arbitration; under the proposed law either the railway company or the land owner has the right to apply after ten days. It is left to the officials to make the minor changes subject to these important changes, just taking the sections and making them read so that they will correspond with secion 219. In the meantime we will carry them.

Section agreed to.

On section 222—Company may offer easement, etc.

Mr. CARVELL: That is an entirely new provision. It was held by the courts that the company must take the whole thing, that they must buy the property from the earth up. The Bill provides now that the railway company can take what is necessary and give back to the owner of the land an easement, the object being to make it less expensive to the railway company and to enable the owner to obtain some very material rights. That is one clause that will have to be left as it is. The officials will have no trouble in working that out.

Section agreed to.

On section 223—Costs of arbitration; expenses of arbitrator.

Mr. CARVELL: Subsection 3 of that clause will have to be struck out. That is the subsection that provides that if the county court judge is acting as arbitrator he shall receive no costs.

Mr. McKENZIE: I think that is a pretty cheeky proceeding from the beginning. We are asking a county court judge to go wandering through the country for nothing.

Mr. COCHRANE: It will give him something to do.

Section agreed to.

On section 227—Notice of award to be given.

Mr. CARVELL: I wish to call the attention of the committee to this section. It provides that:

> After making the award, the arbitrator shall forthwith notify the parties that the award has been made, and shall forthwith deliver or transmit by registered post the award and the depositions, exhibits and all other papers connected with the arbitration to the clerk of the court, to be filed with the records of the said court.

The law has been changed in that regard, I am glad to say. Under the law as it is proposed here, the arbitrator must transmit the award to some proper officer. The way this has been worked out in the past has been that the arbitrator would notify both parties that he had made the award and that if they would pay him so many hundred dollars in costs they could get it. The result was that both the railway company and the land owner had to make a guess whether the award was in their favour or not. But they had to pay the arbitrator's costs, practically what he demanded before they could get the award. It is true that you could have the costs taxed by the proper officer. But I, myself, or rather my clients, have been held up a good many times and we have had to pay out a large amount of money to get awards. I am glad to see that this is provided for.

On section 23—Duties of Secretary of Railway Commission:

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD: This section stood owing to a question which I raised with regard to paragraph (c) of subsection 1, which provides that the secretary shall obey all rules and directions which may be given by the board or by the Chief Commissioner. I pointed out that there ought to be some provision for the case of a conflict between the Chief Commissioner and the majority of the board. I would move an addition to subsection (c) in these words:

> And in the event of a conflict of such rules or directions those made by the Board shall prevail.

Amendment agreed to, section as amended agreed to.

On section 5—Application of Act:

Mr. ARMSTRONG: The Government is bringing in a Bill to amend the Government Railways Act, and it was impossible to amend clause 5 to make it satisfactory. The House did not give the committee the necessary power to amend the Bill so as to include the Government railways. The House could not give such permission to the committee without the approval of the Governor General communicated to the House. Many portions of the Railway Act could not be applicable to the Crown, such as all provisions respecting stocks, shares and bonds.

Mr. COCHRANE: It was agreed to let it stand in its present form until the introduction of the amendment to the Government Railways Act, and we shall have to let it stand.

Mr. ARMSTRONG: The Government system of appropriating land is altogether different, the Crown having a special court, that is the Exchequer Court, to deal with such matters.

Mr. CARVELL: The minister's contention is that we should have no power to include Government railways in the operation of this Act by an amendment to this Act, but must amend the Government Railways Act by a separate Bill.

Mr. ARMSTRONG: It would do no harm to pass the section.

Section agreed to.

On section 388—Fires from locomotives:

Mr. COCHRANE: The hon. member for St. John and Iberville (Mr. Demers) moved to substitute for the words, "the railway making use of such locomotive," the words, "the railway on which such locomotive is used".

Mr. DEMERS: I beg to amend my amendment as follows:

That clause 388 be amended by substituting in the first paragraph, line 15, for the words "making use of such locomotives,' the words "operating the railway on which the locomotive is used."

Amended amendment agreed to.

Mr. SMITH: I beg to move that all the words after "insurance" in line 35 of subsection 2 of section 388 be struck out. I pointed out last evening that if a barn, we will say, had been destroyed by fire and the insurance collected from an insurance company, but not to the full value of the damage done, the owner of the barn could not sue the railway company for the balance, if in the meantime it had been found that the fire was started by a defective locomotive.

Mr. COCHRANE: Who would take proceedings? The insured or the insurance company?

Mr. SMITH: The insured.

Mr. COCHRANE: He has his money. What more do you want?

Mr. SMITH: The insurance he receives from the insurance company might not cover the damage done.

Mr. COCHRANE: The object is to let him sue the railway company for the balance of the damage done?

Mr. SMITH: Yes.

Mr. CARVELL: If the owner got only $1,000 from the insurance company and damage was done to the extent of $2,000 he should have right of action for the other $1,000. Is that the contention?

Mr. SMITH: Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: At common law the fact of a man having his barn insured does not prevent him from bringing an action against the man who sets fire to it. If the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) and the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) are satisfied with this amendment I shall make no objection, but we should be very careful when making changes in the law as to the rights of a man who has insured his property.

Mr. CARVELL: Of course, this is purely statutory; we are providing a liability against the railway company. We say that the railway company is liable up to the amount of $5,000, no matter whether they have used the proper appliances or not. I remember when, under the old law, one almost had to look down the smokestack of the engine to find out whether the spark arrester was working. If I have insurance upon my property, I ought not, in case of loss, to be allowed to get the full amount of my insurance and then collect full damages from the railway company; the two put together ought only to make good my loss. The contention of the member for South Ontario (Mr. Smith) is, as I understand it, that under the present law, if you accept the insurance, you have no right to look to the railway company for the balance. If that is a true interpretation of the statute, I do not think it is right.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The member for South Ontario informs me that he has been asked by the local insurance companies to request that the words in question be eliminated from this subsection; that he has consulted with the best legal talent available, who assure him that if they are removed, the claim which the member for South Ontario has made in committee will be allowed.

Mr. CARVELL: In order to expedite matters, I am willing that these words be struck out. If on the third reading we find that we are in error, we may be able to reinstate them. I must confess that it is hard to sit down here in committee and read over an intricate section of this kind and make up your mind as to its true interpretation.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. CROMWELL: It appears to me that it is hardly sufficient to limit the liability of the railway company at $5,000. It is true that in some instances that amount may be sufficient, but in others it may not. If a property worth $10,000 or $12,000 was destroyed by fire caused by a locomotive, and the property was insured for $3,000, what recourse would the loser have? He could only go to the railway company. I think that the amount of $5,000 should be increased to $10,000 in order to protect sufficiently those who suffer damage by fire caused by locomotives. I hope this suggestion will be taken into consideration by the committee, because the matter is important to any one whose property is located near a railway line.

