Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. A paragraph appeared in the Journal-Press of this city yesterday, and I am told that a similar paragraph appeared in the Globe of Toronto and other papers—I do not wish to read any of them—purporting to give an account of what took place at a meeting of Liberals who voted for the second reading of the Military Service Bill, purporting to give that account as an account endorsed by my hon. friend from Saltcoats (Mr. MacNutt) who was the chairman of that meeting. I have the liberty of my hon. friend from Saltcoats to say what I am now about to say. I read the paragraph from the Journal-Press to my hon. friend from Saltcoats, and with his bluff honesty, he characterized the writer of that paragraph by a very strong substantive. I do not care to repeat it, but it indicated an emphatic belief on the part of that hon. member that the paragraph in question was not only highly coloured, but untruthful. The substantive was further emphasized by the use of an adjective. My hon. friend from Saltcoats asked me not to repeat the adjective as it might reflect on his character as a good Presbyterian. I wish to say, on my own account, that my impression of the paragraph in question is exactly the same as that of the hon. member for Saltcoats.

LABOUR STRIKE IN WESTERN COAL MINES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. CROTHERS (Minister of Labour): Perhaps the House would be glad to hear read a telegram that I just received from the Director of Coal Operations in District 18. The telegram which was sent yesterday says:

District eighteen produced on eighteenth instant fourteen thousand tons of coal and seven hundred tons coke. Production daily increasing but seriously retarded by lack of all classes mine labour. All mines working excepting Pocahontas, which I expect to have operating to-morrow. Railways are heartily co-operating in matter of car supply.

(Sgd.) W. H. Armstrong.

THE SOLDIER SETTLEMENT BOARD.

On the motion of Hon. W. J. Roche, (Minister of the Interior) the House went into committee to resume, from May 7, the debate on the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to establish a Board, to be called "The Soldier Settlement Board," consisting of three commissioners, and to provide for salaries and expenses in connection therewith, and to empower the Minister of the Interior, at the request of the Board, to reserve such Dominion lands as may be required, and upon the recommendation of the Board, to grant a free entry for not more than one hundred and sixty acres of such reserved lands to any person who has served in the naval or military expeditionary forces of the United Kingdom or of any of the self-governing British dominions or colonies, and who has left the forces with an honourable record or who has been honourably discharged, and the widow of any such person who died on active service, subject to such conditions as in the opinion of the Governor in Council are necessary to secure the use of the land for the purpose for which it is granted; and further to provide that the Board may loan, upon such terms and conditions as may be prescribed, to any such settler an amount not exceeding two thousand dollars for acquiring land for agricultural purposes, payment of encumbrances on lands used for agricultural purposes, improvement of agricultural lands, erection of farm buildings and purchase of stock, machinery and equipment, the money to be expended under the supervision of the Board, and all expenditure made under the terms of this resolution to be paid out of such moneys as Parliament may appropriate for the purpose.

Mr. Blain in the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Blain): On the 26th of June, the Minister of the Interior moved:

That the following proposed amendment be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the proposed resolution to establish a Board to be called the Soldier Settlement Board:—

"That the proposed resolution of the 23rd April, last, to establish a Board to be called the Soldier Settlement Board and to effect the other objects set out in the said resolution be amended and that the maximum amount that the Board may loan to settlers be increased from two thousand dollars to two thousand five hundred dollars."

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: When this resolution was up some time ago, I explained the nature of the proposed legislation of the Government, and the leader of the Opposition asked that a map be prepared showing the available undisposed of Government land within easy transportation distance, for the settlement of the soldiers. I have had a map prepared for each of the three provinces—I have just laid them on the Table—showing the acreage of the lands and whether the same are within ten, fifteen or twenty miles of transportation facilities. The amendment that I proposed later on is to increase the amount of the loan to a maximum of $2,000, and to make the terms of repayment to extend over twenty years instead of fifteen years.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not want to say anything that might be deemed at all as opposed to granting every possible assistance, aid and encouragement to returned soldiers; but if I have any objection to offer, it is that this resolution does not go far enough. It proposes simply to deal with homestead lands. The Minister of the Interior will agree with me that it is not very much encouragement to a returned soldier to say: You may go out into the growing West and search for a free homestead, which you are not very likely to get unless you go quite a long distance away from settlement, and then give aid by lending some money for the purpose of putting stock upon the place or of giving money to enable the soldier to buy land from somebody else. What seems to me ought to be done would be to endeavour to get land in blocks near the settled communities in good localities, and give to the soldier the opportunity of buying, extending the loan over a long term of years, but taking care that he would be settled where he would have the comforts of communal life near at hand. He should not be on the lonely prairie, at a remote distance from any community, where he would very likely become discouraged. My hon. friend knows that the best homesteads are pretty well taken up in the more settled parts of the country, and I am afraid it is nothing but a gold brick which is being held out to the returned soldier by this Bill. It is nothing more than that; it is doing nothing more than the provincial governments have been doing in times of peace in the way of loaning money to settlers for the purpose of enabling them to buy farms and build homes for themselves. It seems to me that for the soldiers something better should be done. I have not the same personal knowledge of conditions in the West as my hon. friend and other hon. gentlemen have who represent that section of the Dominion, but I have a knowledge gathered from reading and from seeing resolutions that have been passed in favour of giving encouragement to the returned soldiers, and I am led to the conclusion that in order to produce results of any great importance a broader scheme than is proposed in this resolution should be adopted. I do not believe the present scheme will produce any very encouraging results.

Mr. ROCHE: I think the hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken in thinking that we are here handing out a gold brick to the returned soldier. As a matter of fact, when all the British dominions submitted their land policies at the recent Imperial Conference in London it was admitted on all sides—so it has been reported by our Canadian representative at that conference—that the most generous and practicable offer made by any British dominion was that made by Canada.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What does the minister think of my suggestion?

Mr. ROCHE: I think the hon. gentleman is quite mistaken in his premises. In the first place lands that a few years ago were very far removed from transportation facilities are now being brought within easy reach of the railways by extensions of lines up in the north country, and there is a large amount of available Dominion lands in those western provinces.

The hon. member says that this policy is not very generous. Of course, I expected some criticism along that line, no matter how generous the assistance we proposed, because this is a matter that lends itself to catering to the soldier's sympathies. It has been represented to us by the Land Settlement Committee of the War Veterans' Association that the soldiers who will be likely to settle on the land will be provided with but very little money. The hon. gentleman has suggested that instead of allowing the soldiers to settle on our free Dominion lands, we should purchase lands, which would mean, of course, that we would have to re-sell them to the soldier. Now, I fear there would not be many soldiers who would have sufficient capital to purchase those lands.

We are doing something more than simply granting 160 acres of free homestead lands to the soldiers; it is true we grant him that. There is no interference with his ordinary homestead rights; that is to say, if he has not exhausted his homestead privileges already, he can take up 160 acres of free homestead land by complying with the provisions of the Dominion Lands Act, which are most generous in their terms. But we are doing more than that for the soldier. We are offering him an additional 160 acres under the conditions provided by this legislation. So the soldier can take up 320 acres, one-half of which is to be earned under the Dominion Lands Act, and the other half under the provisions of this Soldiers' Settlement Scheme. Under this scheme we are granting a further 160 acres free to the soldier. We also supply the inexperienced man with agricultural training at the expense of the Government. We also grant him a loan to a maximum of $2,500, which is the largest amount granted in any of the British possessions, this loan being secured by a lien on the land.

I think the hon. gentleman will agree with me, when he reconsiders what he has said, that it would not be the wisest policy or the most acceptable to the soldiers themselves if the Government purchased lands for them in any particular province. Suppose, for instance, in the province of Alberta we bought lands adjacent to the more thickly settled communities, and said to the soldier. "Here is 160 acres of land, and you must settle there if you wish to settle at all." That would be practically dictating to the soldier where he should locate, and if we adopted a policy of that kind in Alberta, every other province would have an equal right to demand such a policy for itself. The Government would then have to buy lands in provinces where the Crown Lands are owned by the provinces themselves. Under our policy, if the soldier wants to settle near a city or town, he has the privilege of purchasing the land where he wants to locate.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is it not true that there is comparatively little land available for free homesteads in the West, except in that territory north of the Saskatchewan?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes, but the hon. gentleman overlooks one of the very best portions of this Dominion. I refer to the Peace River country.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is a long way off.

Mr. ROCHE: It is being brought very much nearer by the extension of transportation facilities to that section. British Columbia is still further away.

Mr. MARCIL: On an average, how near are these lands to a railway?

Mr. ROCHE: The map shows the land within 10, 15 and 20 miles of a railway. I will give the area in a statement I have had prepared. I was saying that we are granting this financial assistance to the soldier, no matter in which province he desires to purchase the land.

Mr. MARCIL: Can the soldier purchase anything he likes with the money loaned by the Government, or has the Government supervision over his purchases?

Mr. ROCHE: This Act will be administered by three commissioners, and loans will be made on their recommendation. They will naturally see that the security is good. If a soldier in Ontario, for instance, does not want to go to the West, but would rather purchase land in his own province; he can still receive this financial assistance from the Government. It is true the Government of the province of Ontario have a Soldiers' Settlement policy, but the land is up in the north part of the province, and the soldier might prefer to settle in a more thickly settled section. We are giving him the same financial assistance as we give to the soldier who settles on the Dominion lands in the Northwest.

I have here a statement showing the available undisposed of agricultural lands in the province of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. There is still a very large acreage available. In the province of Manitoba there are within ten miles of railway facilities 1,486,176 acres.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Good land for settlement?

Mr. ROCHE: I will come to that later. In Saskatchewan, 917,952 acres; in Alberta, 4,100,736 acres. These lands are reported by our department as the approximate areas of undisposed and available Dominion lands suitable for agricultural purposes within ten miles of railway lines. Then we have within fifteen miles, in Manitoba, 2,144,256 acres; in Saskatchewan, 1,407,728 acres; in Alberta, 5,696,512 acres. The acreage within twenty miles in Manitoba is 2,552,736 acres; in Saskatchewan, 1,802,416 acres; in Alberta, 6,891,008 acres. The acreage over twenty miles in Manitoba is 492,864; in Saskatchewan, 1,627,584; in Alberta, 5,580,992. I do not mean that this land is at the present time all prairie land. Much of it is heavily timbered, some of it is scrub, other portions are open prairie.

Mr. PUGSLEY: And a good deal swamp land.

[Mr Roche.]

Mr. ROCHE: No, it is all suitable for agricultural purposes. Some of it will require drainage, and a certain portion will require the expenditure of some money. It is reported to me by the Surveyor General's Department that we have within ten miles of railway facilities about 500,000 acres, near Lesser Slave Lake, a portion of which is small scrub at the present time. If a soldier desires to locate upon other lands he has the option of doing so, but the hon. member for St. John will admit that unless he has some capital the land will be out of his reach at present prices. It has been stated that certain Indian reservations should be reserved. There was a sale of a certain acreage in the Blackfeet Indian reservation about three or four weeks ago, and it was said that the Government should have purchased those lands from the Indians and sold them to homesteaders or soldiers. I pointed out at the time that those lands would bring, as a minimum, $15 an acre, which would have been $2,400 for a quarter section. If in addition to that the soldier got a $2,500 loan, he would be starting out under a mortgage of $4,900 against his property, and I feared it would take the average soldier a long term of years to clear off that debt. As a matter of fact, some of that land sold as high as $47 an acre, and on the average for over 50,000 acres it brought $23 an acre. I claim very few soldiers would be in a financial position to undertake the purchase of this land and to avail themselves of the loan and make it profitable. We leave it optional with the soldier who desires to locate upon our free lands to take 160 acres first and secure the other 160 acres under the provisions of the Dominion Lands Act, giving him 320 acres, unless he has already exhausted his homestead rights. Then he may get his loan of $2,500 on this land. If he desires to locate in a more thickly settled part of these provinces, or in any other province in the Dominion, we will grant such financial assistance as may be recommended by the commission which will have charge of the administration of the Act. I think, therefore, it cannot be truthfully said that this is a gold brick which is being handed out to the soldiers. I have met many of them and discussed the matter with them. Many of them have admitted that it is much better, instead of the Government buying the lands and reselling them, to allow the soldier to buy the land himself and make his own location in any part of the Dominion he wishes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I did not intend to suggest that the soldier should be forced to settle in any particular place. My idea was that the Government having the power of expropriation for public purposes, could acquire tracts reasonably well situated upon which settlers who for the sake of their families might like to locate, keeping comparatively close to civilization. The Government proposes to lend up to $2,500 to a soldier for the purpose of enabling him to buy land. If he desires to settle upon Government land, the loan would be for the purpose of paying off the Government, and should be for a long period of years, say twenty, twenty-five or even thirty years, at a rate of interest not exceeding four per cent. I think the hon. minister will admit that while this land he speaks of is available in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, until you go north of the existing settlements, there is very little desirable land left for homesteading. The best land in that part of Saskatchewan and Alberta, which is south of the North Saskatchewan river, has been pretty well taken up by settlers. Now if the settler is left to buy land, the landowner will take advantage of it, and the soldier will be at a very great disadvantage. It seems to me it would be much better if the Crown would exercise its right of expropriation and obtain certain lands in well selected localities where those who do not desire to go as pioneers may be able to settle.

Mr. ROCHE: You would confine the settlement, then, to the western provinces?

Mr. PUGSLEY: No, I do not say that. I do not see why land should not be obtained in the eastern provinces as well. This is a new departure caused by the war, and it will be a great advantage to the country if the returned soldier can be settled in comfortable circumstances where he and his family will have an opportunity of making a good start in life under, in most cases, entirely new conditions. I have had a little experience with the West. I remember pretty nearly forty years ago people came out from England and went upon the prairie. Everything looked beautiful and enticing to them, but it was not long before their hearts were broken, and they left the country and all they had put in it and went away to seek life in the cities. Remember, you are not dealing altogether with practical farmers. You are not even dealing largely with practical farmers. You are dealing with soldiers whom you want to encourage to create homes for themselves. If they go to the West as pioneers and take their families with them beyond civilization it is not unlikely some of them may become disheartened before very long and will leave it. I should think you ought to have two kinds of land, land available for the pioneer—the man who wants to get beyond civilization and look to the advance which will come in the future, and who is prepared to wait for a number of years—and land in other localities where the returned soldier who does not want to go off as a pioneer may settle with his family, near a village where his children may have a reasonably good school, where there will be a church, and where there will be the advantages of village life so attractive to the ordinary man who does not like the life of a pioneer.

I think the country would sustain the Government in a very generous and very broad policy for the returned soldier, so far as settling on the land is concerned. My criticism of this scheme is that it is not broad enough to encourage the great body of soldiers to settle on the land. Not one man in a thousand would be attracted by an invitation to settle on land in the Peace river country, six hundred miles north of the American boundary, where there are no settlers, no schools, churches or doctors.

Mr. MARCIL: I would suggest to the minister that Canadian British subjects who left Canada to serve in the armies and navies of the Allies and who return after the war should be embraced in this scheme. This might be accomplished by inserting after the words "self-governing British dominions or colonies" the words:

> Or to any other person who has served during the war in the armies or navies of the Allies of Great Britain, who were British subjects and who left Canada for such purpose.

Mr. ROCHE: I shall be quite willing to take those representations into consideration when the Bill is under consideration. Our legislation is broader than that of New Zealand, Australia or any other British possession. In New Zealand the original legislation included only those who joined the New Zealand expeditionary force. The following session it was made to include those who were resident in New Zealand at the outbreak of the war and had enlisted in the British expeditionary force. The Australian law includes those of the British expeditionary force but not those who joined, for instance, the Canadian expeditionary force. Our proposed legislation will include not only those who enlisted in the Canadian expeditionary force but those joining the force of any British dominion. I see certain difficulties in the way of adopting the suggestion now made.

Mr. MARCIL: Has any arrangement been made with the provinces in connection with the settlement of soldiers on lands in eastern Canada?

Mr. ROCHE: We had a talk with the provincial representatives before we finally decided on this policy. It was decided that, inasmuch as the eastern provinces were the owners of their Crown lands, they should be left to dispose of them as they deemed best to the returned soldiers. Some of them have already passed legislation of this kind. This legislation will permit any returned soldier to acquire land in Quebec or in any other province that is not Crown land.

Mr. MARCIL: I understand that if a soldier takes up land in Quebec the province takes the first mortgage.

Mr. ROCHE: That is Crown lands.

Mr. MARCIL: The province then having the first lien, what will the Dominion do?

Mr. ROCHE: Our legislation does not contemplate our coming in on a second lien. It is only right that we should protect the people of Canada and have ample security for any loans we make. I take it for granted that in the case of Crown lands owned by the provinces the provinces themselves will want the first mortgage.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Really all the Government is doing for the soldier is to lend him money and charge interest. What is the rate of interest?

Mr. ROCHE: Five per cent. That is less than we can borrow for.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That does not strike me as doing much for the soldier. You give him, as you give every one else, the opportunity to pick out a free homestead, and in addition to that all you do is to lend him money for which you charge him five per cent. Interest is high just now, but a few years ago it was only three per cent, and in five years it may again come down; yet for twenty years the soldier must go on paying five per cent.

Mr. ROCHE: Ontario charges soldiers six per cent interest and Australia lends at cost price plus a reasonable allowance for running expenses.

Mr. PUGSLEY: We profess to be doing something splendid for the returned soldier but are really not doing anything for him. The country is getting a settler on the land, which is a benefit to the country at large because the soldier is expected to work hard developing the land and creating business, assisting in contributing to the revenues of the country. We are charging him higher interest than he would have had to pay before the war broke out, and higher than the Government will have to pay two years after the war closes. That does not seem to me to be doing very much for the soldier. I think the policy of the Canadian Pacific is far better, although it has been carried out in times of peace.

Mr. ROCHE: What are they charging?

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Canadian Pacific Railway are charging 6 per cent interest, but they were selling land which was irrigated, in a well settled section of the country in southern Alberta. In addition to settling the land, they lend up to $2,000, to enable the settlers to buy stock, horses, and cattle, and engage in all active work of farming. They build a house for the settler, plow up for him and prepare for crop ten acres of land.

Mr. ROCHE: And charge him for all that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Quite so, and that is what gives the foundation of a start for the settler. During the first two or three years of life on a prairie the settler's heart is apt to be broken in many cases. As I understand what the Government propose to do, the policy of the Canadian Pacific Railway, not for the soldier alone, but for any good industrious man who wants to go upon the land, is far better than the Government's proposition. The Government gives nothing to the farmer to buy stock.

Mr. ROCHE: The hon. gentleman is wrong.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Suppose a soldier wants to build a house, $2,500 does not go very far. The minister says that, if he wants to buy a piece of land, the Government will not lend him $2,500 to pay for improvements, but they want a first mortgage for any money they lend.

Mr. ROCHE: The hon. gentleman is wrong. He can equip his farm with stock, and can utilize the money for that purpose. The hon. gentleman has not read the resolution, nor has he read the details of the Canadian Pacific Railway scheme. While not desiring to knock any other scheme, I have heard a criticism of that scheme quite the opposite of the hon. gentleman's statement to-day:

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have heard it spoken of very highly.

Mr. ROCHE: The provision in the Bill reads:

The Board may lend to a settler an amount not exceeding $2,500 for any of the following purposes:—

(a) The acquiring of land for agricultural purposes.

(b) The payment of encumbrances on lands used for agricultural purposes.

(c) The improvement of land for agricultural purposes.

(d) The erection of farm buildings.

(e) The purchase of stock, machinery and equipment.

(f) Such other purpose or purposes as the Board may approve.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Suppose a returned soldier selects land in a good locality, where he would like to be able to make a comfortable home for himself, and it costs him $2,000. He wants to buy stock. He wants perhaps to build a house, and to buy farming implements. He goes to the minister and says, "I want you to lend me, under this Act, $2,500." The minister says, "Have you paid in full for your land?" And the soldier says, "Oh, no, I have paid $250, but I have given a mortgage for $1,750 on the land, and I want this money for improvements; I want to break up my land and plough and harrow; I want to get a couple of harrows and some general farm implements, and I want the Government to give me a start." The minister says, "Oh, we cannot lend you on your land; we have a mortgage already for $1,750 against it; we cannot lend you anything for these improvements." Is that not the case?

Mr. ROCHE: No.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The hon. minister said they could not take a second mortgage. If there is a mortgage on the land, you cannot lend him the $2,500 to build his house and buy horses and stock, which he requires in order to give him a fair start in the world.

Mr. ROCHE: You can take a chattel mortgage on the stock.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Without a mortgage on the land?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Where do you find that?

Mr. ROCHE: The provision is:

No loan shall be made until the Board is satisfied that the additional security offered is sufficient to justify the loan.

That is in the Bill.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am discussing the resolution.

Mr. ROCHE: I am discussing the policy of the Government, and the hon. gentleman is discussing the matter with imperfect knowledge.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I resent that remark. The resolution is supposed to contain the terms of the Bill.

Mr. ROCHE: Not necessarily all the terms.

Mr. PUGSLEY: There cannot be an essential departure from the terms of the resolution. My hon. friend can't say to me that I am simply discussing the resolution and that the Government has a broader policy than is contained in the resolution. That cannot be done according to rules of the House. If the minister has some provisions to embody in the Bill which are different from the resolution, without taking any technical objection to it being against the rules of the House to depart from the terms of the resolution, I think he should furnish us copies of the Bill, so that we can discuss the resolution intelligently. Perhaps the hon. gentleman could send me a copy.

Mr. ROCHE: I have only a confidential copy.

Mr. PUGSLEY: How can we discuss it without a copy of it?

Mr. ROCHE: It is not usual to put in the resolution all the terms embodied in the Bill. The hon. gentleman will have an opportunity on the second reading, or when in committee, to discuss the various provisions, but the Bill itself amplifies the resolution. There is nothing contradictory to the terms of the resolution. It is a little fuller, and there nothing in the policy as set forth in the Bill that would prevent the commissioners loaning the money on stock by taking a chattel mortgage on the stock. When I referred to the Provincial Government loaning money on their Crown lands, probably they would ask for a first mortgage, and we would not want to come in as a second mortgagee. They might utilize a portion of the money to pay off the original mortgage, and our security would stand first.

Mr. PUGSLEY: In New Brunswick, while the Bill provided that, if a returned soldier has purchased his land in one of the eastern provinces, without taking any security for the land the Government will be able, under this Bill, to lend him money to buy stock, and farm implements and to make improvements and develop his property, and take security on personal property for it. I have no doubt our legislation will cover that.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: The hon. gentleman says that under the resolution the Government would not be permitted to lend money to pay off the first mortgage. I do not see how he comes to that conclusion, from the wording of the resolution itself.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I did not say that. I understood the minister, in answer to my hon. friend from Bonaventure, when the question with regard to assistance in the eastern provinces was discussed, to say that the Government could not lend the soldiers money on land which had been bought from the Provincial Government, because they would have to take a second mortgage, and they could not take it.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: My hon. friend knows that is not true, according to the resolution itself.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Roche) is authority for that.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: My hon. friend knew, when he made that statement, that it was not true, according to the terms of the resolution itself.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I rise to a point of order. I think the hon. gentleman has no business to tell an hon. member of this House, when he makes a statement, that he knew it was untrue. I ask the ruling of the Chair?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Chair, chair.

Mr. PUGSLEY: There is too much of that from the other side of the House.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Blain): I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Middlebro) should withdraw that remark.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Withdraw.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: I have nothing to withdraw.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Withdraw.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: I have nothing to withdraw. I am simply saying that the hon. member must have known from a reading of the resolution in his hand—

Mr. PUGSLEY: Mr. Chairman, I call for your ruling on the point of order. I think that you should insist upon the hon. gentleman's withdrawing his remarks before he proceeds.

The CHAIRMAN: I think that my hon. friend (Mr. Middlebro) ought to withdraw the remark.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: I say that the hon. member must have known—

Mr. PUGSLEY: Chair.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: I want to state my point of order first. The hon. gentleman must have known from the terms of the resolution which he had in his hand that it was possible for the Government to pay off a prior encumbrance, because the resolution distinctly says so.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is not what the hon. gentleman said. He said that I knew it was untrue when I made the statement.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: I said that the hon. gentleman must have known, from the resolution in his hand—

Mr. PUGSLEY: Mr. Chairman, in order that the proceedings may be properly carried on, the hon. gentleman should be asked to withdraw his remark.

The CHAIRMAN: I must ask the member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) to withdraw the remark.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: If I said what the hon. gentleman said was untrue, I withdraw. What I did say was—

Mr. PUGSLEY: I accept my hon. friend's statement, but I am very sorry for his weakness of memory.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: And I am very sorry for my hon. friend's apparent lack of intelligence if he came to the conclusion from the reading of this resolution that the Government would not have the power to pay off a prior encumbrance of $250, because the resolution distinctly says that the Government has the right to pay off prior encumbrances.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I wish to correct my hon. friend. I said nothing of the kind. What I referred to was the fact that the Minister of the Interior had told the member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) that the Government would not be able to lend money on second mortgages.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: Did my hon. friend believe from a reading of the resolution that that was the case?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I was bound to accept the statement of a gentleman so truthful as the Minister of the Interior.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: I shall read the resolution to see whether the member for St. John was justified in coming to that conclusion, or whether there was an attempt to give a wrong impression to the committee. The resolution says:

> And further to provide that the Board may loan, upon such terms and conditions as may be prescribed, to any such settler an amount not exceeding two thousand dollars for acquiring land for agricultural purposes, payment of encumbrances on lands used for agricultural purposes.

They do not even have to lend the money upon the security of the land; they may lend on any security and upon such terms as they deem prudent; and they may lend the money for the purpose of paying off a prior encumbrance. So that in the case cited by my hon. friend, that of a man who had a farm worth $2,000 against which there was an encumbrance of $250, the Government would be justified, under the terms of the resolution, in paying off the first mortgage and in that way granting a loan, or they could pay off the first mortgage and take a loan for $2,000. The resolution, therefore, outlines clearly the powers contained in the Bill as read by the Minister of the Interior.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The hon. gentleman has attempted to answer something which I never said and which I did not dream of saying. I was pointing out that in the eastern provinces, where the Crown lands are owned in the right of the provinces, it might be desirable to buy land—which, I understand, can be obtained at a low price—and agree to pay the Provincial Government for it an amount running over a period of years. I thought it would be a great advantage to the returned soldier that he should be able to borrow money from the Government upon second mortgage on his property, farm implements or stock. The minister stated that the Government could not take a second mortgage under those circumstances. I was suggesting that it was desirable that that should be done, if the Board were satisfied that a settler of reasonable energy and thrift wanted the money for productive purposes—perhaps to clear the land, perhaps for drainage purposes, the erection of buildings, or the purchase of stock. I think it is a great mistake that the Government should not be able under those circumstances to take a second mortgage upon the property, in addition, of course, to security that might be taken upon personal property. Notwithstanding the great ability of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Middlebro) who is the Chief Whip on the other side; who, when he rises in his place to speak about anything which the Government has done, uses the word "we," never forgetting to convey the impression that he is an adjunct to the Government—notwithstanding what he says, I prefer in this case to take the statement of the Minister of the Interior as to the real intent of this legislation

Mr. McCRANEY: When this resolution was before the House on a previous occasion I mentioned the case of Private Baldwin of Saskatoon. Private Baldwin is a returned soldier who lost his leg. He had been a homesteader before the war; he left his homestead to enlist, and he now wants to go back to his land. I hope that the provisions of the legislation which will be introduced by the minister will apply to land which had been already homesteaded or purchased as well as to land which will hereafter be taken up by returned soldiers.

Mr. ROCHE: It is broad enough for that.

Mr. OLIVER: The homesteader who is now on service will, on his return, be able to take advantage of this loan?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: The provision for the reservation of land is somewhat questionable. In the first place, reservations are in themselves an impediment to the general settlement of the country. In the next place unless there is some reason why the Government, for the sake of supervision, desires to keep a number of homesteading soldiers close together, it will be a very serious drawback, not only to the settlement of the country, but to the soldiers themselves, if the soldiers are to be allowed to exercise this privilege only within reserved areas. I do not object to a provision for reservation, so that in extreme cases action may be taken to give the soldiers the first opportunity of obtaining a desirable piece of country. But if the Government put in reservation, say, in the Peace River district, a desirable piece of country for the purposes of this Bill, ordinary settlement might be prevented from coming in and the soldiers themselves might not come in in the end. The Peace River country is a very large country, but it is what we might call spotted: certain areas are very desirable, and other large tracts are very much less desirable. So that when we speak of the great area of the Peace River country and then speak of the advantages of that country, there is apt to be confusion of ideas.

There are exceedingly good portions of the Peace river county, but the land is not all of the same character, and so in dealing with the Peace River country, it is quite possible that the Government might do both the development of the country and the soldiers themselves very great injury by applying a policy of reservation. I am, therefore, going to ask the minister: What is the proposed policy of the Government in that particular? Is it considered to be desirable to keep in certain localities the soldiers, who are to get the benefit of this section and who occupy homestead lands?

Mr. ROCHE: The commission is given the power to inspect the land and to recommend to the Minister of the Interior the reservation of any particular area suitable for the location of returned soldiers, and in whatever locality they deem best suited for the purpose. I quite agree with the hon. member it would be impolitic to retain that for permanent reservation. That would prevent, as he has explained, ordinary settlers coming into the country from locating in that reservation, and at the same time, the soldiers might not take as great advantage of the reservation as we would hope. But we are limiting that reservation. The legislation will provide for the reservation to last for a maximum period of three years after the close of the war. We thought that surely within that time any soldiers that were going to locate upon the land would do so. The reservation may be lifted on the recommendation of the commissioner sooner than that. But the soldier is not confined to that reservation; he can go beyond it and select any homestead land he desires, and he will get the same privilege as he would receive on those lands that are reserved.

Mr. OLIVER: The important point is that the soldier may locate anywhere he pleases and still receive the benefit of this legislation.

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: That is entirely satisfactory. This authority of reservation should be exercised with a fair regard not only to the interest of the soldier but to the development of the country. It will not be to the interest of the soldier settler that the development of the country be retarded, and if it is the intention of the Government to hold land under reservation for three years after the war, that would be a huge mistake, to the detriment of all parties concerned. My suggestion would be this, that a reservation be not made unless and until it is expected it will be brought into use, and then notice should be given that that reservation is for the benefit of the soldiers; that it will remain for so many months for their benefit, and that after that time it will be open to general settlement. I certainly will not favour the closing of land from settlement for any considerable period, or except under circumstances under which it would be understood it was going to be required and desired by the soldiers. I would be glad to endorse the suggestion of my hon. friend from Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) in regard to the settlement of Canadians who, by reason of being reservists of allied countries, left Canada to serve in the armies of those countries. They are our citizens, and it would be a gracious and just act that they should be given the same consideration as though they were fighting in our own armies, because we are all fighting in the one cause. I would follow the suggestion made only so far as it refers to citizens of Canada at the time of their call to service in their home countries.

Mr. ROCHE: Would the hon. member include in that list, for instance, the Japanese who were Canadian citizens before going over to engage in the war?

Mr. OLIVER: It would be very hard, of course, to refuse them consideration if we included the others. That would be a matter for consideration.

Mr. MARCIL: I have here a newspaper published in Montreal, and called La Victoire, which is a good name. It is the organ of the French people settled in Canada. I see in it an article signed by Mr. Chevassu, a French reservist, a British citizen, a former member of the press gallery here, and a former secretary of the mayor of Montreal. He was one of the first to go to the front, and, I understand, he was wounded at the battle of the Marne. His article, which is a strong one, is headed, "Shall we have the same rights and the same privileges?" He claims that the Frenchmen and Belgians settled in Canada, British citizens, who responded to the call of duty as soon as that call was sounded, and who comes back to this country, should be given the same opportunity of settling on the land as our own returned soldiers. The minister knows how valuable the French and Belgian farmers are and how difficult it is to get them into this country in any large numbers, as they do not emigrate so freely as the farmers of other countries do. The writer of this article hopes, and he says it is almost a conviction on the part of these people, that the Canadian Government will not refuse their request. On the question of settlement in the provinces, I would not like to have any misunderstanding. Suppose the province of Quebec gives a grant of land to a returned soldier, will this Government supplement that by a Dominion grant to enable him to work the land? If so, will the Government take a mortgage on the property, or how will it give such a grant?

Mr. ROCHE: Under this legislation there is nothing to debar that man from receiving the monetary assistance provided by the legislation so long as the commission can get similar security. The security has to be agreed upon to the satisfaction of the commission.

Mr. OLIVER: Will the Bill set out the terms and conditions under which the settler will acquire his grant and also the terms and conditions on which the loan of money will be made to him?

Mr. ROCHE: The Bill deals in general outlines and will deal with the principle, but it is intended to have the administration of the Bill carried out under a set of regulations by the commissioner. This is the policy that has been adopted in Australia and New Zealand, where, I understand, it has thus far been found to operate well, and we thought it would be a good idea to follow out the same policy.

Mr. MARCIL: Is there a time fixed when this Bill goes into operation and when the soldiers begin taking up the land, or is the Government going to wait until the war is over?

Mr. ROCHE: As soon as this legislation comes into force the land will be available for the soldiers.

Mr. OLIVER: While it is very desirable that aid should be given in this practical form to returned soldiers as an inducement to them to occupy land and take up cultivation, I have seen a great deal of discussion on the matter that seems to me to have been based on a misunderstanding of the situation. In many cases the discussions that I have read have appeared to assume that this Bill was intended to deal rather with the disabled or partially disabled men. That, of course, is a mistake. Other provision would have to be made for the disabled man. This only applies to the man who comes back in the full exercise of his faculties and abilities, and who has the enterprise and desire to establish himself on the land.

I do not think this measure will be taken advantage of to nearly the extent that many people seem to think; in other words, I do not think it will solve the problem of the returned soldier, or even measurably solve it. So far as this Bill will attract our returned soldiers to the land it will serve a good purpose, but it will not solve the problem of the returned soldier. It is a help towards a solution, but the problem is very much larger than this Bill will by any possibility solve. I should like to follow what my hon. friend from St. John has said, that of the vast number of millions of acres of available free land there is very little, except in some portions of the Peace River country, that is not covered with woods and is more or less difficult to bring under cultivation. So that while the financial assistance that is proposed here is substantial, and of great advantage to the man of ability, industry and enterprise who desires to establish himself on a farm, even in that wooded country, it could not really bring the 160 acres under cultivation. I am not suggesting for a moment that this assistance is not desirable, or that it will not be useful; it is desirable, and it will be useful, but conditions in our western country to-day are not as they were ten years ago, when millions of acres of prairie land were available for homesteading, when the question of roads hardly came up at all because there was the prairie to drive over, and when the question of clearing did not exist, because there was nothing to clear. But now we have to deal with a country that is very largely of a wooded character, and bringing a country of that kind under cultivation involves a very large expenditure of labour or cash, or both, and the lapse of a considerable amount of time, for wooded country cannot be brought under cultivation like prairie land, in a year or two; it takes years to do it. So we are dealing with different conditions in the West from what prevailed in former years, and that fact must be taken into consideration in any problem of settlement. The problem of settlement in the West to-day is a different problem from what it was ten years ago, and it must be approached in a different way. So I say there is very great force in the argument of my hon. friend from St. John. I myself saw the statement made by the President of the Canadian Pacific railway some months ago when he suggested that land not now being used for a beneficial purpose, good land conveniently situated, which would cost a minimum of expenditure to bring under cultivation, should be expropriated— I think that was his suggestion— at a fair valuation, and should be brought under cultivation and placed at the disposal of the soldier.

There is a good deal of merit in that suggestion, because the cost of acquiring the wooded land and bringing it under cultivation practically amounts to the value of the prairie land that is now under private ownership and is not being beneficially used. It would, as the minister has said, mean a larger investment, but, on the other hand, to bring the wooded land under cultivation an investment has to be made in some form or another—either by lapse of time, or by a greater expenditure of effort, or by the actual expenditure of money. The soldier might very well spend the greater part of the $2,500 that he borrows in merely bringing his land or a part of it under cultivation, and then have no team or implements or stock with which to go on with and bring in returns. I think the Government might very well consider the suggestion made by Lord Shaughnessy. I would not suggest that this land be bought at an extortionate price, but it is just as cheap to buy good prairie land that is well situated and sell it to the soldier as it is to lend him money to cultivate wooded land that is not well situated, where roads have to be made, and where other great difficulties exist. On the wooded land the soldier's time, money and energy has to be expended in bringing nature under subjection, whereas on the prairie the same expenditure of time, energy and money would be producing actual monetary results. By utilizing this prairie land that is not now being cultivated, and of which it is to be regretted there is such an enormous amount in sight, we will be securing production to a greater degree and in a very much shorter time than if we make provision for assisting the soldier who is going on land that for the most part is wooded, and which will cost time and money before it can be made productive.

Mr. LEVI THOMPSON: I do not know what the Government think of the suggestion of my hon. friend from Edmonton, but I think it would be well to give power to the commissioners to expropriate land where they see fit, or let the Government do it themselves. I presume the minister is so well acquainted with conditions in the West that it is unnecessary for me to remind him of the tremendous amount of vacant land that is held out there—and more so in Alberta and Saskatchewan than in Manitoba—for speculative purposes. The owners buy this land without any intention of working it, in the hope that as the surrounding land is cultivated their property will increase in value. Now, although every citizen is entitled to some consideration, I do not think very much consideration should be shown to a citizen who does that. I think his land should be expropriated. I think there is a great deal in what my hon. friend from Edmonton says on this point.

Let me add this: there is a public interest to be served as well as the interest of the returned soldier. All of us in this House realize, I think, that at no time was the world ever so close to starvation as at present. Our crop reports for this year are not very encouraging, and that does not promise well for next year, because whenever there is a great shortage one year, conditions are unfavourable for the following year. On the virgin prairie a man could get a crop the first year, even if he only started to cultivate his land in the spring. He could grow oats and flax at least, particularly flax, and that would relieve the situation to a great extent; I admit that he would not be able to grow wheat successfully. Of course, it is now too late for this legislation to be of any assistance in bringing land under cultivation and increasing production this year. That would help for next year's crop, because there is any amount of land actually lying idle on which returned soldiers might be placed, and so help out the situation, not only for themselves and for Canada but for the whole world. We who have some experience with western conditions know that the farmer feels he should have more than a quarter-section for a successful farm. He feels he should have at least a half-section, and from my own observation and experience in farming I believe that is right. A farmer to carry on his work in the most successful manner should have 320 acres to work on.

Mr. BURNHAM: Is not intensive farming possible out there?

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: It may be possible later on, but I think my hon. friend will agree with me that intensive farming is not just the thing for a new country. Intensive farming is proper and advisable where the land is scarce and dear. There are other conditions in older and more settled districts which make intensive farming very successful. My hon. friend lives in the province of Ontario, and knows that intensive farming is practically confined to the raising of potatoes and other vegetables. The market in the West is very limited and uncertain for that class of produce. If my hon. friend means by "intensive farming" that a man's land should be farmed in such a way as to yield heavier crops, I agree with him that it should be done, but I do not see how we can deal with that phase of the question.

Mr. BURNHAM: You certainly cannot encourage it by advocating farms of 320 acres instead of 160.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: I will not enter into a long argument on the point, but if I had an hour or so with my hon. friend I think I could convince him that I know a little more about the subject than he does, and perhaps persuade him that he is quite wrong and that I am quite right. I believe the hon. minister (Mr. Roche) will agree with me that the most successful farmers in the province of Saskatchewan are the men who have about 320 acres. That being so, let us suppose we have a man prepared to take 320 acres; I am afraid the amount suggested will not be sufficient, if he has not a fairly large capital to start with, unless the Government advances him the necessary funds on the security of a second mortgage, and I am not in favour of that. Whatever power may be given to the board with regard to the lending of money, I think the Government should have a first mortgage unless there be some very exceptional circumstances. It may be a very serious proposition to say that the amount should not be limited to $2,500, but I think the board might be allowed to exceed this figure, or it might be arranged that there should be a limited sum for a quarter-section, and a proportionate increase for a half-section.

The matter of wooded lands is another important subject which should not be lost sight of. I have already spoken to my hon. friend personally about this, and he was very ready to consider any suggestions. This is a question, however, on which it is hard to make intelligent and useful suggestions. About a year ago I had occasion to examine some land along the Saskatchewan river, directly north of Tisdale. On the south side of the river was practically bare prairie land, although I saw some very fine pieces of wooded land left. The north side of the river was almost entirely covered by the finest growth of poplar I ever saw. I was told that the land on the south side was very heavily wooded some years ago when the homesteaders went there first, and in the natural course of events the homesteader had gradually burned it clear. I should be very sorry to see the poplar on the north side of the river destroyed, because it is extremely valuable, and I think it would be advantageous if some means were devised by which say one-half or three-quarters of this land could be burned or cleared for homesteading and leave the balance in wood as it is. I have not a very clear suggestion to offer to my hon. friend as to just how it could be done, but I would like to see the board given sufficient power to deal with it.

Mr. ROCHE: That is one of the benefits of having the Act administered under regulations which may be changed from time to time, according to the judgment of the commission.

Mr. WRIGHT: May I ask whether it is the intention to acquire land in the different provinces of the Dominion under these regulations? No doubt the attention of the Government will be largely directed towards the West for the settling of soldiers on the land. At the same time, I would like to point out that there are large stretches of territory in the other provinces which, while they might not be quite as desirable as some parts of the West would be equally as desirable as the wooded lands spoken of by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Thomson). In the northern part of Ontario, for instance, there are large stretches of land, not very valuable, financially speaking, but which could be used to great advantage by returned soldiers. In the districts of Muskoka, Parry Sound and Nipissing, and down through the east, they have large stretches of land which the farmers find it almost impossible to work because a great many of the young men had gone off to the West and the few that were left have been drawn off to the army by the recruiting officers. The old men and women who are left upon the farms have not, for the most part, the means of getting help, and they cannot work the farms. These old people would like very much to dispose of their lands and to join their young folk in the West or in the cities. The lands may not be as desirable, but they can be acquired at a moderate price and can be used to very great advantage for the production of dairy produce, sheep, cattle or anything of that kind. They will produce enough feed for large numbers of stock and make equally desirable homes with anything in the West, or anywhere else, for the average comfort of life. There is plenty of fuel, and work all through the winter, while prices for all produce are equal to those in Ottawa or anywhere else. I hope that these sections will not be overlooked in connection with the settlement of soldiers. We require more settlers and more farm help, and the settling of soldiers on these lands would be for the benefit both of that section of the country and of the soldiers. We can make good, comfortable homes for them with a small investment of money.

Mr. BURNHAM: If this were merely a question of farming in the West, I should perhaps not venture to enter the discussion. But there are two elements connected with it which perhaps justify my saying a word upon it. In the first place, this is a matter of the expenditure of public money, and therefore it is open to discussion by all members. In the second place, I have listened this afternoon to a repudiation of intensive farming, something that I must confess has amazed me. Intensive farming, of course, is not truck farming, it is farming; it is making the land grow twice as much as it did before by introducing the equivalent in nitrates or general fertilizer. The growing of crops of various sorts on land spread over a large area entails a vast amount of work. It does nothing whatever to relieve the help problem, and, in addition to that, it means the tying up of a vast lot of capital in the purchase of land which otherwise might be used for other purposes. If, for instance, a man, instead of having 300 acres of land and presently raising from 15 to 18 bushels an acre—and in many cases, after a few years, less—had 100 acres and raised 35 or 40 bushels an acre, he would be doing vastly better and would very likely be able to farm his land, and we should not hear these complaints. But, in any event, speaking upon general principles, this extensive farming has ceased to be considered reasonable and sensible farming in any well settled country. The Americans have abandoned it, and we find that in Belgium, before the war, the people were devoting themselves to enriching the land and raising large quantities of produce upon it. They were not attempting to run all over the face of the earth raising sparse crops and complaining about help and wondering where they could get money to buy more land. That kind of thing is out of date and I certainly hope that the minister will take into consideration advanced or scientific farming and not this commonplace style of spread-eagle farming of which we have heard so much and which, very strangely, has been so advocated this afternoon.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend reminds me of the late Mark Twain who on one occasion explained that the less he knew of a subject the more fluently he could speak on it.

Mr. MARCIL: It is now proposed to give an advance to the men of $2,500. This was originally $2,000. I see a press dispatch from Melbourne to the effect that the Australian soldiers will get $2,500 to go on the land. I was wondering if the minister was taking a leaf out of their book. The dispatch reads:

> The Senate Repatriation Bill provides a maximum grant of £500 to each settler on the land. It is estimated that £32,000,000 sterling will be required, excluding the sum for British soldiers who are to equally participate as far as finances will permit.

Is that a grant or loan?

Mr. ROCHE: It is a loan. They have no free lands there. Their public lands are the property of the State, not of the Commonwealth, and the State Governments supply the lands on the long term lease or by sale. The Commonwealth Government borrows money and lends it to the State Government who in turn lends to the soldiers, charging cost price of the loan with a reasonable amount added for working expenses.

Amendment agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the first and second time, and concurred in.