Mr. SEXSMITH: Many valuable buildings are situated close to railway lines. I think it is highly improper that the amount of liability should be limited to $5,000.

Mr. COCHRANE: I think that $5,000 is enough.

Mr. SEXSMITH: In case of fire, the claimant would have to prove that the railway company caused the fire. I do not see why a man whose loss amounted to $10,000 or $20,000 should be unable to receive from the railway company more than $5,000 because of this limitation.

Mr. COCHRANE: There are not many cases where the loss exceeds $5,000.

Mr. SEXSMITH: I know, but we should not fix the amount at $5,000.

[Mr. Carvell.]

Mr. SMITH: I agree that such a large amount might not always be involved, but there might be cases where $5,000 would not be sufficient to cover the loss. It seems to me that the amount could reasonably be changed from $5,000 to a considerably larger amount.

Mr. CROMWELL: I move in amendment that in this section the words "five thousand dollars" be struck out and the words "ten thousand dollars" be substituted therefor.

Mr. NICKLE: I think, from the language used by the two last speakers, that they are under a misapprehension as to the character and meaning of this section. If the machinery of the company—that is the locomotive—is modern and efficient, they become insurers to the extent of $5,000. That is, if a fire is caused by a locomotive and it was what we call purely accidental, the locomotive being properly equipped and everything being in proper working order, the company are insurers to the amount of $5,000. If there is a defect in the locomotive or any neglect in the operation of the railway, then the company is responsible, in unlimited amount, for the damage done. It struck me that the hon. gentlemen, in speaking to the subject, rather laid down the proposal that there was a general limitation to the amount of $5,000. The limitation is only to the extent of insurance; that is, if the locomotive is modern and well equipped and a fire occurs, the company can only be asked to pay $5.000. If the locomotive is negligently operated or improperly equipped, the liability is unlimited.

Mr. SMITH: I understood that if the locomotive was properly managed and everything was in order, the railway company would not be liable at all.

Mr. CARVELL: If you prove that the fire is caused by the locomotive, you can recover up to $5,000, even if they had the most perfect appliances in the world.

Mr. SMITH: I think a good deal more of the section than I did, in view of that explanation.

Mr. CARVELL: But to recover more than $5,000, you must prove negligence, either in appliances or in operation.

Mr. NICKLE: Under the old law, the plantiff had to show that the spark-arrester was defective or that there was some defect in the mechanism. Having shown that, he could recover damages, but plaintiffs were under this embarrassment; as a rule, they had no opportunity of inspecting the locomotive and they had great difficulty in showing that there was any defect either in the equipment or in the operation of the locomotive. The law was then amended in this manner; if there was reasonable ground for assuming that a spark had gone from the stack of a passing locomotive and had fallen on a man's field or house, causing damage, then the jury were warranted in granting damages not exceeding $5,000. If the plantiff could show in addition that the spark-attester was defective or that the locomotive was incorrectly operated—for instance by blowing up the stack improperly when going up a grade—then the limitation of $5,000 was done away with and the plaintiff could recover to the full amount of the damages suffered by him through the negligent construction or operation of the locomotive.

12 m.

Mr. CARVELL: That is a correct interpretation of the law.

Mr. COCHRANE: Five thousand dollars is a sufficiently heavy liability.

Mr. CROMWELL: Supposing that I have a set of buildings in close proximity to a railway, and with all the modern appliances that the railways have now to prevent fire, fire takes place caused by an engine. My property is insured for $3,000, but perhaps is worth $5,000, and I have in my barn stock and feed for that stock to the amount of $12,000. If my property is burned down through that fire, I am the loser. I get my $3,000 insurance, but the railway company will pay me only the $2,000, the difference between the $5,000 and the $3,000 I have received from the insurance company. Who is to pay the balance? The railway company should have to pay up to the extent of at least $10,000, because many people are in the same position as that which I have described. If fire should take place in a wood lot, the case would be similar. The owners might lose $25,000, and it would be quite a help to them if they could get $10,000 from the railway company responsible for the fire that took place. We should not give a charter to a company that has not a reasonable amount of responsibility to the people from whom it gets a charter.

Mr. COCHRANE: The railway companies have to insure up to $5,000 even when their appliances are in proper order. That is heavy insurance.

Mr. SEXSMITH: I cannot see where they insure at all. They are liable when they cause a fire, but what right has a railroad, with a smoke-stack in accordance with the law of the land, to set fire to my property or your property and then not be liable? If you allow them to be a little slack, they will cause many more fires. A railway engine may be in the best of condition and still cause fires in very dry seasons. Two or three years ago fire was caused from the railway at a certain place, and the grass was dry. The man happened to be away from home. If it had not been for a couple of people coming along all his buildings would have been burned down, and he would have lost $10,000 or more.

Mr. COCHRANE: The railway companies are blamed for setting many fires for which they are not responsible.

Mr. SEXSMITH: It is up to the railway companies to prove that they are not liable.

Mr. CARVELL: The Supreme Court some years ago decided—there were a series of cases—that if a railway company allowed dead grass or weeds to exist upon the right of way and a spark fell upon that and ignited it, thereby causing fire, they were negligent, and such a case does not come under this limit of $5,000. I hold no brief for the railway companies, as my business is to take actions against them. In the revision of this Act, however, a special committee was appointed, and all parties were invited to come and present their cases. The railway companies were represented, and this section went through the committee without any objection. This, of course, is the Parliament of Canada, and we are not bound to send for anybody or to consider the views of any one, but it might be regarded as a little breach of faith with the railway companies if, under present conditions, we interfered with an important section like this. I am not intimating for a moment that we have not the power to change it.

Mr. SEXSMITH: I cannot agree with the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell). The railway companies had their legal advisers before the committee. The people did not come to present their case to the committee, and we are their only safeguard.

Mr. COCHRANE: People did come.

Mr. SEXSMITH: Even if the railway companies were willing to accept liability up to $5,000. I do not see that that is any justification for saying that we should not increase the amount.

Mr. COCHRANE: They were willing to accept that.