Mr. Roche thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 116, entitled "An Act to Assist Returned Soldiers in Settling Upon the Land, and to increase Agricultural Production."

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

SUPREME COURT AND EXCHEQUER COURT ACTS AMENDMENT.

On the motion of Hon. C. J. Doherty (Minister of Justice) Bill No. 98, to amend the Supreme Court Act and the Exchequer Court Act, was read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Blain in the Chair.

On section 1—Crown entitled to costs notwithstanding solicitor, etc., is salaried officer.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Will the hon. minister explain this?

Mr. DOHERTY: The purpose of this section is to place the litigant who has litigation with the Crown in the same position, with regard to liability for cost, in the case where the Crown conducts its proceedings through the law officers in the Department of Justice, who are all salaried officers, as in the case where outside counsel are employed. As the law stands at present, where the cases are conducted by lawyers outside the department, and the Crown is successful, costs are always taxed, of course, against the losing litigant, in favour of the lawyer conducting the case, and include fees to that lawyer. Where, on the other hand, the Crown conducts its case through the law officers of the department, it has been held that, inasmuch as these officers are salaried officials, and the Crown does not pay special fees for the particular case, they are not entitled to have their costs taxed. It seems anomalous that the position of a litigant, with regard to liability for costs, should be different, in the case where the Crown conducts its business through its own officers, from the case where the Crown retains counsel specially for the purpose. I think it will be acknowledged that it is desirable, as far as possible, and it certainly is in the interests of economy, that the cases on behalf of the Crown should be conducted by the law officers regularly employed. That, of course, takes their time away from other duties, and the Crown pays them for that work, through their salaries. Where their time is so occupied, and where the Crown succeeds in its litigation, it seems but fair that the unsuccessful litigant should pay the costs, just as he should pay them if we employed some other lawyer. I do not think it is desirable that the unsuccessful parties, who, in many cases at all events, are conducting the litigation quite without foundation, should escape from the ordinary penalty that attaches to the unsuccessful litigant with regard to the liability for costs.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: If this be not intended to add to the salary of the official of the department who acts as counsel, I can see no very serious objection to the proposed change.

Mr. DOHERTY: It is not so intended.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: But if it is intended to add to the fee, or salary, or remuneration of the officers of the Crown, I think it will be very objectionable.

Mr. DOHERTY: It provides that the money so paid shall go into the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Exclusive original jurisdiction.

Mr. DOHERTY: I desire to move an amendment to this section. I might point out that the purpose of this section, as I explained when introducing the Bill, is to rectify the consequences of the interpretation that has been placed upon the subsection of the present Exchequer Court Act. The section, as it stands, gives the Exchequer Court jurisdiction in respect of every claim against the Crown arising out of any death or injury to the person, or to property on any public work, resulting from the negligence of any officer or servant of the Crown, while acting within the scope of his duties or employment. That section has been interpreted—and I think the wording fully justifies the interpretation—as limiting the liability of the Crown under it to the case where the death of or the injury to any person or property occurs on the public work; that is to say, all cases where the individual who is injured or killed is at the moment actually on the public work, or to cases where the property damaged is, at the time that it is damaged, actually on the public work. Giving it that interpretation, it has produced this result: that you may have two persons, one of them standing actually on the public work, the other one standing, say, on an adjoining street. By some negligence of the employee, the officer or servant of the Crown working upon that public work, say, for instance, handling explosives, injury is caused to these two people. The one who is standing actually on the public work will, under the section as presently interpreted, have a right of action against the Crown. The other one, because he was standing on an adjoining street, perhaps ten feet away, and receives much more serious injury, has no recourse, because he was not injured on the public work. While I think this interpretation is a perfectly proper one of the section as it now stands, I do not think that the intention of the law is thereby realized, and the present amendment leaves the law as it stands, except that we do away with the requirement, where the injury is the result of the fault or negligence of the officer or servant of the Crown actually within the scope of his duties on a public work, that the victim should also actually be on the public work—the victim himself, where it is a matter of personal injury, or the property itself, where it is a matter of damage to property. The wording, perhaps, goes a little further than the intention; at all events, it is subject to the criticism that more words are used than are necessary. I beg to move to amend section 2 of the Bill by striking out the words "during the course of his employment on any public work," in lines 3 and 4 of paragraph (c) of clause 2, and adding the words "upon any public work" at the end of the paragraph. The section sought to be substituted for the present provision of the Exchequer Court Act would then read:

> Every claim against the Crown arising out of any death or injury to the person or to property resulting from the negligence of any officer or servant of the Crown while acting within the scope of his duties or employment on any public work.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Would my hon. friend read section (c), which he intends to repeal.

Mr. DOHERTY: Section (c) reads:

> Every claim against the Crown arising out of any death or injury to the person or to property on any public work resulting from the negligence of any officer or servant of the Crown while acting within the scope of his duties or employment.

Under that section it is required that the victim of the accident should be on the public work at the time of the accident, whereas I think the intention was to limit the liability to cases where the servant who is responsible for the negligence is engaged in employment on the public work, and to attach responsibility to the Crown even if the accident resulting from that negligence happened off the public work. In some cases where the cause of the injury was negligence on the part of the Crown's servant engaged on the public work, the individual hurt did not happen to be actually on the public work. A sample case would be the one that I mentioned. Suppose the Crown is excavating for a canal and I happen to be standing on the canal bank or upon anything that can be construed as part of the public work. If, through negligent blasting operations, I am injured, under the section as it now stands I will have an action, because I was on the public work. But if another gentleman standing ten feet away, beyond the limit of the property which can be considered as part of the public work, receives absolutely similar, or, perhaps, more serious injuries from the same cause, the court would hold that that gentleman had no action. I think it is quite clear that the trouble comes from the words "on a public work" being in the wrong part of the section and being made applicable to the victim and not to the servant of the Crown who causes the damage.

Mr. BURNHAM: Very recently there was a case in my own riding in which property was alleged to have been injured by the improper raising of the water. Because the property was many miles away and was not on the dam—of course, it could not be—the case was ruled by the judge as not coming within this Act, and the man had no redress. It is a matter of question whether another section of the Act did not allow this man to bring an action against the Government, but the Exchequer Court ruled otherwise, holding that the action must be brought in under subsection (c). Of course, you could not have hundreds of acres of property on the dam; therefore, in all cases where property was damaged under such circumstances, no recovery could be had. I ask the Minister of Justice whether such cases have been provided for?

Mr. DOHERTY: This legislation will meet precisely that case. If this legislation had been enacted and were in force at the time of the case in question, any objection to the recovery of damages based upon the fact that the property was not on the public dam would disappear. Of course, I am not in a position to say whether there was any other reason why the Crown should not be responsible in that particular case, but in so far as the hon. gentleman has stated the case, this amendment will meet it. It is quite unreasonable to say that while there is liability if your property is actually on the public work, you may with impunity commit precisely the same fault and produce precisely the same damages if the property damaged is not on the public work.

Mr. MARCIL: I think that this section is identical with Bill No. 49, introduced by the member for Kamouraska (Mr. E. Lapointe).

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not know that it is in the same words, but it is designed to attain the same purpose.

Mr. MARCIL: Many years ago the late Mr. Monk brought up a case that occurred in the county of Jacques Cartier: that of a man who was shot on his farm while volunteers were firing at a target. It was found afterwards that the boys who were firing were not authorized to do any shooting, and the farmer never got anything.

Mr. DOHERTY: At the time that case occurred I was not in a position to bring in an amendment to the law. Since the hon. gentleman mentions the fact, I have some recollection of their being such a case. I think it would have been desirable if this anomalous condition of affairs had been earlier corrected. The matter had been brought to my attention this year, in connection not with the case that the hon. gentleman mentions, but with one or two other cases that occurred in the province of Quebec. At that time I rather came to the conclusion that the law ought to be amended; the member for Kamouraska very likely had similar information and entertained the same view of the matter.

PRIVATE BILLS.

AERIAL LEAGUE OF THE BRITISH EMPIRE.

House in committee on Bill No. 84, to incorporate the Canadian Division of the Aerial League of the British Empire.—Sir Herbert Ames.—Mr. Blain in the Chair.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Perhaps the promotor will explain the meaning of the Bill.

Sir HERBERT AMES: This league is a branch of the Aerial League of the British Empire, which is a very important organization across the seas, and is in close relation with the British War Office. It has rendered very great service in aerial training. The organization in Canada has taken a large part in the same work here, acting in co-operation with the authorities. The Bill has been very carefully considered in the Private Bills Committee. Some amendments have been offered, which have been accepted, and as I understand the matter, the Bill is now satisfactory to all parties concerned.

On section 9—Real property.

Mr. STEELE: The Private Bills Committee added several subsections to this section. Subsection 2 limits the annual value of the real estate to be held by the association to $50,000. The other subsections are the stock clauses which have been inserted in all similar Bills in the last two years providing for the disposal of property which is not required for the purpose of the association at the end of ten years.

Section agreed to.

On section 10—Borrowing powers and investments:

Mr. STEELE: There is added to this section, subsection (2), providing that:

> Nothing in this section shall be construed to authorize the association to issue any note or bill payable to bearer thereof, or any promissory note intended to be circulated as money or as the note or bill of a bank, or to engage in the business of banking or insurance.

Section agreed to.

On section 12:

Mr. STEELE: This section is the usual one inserted in similar Bills providing that the association shall take over all the existing assets, interests, rights, credits, effects and property movable or immovable, held and enjoyed by the existing association, and also take over all the liabilities of the existing association before it shall be allowed to do business.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, amendments read the first and second time and concurred in.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

Bill No. 109, for the relief of John Newton Salter.—Mr. Northrup.

SUPPLY.

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Blain in the Chair.

Post Office—outside service—salaries and allowances, $8,447,263.25.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I notice in the newspapers that a body called the Public Service Committee has recommended that a large number of civil servants should be dismissed from office. Perhaps the minister would state whether the Government has given any consideration to that subject, and whether there will be any reduction in the staff of the Post Office Department, and if so, to what extent. I see that the minister is asking for an increase of half a million dollars on account of salaries, which does not look much like a reduction in the staff.

Mr. DOHERTY: These salaries are for the Outside service.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think the recommendation of the Public Service Committee referred to the outside service as well as the inside.

Mr. DOHERTY: I did not understand it to refer to the outside service. I am not in a position to give my hon. friend any information on this subject because I have not prepared myself on it, as I did not think it particularly pertinent to the Post Office Department. I am informed by the Deputy Minister that the recommendation has been called to his attention, and that it will receive his consideration. He will ascertain whether there is occasion for such reduction in the Post Office Department, and whether it is possible to effect the same without detriment to the public service. The increase in the amount asked for this year is made up practically in its entirety of the statutory increases.

Mr. EDWARDS: I wish to call the attention of the Acting Postmaster General to a matter which I have on more than one occasion brought to the attention of former Postmaster Generals. I realize that it is not a very easy matter to deal with, but nevertheless justice and fairness demand that it should be dealt with. It must be apparent to every member of this committee that the inauguration of parcel post and rural mail delivery has imposed a great deal of extra work upon the country postmaster. Many post offices have been cut off entirely owing to the establishment of rural routes, and this has necessarily increased the work of the post offices that are left. In many cases the country post office has become the distributing point for rural routes within a radius of 15 or 20 miles. That means a great deal of extra work and longer hours for the country postmaster, for which he is not adequately paid. His remuneration is certainly not in proportion to the extra work that has been thrown upon him by these changed conditions.

There is another point. Many of the men who have submitted tenders as couriers on the rural routes are not receiving the remuneration they should receive, having regard to the extra work that the parcel post has thrown upon them. Previous to the establishment of the parcel post, the courier added to his salary by charging 10, 15 or 25 cents for carrying parcels, but now he has to take all the parcels that come by parcel post as part of his day's work, and he is frequently obliged to use a two-horse rig where formerly a one-horse light rig sufficed. Parcel post has thus put him to extra expense and deprived him of the little revenue he formerly received for carrying parcels. I think I am right in saying that after parcel post was established the railway companies represented that they should receive remuneration for the extra work that parcel post threw upon them, and I think their claims were satisfied to a certain extent, and quite properly so. Now if the railways can receive extra remuneration, surely the rural mail carriers are entitled to extra pay. I have taken this matter up with two or three Postmaster Generals, and in every case they have agreed that the matter was worthy of serious consideration. But it is not an easy matter to adjust. They could hardly be paid on a mileage basis, but there ought to be some way of dealing fairly with these men, and at the present time I do feel that they are not being treated fairly in view of the extra work they have to do. I have been told in one or two cases to instruct the parties who claimed that they should receive more money, to keep an account of the number of parcels they carried and of the number of trips on which they had to use an extra rig for carring the mail, and that each case would be dealt with on its merits. If the department is prepared to do that, I shall be in a position to tell the couriers of my county to keep an account of the extra rig for carrying the mail, and that each munerated accordingly. Where a country postmaster has given up his office for one reason or another, I am beginning to find a good deal of difficulty in getting any one to take his place. They say there is nothing in it, that they are tied down to certain hours, that there is no such thing as a holiday for them, and that the remuneration is very small

I am sure the people of the rural districts appreciate very much what the Government has done in the way of extending postal facilities, and anything that can be done along that line will be borne out by the best judgment of everybody regardless of party. When the Post Office Estimates have been before the House, some members have spoken of the cost of this department. I want to state again that if there is any department of the Government which is justified and which will be justified by the people of this country in having a deficit it is the Post Office Department. Its revenue is derived entirely from the people, and in my judgment it should not have any surplus, and it certainly should not have a surplus so long as any member of this House can point to places where the people are not being properly served with postal facilities, or where they could be better served than at present. As to this department we should not be very censorious about expenditure. The public chest is pretty well protected in providing rural routes and rural mail service. Competition is so keen in many cases that the men must be performing the service at a loss. In any event, the country is not being robbed in regard to the amount paid for mail service.

We should take into consideration the fact that cities, towns, and centres of population call upon the Government of Canada for the expenditure of money in many ways, such as the improvement of harbours, public works, and so on. These are of course a benefit to the country, but they are especially beneficial to the particular town or city which obtains the grant. The strictly rural sections do not get such grants, and about the only way the Government can really be of service to the people in the country districts is by giving them the very best possible postal facilities. I maintain that in so doing, even if the Post Office Department should show a deficit, this Government or any Government is justified in having that deficit, if they can show that it has been produced by giving the people proper postal facilities—a daily mail service, so far as it is possible to give a daily mail service.

Once more I want to ask the acting Postmaster General (Mr. Doherty) to give his serious consideration to the question of an increase in pay to the men on the rural routes, because of the increased work those men have to do, which in many cases obliges them to place an extra horse or an extra vehicle upon the route, involving, particularly during the last year, a very great increase in their expenditure.

Mr. DOHERTY: With reference to what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Edwards) has said concerning the remuneration of country postmasters, I quite appreciate that there is a good deal of force in his representations. The subject is not entirely new to me—although most things connected with the Post Office Department are new to me. Quite recently I have had put before me by the deputy minister representations made by a considerable body of the postmasters looking to an increased remuneration. So far as I was able to go into the matter, it seemed to be quite fair that if any means could be found by which a reasonable increase in their remuneration could be granted, we should be glad to do it. The question of rural mail routes is, I must confess, quite new to me. Increased work will very naturally call for increased remuneration. I shall take the matter up and shall be glad if I can find a method by which this work may be better remunerated.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I would like to ask the minister if generally the department allows the exercise of patronage in connection with the awarding of contracts for the carrying of the mails. The reason I ask the question is because it has quite recently come to my notice that where tenders were called for carrying the mails, the tenderer who had offered to do the work for the lowest amount and who naturally expected to receive the contract was disappointed. There was political interference and the contract was given to a political friend of the Government, whose figures were higher than those of the other tenderer. It seems to me that should not be so, and in connection with services of this character the department should be left absolutely free to secure the performance of the work at the lowest price, because if there is political interference and the contract is given to a higher tenderer, it necessarily means the paying out of more public money to mail carriers than would otherwise have been the case.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have no knowledge of any practice prevailing other than that of dealing with tenders upon their merits as they come in. For the short time I have been in charge of the department, I have observed that that was the method in which they have been dealt with, and such cases as have come under my supervision have been awarded to the lowest tenderer. Of course, one can see there might be circumstances which would justify the acceptance of a higher tender. I do not know that I can go into the question, however, because the contracts I have had to deal with have all been awarded to the lowest tenderer.

Mr. BICKERDIKE: I would like to ask the minister in regard to the dismissal of a man named Dubreuil. Perhaps this is not the time to bring the matter up, but I would like the information. I have written several letters about it, and I presume it has not been attended to because the Postmaster General has been away so much. Probably the Deputy Postmaster General will remember the case. Dubreuil claims he was dismissed without a hearing. I asked that the man should have a trial and that he should be present at the enquête. I do not think it is British fair play to deal with charges against a man unless he has an opportunity of being present and hearing them.

I simply bring the matter to the minister's attention so that the deputy minister may know that we should like to have the matter inquired into, and have the man present.

Mr. KYTE: In awarding contracts for the carriage of mails it is sometimes found that, owing to the increased cost of living, plant etc., the lowest tender received is somewhat higher than the former price. The department in such cases does not always enter into a contract with the lowest tenderer, but, after consultation with party friends in the constituency, enter into negotiations with some friend of the Government who is asked if he will not put in a tender, and an intimation, I have no doubt, is given to him of the amount of the lowest tender that has been received, with the statement that the amount is too large and that the department is unwilling to enter into a contract. Then this party friend makes an offer slightly lower than the lowest tender, and the contract is given to him. I asked for correspondence relating to the contract for the carriage of the mails between Grand River and Fourchu. I am unable to understand why I have not yet received that correspondence. If I had it I might be able to illustrate the point I am endeavouring to make.

Mr. DOHERTY: We have a number of similar returns in preparation, and hope to have them ready almost immediately. I am not familiar enough with the work of the department to say more than I have said to the hon. member for St. John. I was not aware of any other method of dealing with tenders than upon their merits.

Mr. BLAIN: I would ask the minister to consider the desirability of making more frequent paymehts to the rural mail couriers. I understand they are paid once a month, but with the higher cost of living they would greatly appreciate more frequent payment.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: May I point out to the minister that in some districts during the winter the rural mail couriers at a good many points have no places in which to keep their horses while awaiting trains, which may be several hours late, the horses having to stand outdoors during that time. When some of these men entered into contracts several years ago the prices of commodities were not as high as they are to-day. That applies particularly to horse feed, and men who put in very low tenders now find that it is very hard for them to get along. I have in mind one man who was most anxious to get a contract and whose tender was $100 lower than the next lowest tender, $450 for a twenty-mile route. I believe the rule of the department is not to pay in excess of $30 per mile. The repairs to rigs have become a very heavy item as compared with five years ago, and many of these couriers have open rigs, in which the mail is exposed to the weather, and which are quite unsuitable for the purpose. It is not to the credit of the country to have His Majesty's mail being carried about the country in rigs of that kind, and I think it would be advisable for the department to furnish rigs for rural mail couriers. This would remove some of the expense under which they are now placed. Many of them are not renewing their contracts; new tenders are being called for, and they are much in excess of those sent in three or four years ago. I understand that in the United States they furnish rigs to the couriers.

Mr. DOHERTY: As to the more frequent payment of rural mail couriers, my information is that the work is done under contract and the times of payment are fixed by the contract. At the same time one realizes that there might be substantial advantages to the contractor from more frequent payments, and if arrangements could be made to obviate the difficulties which I am told exist in getting these accounts in so as to permit of their more frequent payment, I should be glad to consider the possibility of meeting the suggestion.

It looks to me as if it might not be easy for the Post Office Department to undertake to afford accommodation for the horses and rigs of the couriers at railroad stations. I shall enquire as to what can be properly done. This remuneration is a matter of contract, and no doubt the department would find itself open to criticism if it undertook to raise the rates which were to be paid for this work. A change of conditions might justify an increase. As to the suggestion that the department should furnish vehicles for the carriage of mail, whether there would be any advantage to the public by the adoption of a general system of that kind, is a matter which is worthy of consideration. I suppose if vehicles were furnished for the carriage of the mail, contractors would not expect the same rate of remuneration that would otherwise be paid. I shall be glad to consider the matters referred to and see if the suggestions can be met.

Mr. McKENZIE: The hon. member from St. John and the hon. member from Richmond mentioned certain complaints about the unfairness of the department in dealing with mail contracts. I had some correspondence which took place between the post office inspector for Nova Scotia and a gentleman in my riding who had a mail contract. This mail contractor was asked if he would be willing to renew his contract at the old figure. He immediately answered that he would accept a renewal of his contract at the old figure, but, much to his surprise, a month or so later he received a letter stating that his contract would not be renewed, and that the contract was not to be put up for tender, but that it was to go to a friend of the Conservative party in his immediate neighbourhood. That is exactly what took place. In order that nothing may depend upon my version of the facts, I will read the letters, which are very short. The first letter reads:

Post Office Inspector's Office,
Halifax, N.S., April 23, 1917.

Dear Sir,—

I beg to inform you that the Postmaster General has been pleased to authorize the renewal of your contract for the mail service between Baddeck River North Branch and Forks Baddeck, for a further term of four years, dating from the 1st July next.

Please inform me, with the least possible delay, whether you will accept this offer of the department. You, of course, understand that a contract can only be renewed on the existing terms and conditions. If, however, you do not care to continue at the present rate, the service will have to be put up to tender.

Yours truly,
W. E. McClellan, P.O. Inspector.

Mr. D. McPhee, Mail Contractor,
Baddeck River, North Branch, N.S.

To which Mr. McPhee informs me he immediately replied, stating that he would comply with the offer of the department, and continue the service for another four years. His first letter was dated 23rd April, and on the 7th May he received this reply to his offer to continue his contract:

Post Office Inspector's Office,
Halifax, N.S., 7th May, 1917.

Dear Sir,—

With reference to my letter of the 23rd ultimo, notifying you that authority had been received to renew your contract for the mail service between Baddeck River North Branch and Forks Baddeck, I have to inform you that I am now in receipt of a letter from the department at Ottawa, cancelling the authority for the renewal of your contract.

Yours truly,
W. E. McClellan.

Mr. Dan McPhee, Mail Contractor,
Baddeck River North Branch, N.S.

I asked questions in the House, and they were answered, stating that the contract was not put up to tender at all, and that it was given to John McLeod, a friend of the party, without competition at all. I do not know at what figure it was so given, possibly at the same figure, but that is not a fair deal at all. Why throw temptation like this, if temptation it might be called, in a man's face? This man may have lost other opportunities. He may have made preparations to carry out the work after the offer from the department, believing he would get the contract. He was offered this contract and said he would take it, and then, on some representation that it ought to be given to a Tory, the whole thing was thrown to the winds, and it was given, with no competition at all, to another man. The old time principle of competition, and giving the contract to the lowest tenderer, is to be destroyed altogether if this sort of conduct is being carried on by the department, because men who do not happen to be of the same political stripe as the heads of the department, will not bother making tenders at all.

Mr. EDWARDS: What is the amount of the contract?

Mr. McKENZIE: It is only $69 a year or something like that, but I am not talking about the amount. It is the question of principle. There should be a fair deal of this kind, and we on this side are accused, even by our own friends, of not being high minded enough, and not big enough, and that all our energies and thoughts should be devoted to the winning of the war, which is true, but it is surprising that, in the midst of the great burden on the department now, that small petty connivance of this sort should be engaging the attention of the head of the department, taking a $60 contract from one man and giving it to a Tory. We are justified in refusing to believe that the department are regarding the war as serious, as they want us to, when such small matters are engaging their attention. I wish to bring this matter to the notice of the Minister, so that he will not be encouraging such conduct. I have the documents here, and the proof is conclusive. The amount is small, but the principle is the same as if the amount were large.

Mr. DOHERTY: I shall be glad to look into it. Was the cancellation subsequent or anterior to any offer that was made?

Mr. McKENZIE: The correspondence is no doubt available. The letter of the department making the offer was dated the 23rd April, and the man replied immediately, stating that he would accept. Then on the 7th May he received a letter stating that the offer was cancelled, and that the contract was given to the other man, commencing on the 1st July. The cancellation was on the 7th May.

Mr. DOHERTY: I shall look into the matter. My hon. friend speaks about tenders not having been called for. I understand the law is that contracts for amounts less than $200 are awarded by the department, as a rule, without tender.

If the department is subject to reproach for offering the contract without tender in one case, it must be equally subject to reproach for offering it without tender in another. I do not suppose that it is any more wicked to offer it to a Tory without tender than to offer it to any other man without tender. However, if the contract was offered by the department to the gentleman referred to and was accepted by him, it is a matter that ought to be inquired into, and I shall certainly look into it.

Mr. McKENZIE: It is an old established practice in the department, particularly in respect to small contracts, that upon expiration of contract the contractor is asked whether he will continue the contract at the old figure. That is the practice that was followed in this case. The letter of the inspector says: "The service will have to be put up at tender if you do not care to accept." He did accept, they refused to give the contract, and they did not put it up at tender. If that is a square deal, I do not know what a square deal is.

Mr. OLIVER: What is the frequency of the mail service in the summer and in the winter on Peace river, from Peace River town to Vermilion?

Mr. DOHERTY: I have not the information with me, but I shall see that it is furnished to my hon. friend.

Mr. OLIVER: Peace River town now has a railway service twice a week. During the summer season there is steamboat navigation down the river three hundred miles to Vermilion and up the river about two hundred miles to Hudson Hope. I think that there are three steamers running on both those routes. If the department have not done so, I suggest that they take advantage of this steamboat service for the purpose of giving mail facilities up and down the Peace river as frequently as the boats travel. That may be a little outside the ordinary system of the department, but the distances are so great, and, now that the steamboat and railroad are running, the conveniences are so ample, that there is no reason why the people there should not have mail facilities while the steamers are running, because the expense to the country would be only trifling. As to the winter service, the stretch of country up and down the Peace river is now open to settlement and occupation by reason of the railroad and steamboat service, and there is a greater demand for mail service during the winter now than there was a year or two ago. Three years ago the Peace river was practically a closed country; to-day it is wide open, and people are coming in with considerable rapidity and scattering to all points. The service, therefore, that was quite adequate two or three years ago is inadequate now during the winter and still more inadequate during the summer. In the summer the needs can be met at a trifling expense to the department if arrangement is made with the steamboat companies. The increased service in the winter will cost money, but the circumstances justify that increase of cost.

I wish to draw attention also to the conditions at Fort McMurray on the Athabaska. Fort McMurray is three hundred miles north of Edmonton. It is the terminus of the Waterways Railway, and is at the head of steamboat navigation on the lower Athabaska. The rails are laid to within twenty miles of Fort McMurray; there is not as yet a regular train service. I do not know how soon the train service will be established, but there is such communication at the present time as can be carried on by gasoline speeders on the railway. Fort McMurray is reached by a Government telegraph line. Being the head of navigation on the waterways of the north, and being the terminus of the railroad, it is a permanent point, and, naturally, such business as there is in that country centres there. The department may say, of course, that when the railroad is completed it will do business with that railroad. The railroad is not completed, but there is means of communication measurably better than the means of communication on the river. I would suggest therefore, that advantage be taken of the facilities that are now available for the purpose of giving suitable mail advantages to this important stratagetic point in that part of the north country. There shou'd not be delay until the regular service has been established on the railway.

Mr. DOHERTY: I will ask the Deputy Minister to look into both cases mentioned by my hon. friend. I shall be glad to take any means that may be proper to afford suitable service, as far as that is possible.

Mr. OLIVER: In the country lying west of Edmonton, from Edmonton to Resplendent on the British Columbia side, there is a train service on the Grand Trunk and on the Canadian Northern. I would judge from what the Minister of Railways said that there is no mail service on the Canadian Northern, because points on the Canadian Northern are served by mail from the Grand Trunk. There is a regular service of three through trains a week on each line, in other words, a daily service from Edmonton west, but the people got their mail only three times a week. When there is a daily train, I think that the pople ought to have a daily mail and that the Canadian Northern trains should carry mail and distribute it to the post offices as well as the Grand Trunk trains. That would give the whole of that system, about three hundred miles, a daily mail service—and I think the people are entitled to it. I hope that the minister will consider that.

Mr. DOHERTY: I shall have a note made of it and see what can be done.

Mr. MICHAUD: I desire to call the attention of the department to a resolution forwarded to the Postmaster General four or five weeks ago by the Board of Trade of the town of Edmundston in the province of New Brunswick. There is a mail sevice on the Transcontinental railway between Lévis and Monk, half the distance between Lévis and Edmunston, and the people on the line between Monk and Edmunston are desirous of having a mail service on the train. Along that line of railway a good deal of business is being done. Very often the mail car attached to the express, instead of being left at Monk, comes as far as Edmunston. The mail clerks remain on the car, and it would be an easy matter for them to sort the mail all along the line. I hope the acting minister will take the request of these people into consideration.

Mr. DOHERTY: I shall be glad to look into the matter.

Mr. KYTE: Has the department in contemplation any increase in the salaries of letter carriers and postal clerks? Representations have been made to the department from time to time by employees in those branches in the mail service, and communications have been forwarded to members of this House. I speak more particularly of the letter carriers in the city of Sydney and the postal clerks in the Nova Scotia division. I am not going to argue why increases should be made, but some weeks ago the Minister of Finance brought down legislation providing for substantial increases for employees in the Inside Service, and there is no apparent reason why the Government should be absolved from paying similar attention to the necessities of the employees of whom I speak more particularly.

Mr. DOHERTY: I quite appreciate the claims of the class of employees of whom the hon. member speaks, and when the Supplementary Estimates are brought down, I expect to make provision for an increase in the salaries of the employees of that class analagous to the increase made to the employees in the lower grades of the Inside Service. What is in contemplation is, in the Supplementary Estimates, to provide for an increase under the guise of an allowance to meet, in some way at all events, present conditions.

Mr. KYTE: Has the Government considered the desirability of making some allowance to the mail couriers for services rendered by them in connection with parcel post? That matter has also been brought to the attention of the Postmaster General from time to time. When parcel post was inaugurated in Canada some years ago, substantial allowances were made to the railway companies for the additional carriage imposed upon them in respect of that service. I, as well as several hon. members on both sides of the House, have called the attention of the Postmaster General to the fairness of making some allowance to the mail couriers throughout this country. I refer more particularly to the mail couriers in Nova Scotia. I cannot say that a definite promise of an allowance was made by the predecessors of the present Postmaster General, but I would like to hear the acting Postmaster General state whether or not the mail couriers throughout the country are entitled to some consideration in respect to the extra work entailed upon them by the parcel post service.

Mr. DOHERTY: As I had occasion to say earlier in the evening, when the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) raised the same question, it came to me then as a new question. I quite realize that there probably would be an increase in the work imposed on the mail couriers by the establishment of parcel post, and it seems reasonable that an increase in work ought to call for an increase in remuneration. I took the matter up with the deputy minister, and the suggestion is that it is not quite clear how we can arrive at a basis for making an increase. I have asked him to look into the matter, and I shall be glad to give it consideration and to see if we can find a way to make such compensation for increased work as will be reasonable.

Mr. MICHAUD: Is the minister in a position to give me an answer in reference to applications which have been made during the past few years to establish a mail service on the railway operated between Campbellton and St. Leonard in New Brunswick? There are many settlements along that line, and there is a large business being done by lumbermen and merchants. The people need a daily mail service. A daily train has been operated during the last few years.

Mr. DOHERTY: What is the service at present?

Mr. MICHAUD: There is a bag left on the train, and it takes about three days to get a reply from a distance of five or ten miles from where a letter is mailed. The mail bag is often left on the train, and the service is certainly very poor.

Mr. H. BOULAY (Rimouski) (translation): Mr. Chairman, I believe I should endorse the remarks just made by the hon. member for Madawaska (Mr. Michaud), though it may not be very agreeable to my hon. friend, the member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) when I trouble myself a little about New Brunswick.

As my county is somewhat close to that of Restigouche, I have many an occasion to travel through that district inhabited by people who come, for the larger part, from the counties of Rimouski and of Matane. So I take a permanent interest in the welfare of that community whose members are anxious to find in their new abode a few of those advantages we enjoy in the province of Quebec. These people, for the past six years, have had to be content with a very poor mail service. At the outset, when the railway line was first established, they got their mail only as a matter of courtesy on the part of Mr. Malcolm who was the owner of the road, and when the line became a part of the Intercolonial, the Government gave them a tri-weekly mail service. There is already, all along this line, a population of some ten thousand souls, most of them new settlers. In their midst there is much business going on, and the fact of having the mail service only three times a week and of not having any mail clerk, is most prejudicial.

I had, almost two years ago, drawn to this fact the attention of the Postmaster General, the late Mr. Casgrain, and he had promised to attend to it. I do not see why that section of our country should be more neglected than the others. I realize that there would be no money in it, that the Postmaster General's Department would be out of funds by appointing a mail clerk for this section. That cannot be gainsaid. However, there are many other localities, throughout the country, where the Post Office Department makes no money, but just the same provides a good service, with a view of fostering the industries, helping the trade and assisting the people who go into these new townships. Naturally, it takes more heart to go into the forest, as those brave settlers have been doing for the past six years, than to continue labouring in the old settlements. I believe it to be the Government's duty to give them a daily mail service and also a mail clerk.

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY: I admit the importance of the remarks just made by the hon. members, and inasmuch as the limits of a wise economy will not be exceeded, we will see that the present conditions be properly attended to.

Sir HERBERT AMES: Would the acting Postmaster General kindly repeat what he said a moment ago about his expectations in regard to the increased salaries of city postmen? I could not quite catch what he said.

Mr. DOHERTY: What is in contemplation is to provide in the Supplementary Estimates for an additional allowance to the employees generally whose salaries are of the lower class. I understand that would cover letter carriers and employees with salaries under $1,000.

Sir HERBERT AMES: It would cover postmen of the various grades?

Mr. DOHERTY: It would cover letter carriers.

Sir HERBERT AMES: A supplementary grant towards living expenses will be made?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

Mr. ROBB: In the fall of 1916 the Government established rural mail delivery from Glenelm in the township of Elgin, and closed some of the post offices. As a result of the change a number of families, as I represented to the department on the 2nd of January this year, living along the first concession of Elgin, which is the main road running through the whole county of Huntingdon, were deprived of their post office and also of rural mail delivery. They think it most unfair that they should not be served by rural mail delivery now that the post office at Powerscourt has been closed. I should like a statement from the minister as to whether he proposes to give these farmers the service they are entitled to.

Mr. DOHERTY: The Deputy Minister explains to me that the parties living along this mile of road are within half a mile of a rural mail route on either side of them, and I understand that under the regulations if the route is within a mile that is all that can properly be expected. Under these circumstances, unless there is some special reason why the rule should be departed from, there would hardly seem to be justification for providing for the carrying of mail between the two routes I have referred to. I understand that the parties complaining desire a connecting route, so to speak, between the two present existing routes, and I am informed that none of them are more than half a mile distant from one or other of the existing rural mail routes.

Mr. ROBB: What I want to make clear is that this mile of road deprived of rural mail service is the main road running through the whole county of Huntingdon from Hemmingford to Dundee. The rural route is run up a side line. What I want from the minister is a direct statement whether the department will take into consideration the rights of the families living along this mile of main road.

Mr. DOHERTY: I would not like to say absolutely that I will not take into consideration anything that the hon. member represents, but I am informed by the Deputy Minister that to meet the wishes of those on whose behalf he is speaking would involve a departure from the general system of laying out the mail routes, which he assures me has been followed in laying out the routes in this particular section. The hon. member speaks about the rights of the people who live on this strip of road. I do not understand that everybody has a right to have a mail route pass his front door. There has to be some limit as to distance, and I am informed that the parties in question are well within what is considered under the general rule to be such a distance from a mail route as to give rise to no ground for complaint. If I understand the hon. member correctly the basis of his claim that the mail route ought to follow this road, is that it forms part of the main road running through the county of Huntingdon. On the other hand it is represented to me that the present disposition of the mail routes in that section is more generally convenient to the public than if one of the routes were to be sacrificed, so that the mail could be carried along this strip of road. However, I shall be glad to look into the matter to get a clearer comprehension of it myself, and to see whether there is reasonable ground for complaint.

Mr. ROBB: This matter has been before the department since last January, and I wrote the Deputy Postmaster General that I would bring it up again when the Post Office estimates were under consideration. Has the inspector reported against giving these people this service?

Mr. DOHERTY: The Deputy Minister informs me that he is not in a position to speak positively, but he believes there must be a report from the inspector on the subject. I cannot undertake to say off-hand whether this service will be granted, nor would I give an absolute refusal, but I shall certainly look into the matter and if it appears that there is a grievance I shall be glad to try and find a remedy.

Mr. ROBB: Will the minister give us the assurance that he will have another report made on the matter? This is a matter which has been before the department since early in January, and complaint was filed by the secretary-treasurer of the municipality, and representations have been made by people who live there, and who should know, that the route could have been laid out more economically for the service.

Mr. DOHERTY: I certainly shall get the facts and give them my best consideration.

Mr. MARCIL: Does the department undertake of its own volition to institute a rural mail service in a particular locality, or does it wait until the people ask for it?

Mr. DOHERTY: I understand as a general rule—in fact, I may almost say as an absolute rule—it is done upon the request of the parties interested.

Mr. ROBB: Following the question of the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil), I would like to ask if the department has organized rural mail delivery along routes where two-thirds of the people have protested against it and have stated they were better satisfied with their post office service.

Mr. DOHERTY: I understand from the deputy minister that there have been rural mail deliveries established after some portions of the people along the routes had objected to its being done. They were established because it was found that the service could be more economically and advantageously carried out by the establishment of the routes, and because it appeared that the people who objected did so through caprice. There have been cases where rural routes have been established although the desire of a portion of the people was to adhere to the post office system, but I am told that was done because it was believed to be in the best interests of the locality. I understand that unless one-half of the people interested purchase the boxes the route is not established, and the fact that the route is established indicates at all events the consent of at least one-half the persons interested.

Mr. THOBURN: I have a communication from a postmaster in the county I have the honour to represent, which I would like to place before the committee. The member for St. Antoine division (Sir Herbert Ames) drew attention to the small salaries paid the city postmasters. This communication deals with the very small salaries paid to postmasters in towns and villages, and if the statements made are correct, I think the poorest paid officials in the employ of the Government are the postmasters in the towns, villages and rural municipalities. This communication is headed, "Compensation of Country Postmasters." It says:

After Confederation the scale of commission on which postmasters' salaries was fixed in offices such as Almonte, Carleton Place, Clayton, Appleton, Pakenham, etc.,—

These are all towns in the county I have the honour to represent.

—was forty per cent on first $800 of postal revenue, and twenty-five per cent on amount of revenue in excess of $800.

Some years ago (probably ten or fifteen) it was felt that this scale ought to be made more favourable to the postmasters, so a new scale was adopted under which the postmaster received fifty per cent on first one thousand dollars of postal revenue and thirty per cent on amount of revenue in excess of $1,000. This scale was used, without any suggestion that the postmasters were being overpaid, until the introduction of the war tax on letters. Then the department thought that the increased revenue by reason of war stamps would give the postmasters too much on that scale. So, some Inside Service man who finds he cannot live on his 1914 salary, figured that the proper thing was to go back to the Confederation scale of forty per cent to $800, and twenty-five per cent on excess above $800, and this has been done. Please note that the postage rates to-day (including war stamps) are still lower than at Confederation; please note that the cost of living to-day is about double what it was at Confederation; please note that the country postmaster does a much greater volume of work to-day which does not produce revenue to the credit of his office than he ever did; and please note that the scale on which the country postmaster is being paid to-day is the same as at Confederation.

I say that the country postmaster does a greater volume of work to-day which does not produce revenue to the credit of his office, than he ever did. The enormous increase in the circulation of daily newspapers of late years, and especially since extension of rural mail system, involves a burden of daily work, 310 days in the year, which does not increase his office revenue by a cent, and the extension of the parcel post system has had the effect of bringing into his office for distribution the departmental store shipments which pay their postage to the city officers; and his work in the distribution of parcels, which produces no revenue in his office, is out of all proportion to what he collects on parcels despatched from his office.

A single illustration will show the weakness and shortsightedness of the action taken in pitchforking us back into the old Confederation scale. Take Pakenham post office as an example. I have not the exact figures, but approximately the postal revenue used to be about $1,000, which gave the postmaster a salary of $500 a year under the old higher scale. In order that he may get a salary of $500 under the present scale, he has to increase his office revenue to $1,520, and he can then meet the increased cost of living out of the savings he has laid aside out of his salary in previous years.

Mr. MARCIL: Does he have to employ an assistant?

Mr. THOBURN: I will come to that a little later on. (Reading):

It was quite right that the scale should be modified to make adjustments for the war stamp addition to revenue, but the rule-of-thumb way they jumped at the thing was inexcusable. Confidentially, I may say—

—and this is the part to which I want to draw the attention of the Acting Postmaster General—

Mr. McKENZIE: But, it is confidential.

Mr. THOBURN: It will work out all right.

—Confidentially I may say that my own salary warrant is $214 per month, out of which I pay three assistants. I have had girls in my employ, who are now in the Civil Service. Those in this post office are just as intelligent and industrious and work longer hours. I give full time to the work myself.

$214 per month means $2,568 per year, and allowing, say, $1,200 salary for himself, there is the enormous sum of $1,368 to pay three assistants. So I think I was justified in saying that the poorest paid officials of the Government are in the Post Office Department. There is no doubt as to the truth of what this postmaster says with reference to the increased work devolving upon them on account of the rural mail and parcel post. They get little or nothing from the sale of postage stamps for parcel post as the parcels are all sent from the cities into the towns and villages. They have to handle all the parcels and get no extra revenue. The same thing applies to the mail going out into the rural districts. It has increased very materially. If there is any department of the Government that needs special care it is the post offices in towns, villages and rural districts.

I have been repeatedly asked, but have been unable to explain, the difference in postage on a parcel to a Canadian soldier in England and in France. The rate from Canada to England is the same as the ordinary parcel post rate before the war, 12 cents per pound. To the Canadian soldier in France or Belgium, the postage on a three-pound parcel is 24 cents. The same parcel to a soldier in England would cost 36 cents. Can the Postmaster General explain why the rate to England is exactly 50 per cent higher than to France or Belgium?

Mr. DOHERTY: Under the convention with regard to the postal rate to France and Belgium, Canada receives a certain portion of the postal rates for parcels transmitted to those two countries, and to her own soldiers Canada has thrown off ner part. That makes the rate cheaper to these countries. The rates between England and Canada are adjusted by arrangement between these two countries. The deputy informs me that although negotiations have been attempted looking to some arrangement on the subject, nothing has yet been concluded. I have no doubt they have bigger things to attend to over there.

As to the remuneration to country postmasters, I certainly must concede that my hon. friend's correspondent writes a forcible letter. It is exceeded in cogency only by the arguments of the hon. gentlemen in support of it. The subject has been engaging the attention of the department recently. We have had representations by a number of postmasters and an intimation of what they considered would be the proper way to deal with the question. I do not know whether we shall be able to do quite what they suggest, but I do hope we shall be able to do something in the direction of improving the condition.

Mr. MARCIL: What is minimum paid to country postmasters?

Mr. DOHERTY: $50.

Mr. MARCIL: We all remember when the minimum was $10 a year. There has been a great change in fifteen or sixteen years.

Mr. CURRIE: May I add a word on behalf of rural mail carriers? The current impression through some articles that have appeared in the press is that the carrying of the rural mail is not a matter of contract and that the Government could either increase or reduce the remuneration of the rural mail carrier without any regard to any contract, that the whole thing rested entirely with the Postmaster General. Of course the rural mail carrier takes a contract to carry mail at a certain price for a certain term of years and he gets that amount of money. He cannot secure an increase without the route being once more put up to tender. Since many of the existing contracts were entered into, a great deal of additional work has been imposed on the carriers through the parcel post system; there has been an increase of perhaps 40 per cent or 50 per cent. There is general dissatisfaction among the carriers, who think they should get something additional for this work. It would be invidious to grant an additional sum to any special route, but owing to the increased cost of living and the additional cost of carrying the mail, the higher price of horse feed, etc., and the higher cost of labour, if any is employed, there is not much profit left for the rural mail carrier to-day, and I think the department would be justified in giving an increase of 10 or 15 per cent to all rural mail carriers. The rural mail system probably pays the country as well as the old system of having little country post offices with couriers carrying the mail to these offices and postmasters paid for attending to the offices. I wish to put in a special plea for the country mail carrier. I trust the minister will remember it and that when the Supplementary Estimates come down we shall find that the rural mail carriers will receive a flat increase of 10 per cent or 15 per cent. That should be done in justice to these men, owing to the great increase in their work through the establishment of the parcels post system. The Government must have a very large increase in revenue from parcel post. The figures have not been given to the House. Are they available?

Mr. DOHERTY: I am told there is not any separate accounting.

Mr. CURRIE: How much is the general increase in post office revenue from the sale of stamps since the parcel post system was instituted? Will it be 20 per cent?