Mr. BALL: It is up to the railway companies to keep their smoke stacks in order. If damage occurs, they should pay all damage over the insurance, provided it is proved that they are responsible for the fire. I do not see why any private individual should lose on account of that fire. I do not think the burden of proving that a smoke stack is not in order should be placed on the individual.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: When the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Cromwell) spoke to me about this matter I thought, perhaps, we would be justified in increasing the amount. After listening to those hon. gentlemen who have been discussing the question, and after reading subsection 7, which reads:

> Nothing in the last two preceding subsections shall prevent or prejudice any action or claim against the company for failure to use modern and efficient appliances or for other negligence—

I can readily understand that action can be taken against a company for any other negligence as well as for inefficient appliances, and I am satisfied now that the claim made by the hon. member for Compton is fully covered by subsection 7.

Mr. CROMWELL: A railway company is a very big corporation, and an individual is at a disadvantage in contending with it. He might not think it worth his while to take action against a large corporation, and, perhaps, be the loser. The individual who sustains the loss should be protected and should not have to take into consideration the fact that he is up against a big corporation. The Government should see that the individual losing through a fire, whether caused by a big corporation or by a small corporation, should be protected.

Mr. MORRISON: When a farmer suffers on account of a fire caused by a locomotive he has not the means of ascertaining whether that locomotive is in proper condition or not. The locomotive is out of reach.

Mr. MORRIS: I am just a little interested in this matter. Although it has never happened in my own immediate locality, I have heard of great damage sustained by individuals who were not in a position to prove where the damage had originated. We knew from the circumstances of the case that it had originated with the railway company, but it was impossible to prove exactly where, and the company took advantage of this fact. We knew, and the company knew, that they were responsible for the damages, but because the man could not produce the evidence necessary to fix it on the company, he had to sustain the loss. I think when the proof is sufficient that the railway company is responsible, they should be made to pay the damages.

Mr. COCHRANE: If you prove they are responsible, they have to pay.

Mr. MORRIS: The difficulty is to prove where they are responsible. Several companies were using the same line. During the night several trains passed, and the damage was caused. The individual could not prove to the court nor to the committee which had the matter in charge which company was responsible, and had to sustain the loss himself.

Mr. CARVELL: Perhaps my hon. friend was not following the change made by the hon. member from St. Johns and Iberville (Mr. Demers), and accepted by the committee. He suggested a change which provided that the company which operates the railway over which the locomotive is being used is responsible for the damage.

Mr. MORRIS: That covers the point I had in mind.

Mr. CARVELL: Of course, my hon. friend realizes that it would not be fair to hold the railway company responsible unless you proved the fire was started by a locomotive or by the railway company in some way.

Mr. MORRIS: That only throws the responsibility from one to another.

Mr. CARVELL: It fixes the responsibility.

Mr. CROMWELL: But, it does not affect what I have said. What I want is that the maximum responsibility of the railways be placed at $10,000 instead of $5,000, no matter what company is operating.

Mr. COCHRANE: If you prove there is negligence, there is no limit to the amount. You make it $100,000. Of course, the railways must have fairplay as well as any body else.

Mr. CROMWELL: But establishing liability is the consideration before the House.

Mr. COCHRANE: I got a telegram last summer from two lumbermen claiming that the Intercolonial had set fire to their timber. I had the matter investigated and found there was not any fire within ten rods of the track. Their own men had set the fire.

Mr. REID: Did you pay them the $5,000?

Mr. COCHRANE: I did not pay them anything.

Mr. CROMWELL: I cannot see how it would be any disadvantage to the railway companies to place the sum at $10,000 instead of $5,000. We are operating a railway ourselves, and if we do any damage we have no disposition not to settle for the damage. The people of this country have given charters to the railway corporations, and I do not see any reason why those railways should not be responsible. It is only a matter of protecting the individual who is living close to the right of way and who may be in danger of fire.

Mr. CARVELL: We have had to face this question a good many times, especially the lawyers of this House. I have argued it to juries frequently. I am not addressing a jury now, and I am compelled to look at it from a broad business standpoint. In the first place, we must remember this country could not exist without railways, and they are entitled to a great deal of protection. We must also remember that until electric energy is developed to a greater extent than it is at the present time the only known way of operating a railway is by fire; they cannot generate the power otherwise. They have to go through the country at a high rate of speed. I believe the railway companies are trying their very best to use all modern appliances to prevent causing fires. It never seemed to me fair that when a railway company is compelled to use such a dangerous thing as fire, and they cannot get along without it, you should practically put them in a position where they may be mulcted in very large damages for doing that which they are compelled to do, unless you can show that they have done it negligently. I have always felt that Parliament went pretty far when they adopted that clause providing that they were liable to the extent of $5,000 merely by proving the fact that the fire occurred. I hardly think it fair that this should be increased to $10,000.

Mr. REID: The suggestion has been made that a man might have $10,000 or $12,000 worth of buildings destroyed, and that the company would be only liable for $5,000. I look at this clause as being more to protect the farmer who could not possibly insure what this $5,000 is intended to cover, that is the growing grain. I claim a man is negligent of his duty, even in his own interest, if he does not protect himself by insuring his buildings. The insurance premium is not very high, especially if he takes a three years policy. If every man would protect himself there would be more reason for having this limit larger. As the hon. member for Carleton said, we have to be fair to the other side. Every man should take precautions instead of depending on the railway companies.

Mr. SEXSMITH: I realize that the comtry has to have railways and that the railways should have just and proper treatment. But, it is not the railways that are paying this; the people of Canada are paying it. We do not want the fire rate to get too high, because if we do the tariffs of the railways are going to be put up and the people will have to pay. The people of Canada are paying and the tariff is made sufficient to pay the loss of the individual who is unfortunate enough to have his property along the railway line. The railways are not paying it. They figure out what their loss is going to be and they figure their tariffs in accordance with it.

Mr. COCHRANE: They have not the right to figure their tariffs at all.

Mr. SEXSMITH: They do.

Mr. COCHRANE: The commission figures their tariffs.

Mr. SEXSMITH: But they put all these things in and the commission takes them into account. They try to set a limit of $5,000.

Mr. COCHRANE: The limit is not set.

Mr. SEXSMITH: I do not say it is absolutely set, but it is practically impossible for the ordinary individual to prove that a smokestack has a hole in it.

Mr. COCHRANE: Here is a man who proved it.

Mr. SEXSMITH: The case of the hon. member for Carleton will bear out what I say. He had a good deal of difficulty and his client paid out a good deal in costs before he could prove it. I think the railways should be responsible for the fires they set.

Mr. COCHRANE: If you prove they set them, there is no limit to their responsibilities.

Mr. SEXSMITH: There is no limit if you prove they have a hole in their smoke-stack. But how can you prove that? You have to prove first that the fire was caused by the railway.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH: All those properties along the railway were there before the roads ran through.

Mr. COCHRANE: Not all.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH: A great many. A farmer will not put up a valuable building to-day near a railway. The mutual companies are refusing a great many otherwise good risks. I think there is a little in the contention of the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Cromwell). I agree that we have to have the railways in the country and that we should deal fairly with them because we are obligated in many ways to them. But the matter of insurance that my hon. friend the Minister of Customs (Mr. Reid) spoke of is a pretty hard one to deal with. I am connected with an insurance company, and we scarcely ever have a meeting of the board but we have to refuse a risk which would otherwise be desirable because it is located near a line of railway.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend from Ontario (Mr. Smith) says that the buildings were there very largely before the railways were built. In many cases, especially if the farmer is looking after his interests, in estimating compensation for the land taken the increased insurance which he must pay is part of the damages and the arbitration courts allow very large amounts for that increased insurance; so that the railway company before hand has paid in the money with which to carry that insurance.

Mr. NICKLE: The committee have opened up a very big subject and perhaps it would not be amiss, although it is late, to say a word or two in regard to the responsibility of any man for his own default. The general principle of the law is that no man is responsible for damage that is caused to another unless he has been negligent. When railway companies came into existence and began to run, that principle of law was applied to their operation and management. We gave them certain charter rights and there were certain rights incidental to their operation. One was the right to generate steam. To generate steam you need fire, and to get fire you need a fire box and a flue leading from it. The principle of law was gradually worked out to be that if the engine was not negligently operated, and if it was efficiently constructed, the railway was not responsible for damages resulting from fire. Time went on and there were no doubt cases where there were great hardships, where there was fire and it was impossible for the plantiff to prove that there had been any negligence in the operation of the road or the construction of the engine. Public feeling was aroused to such an extent that finally the Act was amended and it was declared that if there was fire and it was traceable to a locomotive the railway that owned that locomotive should be responsible to the extent of $5,000 no matter whether there had been negligence on the part of the railway company and its employees in the management or construction of the engine or not. There are two sides to this question. I have acted for railway companies and I have acted against them. I will take the case of a lumber company with a siding on the right of way of a railway. They do not clean up the debris after their loading operations are over, a railway engine comes along, a spark is emitted from the engine, it falls on the debris and sets a fire which burns up a farmer's or lumberman's buildings. It is true that if there had been no railway there would have been no fire; but if the man who owned the adjacent land on which the spark fell had cleaned up there would have been no loss, or the loss would have been less. What this committee is called upon to decide to-night is this: To what extent are we prepared to depart from the general principle of the law that says that a person or a company are not responsible for damages unless they have been negligent? The principle of the old Act was that to the extent of $5,000 the railway were the insurers. Beyond that amount they were responsible to the extent of the damage suffered provided you could prove they were negligent. Whether $5,000 is enough or whether a couple of thousand dollars should be added to that is for the committee to decide, but I feel that it would be most unwise to provide that there should be an unlimited responsibility, because if that were the case it would put a premium on dishonesty to this extent, that those who had property adjacent to the line of railway and could by no possibility suffer loss from fire, under proper conditions, might so arrange events that this property would be burned knowing that they would get the full value from the railway company. My hon. friend from South Ontario (Mr. Smith) says that it would be difficult to prove damages against a railway company. My experience has been that if you get a farmer's jury they will find some way of proving a defect in the construction and operation of the railway and that if there is a case at all the farmer jury will find something that was done that should not have been done, either in exhausting too rapidly up the stack, or that a spark arrester was defective in construction or in operation. As a rule the railway company has pretty hard going. The principle that underlay the original Act was that $5,000 was thought to be reasonable compensation in the ordinary case, and that this amount did away with unnecessary litigation and gave reasonable insurance to the people who had property adjacent to the railway. Of course it must be remembered that if you unduly increase the responsibility on the railway, in the last analysis you throw that burden on the people in the way of increased freight and passenger rates.

Mr. CROMWELL: The hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) has referred to exhausts. The exhaust from anything, even a railway locomotive, does not amount to much. It is not exhaust we are after, it is protection for the people who have buildings close to a railway chartered by the Government of Canada to build through a certain district. Why should the railway not be responsible for damages which they cause to the property owner? I do not see any obstacle in the way of increasing this amount from $5,000 to $10,000, and I hope the House will see fit to endorse the amendment I have proposed.

Mr. DEMERS: While it is true that the railways are absolutely necessary to the country, it is also true that they operate under charters granted by this Parliament, and enjoy great privileges. I do not agree that it is easy to get a verdict against a railway company. It is almost impossible to prove negligence or improper equipment of engines. Then it must be remembered that $5,000 covers the total damage, no matter how many owners may suffer loss. A fire in Mississquoi county a few years ago burned an entire village and caused damage of more than $100,000, but under this Act if the law had been in existence at that time $5,000 is the total amount for which the company would have been responsible, and this amount would have been divided among all the property holders.

Mr. COCHRANE: I will agree to change the $5,000 to $7,000.

Section as amended agreed to.

Progress reported.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Reid the House adjourned at 12.50 a.m. Friday.

Friday, July 20, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

BOARDS OF TRADE ACT AMENDMENT.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 115, to amend the Boards of Trade Act. He said: This is simply to make provision enabling a group of Boards of Trade in a municipality, for instance, to co-operate.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PRIVATE BILLS.

FIRST READING OF SENATE BILLS.

Bill No. 113, for the relief of William Henry Bishop.—Mr. McCraney.

Bill No. 114, respecting The Montreal Central Terminal Company.—Mr. Girard.

SOUTHERN SLAV COMMITTEE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I beg leave to lay on the table of the House a memorandum submitted by the Southern Slav Committee to the representatives of the British Dominions. No particular mode of communication is suggested in the memorandum, and I therefore thought it best to lay it on the table of the House.

PRIVILEGE—HON. MR. PUGSLEY.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. WILLIAM PUGSLEY (St. John): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege concerning a matter to which I referred when the Military Service Bill was in committee. On the 6th day of June of this year, as reported on page 2149 on Hansard, at a time when I did not happen to be in the House, my right hon. friend the Prime Minister in connection with an Order in Council which had been passed providing for the appointment of two judges to inquire into the report of Mr. Justice Galt in a matter which concerned my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works, made use of these words:

> My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) challenges the action we have taken and challenges the reflections which have been made upon Mr. Justice Galt in the letter written to me from the Minister of Public Works. I should like to remind him that on a certain occasion one of his colleagues who sits beside him used infinitely stronger language, if my memory is correct, with regard to Mr. Justice Landry of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick, and he did so without any reproof from my right hon. friend. I am perfectly willing to contrast the action which we have taken in this matter with that which my right hon. friend took on that occasion. Findings had been made by a commission of which Mr. Justice Landry was a member. Those findings reflected seriously upon a member of my right hon. friend's Government. The matter was brought to the attention of Parliament, and it was urged by a motion in this House that such a finding should be disregarded.