Mr. MARCIL: You will have to eliminate the war tax.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am informed it is safe

Mr. MARCIL: You will have to eliminate the war tax.

Mr. CURRIE: I think five per cent of that increase should go to the rural staff. A number of these local carriers were paid for handling local express. A woman, for instance, would give a man a parcel of eggs and perhaps give him ten cents, but now that is all done away with, and the carriers receive nothing in that way. I think the Government should increase the pay of these men at least 10 per cent. Referring to the soldiers, I was on the Board of Inquiry on the postal question in England and I gained some knowledge there. I ascertained that the British Government handles all the mail to France free. I will be corrected if I am wrong. Therefore, the French Government gives us nothing, as the statement was made. When a parcel is sent from here to a boy in France, it goes to England first, and from there to France. It goes from England to France free, there being one consideration, namely, that that parcel virtually becomes military property the moment it leaves England. If a mother sends a pair of socks to her boy in France, it goes to England and from England to France, and if the boy happens to be killed or wounded in France, the parcel is expropriated by the military authorities in France, and those socks go into a general fund with other articles, the idea being that it is not fair that these parcels should be returned, but that some use should be made of them at the front. Every mother in England who sends a parcel to her boy knows that that is the rule. I do not think the Canadian women know, and notice of that fact should be given. I might say, also, that all the mail from Canada is handled free by England, and I cannot understand the Postmaster General putting up a story to the effect that he had to pay a large sum for that postage over there. I do not think we have to pay anything for it. That is my own opinion, formed from what I ascertained over there.

Mr. PUGSLEY: When did they put up that story?

Mr. CURRIE: The statement was made last year, and repeated again to-night. I think a certain weight of parcel should be permitted to be sent to the soldiers at the front by the mothers in Canada without any postage, as is the practice in England.

Mr. MARCIL: How about letters?

Mr. CURRIE: I would not make that applicable to letters, because the girls would write too many letters to the boys at the front.

Mr. MARCIL: I asked about that, and they said the Union Postal Regulations were against it.

Mr. CURRIE: That is a fallacy. All those regulations fail in time of war. A soldier in the field writes his letter. It is franked by his officer and the letters pass through France, and through the British post office, and come here, and the Post Office Department here places a stamp on them; I do not know why.

Mr. MARCIL: I got a letter from the front bearing two Canadian stamps.

Mr. CURRIE: They are put on by the postal authorities here. I think the postal regulations, as far as letters and parcels sent to England and France are concerned, require revision. I do not want to attach any blame, but I think the people in this country have been mulcted in large sums for postage on letters to their boys in England, which sums they are not entitled to pay, and that has been an added source of revenue to the department here. The people understood the money had to be paid to England, which I do not think is a fact. I think we would be justified in making some change in the regulations.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not want to question the accuracy of what has been said, but I am informed by the deputy minister that on the cost on parcels from here to France, Canada gets absolutely nothing. With regard to parcel post, the rate stands as it stood before the war.

Mr. CURRIE: England carries free for us?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

Mr. CURRIE: Why do we have to pay large sums of money?

Mr. DOHERTY: I suppose we could stop charging anything at all, but England will not consent, or has not as yet consented, to the collection upon her side, and it is a matter of arrangement between the two countries.

Mr. CURRIE: The minister does not seem to understand. There is a postal union between the various countries, and under that union each country carries the other's mail free. I speak subject to correction. When we send parcels to France, when they reach England they carry them free. When there is no charge for carrying parcels in England, why do we not follow suit and make no charge? Why do we collect a revenue on parcels here and let the people think we have to pay the money to England? I do not see any items in the Public Accounts showing that there is anything paid for that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say it costs less to send from Canada to France than it does to send to England?

Mr. CURRIE: Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I understood that was the case. The mother of two boys, who happened to be very closely connected with myself, told me that in respect of one boy who was in France, the postage was less than it was to her boy in England, both sons serving in the expeditionary force. That seemed to me pretty strange, and certainly it requires explanation. I could not believe it to be true, but my hon. friend from West Simcoe corroborates the statement?

Mr. CURRIE: Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What is the reason for that?

Mr. CURRIE: There is no charge on these parcels once they land in England, whether they go to England or France, but we are making a charge on this end, on the understanding that there is a charge on the other end. There is no such charge. If there is no charge in England, there should be no charge here. I claim the people are paying all that postage to the department here, thinking they have to pay large sums to send things to England and France.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It would look as though somebody ought to study this matter.

Mr. CURRIE: I have not heard an explanation yet, and having gone into the matter a little bit, and having been interested in the matter over there, I ascertained that there was no charge for parcels in England. I went into the matter when I was over there and I was given to understand that there was no charge for parcels on the other side. I cannot understand, therefore, why this country is charging for carrying those parcels from inland villages, towns and cities to the coast. I think it is only fair that a more lucid explanation of the whole matter should be given. If the thing is justified by the old regulations of the Postal Union, then those regulations should be abrogated during the war. Surely Canada can carry parcels for her boys free if England and France are willing to carry them free.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: If the hon. member is right, it is an outrage that we should have to pay more for the carriage of parcels to our boys when they are in England than we have to pay when they are in France. When sending parcels to my boy, I have often wondered why I had to pay more when he was in England than I had to pay when he was in France.

Mr. CURRIE: I should like to see the item in the public accounts showing that we paid for the carriage of these parcels in England and in France; then I would be satisfied that the information which I obtained from different general post offices in England at the beginning of the war was wrong. As soon as the parcel reached Liverpool it was carried free to London and then sent free to the soldier in France or wherever he happened to be, no charge being made to the Canadian Government. Indeed, the parcels were handled almost entirely by he Canadian officers over there; they hardly ever went into English hands.

Mr. DOHERTY: My information is that there are matters in connection with this which it has not been considered desirable or proper to explain to the public. But I am in a position to say that whatever may be the reason of it, it does not depend on action which Canada would be free, independently of her contract in the Postal Union arrangement with the Mother Country, to alter. As the matter has been put forward, I shall inquire whether I am at liberty to give an explanation or not. There is an absolutely clear and settled explanation, I am told, making it clear why Canada cannot control the matter. I cannot say more at the present moment.

Mr. PUGSLEY: This matter is of very great interest to the mothers of the boys who are at the front.

Mr. DOHERTY: It is, and when I am at liberty to do so, I shall explain.

Mr. PUGSLEY: We have heard a great many times during this war that there are all kinds of subjects upon which no information can be given to this Parliament. I think that the sooner we have a secret session of the House of Commons in order to get some information upon these questions, the better. They have had secret sessions of Parliament in England, as well as in France. Although this country has been engaged in the war for nearly three years, not one particle of what may be called secret and important information has been given to this House. This House has never received any information except what has been given to the general public. I think that the minister ought to let this item stand and get the information, or else give to the committee a satisfactory reason why he does not give us the information now. It is difficult to comprehend why people sending parcels to their boys in England should be obliged to pay more than they pay on parcels going to their boys when they are in France. The minister says there is a perfectly good reason; well, if there is, I think that Parliament ought to know it. I can see no reason why it would not be quite right to communicate the information to Parliament.

Mr. DOHERTY: Perhaps the hon. gentleman attaches too great weight to what I said. As to the suggestion that there should be a secret session of Parliament, I shall be happy to communicate that to the Prime Minister. The hon. gentleman would hardly expect me to undertake to

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister is a very important member of the Government.

[Mr. Doherty]

Mr. DOHERTY: I appreciate the hon. gentleman's appreciation of my importance. I shall be absolutely frank; I do not understand the explanation of the deputy minister, beyond that he does assure me that there is a reason that interferes with our independent action—interferes for the moment, at all events, with my going into the explanation. Perhaps the best reason why I cannot explain at the present moment is that I do not myself grasp what the reason is.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Perhaps the minister who has been on military service can tell us.

Mr. MARCIL: Will the minister explain why stamps are put on letters sent to Canada by the boys at the front? I have received censored letters from the front upon which Canadian stamps were placed, evidently in Ottawa. Why should this be done?

Mr. DOHERTY: That costs nobody anything, and is to facilitate distribution. Otherwise we would have to have some kind of franking system.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I suppose that adds something to the apparent revenues of the Post Office Department.

Mr. DOHERTY: The stamps are handed out gratuitously; how could that figure as revenue? That is as difficult to understand as the other explanation. Indeed, if they were charged up, they would help to make a deficit. Whatever the cost of these stamps is, we get nothing back for it. I do not know whether you can trace that loss or not. However, that is the only method of enabling the soldiers' letters to be distributed free without their being held up for lack of postage. The method is the simplest and costs nobody anything.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why not stamp the letters "free."?

Mr. DOHERTY: If it is thought that the revenues of the country will be increased or any good purpose be served by stamping the word "free" upon the letters instead of affixing a stamp, which has so far been found the most convenient method, of course we shall be glad to do it. I cannot, however, see what advantage would be in that. I might have a calculation made as to how much these postage stamps cost the country and what difference in cost would be involved in buying a rubber stamp, paying for the ink, and stamping "free" upon the envelope. If there is any difference in favour of the latter method we might adopt it. I must say, however, that I am doubtful whether there would be any advantage in departing from our present method.

Mr. CARVELL: How does the placing of a stamp on a letter from the front at St. John or Halifax expedite the delivery of a letter to an internal point in Canada? As the member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) says, the letter is franked in France.

Mr. CURRIE: The censor's stamp is the frank.

Mr. CARVELL: When I mail a letter in the House of Commons with my frank on it, my hon. friend does not have to put a stamp on it in order to ensure safe delivery. If the censor's stamp will carry into Canada a letter from the front, I do not see why that letter should not go to its destination just as readily with that censor's stamp on it and without postage stamps on it as my letter goes from the House of Commons with my frank on it. Moreover, putting the stamp on the soldiers' letters involves time and trouble. The minister says that the placing of stamps upon these letters does not involve an increase in the revenues of Canada.

Mr. MARCIL: It is a waste of stamps.

Mr. CARVELL: I would like to be sure of that because I have an idea that the revenues of Canada are increased to that extent. The minister, however, may know about the matter.

Mr. CURRIE: Possibly the method intimated by the minister would be the best one, because I think the whole trouble is due to red tape in the department, and the people have been paying for red tape. The House will anxiously await the solution of this trouble, which to anybody who has anything to do with the postal service in the Old Country so far as the Canadian soldiers are concerned, is certainly a mystery. For that reason I suggest that some other item be taken up.

Mr. DOHERTY: These soldiers' letters come together as soldiers' letters, and the man in this country who receives the bundle knows that they are soldiers' letters, but if he sent them off to all their destinations, when one reached the postmaster who would have to deliver it, he would not know it was a soldier's letter, and he would hold it back until double postage was paid. It is only to avoid that difficulty that the stamps are put on. I understand a system is being sought to be arrived at by which those letters will individually when they are sent from the other side, be stamped as being soldiers' letters. When that comes to be done, of course, it would not be necessary for us to put stamps on them when they reached here. It is only quite recently that the British authorities have undertaken to consent to that system. Until we have a system of that kind identifying a soldier's letter, something has to be done with it to ensure that the recipient would not be held up for additional postage when the letter arrived with nothing on it to show that the postage had been paid, and what was thought the simplest way to show that the postage was paid was to put stamps on it when it arrived in Canada.

Mr. CARVELL: I suppose we must accept that reason. Any letters that I have received from soldiers overseas have been marked "on active service" or something of that kind. There is certainly a mark on every letter coming from a soldier to indicate that it is a soldier's letter.

Mr. DOHERTY: Some of the letters are marked and some are not. Of course, one could separate all those that bear marks from those that do not and put stamps on those that have no mark and not put stamps on the others, but inasmuch as many of them are not marked, it was thought the simplest way to put stamps on them all.

Mr. CARVELL: Are there any well defined regulations or rules of the department by which people in any portion of the country can obtain rural mail service? I was told some years ago that if 50 per cent of all the residents along a certain route or road would subscribe for the boxes and agree to become patrons of the rural mail service they would obtain that as a matter of right. Is that correct?

Mr. DOHERTY: I am informed that where 50 per cent of the people interested make a request a rural mail service is established.

Mr. CARVELL: Within the last year or two I have received many complaints, some of which I have forwarded to the department, that those regulations are not lived up to at all, and that the only way the people can get rural mail service is by putting their request through a political organization. In my own constituency the bribe is notoriously put forward that if you will do certain things we will give you a rural mail delivery. I think I am safe in saying that if 90 per cent of the people in certain districts signed a petition asking for a rural mail delivery they would not get it unless they put their request through the proper political channel. That is the way in which the matter works out. I have not bothered the department very much about the matter, but I have felt a great many times that when these estimates were up I would like to ask the question. I intended to do so last year, but when these estimates went through I was busy at another place in the city. I am glad to have the assurance from my hon. friend to-night that, as a matter of right, 50 per cent of the people living along a certain route can demand the boxes, and I shall have great pleasure in notifying many people in my constituency to that effect.

Mr. DOHERTY: It is not in my knowledge, nor in that of the deputy minister, what representations have been made as to what is necessary in order to get a rural mail service, but I am told by the deputy minister who locates the rural mail routes that he has never had political influence of any kind brought to bear on him in connection with the matter, and that it has been dealt with on the principle which I have just mentioned. That is all the information I have on the subject.

Mr. CARVELL: The deputy minister does not know what takes place in the local communities. I have known the deputy minister for a long time, and I know he possesses a great deal of knowledge, but there are taking place around the post office inspector's department, and many places in the different provinces many things of which the deputy minister knows nothing. I assure my hon. friend that what I have described is the practice, but having his assurance to-night, I hope we shall be able to get rid of that little difficulty.

Mr. DOHERTY: The deputy minister assures me that the routes are laid out in this way, and that the political influence that is talked of has never in any way reached the man who allocates the postal routes. The only conclusion one can draw is that somebody must have misrepresented the matter.

Mr. CARVELL: I will bring the thing to a head in a very short time. We will send in an application, and it won't go through the political end of the constituency either, or through the inspector's office, but straight to the deputy minister with ample evidence that 50 per cent of the people want the accommodation.

Mr. COPP: Are forms furnished by the department to people who desire to petition for a rural mail route?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

Mr. COPP: Is an affidavit required as to 50 per cent of the inhabitants wanting the accommodation?

Mr. DOHERTY: The deputy tells me it has not been the practice to require an affidavit. The applications may be made directly to the department or to the inspector. Where they are made through the inspector he is in a position to know, I suppose, whether the petitioners form 50 per cent of the population.

Mr. COPP: I know that within ten miles of my home a rural mail route was established in a section that was formerly served by a post office. One route was cut off entirely, and the people along it are without mail accommodation at all. I do not know whether this is a case of politics or not.

Mr. DOHERTY: If the hon. member will be good enough to furnish me with the facts I shall be glad to look into the matter.

Mr. COPP: I was just drawing it to the attention of the minister in that way.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What are the considerations that govern in the establishment of these mail routes? What are the limitations as to the number of people to be served? I know of one or two places myself where I should very much like to see a rural mail delivery route provided, but I am not quite sure that the route is long enough. How many miles long has it to be?

Mr. DOHERTY: I am informed that there never has been determined an absolute limit below which a route would not be established, but in practice it is not usual to establish a route longer than 20 miles or for a shorter distance than 10 or 12 miles. As to population, routes have been established where the number of people to be served was as low as 25, but that is not usual. I understand that no limits have been fixed as to the length of route or the number of people to be served. The deputy informs me that the department has tried to meet every request for the establishment of a mail route where 50 per cent of the people interested were agreed in asking for it, and where the length of route and number of people made it at all reasonable.

Mr. MARCIL: I was asked a question yesterday which I was unable to answer. Can public documents of this House be mailed free by members of Parliament from any post office in Canada? It would be interesting to know, for instance, in view of the election, if a member could mail a copy of Hansard containing his speech in an open letter from any post office in Canada?

Mr. DOHERTY: I understand that the franking privilege is limited to the House of Commons Post Office.

Mr. MARCIL: I understood that official publications could go free from any post office in Canada.

Mr. DOHERTY: I understand that members of Parliament have the right of mailing public documents free from their home post office.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is the minister quite sure of that?

Mr. DOHERTY: I am making the statement on the assurance of the deputy minister. My own impression was that the franking privilege was limited to correspondence from Ottawa. The deputy minister informs me that while some distinction is made in regard to public documents, it would not be quite safe to take as positive the answer he gave me a moment ago, but I shall have it verified and let my hon. friend know.

Mr. MARCIL: The question was put to me as regards Hansard. Could a member send 100 copies of his speech, for instance, free from his home post office?

Mr. DOHERTY: The deputy minister informs me that Hansard is not quite what he had in mind when speaking of public documents. Hansard, at all events, would have to be mailed from here to go free.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: Some time ago a petition was forwarded to the department from the inhabitants of Scotch Hill, in the county of Inverness, asking for the removal of the post office from its present site to the main road. Where the post office is now, there are only two mail days a week, and if the post office were removed to the main road the people could get their mail daily, and the department would be saved the cost of carrying the mail to the present site. The petition was signed by every inhabitant in the district, irrespective of party, except the person who has charge of the post office. I want to know what has been done with that petition, which was forwarded to the department about two months ago.

Mr. DOHERTY: I shall make inquiries and be glad to give the hon. member the information.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: Shortly after sending the petition forward, I had a communication from some parties down there, and on making inquiries at the department I was informed that they were awaiting a report from the post office inspector. That report, I presume, is now in the department, and I should like to know what decision has been arrived at.

Mr. DOHERTY: The deputy minister does not recall at the moment.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: I had a communication from some officer in the department—I do not know his name. He said the prayer of the petition was not granted. What I want to call the attention of the minister to particularly is the fairness of the demand of those people, and I cannot understand why their request was disregarded. They wanted to get a daily mail, and by granting their request the department would have saved a matter of $70 or $80 a year, and at this time when money is so scarce it is difficult to me to see why the request was refused. I would ask the minister to be kind enough to give me some information on the subject before the estimates are passed.

Mr. DOHERTY: I will be glad to look into the matter, and inform my hon. friend as to the result of my inquiry.

Mr. MARCIL: I would call the attention of the minister to the fact that Hansard is "printed by J. de L. Tachè, Printer to the King's Most Excellent Majesty," and would appear to be a public document entitled to be sent free through the post by members. Will the minister kindly clear up the matter so that we may know where we stand with regard to the mailing of Hansard?

Mr. DOHERTY: I will ask the deputy minister to distribute copies of the regulations.

Mr. McKENZIE: I would like to ask the minister for some information in regard to the St. Pierre-Miquelon mails. They used to be conveyed from Halifax to North Sydney by rail, then placed on board the steamer for St. Pierre. This steamer runs from St. Pierre to Halifax, calling at North Sydney, and when she returns from Halifax to St. Pierre she also calls at North Sydney and there receives all the Canadian mail. The mails are brought from Halifax to North Sydney by rail, unloaded there on trucks, and brought into the post office, where there is very poor accommodation for them. The place is comparatively small, and these mails fill it up so that you can hardly move around. After they have been there for some time they are re-trucked from the post office and put aboard the boat. This was the custom, and I believe it is still carried on. I could never understand why those mails were not put aboard the steamer at Halifax. Not a moment of time is gained by sending them by rail to North Sydney because there they have to wait for the boat. I brought this matter before the Postmaster General some years ago, and was told some change had been made, but so far as I know nothing has been done. The people of North Sydney protest very strongly against the practice, because it results in filling the post office up.

Mr. DOHERTY: It certainly does seem as if that were a very reasonable request. I will look into it. I understand the hon. member is not quite sure as to whether that system still prevails.

Mr. McKENZIE: I think it does.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I would like the minister to tell me how the amount of $3,519,932 for mail service by railway is made up. I take it that is the amount which is paid to the different railway companies.

Mr. DOHERTY: That is the total amount paid to the railways for mail service.

Mr. PUGSLEY: On what basis is it arrived at?

Mr. DOHERTY: There are different contracts with different companies, and that the services are paid for at so much per running mile.

Mr. PUGSLEY: How much per running mile?

Mr. DOHERTY: They are paid at the rate of 16 cents per running mile for a car, and nine cents per half car, and that in certain places where a baggage car is supplied they are paid four cents per running mile.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is not that quite an increase over what it was a few years ago?

[Mr. McKenzie.]

Mr. DOHERTY: There was an increase made two years ago. The rates were then readjusted. I understand the arrangement did not really result in an increase. The difference is they are now paid per running mile, whereas previously they were paid per track mile.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Then, if they carry two mails a day they would really get double what they were getting when they were being paid by the track mile?

Mr. DOHERTY: I did not quite follow that. I understand that on the track mile system the post office used any car that was available and paid for the number of track miles, while they now have a car especially purchased and pay for the number of miles that the car runs.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What was the percentage of increase to the railway companies as a result of the readjustment a few years ago?

Mr. DOHERTY: I understand it was approximately $1,000,000 per year.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Before the war broke out?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

Mr. COPP: I wish to bring up a complaint with reference to unsatisfactory mail service on the Intercolonial in a very large portion of my constituency, particularly during the winter. For years a train leaving St. John at seven a.m. has connected at Moncton with the Maritime Express during the winter, although it runs on to Truro in the summer. The Maritime Express is supposed to take the mail on from Moncton. If, as frequently happens in winter, the Maritime Express is more than two hours late, a special is run through from Moncton. But on that special they do not carry mails or papers and all the eastern section of Westmorland county from Moncton down is deprived of mail service.

Mr. DOHERTY: I shall ask to have the matter investigated. It seems only reasonable that we should take advantage of the special train.

Mr. McKENZIE: I have here a memorial by certain railway mail clerks. It appears that railway mail clerks operating west of Sudbury receive a provisional allowance of $15 a month in addition to the regular pay. Clerks operating east of Sudbury do not receive that. According to the memorial placed in my hands, the eastern men discussed this matter with the late lamented

Mr. Casgrain shortly before he died, and they say that they had made good progress in their negotiations with him, that he was much impressed with their story and that something was about to be done. Owing to the death of Mr. Casgrain and several changes in the Postmaster Generalship that have occurred since, nothing has been done. They ask that all railway clerks in the eastern division be placed upon the same footing as those in the West. I am requested by the clerk of the association to bring this matter to the notice of the minister.

Mr. DOHERTY: I shall be glad to consider it. The payment of a special allowance to western employees is not confined to the post office. Owing to the high cost of living in the West, many departments have granted an extra allowance to employees there. As to the particular case, I presume that the memorial will be brought to my knowledge and I shall be able to give it consideration. In the allowance that we propose to make to employees on salaries of $1,000 or under there will be some step in the direction of equalization, because it is contemplated to give a larger allowance to the eastern men who have not presently this additional amount than it is contemplated to give to western men. That would not apply to all railway mail clerks inasmuch as the salaries of some of them are larger than $1,000.

Mr. McKENZIE: This memorial says that in April, 1914, an Act put through by the Postmaster General, granting certain concessions to those clerks in the eastern division, but it went to the Senate, and, being mixed up with other Acts that were defeated, this Act, while in itself not objectionable, fell by the way with the other Acts, and nothing was done. This is evidently not a new matter, and perhaps the knowledge of that Act having passed through the House would help the minister in reaching a conclusion in regard to it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I would like to take advantage of the presence of the deputy minister to ask a question in regard to the postmastership at Dorchester, N.B. The office became vacant recently. Has an appointment been made, and if so, who is the present official?

Mr. DOHERTY: I understand it has not been filled.

Mr. McKENZIE: I have been asked to obtain some information from the department in connection with the postmastership in the town of Stellarton, in the county of Pictou. Some questions were asked not long ago as to who the postmaster was, and I understand the answer was that a man by the name of William G. Miller was postmaster, the former postmaster, Alexander Inglis, having been dismissed, but my information is that Inglis is still acting postmaster, and it is regarded as peculiar that the gentleman who was referred to in answer to questions, as the dismissed official is still performing the duties of postmaster, while the real postmaster is William G. Miller. Is there any explanation, first, as to why this man was dismissed, and, if dismissed, why was the regularly appointed official not installed in office, and why is he not discharging the duties of the office at present?

Mr. DOHERTY: I am informed that the reason why he was dismissed was that his performance of the duties was not satisfactory. He was insubordinate and negligent, and more particularly, I think, in the matter of answering correspondence and giving information. At all events, he was dismissed, and Mr. Miller was appointed, but the actual transfer of the post office has been delayed, by reason of the fact that it was necessary to make certain alterations in Mr. Miller's establishment, to adapt it to the business of the post office. Those alterations are nearly completed, and, pending their completion, it was not convenient that Mr. Miller should carry on the business instead of Mr. Inglis. Mr. Inglis has been acting postmaster, pending the alterations in Miller's premises. It is expected that in a week or two the new premises will be in proper order.

Mr. McKENZIE: I did not expect the minister to have any information about the premises, but I am told the whole store owned by Mr. Miller is now rented by the Government. It is a small store, but rented at rather a good price, namely $600 a year, by the Government. As the minister is aware that some changes are being made in this building, perhaps he could tell us whether the Government rented the building, or is it in that building that changes are being made for the post office?

Mr. DOHERTY: The Post Office Department made the usual allowance to Mr. Miller for rental, but, in view of the nature of the premises he is furnishing, the Public Works Department is making a certain addition to that allowance, bringing the total up to $50 a month, which is paid to him as rental.

Mr. McKENZIE: Does the minister know what the Public Works Department want this for?

Mr. DOHERTY: They want it for the business of the department.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is the minister satisfied with the night's work?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes, very well satisfied.

Mr. PUGSLEY: There are some other items in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. CROTHERS: I have some items.

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes, there will be items in the supplementary estimates, but that covers the main items.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does the Minister of Labour intend proceeding with his items to-night?

Mr. CROTHERS: Yes, they will not take very long.

Fair wages and inspection officers, $15,000.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I would like to ask the minister if the findings made by Mr. O'Connor are to be referred to a judge for further inquiry?

Mr. CROTHERS: The matter has not yet been fully determined. My hon. friend will remember that, in the order in council passed November last, provision is made for a further examination under the directions of the Minister of Labour, who is authorized to appoint an examiner, and to confer upon him power to examine books and witnesses under oath, and all that sort of thing. Whether a further investigation will proceed under that clause of the order in council or otherwise, I am not in a position to say definitely, but there will be a further investigation.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I did not make myself plain. What I meant to inquire of him was whether his report, covering the matters of bacon and foodstuffs, is to be the subject of an investigation by some judicial tribunal. There is some intimation of that in the press to-day. If there is to be such an inquiry, has a judge been appointed yet to conduct it?

Mr. CROTHERS: I think I understood what the hon. gentleman asked. What I said was that it had not been determined yet whether there would be a further inquiry or investigation under that order in council. There will be a further investigation.

[Mr. Doherty.]

Mr. CARVELL: Will there be an appeal from that investigation?

Mr. CROTHERS: No telling what the future may bring forth. Perhaps I ought to make a little explanation as to a misunderstanding concerning that report. Questionnaires were sent out to those having cold storages in Canada, somewhere about a hundred, I think, just as we had sent out questionnaires to dealers in coal.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What are questionnaires?

Mr. CROTHERS: It is a name given to a set of questions. Take the matter of bacon, for instance; the first question was as to the quantity of bacon on hand on a certain date. The next question was with regard to the cost of the bacon laid down in cold storage, including freight and unloading charges. The questions were answered satisfactorily. The next question was: what was the storage, overhead, and delivery cost. One or two of the firms said: "we cannot answer these questions; we are not in a position to give you the particulars." Hon. gentlemen will see at once that in the case of bacon that is sold in Liverpool that the delivery charges would be a very important matter. No answer was given to that question by the firm about which there has been so much talk during the last few days. In his report, Mr. O'Connor does not profess to deal with net profits; he deals with what is known in economics as margins. He pointed out the gross profit, that is the difference between the cost of the bacon and its selling price. Margin is made up of the different items of cost, delivery charges, overhead and cold storage charges —which the firm failed to give us. In a day or two after the report was filed these items of margin, the cost of delivery, storage and overhead charges were all provided and published in the Citizen and other newspapers.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Then what is the purpose of having a further inquiry by a judge? Why should not Mr. O'Connor make a further explanation of his report, having obtained from the firms investigated information which they failed to give to him upon request earlier in the proceedings?

Mr. CROTHERS: It is thought desirable that the information should be got by the department through some special officer— not necessarily a judge, though that has not been determined. Uuder the order in council we have power to send a man out who may examine the books of the company and any witnesses under oath that it may think it desirable to call, with a view to ascertaining without any doubt what the net profits of this particular concern were within a certain period.

Mr. McKENZIE: The Government seems to have established a peculiar system under which these examinations go on indefinitely. You appoint a commissioner to make certain inquiries according to the best of his ability. Perhaps his report is not quite satisfactory to the party whose affairs are investigated. Accordingly, that party raises a howl and makes a lot of noise, the effect of his noise being proportionate to the influence he has with the department or with the Government, and, in some degree, to the size of the interests that he represents. Then another commissioner is appointed to investigate the first commission. If the second commissioner is not orthodox in his report, the first may say: This report is not fair to me; I did the best I could; I furnished the facts and gave good reasons for the conclusions to which I came. Over my head you have appointed a judge who does not agree with me. I want to investigate him; he is not right; he is not fair. And then it goes on—ad infinitum. There is an old saying, well known to the Minister of Labour, that it is in the interest of the state that litigation should end. The minister should tell his officials that when they make a report upon a matter of this kind, the report will be final; that the first investigation or finding of a properly constituted court must be considered as final. If that is done, the public will know that when a report is filed, that is the end of the matter. The principle established now seems to be that of waiting a certain number of years after the filing of the first report for a further report on the subject. Has the minister any particular policy in his department in that regard? Is there any statute of limitation which he regards as applying to these investigating commissions?

Mr. CROTHERS: In his report Mr. O'Connor points out that the information is not complete and he asks that an expert accountant be employed to make a further investigation. This was done before the William Davies Company ever saw or heard of the report. I quite agree with my hon. friend that it would have been better that further investigation by an expert accountant should have been made before the report was published. But the further investigation is not to be an investigation of Mr. O'Connor's work, whether it was right or not right; it is the further investigation under order in council as recommended by Mr. O'Connor in his report.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Do I understand that the minister thinks he was premature in submitting the incomplete report to the House?

Mr. CROTHERS: I admit frankly that it would have been better to have had an investigation by an expert accountant first.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Perhaps "it would have been better" is a mild way of saying that it was a grievous mistake.

Mr. CROTHERS: Characterize it as you please.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Mr. O'Connor made reports also with respect to coal, sugar and other commodities. Was his investigation complete in this or should further inquiry have been made? Perhaps these reports also were defective; perhaps he lacked some information which was not supplied by the parties interested. It is a very serious matter if the inquiry was not complete or the information given not reliable.

Mr. CROTHERS: The answers sent in concerning anthracite coal and sugar were satisfactory; it was not considered necessary to make any further investigation by an expert accountant. But my hon. friend will realize that the investigations never cease. We are getting monthly reports from all the leading coal dealers and sugar dealers and cold storage people in Canada concerning the quantity of goods in storage and the amounts bought and sold during the month in question. In that sense, therefore, the investigation continues right along, going back to the year 1913. There is an immense amount of work connected with it. The inquiry will continue right along in that sense.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister must be unconscious of what is going on. He says that it has not yet been decided whether there is going to be a further investigation by Mr. O'Connor.

Mr. CROTHERS: I did not say a further investigation by Mr. O'Connor; I said a further investigation under the order in council, by an expert accountant.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Let me read what the Prime Minister says in a telegram to the William Davies Company. A despatch from Toronto states:

This morning, the William Davies Company received a reply from Sir Robert Borden to the telegram sent the morning after the publication of the O'Connor report. Sir Robert's telegram says:

"I think it desirable that an investigation into the whole matter raised by Mr. O'Connor's report should be made by a competent judicial officer. This course I propose to direct."
(Signed) "R. L. Borden."

Mr. CROTHERS: Is the word "judicial" there?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes—"by a competent judicial officer." The minister was not aware of that?

Mr. CROTHERS: I have seen the telegram.

Mr. PUGSLEY: But the minister did not know the word "judicial" was in it.

Mr. CROTHERS: I read the whole telegram, but I do not think the term "judicial officer" is necessarily confined to a judge.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What is the meaning of the term "judicial officer" if it does not mean a judge?

Mr. CROTHERS: I do not think it is confined to a judge.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What class of officers would it cover?

Mr. CROTHERS: I do not propose entering into a discussion as to the definition of the term.

Mr. CARVELL: A lawyer of ten years' standing might come under that.

Mr. McKENZIE: Does the minister make any inquiry as to the wages paid by contractors who have large contracts with the Home Government for supplying war munitions?

Mr. CROTHERS: I understand that the Imperial Munitions Board does not insert in any of its contracts what is known as a detailed schedule giving the schedule of wages or the general fair-wage clause; but when any complaints are made to us—and there have been a few, although not many—we have made an inquiry and then taken the matter up with the chairman of the Imperial Munitions Board, and he has gone, in at least one case, so far as to cancel the contract because the contractor refused to pay the wages that we found were current in the neighbourhood and which we thought should be paid. When any complaint is made regarding wages we make inquiries just as we do in the case of contracts let by our Government.

Progress reported.

[Mr. Pugsley.]

On motion of Hon. Mr. Doherty, the House adjourned at 11.12 p.m.

Saturday, July 21, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

FORBIDDEN CIRCULATION IN CANADA.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to draw the attention of the Government to a matter I brought to its notice on July 18th, in connection with the book "The Fiddlers," and its prohibition in Canada. I said:

I desire to ask the Government under what paragraph of these consolidated orders this notice has been issued, and in respect of what portion of the matter contained in this book?

I would like to ask if the Government is prepared to give an answer to that question.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): The subject to which my hon. friend alludes is under the consideration of the Committee on Censorship. A report has been received from the Deputy Chief Censor setting forth the reasons why it was thought desirable and necessary to take the action which was taken. That report, together with the report from the Under Secretary of State, will be considered immediately by the Committee of the Privy Council to whom these matters are referred.

Mr. OLIVER: May I ask if the report will answer the questions I have asked?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not know whether it would be desirable or necessary to set out all those portions of the book which might sustain the action, if the action should be sustained. I cannot say that in advance.

Mr. OLIVER: When will the report be available to the House?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Just as soon as it is made. We hope to have it in the early future.

Mr. OLIVER: I asked the Prime Minister two specific questions in regard to a specific matter, and I desire to press for an answer to those questions.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have given my hon. friend the only answer possible at the moment. I have not a sufficient recollection of the regulations to say under what particular paragraph it was done. The action was taken on the report of the Deputy Chief Censor by the Under Secretary of State, and following the inquiry of my hon. friend—which was the first knowledge I had of the matter—I asked that a report should be procured from the Deputy Chief Censor. This has been prepared for the Censorship Committee, and a further report is being made by the Under Secretary of State. Both of these reports will be referred to the Censorship Committee immediately. I cannot give any further answer at the moment.

Mr. OLIVER: The result will be laid on the table of the House in due course?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes.

Mr. MURPHY: Did I understand my right hon. friend to refer to Col. Chambers as Deputy Chief Censor? If so, who is the Chief Censor?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The Chief Censor is in England. Persons appointed for the various dominions overseas have the title of deputy chief censors. They fulfil, in the dominions for which they are appointed, the functions which are fulfilled by the Chief Censor in England.

BUSINESS PROFITS TAXATION.

DETAILS OF RESULTS ASKED FOR.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. CARVELL: I wish to ask the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) a question, and I ask it in view of the discussion which has taken place in the newspapers recently in regard to the report of Mr. O'Connor on the meat and bacon situation. When the matter of the taxation of business profits was before the House I asked the Minister of Finance to produce to the House, in the form of a return, full and detailed statements of the result of the business profits taxation. I felt that the House and the country are entitled to know not only the fact that a company or person paid so many thousand dollars of taxation, but that they should have a resumé of the report, showing the capital invested, taxation, and so on. The minister, for some reason or other, thought it would not be in the public interest if all this information were divulged. I find that on June 20 last, as reported at page 2614 of Hansard, the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) was able to give certain portions of this report, for twenty-two of the leading firms in Canada, the object being to show how much they would have paid under the new system of taxation as compared with that of the first year. If the hon. member for North Grey could go to the department and get such portions of these returns as he wished to use for his own purposes, surely the people of Canada are entitled to the whole of them. Therefore, I ask the Prime Minister if he cannot, without delay, and before this Parliament prorogues, lay upon the Table a complete detailed statement of all the returns of persons and companies who have been taxed under the business profits tax.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Did the hon. member for North Grey give the names of the firms?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes. It will be found at page 2614 of Hansard. There is a tabulated statement of 22 of them. It shows, first, the amount each concern was assessed for the accounting period from 1914 to 1915, and their amounts which they severally would have been assessed under the law as it has been changed.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Does he give the names of the companies?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes; twenty-two of them. So far as the William Davies Company, Limited, is concerned, the accounting period from April 1, 1914, to March 30, 1915, shows the amount assessed as $109,623.99, then in the column showing what the assessment would have been under the amendment of 1917, I find $223,062.08. The statement gives the same detail with regard to the other twenty-one companies. If the hon. member for North Grey could get portions of the information which he wished to use, surely the people of Canada are entitled to full information on the subject.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am afraid, in the absence of the Minister of Finance, I cannot say very much to my hon. friend, except that I will direct the attention of the minister to the matter. If the hon. member for North Grey had more information than my hon. friend has, he also had more information than I have, so my hon. friend (Mr. Carvell) and I are very much in the same boat in that regard. I do not really know what the policy of the Minister of Finance is in regard to the matter, but there seems to be some force in the observations of my hon. friend (Mr. Carvell) and I will direct the attention of the Minister of Finance to them.

EXPLANATION—MR. MACNUTT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. THOMAS MACNUTT (Saltcoats): I wish to make a statement with regard to a matter which has been discussed both in the House and among the public. It is not a matter of the most extreme importance, but I think it should be straightened out. I refer to a report of a meeting held a few days ago, at which I was present. I was approached by a reporter, and I gave him a statement of what had actually occurred at the meeting with regard to this matter. I do not know how he understood me as he did. The report in the Journal-Press is as follows:

> Mr. Thomas MacNutt, of Saltcoats, who was chairman of the Liberal caucus on Tuesday, made the following statement last night:
> "The statement made in some of the Government organs to-day that Hon George P. Graham's amendment to the extension resolution yesterday was sprung on the House without the unanimous consent of his party, and that thereby some of the Liberals who favoured the Government's conscription measure were "tricked" into an embarrassing position of opposition to the extension, is wholly without foundation in fact. The chairman of the Liberal caucus yesterday, (Mr. Thomas MacNutt,) declared to-night that Mr. Graham's amendment had been unanimously consented to by every member of the party. The only instruction was that it should not be moved as an amendment of the third reading of the conscription Bill, lest it be represented as being a motion to delay the passing or enforcement of that measure. Mr. Graham was authorized to present the amendment at the first opportunity, and no dissent was taken to his suggestion that it might be fittingly moved as an amendment to the extension resolution. Even Dr. Michael Clark who voted against the amendment last night, had previously endorsed the principle and wording of it."

I never mentioned that hon. gentleman's name at all. For fear that I shall be again misquoted, I have written out what I remember did actually occur and you will notice there is a difference.

In the first place, the caucus was very informal. No motions were put from the Chair, and no vote was taken by me as chairman on any question whatever. The hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) stated at the meeting in my hearing, and no doubt in that of others, that he had been looking for a chance to move his resolution for some time. He had thought of moving it on motion for Supply, but none had yet been made. He had also thought of moving it as an amendment to the third reading of the Military Service Bill, but had given up this idea, as it might be considered a dilatory motion. He had now decided to move it as an amendment to the extension resolution, but would drop the term "accumulated wealth" and present it in a different form with the same object in view. I am not quoting his exact words, but that is the purport of his statement as I understood it. The point is this: If the matter had been discussed as reported by the Journal-Press, the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark) must necessarily have heard it, but as it was not formally discussed, the statement merely having been made by the member for South Renfrew, it is possible that he and others might not have heard this statement and might therefore have been under the impression that no announcement in regard to the matter had been made. There was no "trickery" or anything approaching it. I do not wish to impugn the veracity of the reporter, but he got it wrong some way; I do not know how.

ENLISTMENT OF PERSONS OF FOREIGN BIRTH.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. MACNUTT: I have another matter to bring up. I gave notice yesterday to the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Edward Kemp) in regard to this question. I might have brought it up in committee but failed to do so. However, it is not too late yet. It may be of some interest to a good many people of my district. I have also written this out, and it is as follows:

I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Militia as to the enlistment of naturalized enemy country aliens, with especial reference to Ruthenians who formerly resided in the eastern provinces of Austria. My information is that recruits have not been accepted for the overseas forces for enlistment from among these people, who, if they wished to enlist, had to claim they were Russians. Is it the intention of the Government to accept persons of enemy country birth as recruits in the future, and is it the intention of the Government, under the Military Service Act, to conscript those classes of people of alien birth whom it refused to accept as volunteers?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In the ordinary course, my hon. friend's question would go on the Order Paper and the Government would have an opportunity of considering it. My hon. friend the Minister of Militia and Defence unfortunately is not here to-day. We shall be prepared to give my hon. friend an answer on Monday or Tuesday. I am not personally familiar with the facts as to whether persons of foreign birth have been refused by the recruiting officer. It is, of course, perfectly true that the British Government have been very strict as to the enlistment of persons who were born in an enemy country. On the other hand, I believe that there have been a great many people of foreign birth, possibly some of enemy nationality, who have enlisted and gone to the front. I am disposed to think that, although I am not sure. But we will have inquiries made on the subject and will give my hon. friend an answer on Monday or Tuesday.

Mr. MACNUTT: I am not criticising the policy of the Government at all; I am simply asking for information.

BOARDS OF TRADE ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Sir George Foster (Minister of Trade and Commerce), Bill No. 115, to amend the Boards of Trade Act, was read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon.

Mr. Dugald Stewart in the Chair.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Bill is not printed.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: In the meantime I may explain the Bill and we will have it on the record. This is to amend chapter 124 of the Revised Statutes, an Act respecting the incorporation of boards of trade. Section 2 of that Act, the interpretation clause, reads in part as follows:

> In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires,—"district" means and includes any judicial district, or temporary judicial district, which is set apart or constituted as such by any Act of the Parliament of Canada, or by any Act of the Legislature of any province of Canada, or by any proclamation issued under or by virtue of the provisions of any such Act.

Also:

> Any city, county, town or village, to any of which may be added one or more townships selected for that purpose.

After the word "purpose" it is proposed to put in "or any group of such municipalities or divisions." This allows a group of boards of trade, close to each other and with a centre of a considerable town or city, to amalgamate for the purposes of the various operations of a board of trade. The special occasion that brings it up is the desire for such an amalgamation between the towns of Windsor and four municipalities about it. Each one of them has a small board of trade and they have agreed to go together and work as an associated board of trade. Their membership is about 800, and it is supposed, and I think rightly, that an aggregation of this kind working in unison will make for more effective board of trade work and for carrying out the purposes of the Act to better advantage.

Mr. PUGSLEY: This is only a little Bill, but that is all the more reason why it should be printed.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have no objection to printing it. I simply made the explanation so that it would be on Hansard.

Mr. MURPHY: It is printed.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is not marked on the Order Paper as being printed.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is not printed in both French and English.

Mr. PUGSLEY: How could my hon. friend move the House into committee.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The House went into committee on the Bill and then it was pointed out that it was not printed in French. I took advantage of its being in committee to explain the Bill so that it might be before the House. I do not propose to go on. Of course, my hon. friend, being very familiar with parliamentary practice—

Mr. PUGSLEY: I always look on my file for Bills. It is really of some advantage for members to read the Bills before discussing them. Of course, if it is a matter of urgency, and it has been fully explained in committee, that might be a reason for proceeding with it now.

Progress reported.

PROTECTION OF MIGRATORY BIRDS.

On motion of Hon. W. J. Roche (Minister of the Interior) Bill No. 92, respecting a certain convention between His Majesty and the United States of America, for the protection of migratory birds in Canada and the United States, was read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon.

Mr. Douglas Stewart in the Chair.

On section 3—Definitions.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: May I ask, has this treaty been ratified by the Senate of the United States?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Is it before the United States now?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Would it not be desirable for the minister to explain what birds are meant in section 3, using ordinary common language, because I am sure the public would not know them by these names?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Most of them are common names.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not know whether the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Roche) could give any further explanation?

Mr. ROCHE: No, those are common names.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I was brought up in the country, but scores of these names are unfamiliar to me, and I never heard of them in our country. For instance, the name "flickers" is unknown to me.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Does the hon. gentleman know what the name "dowagers" means?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Oh yes. Somebody may be able to inform the House later on, if the Bill becomes law.

Mr. ROCHE: These are the names ordinarily given to them. They are called migratory as distinct from resident birds.