I think the word "not" has been left out there.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It goes on:

My right hon. friend ignored the whole matter and voted down the motion, the precise words of which I have not before me; no consideration to the finding was given by him, and the then Minister of Public Works retained his position in the Government and continued to administer the affairs of his department. It seemed to me, when the matter was brought to my attention by the present Minister of Public Works, that such a course as was on that occasion pursued by my right hon. friend could not be followed or sanctioned with advantage to the public interest.

The statement of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister is contrary to the facts in two most important particulars. I would not bring this matter up were it not for the fact that the statement of my right hon. friend deeply concerns my honour as a member of this House, apart altogether from the reflection upon the attitude of my leader. I think that members of this House ought to be very careful in making aspersions on the character of other hon. members of this House. We ought not to attack each other as if we were wolves anxious to destroy each other's reputation. I think my right hon. friend ought to have been more careful, and to have looked into what took place when the matter to which he referred as affecting myself was before the House. He should have satisfied himself as to what took place on that occasion before so reflecting on me.

Just for a moment I will call attention to the statement which my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works made with regard to Mr. Justice Galt in his letter to the Prime Minister, which will be found on page 2147 of this year's Hansard. These are his words:

It was manifest from Mr. Galt's demeanour—

[Mr. Pugsley.]

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not desire to restrict unduly the hon. member, but I hope he will confine his statement directly to the matter of privilege as affecting himself.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I will do so. The reason I propose reading this is that the Prime Minister says I reflected upon Mr. Justice Landry in infinitely stronger language than was used by the Minister of Public Works in respect to Mr. Justice Galt. I therefore think I am in order in quoting the language used by the Minister of Public Works. He said:

It was manifest to me then from Mr. Galt's demeanour and remarks that he purposed sparing no effort and rejecting no means, however unfair, of doing me all the injury in his power. I therefore, from that point forward, took little or no interest in the proceedings of his Commission, being absolutely certain not only that my own conduct in the premises had been straightforward and in the public interest, but that, though it would be a waste of time to make any attempt to influence the purpose of Mr. Commissioner Galt, there would be no difficulty later in exposing and establishing before any fair and competent tribunal both the true facts of the case and the malice of this commissioner.

A little further on he said:

It is quite true that no explanation or defence, however complete or however substantiated, would have affected in the least Mr. Galt's determination, but this fact cannot be offered as an excuse on his part for abandoning and indeed prostituting the most elementary principle of British justice—that it is a fact, however, does, I think, fully establish the predetermination and malice of the Commissioner.

I will deal first with the second charge that my right hon. friend the Prime Minister makes. He says that there was a motion in 1909 for an inquiry in respect to myself and the Central railway. He must have absolutely forgotten what took place upon that occasion, for there was no motion for an inquiry. The motion was that I had been found by the report of these commissioners to be guilty of misconduct—of conduct not worthy a public man—and a demand was made that I should be retired from the Government; that was the motion. It is important to see how the matter got before the House. There are four gentlemen, members of this Parliament, who took an active part in the attempt so to drive me from the Government at that time. One was my hon. friend Colonel Fowler who is now a member of the Senate.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member is going rather far afield now. On a question of privilege it is competent for him to deny statements reflecting on himself, but I hope he will not bring into his explanation other hon. members of this House, and other matters.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I shall have to do that to a certain extent in order to show how the matter came before this House, and to prove that the statement made by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister the other day: that the leaders of the party at that time asked for an inquiry, is incorrect. What was demanded was that I should be forced from the Government.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: What were the exact terms of the resolution?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I will come to that in a moment. My right hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) was then leading member of the Opposition, and he requested the then Premier of New Brunswick, now the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen), to send the report of this commission here for the purpose of being acted upon. He referred to the fact that I might seek to rely upon the evidence to show the report was false, but he said that they proposed to get after me before I would have a chance to get the evidence. Now let me read the letter. This has been brought down in the Legislature of New Brunswick. The letter reads as follows:

House of Commons,
Ottawa, April, 14, 1909.

Dear Mr. Hazen:—

I telegraphed you this morning re the Comm. Reports and trust you have sent me a number. As to copy of evidence I put that in in case you have it printed which probably you have not. It is, I suppose, voluminous. Why I did so was for this reason. Pugsley so far as now appears will try to bluff the matter out of the House here as not pertaining to Federal affairs.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The letter continues:

He will say that the report is not based on evidence and that he will, after getting a copy of the evidence issue a statement showing this to be so. That will be his defence. We propose to get after him here before he gets a copy of the evidence.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The letter concludes as follows:

But if by any possibility he does get it then we need the evidence to meet him here.

I presume the evidence will not be available in printed form for some time. If he gets a copy I hope you will see that several copies are made at the same time and that we get one or two here.

I have not seen full report but what I have seen is pretty straight goods.

Yours very truly,
(Sgd.) G. E. Foster.

That is the letter written by my high-handed friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce. When the matter came before the House it was on a motion made by my hon. friend, my Christian friend, the present Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers). He brought the matter before the House, and if any hon. gentleman has the curiosity to read what took place, I would refer him to Hansard of 1909, at page 5645, and so far as my reply is concerned, concluding upon page 5755. I assure the House that I am not going to read the hundredth part of what took place on that occasion. My hon. friend the present Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) proceeded to remark that this report had been made, and it seriously reflected upon me, and at page 5655, referring to the evidence which was then under consideration by the present Minister of Labour, I made these remarks:

Mr. Pugsley: I wish to correct the statement of my hon. friend. I was not the managing director of the company.

Mr. Crothers: I am simply making my observations based upon the judgment of this court.

Mr. Pugsley: My hon. friend must pardon me. I say that there is nothing whatever in the evidence which would justify a statement of that kind, and the statement is absolutely untrue.

Mr. Crothers: I am not here for the purpose of discussing the evidence in this case.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. Crothers: Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to discuss the evidence in the case.

Mr. Pugsley: I am not surprised at that.

Mr. Crothers: I am here standing on the judgment of a court.

Mr. Pugsley: If my hon. friend can find anything in the evidence which will justify some of the statements in the report, I shall be greatly obliged if he will refer to them.

Mr. Crothers: As I said a moment ago, I am not here for the purpose of discussing the evidence in this case. I am standing on the judgment of a court.