Section agreed to.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The usefulness of this law will depend largely upon joint action on the part of the American and Canadian Governments. The Governor in Council here takes power to make regulations prohibiting the killing of birds. But I think that the birds mentioned in subsection (c) of this section—bobolinks, catbirds, chickadees, cuckoos, flickers, flycatchers, grosbeaks, humming birds, kinglets, etc., should not be killed under any circumstances. I suppose it is the intention to provide that they shall not be killed, if that is not already provided for.

Mr. ROCHE: It is in the treaty. Article 2, subsection 2, says:

> The season for hunting shall be further restricted to such period not exceeding three and one-half months as the High Contracting Powers may severally deem appropriate and define by law or regulation.

It is provided under article 2 that the season for hunting shall be arranged as between set dates. The close season is to be three and one-half months. This period of three and one-half months shall be established at any time between 1st September and 10th March, to suit local conditions.

Mr. COPP: What effect will this legislation have upon provincial legislation for the protection of game?

Mr. ROCHE: The draft of the treaty was submitted to all the provincial legislatures, and approved. The treaty itself, after it was signed, and the Bill, were also submitted to the provincial legislatures. Some of the provincial legislatures have adopted legislation approving the steps taken in this respect and have passed their Game Acts in accordance with the conditions of the treaty. Others have promised to do so at the next session.

Mr. COPP: I assume that the matter has been submitted to the provincial executives.

Mr. ROCHE: We have communications from the executives stating that it is their intention to introduce legislation confirming this at the next session.

Mr. COPP: The New Brunswick game law was amended at the last session of the provincial legislature, not in accordance with this proposed legislation. The game birds in New Brunswick are a source of revenue to the province; regulations are made and licenses issued for the shooting of game birds.

Mr. ROCHE: This will not interfere with that at all.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I notice that in the treaty the prohibition of the killing of migratory and insectivorous birds is made absolute. It reads as follows:

> The close season on migratory insectivorous birds shall continue throughout the year.

And that I approve. I call attention, however, to the fact that in subsection (b) of section 4, my hon. friend takes power to make regulations for the granting of permits to kill or take migratory game, migratory insectivorous and migratory non-game birds, or their nests or eggs. I imagine the intent is not to grant licenses for the killing of these migratory and insectivorous birds, because in the treaty the killing of these birds under any circumstances is prohibited.

Mr. ROCHE: I shall read to the right hon. gentleman article 7 of the treaty. It is as follows:

> Permits to kill any of the above-named birds which, under extraordinary conditions, may become seriously injurious to the agricultural or other interests in any particular community, may be issued by the proper authorities of the High Contracting Powers under suitable regulations prescribed therefor by them respectively, but such permits shall lapse or may be cancelled, at any time when, in the opinion of said authorities, the particular exigency has passed, and no birds killed under this article shall be shipped, sold, or offered for sale.

Mr. COPP: The minister says that this legislation will have no effect upon provincial game laws. Suppose the Dominion Government makes the open season different from the open season in the province; will that not cause difficulty?

Mr. ROCHE: I shall read some correspondence that has been had with the Government of New Brunswick in respect to this matter. Here is one letter:

With further reference to your letter of the 20th of March last respecting:

"A proposal made by the United States Government for a convention between Great Britain and the United States for the protection of migratory birds in the United States and Canada."

I herewith enclose you a letter from Mr. Loggie, Deputy Minister of Lands and Mines.

It appears the laws now in force in this province for the protection of birds and game embrace almost everything included in the convention proposed and very little change would be required, if a convention were adopted.

I note that the constitutionality of the Act of March 4th, 1913, passed by the United States Congress, was doubtful; whether this question has been settled by the courts I do not know. A similar difficulty will be found in legislating in Canada. The laws upon this subject come within the jurisdiction of the different provinces.

The establishment of refuges referred to in Article 4 of the draft convention has at different times been discussed here and I trust that in the near future, action may be taken to establish these refuges.

Another communication is as follows:

Referring to the enclosed correspondence received through you on the 15th inst., with regard to the proposed conference for the protection of migratory and insectivorous birds, I have had reference to the correspondence with your honour and the Deputy Minister of Lands and Mines dated 24th of April, 1914.

The only inquiry called for in the enclosed correspondence is that contained on the third page of the commercial paper No. 95 from Sir Cecil Spring-Rice, British Ambassador at Washington, to the Hon. Sir Edward Grey, Bart., K.C., dated April 30th, 1914, namely a close season for plover in New Brunswick. The date suggested by the conference is from September first to January first. If reference is made to the enclosed proclamation of the President of the United States on the close season for plover it will be shown that an exception is made of the states of Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Rhode Island and Long Island by allowing the open season for plover to commence August 15th or the same date as is now in force by the game laws of this province. I am, therefore, of the opinion no change in our game laws is required to keep them in harmony with what is proposed by the convention.

Mr. COPP: Under section 4 the Governor in Council may make such regulations as may be deemed expedient for the protection of migratory game, etc. If the Governor in Council passes a regulation making the close season for certain game between certain dates and the provincial legislature of New Brunswick specifies totally different dates for that purpose, the result will be that a man may be poaching so far as Dominion legislation is concerned, but absolutely within his rights under the provincial law.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: If there is a clash between legislation passed by the provincial parliaments and regulations passed under this measure I presume the provincial legislation will go by the board, and the regulations passed under this legislation will be effective. I think, however, this is very proper legislation. Article 7 of the treaty says:

Permits to kill any of the above-named birds which, under extraordinary conditions, may become seriously injurious to the agricultural or other interests in any particular community—

Does the minister apprehend any danger of that kind from bird life to-day?

Mr. ROCHE: For example, in Saskatchewan cranes are occasionally injurious to grain. In British Columbia geese, pigeons and robins are sometimes injurious to agriculture. In other parts of Canada mergansers may destroy young fish. To meet all such cases where a bird, which is ordinarily useful to agriculture, or innocuous, becomes injurious to agriculture or other interests, permits may be given to kill such species so long as they may be injurious.

Mr. MARCIL: Has the minister had any correspondence with the Quebec Government on this matter?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

Mr. MARCIL: What did they say?

Mr. ROCHE: They approved it at the last session of the legislature.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Did the minister have any communication with the Nova Scotian government with regard to this matter?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Is this legislation satisfactory to that government?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes, it is at the present time. An objection was raised, but the legislation had been amended to their satisfaction since. The Quebec Government have sent a communication stating that

> The Province of Quebec welcomes this treaty, and will endeavour to carry out its provisions affording uniform protection throughout the greater part of the North American continent.

Mr. MARCIL: The crow is a nuisance down in eastern Canada.

Mr. ROCHE: That bird is not in the treaty.

Mr. COPP: I have no objection to this legislation, but I would like to know what effect it is going to have on provincial legislation, and my hon. friend has not answered me in regard to that matter. This Bill says that the Governor in Council may make certain regulations in regard to migratory birds. The province of New Brunswick has certain laws in regard to game birds and it has been very careful and jealous in looking after the game birds in that province for a number of years past. The Governor in Council, after the passage of this measure, may make an arrangement as to the close season for game birds. But the provincial government cannot change their regulations—that is in the hands of the provincial legislature, and at any session of the provincial legislature of New Brunswick the dates of the close season may be changed. For instance, at the last session of the New Brunswick legislature, the game season for black duck was extended by an amendment to the Act from 1st to 15th September. I want to find out whether by the passing of this Act the provincial legislation in regard to this matter goes absolutely by the board, and the whole protection of the game birds is to be afforded under this legislation. You cannot have dual control.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: You can have the two pieces of legislation if they agree with each other.

Mr. COPP: But the dates may be changed very quickly.

Mr. ROCHE: The New Brunswick government have already assented to the principles of this treaty, and when regulations are to be formulated, they will be formulated in consultation with the members of the provincial executive. The same difficulty arises in connection with the state governments of the United States. All the state governments exercise jurisdiction in regard to the various provincial laws, and the only way in which this matter can be satisfactorily dealt with is by making a treaty with the United States authorities as, under the British North America Act, we are entitled to do.

Mr. COPP: I do not think my hon. friend understands the point I am making. Under this legislation the Governor in Council makes regulations for the protection of migratory birds. My hon. friend must not forget that the provincial government cannot make regulations as can be done by the Governor in Council under this legislation, but the legislature can change the regulations. If you make regulations along certain lines, making the close season between certain dates, that might agree with the present legislation of the different provincial legislatures, but when a provincial legislature meets again, it may make amendments that will be absolutely different from these regulations, and, as you are having dual control—dual officers, one under the Governor in Council under this legislation and the other under the provincial statute—there would be a clash at once.

Mr. ROCHE: Does the hon. gentleman think that the provincial legislature would, in violation of the agreement entered into in behalf of the province by their government, change their stand on this question? For they have already consented to the game laws under this treaty being taken over and exercised by the Dominion Government?

Mr. COPP: How have they consented?

Mr. ROCHE: Through the proper executive representing the province.

Mr. COPP: I understand the Deputy Minister of Lands and Mines of New Brunswick has written a letter, but he is absolutely without any authority whatever; he is not responsible to the people or the legislature. He is just a local man selected for and appointed to that position.

Mr. ROCHE: What does the hon. gentleman suggest?

Mr. COPP: I am not suggesting anything. I am not speaking against this legislation; I am only asking for information to find out what position the provinces are going to be in after this legislation is passed. This may be very proper legislation, but I know something about the game laws of New Brunswick, and I know that if this legislation is placed on the statute book, and the Governor in Council makes regulations, perhaps this year they will be in accord with the Game Act of the province, but next year that Act may be changed, and as you would have dual control, you would not get along harmoniously.

Mr. MARCIL: Will the Dominion legislation override that of the provinces if such a condition should arise?

Mr. ROCHE: The provinces all consented to this legislation being carried out by the Dominion under the provisions of this treaty.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Appointment and powers of game officers:

Mr. MARCIL: Will one set of game officers be appointed by the provinces and another set by the Dominion?

Mr. ROCHE: I might say this Bill has merely been handed over to the Interior Department for administration. I had personally nothing to do with the making of the treaty. That was all done by the officers of the Department of Agriculture, and I have to depend upon them for my information. I am informed that it is proposed to administer the regulations under this Act with the assistance of the provincial governments so far as may be possible, and to utilize their administrative machinery. With this end in view certain of the provincial governments—Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta—have already brought their regulations into line with the provisions of the treaty. Others have signified their intention of doing so when the Dominion legislation has been enacted. It is not intended to duplicate the existing game protection staffs employed by the provincial Governments, but to use them as far as we can by appointing the provincial game officers to be game officers under this Act.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: If what my hon. friend has outlined is carried out, I think it will cerainly help in the proper administration of the Act. In the province of Quebec we have officers for the protection of game, but, so far as my information goes, no officers for the protection of bird life. I think if the Act is administered with the concurrence of these game officers, it will be effective.

Mr. MARCIL: In the province of Quebec there has often been a conflict of jurisdiction as between the Dominion and provincial authorities over the fisheries. All the courts in the realm have pronounced on the question, and there is now a case on the way to the Privy Council. It would be unfortunate if the same thing should occur in connection with this Act. I agree with the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) that if concurrent action can be arranged for between the provinces and the Dominion it would be highly desirable.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I presume the minister intends that all the provincial regulations will be repealed that conflict with these regulations. In Nova Scotia we have regulations, for instance, as to the date beyond which partridges and birds of that kind shall not be shot.

Mr. ROCHE: Partridges are not migratory and therefore do not come under this Act.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I have been told by certain people who understand all about game in the Maritime Provinces, or who think they do, that birds that nest on the coast should be protected from destruction, while the birds that simply alight there for rest and food on their way north to Labrador and other points should be allowed to be taken. Of course, if you kill the nesting birds you destroy their progeny.

Mr. ROCHE: All migratory birds such as my hon. friend speaks of are protected under this legislation.

Mr. MARCIL: Will the regulations be distributed by the Dominion Government just as the regulations are distributed by the provincial governments? In my constituency they are printed in both languages and reach all the huntsmen.

Mr. ROCHE: Arrangements will be made in that respect. The Dominion Government will circulate the regulations.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Subsection 2 of section 5 says:

> Every game officer who is authorized by the minister to exercise the powers of a Justice of the Peace or of a police constable shall, for all the purposes of this Act and the regulations, be ex officio a Justice of the Peace or a police constable, as the case may be, within the district within which he is authorized to act.

I think it is vicious legislation to allow the game officers, who are the prosecutors, to try the cases and pronounce judgment. That would be tantamount to a man bringing an action and trying it himself. That system has been followed in regard to the fisheries in the past, and has worked out very badly indeed. I think it would be best to try the cases before an independent Justice of the Peace, of whom there is no scarcity in the eastern provinces. If the game officers are to try the cases themselves, it would be just as if a policeman in Ottawa arrested a man, took him to the police station, tried the case himself, and found the man guilty.

Mr. ROCHE: It is not the intention to utilize these officers as justices of the peace in places where a justice of the peace is available, but my hon. friend knows that in outlying parts of the country a justice of the peace cannot be found, and it is in these exceptional cases, in order to avoid great expense and loss of time, that the game officer will be ex officio a justice of the peace. This is already done in connection with our Game Act in the Northwest Territories.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The game officer would not try the case if a justice of the peace were available?

Mr. ROCHE: No.

Mr. SINCLAIR: How many persons does the minister propose to appoint under this Act, and what is the estimated cost of its administration?

Mr. ROCHE: It is impossible for me to say at this stage, because the machinery has not yet been provided. The Act will be administered by the Parks Branch of the Interior Department, which will also administer the Northwest Game Act which is now on the Order Paper.

Mr. MARCIL: Are those men paid by the season, or are they paid according to the work they do?

Mr. ROCHE: Some of them are paid an annual salary.

Section agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I report the Bill?

Mr. COPP: I would like to refer the minister to Article II of the schedule. At the last session of the New Brunswick legislature the end of the close season was fixed for 15th September. Under this article it is made 1st September. If this legislation is passed and you appoint your officers, and the people begin shooting, say black duck, on 1st September, the local authorities will step in and say: "It is against our law, because the close season runs until 15th September."

Mr. ROCHE: The hon. member misinterprets the article. The open season shall be any time between 1st September and 10th March, not exceeding three and a half months.

Mr. COPP: But the article puts it the other way. It says that it shall between 10th March and 1st September.

Mr. ROCHE: That is the close season.

Mr. COPP: After September 1 it must be the open season.

Mr. ROCHE: When do you say the open season begins?

Mr. COPP: Fifteenth September, under the new Brunswick law. This article stipulates that the close season is from 10th March to 1st September.

Mr. ROCHE: The close season on migratory game birds shall be between 10th March and 1st September, according to this article. Then the season for hunting shall be further restricted to such period, not exceeding three and one-half months, as the high contracting parties may severally deem appropriate and define by law or regulation. The season for hunting could begin on 15th September.

Mr. COPP: Can it not begin on 1st September under the terms of this article?

Mr. ROCHE: There does seem to be a contradiction. The officer points out to me that it cannot begin before 1st September.

Mr. COPP: That is perfectly true, but under the provincial law it does not begin until the 15th. I am sure this conflict as to date will cause trouble.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Would there really be any trouble? If the two parties are working in unison, as they have been so far, they could certainly deal with this matter without any difficulty. As I understand it, under this law the shooting season may commence on 1st September. In New Brunswick it does not commence until the 15th. It seems to me it is the easiest thing in the world for the Dominion Government to make provision for that, and so arrange that the shooting shall not commence until the 15th September. As it is, we say it shall not commence before the 1st, but that does not mean it shall not be made still later.

Mr. COPP: I do not think my hon. friend has the wording of the clause before him. It sets forth very clearly that the close season on migratory birds shall be between 10th March and 1st September.

Mr. ROCHE: That is the minimum.

Mr. COPP: According to this article surely the hunting season in the province of New Brunswick for migratory birds may commence on 1st September.

Mr. ROCHE: Not necessarily.

Mr. COPP: Then, I cannot understand the English language. Under the provincial law it only opens on the 15th. It was the first until the last session of the New Brunswick Parliament. Now you have your officer under this Act making 1st September the beginning of the open season and the provincial officer, under provincial legislation, making it the 15th. There is bound to be misunderstanding and trouble.

Mr. ROCHE: The minimum of the close season is from 10th March to 1st September, but the close season may extend beyond that. The open season may be any three and a half months between 1st September and 10th March. The local officer can name any date; he can start on 15th September or 1st September, and he can choose any three and a half months between 1st September and 10th March.

Mr. COPP: The minister is putting it the wrong way. It is from 10th March to 1st September, not from 1st September to 10th March.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

REMOVAL OF INDIANS ON SYDNEY RESERVE.

The House went into Committee on the following proposed resolution:

That the following, being the findings of the Judge of the Exchequer Court made on the 15th day of March, A.D., 1916, under the provisions of section 49a of the Indian Act as enacted by the Statutes of 1911, chapter fourteen, be approved:—

"1. That it is expedient, having regard to the interest of the public and of the Indians located on the small Sydney Reserve in the City of Sydney, in the Province of Nova Scotia, that the said Indians should be removed from such Reserve;

"2. That the compensation fixed by the said Judge should be paid respectively to the individual Indians of the band for the special loss or damages sustained by them in respect of their buildings or improvements upon the Reserve, or an adjustment be made for their claims in respect thereof, and a suitable new Reserve be obtained for them before they be removed from or disturbed in the possession of the present Reserve;

"3. That the Indians should, on their removal be treated with great consideration and kindness and that such removal should be made quietly, without undue haste, trouble or inconvenience to the Indians after the selection of a new Reserve and the payment of compensation for their buildings or improvements."—Mr. Roche.

(Mr Dugald Stewart in the Chair.)

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is there any explanation of this resolution? Who supports it; where does the suggestion come from?

Hon. W. J. ROCHE (Minister of the Interior): I explained this in brief when the Estimates of the department of Indian Affairs were up. There have been representations made for years past by various parties to the Indian department with regard to this matter. There is a small reserve situated right in the heart of the city of Sydney.

Mr. MARCIL: What is the area?

Mr. ROCHE: In the neighbourhood of two acres. There are about 125 Indians and the reserve is very congested. The condition has been complained of and efforts have been made on numerous occasions to have the Indians give a willing surrender of the reserve. Owing, however, to the fact that it is very convenient for them, as most of them, not being of a nomadic character, are working the coke and steel ovens, they would not surrender it. We are now proceeding under the provisions of an amendment to the Indian Act introduced by my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) when Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, that where, in a town of more than 8,000 population, the Indians will not willingly surrender, and the existence of the reserve there becomes a public nuisance or when, for the public welfare or for public purposes, it is deemed necessary to secure the Indian property, the matter may be referred to a judge of the Exchequer court. Under the provisions of that Act Judge Audette visited Sydney, took evidence, and made his report in accordance with the Indian Act. That report was laid on the Table some weeks ago. Judge Audette reports that unmistakably the Indians should be removed from this reserve. The members who are acquainted with the condition of affairs there are quite in agreement. I heard the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) express himself in that way as well as other members. The judge recognized that a new reserve should be secured for the Indians, and he visited and inspected three several sites and recommended any one of the three.

Mr. MARCIL: In the same province?

Mr. ROCHE: Right adjacent to the same city, the object being to remove the Indians from the heart of the city. Under the provisions of the Indian Act we would remove these Indians to one of these sites, sell the property by auction and devote the proceeds to the benefit of the Indians. We will be compelled to remove the Indians' houses and to locate them on the new reserve. It is not my intention, however, to go any further with this question this year, because I do not intend to introduce any appropriation to cause an expenditure, as I think the matter might well be left over until next session or until after the war. I placed the report of the judge upon the table and Parliament is supposed to approve or disapprove of the judge's finding. I am not going to ask Parliament to go any further this session.

Mr. MARCIL: Can this land be used for any public purpose?

Mr. ROCHE: It will be sold by public auction. It is in the neighbourhood of two acres; an estimate has been placed upon it and it will be offered at an upset price. Being in the heart of the city, it is a fairly valuable piece of property.

Mr. SINCLAIR: How many Indians are there on this reserve?

Mr. ROCHE: One hundred and twenty-two.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I see that the resolution provides that payment shall be made respectively to the individual Indians of the band?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Does that mean that the children get a share as well as the grown-ups?

Mr. ROCHE: These proceeds are for improvements. There are houses and different families reside in these houses. The children are not taken into consideration, but only the owners.

Mr. McKENZIE: When this matter was discussed on a previous occasion, I asked the minister a few questions about the disposal of this land, and I suggested that it should be given to the city. The two acres is in the heart of the steel industry, in a very pretty place, right on the shore, and particularly suitable for a park. I suggested to the minister that it would be a proper thing to let the city have it. The hon. minister will not get very much for this land at public auction. It is the only particle of waterfront, from one limit of the city to the other, that is not taken up. It is fronting right on the harbour, with level ground, and is particularly well adapted for bathing, boat houses and that sort of thing; and it would be a great benefit to the poorer classes, who cannot go very far for that kind of enjoyment, if this land were made a public park. I brought the matter to the notice of the city of Sydney, and I assume the minister heard from them. I think they were moving in the direction of suggesting that the land should be given to the city for park purposes. I do not know whether the minister heard from them or not.

Mr. ROCHE: I do not recollect.

Mr. McKENZIE: I had letters from the city council, saying they had passed resolutions in that direction, and were going to send them to the minister. I am sorry if their communications have not reached him. In giving this little bit of ground to the city, the Government will be only following the example of the Imperial Government, who, with the consent of this Government, gave the city a park, 30 or possibly 50 acres, which was old military ground, in the northern section of the city. They gave it over, practically forever, to the city, without any fee or reward of any kind, and this being a little bit of Government property, I think it would be a very graceful thing—and I am sure the people of Sydney would be very grateful and would regard it as generous and proper on the part of the Government—to give them this little piece of ground. Of course, it might well be said that it is open to the city to buy it, but the generosity and public-spiritedness of the minister would disappear, if they simply bought it at public auction. I have received letters from very prominent leading men in Sydney, who were thankful that this matter was brought up, adopting my suggestion that this be called Roche Park, commemorating the name of our esteemed minister for all time to come. As to what shall become of the Indians, I am sure they will be properly looked after. I was not in the House when the minister was speaking, and I should like to know if he has picked out any particular site for them in the vicinity of Sydney, or is that held in abeyanace?

Mr. ROCHE: I pointed out, before the hon. gentleman came in, that it was not my intention to have any site selected immediately. The matter might well stand till the end of the war, as it would mean considerable expenditure to buy a new reserve. But the judge, in reporting upon various sites, has selected three alternate sites any of which he recommends, but it is not the intention to do anything immediately, because we are not asking any appropriation in our estimates this session for that purpose. If this were Government property I could understand the request of the hon. gentleman from Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie), but inasmuch as the Government merely holds it in trust for the Indians the Government could not confer it on the city. We would have to compensate the Indians, not only for their improvement and for moving them on a reserve, but also for the value of the property. The idea of having it recommended by the judge was that it should be sold by auction. I think the upset price recommended by the judge is $5,000, and I do not think the city would object to pay $5,000 to have a nice little park there.

Mr. GRAHAM: It might be called McKenzie Park?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes. However, inasmuch as this is not a matter for immediate action, it can be taken up later on. I do not remember any resolution coming from the city council of Sydney. It is just possible there may have been, but the deputy minister does not remember any, and I do not remember any reaching me. I ask Parliament to sanction the resolution this session, and further action will be taken later on.

Mr. McKENZIE: The Indians will not be removed this year?

Mr. ROCHE: No.

Mr. McKENZIE: From a personal standpoint, I have no more interest in this matter than the hon. minister (Mr. Roche) himself. It is not in my riding, but I would really like to see that little bit of ground given to the city for a park. I would suggest to the minister that, before putting it up at auction, he should negotiate privately with the city, because if $5,000 is regarded as a sufficient price, possibly private negotiations can be conducted between the officials and mayor of the city and the department without putting it up at auction at all.

Resolution reported.

GAME IN NORTHWEST TERRITORIES.

On motion of Hon. W. J. ROCHE, Bill 100, respecting game in the Northwest Territories of Canada was read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon.

Mr. Dugald Stewart in the Chair.

On section 1—Short title:

Mr. MARCIL: What is the general purpose of this Bill?

Mr. ROCHE: The game in the Northwest Territories is being decimated by hunters rather indiscriminately. It has come to our ears that certain Americans were going into the north country, organizing parties, and engaging the local Indians there and others, to their own commercial advantage, and we felt that we should take some action to preserve the wild animal life in that country, so that it may not be depleted as it has been in other parts, particularly Alaska. For that reason it was deemed expedient to introduce a new Game Act for the Northwest Territories, and to appoint officials for its enforcement.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Regulations.

Mr. OLIVER: This section empowers the Governor in Council to make regulations prohibiting, controlling or restricting the hunting, destroying, injuring, trapping, taking, capturing or molesting of game. If this Government in its wisdom considers that there should be a prohibtion of the killing of game, it should present its proposals to Parliament; Parliament should pass upon them, and they should become an Act of Parliament. They should not be subject to change without notice, as they are when they are made effective by regulation. It is only right that the person who, coming, perhaps, from some other country for the purpose, desires to hunt for sport or for scientific or other purposes in this Northwest country, should know by statute what his privileges are. If the law is left so that it may be changed from time to time, as it can be under this provision, a man of wealth, we will say, who desires to hunt in the Northwest may make his arrangements, provide for his expenditure, take every step necessary towards the putting on of a hunting party—and at the last moment find that the law is changed and that his preparations have been in vain. On the other hand, the people of that North country are not closely in touch with affairs here in Ottawa, and they are entitled to know, by means that there can be no question about, what their rights are in regard to the killing of game. Upon the killing of game a large proportion of the people depend for their livelihood; all the people there depend upon it for the general business of the community. Because the Northwest Territories are far away; because the population is small and scattered, is no reason why hardship and injury would not be suffered there under certain conditions as they would be suffered in any other part of the country; and there is no reason why the people there should be placed at a disadvantage as compared with the people of any other part of the country. Under this law some wise man may drop into Ottawa some fine day and, having secured an interview with the Minister of the Interior, may suggest to him that a certain change should be made in the law. Under this section, if I read it correctly, the minister may then make a recommendation to Council, and Council may agree that the law shall be changed—perhaps in such a way as to affect very materially the interests of the people in that country. There is no way of giving them notice of that change; the first notice they have is the action of a police officer in arresting and fining for the infraction of the law a man who had no knowledge of the law—the law itself, perhaps, not being properly applicable to the country. The less law there is and the fewer applications of law there are in a country where it is difficult to enforce the law, the better for the credit of the Government and the better for the welfare of the people. If it is necessary to provide further restrictions than those that exist there, let them be provided by Act of Parliament, so that all parts of the country will know what the law is and what it is going to be, at least until Parliament in its wisdom sees fit to change it. The proposals contained in section 4 are not necessary; they are liable —I might almost say, certain—to create great hardship both to the people who are living in that country and to the interests that are interwoven with the welfare of those people.

Mr. ROCHE: This is no new departure. Practically all the provinces have taken similar powers to make regulations under order of the Lieutenant Governor in Council. Conditions are changing from time to time; the point raised by the member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) has been very carefully considered. The officers of the department entered into a consultation with the members of the Northwest Mounted Police and with what is known as the Wild Life Commission, the membership of which includes Dr. Hewitt, Mr. White, of the Conservation Commission, and Mr. Anderson, of the Geological Survey, who has been on the Stefansson expedition. These men have recommended that this be done by regulation under Order in Council rather than by statute. As the hon. member says, the district concerned is a remote part of the country. These gentlemen, however, do not look at the matter as my hon. friend does; they feel that greater advantage results from adopting the principle of regulation by Order in Council. I shall read what has been done in some other provinces in order to show that similar powers to those which we are asking for here have been taken by the various provincial governments:

This section gives the Governor General in Council power to make regulations calculated to effectually conserve the wild life of the North. With regard to a country so remote it would be unsatisfactory to attempt to make hard and fast statutory provisions covering the various matters dealt with. Investigations have to be carried on to determine just what regulations may be necessary to conserve wild life and at the same time to permit of reasonable commercial exploitation. Conditions are rapidly changing and it is desirable that there should be power to change the law to meet changing conditions. For instance there is now a threatened invasion of expert hunters from Alaska, with the latest modern equipment. Such an invasion might in a short time exterminate the game in large areas. This is a new condition. From the South there has commenced an invasion of small pedlar traders whom it is necessary to control, because some of them may carry on business in a way seriously detrimental to the natives and the game. Moreover, there has also commenced an invasion of white trappers who have been using poison and who have carried on business on a basis of the greatest possible profit regardless of the future of the game. These are given as instances of the changing conditions.

The necessity of power to make and vary regulations is specially desirable in a remote country like the North, in regard to which only a limited amount of information is available. While in the other parts of Canada there is not the same necessity for control by regulation the practice is to delegate a good deal of power in the form of regulations.

The Fisheries Act (R.S. Chap. 45) gives the Governor in Council extensive powers. Section 54 gives authority to make regulations:

(a) For the better management and regulation of the sea coast and inland fisheries.

(b) To prevent or remedy the obstruction or pollution of streams.

(c) To regulate and prevent fishing.

(d) To prohibit the destruction of fish.

(e) To forbid fishing except under authority of leases or licenses.

The Ontario Act gives the Lieutenant Governor in Council power to make regulations relating to:

Migratory birds, non-migratory birds; varying close season in certain outlying districts; forbidding the possession of guns and rifles; licensing guides, game preserves; sale of game for breeding purposes; exempting Indians and others from the provisions of the Act; sale of game; possession and transportation of game in the close season; issue of hunting and trapping licenses.

Alberta Game Act.—Section 6 (a) delegates to the Lieutenant Governor in Council power to make regulations regarding game reared on game farms; regarding close season for beaver, and the destruction of beaver dams and muskrat houses, and may authorize the taking or killing of any fur-bearing animal and the disposition of same, when such taking or killing or disposition is deemed to be in the public interest; and regarding the issue of licenses and permits.

Saskatchewan Game Act.—Section 9 authorises the Lieutenant Governor in Council to authorize the killing of game birds which may be destroying crops; and section 10 gives authority to suspend the Game Act in the northern portion of the province in so far as killing for food is concerned.

The minister by section 12 is given power to authorise municipalities to destroy muskrats that become a nuisance by undermining roads and bridges; and to deal with the nuisance arising from beavers causing the flooding of lands. The minister is also given power to make regulations regarding licenses.

And the same with the British Columbia Game Act, which covers much the same ground. Therefore that is a point that has been very carefully considered by the gentlemen to whom I have referred, and it was considered that, on the whole, in order to meet the conditions, it would be far preferable to have this power conferred on the Governor in Council, and to have regulations made under an Order in Council.

Mr. OLIVER: The difference between the precedent my hon. friend has read from provincial legislation and this legislation is that there is provincial legislation regarding game, and then provision is made for following up that legislation in certain specified instances. That is quite a different matter from simply handing over to the Governor in Council the right to do whatever they please in regard to game. While I do not wish to throw any discredit upon either the abilities or the motives of the officers of the Government whose names have been mentioned by the minister, their business is the protection of the animals, my business here is the protection of the people, and the recommendations made by these gentlemen in regard to the animals might be all right if there were no people concerned in the matter. My contention is that the minister, in considering the welfare of the animals, should consider the rights and interests of the people, and that cannot be done, as he apparently purposes doing, by placing in the hands of a few estimable theorists, who have no practical knowledge of the facts or of the conditions in the country affected, almost the absolute right of life and death over the people of that country. That is a most objectionable provision; it is not necessary from any point of view, and, it can result only in injury and hardship to a people who have no protection, who have no representation in this House and who are scattered far and wide. As they have no means of bringing their grievances to the attention of the authorities, I make no apology for urging the minister to revise his views in regard to this matter. Let him consult those experts in regard to what they actually propose doing that will affect the people of that country; let him bring those proposals to the House, and let members of this House, who have some knowledge of the conditions and who are interested in those people place their arguments before the House. My hon. friend says that there is a danger of an incursion of trappers from the Yukon, and there is a danger of pedlar traders from the south. I do not know that those trappers from the Yukon have not just as good a right as anybody else to trap in any part of the country, if they keep within the law, and all I ask is that they be given a knowledge of what the law is so that, being miners or labourers or prospectors or whatever they may be in the Yukon Territory they will not make their preparations for going across the Mackenzie river and, when they have got across, find they are in the hands of the police, the first move they make. I am not so much concerned with what legislation the minister wishes to bring into force, but I want him to put his legislation in the statutes, so that everybody will know what it is and will be able to govern himself accordingly.

As to the pedlar traders from the south who are pushing up into this north country, if a man is in business only on a small scale and can carry on business only as a pedlar, if my hon. friend thinks that man or his business is undesirable, let him say so in the statute, so that the man will not make his investment, whatever it may be, and spend his time for months with the result that he runs into the arms of the police and becomes punishable for an offence of which he had no knowledge and which he certainly would not have committed if he had knowledge of it. All I ask is that the minister shall deal with the people of the north country fairly and above board, so that they shall have notice in due time of what the law is and may protect themselves by observing that law. The year in that country, as everywhere else, is divided into two parts, but those two parts are not, for business purposes, subdivided again. A man makes his arrangements in the fall for the winter, and he makes his arrangements in the winter for the summer, so that this is not a matter of putting a man out of business for a week or a month, it is a matter of putting him out of business for half a year and possibly for a whole year.

Mr. ALFRED THOMPSON: I have listened to this discussion with a great deal of interest. We are far removed from the hinterland of Canada, and perhaps fail to realize how important an industry the fur-catching industry is.

Comparatively speaking, there are not a very large number of people in this country living by the fur-catching industry. But in that great belt of territory north of our provinces, from Labrador to the 141st meridian west, scattered all along the rivers and lakes are people who make their living by catching fur. That has always been so since the white man came to the north country with the Hudson Bay company. it is so to-day, and will continue to be so for decades to come. The fur industry, then, is of more or less national importance.

Mr. OLIVER: It is the first industry that made Canada.

Mr. ALFRED THOMPSON: It is the first industry that opened up the interior of Canada. I am impressed with the observations made by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), the more so because I have had some experience in dealing with a frontier country where the laws were subject to change over night by the cabinet of the day. For years the regulations governing the great gold-mining industry of the Yukon was subject to change from day to day, and sometimes they were changed overnight. As the hon. member for Edmonton has pointed out, some man with a particular interest to serve would come to Ottawa and have an interview with the Minister of the Interior, and the minister in perfectly good faith might perhaps be convinced of the necessity for a change in the regulations. The result was that those engaged in mining in the Yukon never knew from month to month where they stood with regard to the basic factor of their industry, namely, the question of title and ownership. That went on for some time, until representations were made to Parliament by myself, and as a result the regulations were examined into and reported upon, and finally codified into the Yukon Placer Mining Act. That Act has been a great boon to the territory which I represent. It seems to me, therefore, that the minister will be well advised to take into consideration the proposal of my hon. friend from Edmonton, that the regulations should be cast into the form of an Act, for it must be remembered that men very frequently go into that vast northern country with their all.

Mr. OLIVER: They always do.

Mr. A. THOMPSON: They go a long distance into the interior and depend for their living upon that industry. The fur industry is of much greater proportions than perhaps many hon. members of this committee imagine. I repeat that the minister will be well advised to take the suggestion of my hon. friend into consideration.

Mr. ROCHE: Personally, I have no particularly strong views on this subject. The advice I sought was the advice that any minister naturally would seek, that of his expert officials who have had this matter under consideration. When such an important board as the one I have referred to has been consulted, as well as the Northwest Mounted Police, and their views set forth in the memorandum submitted to me, I quite naturally, having no views to the contrary, decided to acquiesce in their recommendations. The hon. member for Edmonton states that these officials no doubt have the interests of the animal life at heart, whereas he has the interests of the people. The Government have at heart the interests both of animal life and of the people, and we wish to adopt whatever policy will conserve the animal life for the benefit of the people.

One of the essential things in connection with this Act is to protect the game of the Northwest Territories for the inhabitants of that country. It is their main source of food supply, and if any person is allowed to go in there and indiscriminately slaughter whatever he thinks fit, the Indians and the inhabitants of that enormous territory will be deprived of their food supply and will become pensioners on the Government, which would entail large appropriations by this Parliament for supplying them with food. I did not say there was an invasion of this territory by people from the Yukon, but I did mention Alaska, and we do not want a repetition of what occurred in Alaska. There they had millions of caribou, but these animals were exterminated by exploiters, and to-day the people up there are now going into the Northwest Territories. They have had to introduce reindeer into Alaska to take the place of the caribou. We are anxious to conserve the animal life, not only for the sake of the animals themselves, but to conserve the food supply of the natives. The memorandum that was prepared for me states that the Act was divided into two parts, the first giving the Governor in Council power to pass regulations concerning the close seasons, hunting, trapping, trafficking and general control of game matters. The second part deals with officers, their powers and duties, prosecutions and penalties. The control by the Governor General in Council provided for in the first part is essential, because it is impossible for any one remote from the North to put into statutory form provisions to cover the various conditions in the North. There is not sufficient information at present available. Moreover, conditions in the North are changing constantly, and it is desirable that changes in the law may be made to meet the changing conditions without each year having to amend the Act. It is the intention to adopt the provisions of our Game Act with regard to the close season and other matters, and in the meantime send an official through that country and gather all possible information before finally drawing up the regulations. If there is any very strong objection I am willing to allow the section to stand for further consideration, but the reason I sanctioned the section in its present form is that it was very carefully considered in regard to this one essential.

Mr. OLIVER: I wish the minister to understand that I am supporting any policy for the protection of the game in the North country, in the interests of the people of the North but that is not the point I am making. The point I am making is that whatever protection the minister intends to give should be placed in the statutes so that everybody would know what the law was. If I may venture to criticise, I think the very words the minister read to us a few moments ago show that the gentlemen who have discussed the matter have not appreciated the conditions, inasmuch as they give as a reason why there should be power to make changes in the law the fact that the district is inaccessible and the population sparse. That is the very reason why the law should not be changed, except from year to year by Parliament, so that everybody would have due notice of what the law was. That is the only point I am urging at the present time, and I would respectfully suggest the advisability of allowing the clause to stand and, if it is possible, let the minister bring in in place of this clause whatever proposals his advisers have for changes in the law, and those proposals may be embodied in the statute.

Mr. ROCHE: Of course, as I explained, it was not the intention to have all these regulations prepared in time to be approved this session. Would it not meet my hon. friend's views if we were to provide that whatever regulations are made by the Government in Council shall be submitted to Parliament for approval at the next session?

Mr. OLIVER: It is not that I have any curiosity to satisfy, or that it makes any difference to Parliament, but it is to get the information into such shape that the man in the North will have reasonable opportunity on knowing what the law is, so that he may avoid breaking it and getting into trouble. It must be understood that in all that country the Dominion authorities have a means of enforcing the law. They have the police officers. The duty of those police officers is to see that the law is enforced. It is not their business to discuss whether the law is good, bad or indifferent. Conditions are different from those in Ontario, where, in vast areas of the country it does not matter what the law is because there is no one to see to its enforcement. It is necessary that we should be very particular, if we want to give our people a fair chance, to afford them an opportunity of knowing what the law is, and it is necessary that there should not be frequent changes in it of which the people have not reasonable opportunity to be notified. I would ask the minister to allow the section to stand. We may discuss the general provisions recommended by his advisers for the protection of game, and embody those general provisions in the law, with the authority, if you wish, to make such additions as may be necessary from time to time by Order in Council, but let the public of the North Country know in general what you intend to do.

Section stands.

On section 7— game officers to be justices of the peace:

Mr. OLIVER: Are there provisions in the Bill in regard to the appointment of game officers, describing their duties and so on, or is it merely a matter of regulation?

Mr. ROCHE: It is a matter of regulation.

Mr. OLIVER: I hardly think it is a wise provision to have game officers ex officio justices of the peace. Wherever there is an established point of trade there are regularly appointed justices of the peace. In the old days in the Northwest Territories, when the Northwest Mounted Police were charged with all duties, there was grave objection to the mounted policeman being policeman and judge, and I think the same objection exists with regard to this proposal. I have no objection to giving him whatever legal powers may be necessary to enforce the law, or giving him such authority as will constitute him the force behind the law, but I do not think he should be made the judge.

Mr. ROCHE: This provision is not a new departure at all. It is similar to the old Act, and is intended to apply where there are no justices of the peace, and to confer on the Royal North-West Mounted Police the powers of justices of the peace. If we do not do that I am afraid there would be a good deal of inconvenience in enforcing the Act. Of course, this provision is not intended to cover game wardens. It is proposed to have two classes of officers, game officers who shall do supervising work, and game wardens who shall do only local work. Section 18 of the old Act gives to all game wardens the powers of justices of the peace. The Ontario Act, and the acts of other provinces have similar provisions.

Mr. OLIVER: I take it that under this Act it is proposed to give greater attention to the protection of game in the Northwest Territories than has been possible in the past. The old Act has been more or less a dead letter, and I assume the intention is to enforce this Act with more energy. In the North Country conditions are entirely different from those on the border line of civilization. In the Far North the only person who would be of any value in carrying out the duties of game protector or game warden would be the man who under ordinary circumstances would not be a proper person to act as a justice of the peace. I am not saying anything at all against the man, except that in all human probability he would not have that knowledge of the law or that mental outlook which would warrant him being given that responsibility. More than likely he would be a man who had been dependent upon trapping or hunting for his livelihood, and I would urge upon the minister that it is not desirable he should be given the powers of a judge. He would have to be given the power of arrest, but to give him the power of decision as well, I think, would be apt to create a very unfortunate set of conditions in many cases.

Mr. ROCHE: We would define and limit the duties of the justice of the peace.

Mr. OLIVER: Would the minister agree to allow that clause to stand and consider the suggestions I have made with a view of accepting them if possible?

Mr. ROCHE: Very well.

Section stands.

On section 9—Possession of game.

Mr. PUGSLEY: There is a great deal of force in the contention, of my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), that the man who institutes the proceedings, and thereby becomes the prosecutor, should not also be the judge. If an ordinary policeman arrests a man he becomes zealous to have him convicted. I have found that in my experience in administering the criminal law. Policemen and detectives, while naturally they may be just as fair men as can be found, when they make arrests, are anxious that their judgment should be vindicated by a conviction. If you allow the man who institutes the proceedings and arrests the individual to act as justice of the peace and to sentence the accused, you thereby make him prosecutor, judge and executioner. That is very objectionable according to all the standards of the fair administration of justice. At the same time, I realize the desirability of giving game officers the powers of a justice of the peace. Might it not be possible that the game officer should not act as a justice of the peace in any case where he has instituted the proceedings? By section 15 it is provided that:

> Any person found committing an offence against this Act may be arrested on view by any game officer, game warden or peace officer.

Where an arrest is made by a game officer he ought not to act as justice of the peace.

Mr. ROCHE: That is all right but the hon. gentleman will also recognize that in some instances men have to be taken one hundred miles to be tried by a justice of the peace other than the particular officer who makes the arrest. It is not however intended to confer these powers on a game warden but on other game officers. Similar powers have been granted to our officers in the parks and still they are instructed not to try any case if it is at all possible to secure a justice of the peace. But for the enforcement of a law of this nature it is essential that this power shall be conferred on these officers, not only from the point of view of convenience but also having regard to expenditure. It would be too bad to take a person arrested a hundred or two hundred miles in order to reach an ordinary justice of the peace. Therefore, we think it advisable to confer upon some of these officers, not the wardens, however, the powers of a justice of the peace.

Mr. OLIVER: I have not heard what the distinction is between a warden and a game officer. I notice that subsection 2 of section 8 provides for the trial of the person arrested before a game officer. Would the minister be good enough to take into consideration that along with subsection 7.

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

Section stands.

On section 10—Seizure:

Mr. OLIVER: This provides for the seizure of the plant of a trapper or hunter. Is the plant so seized forfeited, or what becomes of it?

Mr. ROCHE: This section gives the game officers and wardens authority to seize any thing from any man who commits a violation of the Act. It is similar to section 92 of the Fisheries Act, except that it provides that the articles seized shall be handed over to an officer having the authority of a justice of the peace while section 92 of the Fisheries Act goes farther and says such thing is confiscated to His Majesty. The question of confiscation of any article seized is not dealt with in this section. There is provision in the penalty clause by which any question regarding confiscation is left to the discretion of the trial justice.