Further on he said:

Mr. Crothers: I submit, Mr. Speaker, in accordance with well established practice in English speaking communities, that the first thing for the hon. the Minister of Public Works to have done, when that judgment was pronounced against him by a court so constituted, was to step aside and resign his position as Minister of Public Works.

Now you see by that, Mr. Speaker, that leaders of the Conservative party at that time were seeking to drive me from the Government, without any opportunity of discussing the evidence, or having this House pronounce upon the evidence. I desire to say, Sir, that I appreciate to the fullest extent the desire of my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) that he should not be condemned upon the judgment of Mr. Justice Galt, without some opportunity being afforded, either to this Parliament or to a committee of this Parliament to review and to consider the evidence upon which that report is founded. That is the right of the present Minister of Public Works. He has a right to demand—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is surely exceeding his right. He must confine himself to a denial of the matters complained of, but I shall not be unduly restrictive.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I will endeavour to do so. What I say is that the Prime Minister gave to this House the impression that my leader and I were seeking to prevent an examination of the evidence.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is what he told this House, and I see the report in Hansard puts it beyond the shadow of a doubt that the hon. gentleman was mistaken in that assertion.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Which assertion?

Mr. PUGSLEY: That we were seeking to prevent an inquiry.

Sir SAM HUGHES: In which case?

Mr. PUGSLEY: In my case. The matter came up also in connection with the view which the Speaker took. He took the view that my hon. friend the Minister of Labour had no right to bring the matter up on a motion to go into Supply; that it was contrary to Parliamentary practice, but my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) who was then the leader of the Government stated that although the Speaker might be right, yet he was desired by me to say that no such point would be taken, because he wanted Parliament to have the fullest opportunity to examine the evidence, and deal with the matter upon the evidence. That was stated by my right hon. friend the then leader of the Government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and it will be found that later on I took the same view. The result was that the inquiry was made open, and the evidence was fully discussed. The motion will be found on page 5683 of the Hansard of May 5, 1909. It reads:

That all the words after the word 'that' to the end of the question be left out and the following substituted therefor:

[Mr. Pugsley.]

The unanimous findings of the commission consisting of the Hon. Mr. Justice Landry and Messrs. F. MacDougall and A. I. Teed, appointed by the government of the province of New Brunswick by order in council dated June 5, 1908, and the authorized reports of the proceedings of the legislature of the said province during the session of 1908 set forth serious matters touching the public acts and conduct of the Hon. Wm. Pugsley, formerly a member of Government of the said province and now Minister of Public Works;

That persons occupying high offices of state as constitutional advisers of His Excellency ought to be free from just reproach and from reasonable suspicion in respect of their public character and reputation;

That to this end the said findings in so far as they impugn the public acts or conduct of the said Hon. William Pugsley deserve the serious consideration of this House and demand such action thereupon as may be necessary to enforce worthy and proper standards of public duty.

That was the motion, and, as I have said, upon that, the demand was made by the present Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) speaking for the leaders of the Conservative party, that I should immediately resign my seat. On the contrary, as I have said, from what my right hon. friend states, even against the opinion of the Speaker that the motion could not properly come up in that way, we, I and my right hon. leader, waived all objections to it and insisted upon the fullest inquiry by this Parliament into the evidence with a view to determine whether or not the report was well founded. And, Sir, after my hon. friend the Minister of Labour got through insisting that the discussion should be confined to the report, that he had nothing to do with the evidence, and that this Parliament had nothing to do with the evidence, that the report must govern. I followed, and I discussed the evidence very fully. I showed that in twenty different instances this report was absolutely false—absolutely false.

My right hon. friend makes the statement that I made a statement with regard to Mr. Justice Landry in infinitely stronger language than that which was used by my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works in regard to Mr. Justice Galt. I shall not criticise the language of the Minister of Public Works; he may be entirely justified in his statement, I am not here to question that. It may be that the mode which has been taken is the best mode of having the evidence reviewed. Some may think that the best way would be to do what was done in 1909, that is to have this Parliament fully investigate the evidence; but from my experience I am free to say that I would not hang a dog on the report of a commission without an opportunity to go fully into the evidence and form my own judgment with regard to it.

Mr. ROGERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am free to say that, I do not hesitate to say it. Perhaps it was because my experience was so painful that I entertain strong views upon it. The only safe thing to do is to look to the evidence and see whether it forms a proper foundation for the report and, as I said, when we came to the examination of this report and evidence, I was able to show that in twenty important particulars there was not a shadow of evidence to support the findings.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Does my hon. friend refer to the commissioners in his particular case, or commissioners in general?

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend, I trust, will be able to draw a reasonable and proper conclusion from what I have said. I have had a sorry experience. Whether all commissioners might act in the same way I would not say but, if there is danger that they might, the only safe thing in my judgment is to have the evidence and to investigate the whole matter before the high court of Parliament, or before a committee of Parliament, or in some other way. There is no appeal from the court; it is not a judgment in the sense in which the Minister of Labour sought to put forward that it was a judgment, and it seems to me that this Parliament would have the right and would be the proper tribunal to investigate the evidence as was done in 1909, a fact which my right hon. friend must have forgotten when he made the statement which he did. He must have forgotten that the evidence was fully gone into in this Parliament in 1909 with the full consent of my right hon. friend and leader and entirely with my approval, and against the suggestion of the Speaker that it was hardly the proper time to take up the matter or to enter into the motion proposed by the Minister of Labour.

When the Prime Minister states that I referred to the Hon. Mr. Justice Landry in infinitely stronger language than the Minister of Public Works reflected on Mr. Justice Galt, my right hon. friend is wrong. The reflection that I made upon that occasion was upon the report, not upon the individuals. I took up the report, and from the fact that it disregarded the evidence in many particulars, from the fact that it was absolutely contrary to the evidence in many particulars, I argued that it showed partisanship; it showed a reckless disregard for the truth; it bore upon its face evidence of a determination to drive me from public life if it were possible to do so. The strongest language which I used—and I had a right to use it, just as every litigant who has a case before a court has a right to criticise in very strong language the judgment if it is absolutely contrary to the evidence, or if it ignores the evidence. Of course, it is one thing to characterize a report as unsupported by evidence and as evidently showing a lack of desire to get at the truth, and it is quite a different thing to criticise the judge individually. The strongest language which I used will be found on Hansard, page 5700. That is the only one of the twenty instances in respect to which the report was false with which I desire to trouble the House. That had reference to a matter of the greatest possible consequence. It had reference to the guarantee by the province of $250,000 of bonds for the New Brunswick Railway Company. By the statute power was given to guarantee on behalf of the province these bonds as each section of the railway, if I remember rightly, was completed. The Royal Trust Company were the trustees for the bondholders. The bonds were deposited with the trust company of which Mr. Shadbolt was manager, and from time to time as the company became entitled to have them guaranteed, the secretary would endorse the guaranty upon the bonds. Up to a certain period there were $111,500 of bonds guaranteed for which there was provision by Act of the Legislature. These commissioners made a report—and this is what I referred to in very strong language on Hansard, page 5700—that it was conclusively proved that $250,000 of these bonds had been guaranteed by the province without any legislative authority.