Mr. OLIVER: That makes it all the more necessary that the trial should take place before a justice of the peace and that the trial should not be at the hands of the man who makes the seizure. In regard to the difficulty of administering the Act, in that north country there are certain points of trade and general missionary effort. Although the country is vast, it is only at these points that there can by any possibility be any enforcement of the law. At these points there is always, or there may easily be, a justice of the peace. An offence against the Game Act may be committed a hundred miles from that point, but at some time the man who committed that offence must come to that point. He cannot stay out in the wilds all the time, he must come out there and then he comes within reach of the administration of the law and may suffer his punishment accordingly, if the game warden or officer has evidence against him. There is not that difficulty about the enforcement of the law that has possibly been in the minds of those who have drawn these provisions. I would again urge that when you undertake, as you do here, to confiscate a boat or other property that a man may have, which means his living, or the living of his family—means to him everything that millions would mean to many people in this outside country—the power should not be placed in the hands of a man except one whom the Government has every reason to believe is a responsible officer and one upon whose sound judgment they can absolutely depend. It is a very serious matter to confiscate horses, dogs, wagons, sleighs, boats, skiffs, canoes, punts and vessels. In that country, where people have to live and support their families on the results of the chase or of the fishery, it is a terrible power to put in the hands of any one. Besides urging that it should not be put in the hands of any one except a person of thoroughly well established responsibility, I really think there should be some restriction in regard to the value of the plant or appurtenances which could be confiscated.

Suppose a team of horses or a boat were confiscated; there is no limitation on the kind of boat. It might be a motor or power boat of some kind. I think the power of confiscation should not be exercised at all. The individual who has committed the offence might be subject to a fine, and the plant in his possession might be seized subject to payment of that fine, as security for the fine, but if, in addition to any fine you may impose upon him, you destroy his means of livelihood, you are taking extreme action, and it is not necessary.

Mr. ROCHE: You can find it in the other Act.

Mr. OLIVER: I am aware that it is in other Acts, and it is because of the instances of terrible hardship that have come to my notice, as a result of the enforcement of the other Acts, that I am taking the opportunity to urge upon the minister that he should reconsider this matter with the gentlemen whom he has consulted in regard to it, and see if they would not take another view of the matter. The man who offends against the law is liable to a fine, and his plant may be seized, subject to the payment of that fine, but I do not think that his actual living and that of his family should be destroyed because he has made himself amenable to the law. That is pursuing a man to a degree that the conditions do not demand; it is not necessary.

Mr. ROCHE: Does the hon. gentleman want this section to stand?

Mr. OLIVER: I would urge strongly that it should stand, with the view of considering the suggestion I have made.

Section stands.

On section 11—Penalty for offences by officers.

Mr. OLIVER: The minimum penalty here seems very high. I will certainly admit that the officer who commits a breach of his duty should be subject to serious penalty. He is in a different position altogether from a private citizen. I would not raise any objection to it, but I desire to call attention to the fact that the minimum penalty is $100.

Mr. ROCHE: Unless the penalty were made very severe, there might be a temptation to infractions of the law.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: These men are officers of the Government.

Mr. OLIVER: I am willing, in the charity of my heart, not to punish even officers of this Government too severely.

Section agreed to.

On section 13—Refusing information or giving false information.

Mr. OLIVER: Is this penalty not very severe? Every citizen is subject to inquisitorial proceedings under this section. That might be all right in the case of an infraction of a very serious law, such as the law against murder or robbery, but it seems to me in the case of the enforcement of the Game Act, it is certainly a very extreme penalty.

Mr. ROCHE: I think that the words "furnish information" might be stricken out, but we should retain the provision in regard to "wilfully furnishing false information."

Mr. OLIVER: I quite agree to that.

[Mr. Oliver.]

Mr. ROCHE: I move that we strike out the words "wilfully refusing to furnish, or."

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 16—Justice may convict on view.

Mr. OLIVER: This again brings in the game officer, giving him the power of a justice. I would like the minister (Mr. Roche) to reconsider that.

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

Section stands.

On section 17—Separate offences.

Mr. OLIVER: What is the idea of constituting the possession of a separate part of any animal a separate offence?

Mr. ROCHE: It might be considered profitable for a man to kill a large number of animals, if the killing of each animal did not constitute a separate offence. He might figure on making several thousand dollars, if the penalty were the same as if one animal had been killed.

Mr. OLIVER: I am referring to the words "or separate part thereof." If a deer were killed and cut into quarters each man having a quarter would be guilty of an offence.

Mr. ROCHE: A person might have in his possession a portion of an animal, without having the whole animal. The possession of a separate part would constitute an offence.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If one man had a leg he would be guilty.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: He might have eaten a quarter of the animal.

Mr. OLIVER: Supposing a deer were brought into the camp and divided up amongst the friends of the man who killed it, every one of them would be subject to the full penalty, yet none of them would be in any sense guilty. That very frequently happens.

Mr. ROCHE: This provision applies only where an infraction of the law has been committed and a separate part of an animal has been found in a man's possession. I do not think it would apply to a case where a man who has committed no offence innocently becomes possessed of a portion of an animal.

Mr. OLIVER: A lack of knowledge of a breach of the law would not excuse a man, under the wording of the Act. I appreciate the difficulty of meeting the case, but I am anxious not to make the law so drastic that there will be a combination against its enforcement. That is what is liable to take place when a law is made too comprehensive or too severe. Will the minister consider that?

Mr. ROCHE: The executive have gone over this section several times and have drafted it as carefully as possible. However, I will allow it to stand.

Mr. OLIVER: The difficulty is that the gentlemen who have been advising the minister are, perhaps, not familiar with the actual conditions on the ground.

Section stands.

On section 19—Penalties.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is it necessary or desirable to make the minimum penalty as great as it is? Indeed, is it necessary to fix any minimum penalty at all? Section 12 provides:

> Any person who assaults, obstructs or interferes with any game officer, game warden, constable or other peace officer in the discharge of any duty under the provisions of this Act or of any regulation, shall be guilty of a violation of this Act.

Section 19 applies to all cases for which no other penalty is provided. Under subsection (a), if in the excitement of the moment, a man committed a very slight offence in the way of resisting an officer, a penalty of not less than $100 would be inflicted. I should think that the minimum penalty might very well be left to the discretion of the justice of the peace in such cases. I am sure that in many cases the game officer or justice of the peace would feel that a small penalty of from $5 to $20 would amply meet the case.

Mr. ROCHE: Subsection (a) refers to offences respecting wild mammals in sanctuaries or in regard to which there is no open season. It is felt that a more severe penalty should be enacted in such instances. Paragraph (d) is as follows:

> A fine not exceeding one hundred dollars or less than ten dollars or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding two months or to both fine and imprisonment for any other offence against this Act or any regulation.

It is not desirable to leave too much latitude to justices of the peace in inflicting these penalties. If they have the statute to guide them, they are less liable to err than if the matter is left to their own discretion.

Mr. PUGSLEY: In cases which are clearly not wilful violations of the statute, a ten dollar or twenty dollar penalty might amply cover the offence. In such cases the magistrate has no discretion, though he is given discretion as between the $100 and $500, the minimum and maximum fines. I rather think that the minimum amount should be left out altogether.

Mr. ROCHE: Some of these animals are near the point of extermination, and unless a severe penalty is provided, still further destruction will take place. I think that as a deterrent it is better to provide a minimum fine of $100 than to leave the matter to the discretion of the game officer or justice of the peace.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think, with the member for Edmonton, that if you make the penalty too severe you really prevent the carrying out of the law, because you tend to bring about a combination of people in the locality to prevent the enforcement of the law. Many a man might be absolutely ruined by the inflicting of so large a penalty; whereas if the matter were left to the game warden or to the magistrate, very much better results would be accomplished.

Mr. ROCHE: In several of the provinces the minimum penalties are in excess of the amount provided for under this Act. In Alberta there is a maximum penalty of $500 and a minimum of $200 for killing certain animals. In British Columbia there is a minimum penalty of $250 and a maximum penalty of $500 for killing big game, big game being defined in the Act as including mountain sheep, mountain goat, elk, deer, bear, etc. In Saskatchewan, there is a maximum penalty of $300 for certain offences with regard to beaver. There is no minimum.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is wise.

Mr. ROCHE: The Manitoba Game Act provides penalties of from $100 to $500. In Nova Scotia the penalties are from not less than $50 to $200. In nearly all the provinces the minimum penalties are higher than the minimum penalty stated in this Act.

Mr. OLIVER: The minimum penalties in the provinces are applicable to cases where men go out from civilization, generally with malice aforethought, to kill. In the Northwest Territories, that is entirely the exceptional condition. We are dealing, in the Northwest Territories, with a population, such as it is, that is dependent on the hunt for its actual living, whereas all the game laws of the provinces were made, not in regard to people who are dependent on the game for their food and support, but to control the actions of people who hunt for sport, for amusement or for the market. Therefore, the justification for a heavy minimum fine in the provinces is on a different footing altogether from the justification for a heavy minimum fine in the Northwest Territories. Money is very scarce in the Northwest Territories, and $100 is just as far beyond the possibility of being raised by many of those who might be arrested, as $1,000 might be beyond the possibility of a hunter in the provinces my hon. friend has mentioned. I urge, in fairness and in the interest of the successful enforcement of the law, that if there is to be a minimum fine, it be reduced very substantially from the figure suggested.

Mr. ROCHE: So far as the natives in the Territories are concerned, they are exempted from many of the provisions of this Act in order to afford them an opportunity to secure a sufficient food supply, unless they violate the law in some sanctuary. This legislation is designed to hit those who are coming in for exploiting purposes, and organized bands of hunters to go into the Northwest Territories. One of the reasons for bringing in this legislation is that we have information of Americans going in through the North Passage and coming down and establishing trading posts in various parts of the country. I do not think the penalty is too severe for the class to which I refer, and that is the class to which this legislation will principally apply.

Mr. OLIVER: If applied to that class of people, then the conditions are just the same as in the various provinces, and the minimum penalty is all right. There would be no difficulty, however, in securing the application of a maximum penalty to those outside hunters who are hunting for sport or for the market, and a smaller minimum penalty then would not cause the local people to enter into combination for the purpose of setting the law at defiance which is what in human nature, they will be inclined to do if they are up against so severe a penalty as this. This means ruin to many of those people who have very little to come and go on.

Mr. ROCHE: The minimum penalty to which the hon. gentleman refers, more particularly concerns those valuable animals like the musk-ox which are pretty nearly extinct and whose destruction is a very serious matter, and it also refers to sanctuaries; but if my hon. friend looks at the other clauses he will see that in clause (b) the fine is "not exceeding $200 or less than $25"; in clause (c) the fine is "not exceeding $200 or less than $50"; and in clause (d) the fine is "not exceeding $100 or less than $10".

Mr. OLIVER: If the minister should see fit to state in a revised section 4 just what animals he is going to protect permanently, then this subsection might very well be quite in order. I would not at all object to a minimum penalty of $100 for the killing of a musk-ox or a buffalo. That penalty is likely as small as it should be; but not knowing from this measure what animals are going to be under protection, I naturally felt anxious about the imposition of such a heavy minimum penalty. Clause (b) imposes a minimum penalty of $25 or imprisonment of two months for any person who offends against a regulation regarding birds. That minimum is surely extremely high. The necessities of life at times demand that a wild fowl be taken and used, and there should be a very wide discretion left to a justice of the peace in regard to the penalty to be inflicted for an offence against a regulation relating to wild birds.

Mr. ROCHE: The preceding section refers to birds nearly extinct and in sanctuaries, that is, the more valuable birds, and the fine will be imposed only in such cases.

Mr. OLIVER: It would be better if we had the particulars as to what birds were going to be permanently protected and what sanctuaries were likely to be created. Is it a policy of the Government to create any sanctuaries in the Northwest Territory?

Mr. ROCHE: That has not been definitely decided, although it has been under consideration.

Mr. OLIVER: Would there be sanctuary merely for a particular kind of game or for all game?

Mr. ROCHE: When a sanctuary is created, it includes all game within that area.

Mr. PUGSLEY: This clause is not limited to birds in sanctuaries; it refers to birds in regard to which there is no open season. Take for instance prairie chicken. Suppose there was a regulation passed making a close season for two or three years for prairie chicken. A person shooting a prairie chicken during that period, although he may require it for his sustenance as he may be on the point of starvation, is brought before a magistrate and must be fined an amount not less than $25. That is a very extreme fine, and my experience in regard to fishery regulations is that extreme penalties prevent the laws from being carried out, they prevent punishment; whereas if you have reasonable penalties and reasonable administration of the laws, very much better results would be secured.

Mr. ROCHE: Does the hon. gentleman also want this section to stand?

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend from Edmonton is particularly urging that it stand.

Mr. OLIVER: I would ask the minister to take into consideration the remarks of my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) in which I strongly concur, and I would also draw his attention to subsection (e) which provides for the confiscation of property. I take the strongest possible exception to that provision which imposes a terrible and unnecessary hardship. If a man pays his fine, he should not have his property confiscated.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I also want to add my protest against that. If a man is arrested and fined it should not be obligatory to confiscate his property. In aggravated cases that might be justified, but here it is made obligatory on the game warden actually to confiscate the property of every man who is found guilty of an offence. Take the case of a man who shoots a prairie chicken, which he might actually need for food; he will be fined not less than $25, and the gun which he had used on that occasion would be confiscated. I think the punishment is entirely too severe.

Mr. ROCHE: All these criticisms tend rather to the protection of the persons, as the hon. member says, rather than to the protection of the game. Now we are trying to have our legislation do both; we desire to protect our game for the future welfare of our people, and unless we have penalties that will act as a deterrent I am afraid there will be many infractions of the law. I think that if exploiters go into that country and break the law—the natives themselves are exempt—they should be subject to a very severe penalty. In many cases the animals these exploiters kill are the most valuable ones, or of species which are rapidly nearing the point of extinction. I think the case cited by the hon. member about the prairie chicken would come under another provision of the Act, where not such a severe penalty is imposed. However, I am willing to allow the section to stand for further consideration, if hon. gentlemen consider the penalties too severe.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I infer from the attitude of my hon. friend from Edmonton that he is sincerely desirous of seeing the game protected; so am I. But I do not think you will have the same satisfactory enforcement of the law where you have these extreme penalties. The game warden will perhaps be living in the same community with the man who commits an offence, and might reason: "The moment I convict him I have to deprive him of his means of livelihood; rather than do that I will let him go scot free." That is the way in which our fishery laws are administered, or non-administered. In many cases the penalties are so severe that there is a feeling of sympathy among the officers, and rather than ruin the man guilty of an offence they will close their eyes to an infraction of the law. There is no benefit in having a law on the statute book that is not enforced, although many people think that once a law is on the statute book it is all right even if it is not enforced. I do not believe that; I think it is better to have a law that can be enforced in a reasonable way.

On section 22—commencement of Act:

Mr. PUGSLEY: What is the object in bringing the Act into force by proclamation instead of in the ordinary way?

Mr. ROCHE: By one of these clauses certain regulations are to be enacted, and we do not wish to have the Act come into force until these regulations are formulated.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The regulations will come into force at the same time?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by asterisks.)

NATIONAL SERVICE BOARD.

Mr. GRAHAM:

1. What amount of money has been expended by the National Service Board to date?
2. What amount has been paid to the directors as salary and expenses, respectively?
3. Are the directors of said Board still drawing their salaries?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN:

1. Including expenditure on card registration and Publicity campaigns, to July 1, $134,081.35.

2. To July 1: Directors' salaries, $19,131.71. Expenses: Travelling, $3,254.68; office staff, $6,687; premises, $1,514.90; temporary assistance, $777.60. Total expenses, $12,234.18. Total salaries and expenses, $31,365.89.

3. The following Directors of National Service draw no salaries: K. W. McKay, Colonel Brock, J. H. Sherrard, Colonel Mignault, G. S. Campbell, L. P. D. Tilley, R. F. Green, Mark Irish.

The following directors have been drawing salaries at the rate of $250 per month: Captain Bowen, Colonel Chauveau, J. A. Macdonald, E. R. Chapman, A. L. Haining, Dr. Rutherford.

For the future no salary will be paid to any member of the board except upon the recommendation of the Director General.

I might be permitted to supplement the answer by saying that the staff of the Nation Service Board, at the head offices in Ottawa, have been, and still are, very actively engaged in the work of the Board and in any work that seems directly connected with the purpose for which the board was constituted. For example, a great deal of routine work of the office of Fuel Controller has, under an arrangement between the Director General of National Service and the Fuel Controller, been carried out by the staff of the National Service Board, and in that way additional expense to the country has been prevented. I understand also that the members of the staff at the offices in Ottawa are co-operating with the Food Controller for any purposes in which he needs their assistance.

DAYLIGHT SAVING BILL.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER moved the second reading of Bill No. 82, to provide for the time in Canada being in advance of the solar mean time during the summer months.

He said: It may be advisable that I should make a short statement with reference to this Bill. Daylight saving is a somewhat new thing in most countries of the world, and absolutely new, on a national scale, in Canada. The arguments in favour of daylight saving during the summer months are based upon a good many considerations. The primary consideration is that of economy. The substitution of an hour of early daylight, which may be used instead of an hour of artificial light, naturally lends itself towards economy, particularly in the matter of lighting, and in the use of coal for the manufacture of gas, and of electric light. Outside of these reasons of an economic kind, there are many collateral considerations, which, though not financial, are perhaps more important. The history of daylight saving legislation does not go very far back. I think in 1908 the first Daylight Saving Bill was introduced in the British Parliament, and was referred to a select committee of the House of Commons, which reported in favour of the Bill. It was, however, not enacted. In 1909, another Bill was introduced in the British House of Commons a little wider in scope, and it was also referred to a select committee, which committee reported thereon. Afterwards Bills were introduced in other sessions, but no legislation followed until 1916, when a resolution introduced by Mr. Henry Norton in favour of legislation along the line of daylight saving in the summer months was carried by a vote of 170 to 2, and in April, 1916, a Bill was passed, which came into operation on the 21st May, and remained in operation until 30th September. It was tested, therefore, in actual operation during 1916. In the same year legislation for the same purpose was introduced in Germany, Austria, France, Sweden, Denmark, Norway, Holland, Portugal, Italy, and perhaps some other smaller countries. In at least ten of the more important European countries daylight saving legislation was adopted in 1916, and was carried into operation. A committee of the House of Commons in Great Britain was appointed to make an examination into the results of the operation of the Daylight Saving Bill, and also to extend their examination and observation, as far as they could, to the other countries in which the system had been in operation. This committee, after due investigation, has reported, and I shall call the attention of the House to the report. The members of the House who desire to look into the report more fully will find it in the library.

The first thing to note is the thorough way in which the inquiry was carried out. The committee, in the first place, issued what are now called, by a modern term, questionnaires, and these were sent to the principal bodies, associations and interests in Great Britain, and to Government institutions, munition factories, industrial concerns, commercial bodies, chambers of commerce, boards of trade, labour unions and organizations, women's unions, co-operative societies, in fact they were sent to every particular interest that could be reached in the United Kingdom. Seventy-five per cent of the questionnaires sent out were answered, which is a very large percentage, and shows the interest taken in the matter in Great Britain. The committee gives the comments by the different interests, and the replies from the different interests, and arrive at general conclusions. I shall read a few of the special notes made with reference to special industries, or special interests, and then give the House, in short, the general conclusions that were reached by the committee. As regards public health, in section 19 of the report they say:

> We have devoted particular attention to the question of the effects of summer time on the health of children and we have been glad to find that, in spite of certain statements which have been made to the contrary, the bulk of the evidence (mostly derived from educational authorities) favours the conclusion that in the case of children summer time has proved a success.

With regard to public morals and order, the committee remarks:

> The tendency throughout the country to spend the extra hour of daylight in the evenings out of doors is said of itself to have made for an improvement in the general moral tone. In particular, a marked decrease was noted in some districts in juvenile offences, which is attributed by the police to the fact that during the summer time period boys were expected to be home in daylight.

In reference to the workers' interests generally, it is noted:

> So far as the trade unions were concerned, we were not able to obtain quite as much detailed information as we could have wished. However, out of the fourteen trade unions to whom we addressed our circular, we had a definite expression of opinion from nine, the general verdict being favourable in each case, though one or two of the secretaries remarked that they had not been able to make detailed or extensive inquiry among their members.

In section 25 they say:

> The general view of employers as expressed in the replies to the questionnaires was that their employees had taken full advantage of the extra hour's daylight; and while the majority were not in a position, with so short a period for observation, to state positively whether or not an improvement in health had resulted, a number had noticed increased vitality in their workers, and in some cases an improvement in the standard of the work. Only one or two employers recorded the appearance of any ill effects in the shape of tiredness and irregularity of time-keeping.

In the opinion of Mr. J. E. Hutton, manager of the labour department of Vickers Limited, the Summer Time Act was one of the greatest boons conferred upon the industrial classes of the greater towns and cities by recent legislation. The committee say:

> We have had evidence from all sources of the value of the extra daylight to the very large number of workers who cultivate gardens and allotments.

In section 31 they say:

> Taking the whole of our evidence, we are satisfied that the great bulk of the working classes are favourable to Summer Time, and we are convinced they stand to profit by it as much as, and in many cases more than, any other section of the community. Such real inconveniences as have been experienced will, we believe, be remedied with a little more experience of Summer Time conditions.

The committee had the following to say with regard to children's sleep:

> Only a very few authorities appear to consider that the evil was so pronounced as to outweigh the other advantages which children derived from the Act. The opinion of a very large majority, and the enthusiastic opinion of a great number, is that the children benfited by the operation of Summer Time, both by reason of the extra time which they were able to spend in the open air, and also because of the cool hour gained in the morning in place of a trying hour in school in the heat of the afternoon. Many authorities reported that children had been brighter and fresher in the mornings in consequence. This view was confirmed by the medical opinion which we received, and it was unanimously supported by the witnesses who gave evidence before us.

With regard to trade, industry and commerce, outside of agriculture, the committee notes, in section 37:

> The replies received to the very comprehensive inquiries which we have described in paragraph 9 above show beyond all question that the opinion of employers in every trade and industry and business throughout the country is overwhelmingly in favour of Summer Time. We summarize the evidence on points of detail, such as effect on the health of workers, saving in artificial light, etc., under the appropriate headings elsewhere in our report.

After showing that there were some diversities of opinion, based upon difficulty in coming to accurate conclusions, in section 42 the committee, dealing with the question of economics in artificial light and fuel, state:

Nevertheless, though it has proved so difficult to arrive at any accurate estimate of the economies effected in light and fuel it is perfectly clear that the substitution of an hour's daylight in the evening during many weeks of the year for an hour's artificial light must have resulted in a considerable net saving; and this is certainly borne out by the information furnished to us. The estimates of the reduction in the consumption of electric light vary very widely, from 1.25 per cent in one case to 55 per cent in another. The returns from the power companies give a mean reduction of 20 per cent for lighting purposes. Thirty-eight private companies furnished figures which give an estimate of reduction varying from 10 to 41 per cent, the mean for the thirty-eight being 23 per cent. Sixty-four municipal undertakings give a mean reduction of 18.3 per cent in units used for lighting.

With regard to gas, Mr. Hanbury Thomas, of the Sheffield United Gas Company states:

The total quantity of fuel used by all gas undertakings in the United Kingdom for 1915 was, in round figures, 18,000,000 tons. Reckoning one and one-quarter per cent of these figures, the saving in coal effected by gas undertakings in the United Kingdom as a result of four and a half months of Summer Time may be put at about 260,000 tons.

That was with reference to the saving in coal for the making of gas. The saving to users of gas was estimated at £475,000. The statement is made that 11,500 tons of illuminating oils were saved by the application of the Daylight Saving Bill.

When you come to agriculture, you have greater diversity of opinion. In section 53 the committee state:

As might have been expected, the opinions of the farmers and those interested in agriculture have been more conflicting than those of any other interest, in many cases totally diverse opinions as to the effect of Summer Time having come from the same district.

We find that the general opinion is that difficulties were easily overcome by organization and that the very definite advantage of having an extra evening hour for carrying crops outweighs any inconvenience. Many reports also mentioned the advantage at harvest time of the help of workers employed in other occupations whose longer evenings made it possible for them to give assistance on the farms. This, of course, occurred chiefly in districts near villages or towns.

Section 55 says:

In some cases trouble was experienced with milkers who were, it is said, unwilling to commence work in the very early mornings, and it is also stated in a few instances that at the outset the quality and quantity of the milk was affected by the earlier milking. These difficulties are only mentioned in a few of the replies, and the majority even of these few add that they were only temporary.

The committee say in section 56:

In the gathering and transit of fruits and vegetables the operation of the Act is generally reported to have been very beneficial, as in almost all cases these are better gathered with the dew on and transported during the cool of the day.

Section 59 says:

In spite of such difficulties as have been recorded, a very large majority of farmers and war agricultural committees are in favour of a renewal of the Act, and the majority even of those who are of opinion that it was not advantageous to agriculture consider that it should be renewed, as they recognize its great benefits to the community at large.

In respect to the later closing of shops, the evidence is stated to have been almost overwhelmingly in favour of the Daylight Saving Act.

These take in the main points in the special observations of the committee with reference to the results of their examination. I will now read the three concluding paragraphs entitled "conclusions" of their report which are general:

Taking the evidence we have received as a whole, we can unhesitatingly say that the vast preponderance of opinion throughout Great Britain is enthusiastically in favour of Summer Time and of its renewal—not only as a war measure, but as a permanent institution.

As we have already pointed out, some difficulties have undoubtedly been experienced, but not to anything like the extent predicted by the critics of the scheme, and we have not heard of any that could not be overcome with goodwill and organization. Indeed the experience of Summer Time in 1916 has converted many of its former opponents into hearty supporters. Moreover, as we have pointed out elsewhere, many of those who still hold the view that Summer Time may be prejudicial to their own interests admit that the general public advantages arising from it more than outweigh any inconveniences that may be caused in particular cases. In a few years we believe that what opposition still remains to Summer Time will have completely disappeared, and that the whole nation will regard it as a wholly beneficent measure.

We recommend, therefore, that Summer Time should be re-introduced in 1917 and in subsequent years.

As a result of that report the Summer Time Bill was again introduced and was passed with practical unanimity, and it is for the second year in operation in the United Kingdom. Similar investigations were undertaken to get at the results of the operation of the measure in France in 1916, and the report has been so far satisfactory that in France again the Daylight Saving Bill has become law for the present year and is in operation. Daylight saving measures are also in operation for the second year in the northern fringe of neutral countries that I have mentioned, and in Italy, and a similar measure has been introduced and passed for the first time in Australia.

It will be noted that after the introduction and trial of a daylight saving measure, almost all of these countries have, after investigation, been so far influenced by the operation during the preceding year that they have put it into operation for the second year, and the report of the British committee recommended that the Daylight Saving Bill not only be passed for the year 1917, but that it be passed for successive years. The matter has been taken up in the United States, and an extended hearing commencing, I think, in March, was given by a Senate committee. Before that committee, opinions were brought from every part of the United States. The hearing has been concluded, and as a result the United States Senate has passed a Daylight Saving Bill by a large majority and has sent it to the House of Representatives, where it is believed that the Bill will pass with an equally strong majority. Inasmuch, however, as a large part of the summer season has been taken up, in the United States, in holding the hearings and passing the Bill through the Senate and as the Bill, with other pressing legislation, has to pass through the House of Representatives, it is provided that the measure shall go into operation not this year but at the designated period in 1918.

In Canada we have had various experiments made with daylight saving, but in restricted areas, and, of course, it is quite easily seen that when such a measure is put into force in a city or a small district, while surrounding cities and the generality of the country are not under the operation of a similar Act, it does not have its full force and effect. Even so, there are strong testimonies in favour of the good effect of daylight saving in various cities and towns in which it was in operation last year. The general impression, however, so far as far as I have gathered, is that it is shorn of its main and proper advantages unless it becomes an extended measure—unless, in fact, it becomes a national measure. Some opinions are expressed that it would be better if, when a daylight saving measure goes into operation, it should go into operation contemporaneously with the Act in the United States, so that, along the border line where we have our traffic arrangements, there should be no clash of time keeping as between the two countries. As part of the summer is now past, and holding in view the suggestion that I mentioned last, I think it is reasonable to say that if this Bill is passed, a provision should be inserted in it bringing it into effect next year when, in all probability, it will have the added support of similar legislation in the United States. As regards the demand for a daylight saving measure in Canada, there is a wide call for it from every part of the Dominion. There are also objections against it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What are they?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The call for legislation is generally from the manufacturing industries, the boards of trade and business associations of the towns and cities. The objections to the legislation that have so far come to hand are from sections of the farming community who foresee trouble in certain lines of their work in the earlier time to be set, and inconveniences that would arise therefrom. It is fair to say that those are in restricted lines of agriculture. What I have read from the British committee's report would show that the same objections were held there; when the legislation was first introduced, but that upon the whole the agricultural interests, in Britain, being aware that the general advantages were entirely in favour of the legislation, are by a large majority in favour of the re-enactment of the daylight saving law. The House will note that I have not put forward any particular plea either for or against such legislation in this country. What I was anxious to do was to place before the House a brief summary of what had been done and why it had been done so that members, if they had not been able to follow the outcome of similar legislation in other countries, might have the advantage of knowing what the result had been.

Personally, I am very strongly in favour of such legislation, largely on the ground of economy, but still more largely on the ground of public health and morals and the maintenance of social order, which seem to spring from the substitution of an hour of daylight for an hour of artificial light. Stress is laid in the British report upon the impetus given to production by the cultivation of small garden plots. These plots, though small in themselves, when cultivated all over the country, contribute tremendously to the food production of the nation. In that respect the British report is entirely favourable to daylight saving.

With this statement, I leave the matter before the House. I shall be glad of a discussion, if that is deemed wise, and we can then go into committee on the Bill, and leave it there until the House has had an opportunity of digesting the information and coming to a conclusion.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: As this Bill seems to be very technical and more information will be required, I would suggest that the discussion had better take place in committee rather than upon the second reading.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Blain in the Chair.

On section 2—time advanced one hour:

Mr. MARCIL: What is the prescribed period in the United States?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It runs from somewhere in April to the latter part of September or about the 1st of October.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The object of the Bill, in a nutshell, is that we shall, by law, call what is seven o'clock, eight o'clock, and what is eight o'clock, nine o'clock. I agree that the object is a very praiseworthy one, but whether it is necessary to achieve the object by legislation is quite another matter. It is true that most of the civilized countries of Europe furnish us with precedents at the present time. Legislation of this sort is an attempt to make us believe that a certain hour is really a different hour. The labourer's day generally commences at seven o'clock, at which hour all the factory whistles are heard summoning the labourers to their day's work. The school boy's day begins at nine, and the business man goes to his office about ten o'clock. Now, this Bill proposes that the labourer shall begin his day's work at six o'clock instead of seven, the school boy at eight o'clock instead of nine, and the business man at nine o'clock instead of ten. It is quite possible for these three classes to being their day's work one hour earlier without any legislation on the subject at all, and I think it would be well if they agreed to do so voluntarily. If the captains of industry would start their men working at six instead of seven o'clock in the summer time, and the schools would open at eight and the business offices at nine, the same object would be achieved. But it has been thought that confusion would arise without the authority of the law upon the subject. I agree with my hon. friend that the report he has read justifies his conclusions. Without deceiving ourselves in this way, I think it would be to our advantage if we all rose an hour earlier in the summer time. But when we have the force of law behind us we shall have to be industrious whether we will or no, and when five o'clock in the morning comes, though we know it is only five o'clock, the Bill says it is six o'clock and we shall have to get up. So far, so good; I have no objection.

There is one point, however, that does not seem to have been considered. In Europe the area of the different countries is very limited. In England, for instance, a few hours' ride brings you to the end of the Kingdom. In France, you can leave Paris at any time of the day and reach the frontier before the following morning. But it is different on this continent. It takes over four days to get from Halifax to Vancouver, and the same length of time to get from New York to the Pacific Ocean. Now the railways have a standard time of their own, which varies according to latitude. Has my hon. friend considered how railway time will be affected by this Bill? If this Bill is passed and comes into operation next year, when it is ten o'clock by solar time it will be eleven o'clock under this Bill. In the city of Ottawa to-day, I think we are using railway time and not solar time.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Standard time.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is railway time. My hon. friend would perhaps explain whether there would be any conflict with railway time. For my part I see no objection to the Bill; it ought to work well. But I think it would be better for the health of every one of us, and to our advantage in the other respects to which my hon. friend has referred, if of our own free will we rose an hour earlier in the summer time.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: As to the area of the different countries, the United States is within a few square miles as large as Canada, and no difficulty has been encountered there. A very thorough inquiry was first of all made, at which the railway companies were represented. That is a fact which in itself serves for any amount of other evidence that I could give. Then with reference to the railways, I will read the opinion of Sir George Bury, vice-president of the Canadian Pacific Railway, which I think would be taken as good testimony so far as the railway part of it is concerned.

There may be various views on the advisability of daylight saving, but there is one point on which there is no diversity of opinion, and that is that if daylight saving is to be successful it must be a measure passed by the Government at Ottawa, which would require that all clocks in the Dominion be set ahead one hour at a stated time in the early spring, and set back an hour at a stated time in the fall.

The daylight saving scheme has been tried in many localities, and the main reason for its failure was entirely due to it not having been universally adopted all over Canada.

As I see it, if the people of Canada as a whole wish daylight saving, it should be adopted; and so far as the railways are concerned, I believe they would gladly support it. If it were made universal in Canada, it could not, in any way, embarrass train operation.

Mr. CARVELL: I can quite understand that so far as the railways are concerned it plays no part whatever, because for some years past we have been compelled to adopt railway time in Canada. We know railway time is not solar time, but simply a conventional time. The earth is divided into sections, starting at Greenwich, every fifteen degrees east or west represents an hour in time. When they get back fifteen degrees, they drop an hour. Thirty degrees means two hours. Forty-five degrees means three hours, and sixty degrees four hours. That brings you to what we call Atlantic Standard time. I think the first degree would be somewhere around Cape Breton island, therefore, under present conditions, the people of Cape Breton island are practically solar time. Wherever you come to the centre of one of those sections, you have practically solar time. As you go east from the centre their time is slower than solar time, and as you go west it is faster than solar time. To my mind that is the whole difficulty in Canada. Although it does not make any difference to the railways, it makes a great deal of difference to the people. I happen to live on the very western edge of the Atlantic Standard time, and our time is half an hour faster than solar time. When you cross the boundary line into the state of Maine you are under the eastern standard time, which, I think has its centre very near Montreal, and which brings Montreal practically under solar time. As you go east they are slower until you get to the eastern border of the state of Maine or the western border of New Brunswick, where they are half an hour slower than eastern standard time. Going west, when you reach North Bay or Sudbury you come to the western edge of the eastern standard time, and there they are half an hour faster. I understand the railway company takes Fort William as the dividing point between the two times, but that is only conventional, because they are taking much more than the fifteen degrees into the eastern standard time, and I think you will find the next section has much less than fifteen degrees. I just mention this to impress upon the minister the fact that in a country extending as far east and west as Canada does you have great inequalities now. It would perhaps be feasible to advance the clock an hour if you are at the centre of one of these sections, but, when you get west of the centre, where the time is faster than it ought to be, and you advance it another hour, you are getting people out of bed in the night in order that they may be up at six or seven o'clock in the morning. They tried this daylight saving in St. John last year, and it was a great failure. The difficulty was that their time is about twenty-five minutes fast.

5 p.m.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Twenty-four minutes.

Mr. CARVELL: I think I made a pretty good estimate of it. St. John standard time is 24 or 25 minutes faster than St. John solar time. Then they added an hour on to that, and there was great confusion, because the Canadian Pacific Railway carries its eastern standard time down to St. John, which is nearly 100 miles east of the eastern limit of the eastern standard section. The result is they had three times in St. John, the Canadian Pacific Railway time, Atlantic Standard time (which is legal time in New Brunswick) and this daylight saving time. I know that country pretty well, yet I had a great deal of difficulty in getting out of St. John one Sunday.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: They do not travel on Sunday down there.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, they do occasionally. I could hardly tell what time the train left, so I simply went to the station and waited for it. If you compel the railway companies to adopt this daylight saving time, you will probably bring about a great deal of confusion. In this world there are a great many faddists as regards everything. Perhaps they are useful in some ways, but it has always appeared to me that this was one of the greatest fads ever put before the public. If you are going to adopt this Daylight Saving Bill, it can only be in effect during the summer months, when we have a great deal more sunlight than we know what to do with. If you were at the Tropic of Cancer, within a few degrees of the Equator, I can see it might make some difference, because the farther north you go the greater the variations in the length of the days and of the nights, until you get to the Arctic Circle, and from there to the North Pole, theoretically you have a point where there are six months days and six months nights. In Canada on the 21st of June we have daylight from four o'clock in the morning until half-past eight in the evening, and as you go backward, or go forward, from the 20th of March until the 21st of September, when you have the equinoxes, you have more or less daylight. People in this country usually start to work at seven o'clock in the morning, and under this scheme you practically put them to work at six o'clock, solar time. But you have daylight for two hours before that. There is no saving of oil, light, coal, or power. On the other hand, they cease work at six o'clock and there are two hours of daylight after that.

Mr. NESBITT: Three.

Mr. CARVELL: There would be under this scheme if they ceased work at five o'clock solar time. That would give three and a half hours after the day's work was done. There is, I repeat, no saving of power, light, coal or oil in manufacturing establishments. It would not mean anything in the stores, because in the summer time the stores all over the country close in the evening. In our province we have a compulsory law on the subject. If two or three storekeepers petition the Government, they issue an order compelling all storekeepers to close at six o'clock. Therefore, there is no saving as far as the stores are concerned. It simply comes down to the question of a little bit of saving in the homes of the people. We all know that people will not go to bed in the summer time until it gets dark. You can make all the laws that all the faddists in the United States or Canada ask you to make, but they will not have any effect. The Anglo-Saxon says: It is my business when I go to bed, and I am not going to bed until after dark. The country will burn just as much oil and coal as it did formerly. While in many cases this system may be an advantage, while east of the centre line of these different sections or standards it would be an advantage, it would be such a great disadvantage to those people living west of the centre line that I am afraid the disadvantage would far outweigh the advantage. I believe that wherever it has been tried in Canada it has not been a success. However, if the minister is anxious to have it go through I am not going to vote against it, but it is only pursuing one of those pleasant discussions which are matters of entertainment but have no practical value.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: This notice has been on the Order Paper so long that I was in hopes that it would stay there until the session closed. I agree entirely with the remarks of the last speaker. If you have more daylight than you know what to do with in the East, we certainly have in the West. You say that you have daylight at four o'clock in the East and that it is dark at eight. In the West you have daylight at half-past two and you can see to read at ten o'clock.

Mr. CARVELL: You are that much farther north.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: Yes, and west.

Mr. CARVELL: Being west has nothing to do with it; it is a matter of north and south.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: The report read by my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce applies to England and possibly the continent of Europe. The conditions are not parallel as between Great Britain and Canada. You may say that the United States would perhaps present a parallel case. Did I understand the minister to say that a daylight saving law had been adopted there?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It has passed the Senate.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: We tried this out locally in Winnipeg and Brandon last year. Brandon stood it for one month, but as it was more difficult to abolish it at Winnipeg it lasted during the summer. When the council was called upon this spring to express itself with regard to daylight saving, it unanimously decided to go back to the old, tried and reliable time which has stood us in good stead for a great many centuries and is good enough for us now. People will not go to bed, even although the clock shows 11 o'clock. They will say: It is not eleven o'clock, it is only ten o'clock and are going to stay up another hour. In my opinion the farmers of western Canada are almost a unit against the adoption of this Bill and in favour of the system that we have at present. Coming from the West, where we have a tremendous amount of daylight, it occurs to me—and I say this without the slightest desire to be offensive—that, with a temperature of 81 degrees of this House and the session nearing the first of August, we might be occupying our time better with some other measures than talking about saving daylight.

Mr. NESBITT: The hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) says that he has requests from various boards of trades and cities throughout the country in favour of this Daylight Saving Bill. I did not catch what he said about agriculture, but I do not know of any agriculturists who want the time set forward an hour. What good would it be to them? They get up at daylight and they work until dark. They put in fourteen or fifteen hours a day. What is going to be saved by fixing the time earlier? They would have to get up and milk the cows, as my hon. friend (Mr. A. K. Maclean) says, at three o'clock in the morning. The cows will object if they are disturbed an hour earlier. Then, what about the roosters—are they going to start to crow an hour earlier?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: In reference to the roosters, they get in enough work now.

Mr. NESBITT: That is what I say too. They waken us up, heaven knows, early enough now without starting them an hour earlier. I cannot understand, in so far as the agricultural community is concerned, where there will be any benefit. They have to get up at five; milking starts at half past five, and they work until seven in the evening. There would not be any benefit at all in getting them up at four instead of five. Then, in the evening they will not go to bed, as my hon. friend from Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell) has said, until after dark. They do not go to bed in daylight even on the farm. Therefore I do not see any benefit that can accrue on the farm. As to the manufacturer, he starts at seven o'clock and closes at six. It is daylight long before he starts, and he is not required to use artificial light except on a dark day, unless his shop is badly lighted. I do not suppose that moving the clock forward an hour will affect the darkness of a shop of that kind. If he works in a dark shop he will have to put on artificial lights but if he has a light shop he will not need any light. The hours of work will be the same. As far as fuel is concerned, if he works eight or ten hours, he will use just the same amount of fuel whether he works in daylight or darkness. Therefore I do not see any possibility of saving in fuel. I can easily understand boards of trade asking for this because they largely consist of lawyers, doctors and merchants who like to close up early and go for a game of golf. But that will not help the country one bit. There is lots of time after closing at six o'clock for golf, tennis or bowling. I do not see any benefit in this thing, and I do not know where my hon. friend gets his petitions from. I cannot imagine what business or class it will benefit, except the gentlemen whom I have mentioned. My hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Maclean), I have no doubt, would like a law passed so that he would not have to get up at all, but I do not believe it will help the rest of us any.

Mr. BEST: If the farmers are forced to get up an hour earlier, I do not think the cows would give nearly so much. The farmers are wakened up when they should be sleeping. I think changing the time twice a year would be a great inconvenience. Hon. members fail to realize what it means for the farmers to get up at half past four or five. The farmers cannot get to work, from haying till harvest is over, till almost eight o'clock. They cannot work while the dew is on the ground. If the time is put back, it is going to injure the farmers. The men working on the farms will see that the men in villages stop work at five o'clock in the afternoon, and they will want to do the same. Some of the people in the county I represent want the time changed, but only a small percentage. I am sure that not one farmer in my county desires to see the change, and I think it would be a great mistake.

Mr. TURRIFF: There is one argument which has not, so far, been advanced in this discussion. I heard a good deal of complaint in the West about the daylight saving scheme. It came chiefly from two classes of people, the farmers throughout the country and the women in the cities. In the case of the farmer, the chief objection was that farmers living ten, twelve or fifteen miles from a town, after they got through their day's work, would run into town in their automobiles, but would find that the stores were closed an hour earlier than previously. The daylight saving did not affect the farmers themselves, because they got up just as early as before the time was changed, but it would shut them off from the opportunity of doing business in the stores in the villages and small towns. I heard a great many complaints in Winnipeg from the women. Their complaint was that the children got up an hour earlier, and they simply could not get them to bed any earlier at night, because, as everybody knows, in Winnipeg, for several months in the summer, it is daylight until ten o'clock at night. There was very, very great complaint about the change. There may be some advantages in it that we have not heard of, but take it all round, I do not think there is any great demand in Canada for daylight saving.

Mr. GLASS: I do not think public opinion generally is behind this movement, and I will waste only a few moments in discussing it. Last year, in the city of London they tried an experiment in this matter, the movement being agitated, I think, by the Board of Trade, or by petition from a number of merchants. The plan was found to work very unsatisfactorily. It dislocated business and disorganized things generally, and it was only allowed to remain in operation for about a month, when opposition to it developed so strongly that the city council saw it was a mistake and cancelled the by-law. I find a great deal of opposition to it amongst the farming community in my district. Farmers generally were inconvenienced, and when, this year, they saw that a movement was inaugurated to promote this scheme I received from different farmers communications expressing decided objection to the proposed Bill. I think business men and farmers generally will be more satisfied if the time remains as it is.

Mr. MARCIL: As far as I can see, it would be felt more especially in the large cities, particularly in Montreal, where the tramway service is not what it should be. It would be different if we had an underground road to carry the vast hordes of people, who go to work early in the morning and have to cover eight, ten, twelve or fourteen miles before they reach their work. A large number of working people have to leave their homes an hour, or an hour and a half, before the time they are supposed to commence work. It would mean that these people would have to get up very early. We have had a great deal of inconvenience in Bonaventure. We have the Eastern Standard time, Altantic Standard, and the local mean time, so that it brought about a confusion which has not ended yet. As to a measure of this kind, it will not affect the districts which are remote from the towns, because the farmer residing a long distance from the city does not need to go to the market with his truck in the morning, and does not care at what hours the stores open or close. As the season is very short, he will get up as early as he can, and do all the work he can possibly do, because he only has three or four months in the year in which he can do any work at all. As far as those who are in the cities are concerned, I think the proposition could not be enforced successfully—for instance, in a place like Montreal—until the method and customs of the people are changed. In Montreal, especially in the summer evenings, there are attractions galore for the young people, moving picture shows and parks of various kinds, and it is very difficult to get them to go to bed early. If these people keep up their present hours, and are compelled to go to work an hour earlier in the morning, I think there will be such an outcry that the Bill will not work at all.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The right hon. gentleman (Sir George Foster) read some reports with regard to the experience in the working of this law in England, and, amongst other things, said that the application of this law had resulted in a great saving in expense for fuel and light. I cannot understand that. Can the hon. gentleman explain it? What difference would it make in the cost of fuel to anybody. There is no saving of fuel as far as I can see, or of light either, because in either case, the working hours in summer are all in daylight. It may be different in England, but as far as this country is concerned, I cannot see the force of his observation.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The conditions are different in England from the conditions here, because their evenings are not so long. The facts as brought out by the examination are stated, and I have no doubt of those facts. Here, where we have such long hours of daylight, similar saving will not take place in the items of electric light and gas, although I think there would be fairly good economy, even in respect of those two items, particularly as regards home consumption.