If that had been done every man connected with the provincial government, myself included, was liable to criminal prosecution and might have been sent to the penitentiary. It was of the most serious character. Yet that report was absolutely contrary to the evidence. Those commissioners say in their report it was conclusively proved that this guarantee had been made. Surely characterizing that part of the report as false, and characterizing it as made with a reckless disregard of the truth, was not making a charge against the commissioners any stronger than that which my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Hon. Robert Rogers) made against Mr. Justice Galt. His charge against Mr.

Justice Galt was against him personally, not showing it by the evidence, but expressing his belief that the report was made with malice, etc. Let me read the language which I used:

> I wish to invite attention to another statement which I think is of great importance, and which no member of this House should have been prepared to practically support by bringing this matter before the House unless he had made some inquiry and satisfied himself of its truthfulness. I find, on pages 18 and 19 of the report of the commissioners, a very important statement, and I am going to press this with a great deal of force if I can press any point with force. I am going to urge upon the consideration of this House, the fact that not only is the statement to which I am about to allude false, but that it is, I am obliged to say, either knowingly or recklessly false. It has been made either knowing that it was false or with an utter disregard of the facts of the case. On page 18 they say:
> "Notwithstanding this fact, it appears conclusively from the evidence that the whole $250,000 par value of these 3 per cent bonds had been guaranteed and delivered to the company up to the 6th day of August, 1903."
> That is a charge of the most serious character to make against the provincial government. That is a charge that we, in violation of the statute, in violation of our duty, when we had no legislative authority to do it, prior to the passing of the Act of 1904, which extended the powers as far as the guaranteeing of bonds was concerned, prior to the 6th of August, 1903, guaranteed the whole of this issue of $250,000 of three per cent bonds and that they were delivered to the company. They say that that appears conclusively from the evidence. I say it does not appear, not merely conclusively from the evidence but that it does not appear at all from the evidence and that the evidence is entirely contrary to that statement. So far from the whole $250,000 having been guaranteed prior to the 6th of August, 1903, the total amount which was guaranteed was $138,500, a difference of $111,500, between what was actually guaranteed and the statement which these commissioners make as the amount having been guaranteed. There is no excuse for that and it cannot be a typographical error either.

As I have said, taking up that important item, and showing that it was made without any evidence whatever to support it, I think making the charge which I did against the commissioners is a very different thing from the charge which my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works makes. Yet because I used that language with reference to the report, my right hon. friend the Prime Minister has asserted in this House that I made a charge against Mr. Justice Landry infinitely stronger than that which the Minister of Public Works made against Mr. Justice Galt.

I will detain the House a few minutes longer while I call attention to the fact that my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen), who sent these reports to the Minister of Trade and Commerce to be acted upon by this House, knew from the report of the Government counsel that that statement was false and that when this report was presented here—

Mr. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. member to desist from pursuing his present line of argument. The hon. gentleman has made his denial very fully, and has been given ample opportunity to do so. I think he is going too far on a question of privilege.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have made the statement that there was no evidence to warrant those commissioners making the report they did in reference to the guarantee of those $250,000 of bonds. Do you not think, Sir, that it would strengthen my position infinitely if I were able to show from the report of the Government counsel, Mr. Powell, that it was unsupported by the evidence, and that it was in that respect a false report, and that my hon. friend the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) knew it was false? Some people might doubt as to whether I was right or whether the commissioners were right, but if I can show from an official document transmitted to the Premier of New Brunswick that this report of the commissioners was false, surely my position is stronger. If you will let me do that, I will drop the matter.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman has made his denial, and has stated his position very fully. To bring evidence from another person to support his denial would not be permissible on a question of privilege.

Mr. PUGSLEY: But, how many people might say it was just the statement of Mr. Pugsley against the report of Mr. Justice Landry. If I corroborate my statement by showing that the Government's own counsel, Mr. Powell, reported to Mr. Hazen before this report was sent here and before it was acted upon, and before this Parliament was asked to approve it, that the report was wrong, surely it is only fair I should be allowed to do so.

Mr. SPEAKER: On a question of privilege, the hon. member can only deny, as he has done so elaborately in this case, certain statements made by the right hon. the Prime Minister. The hon. member should not try the case ex-parte, which is what he now purposes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: In the first place, this report was sent for by my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who wrote to my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries—who was then Premier of New Brunswick—and asked him to hurry along these reports, telling him they proposed to get me before I could get a copy of the documents. The Minister of Marine knew there was accompanying this report, and had in his possession at that time, an official document from the counsel of the Provincial Government telling him that this report was false.

Mr. HAZEN: Does the hon. gentleman say it was an official document?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HAZEN: It was nothing of the sort, it was not intended as an official document.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If it was not it was an informative document anyway, and it told the Prime Minister that the report was false. It told my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that in regard to the $250,000 of bonds there was not a particle of evidence to support it. Whether it was official or unofficial, I care not. It gave the information to my hon. friend that the report was false, yet he sent it here to the present Minister of Trade and Commerce to act upon it, and the Minister of Labour was put up to act upon it and to thrust me from the Government upon a report which the Provincial Government's own counsel told him was false. Have I not the right to read that letter? I have it before me, certified under the hand of the Clerk of the House, and I wish to read it.