I have no disposition to force the Bill upon the House, if the House does not care to endorse it. I felt it my duty, in answer to very widespread requests—and as this legislation would be in consonance with that enacted in other great countries of the world—to introduce the Bill. I have presented it, and I have frankly made a statement of the case before the House. I propose now to leave it in committee, and we can use our judgment with reference to the future progress of the measure.

Mr. CARVELL: Before the hon. gentleman takes any further action, I would point out one difference between Canada and the United States, as far as daylight saving is concerned. In Canada, as pointed out by hon. gentlemen from the West, we have more daylight than we know what to do with in the summer time, but my hon. friend is sufficient of an astronomer to know that the further north you go the longer the days in summer time and the shorter in winter. If my hon. friend would go down to the southern portion of the United States, say Texas, I do not imagine it would be daylight before five o'clock in the morning, and it would be dark at seven in the evening on the 21st of June. Conditions are different here from what they are in the United States, because we are farther north. The southern part of New Brunswick is in latitude 45 or 46. In our part of the country in June it gets dark at about half past eight. In Winnipeg and in the country north of that city, where the latitude is about 50 degress, it does not get dark until ten o'clock. I can understand that in Massachusetts, Pennsylvania and the southern part of New York state, the people might well take advantage of an extra hour in the morning, because they have not as much daylight to spare as we have. In Canada, nothing is gained by changing the time. You only disarrange the affairs of the people, and you do not make the saving that would be made by the adoption of such a measure in the central portion of the United States.

Mr. KNOWLES: I think that the people of the part of the country from which I come would be in favour of this Bill. For some years we have had what is called "fast time" in Regina—it is by the working out of these things that we determine whether or not they are beneficial. In spite of the fact that in Regina the change of time involves all the inconveniences of having time which is different from the railway time and from the time in the neighbouring towns, year after year they have resorted to fast time during the summer. That is our practical experience.

Mr. CARVELL: Is the Regina time faster or slower than the standard time?

Mr. KNOWLES: The Regina time would be pretty nearly the same as the solar time. Regina is less than one hundred miles from the point where the Canadian Pacific trainmen change the time of their watches. I cannot answer my hon. friend's question in any more detail. There is, however, that specific illustration in the case of Regina. Then there is this point: at all those places where the people have the option of taking whichever time they want, the people invariably go by the fast time. It is evident, therefore, that in its practical working out there is some convenience in the adoption of the faster time. It is a fact that we waste a great deal of daylight in the morning and that the average citizen is out of bed a great deal of the time after sunset. If you can do anything to equalize things by devoting the hours of darkness more exclusively to sleep, you are that much ahead in the enjoyment of life, and in the saving of light, and any other way you want to look at it. Personally I am very much in favour of this Bill.

Mr. McCRANEY: A few years ago in the city of Saskatoon we had a by-law providing for the changing of time. On account of the railways having standard time, there was a great deal of confusion, and that gave rise to some objection to the daylight saving plan. During the summer, before the term of the by-law had run out, the by-law was cancelled, for the reason given by the member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff): the difficulty parents had in getting their children off the streets and getting them to bed. I do not think that they would ask for it again.

Mr. THOBURN: There seems to be a consensus of opinion against this Bill. But, as with most Bills, there are two sides to the question involved. Most of the argument that I have heard this afternoon has been in favour of the agricultural committees; I want to say a word on behalf of the employees of the manufacturers. I think that if a vote were taken among the men employed in the manufacturing concerns of Canada, they would express themselves as largely in favour of this Bill. From my own practical experience, I am satisfied that the change would be a great benefit. Hon. gentleman may be surprised when I tell them that under present conditions the factories sometimes change their working hours in order to suit the hours of light and in order to prevent lighting up both morning and evening. In the spring they change the time one way, say half an hour; and in the fall they change it the other way. But another reason why the majority of men and women employed in the manufacturing industries are in favour of this legislation is that they all look forward to the evening as a time of pleasure. As it is now, by the time these people get home from their work, get cleaned up and do what they have to do about the house, they have not much time for pleasure. A man who has a garden, for instance, always looks forward to the evening as the time when he will do necessary work in the garden. I am satisfied that most of these men would rather go to work earlier in the morning and have that extra hour in the evening.

An hon. MEMBER: Why not hoe the garden in the morning?

Mr. THOBURN: It is all very well to say that, but most of these men find it all they can do to get up in the morning, get their breakfast and get to work in time. If daylight saving were adopted, they would have the advantage of that extra hour in the morning, and they would get to work just as conveniently as they do now. I believe that they would prefer going to work an hour earlier in the morning for the sake of getting the extra hour in the evening.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

On the motion of Sir George Foster for Committee of Supply:

Mr. CARVELL: I understand that the Military Service Bill comes up to-morrow. Of course, it will take the whole day, and possibly the next day. I may say to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), who is leading the House—the Minister of Railways (Mr. Cochrane) is not here—that I should like to have the Railway Bill brought up just as early in the week as possible. I should like to be here when that Bill is brought up.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is quite possible that the Railway Bill will be taken up to-night. I shall speak to the Minister of Railways about it.

Mr. CARVELL: I should be glad if it were.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY.

The House in Committee of Supply.

Mr. Dugald Stewart in the Chair.

Trade and Commerce—Salaries, rent, wages and contingencies under the Canada Grain Act, $850,000.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This is an increase of $125,000 over last year. This vote covers all the expenditures for salaries of officers, permanent and temporary; the contingencies of the various offices in both eastern and western divisions; the salaries and contingencies of the Board of Grain Commissioners; and the working expenses of the different Government elevators, interior and terminal, from Vancouver eastward. The crop of 1913 was very much larger than was anticipated; in fact, it was the largest crop in the history of the country, so that a supplementary vote had to be taken last year to meet the expenses of the year. As between the two years, therefore, the great crop of 1915, which commenced coming out late in the autumn and continued coming out during the year 1916, caused the extra work and consequently the extra expenditure. Generally, after the usual rush of grain at the close of navigation, there is a lull, and so much work does not have to be carried on, but the crop of 1915 came out with very little lull; it was coming out during the whole season, and as soon as the season of navigation opened again in the spring of 1916, the rush was very great.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: After the close of navigation it came out by railway?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: To Montreal?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It came up to the western terminals, and a good deal of it came down to Montreal. Some figures might be enlightening. At Winnipeg and other western points, for the crop year ending 31st August, 1916, 354,039 cars containing over 474,000,000 bushels of grain were inspected. The preceding year the figures were 122,831 cars containing 153,000,000 bushels. That is, in 1915, there were about three times as many cars and about three times as many bushels of grain as in the preceding year—cars from year to year taking a greater number of bushels of grain. In the crop year of 1916, for ten months to June 30, 1917, there were inspected 212,000 cars containing 279,000,000 bushels of grain, or an excess over the crop year of 1914 of about 89,000 cars and more than 126,000,000 bushels of grain. That accounts for the increased work of the staff.

Mr. TURRIFF: Does the minister purpose, during this session, bringing in a Bill to amend the Canada Grain Act?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have already been questioned three or four times by my hon. friend and have made answer that I thought it would be necessary. Some of the things that I had at that time in mind I regard now, after investigation, as not of sufficient importance to make it necessary to bring them in, but there are one or two points which I think will have to be dealt with by legislation, and at the present time

I expect to bring in a very short Bill in amendment of the Act.

Mr. CARVELL: If the minister thinks I am treading on ground on which I ought not to tread I will find no fault with him if he does not answer my question. I noticed in the papers a few days ago that an arrangement had practically been made between the grain commissioners and the farmers of Canada to take care of the 1917 crop on a basis of $2.40 per bushel for No. 1 Northern at Fort William. That is a pretty good price. I am not, however, quarrelling with the price the farmer gets, but if the minister could take the House and the country into his confidence he ought to do so. We know in eastern Canada we are paying more for flour than we ought to pay. The wheat was practically all purchased, but by manipulation of the market some two or three months ago the price of wheat was sent up to $3 per bushel, and the millers commenced to sell flour on a basis of three dollar wheat. The wheat did not cost them $3; probably it did not cost them $2; it is doubtful if the wheat which is being sold to-day as flour on the basis of $3 cost the millers more than $1.50 to $1.75 per bushel. If the miller is compelled to pay $2.40 for his wheat he cannot sell his flour at much less than $12 or $13 a barrel, but there ought to be some relation between the price of wheat and the price of flour. I do not believe that the minister realizes how high the price of flour is in eastern Canada to-day. It is becoming almost an impossibility for people to buy flour. The Food Controller is taking some steps; he is asking us to curtail in the consumption of white bread and all that sort of thing, but what is bothering the labouring people in eastern Canada to-day is to get bread at almost any price. They would be only too happy to have brown bread, or coarse-grained bread, if they could get it at a reasonable price. I do not want the minister to understand me as finding fault, although I do think that $2.40 wheat is a pretty stiff price, and if the farmers of eastern Canada can get that price for very long they will soon get rich. Now that the Food Controller is going to get after the millers, the poor consumers of this country ought to know what they will have to pay for flour.

Mr. TURRIFF: I understand that $2.40 is the maximum price. If an arrangement is made to take over the whole crop at a certain price for No. 1 Northern at Fort William, the price of flour should also be fixed; the millers should not be allowed to charge what they like. It takes about 50,000,000 bushels of wheat to furnish the people of Canada with a year's supply of flour. It is well known what it costs to grind a barrel of flour, and what the handling and shipping charges are, and I repeat that the miller should be allowed to charge not more than a certain price. Otherwise the consumer will have to pay for flour at a much higher rate than the farmer is paid for his wheat, and we shall have a repetition of what happened last year when the middlemen got away with millions of dollars that should have been saved to the consumers. Personally, I think it would be a good thing all round if such an arrangement was made. There is only one customer anyway; Britain is buying for herself and her Allies. I was up in the West recently, and the farmers with whom I discussed this question were all willing to accept a reasonable price. I never heard one suggest so high a figure as that mentioned by my hon. friend.

Mr. WRIGHT: What does my hon. friend consider a fair and reasonable price?

Mr. TURRIFF: I represent only farmers; I do not represent consumers in the ordinary sense of the word. In my judgment a reasonable price would be $2 for No. 1 Northern at Fort William, which would give $1.80 to $1.87 a bushel to the ordinary farmer in the Middle West. I think that price would be satisfactory to the farmer, providing he knew the consumers of Ontario and the lower provinces were getting their flour on that basis, instead of having to pay on the basis of $2.50 a bushel. I do not want to be understood as giving this price on behalf of the farmers; I was not deputed by any farmer to state a price, but I think the figure I mentioned would be fair as between the farmers I represent and the consumers that other hon. gentlemen represent.

Mr. GLASS: Is the hon. gentleman desirous of fixing a price for next year's crop or for this year's crop only?

Mr. TURRIFF: I was speaking of this year's crop.

Mr. GLASS: My hon. friend would not go beyond this year's crop?

Mr. TURRIFF: No, I had not that in mind.

Mr. WRIGHT: Now that the bars are all down and wheat can flow freely into the United States from western Canada, how can the price be regulated at Fort William? If the Americans happen to offer a little more than $2 a bushel, the farmer would certainly not send his wheat to Fort William to be sold at $2.

Mr. TURRIFF: I understand—and the Minister of Trade and Commerce can correct me if I am wrong—that the Governments of Great Britain, the United States and Canada are negotiating an arrangement for the handling of the crop of both the United States and Canada. If the Canadian Government or the Wheat Commission made arrangements for buying the whole crop, a fair and reasonable price would be fixed, and everybody would have to live up to the agreement. I think you would find that the great majority of farmers would be satisfied with an arrangement of that kind, though no doubt there will always be some who would not be satisfied with $2 if there was a chance of selling somewhere else for $2.50. I have never heard a farmer express himself as not being satisfied with an arrangement of that kind.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I understood my hon. friend (Mr. Carvell) to ask this question with reference to the 1916-17 crops?

Mr. CARVELL: I was referring to the growing crop that will be on the market in two or three months. I quite understand that the 1916 crop is in the hands of the people who bought it, and it might be said we were confiscating their property if we made arrangements regarding the 1916 crop.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The discussion covered both crops, I think. I wanted to make sure what my hon. friend's question was. The matter divides itself along certain broad and general lines. First of all there is one buyer, that buyer being the Allies, represented by whatever commission or committee they may set up. There will be a common buyer for the allied demands, and consequently they will not be competing against each other.

The seller is divided into two. There is the seller in the United States, and the seller in Canada, and an arrangement will no doubt be made as to the price that shall be paid, having regard to both the buyer, who must have the grain, and the seller who furnishes the supply. The reason matters have drifted along so far as they have without fixation of price or without such controlling and supervising regulations and methods as will be adopted, is that there is no United States authority yet established with power to act. In Canada we have the advantage of a War Measures Act by which Parliament gives the Government powers which are very broad and which cover a matter of this kind absolutely. Such a law does not exist in the United States, consequently the two Houses must legislate for these powers; and for the last six weeks or more they have been coming to conclusions as to just what legislation they should pass, what powers they will give, and what regulations and restrictions they will authorize to be made. Until the United States commission, or whatever it may be called, has its powers defined and is in a position to act, there must necessarily be delay and imperfect co-operation between Canada and the United States on this question. We all agree that, constituted as we are, it is advisable that the two countries should act together in reference to the prices of wheat. Our wheat goes into the United States without let or hindrance, and the market price is there accessible to the seller in Canada. It is expected that this week, or next week at the latest, the legislation will have been perfected, and then the United States authority will be constituted and its powers defined. In Canada, we have placed the matter in the hands of a Board of Supervisors, the constitution of which has been declared. The Order in Council has been laid before Parliament, and the powers of the Board are therein defined. That commission has visited Washington, and has had full communication and conference with the authorities there; and, so far as the crop of 1917-18 is concerned, it is the desire of our commission and of the United States authorities to act together. Just as soon as the legislation is through at Washington, just so soon can the two bodies take accordant action. I do not think any prices will be set for the crop of 1917-18 until the preliminaries I have mentioned have been discussed.

Mr. CARVELL: Will the minister pardon me for a moment? I have just picked up the afternoon paper, and I find that the gamblers are betting that wheat at Winnipeg will be worth $2.31¼ in October. They are betting that July wheat will be worth $2.58; I believe that is in the Chicago market—they are betting that September wheat will be worth $2.31. I quite realize the almost insurmountable difficulty in applying the law in Canada and not in the United States, but just as long as the matter is allowed to drift, just so long will the gamblers continue their betting, and when a man bets a few million dollars that wheat will be worth so much, he will move heaven and earth to see that nothing beats him on his bet. He will go to the Government, or will go anywhere, and say: I have so much tied up in options on September—or October—or December—wheat, and if you regulate the price at lower than $2.31 I am ruined. I would like to see something done that, if these men go on gambling on the price of wheat and are ruined, they shall have no one but themselves to blame. I think notice should be given to these people by the Government that if they will gamble they do so at their own risk. The time has come when there should be very drastic action taken in Canada, not only in regard to the price of wheat but in regard to the prices of many other commodities. It is absolutely unreasonable that the consuming public should 5 p.m. be compelled to pay the prices they have been paying in many instances. Even if the United States will not pass the legislation, we have the power to prohibit the exportation of wheat from Canada, and we have the power to fix the price. Therefore, so far as Canada is concerned, we can at least protect our own people. Of course, the prohibition of the exportation of wheat is a last resort, and I hope it will not be necessary for us to go that far. At the same time, I feel we should point out to those gamblers that the food of the people must not be put up to unreasonable prices in order that they may satisfy their greed for money which they have not earned.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Of course, we cannot prevent people from betting on what the price of wheat will be in September or October. As I was saying, the matter divides itself into two sections. There is the 1916-17 crop which remains on hand, which I do not think is subject to the limitations that the crop of 1917-18 would be subject to on the ground of accordance between the two countries under the regulations or control which they shall have. There is not a large quantity of the 1916-17 wheat in store in Canada, although there is a considerable quantity of it; a very large proportion of that, I believe—a larger portion than I had thought— is owned actually by farmers, and is held for a price. The advantage of whatever price it is sold at, if it be an advantage, will accrue to the farmers who are holding the wheat in different storage elevators.

Mr. CARVELL: There cannot be very much sympathy with a farmer who refuses to sell his wheat for $3 a bushel.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I suppose the farmer might not have exactly the same view of it. It is important at the present time that the surplus of wheat in Canada should find its market and transfer from Canada at the very earliest possible moment. This is rendered necessary for two reasons—in the first place because arrangements have been made for the carriage of wheat up to the quantity of our surplus, and we do not want to retard these transportation arrangements in any way.

It is not impossible—I do not say that it will be done—that the board of Grain Supervisors will fix the price for the 1916-17 crop, which is now in store, independently entirely of what action may be taken in the United States in reference to their 1916-17 crop. The food controller, who has been appointed, takes up the problem where the Board of Grain Supervisors leaves it. They have to do with wheat and grain only. The moment they act upon wheat and grain, the food controller knows what the price of the basic article is and then can conduct his work on a fixed and certain basis, provided the arrangement for price fixation is for the total crop. There will then be no debate and matters will be simple in so far as the basic price of the prime article of food is concerned. I do not think I can say anything more in reference to this matter. The delay is regrettable. The Winnipeg Grain Exchange is not allowing any dealings in futures, and consequently speculation is shut off from the exchange.

Mr. OLIVER: What is the meaning of the announcement of the figure of $2.40 spoken of by my hon. friend from Carleton?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have heard nothing officially at all about the fixing of the price of the present crop in store. I just saw it in the paper but I have no official knowledge of it. I do not know whether it is true or not true.

Mr. OLIVER: The newspapers contained the very definite announcement that the Board of Grain Supervisors had established a figure of $2.40 a bushel for No. 1 Northern at Fort William. I rather understood from my reading of the item that this was the maximum price beyond which the grain of the coming year's crop should not be sold after August 1. Was it merely the maximum price or was it a price at which it was expected grain would be taken off the farmers' hands?

Mr. CARVELL: May I ask my hon. friend a question? Does he think there will be any practical difference between fixing a maximum price and setting the price at $2.40? Would it not be $2.40 any way?

Mr. OLIVER: I am not sure of it; I am not a grain speculator.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Suppose you were a grain holder and the maximum price was $2.40, would you hold?

Mr. OLIVER: I am not a grain holder, I am a consumer but that was my understanding of the item as I read it. It was not held up to the farmer that he was going to get $2.40 a bushel but it was held up that he was not going to get any more than that.

Mr. MORRISON: That was the idea I took from it.

Mr. OLIVER: The minister might answer that question.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I could not answer that until I had official information. It may be that the reported action is an act of the board and it may be that it is not. It may be a rumour. It may refer only to the crop of 1916-17. It might refer to the crop of 1917-18 but until I receive the official information I am not able to give it to the House.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend from Macdonald (Mr. Morrison) was about to say something.

Mr. MORRISON: I understood from reading the report in the paper that it referred to the wheat of last year's crop and that it was a maximum price of $2.40.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend will remember that the item referred to marketing after August 1. My understanding was that it referred to the wheat crop of the present year.

Mr. MORRISON: If I recollect aright it only had reference to the wheat on hand, the wheat in store, of the present year's crop.

Mr. OLIVER: I think that when this item is being passed such an important action as is reported to have been taken by the grain supervisors so early as to permit an announcement to be made in the papers on Saturday should have been in the minister's hands for the information of the House. This action is going to set the policy of the Government in regard to this matter and it is of the highest importance to the whole of the western country. I think the minister should have been able to have stated exactly what the purport of that action was and what the result was going to be.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am very sorry that my hon. friend, tenacious as he is, and rightly so, cannot draw from me information that I have not got. Nothing would give me greater pleasure than to give it to my hon. friend if I had it. I am quite certain I will receive intimation in reference to the action of the board just as soon as it officially acts. Whether this is an official act or not, or a foreshadowing, or a rumour, I cannot tell, but as soon as I have the information I will give it to the House and the House has a right to have it.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend from Carleton said that if a maximum of $2.40 is fixed there will be no minimum, that that will be the price and that there will be nothing below that. Is that the correct view?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am not going to give my hon. friend a view as to what will take place in the practical operations of the market if you set simply a maximum price and nothing else. I do not know whether every man who holds grain would hold it with the idea that, that being the maximum price, conditions would be such that that he would probably get that price if he held on to it rather than sell it at less. From that point of view it would seem that simply to fix a maximum price would be to fix the actual selling price. But there are differences of opinion in regard to fixing a maximum and minimum price. From almost as many grain men as you may talk with you will get just as many different opinions as to what will be the effect of fixing a maximum price alone or fixing a maximum and minimum price.

Mr. OLIVER: I am sorry we are not able to get more definite information from the Government in regard to this matter that is now entering upon an entirely new and most critical stage. The House should be more thoroughly informed in regard to what may or may not have been the action of this Board of Grain Supervisors and as to how far their action is going to affect the profits of the farm particularly in the western country. Surely this is the place to give the public information in regard to it. If we have suffered in the past it is because we have not known what was going to occur. In the nature of things, we could not know what was going to occur, but now, if, under the authority of Parliament, we are going to make things happen as we wish, surely Parliament and the country should know it.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not want my hon. friend to have in the back of his head the least glimmering of an idea that I have this information and am not giving it to the House, because that would not be a correct idea in any respect. I do not know that he even thinks that. My arrangement made with the chairman of the board was that he should regularly and promptly report the principal actions that took place. As I have not had a report from him, I am rather inclined to think that no official action has been yet taken, and that what appeared in the newspapers was probably something of a guess.

Mr. MORRISON: In Saturday evening's Journal I find the following:

Grain Supervisors Fix Wheat Price.

Board Decides on $2.40 per Bushel—Applies to Balance of Present Crop.

Toronto July 21.—The Board of Grain Supervisors for Canada, in session in Toronto yesterday, have ruled that, dating from August 1, 1917, the maximum price of wheat, basis 1 Northern in store Fort William, shall not exceed $2.40 per bushel. This holds until further notice and applies to the balance of the present crop.

Mr. WRIGHT: Is it in the power of the supervisor to fix a price for the other grades of grain? This quotation seems to be for No. 1 Northern. As a rule the price for 2, 3, 4, 5 and 6, and the other grades are regulated by the law of supply and demand. There being a fixed price for No. 1 Northern, would the intention be to allow all the other grades to be regulated by the demand made for them, or would the Grain Supervisors set the price for each different grade of grain? I am not at all clear upon the point, and I think it would be of value to us if we had some information in regard to it.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The Board of Grain Supervisors has complete power to fix the price of grain, and that means not only No. 1 Northern or No. 2, but all grades. No one knows better than my hon. friend that you must have some basis upon which to make a contract, and my own impression is that all grades are valuable and necessary, to the last grade of the grain, and that the prices of the several grades, if fixed by the Board of Grain Supervisors, will be fixed in accordance with the relation of the grades to one another in point of milling values.

Mr. OLIVER: We are dealing with a very serious matter, and I am sure that almost all of us are disappointed at the lack of information in the statement that has been given to the House by the minister. Is it a fact that, in a matter so tremendously important, certainly to the prairie West and through the West to all Canada, the House having given the power absolutely to the Government under the War Measures Act, the Government has handed that power to the Board of Grain Supervisors, without let or hindrance, without check or authorization as to what they are or are not to do? I can hardly imagine that to be the case. Would this not be the time and the occasion for the minister to inform the country exactly how far this Board of Grain Supervisors has been empowered, and in what way it is expected that they will exercise that stupendous authority that has been placed in their hands?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The Order in Council fixing the powers of the Board of Grain Supervisors has been placed on the table of the House, and is available for members of the committee.

Mr. OLIVER: Certain powers are defined in the order in council, but very frequently those of us who are not familiar with legal construction may be the better of an explanation as to just exactly what the order in council means, and we would like particularly to have a statement from the minister as to the line in which the Government propose to direct the efforts and activities of this grain commission and what the object to be achieved is.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: After all, it seems to me that when, in any important question of this kind, you constitute and empower a body to deal with it the less interference with that body by Government the better; otherwise we should be exposed to the criticism that, whilst appearing to have this thing done by a more or less independent body clothed with power, the Government was simply using this body as an instrument to do what the Government thought best to be done. That is one side of the question, and my hon. friend will see it is an important side, and that therefore it is necessary to be careful in the selection of the men to whom you trust these great powers. The other side of the question is whether, in any case, the approval of the Government is necessary before the decisions of the Board become effective. I do not carry in my mind just what the powers of the Board are as defined in the order in council, but I am quite sure the intention was, after having selected this body of men, to put the power in their hands to the utmost possible extent, so that they, having the matter in hand and being versed in all the ins and outs of this very complex business, might not be interfered with by the Government, or by politics or parties. At the same time, in reference to regulations of certain kinds, the Government has power of approval.

Mr. OLIVER: In regard to certain negotiations that were in progress, I think last fall, in reference to the crop that is now on the market, I understand my hon. friend was negotiating with certain representatives of western grain interests in regard to fixing a price at that time. My understanding was that there was a price offered and a price demanded, and that if the arrangement had been closed at that time those who to some extent represented the farming interests would have accepted a basic price of $1.70 for No. 1 Northern, as against $1.30 offered on behalf of the Government through the Minister of Trade and Commerce. What is the fact in regard to that matter?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I think the facts can be very simply stated. The Canadian Government have been anxious, since the beginning of the war, that Canada should have all possible opportunity of supplying the demands of Great Britain and the Allies for such things as Canada produces. We have always been in touch with the British Government and its different departments in regard to all kinds of supplies that are required and that can be produced in Canada. We are kept up to the mark in that respect by the people in Canada who have these things to sell and who are anxious to dispose of them. In carrying out that line of communication, which had never been interrupted from the time the war began, the question was mooted as to the crop of 1916-17. The British Government were asked whether they had any proposals to make with reference to the securing of that crop. Different communications took place. I was in London for a little while; I met the Export Wheat Buying Commission there, and talked the matter over with them. The result was that they made an offer for the whole crop surplus for 1916-17, the offer running at about $1.20 or $1.22 a bushel at Fort William. Ultimately they raised the offer to about $1.30 or $1.32. I simply did what I thought was my duty; I passed that offer on to persons who appeared to be representative farmers who could take hold of and decide upon any such offer—the Council of Agriculture of the West. I asked these gentlemen to come down and see me. They came, and I told them frankly and fully what had taken place. They discussed the question with me, went back, and then decided that the terms were not high enough. Consequently, the thing fell through.

Mr. OLIVER: Did they make an offer?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If my memory serves me correctly, the price ranged between $1.50, minimum price, and $1.75, maximum price. There again the question of minimum and maximum came up. There is a good deal in favour of the contention that if a maximum price is mentioned and the necessity for the grain is pressing, the grain brings the maximum price.

Mr. OLIVER: I believe that one of the gentlemen who was concerned in these negotiations was Mr. Maharg, president of the Council of Agriculture?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: Has the minister seen Mr. Maharg's statement in regard to these negotiations? If so, does he agree with that statement?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have seen the interview which was given by Mr. Maharg, but I do not carry it in my memory. In so far, however, as Mr. Maharg's statement is not on all fours with the statement that I have made here, it must come from some misapprehension—not wilful misapprehension—on his part. I think that the attempt was made to represent me as pressing the western farmers to take the $1.30 a bushel. Whatever my private opinion was, it was not part of my duty to press upon them a price which they did not wish to take. I may say frankly that as things looked at that time, it might have been that I thought they should very carefully consider a price at or around those figures. Matters, of course, have greatly changed since that time.

Mr. OLIVER: The farmers who wished to sell last fall did get about $1.75. It will be observed that there is a very wide margin between the $1.75 which the farmers asked last fall for a part of the crop now in the elevators, and the maximum figure of $2.40 that has been fixed by the Board of Grain Supervisors for the remainder of that same crop. I am bringing these facts out for the purpose of showing that it was not the exorbitant demands of the farmers that made the price $2.40, if that is the price, because certain representative farmers—who, however, did not officially represent the farming community—did, as a matter of fact, believing that that they were acting on behalf of the farmers, offer the crop at $1.75.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend must bear in mind that conditions change. If there had been no submarine menace, and if many things that happened had not happened, perhaps $1.30 or $1.40 would have been a princely price. As it is, it turned out the other way.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not wish to be understood as finding fault with what has been done. But the idea has prevailed in some quarters that the western farmer is taking undue advantage of the situation and is responsible for the high cost of the greatest necessary of life. I merely wish to justify him to this extent: that he did offer to sell out last fall at $1.75, which as a matter of fact, was the maximum price that the large majority of the farmers got.

Mr. WRIGHT: I do not know what authority Mr. Maharg would have in the West to speak for the farmers of the West. Neither Mr. Maharg nor any other man or association has any right or power whatever to speak for the farmers of the West. Each farmer is master of his own grain and can sell it at any price that he can get for it at any time. If the farmer was holding the grain, he was holding it expecting to get a better price, without any regard to any bargain made by Mr. Maharg or anyone else. I do not think too much stress should be laid on the fact that some association in the West mentioned a certain figure that might be accepted by the farmers of the West for their product. Such offer was made without authority, and would not be binding upon the farmers. Probably if it had been accepted, no action would have followed.

Mr. McKENZIE: I do not represent the grain growers or the grain speculators; I represent a very large body of the people who have to eat bread. We are passing a large amount of money into the hands of the Department of Trade and Commerce for the purpose of dealing with matters affecting grain in the West. As far as I am concerned, that money is voted for some useful purpose.

I am somewhat disappointed at the quantity of information we have been able to obtain from the minister this afternoon on the question of grain handling and grain prices in the West. Some years ago, long before the war and since this ministry came into office, I took the responsibility, and more or less risk, to mention to the present Minister of Trade and Commerce that his department ought to be in possession of some information in respect to the price of grain from the time it was cut in the field until it got to the elevator and possibly to the mill. On that occasion, the minister answered me with a great deal of witticism and facetiousness and the know-it-all policy that he usually brings forward in matters of this kind, so that any one who doubts him or who looks for information is simply wasting time and beating against a rock from which he gets no result. That seems to be the policy of the minister about these matters. For many months since the war began, we were told by the minister that it was out of the question for the Government to do anything towards regulating those matters, but we kept at them until at last they seemed to change their minds and to think that something could be done, because they started appointing a commissioner, and then they appointed a commissioner to examine the report of the commissioner, and another commissioner to examine the Board of Commissioners. The thing seems to go on like an endless chain without any termination. It would be unkind, I suppose, to say that the Government is taking this method of putting the thing off and giving it over into the hands of the profiteers, the combines, and the trusts, at the expense of the poor people. I am not saying that is the purpose, but that is the result. If the question were put up to the minister to say: what did those who are getting this $150,000 cash do during the last year to help the miner or the lumberman in Cape Breton by cheapening the cost of flour, I think the minister would have to say that they did nothing at all, and that the Government did not ask them to do anything. I have in my hand a report made by Mr. O'Connor, an official of the Government, on the high cost of living. What he says in paragraph 2 of his conclusion is along the line that I have just suggested, namely, that the Government could have done something much earlier than they did. In paragraph 2, Mr. O'Connor says:

> Individual instances of profiteering occurred during the year 1916. These I have already identified. If they had occurred during the present year, since the provision of the Order in Council under which I am acting in the making of these investigations, I would consider it my duty to recommend that the facts be laid before the proper Attorney General for his consideration as to their criminality.

That is what an officer of the Government says about profiteering in this country, and this profiteering was going on as much, I presume, in connection with wheat and other things, and the reason the criminals are going to escape is by the accident of the date of an order in council. If the minister had the public interest at heart, he would not agree that a mere date in an order in council would permit them to escape, when the Government have the power to change that date back and forth just as they like and to make it go back to the date of the War Measures Act. Would the minister take this to be a good answer from anybody else to say that the order in council bore a certain date and that therefore criminality and profiteering could escape? This report has the approval and sanction of the Government because by them it is printed and by them it is laid upon the table of the House and distributed amongst hon. members. I further want to bring to the notice of the Government along this line—and it is quite in accordance with the officialdom in the West and elsewhere for which we are voting money—that although they profess to be getting money from those big concerns for the carrying on of the war, it is merely farcical to be taking it from them in the way it is done, because the big interests simply pile it on the commodities they are producing. If a proper accountant were to investigate the business done by the great profiteers from whom this money is taken, he would find that not only do they put back on the price every dollar that is taken from them by way of a War Profits Tax, but interest on the money, and everything else they can think of is piled on, and that is finally taken out of the pockets of the poor man. That is what has happened in the case of every article that has been taxed. The Ogilvie mills, and some other mills which might be named—I am not naming the Ogilvie mills as being greater sinners than the rest—when they sent the prices on flour up to $16 and $17 a barrel, did so for the purpose of getting back the moneys this Government is taking from them as a War Profits Tax. I simply mention this particular case as an illustration so that the minister may understand what I am speaking about. The Department of Trade and Commerce should have a distinct knowledge of every step about this grain from the time the seed is put into the ground until the grain is handed over to the miller for grinding, or until the flour is put into the bags or barrels for sale. If we had that knowledge, as we surely may and can have it, we would not be obliged to take the most unfair course of asking hon. members here who represent western farming constituencies what they would call a proper price for wheat. That is not a proper question to put to such a member. It is just as unfair a question as to ask me what would be a fair price for coal at the pit mouth, or on board the steamer, because I might be giving away some secrets in connection with the business of the people whom I represent here. So far as the production of coal is concerned, there is no difficulty for any man who follows the matter to know to a half cent what coal should be produced for. He knows the amount of the royalty; he knows the cost to cut it, to hoist it, to put it on the car and to deliver it on board the steamer. Therefore a proper accountant or statistician who follows the matter will know to a half cent whether a coal owner is charging too much or not. The same thing ought to be true about wheat, and if the country wants to know whether a fair price is being charged for wheat, it is not the proper thing for a member on the Government side of the House, in order to make a political point, to ask a member who represents a farming constituency what is a fair price to charge. The department ought to know what it costs to produce wheat and what the charge for flour ought to be to give the millers a fair profit upon their investment and expenditure. We are past that stage in this war when we can speak about prices being regulated by supply and demand.

Whatever may happen after the war, the present conditions demand that the Government arrange for the people getting flour at a reasonable price, and preventing prices from reaching a level which Mr. O'Connor said in his report might be lawful but was certainly not respectable. That is the ground I take. The people I represent in this House are non-producers of foodstuffs, but they are just as useful in the community, and just as useful in the production of the necessities of war as are the people of any other section of Canada. They should not be made the victims of speculators in this way, and be forced to pay $16 or $17 a barrel for flour. In this great Canada of ours there are millions and millions of bushels of grain every year that we cannot use. There must be some remedy, and we have nobody to look to for a remedy but the Government and the department. I sincerely trust that some action will soon be taken, without waiting for a new report and then getting some one else to report on the reporter, keeping the question up interminably, with no relief for the people.

Mr. GLASS: My hon. friend seems to have lost sight of the difficulty that would ensue in a country like this if prices were to be fixed. We live alongside a country with 3,000 miles of frontier, the border, geographically speaking, being an invisible line. Conditions change very rapidly, and I have no doubt that one of the reasons why the board of supervisors were appointed was because of the entry of the United States into this war, and of the two countries having much in common. I have not heard any hon. gentleman express the opinion that it is the duty of this Government to fix a price at which the farmer shall be compelled to sell his grain; I do not think it is the duty of the Government to do that. I think it was fortunate that no action was taken last fall, when it was proposed to fix a price for the farmers' wheat. As events have turned out, they have been to the farmers' advantage. I do not think the people of this country object to the farmer getting the best possible price for his commodities, but what they do object to is the profit that goes to the middleman between the farmer and the consumer. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has pointed out that the board of supervisors have the power to fix a maximum price for grain. I do not see what good could come of fixing a maximum price unless some organization backed up by Government buys the grain from the farmer at that maximum price. On the other hand, I certainly think it would be an advantage to the farmer to have a minimum price fixed, spread over a period of two or three years. But a maximum price is of no advantage unless arrangements are made for buying the grain from the farmer at that price. If such an arrangement were not made, the law of supply and demand would determine the price the farmer would receive. I think the greatest encouragement possible would be given our farmers if we adopted the policy of the British Government of fixing a minimum price spread over a period of two or three years. The farmer who responds to the appeal for greater production necessarily goes to a large expenditure in breaking up more land, acquiring more machinery, and engaging extra help, and it would be a great encouragement to him to know that he would receive a minimum price, ensuring adequate profit, for his product.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend from Cape Breton has intervened with an extraneous subject, remotely connected with what we are discussing, and I shall have to leave him on Hansard in order to get my answer in to the previous questioner before six o'clock. The order in council reads:

> The Board shall make such inquiries and investigations as from time to time it deems necessary to ascertain what supplies of grain are now available or will be available. The Board shall ascertain the location and ownership of such grain and what transportation and elevator facilities are available in connection therewith, as well as all conditions connected with the marketing and market price of the same.

The board are given the powers of a commissioner under the Inquiries Act for the purpose of any inquiries they may make. Section 4 says:

> The Board shall have power from time to time to fix the price at which grain stored in any elevator may be purchased and the conditions as to price, destination or otherwise under which grain may be removed from such elevator, and may also prescribe what grain shall be sold to millers or milling firms in Canada or elsewhere, and what grain shall be sent to the United Kingdom and the Allied powers.
> It will be the duty of the Board to issue such orders and take such action as it deems necessary to facilitate at all times the transportation and delivery of grain in excess of domestic requirements to the United Kingdom and the Allied powers.
> (a) Any price so fixed shall be subject to the approval of the Chairman of the Board.

Mr. OLIVER: Once the board is appointed they are vested with a certain power. Are they expected to exercise that power from the date of their investiture, or do they allow it to lie dormant until an occasion arises that calls for its exercise?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: They exercise it whenever they deem necessary.

Mr. OLIVER: There may be no exercise of that power?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Quite so.

Mr. OLIVER: And they may exercise it on occasion?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes, my hon. friend will see that they do not go farther than the storage places. The grain trade goes on as it may, between the time it leaves the producer and the time it is stored in the elevator.

Mr. BURNHAM: Is it the intention of the Government to establish a relativity of prices, or do they intend to grapple with those cases where industrial disease, blight or something of that description, has made it necessary that some remedy be adopted? Or do they propose to take some scientific plan and establish as I say the relativity of prices and maintain them in order that there may not be this continual unrest and the pulling of one against the other to such an extent that it distorts the whole body of industry?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Does my hon. friend expect me to answer that question offhand, and without hesitation? I think I shall have to ask the privilege of seeing the question in print before I can make an answer that would do justice to myself or to my hon. friend. My hon. friend quite understands it is a most serious undertaking to arrange prices throughout the length and breadth of a country like this, in such a way that everything will flow absolutely smoothly.

Mr. OLIVER: In view of the importance of the subject, I think it would be well if the minister would read the whole of the order in council.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER. I have given the gist of the order. In so far as the fixing of prices is concerned the board has the decision as to what is necessary and when it is necessary.

Mr. OLIVER: I am sure it would be very valuable information, and much benefit would be derived from the reading of the order in council. Questions might then arise which do not now suggest themselves. For instance, I think the question I asked has brought out a fact which is not covered absolutely in the order in council.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The main provisions of the order in council are:

5. The Board shall have power to receive offers for the purchase of grain from millers and from the Wheat Export Company, Limited, or from any other person or body representing or acting for the Government of the United Kingdom or for any of the Allied nations or for any combination of the same, and from time to time to fix the prices at which such grain shall be sold.

6. The Board shall have power to take possession of and sell and deliver to millers or to overseas purchasers at the prices so fixed grain stored in any elevator, and to account and pay over to the orders thereof the proceeds of such sales after deducting all expenses connected with the taking possession, sale and delivery.

7. The Board shall, as far as possible, and having regard to position and the cost of transportation fix a uniform price throughout Canada for grain of the same kind, quality and grade.

8. Notwithstanding anything in the Grain Act or in the Railway Act, the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada shall have power to order any railway company to provide cars and other transportation facilities for handling grain and to transport as directed, grain taken possession of or owned by the Board.

9 Every person shall truthfully and promptly answer any inquiry made by the Board or by any person duly authorized on its behalf about any matter within its powers or duties, whether such inquiry is made verbally, in writing, by telegraph, or in any other way.

10. In this order "Elevator" means and includes any terminal, country, private, public and hospital elevator, and any elevator licensed by the Board of Grain Commissioners for Canada.

11. The Board, with the approval of the Governor in Council, may make any regulations it deems necessary for the purpose of fully and effectively carrying out the objects and provisions of these regulations, and in particular, but without limiting the generality of the foregoing, may make regulations:—

(a) For appointing representatives in different places in Canada for the purpose, from time to time, of making known in such localities the prices of grain fixed and other regulations or directions made by the Board, and for reporting to the Board any violations of any order issued by the Board or any regulation made hereunder, and generally for assisting the Board in the effective discharge of its duties.

(b) To authorize the engaging of clerks, employees, and assistants and the paying of their salaries.

(c) Creating offences and providing penalties in respect of violations of any order made by the Board or of any regulation made hereunder.

Mr. OLIVER: I am afraid we will have to ask the minister for information as to the policy of the Government in regard to this matter. It might be as well to let it stand until after recess.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock, Mr. Blain in the Chair.

Mr. OLIVER: The Minister of Trade and Commerce was reading and explaining the order in council under which the board of grain supervisors was appointed. I would be glad if he would be good enough to conclude the reading.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I completed it just at six o'clock.

Mr. OLIVER: The order in council has conferred upon the board of grain supervisors very remarkable powers. I fancy it would be safe to say that all the power that was delegated to the Government by Parliament in the War Measures Act has again been delegated by the Government to the board of grain supervisors in the matter of handling and dealing with the grain crop.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: As far as defined there.

Mr. OLIVER: Does it only apply to wheat; does it apply to other grain?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: To grain.

Mr. OLIVER: All grain?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: And to eastern Canada as well as western Canada, or only to western Canada?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It applies to all Canada.

Mr. OLIVER: It is a matter of very grave interest to every one as to the times and occasions and circumstances under which the board will exercise these very great powers. My hon. friend informed the House that the granting of the powers did not necessarily mean the exercise of the powers, that they would be exercised as occasion demanded.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There is a purpose to be accomplished. If they accomplish that purpose without fixing the price they need not exercise the power.

Mr. OLIVER: It is of very great interest to the public to have knowledge as to the circumstances and character of the occasions under which this board will exercise those extraordinary powers. That must be, I presume, a matter of explaining the arrangements or instructions as between the Government and the board. Just on that point I am sure the House and the country will be glad to hear from the minister.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There are no instructions given by the Government, or by any member of the Government, to the board. There are the powers and they exercise the powers in the way in which we have discussed this afternoon. If the board wish to consult with me as the minister under whom they act to a certain extent—that is, they report to me—they have the right of consultation, but I do not consider, and it is not within the four corners of the order in council, that they are to be directed by the Government. Certainly no direction has taken place up to this present time.

Mr. OLIVER: The authority vested in this board is an authority to commandeer the grain crop of Canada. The minister, surely, was not a party to placing that enormous, that stupendous, power in the hands of otherwise private individuals without having an appreciation of, or an understanding as to, the circumstances under which such a stupendous power would be exercised. Surely the minister can enlighten us on that point?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Again, I am unable after dinner, as I was before dinner, to give my hon. friend the information which I do not possess, and which, if I gave it to him, I would have to manufacture. I can only answer as to the facts as they are and these are the facts: This power is not a power over everything under heaven and on earth. It has to do with a certain line of action to bring about a certain result. The purpose is that the Allies shall get the surplus grain that they want from Canada, this board is for the purpose of carrying out that idea, and it was given these powers in order that that might be done, going no farther than the storage place, as was explained before the dinner hour. When the grain is stored then they have a choice of the various powers which I outlined. But the whole purpose of it is that for reasonable and fair prices paid the surplus grain may be put in the hands of the Allies for their purposes, conserving what is necessary for the use of our millers and for Canadian consumption.

Mr. OLIVER: Are we to understand that this action on their part does not require confirmation by the Government, no matter what the action may be?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Of course, the Government always have the power, when originating and passing an order in council, to cancel it.