The letter reads:

Powell & Harrison, Barrister, Solicitors, Notaries, etc. St. John, N.B., March 31/09.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think that my hon. friend has already far exceeded his right on a question of privilege. His complaint, as I understand it, was with regard to myself, in two respects: one, that I had suggested that an inquiry had been denied, and the other that I had attributed to him language stronger than that which had been used by the Minister of Public Works with respect to Mr. Justice Galt. I must confess my own belief that about two-thirds of what my hon. friend has already alleged is altogether outside the question of privilege upon which he undertook to address the House. If we are to have a debate upon the merits of Mr. Justice Landry's report, that is one thing; if we are to have an explanation from my hon. friend on the matter of privilege which he desires to bring to the attention of the House, that is quite another thing. In the first case, my hon. friend is quite at liberty to go ahead and read letters or discuss the report to the greatest possible extent, with the understanding that the right of reply be admitted. In the other case, I submit that he has already gone much further than he has any right to go under the rules of this House.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have no objection whatever to the fullest reply. I think it is only fair to public men that these matters should be dealt with.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If we are to have a discussion of that, I suggest, with all deference to my hon. friend, that we appoint a day for that purpose. I will then move the House into Committee of Supply and we shall have a discussion on the subject. But it is not desirable to do that in contravention of the rules of the House upon a question of privilege that does not bring the matter into debate.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I will just read the letter, and then I will stop.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the hon. member say that the letter concerns his statement, that he had referred merely to the evidence and not to the commissioner? If so, there can be no objection to his reading the letter. The Prime Minister has pointed out the difficulty that I had in mind all the while. While I desire that on a question of privilege the hon. gentleman shall have the widest opportunity of making his defence, I do think that there must be some limitation.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I will tell you, Mr. Speaker, what the letter will show. The letter will concern my statement that I was thoroughly justified in criticising Mr. Justice Landry, because the statement of the Commissioners that $250,000 had been guaranteed without legislative authority was absolutely false.

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the hon. member read that portion of the letter?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes. This is a letter dated March 31, 1909, addressed by H. A. Powell, of Powell and Harrison, barristers, etc., to Hon. J. D. Hazen, Attorney-General, Fredericton.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Whether the letter does or does not concern what my hon.

friend has stated, I cannot see that it has the slightest relevance. Whether Mr. Justice Landry's report is correct or incorrect is not the question of privilege that the hon. gentleman was raising. He raised the question of privilege that I, in characterizing his criticism of Mr. Justice Landry and his report, had gone further than the facts warranted when I compared his criticism against Mr. Justice Landry with the criticism of the Minister of Public Works against Mr. Justice Galt. My hon. friend is perfectly at liberty to go into that; he is also at liberty to show that what I said with regard to the inquiry on that occasion was not justified. These are the points to be brought to the attention of the House, and no others.

The SPEAKER: The Prime Minister has raised a point of order, which I have no doubt in my mind is well taken:

Mr. PUGSLEY: I feel that I have been treated very unfairly; therefore I must insist upon reading the letter. Of course, I respect Your Honour's ruling, but I shall leave it to the good judgment of the House--

Mr. SPEAKER: I rule that the hon. gentleman cannot read the letter. I do so as the point of order has been raised.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Without knowing what the letter contains, or what I propose to show?

Mr. SPEAKER: Quite so. I rule that the hon. member cannot proceed to read the letter.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Before the point is put to the House, I want the House to understand clearly what the point is.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member may, in a limited way, discuss the point of order, but I rule that he may not read the letter.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What I propose to Your Honour is to read a portion of a letter from the provincial Government's counsel, H. A. Powell, in which Mr. Powell states that this statement in the report was absolutely contrary to the evidence. That is what I want to show.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has already made that statement, and he has given the gist of the letter.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I do not want to question the ruling of the Chair, even if in my humble judgment the ruling is not right. But if the Prime Minister will say that we shall have an opportunity of discussing this matter, say, on Monday, my hon. friend will abide by the ruling.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I cannot say that we shall do so on Monday. I understand that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries will not be here on that day. I will see, however, that opportunity is given.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Then we will say Wednesday.

Mr. HAZEN: I am leaving for St. John to-morrow afternoon at four o'clock. While there is a possibility of my being back on Wednesday, it is not a probability; I do not think I can get back before Thursday.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It will keep.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It will keep, but in the meantime my hon. friend (Mr. Pugsley) is under a misapprehension on the part of several people, and he is anxious to clear his name, which he has a right to do at the first opportunity.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think that the hon. member for St. John has gone fully into the matter so far as the point of order is concerned. I should like him to believe it is not and never has been my intention, in any observations which I address to this House, to do him or any other hon. member anything short of the fullest justice. My hon. friend has not examined the remarks which he made in 1909 as fully as I could have desired. I understand him to say to this House that his criticism on that occasion was directed against the report, not against the commissioners, and he repeated that. I must ask the privilege of refreshing his recollection in order that I may do myself the justice of showing to the House that I did not speak without some warrant. On that occasion my hon. friend said this—

Mr. PUGSLEY: I assume that we shall have opportunity of replying to my hon. friend.

Mr. SPEAKER: The very difficulty which I feared has arisen because of permitting to the hon. member undue latitude in his remarks.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am confining myself entirely to the point of order which my hon. friend raised.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That point of order was decided against me.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No; this is with regard to what my hon. friend said on that occasion. He states that he used no language which would justify me in the observations which I addressed to the House and he quoted just one portion—by no means the strongest portion—of his remarks. I desire to point out that he used much stronger language, and that when he stated to this House that he did not attack the commissioner, but only attacked the report, his examination of the speech he made on that occasion was not thorough.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I rise to a point of order. The point of order raised by my right hon. friend was settled by Your Honour, my right hon. friend stating that he would appoint a day next week when the whole matter would be discussed. At that time, it would be quite open to my right hon. friend to take up the evidence, but it would not be fair now to make a speech to which I could not properly reply.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I will rise to a question of privilege myself. I desire to point out—

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will my right hon. friend pardon me? I am not quite through with my remarks.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The Prime Minister has the floor.

Mr. PUGSLEY: No, Mr. Speaker, I have the floor. The point of order having been settled, I was going to continue my line of argument.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for St. John made a statement to the House and he concluded by giving the gist of a letter. I ruled that he could not read the letter. I assumed then that he had concluded his remarks.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I was not permitted to continue. I wanted to conclude in some other way.

Mr. SPEAKER: It would be more in order if a day could be appointed when the matter could be discussed in conformity with the rules of the House.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Very good. I am content, except that I desire to say that my hon. friend's examination of his remarks on the occasion referred to has evidently been so exceedingly superficial that he has had his attention entirely diverted from those portions of his remarks which justify the observations I made in the House on June 6, and I further say, so far as the rest is concerned that his own statement this afternoon is absolutely in accord with the description I gave in my remarks on that day of what took place in May, 1909.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I can only say in answer to my right hon. friend that he has a strange conception of the difference between attacking a judge and taking up his judgment, and showing that it is not based on evidence, or is entirely contrary to the evidence, and charging that this shows a reckless disregard for the truth.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I hope I have a better appreciation of that than my hon. friend has of the remarks he made in May, 1909.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must ask that this discussion cease.

PRIVILEGE—Mr. MICHAEL CLARK.