Mr. OLIVER: I have pressed the minister very strongly in regard to this matter, and I have done so because of its importance. Although, under this power, the grain supervisors have not control of everything in the heavens above or on the earth beneath, they have control of such an important part of what is on the face of the earth that there is no man in Canada but must feel a very deep interest in the exercise of the tremendous authority vested in them. I do not wish to be understood as finding fault at this stage of the proceedings with the object in view as stated by the minister; that is to ensure that the grain of Canada shall reach the Allies at reasonable prices. Under the present circumstances of success that is a very proper purpose and is the object of governmental action. But I cannot agree that it is an entirely satisfactory position in which the people of Canada find themselves under the order in council and subject to the policy as laid down by the minister. I gather from what he said that the board of grain supervisors may commander any amount of grain they please, at any time they please and at any price they please, and that the only remedy the Government has is to cancel their powers, and that the only remedy Parliament would have would be to upset the Government if circumstances would permit of such a thing being done.

I hope to be excused if I say that I do not agree that that is a satisfactory arrangement. This Parliament is, or ought to be, responsible to the people of Canada. The Government should be responsible to this Parliament for every act which is done under the authority of the Government which affects the people of Canada. That the board should be constituted, as far as possible, on lines removed from direction or control by the Government of the country.that is to say, by Parliament—is not, it seems to me, an arrangement that I could approve of as being satisfactory. I would not be prepared to argue that a reasonably wise choice has not been made in the selection of the board of grain supervisors. I have the pleasure of an acquaintance with some members of the board, and others I do not know. But that is not the point. Putting myself in the position of the ordinary farmer, these gentlemen are handling my property, and, while I am willing to make every sacrifice in the interest and for the well being of the Allied cause in this war, I claim the right to have something to say in regard to the management of my own affairs. I am not speaking personally, but I am speaking as though I were a member of the farming community. As a farmer, I have a very deep interest in seeing that I secure that price for my product that I am fairly entitled to, under conditions as they exist, and, as a citizen, I am entitled to be assured that when the hand of authority is laid upon my property and my rights, it shall be in the best interests of the Allied cause. I am entitled, as a citizen of Canada, to have that assuranace, and, being a citizen of Canada, I am, in fact, a member of the Government of Canada, or would have been, if the elections had been held at the proper time.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Or if we had a union Government?

Mr. OLIVER: No, a union Government would not have that result. But the citizens of Canada have the right to have the control and direction of their business, through their executive, the Government, and my view is that any board of commissioners, or body of men vested with authority, which under many circumstances is right and proper, should have full responsibility to the Government of the day for their action, and that their action should be subject to confirmation by the Government, so that the Government would be held responsible by Parliament and by the people for whatever action was taken. It seems to me that is the only satisfactory way of transacting this very important business. The fact that there are peculiar conditions which have to be met by special means, makes it all the more necessary, in my humble judgment, that the chain of responsibility should be thoroughly established link by link, from the commission right back to the country.

Mr. GLASS: Would not the Government which has appointed the supervisors have the power of cancelling the appointment, and, by that means, have direct control of the supervisors who have been appointed? If their actions are not satisfactory to the Government, they are immediately under the control of the Government, and the Government would have power to cancel the appointment. In the meantime, these men attend to the details and study market conditions at a time when the members of Parliament are charged with other responsibilities, but I cannot see how you can take the control of this board out of the hands of the Government, because these men simply have the power delegated to them by the Government. Does the hon. gentleman not think the Government has power to cancel their appointment if it becomes necessary?

Mr. OLIVER: I do not recall the terms and conditions of the appointment in the order in council. Is this board of commissioners appointed in the same manner as the railway board is appointed?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Just appointed for this purpose.

Mr. OLIVER: During what time?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: A term that is stated there, whilst action is necessary—until their recall.

Mr. GLASS: Would the minister say whether the Government has or has not the power to cancel or recall them at any time?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: The Government has the power to cancel their appointment at any time?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: In that case, are we to understand that the principle of direct responsibility for the actions, and the results of the actions of the grain supervisors, is accepted?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Absolutely. My hon. friend has argued in a queer circle. He makes himself, in the first place, one of the farmers of the country, for the sake of argument. Suppose there are a thousand farmers in our country who are effected, the Crown has the property of that thousand farmers. The farmers are interested in knowing that they get a reasonable price and that their interests are protected. By what method could you put that thousand farmers into any room, and keep them there, where they could see everything that was done and ascertain whether or not their interests were protected? The farmers select representatives, and the representatives come to this House, and the representatives have their powers. They put Governments in, and put Governments out. The Governments have certain executive things to do. They undertake an executive action. It is impossible to have 224 members of this House in any room, in any place, at any time, and at all times where the Government is carrying out that executive action? It would be just as impossible for the farmers to be in attendance. There is only one way, under representative democratic government: that is that the farmers should hold their representatives responsible, and the representatives hold the Government responsible, and the Government cannot break its chain of responsibility by appointing a body of men and saying to them with reference to this particular work: go ahead and do it. Of course, the Government is responsible. As to the common sense of the thing, does my hon. friend think that 14, 16 or 18 members of this Government, or of any Government that you might have at Ottawa, is the proper party, around the council table, to decide and carry out such action as that contemplated here? The most abstruse questions come before council for investigation. Difficult questions have to be studied continuously, and must be studied by men who understand the questions, who will stay with the job, and who understand how to carry out the job. Therefore, when this question was taken up by the Government, it was clearly impossible that they could sit round the Council table and decide these matters, and keep themselves, day by day and hour by hour, possessed of the information which would enable them to act wisely and properly. They did the best they could. They selected a body of men who they thought, possessed the knowledge, the honesty, and the probity, and they appointed them to do that work. My hon. friend would find greater cause for criticism if he came into the House and elicited from me the information that these men could fix no price and take no action whatever unless they first secured the approval of the Government. But my hon. friend has on hundreds of occasions in the House said that he has not the least bit of faith in this Government or any member of it. He thinks they would jew the country, jew the Liberal party, do anything at all under God's heaven in order to get ahead of the poor, beleaguered Opposition.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend is very clear in his statements.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: What a splendid chance it would be for my hon. friend if we had tied up that commission, saying to them: Before you pull a string you must come to Ottawa and consult us as to whether you shall pull it or not; there is a chap out there by the name of Frank Oliver; you wind him up by taking his grain, some way or other. That is what my hon. friend, because of his view of the calibre and quality of this Government, would think that we would be disposed to do. We did not want to do that. We want my hon. friend's grain to get just as good a chance as anybody else's. Therefore, we get the men, tell them to do the work—and we keep our hands off them. If they act in such a way that it is a scandal and a harm to the country, we can cut the strings and their powers instantly cease. That ought to satisfy my hon. friend; indeed, I believe that it does satisfy him, but he will not admit that it does.

Mr. OLIVER: I am satisfied that the position taken by the minister in the earlier stages of this discussion has been definitely abandoned by him. We are now given to understand that the Government is responsible for the acts of the board of grain supervisors.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I never said anything else, did I?

Mr. OLIVER: I understood otherwise from my hon. friend's earlier remarks.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I expressed myself badly if the hon. member got that idea from my remarks.

Mr. OLIVER: Then it was because of my misunderstanding my hon. friend that I have taken up so much of the time of the committee in securing from him the very clear statement that he has just made. I suggest the importance of having the position definitely stated. This board can commandeer all the grain in Canada at any price they like.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No.

Mr. OLIVER: Then what can they do?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: They can do just what they have power to do under this order in council. They can go as far as the place of storage, but they cannot go into a farmer's yard, grain bin, or anything of the kind. Unless the farmer who raises the grain gets it into the elevator the board are not, under these powers, in possession of any string on it. That is quite different from being able to commandeer all the grain in Canada.

Mr. OLIVER: I misstated the case when I said all the grain. But all the grain in storage in Canada they can sell at any price they please, and the owner must accept that price. I recall that a couple of years ago, at the direct instance of the Government, some 15,000,000 bushels of grain were commandeered in the terminal elevators at Fort William. I recall the difficulties that arose out of that commandeering, and I wanted to have absolutely fixed the responsibility for whatever may take place when similar action is taken, if it ever is taken, by the board of grain supervisors. Let us not make any mistake; we are giving our assent here to power that is of the most extraordinary and far-reaching character. While we agree that under certain circumstances and conditions it may be proper to exercise that power, there may be very wide differences of opinion as to its merit at the time it is exercised. I wanted, therefore, at this time and in this place to have fixed absolutely the responsibility which my hon. friend has officially and in express terms assumed.

Mr. GLASS: The Food Administration Bill of the United States which was passed on Saturday last, fixed a minimum price of $2 a bushel on wheat during the period of the war. In England, if I remember rightly, a minimum price was guaranteed for a period of three years. The price was not a fixed amount for the whole of that period; for 1916 the price was fixed at a certain amount, for 1917 the price was somewhat lower—twenty cents, I think—and for 1918 the price was still lower. The reductions were graded from year to year; nevertheless, a minimum price was fixed upon which the farmer might count. As they have fixed a minimum price of $2 a bushel in the United States, all the wheat that we sell there must command that minimum price during the period of the war. The circumstances, therefore, would seem to justify our fixing a minimum price here. No matter what happens, we cannot anticipate, with free interchange of wheat between this country and the United States, that the price in Canada will recede below the price fixed as a minimum by the United States during the period of the war.

Mr. MORRISON: Is the grade mentioned in connection with that minimum price?

Mr. GLASS: The despatch says that the Food Administration Bill of the United States passed on Saturday last—

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Passed what?

Mr. GLASS: Passed the Senate, by a vote of 81 to 6. The despatch continues:

> The bipartisan leaders had worked broader features of control into the Bill, extending its operation specifically to coal, fixing a minimum price of wheat to the farmer of $2 a bushel, and empowering the President in time of emergency to buy fuel, wheat, flour, meal, beans, potatoes and coal from producers and sell to consumers.

Mr. NESBITT: The Bill passed the Senate, but not the House of Representatives.

Mr. GLASS: Passed the Senate, yes.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It may go through and become law, but no one can even bet on the result until the Bill goes through. So far that is just what the Senate thinks about it.

Mr. OLIVER: There is a good deal of merit in what my hon. friend (Mr. Glass) contends: that if there is to be an effort to increase production, the way to increase it is by guaranteeing a minimum price. It is increase of production that we are all anxious to secure. It is increase of production upon which the success of the Allies largely depends, and that increase can take place in Canada more rapidly and more satisfactorily than in any other part of the world. Has that subject attracted the attention of the Government, the Board of Grain Supervisors, or the minister?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Certainly that idea has been present with the United States Government. Certainly it has been present with our own Government, and no body of men like the grain supervisors could possibly avoid having their attention drawn to that phase of the subject.

When one begins to speak about fixing the price of food in order to get plenty of food and more food for the world to live upon, one has to take this into consideration as a primary factor: What reasonable price is it which, while being just and fair to the consumer, will so act upon the producer as to make him feel that he is getting a reasonable return for what he raises, so that he will be impelled to keep on raising and, if possible, to facilitate and increase his production? If you place the fixed value of the product below what meets that reasonable desire, then, of course, you are face to face with an indisposition on the part of the producer to put capital, money, labour and trouble into the raising of the article, and you will perhaps turn him into some other line of production altogether. Certainly such a course would tend to discourage the effort to produce on the usual basis, and particularly the effort to produce on a larger basis. That must be taken into account. On the other hand, you have the great body of consumers. In this case, you have as the body of consumers the Allied countries and their forces. They are interested in getting, for as reasonable a price as possible, the product they want. You have also in the United States of America many millions of consumers who are deeply interested in what the price of food is to be, and you have proportionately the same in Canada, so that those two interests meet together, and the idea is to arrive at what will be a fair and reasonable mean so as to do right by both of these great parties. That is the problem that the United States on its part, and this Board of Grain Supervisors for Canada have to keep in mind in a very thorough way and, if possible, to arrive at right conclusions in regard to it.

[Mr. Oliver.]

Mr. OLIVER: In regard to the idea of a guaranteed minimum price, it is well known that in the Prairie West land can be brought under cultivation probably as quickly and at as little expense as land in any other country in the world, and it is as productive when brought under cultivation. At the same time, as costs have increased, the expense of bringing land under cultivation has increased accordingly, and with the scarcity of labour and the increase of costs, although the returns for bringing land under cultivation are great, there has not been that increase in cultivation that is entirely desirable from every point of view. The owner of uncultivated land no doubt desires to bring it under cultivation, but at the present moment his costs of bringing it under cultivation are abnormal; they are very much higher than they were two or three years ago. If present high prices were going to continue he would be warranted in undergoing that expense in bringing his land under cultivation, but if he brings his land under cultivation on a basis of $2 or $2.50 wheat, and next year the price of wheat falls to sixty cents, we know how he will come out financially. That is, beyond any question, a very serious deterrent to the increase of cultivation in the prairie West. I am not laying down a policy for the Government, but I am taking the liberty of following the suggestion of my hon. friend from East Middlesex (Mr. Glass) of putting before the minister the conditions that would seem to indicate the desirability of suggesting a policy being inaugurated, if possible, so that we might have that increase in production, because, although we have the big reward, there is such an uncertainty attached to it that many of our people are unwilling to make the extra large investment that has to be made at the present time.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is a contingency which attaches to all businesses in all countries in all ages of the world. If every man who produced could be guaranteed that he would get a certain price which would give him a good profit, that would be a fine thing for the producers. I doubt very much if that is possible in this world, at least at the present time. What would apply to the farmer in the way of grain raising would apply to the man who raises stock and to the men who manufacture this kind of food and transport it and keep it in store for the consumer. The application runs through the whole gamut of industry, and I am sure my hon. friend will see how difficult it would be to bring about such a condition.

Mr. OLIVER: In England there has been a fixing of minimum prices for a succession of years for the purpose of securing a food supply for the people of that country. There is no difference whatever between the guarantee by one of the Allied Governments or by all of the Allied Governments of a minimum price on grain raised in Canada, and the guarantee of a minimum price on grain raised in England. There is, however, the difference that such a guarantee might produce greater results in Canada than it possibly could in England. I am not suggesting the laying of a financial burden upon the Government of Canada, but this Government being in control of our affairs and acting as intermediary between the producers of Canada and the consumers of Great Britain, might not such a proposal be very well brought to the attention of the Allied Governments as a means of securing increased production in this country where production can be more largely increased than in any other country that is convenient to their purposes, in the hope that we might, while doing them good, do ourselves, or, while doing ourselves good, do them good? What is found to be good policy in England might be found to be good policy in Canada.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There is a great difference between England and Canada in that respect. England is an importing country. She has to import the vast majority of her food, and she has had to do that for many years. Her grain cultivation has constantly been decreasing, and what Great Britain as an importing country is after in fixing a range of minimum prices for a series of years, is to bring back again the old cultivation of the soil in order that a country of 45,000,000 people may not be for five-eighths of its food dependent upon other and outside countries.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Has it ever occurred to the minister that the Government might raise wheat themselves on a large scale in western Canada?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We would have a fine time raising wheat.

Mr. SINCLAIR: That question might be considered. We are said to have a hundred million acres of prairie land uncultivated at the present time. This land belongs largely to such companies as the Canadian Pacific, the Canadian Northern, the Hudson Bay, and to speculators throughout the world. This land could be commandeered by the Government and brought under cultivation. This is the only country in the world where that could be done. Canada is the only place under the control of the Allied governments where there is such a large area of uncultivated fertile land. Now if it is true that there is a possibility of a shortage of bread in the armies of the Allied powers, is that a question too large for the Government of this country to deal with? Would it not be possible for the Government to cammandeer a few million acres of that land and secure the necessary machinery and labour? It is not impossible to secure labour, I suppose. I understand that large numbers of Chinese have been taken from Northern China to work in the fields and trenches in France during this war. If we cannot get labour here at home, could not some such arrangement be made for getting labour of that kind from abroad? I think the suggestion is worthy of the minister's consideration. If we have years of war ahead of us, and there is danger of a shortage in wheat, we have now an opportunity to do a big thing in putting our armies in the field and those of our Allies beyond the fear of want. That is not too big a thing for the Government of this country to undertake.

Mr. WRIGHT: I just wish to say a word in reply to my hon. friend from Edmonton. He said that in England they had fixed a minimum price for wheat and had done so and so. We hear too much altogether about what is being done in England and the United States. If the hon. gentleman would only read to-day's papers he would see that no such arrangement has been made in England. In fact, the question is probably being discussed in the British House to-night while we are sitting here. I think it would be well if hon. gentlemen would post themselves before making such definite statements to the House. A question of this kind has two or three sides, and needs a lot of discussion. To-day's papers show the difficulties they are meeting with in England. I do not say that this will not be done in England; it will come to a head some day, but before we are directed to England and the United States for models which we should follow in our legislation here, it would be well to ascertain what they are really doing in England and the United States, or else let us go on our own hook and do the best we can without reference to other countries.

I do not know that it is a very wise thing for this Parliament to lay down a cast iron rule as to the price the farmer shall receive for his product. I do not know that our agricultural population all over this country are going to tamely submit to men in this House or outside fixing a cast-iron price for their product. We all know that for many years the farmers in both the East and the West had to accept very low prices indeed. I have known many cases where people in the East complained that farmers in the West were becoming millionaries when they were selling wheat from 55 to 60 cents a bushel, when, as a matter of fact, it was costing the farmer almost every cent of that to produce his wheat. So if our farmers can get a little more just now, I do not think they will take very kindly to dictation as to the price they shall receive for their product. At the same time I have no doubt that if an arrangement could be made guaranteeing them a fair price for a number of years, they might consent to reduce their prices very materially at the present time. But if two or three or four years from now they have to look forward to a price of 50 or 60 cents a bushel, you cannot blame them for trying to get a higher price at the present time. I think if an arrangement can be made delegating to certain people power to fix the price at which the millers and buyers from the older country can buy wheat, we should also fix the price at which the millers shall sell flour to the people. If we can secure wheat for the millers cheaper than they can buy it otherwise, it is up to them to supply flour to the people of Canada without exacting large profits. The great millers of this country have been making fairly decent returns during all the years that our farmers to my knowledge, have been producing their stuff at a very small margin. The millers have been making a good margin, and I think they ought to be content with a reasonable return on their investment. Six or seven per cent ought to be sufficient for any great company in times like these, and I think something might be done in that direction. In a country like this, occupying such a large area and with transportation and many other considerations to be taken into account, we cannot expect to have the margin reduced as fine as it is in the old country where the miller and the consumer are within a block of each other. A miller at Winnipeg, or Keewatin, or Montreal, for instance, has to send his flour one thousand or fifteen hundred miles to the consumer, whereas in England the mill is within a few rods of the consumer. In England, there is also a large number of consumers within a small area, whereas in Canada the consumers are scattered over a vast area. We cannot, therefore, expect to have the margin drawn as fine in Canada as in England, but I believe there is a feeling abroad all over this country that the margin could be reduced very materially without putting the millers out of business, and I should like to see some steps taken to bring the margin down as low as possible.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is exactly what is going on. The Board of Grain Supervisors went to Toronto on Friday night, and on Saturday had a conference with the food controller. The powers of the grain supervisors simply extend as far as grain and no further, but it is of great importance that they and the food controller should understand and work in complete unison with each other, and that is what it is intended to do. The work of regulating the food prices and making everybody supremely happy in the process is in the hands of Mr. Hanna at the present time.

Mr. OLIVER: Under what department of the Government does the food controller operate?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Under the Prime Minister, I think.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: I think I heard my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. Wright) say "something might be done." That is exactly what I think. Hon. gentlemen sit here listening to arguments and talking about wheat and grain, which is a subject that mostly concerns the grain growers of the West. We let them do whatever they like. I agree with my hon. friend that something ought to be done. We often hear it said that the farmer is making nothing, but I can assure the House that if the farmers are making nothing then the middlemen must be making a great deal, because it is a sure thing that the consumers of Montreal are paying plenty. There is no doubt about that. When the food controller tells us that we should not eat so much white bread and all the rest of it, it seems to me that it is high time something was done. The price of bread and flour is going up, and yet nothing is done except to talk politics. I want something practical done, and I think the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, who is a man of ideas and spunk, ought to do something for the cities, and especially for the city of Montreal and the city of Toronto.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Let me ask my hon. friend what more he needs? Has not the city of Montreal a mayor?

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: Yes, and Toronto has a mayor too. But it is not an argument to say "leave it to the mayor." In any event, I will take my right hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce at his word. If he wants to leave it to the mayor of Montreal, we will have flour and bread very cheap.

Mr. GLASS: I am sure every one will agree with the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. Wright) in his remarks concerning the duty of the Government and the desirability of control of the millers, so that they shall only obtain a reasonable profit for their work, and not be allowed to bleed the consumer as it appears they have done in the past. I do not, however, agree with him when he refers to the conditions as they exist in the United States and in England, and when he says we should not look to them, but we must act and consider these things for ourselves. I grant he is right to a limited extent, but, at a time like this, with a border three thousand miles long between Canada and the United States, and with free transportation between those two countries and free wheat passing in and out, what may be done by the United States in regard to the regulation of wheat prices interests us very materially indeed, and we have to be guided largely by their action. My hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) criticised the department for not having taken action in the matter of food control earlier, but he knows and everybody in this House knows it would be a physical impossibility to do anything at the present time, were it not for the fact that the United States is allied with us and that we are both working towards the same objects. Conditions have changed, and now the Government is able to appoint a food controller, because the food controller of the United States and the food controller of Canada can be in constant touch with each other, and whatever action is taken in the United States can be taken here. I think my hon. friend from Edmonton has very logically reasoned the conclusion to which he has come in reference to the fixing of minimum prices, when he said it involves no responsibility upon this Government. Of course it does not. We are an exporting country, and so is the United States, and it would be consummate folly for this Government to fix a minimum price for wheat were it not that they had some authority from the Allied Governments, or the British Government to make such an arrangement. England is calling to this country and to the Uuited States, and the call is for greater production of wheat. To say we are going to have a fixed or guaranteed price for one year is no encouragement to greater production. It may be an encouragement to a man who has already tilled his farm, to put in a little larger acreage than usual, but it is not of interest to the man who is about to work new land. My hon. friend from Muskoka says the members of this House ought to read the papers and know what the British Government did. I do not know what they are doing now, but over a year ago they fixed the price and graded it for a period of three years. Of course, in view of the changed conditions this may have to be amended. If the Allied Governments need our surplus wheat they will get it, and if they need the surplus wheat of the United States they will get it, and if it be possible for them to fix a minimum price let them put a graded price for two or three years or for the term of the war.

Mr. WRIGHT: If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Glass) will read the newspapers of to-day, he will find I have stated the matter exactly as it is.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Chapter 7 of the report of the grain commissioners for 1916, shows the annual weigh-out at terminal elevators. On page 27 I notice that the surplus of overweights for wheat alone in the year 1916 aggregated 612,843 bushels, which means that the elevator companies weighed in that amount more than they purchased. I notice that the Dominion Government elevators show a shortage, with two exceptions. The Dominion Government elevator at Port Arthur showed an overage of 95,168 bushels, and the interior elevator at Calgary showed an overage of 1,849 bushels. Those two elevators were short 11,087 bushels and 2,293 bushels respectively on oats. On barley, they were short 6,844 bushels and 1,091 bushels respectively. On flax, they were short 1,987 bushels, and 7,537 bushels respectively. If the Dominion Government elevator system shows an overage in wheat or any other grain, I would expect that the grain would be sold and the consolidated revenue fund of Canada would receive the benefit. These private elevators, which are working under Government supervision and regulation, show a surplus of over 612,000 bushels of grain, which at a price of $2 a bushel shows an actual steal of a million and a quarter dollars from the people of Canada. Is it not possible for the Government to so amend the Canada Grain Act that a condition of this kind could not possibly arise, and by which if any surplus is shown by those terminal elevator companies the money shall be turned over to the consolidated revenue fund of Canada for the benefit of the people of the country?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend uses a strong term as against the elevators. Let us look into the matter a little; 612,000 bushels of wheat massed by itself is a very considerable surplus, and the figures he has quoted in regard to the other grain are also large, standing by themselves, but, when you compare those figures with the total quantity of grain that came into and went out of the elevators, the percentage is really a very small one.

But what did we do in connection with these elevators? We have a system of allowances and of dockages. The elevator takes in its grain and is allowed on the different kinds of grain, and on the different grades of grain of the same kind, its proper dockages. That is to clean the grain according to the direction, or to the satisfaction, of the supervisor or inspector, and is to clean to grade where the dockage is allowed for cleaning to grade. These elevators, therefore, have a source of surplus. They get, for instance, one and a half per cent on wheat carrying a dockage of five per cent or more. That is pretty dirty wheat and requires a great deal of cleaning. They get an old time allowance which has been running ever since the grain business was a business in the West. It has no legal status, and never had, but it is a custom grown up, sanctioned and agreed to as between the farmers and the elevator companies. The companies get 30 pounds per car of wheat, 28 pounds per car of flax, 50 pounds per car of oats and 50 pounds per car of barley. Up to within two years ago the allowance they received from that old custom was just twice those amounts. Two years ago, or thereabouts. the board of grain commissioners cut that allowance in two and so diminished to that extent the contribution by the old custom. Then, the elevators may or may not take in certain grades of grain; for instance, no grade grain —that is tough or damp, or wheat that is not in a condition for warehousing. They are not required to receive that grain. They take it in under contract with the shipper himself and the amount which they take as dockage upon that, or shrinkage, is one per cent of the gross amount. That is, there is a dockage set by the inspector to clean to required grade when it is under five per cent. I read a little while ago the allowances for cleaning up to five per cent and over, these being the amounts of dockage on all clean-to-clean grain or cars where the grain has to be cleaned, re-cleaned and re-cleaned again if necessary until it comes up to the required condition and to the satisfaction of the inspector. Then the elevator takes its dockage and its screenings therefrom and these are the legitimate bases for the overages or surpluses which they have.

It may be a question as to whether or not the allowances and dockages have been in the past too great or are too great at the present time. That matter has been very carefully considered by the Board of Grain Commissioners. Up to the time that we built our own terminal we had nothing to go upon. There was no comparison as between, for instance, a Government run terminal and a corporate or privately run elevator. The inspection which could possibly be given could not afford ground for a reasonable judgment without our being guided by the running, under Government supervision, of a terminal and our knowing the whole of the management and inside work of that operation and how it turned out. That way you get your basis for comparison as between that and other elevators, and also as to what is a reasonable return in the way of dockage. Ever since these elevators have been running these overages have, with these dockages and allowances, lessened from time to time. These elevators have been receiving and claiming these surpluses. When the board of grain commissioners took over the work of operating they had an opportunity, amongst other things, of testing out the system for a series of years and coming to conclusions from the real working of the Government elevators as to their overages and their reasonableness. Some two years ago the question came up in an acute form and we were looking into the matter in the department. I laid the question before the Minister of Justice and asked him for his opinion as to whether we had the right to take these overages. After a careful examination of the question the opinion of the Justice Department was that whoever else had a right to them the Government had no right, that they were the property either of the elevators or they belonged to the producers of the grain out of whose product these overages were won. There were no possible means of restoring these to the producers of the grain themselves. Therefore, there is only one of two things to do. You can reduce the dockages from year to year so as to bring the overages down to a minimum, or reasonable allowance; or you can, by legislation, affirm that the Government is to take all of these overages, or such portion of them as you may think it reasonable to take, taking all the expenses into account. That matter is now, and has been for some time, occupying the attention of the Board of Grain Commissioners and of the department and myself. Before the House rises I propose to bring legislation before Parliament which will in a legal way define to whom these overages shall go. That is a review, though somewhat inadequate, of the question as it comes before the department.

Mr. MARTIN: I heard that a few moments ago the right hon. gentleman used my name in connection with the question of the cost of living in Montreal. Would the right hon. gentleman be kind enough to give me his power to act?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I consider that I would have taken an awful step if I had made the proposal to hand over all my powers to the mayor of the city of Montreal. I never could be so fatuous as to undertake that. I certainly did not mean to. If my hon. friend has rushed in here with the idea he was going to have my powers transferred to him I am sorry to disappoint him.

Mr. MARTIN: I thought we were serious people here, but if you are going to make a farce of it, all right.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If there is any farce to be enacted, my hon. friend will have an important part in it.

Mr. DOUGLAS: In connection with the question of the loading of grain at the elevator, there is another table at page 233 of this report of the grain commissioners which shows the number of cars, and the quantity and kind of grain inspected in 1916 for the western grain inspection division, and I find in that compilation, in the recapitulation by provinces, that Manitoba had, in screenings alone, 153,000 bushels; Saskatchewan had 150,000 bushels, and Alberta 34,000, making 337,000 bushels of screenings. If I understood the minister aright, he was claiming that part of the 612,000 bushels weighed into the terminal elevators included screenings.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Part of the surplus of the elevators would include screenings.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I do not understand this compilation sufficiently well to know, but it would look to me as though the 337,000 bushels of grain might possibly be over and above the 612,000 bushels weighed in at the elevators.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am not so certain about that. I will have to look into it a little before making a statement in reference to it. There may be something in what my hon. friend says as to that, but as to whether the screenings, which are taken out of their dockages, go to make up part of the overages, I do not know.

Mr. TURRIFF: There is no question at all that the 600,000 bushels overage is over and above the screenings, because when a car is inspected, and the inspector marks on it "4 per cent dockage" it means the net weight of that car is four per cent less than the gross weight, and they are supposed to clean that four per cent out, to bring the weight up to the grade that it is given by the inspector, so that the screenings do not come in, in connection with this amount of overage. All the different scales of dockage that the minister gave us a few minutes ago are supposed to be necessary to make an average car of grain weigh out what is paid for it, and it generally takes something about that to keep the accounts fairly evenly balanced. But when these elevators have 600,000 bushels over and above all that, to my mind there is something very wrong, and remember this is not wheat that is being brought in load by load. This is all carload stuff, all terminal elevator stuff, and it is all carload weights, and there must be something very careless in the manner of weighing in and weighing out, when we find such a tremendous overage as we have here. It appears that these private elevators have far greater overages than the Government elevators. I understand the weighers are all appointed by the Government and all Government officials, and have to account to the board of grain commissioners for the work they do. It seems rather strange to me that the private elevators should have so much overage, and the Government elevators should have such a shortage. When the Government elevators have a shortage, the people of Canada have to pay for it. Where the private elevators have an overage, it does not go to make up what the people of Canada lose, but the people of Canada lose that also. The farmers who grow the wheat lose it, and they have to help pay the shortage that is found in the Government run elevators, so that it seems to me that there must be a considerable amount of carelessness in connection with the weighing of this wheat. I am well aware that in the busy season, when there are two or three thousand cars a day to attend to, mistakes may naturally occur, but there should not be mistakes to such an extent, and it is a question that is well worth looking into. In this connection, I wish to bring up another matter in connection with shortages. Mr. Campbell, of Winnipeg, formerly an officer of the department under the grain commission, looked after all sorts of claims which individual farmers were not able to look after themselves; for some two or three years he has not been an official of the Government, but he has an office in the grain exchange in Winnipeg, and does this work for the farmers, and charges them a commission on what he collects. He has complained to me very, very many times, and has written to me about changes that should be made in the law for the protection of the farmer. In a great many cases a carload of wheat is shipped from an elevator, or a farmer loads it himself from his wagon, and he will put in, say, a thousand bushels of wheat, When that wheat goes down to Fort William, in dozens of cases—I will not say hundreds—it turns out all the way from 100 to 500 bushels short of the wheat that is put in there. The railway companies absolutely refuse to pay for the shortage. In some cases they have paid, but it has been more as a matter of leniency or perhaps charity. However, they refuse to acknowledge that they are responsible for any more wheat than is weighed out of that car at Port Arthur or Fort William, and in many cases that car looked all right when it was loaded, but owing to its being an old car, or something the matter with it, the grain has leaked out. I have walked along the railway track many a time and have seen where a regular stream of wheat had been coming out of the car as it went along, and the result is that the farmer is several hundred dollars out in the value of his car of wheat, and in many, many cases that farmer has to suffer the loss. On the one hand we have the farmer suffering a loss from one hundred to five hundred bushels on a car of wheat, and going to considerable trouble and expense, employing an agent work for months to try and collect the shortage, and, on the other hand, we have these elevators showing an overplus of 600,000 bushels of wheat in the last year, valued at a million and a quarter dollars. It seems to me there is something radically wrong in the system if the farmer has to lose the wheat, and the elevator companies are allowed to take that overage, because it is taken when they have no right to take it, by reason of the mistakes of the weighmen. When you find the private elevators having big overages, and the Government elevators having considerable shortages, and these companies putting a million dollars in their pockets last year through overages, the system must be wrong. If they get 600,000 bushels by way of overages, they get away with over a million dollars—and they fight to the last ditch against paying the farmer for the shortage. A number of cases have come before Mr. Campbell where there was absolutely no question as to the amount of wheat that was put in the car. When you load a 60,000 pound standard car so many inches deep with wheat, you can tell within 25 bushels how much wheat is in that car. When three or four men who helped load the car are prepared to take their oath that so many bushels of wheat were put in the car, surely there ought to be some quick way by which the farmer can get justice when it turns out that the car is from two to six hundred bushels short. I know one case where two farmers from the same town each shipped a carload of wheat. One man got four or five hundred bushels short; the other man got several hundred bushels over. Apparently the weight had been transferred from one car to the other. The man who got the overage, thereby gaining many extra dollars, was quite satisfied; but the other man, who was short a considerable sum, was unable to get his money.

I wish to submit to the Minister of Trade and Commerce one or two suggestions made by Mr. Campbell, in order that he may take them into consideration and see if he can incorporate them in his proposed amendments to the Manitoba Grain Act. I am glad to hear that my right hon. friend is going to bring forward those amendments this session. Mr. Campbell suggests that one means of overcoming this difficulty is to have the scale of inches put in all cars by the railway company. That simply means that a painted strip be put on the inside of each car, with the inches marked all the way up. He further suggests that all shippers show on bill of lading the number of inches of grain in the car. Of course, if in Saskatchewan you put 60 inches of wheat in a car, there will be four or five inches less in the car when it arrives at Fort William. A full carload of wheat, say five feet, will settle down about five inches while travelling that distance. But it is only fair—and it would be no hardship to the railway company—that if a farmer put 48 inches of wheat into a car and levels it off so that you can tell exactly what amount there is in the car, that amount should be shown in the bill of lading, so that if, when the car arrives at Fort William, it is 100 or 500 bushels short, the farmer has the bill of lading to show that he put so many inches of a certain grade of wheat into the car.

Mr. Campbell further suggests that an arbitration board be appointed to settle shortage disputes. The chairman of that board might be one of the members of the grain commission. At all events, there should be some one to settle these disputes when they arise, thus saving the farmer a great deal of expense.

Mr. Campbell further suggests that ticket form C be amended to prevent elevators taking an agreement or making a contract with a farmer whereby he agrees to accept outrun of car instead of amount of wheat stored. Although very few elevators would do anything of the kind, this is what has happened in some cases: a man puts three carloads of wheat in an elevator. He gets a storage ticket from the elevator for, say, 3,000 bushels of wheat. The elevator company takes from the farmer a contract—the farmer very often does not know it—whereby the farmer agrees beforehand to take whatever outrun the three cars of wheat, that they say they put 3,000 bushels into, may turn out at Fort William. When the farmer, finding a shortage of two or three hundred bushels in his wheat, comes to make a claim he is faced with this contract, whereby he agreed to take the outrun from the cars. There is absolutely nothing to show that they put into those cars the full amount of wheat that was in store. That is something that should be dealt with at the first opportunity.

Mr. Campbell further suggests that subsection 4, clause 26, should be put back in the Act. When I was talking to Mr. Campbell I was familiar with that particular subsection, but I forget now just what it is. This subsection, however, was taken out, and Mr. Campbell thinks that it should be put in again.

These are the suggestions that Mr. Campbell made to me. He is a practical man; I have known him for the last thirty-five years. He has been a grain buyer and dealer for many years; he has done good work during the last five or ten years in looking after the claims of the farmers. He knows how to go about it; he knows all the railway and grain authorities, inspectors, members of the commission. In dozens of cases he has collected all the way from $50 to $500 or $600 from the railway companies for the farmers. In a large number of cases, however, they have absolutely refused to pay, and the farmers have had to go short. It is between the railroad company and the elevator company that the shortage takes place. In some cases the grain leaks out of the car; that is the fault of the railway, not of the farmer. In other cases the shortage is due to mistakes in the elevators, either on the part of the grain weighers, or by connivance in the elevators. These suggestions of Mr. Campbell's, if adopted, would go a long way towards preventing these shortages, and, if the shortages did actually occur, they would enable the matter to be settled quickly and with a minimum of expense, thus saving to the farmer heavy losses that have been occurring for many years.

When one considers the amount of these overages by which the elevator companies last year made more than a million dollars, and when one thinks of the way in which they will fight a farmer when he is being done out of a hundred or four hundred or five hundred bushels of grain, it is really atrocious that they should have all that overage to themselves and be so niggardly in paying up losses that occur either in their elevators or upon the railway that carries the wheat from the farmer's elevator or from his platform down to the head of the lakes.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I will certainly look into the matter and have my officers consider the suggestions made. When my hon. friend was speaking about the shortages and overages, he seemed to imply that the Government elevators also had shortages—

Mr. TURRIFF: Not all.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: —and that the other elevators had overages. He will see that the terminal elevator at Fort William had fairly large overages as well. The work of some of the internal elevators during their first season was probably not as good nor as accurate as it would be after they got well started at work. We are hoping to show a different record for the terminal elevators this year from what they showed the year before.

Mr. TURRIFF: Perhaps I was wrong in even suggesting that there might be any intentional crooked work, and I do not wish to make that suggestion, because in the quantity of grain handled, the elevator companies, by being excessively careful to make themselves right, might easily gather up that quantity, as it is only a little over a bushel or a bushel and a half per car, but that is much more than is necessary. The idea that my right hon. friend expressed a little while ago, that one way was to cut down the quantity of dockage the elevators were allowed to take, might perhaps bring about a remedy. I am not so much worried about the overages as over the shortages from which the farmers have to suffer, and for which they do not receive payment.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend has to keep this in view—in 1915-16, there were received at Fort William and Port Arthur 286,000,000 bushels of wheat alone. This all commenced away back on the farms of the farmers. It has to go through many vicissitudes, changes, handlings, which cannot be made mathematically accurate. In the first place, there is the interior elevator at the station. The quantity of grain is weighed into that elevator. The first element that comes in is the weighing machine of the elevator into which the farmer loads his grain. It is impossible to make constant and repeated inspections of all these interior elevator weighing equipments. Large weights are necessary, and it would take an army of men to have those examined every now and then during the prevalence of the season. You may to-day send your men there, and they may test that weighing machine and put it into the best of order, and five days later something may have gone wrong and the weighing may not be as accurate as it should be. There is the first contingency in the thousands and thousands of country elevators where the farmer's grain is weighed. Then when the farmer's grain takes its next excursion, it goes into a car and is carried for thousands of miles down to the terminal elevator. Cars are different one from another; some are new and some are old. There will be leakages and dispersals in that way. But when you come to examine the number of cars that make the journeys and the small number of instances in which these deficiencies occur and, therefore, these grievances arise, the latter number is only a small percentage of the whole. The railway company is liable for the quantity of grain that it receives being delivered at the terminal elevator. The elevator takes charge of the grain from the car and cannot be debited with more than the car turns out into it, but you come there against another fallible piece of machinery, namely, the weighing apparatus. The terminal elevators are under the close supervision of the weighmaster, and the weighmaster at the head of the lakes is a most capable man. If my hon. friend knows him, he will bear me out in that appreciation of Mr. White, who has had charge of the elevators at the head of the lakes for the last three years. The weighing there has been very much improved, and it is as carefully watched and supervised as it is possible for human care to supervise it. Mistakes will always be made there will be errors and, in some instances, there may be intentional errors. That is part of a system which you can probably never entirely eliminate, but which by good supervision and constant care you may reduce to a minimum. Therefore, when we speak about those cases that did occur, we must, in the first place, take them in connection with the very large number of cars and the great quantity of grain which is in passage, and we must also take into account the human element and the mechanical element which come in, either of which is apt to go astray and awry at different times. Taking all these into consideration, I think I am perfectly right in saying that during the last five or six years there has been a very great improvement in the management of the grain handling apparatus under the supervision of the Grain Board. Whilst there are those individual and sparse cases of trouble and difficulty, in the main, the grain producers and handlers in the West appreciate the system and give it as their opinion that, taken altogether, it is constantly improving, and is, taking human and mechanical fallibility into account, pretty nearly as perfect as it can be made. By increased care and supervision improvement is continually being made, and I hope we shall do something with this matter of overages and shortages that will be satisfactory. The last few years have been a testing and weighing out time. We have now a record which I think we can bank upon as being fairly correct, and it is a basis on which legislation may be had and adjustments be made.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I appreciate the fact that on a percentage basis the elevator companies are, perhaps, not very careless in having an overage of 612,000 bushels of grain for the year 1916, but that is not the point I wish to bring before the minister. My point is this: The terminal elevator is an institution that is put there for a certain specified purpose, namely, to handle the grain of the dealer at the point of embarkation.

The point I wish the minister to adjust is this: That any surpluses there might be over, should not become the property of the terminal elevator company, because it is not legally their money. They charge what is supposed to be a reasonable fee for handling the grain, and there is no more reason why they should be permitted to retain what does not legally belong to them than why the banks should retain unclaimed balances; the two things are in exactly the same position. Surely it is possible to amend the Grain Act in such a way that the private elevator companies will not be allowed to take grain that does not belong to them.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I quite agree with my hon. friend, but just how far we can go I cannot say at the moment.

Mr. BUCHANAN: The minister has been willing to give us plenty of information tonight on matters that have come before the committee, and I should like him to make a statement on the appointment of the new chairman of the grain commission. The farmers of western Canada feel the loss of Dr. Magill very keenly. They looked on him as a real friend on a very important commission dealing with their affairs and I think many of them felt that the Government would have been warranted in offering him considerable inducements to remain at the head of that commission. I question whether there is any man who understands the grain trade better than Dr. Magill. When he was first appointed he was even then an authority, and I am sorry that in appointing his successor the Government did not look around for another authority. I cannot understand why a Montreal lawyer was chosen as chairman of the grain commission, and I would ask the minister to inform the House of the knowledge this gentleman has of the grain trade—which I am afraid is very little. If the minister had asked me—of course, I know he would not—I think I could have named a very good man in case Dr. Magill could not have been prevailed upon to remain as chairman, and the man I have in mind happens to be a political friend of the minister. I have come in touch with the chairman of the Georgian Bay commission within the last year or two, and I must confess that he has a very wide knowledge of the requirements of the farmers of western Canada. Mr. Sanford Evans has visited the West and given addresses there, and he has in my judgment proved himself to be an authority on western needs in connection with the grain trade. Mr. Boyd may be a very estimable and a very able gentleman, but the people of the West cannot understand why a lawyer from Montreal, who I am satisfied has no acquaintance with the grain business, should have been appointed to succeed Dr. Magill. Dr. Magill, as I have said, was an authority, and an authority should have been chosen to succeed him, and from all I can gather the gentleman who has been appointed is not an authority by any means. I am sure the minister will give us some reason for the appointment of Mr. Boyd as chairman of that commission.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I shall be very glad to give an explanation, but I cannot guarantee that it will satisfy my hon. friend. There was a time in Dr. Magill's life when he did not understand anything about the grain business. He was a professor in a university, a student above all else, and a man of great mental power and ability. He learned the grain business from that standpoint, a business which was absolutely different from all his training and work up to that time. I merely mention that to show that it is not necessary for a man to have been brought up on a farm or in a grain exchange or to have been otherwise closely connected with the work of handling and raising grain in order to make himself thoroughly acquainted with the business of helping to conduct the mechanism of the grading, inspection, and handling of grain. I cordially agree with everything my hon. friend has said with reference to Dr. Magill, and I am strongly of the belief that when the people of the West are as well acquainted with Mr. Boyd as they became with Dr. Magill, they will come to look upon him as their friend, and a fair and able administrator of the office of chairman. I used a great deal of care when looking around for some one to take the place of Dr. Magill. I would have kept him if it had been possible to do so, but it was not possible; he had to go and I could not retain him. So I did the best I could to get some one to take his place. Finally Mr. Boyd was selected. Mr. Boyd, I was informed by gentlemen who are well qualified to judge—and my inquiry was very thorough—is a gentleman of excellent ability, of the very highest character, and thoroughly reliable in every respect. He is, besides, of an energetic, industrious, and studious disposition. He does not take the office simply for the sake of getting the salary attached to the position. After a good deal of correspondence with me he accepted the position with a desire and a liking on his part to make a thorough study of the whole subject, with the object of making himself an approved authority on it. With that ability, that training, and industry and desire of his, I am quite certain he will prove a success as chairman of the commission. He is associated with practical men who understand the grain business, both from the elevator and the farmer's point of view, and consequently the commission is broad in that it can call upon men of different kinds of experience and ability.

There is one thing to the advantage of Mr. Boyd, and that is, he has had a legal training and is in good standing as a lawyer. To my mind, a legal knowledge and legal training plays a very important part in the successful carrying out of the duties of chairman of the grain commission. These are the reasons why I chose Mr. Boyd. He has undertaken the work, and I bespeak for him a fair trial. I shall be very much disappointed indeed if he does not turn out to be a very successful member and chairman of the commission.

Mr. BUCHANAN: I think I was right in stating that Dr. Magill was an authority before he became chairman of the grain commission. While he was connected with Dalhousie University, the Saskatchewan Government appointed him chairman of a commission to inquire into the elevator question, and he there acquired a considerable knowledge of the grain business. He had the knowledge and the qualifications to become chairman of the grain commission. He was also thoroughly acquainted with the grain trade of the West. The gentleman who has been appointed to succeed him may be all the minister says he is, but he has not the knowledge of the grain business. I hope he acquires it as rapidly as the minister thinks he will, and I hope he may be a success.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: I agree entirely with what has been said by the Minister of Trade and Commerce with regard to Mr. Leslie Boyd. Admitting that a political friend of the Government had to be named, I think the Government could not have chosen a better man for the position. As the minister says, Mr. Boyd is a good lawyer and a practical man in every respect, and he was a good alderman of the city of Montreal for many years, which is something.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It certainly is something.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: He resigned his seat to take up this new position, and I think the Government has made a first-class appointment. I believe my hon. friend from Lethbridge (Mr. Buchanan) knows Mr. Boyd.

Mr. BUCHANAN: I met him with my hon. friend (Mr. L. A. Lapointe)

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: The only thing that seems to worry my hon. friend from Lethbridge is the fact that Mr. Boyd may not have very much knowledge of the grain business. That may be so, but I am sure he will acquire that knowledge as quickly as he acquired other knowledge which was useful to him. I feel he will be a practical man, and a splendid man for the position.

Mr. OLIVER: I would like to ask the minister in regard to the permission given to the railway companies last winter to refuse the carriage of grain from points in Alberta to Fort William. During a part of last winter the railway companies operating in Alberta refused to carry grain to Fort William. Although they would take it to the internal elevators. I would like to know under what conditions that refusal was made?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Under conditions of great congestion and insufficient haulage which obtained there for a considerable time. A great quantity of the grain was insufficiently stored and there was great necessity of getting it moved as quickly as possible. It was entirely a matter of railway transport, and I consulted with the chairman of the railway board, Sir Henry Drayton, and he took the question up with the railway companies, and instituted this system of more rapid transit of the grain from the places where it was originally stored, and where in very many cases it was insecurely stored. A certain railway division was told to use its cars to bring the grain to a transition point, and then go back and get more, using the cars as quickly as possible, in order to take away the great quantities of wheat which were lying there and about the removal of which the people were rightly clamour-

10 p.m.

ing. Then another railway took the grain at an internal elevator, say Saskatoon, and moved it the other distance down. If the cars which were loaded at the distant points west of Saskatoon had to go all the way to Fort William and back, there was a usage and a delay of cars. If they could use their somewhat insufficient force to go short distances and do rapid haulage, they got the advantage of storage in a safe place, with as good conditions in the matter of cost as could possibly be given. The two sets of cars working together constituted a more expeditious way than could be got by any other means of handling the grain and of relieving the congestion in country places. This system was worked out by the chairman of the Railway Board, and the railway companies. Everything possible was done with the idea of moving the grain as quickly as it could be moved from the congested and threatened districts. I say threatened, because of the insecure storage much of the grain being stored in open fields.

Mr. OLIVER: By what authority did the railway companies refuse to take the grain?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If the railway companies refused to take grain, I suppose they refused to take it on the ground that all railway companies refuse at certain times of congestion to add to the congestion by piling more grain into cars which cannot find an ultimate resting place to be unloaded, and the cars get back again. When you have congestion towards the front, and that congestion becomes so great that if you pile more freight in, it simply adds to the difficulty, then as a matter of sensible haulage the railway company says: We cannot take any more until this forward portion is relieved. Last year there was this congestion of freight from New York, Baltimore, Boston, and Portland. The freight was piled up along thousands of miles, and every storage facility was filled to the very roof. Finally, it became necessary that these embargoes should be put on. The embargo is a part of the system of railway transport, and although it may be unsatisfactory for the person who has a car of grain and wants it taken out at a certain time, in the end it works out for better transportation in general.

Mr. OLIVER: I shall have to take issue with my right hon. friend on this point. I would like to know, if he can tell me—and if he cannot the Minister of Railways is beside him and may be able to give the information—whether the railway companies refused on their own initiative to haul the grain, or if they did it under authority from any department of the Government, or any commission acting for the Government?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: So far as I know the embargo was on, and I received notice of it. As soon as I was notified, I immediately took the question up to see what could be done in order to relieve conditions. I got in touch with the man who is best able, taking a general view of the matter and having general authority, to bring order out of confusion and to regulate so that the best haulage might be had. He went into the question very thoroughly with the railway companies, and they did the best they could.

Mr. OLIVER: The minister has not mentioned the name of this gentleman.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Sir Henry Drayton.

Mr. OLIVER: Was the course followed by the railway companies taken with the authority of the railway commission?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am informed the embargoes are always put on by the railway companies themselves.

Mr. OLIVER: If they did it with the authority of the railway commission, the people who were affected will have to hold the Government directly responsible for the consequences they have suffered.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not know whether that reasoning is correct.

Mr. OLIVER: That is the reasoning I have to make. I wish to put the case to the Government as forcibly as it is possible to put it. There is supposed to be a public right which is expressed in what is known as the Common Carriers law. That is a law, which, as far as I know, was never set at defiance publicly and without cause until last year. All that my right hon. friend has said about the stress of circumstances compelling the railway companies to do thus and so on account of certain conditions existing does not apply, because these conditions did not exist last year. They existed the year before, but not last year. Last year it was not a question of a heavy crop but of a short crop.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is more than the crop; it has to do with the conditions of general freightage.

Mr. OLIVER: Last year there was a very short crop and there was not the same burden of tonnage as there was in previous years. There was not at any time last winter a shortage of storage at Fort William and if the railways did not haul grain forward to Fort William and to Minneapolis it was because they refused to do it and not because they could not do it. The result was very serious loss and damage to the farmers, particularly of Alberta. These railway companies offered to haul the farmers' grain to the interior storage elevator at Calgary, which would be a back haul, or to Saskatoon or Moosejaw. For what purpose were these storage elevators built? They were supposed to be built for the advantage of the farmers. They were supposed to meet a condition of grain blockade as a result of shortage of storage at the head of the lakes or of undesirable weather conditions. Neither of these conditions prevailed last year. Whether the action taken by the railway companies was simply to make matters easy for themselves, or whether it was taken at the instance of the Government in order to turn their elevators into earning propositions, I do not know, but I do know that the farmer producer of Alberta lost very considerably because of the failure of the railways to take the grain forward to Fort William or Minneapolis when it was desired that it should go forward. The statement that the railway companies were short of cars is a statement that I for one cannot give credence to. The railways were able to handle the crop production of the year before though immensely larger than the crop of last year. Everybody recognizes that if they had difficulties last year they were able to handle that immense crop of the year before during the period of transportation. Therefore, as there was no destruction of rolling stock in the meantime, as they still had it, there was no reason to believe they were not able to haul that grain forward as the needs of the country demand that they shall carry it forward; that is when the farmer desires to ship it. Any other construction placed upon the duty of the railways to the public is a wrong construction.

It is fitting in this connection, that I should draw to the attention of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane) the action taken by the railway companies in the vicinity of Edmonton in regard to the haulage of coal, where at the beginning of winter, and at the time the Southern Alberta coal strike was on, the railways, because of some disagreement between themselves, or for some other reason that no man can find out, absolutely tied up the coal industry between Edmonton and the consumers of coal on the prairies at a most critical time of the year. I am not one of those who look upon the railway companies with any desire to see them do other than prosper but I do want to see it impressed upon them that they enjoy the privileges which they do enjoy as the servants and not the masters of the public. I look to this Government, in the discharge of their responsibilities and duties to see that the railway companies do their duty to the public as they did not do it last year in the province of Alberta.

Mr. BUCHANAN: Not long ago a deputation of Vancouver business men visited Calgary and made the statement that after seeing some members of the Government in Ottawa it would not be long before grain was moving westward to the Pacific. They said they had the assurance of one of the members of the Government that they were going to force the grain to the West and through by the Pacific route. The only member of the Government who could make a statement of that kind that would be official would be the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who is in charge of the operations of the grain trade and I would like to know if he could give us any information about forcing grain through by the Pacific route.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The Minister of Trade and Commerce never gave an assurance of that kind and never had any thought of that kind. It is not within his power to force grain. Grain has to go according to the natural channels. Under the circumstances which have existed for two years at least, and which especially have existed during the past year, any attempt to force grain through by way of Vancouver and the Panama canal is absolutely impossible. My hon. friend will see that in a moment if he begins to think over the conditions as they exist. It is desirable that as soon as possible a shipment of grain shall be made by Vancouver and through the Panama canal for various reasons. Such a shipment, as soon as it can be made under anything like normal conditions, will solve two questions which are a little in doubt. One of them, not very much in doubt, is as to whether grain in bulk will bear the passage through the canal without being injured or going wrong. The other is as to the commercial and economic possibilities of shipping grain through that route. But under these abnormal conditions you can settle that second question. I am in communication now with the British authorities with the view of having one of the British vessels which are being constructed on the Pacific coast, when she is finished and sails for Great Britain, take a cargo of bulk grain for the purpose of settling a doubt that has been expressed, although I do not think there is very much in it, namely, that bulk grain cannot be carried through the Panama canal. I believe there is no doubt it can be carried, and I hope before the season is over that a shipment of bulk grain will in that way go through from the West and through the Panama canal.

Trade and Commerce—Supervision lake and ocean freight rates, $6,000.

Mr. OLIVER: There was a charge this summer that lake freight rates were very high. Does this vote mean that there is any supervision or that any supervision can be exercised?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This is a vote that was put in the year before last when I contemplated the appointment, if I could get the proper man, of a supervisor of lake and ocean freights. But the conditions have been so abnormal on the ocean and, to a certain extent, upon the lake, that I have not made the appointment, and we will have to get back to something like normal times before any good can come from the appointment of such an officer. So that this is a vote for the appointment of such an officer when the time becomes suitable.

Mr. OLIVER: Is this merely a vote for an officer who will secure information, or is it a vote for an officer who will exercise some authority?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Primarily, it is for an officer who will secure information. The Department of Trade and Commerce has a system of subsidized services running to different parts of the world. There is always a question of freight rates coming up. We had no expert in the department, and I had not myself the expert knowledge which is necessary to guide decisions which the department and the minister must give oftentimes with reference to freight rates. I wanted an officer of that kind who would be the information bureau of the department with reference to freight rates, and then, with that information, the department could probably do more than it has been doing, even in the past, in the regulation or control of freight rates.

Mr. OLIVER: What measure of control or regulation has the Government in regard to lake rates?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It has none. We have no subsidized services on the lakes, and we only have power to control or regulate the freight rates charged by subsidized services. There has been, as my hon. friend knows, negotiations with the British Government for some years back with reference to getting a concerted action between the United Kingdom and Canada, and, if possible, the United States, with reference to some general supervision of ocean rates. But nothing has transpired, although a good deal of attention has been given to it, and the war, of course, has stopped all those matters for the time being.

Mr. OLIVER: Is Canada still paying subsidies to the mail steamship lines?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: The Government has not any control of rates?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: All the contracts with subsidized lines are signed, of course, by the minister, and the schedule of rates chargeable is within the control of the minister.

Mr. OLIVER: For freights?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: From what I have heard, the minister must be very liberal in the allowance for freights, because the general impression is that freights are very high.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The freights are very high, and fifteen hundred thousand ministers could not have done much during war time to make any different rates.

Mr. OLIVER: I would suggest that, when rates are so high, and business demands that they be high, might not the subsidy we pay them be fairly withdrawn, on the same principle that the bonus that we pay to the lead smelting companies, when prices are beyond a certain figure, is reduced? The steamship companies are making more money than before the war, and surely we might save the money we are paying for subsidies.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We might if we took away the subsidies, and we would then have no longer any control over the lines, which are mail lines. These mail lines must conform, in their dates of sailing, and as to the ports of sailing, and the like of that, to their contract with us. We must have control of those things for the sake of the mails, and we keep that control and exercise it, because we subsidize them. They have to sign contracts and abide by those contracts. We might also impose certain rates of freight on them, but if the rates that we fixed were less than the rates that could be got from ports to the south of us, we would run the risk of losing our lines entirely.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not wish to speak about ocean rates, but in regard to the lake boats, there was a time this season when the boats were charging seven cents a bushel from Fort William to Midland. That is a very high rate. It was not a case of supply and demand, but a case of hold up. The lakes are common property between Canada and the United States, and if it is not possible for this Government to control the grain rate on lake boats on our side of the lakes, perhaps the Government would consider the matter of entering into a reciprocity treaty with the United States, so as to secure a control of rates on the lake lines. This is a matter surely within our reach, and while I am perfectly willing that the companies should make reasonable profits, everybody will admit that a seven cent rate is not within the bounds of reason, and is not a case of payment for services rendered, but a case of hold up, and should not be permitted.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There might be, in normal times, some chance of a dual control by co-operation in that way, in regard to the traffic on the lakes, although it is a complex question, taking into account the ore and coal and grain, which constitutes the chief part of the freight, but at the present time I do not think any thing would come from an attempt to regulate the rates between the two countries. My hon. friend does not take that seven cent rate that he spoke about as an index of the general rate. I think the rates were about two or two and a quarter cents the last time I inquired.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

The House in Committee on Bill No. 13, to consolidate and amend the Railway Act.—Hon. Frank Cochrane.

Mr. Blain in the Chair.

Mr. COCHRANE: On the 18th July I accepted an amendment prepared by my hon. friend from Rouville and proposed by the hon. gentleman from Rimouski, which reads as follows:

All railway employees on local passenger trains running in the province of Quebec, having to deal with the travelling public, shall be conversant with the English and French languages from and after January 1, 1919.

There has been strong objection to this amendment on the ground that it would cut men out of their seniority. For instance, a man running on a freight train to Prescott or Brockville would be prevented from being promoted, say, to a passenger train running to Montreal, because he was not able to speak French. I feel that the amendment suggested by the member for Muskoka (Mr. Wright) will meet the situation far better. I move that section 302 be amended by adding thereto the following as subsection 3:

After the 1st day of January, 1919, the Board may from time to time make such orders and regulations as it may deem advisable to provide that all or any railway employee on local passenger trains running in the province of Quebec shall be conversant with the English and French languages.

I am sure that none of us want to injure the railway men, or deprive them of their right of promotion. Neither my hon. friend nor myself thought of this when the amendment was made. I hope that the committee will accept the proposed change.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I thought that the amendment had been drafted in such a way as to meet all possible objections. It was at the suggestion of the Minister of Railways and Canals that the amendment was drafted in that form. However, I am sure that nobody would like to cause any injustice to the conductors. My hon. friend realizes that there are some grievances—I mentioned some the other day. I hope that the board of railway commissioners will not allow this amendment to remain on the statute book as a dead letter. Under the circumstances, I agree to accept my hon. friend's further amendment, because I know that he is well disposed towards the conductors and towards the public. The very fact of inserting the amendment now moved by my hon. friend and the publicity the matter has had since it was brought before the committee may produce the desired effect of inducing the conductors on all local trains in the province of Quebec to learn both languages.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 215—expropriation proceedings:

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: At their last meeting the committee were good enough to say that clauses 215 and 232 should pass if they were amended so as to include the provision with regard to arbitration made in the clause of the old Act. The law clerk has carefully gone over these clauses and the member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) has spent an hour and a half of his valuable time in assisting in that work. They are satisfied that the clauses as amended are correct and that they will meet with the approval of the committee.

Clauses 215 and 232 have been amended by restoring the old arbitration proceedings before three arbitrators or a sole arbitrator, keeping the law in that respect the same as it is at the present time, and making the necessary verbal changes in the section as directed by the Committee of the Whole at its last sitting. These changes have been checked over by the member for Carleton. Section 196 and 197 of the old Act replace section 219 and 220 of the Bill. Section 206 of the old Act becomes section 229, but subsection 3 of section 229 remains. Subsection 3 of section 223, forbidding arbitrators to take any fees, is struck out. The other clauses have been amended verbally to make them agree with the other changes. I therefore move that the clauses as amended do pass.

Motion agreed to.

Sections 215 and 232, as amended, agreed to.

On section 380—statistics and returns:

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: A central department of statistics, which is attached to my department, is working along the line of centralizing and co-ordinating the economic statistics of the Government and of co-operating and co-ordinating with all the different provincial governments so as to prevent overlapping and to carry out an accurate, thorough and reliable system of general Dominion statistics.

In this Bill, section 384 and those that follow it and are conjoined with it provide for the complete gathering of statistical information for the administrative work of the board of railway commissioners. Those statistics are necessary for the work of the board, and they must gather them as they please and according to their own methods. Sections 379, 380 and 381 provide for a statistical return to the minister himself, covering exactly the same ground, not for administrative, but for economic purposes. In that way, they cover the ground which is covered by the central department of statistics and they make a duplication of effort and of expense. But more than that, being not under one management as regards methods, schedules and information to be gathered, they do not serve the purposes of comparison, and the idea is that these statistics should be gathered by the central department of statistics, so as to prevent duplication and confusion. This also has the other effect that you do not bother the companies with a duplication or a triplication of demands upon them for practically the same information. My suggestion is that all the statistics are provided for in section 384 and the co-related sections.

Mr. CARVELL: Section 384 in my copy provides that the returns cannot be used in a court of law except in case of default or perjury or something of that kind.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Section 384 in my copy provides for the gathering of statistics.

Mr. CARVELL: Section 385 in my copy is the same as the one the minister is speaking about. There must have been a renumbering of the sections. We agree upon the section anyway.

On the motion of Sir George Foster, sections 379, 380, 381 and 382 were stricken from the Bill.

Mr. CARVELL: That will require a renumbering of sections to the end of the Bill.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The clerk of the House will look after that.

Mr. CARVELL: Has the minister gone over this copy to see that the provisions of what is section 384 in my copy and which I suppose will be 383 in the minister's copy are provided by the present section 384. Section 384 in my copy or section 383 in the minister's copy says:

> All returns made in pursuance of any of the provisions of this Act last preceding shall be privileged communications, and shall not be evidence in any court whatsoever, except in any prosecution for,—
> (a) default in making such returns in accordance with the requirements of this Act;
> (b) perjury in making any oath required by this Act in connection with such returns;
> (c) forgery of any such return; or,
> (d) signing any such return knowing the same to be false.

That is an important provision. It is quite right that many of these statistics should be treated as confidential, but if the company makes a false return, or fails to make a proper return, there ought to be some right to sue it for the purpose of securing a conviction. I turn to subsection (5) of the section which the minister purposes retaining, and it seems to carry out the same idea, but I would like to know whether it goes far enough. The subsection says:

> The Board may authorize any part of such information to be made public when, and in so far as there may appear to the Board to be good and sufficient reason for so doing.

I suppose that would give the board the power to go into any court of law.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes. There is a proviso after that:

> Provided that if the information so proposed to be made public by the Board, is of such character that such company would, in the opinion of the Board, be likely to object to the publication thereof, the Board shall not authorise such information to be published without notice to such company.

Mr. CARVELL: There are no powers taken away. I only want to make plain that there is nothing to prevent the board using this information for the purpose of punishing negligence or the making of false returns.

Bill reported.

On the motion of Hon. Mr. Cochrane for the third reading of the Bill.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Might I respectfully urge that the House consent to the third reading to-night, as I understand the Senate have very little before them to-morrow and would be able to devote the whole day to this Bill, if passed.

Mr. BUREAU: I understand that some hon. gentlemen who are not now present have some amendments to offer, and I would therefore suggest that the Bill be not given its third reading until the next sitting of the House.

On motion of Sir George Foster, the House adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

Tuesday, July 24, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

FORBIDDEN CIRCULATION IN CANADA.

THE CENSORSHIP.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I might say to the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) that I expect we shall be able shortly to make a statement in connection with the exclusion from Canada of the book called "The Fiddlers," which he brought to our attention. One of the chief objections to the book is that it contains certain statements which are entirely unwarranted with regard to the conduct of the men of the Canadian Expeditionary Force. I think it proper that whenever any action is taken in the matter some statement should be made expressing the view of the Government as to the absolute unreliability of the book, so far as these statements are concerned. To-morrow, or, at the outside, Thursday, we shall be able to make a full statement to the House.

In connection with the same matter, my hon. friend from Russell (Mr. Murphy) asked me about the deputy chief censor, and, speaking on the spur of the moment, I am afraid I rather confused the press censor and the deputy chief censor. I should like to make the matter perfectly clear. The action in this case was taken on the report of the chief press censor for Canada, that is Lieutenant-Colonel E. J. Chambers, who is an officer under the Secretary of State. He is not connected with the British press censorship in any way, but is an independent officer acting in this country and discharging in this country the same functions as the chief press censor discharges in the United Kingdom. I confused him for the moment with the deputy chief censor, Lieutenant-Colonel C. F. Hamilton, who is administering in Canada the cable and wireless censorship. He is an officer of the Department of Militia and Defence, and works in co-operation with the chief censor in London, who is the head of the cable and wireless censorship for the whole Empire. I should also add that there is an additional officer who has duties in connection with censorship in this country, that is Dr. Coulter, the Deputy Postmaster General, who is the chief mail censor for Canada. There has been more or less confusion in the nomenclature regarding these various officers, both in this country and in the United Kingdom. I think it is desirable to make this statement to the House, and I hope it is perfectly intelligible.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT—1917.

THIRD READING OF THE BILL.

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister) moved the third reading of Bill No. 75, respecting Military Service.

Mr. J. G. TURRIFF (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, as I happened to be absent during most of the discussion on the second reading of the Bill, I desire now to say a few words, as I think it is due to my constituents to explain why I am supporting the Bill, especially as, in doing that, I am voting contrary to my leader and to the majority of the members who sit around him. Let me say here that while I am taking this course I claim that I am staying absolutely by the policy of the Liberal party that was enunciated at the time the war broke out; which was that Canada should put every man, every resource, and every dollar at the back of the Empire to win this war. That was the policy of this House until notice was given of this Bill. But as recruiting has largely fallen off, it seems to me that the provision in this Bill is the only sensible way, the only proper way, in which we can secure the necessary men to carry on the war, as I understood it was the policy of both sides of the House to carry it on.

I voted against submitting the matter to a referendum for two reasons. One was that if it carried it did not lead us anywhere, so far as I could see. The second reason was that a referendum on the straight question of conscription or no conscription was beaten before it started. We have one province that is practically solid against it, rich and poor, learned and simple, Liberal and Conservative alike. We have also a very large foreign vote throughout the country, and I do not think that any one could expect that the Germans and Austrians would vote to be conscripted to fight against their own countries. Then, joined to these two large votes, you would have practically every slacker from the Atlantic to the Pacific, who would take that position, and in my judgment conscription would be beaten on a referendum. In my judgment also, and I say it in all kindness, the great majority of the members who in this House voted for conscription voted for it on the understanding that it could not possibly carry on a vote in the country. Well, while I would endorse the statement that if the majority would vote for it it ought to be the law of the land, I think a time may come when the majority should not say what the law of the land will be. That may not sound logical, but remember that we are at war, and the first consideration is to win the war, and if, by any vote that may be taken on a referendum, conscription would be turned down, what possible chance have we to win the war? Does any man think that after this coming election is over, with all the hard things that will be said, all the bitter things that will be said by our friends from Ontario, from the West, and from Quebec, from all over the Dominion, that there will be much recruiting in Quebec by the voluntary system, or in Ontario, or in the West? This election will end voluntary recruiting. My friends here, many of them, say that we will be able to get the men. Well, if that is the case, why not go a little bit further and unite everybody and say that if we do not get the men by the voluntary system to enable Canada to maintain the position which she has taken all along, then we will apply the law and get them in that way. That seems to me to be a reasonable position. But many do not view it in that light. They have as good a right to their opinion as I have to mine, but my opinion is that we are out to win this war.

Now, how are we going to win the war if our four divisions at the front keep dropping off?—and can any one imagine from reading the papers to-day that we are near the end of the war? Look at what is going on. I read in the papers yesterday that, since the first of January of this year, three million, five hundred and seven thousand and some odd tons of shipping had been sunk by German submarines—over three and a half millions of tons. And to-day Germany is holding back her enemies on every front, and what will be the result if we do not maintain our position in the lines? Mr. Speaker, I received a letter only the day before yesterday from an officer in high command at the front. I know him fairly well. He is a thoroughly reliable man, and a friend of the members on this side of the House. In that letter he says:

> I hope the coalition is a success and conscription becomes law. We are getting short of men, and if any serious fighting takes place in the near future our supply of reserves here will be about depleted. If the 5th Division is sent to France as an independent fighting unit before we get more reinforcements, it will leave us in a very bad state for reinforcements. I hope they leave the 5th Division until conscription gets in good working shape.

That is the opinion of a man who went to the front with the first contingent. He is to-day in England, looking after the preparation of the men who are to go to the front. If I felt that there was any possible chance of a no conscription Government being able to get the men, and being able to send them to the front and that Canada under that system would be enabled to maintain the position that she has held right in the front line since the beginning of the war, it would be the greatest pleasure to me. It is not a pleasure for me, nor for any man who has been as strong a party man as I have been, not to be able to agree with those who are sitting around me. It is forty-eight years this summer since I took my first active part for the Liberal party, and to-day, Mr. Speaker, I claim that I am as good a Liberal as I ever was, and hope to remain so; but I am going to support whichever party will do their utmost to win the war and see that Canada does her part in winning this war. There are times when the majority should not rule. Let me point out to hon. members in this House that in the year 1897 my friends on this side of the House took a referendum on the question of the liquor traffic, and the majority of the people voted for the supression of the liquor traffic, but my friends on this side did not carry that out, and I absolutely think they were right, but if it was right at that time, why should it be wrong to-day for the red blooded men of this country to say that the men who do not fight should not dictate to the rest of the men of Canada? The thing is to win this war; we can settle our party differences afterwards. In my judgment there should have been conscription at the first, but I am not going to blame hon. members opposite, because if we had been in power we should not have adopted it. Why? Because no one dreamt that the war would last as long as it has, and there were more men offering than could be handled at that time. But now, when the volunteer enlistment has stopped, how else are we going to get the men? I think the hon member from Humbolt (Mr. Neely) stated on the second reading that every government had an inherent right to take men for the defence of the country. Why should the men not be taken for the defence of the country? It is no use saying, "We will defend the country when we are attacked on Canadian shores." The place to defend Canadian shores to-day is on the fields of France and Flanders. What good could a Canadian army do fighting on Canadian soil, if the British and French armies were overcome and Germany could land an army in Canada? It would be too late; and I think many of my hon friends will regret in the future the line of action that is taken to-day. Glorious pages of history are being written by Canadian sons at the front. But when half the men of France of military age are killed in defending France and defending Canada as well; when thousands and tens of thousands of women and girls in France and Flanders are being practically driven into slavery—into white slavery at that—and subjected to such indignities that their friends only wish they were in their graves, I solemnly believe that the people who stand by quietly and do not want Canada to send more men to the front to keep our army intact will reproach themselves in the years to come for the action that is being taken to-day.

I believe that until the end of the war it would be much better if we had a national Government. I do not think the present occupants of the treasury benches are in a good position to administer the conscription law; I do not think a party government composed of those now on this side of the House would be in the best position to do so. I think it would be a mighty good thing for Canada if the two parties could bury their differences for the time and unite in forming a national Government until the war is over. Then no one would take off his coat with greater pleasure to fight the battles of Liberalism than I would. I have not much sympathy with hon. members across the floor of the House, never had, and never expect to have. It would be no great pleasure for me to work with them. But I say that in view of the conditions of to-day, when the fate of the Empire and of the country is trembling in the balance, this is no time for us to be fighting out our party issues. We should drop them in the meantime, form a national Government, continue the war and win it, and settle our differences as best we may afterwards.

I do not think the conscription Bill of my hon. friend the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) goes far enough. I want to see conscription of men, but, in addition to that, I want to see, along with it, the conscription of resources and the conscription of wealth, and I use the term "conscription of wealth" in the same sense as my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) used it the other day, and in the sense in which the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) has used it. I do not think the Government should go to the bank and lay hands on $10,000, which some man had placed there. I hold that if the man with an income of $50,000 to $100,000 who is not —as many such men are not—paying as much taxes as the average man here, were tapped for ten or twenty per cent of his cash income until the war was over it would not be a bad idea. Take the man who has a cash income of $100,000 a year; could he not live very well upon $75,000 or $80,000?

If my hon. friends opposite attempt to enforce a measure for the conscription of men without conscripting wealth by the imposition of an income tax that will fall equitably upon all, their conscription measure will not be a success. They should not attempt to conscript wealth only; one is just as necessary as the other. I am supporting the third reading of this Bill on the understanding that, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) told us the other day, during this session legislation will be introduced to provide for the levying of an income tax under which each person will pay in accordance with his ability.

I thought it due to my constituents to make it clear that I am for the winning of this war and that I propose to support any party that will win this war. It has never been the practice of the Anglo-Saxon race or of the French race to lie down in the middle of the fight; and I, for one, do not propose to do so. During the last three years I have done what I could to induce men to go to the front and fight, and I am not going to go back on the men who have gone. I will try to be loyal to the men who have gone to the front some of whom have laid down their lives; I am anxious that the sacrifices that have been made shall not have been in vain. It is the duty of every man in Canada to see that Canada maintains her position in the struggle for the freedom of our own country, the freedom of Great Britain, the freedom of the British Empire, of the Allies and of the world.

Mr. F. F. PARDEE (West Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I have anything new to say to the House with regard to this Bill. There seems, however, to be some misunderstanding as to my position in certain matters. I desire to detain the House for a few minutes to refer to the report of the meeting of the Liberal members of the House of Commons and the Liberal Candidates in Ontario for the House of Commons, which was held in Toronto on Friday last. The report states that certain conclusions were arrived at, as set out in the issue of the Globe of 21st July. The report further goes on to say that the Ontario federal Liberal members and the candidates in the field, after earnest consideration, came to certain conclusions unanimously. Let me say to the country that I do not agree with those conclusions. I stand exactly where I stood when I spoke on the second reading of this Bill. I am a conscriptionist Liberal, with all that that implies, believing that the adoption of conscription is the only way for Canada properly to prosecute her part in this war. I stand to-day where I have stood for months past. Notwithstanding the fact that I expressed regret in this House the other evening that it was seemingly impossible to have a national Government, I believe that the affairs of this country to-day demand a national Government, if it can be formed on a proper basis for the proper administration of those affairs. I am speaking for no other person or persons who attended that meeting; I speak for myself alone, and I propose to follow my line of conduct as vigorously in the future as I have in the past. I expressed these very sentiments at that meeting.

Mr. HUGH GUTHRIE (South Wellington): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to add a word to what has just been said by the member for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee). I do this because I have received over a score of letters from the constituency which I represent, protesting not against the article in question, but against the statement that certain conclusions were unanimously supported at that meeting. I take this opportunity of answering these various letters from my place in the House. I merely say that the report in question is not in accordance with my views. With regard to the Military Service Bill, I expressed my views fully in this House in the month of June last, and I have seen no reason in the interval which has since elapsed to change those views. Indeed, my views are more confirmed now than they were then. I sincerely hope that when this Bill comes to a vote upon the third reading, a majority even greater in its favour than on the second reading may be rolled up, in order that the country may see where the largest element in the House of Commons stands in regard to this measure.

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Mr. Speaker, in view of the speeches to which the House has just listened, especially the speech of the member for Assiniboia (Mr Turriff), with whom I have been associated for so many years, I crave no indulgence, though I may rise to fruitless effort, for placing once more before the House the dangers which in my judgment must follow if the Bill now before us is enacted and put into operation.

On the second reading of this Bill, as the House recollects, I moved that the principle of it should be referred to the people. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) who spoke immediately afterward on behalf of the Government, characterized this amendment as a miserable, dilatory motion. That it was a dilatory motion I do not dispute; I asked that the House should pause before imposing such a measure upon the people. Whether or not it was a miserable expedient, time alone can tell—nay, time has already told. It required but a few weeks to get the answer. That answer is already written, not upon the walls of this hall, in flaming and mysterious letters, to be explained only by a seer, but in very plain language in the records of this House, in the division upon the second reading, and even in the spectacle which is offered every day in the division of opinion that exists among both parties upon this question. The reason which I urged against this Bill was that, presented as it was, after the numerous statements which had been made by the Prime Minister and the Government that compulsion would not be resorted to; that to the very last we would win the war on the voluntary principle, if this Bill were forced upon the people by a moribund Parliament, division, irritation, friction, and disunion would follow.

Already we have the verification of my statement, even before this Bill has left this House. The statement which I made was combatted by many hon. members on both sides of the House, and by none more vigorously than by the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen), who spoke after the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The Solicitor General took the ground that no such disunion would follow from the intentions of the Government, which were to be found within the four corners of the Bill, and which were to get more soldiers to fill the ranks of our army. As to the intentions of the Government, I do not purpose entering into any discussion here and now. If there be those who have affirmed—and there are some—that the intention of the Government was more to win the elections rather than to win the war, on such a statement I do not offer any reflection at all, and I do not purpose entering into any discussion at the present time in regard to it. If there be those who contend that this measure was forced upon the Government by the jingoes and the ultra-Imperialists, who, not only in this country, but in all British countries, have tried to force upon those countries the continental military system of Europe, I have no intention of entering into any discussion in regard to that. To those who, like the Solicitor General, affirm that the intentions of the Government are to be found within the four corners of the Bill, I have only this observation to offer: That I accept the statement as it was made, but the attitude and the conduct of the Government showed a singular lack of foresight and forethought. I charge against the Government, in introducing this measure as they did, without any more preparation than they made, and upon their declaration, maintained since the first day of the war that there would be no compulsion, and that they would continue the voluntary system; that to precipitate this Bill as it has been precipitated upon the people certainly showed that no calculation had been made as to what would be its effect, and although its intentions were not sinister, the results were sinister, and in this House and in this country, more violent speeches have been made than were ever before heard. The Solicitor General spoke very confidently as to the result of this Bill—more confidently, perhaps, than he felt. He stated that he had no doubt that the Bill, when it was studied by the people, would produce no bad effects. Perhaps I had better read his language. He said:

> I am as confident as I have ever been of anything in my life that if the members of this House, reading and studying this Bill, and hearing this debate, will go to their constituents and tell them the meaning, purpose and spirit of this Bill there will be no possibility whatever of discord or resistance.

This was very easily said. Whence comes this assurance of my hon. friend? Would he speak to-day with the same assurance? I have no doubt that he did what he said should be done, namely, that he studied the Bill; that he explained it to his followers; that he showed them there was nothing in it to which they could take exception. How do I know that he did that? He would have been recreant to his office, to his duty and to his self respect, if he had not attempted to explain this Bill to his followers and to show that there was nothing in it to which exception could be taken. But he failed, as anybody must fail who had to give the same explanation. I followed the speech of the Solicitor General with more than usual attention. It was, as customary with him, a closely-knit argument. Still, I thought the tone of his speech was not free from anxiety and doubt. There was a passage in particular which struck me very forcibly. I do not know what effect it had on the other members of the House who listened to it. He said:

> We are told this action will result in disunion. I see no reason why it should produce disunion. It should not produce it. It is framed to avoid disunion. Let no man deceive himself. We do not avoid disunion by dropping back to where we were, any more than we avoid disunion by going ahead with this measure. I see no more peril in the one course than in the other.

This is a singular confession of impotence. Mark the words. There is peril behind and in front whether this measure is proceeded with or not. That confirms what I said a moment ago, namely, that the Government was singularly deficient in foresight and forethought when it introduced such a measure without calculating the effects as they were calculated by the Solicitor General.

But the Bill is before us at the present time, and we have to deal with it. The apple of discord has been thrown into this assembly and already the assembly is divided on it. It is nothing new in Parliamentary history for a Government when it introduces a new measure, to find itself deserted by its followers or its friends. That has happened in this country; it has happened in all countries where there are parliaments. It is, however, something which is very unusual when a measure is introduced which creates division, not only in the one party, but in the two parties at the same time. Why should I be blind to what has happened? I have already heard three of my friends take exception to the course which I have taken as the leader of the party. I find myself on the present occasion estranged from friends who were just as near and dear to me as any of my own brothers. I need not tell the House—every one will believe me—that such an estrangement, even if it be only temporary and upon this question alone, is a wrench at one's very heart strings; but every one of my hon. friends knows that I have not tried to impose my views upon any of my followers. I respect their consciences; I would not attempt to bring any one of them around to my way of thinking. I have my conscience and they have theirs; but this situation shows that we are face to face with a cleavage which, unless it is checked, may rend and tear this Canada of ours down to the very roots. Such is the situation and no one can be blind to it. If there are in this House men who affect to be impervious to the situation, to be careless about it, I am not one of them. If I may give a personal allusion, this is a matter which has caused me a great deal of anxiety within the past two weeks. But what is the use of lamenting over a situation? We must face the situation like men. What is the attitude of the Government with regard to the situation? How are they purposing to settle it? We have had the answer from the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), when he rose after me to answer my speech on that occasion. The answer is simply these words of my right hon. friend:

> What we propose is to do, in the light of the experience and knowledge that we have, our plain duty, and let the people pass their verdict as they choose later, or by history. At least, we will stand as not having been afraid.

That is the only position which is to be taken by the Government. They will carry this measure by coercion, let the consequences be what they may. This attitude of coercion and this disregard of the consequences which may follow, coming from friends of mine on the other side, grounded in Toryism, do not surprise me, but I am more surprised when friends of mine, Liberals brought up in the old days of the Liberal school in which I myself have been brought up, take no more concern upon this question than is taken on the other side. May I call attention to the attitude of my good friend the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) who, speaking upon this very subject said:

> He (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has referred to another question, which I will discuss very, very briefly; that is that this Parliament is in the nature of a moribund parliament, or, as he described it, a rump parliament, his contention being that, on that ground, this House should not deal with it.
> I do not take that view of the matter. My view is that this Parliament is in every respect legally constituted.

There is no doubt at all that this Parliament is legally constituted, and so long as it is not dissolved, either by the effluxion of time or by the decree of the Governor General, it can pass this law and many other laws equally nefarious and equally dangerous to the Canadian people. But that is not the point I wish to bring before the House.

It is not a question of legality or illegality, but a question of policy. Is it wise, is it prudent, is it good statesmanship to force on the Canadian people at the present time such a measure as is now before the House? Upon this point I have simply to say to my hon. friend, who was brought up in the same school as I was, that again and again, not only in England but in every other country under British institutions, and particularly in Canada, Parliament has been dissolved for the purpose of consulting the people on a measure which it had the power to pass. The last instance I recall is the reciprocity question, on which we went to the country six years ago. We could have passed that law, for we had a majority behind us, but we preferred to submit it to the people, and for my part I am prouder to be standing here defeated by the will of the people than I should be if I had denied to the people the right to have their way upon this question.

All through my long parliamentary career my object has been to try and convince. But where I could not convince I would not coerce. The attitude of the Government upon this question is simply that we must have more soldiers at the front. A letter has been read from General Currie, commanding our forces in France, asking for more soldiers. There is nothing new in that. I do not know of the general who, now or at any other time in history, did not ask for more soldiers. I say to my hon. friend from Assiniboia, I say from the bottom of my heart, that I stand on the same platform to-day that I have stood on from the very first day of this war; my conviction is still the same. I wish that we could send more soldiers to General Currie. I wish that our population and our resources would allow of our sending not only half a million but a million men. But the question is how many men can we take from the life of the nation at the present time without imperilling the public services which are essential to this country, and essential to carrying on our share of the war. This is a subject which, in my humble opinion, has not been sufficiently considered by the Government. They went into this war without any previous calculation whatever, without taking any census of our resources in men and in other respects. They asked for 100,000 men, 200,000 men, 300,000 men, 400,000 men, and, at last, for 500,000 men. When they reached the 500,000 figure they were told by several people that they could not get the men. One of the most important captains of industry in this country, Lord Shaughnessy, expressed his opinion in no uncertain terms, that the men could not be got without injury to the public services. But the Government paid no heed to that. They paid no heed to the other consideration, that it is not only men the Allies require at the present time, but food. They paid no heed to the question whether the men could not be better employed in producing food in Canada than in fighting at the front.

It is manifest that the campaign of 1917 will not materialize as we had hoped. We had expected that the offensive of this year would be effective. We had supposed that an offensive would take place on all fronts, especially on the western front, where we expected the Allies would pierce the German line, and roll it back to the Rhine. I have no doubt these plans were laid, and if they could have been carried out the effect would have been as I have stated. Unfortunately, events in Russia materially interfered with the plans, and enabled Germany to transfer thousands of men from the Russian front to the western front, with the result that the Allied offensive was checked. But there is some comfort to be found in the situation. There is one good omen, it seems to me. The strategy of the German staff in this war has been to strike wherever they thought there was a weak spot in the Allied line. They would throw an overwhelming force upon that point, with the object of breaking down resistance, and pushing into the Allied territory as far as possible, and then they would entrench. Such has been their strategy since the beginning of the war. At the very opening of the war Germany attacked Belgium, in the face of the treaty which she had herself signed, because she knew that by attacking France through Belgium she could break through the French frontier at its weakest point. The same thing happened in Roumania. Instead of protecting their own frontier, the Roumanians invaded Transylvania and the Germans at once penetrated Roumania, and have remained in possession of it ever since. As I said, there is some comfort to be found in the war situation. When the Russian revolution took place everybody expected that the Germans would begin their much-talked-of offensive to Petrograd. The fact that it has not taken place is simply an evidence that the Germans did not have the men. Their resources in men are beginning to fail. It is an evidence that the policy of attrition, which was inaugurated by the Allies in 1914, after the battle of the Marne, is commencing to tell. And if the German forces are being depleted it is due almost altogether to the British navy, which day in and day out, at all times and at all seasons, has brought pressure to bear upon the German Empire by its blockade in the North sea. The Germans have countered by submarine warfare, and have brought about a very serious position, perhaps the most serious of the war, but there is this comfort in it: it seems to me that already the effort of Germany in this respect has failed. They expected to achieve their object by submarine warfare within four or five months, but we all know that that object has not been achieved. But there is, however, a heavy toll to pay, and the duty has been imposed upon the Canadian people to produce more than we have ever done, because we have not only to send food to feed the people of England, but also to make up for the food that week by week is being sent to the bottom of the sea. But all these considerations seem to have been of no consequence to the Government. The Government seem to have paid no attention to them. Their energy has been employed in the last few weeks upon this new policy of compulsion. The genesis of this new policy still remains obscure.

It never was sufficiently explained, it never was explained at all, how, from one day to the other, the Government changed their attitude from voluntary to compulsory service. But, upon this point, at all events, if we do not know what the genesis was, unfortunately, we know what have been the results and the results have been to impress many classes in the community with a sense of deception; that is with a realization that they have been deceived by the Government.

I contrast the action of the Government with the action of President Wilson. When President Wilson had made up his mind that war with Germany was inevitable, what did he do? He did not launch his policy upon the people but he consulted almost every class of the community. He consulted his opponents of the Republican party, he consulted the great Democratic party, he consulted the churches, he had their assistance, he consulted the American citizens of German origin, and the consequence was that the day that he put his policy before the people every American citizen was behind him. Has that been the policy of the present Government? How did they manage this matter? They have consulted no one outside of their own Cabinet. One of the first bodies that they should have consulted was the labour party. They did not consult the labour party—far from it. The labour party came to the Government and we have it on the statement of one of the most prominent members of that organization that it has been deceived by the Government. On the 15th June Mr. J. C. Watters, President of the Dominion Trades and Labour Congress, made this statement:

> Up till the time the Prime Minister left for London we had repeated assurances that conscription was not contemplated by the Government. On the 27th of December last while discussing with him the registration scheme of the National Service Board, he stated, in connection with the adoption of conscription in the hearing of Vice-Presidents Simpson and Rigg, Secretary Draper and myself that he would consider it his duty to consult organized labour before undertaking to act on a matter of such grave importance.
> The first intimation I had was in the daily press and no official of our Congress was consulted.
> We were not consulted, but the Congress executive sought an interview with the Prime Minister after his pronouncement on May 18 last to learn his reasons for his changed attitude. There was not the shadow of a reason revealed at the interview to warrant a change from voluntary to compulsory service. On the contrary, the statements made by the Prime Minister, taken in conjunction with the information I gleaned while in Washington the week previous, all went to demonstrate that the need of the hour was not men at the front so much as food for the people in our Motherland, France and Italy, the means of transportation of the same by overcoming the submarine menace, and the manufacturing of all war supplies and building of ships.

Here is a direct statement that the labour people were deceived as a result of the announcement of their policy by the Government.

But, that is not all. When the Government introduced the system of national service, for which they issued their cards, it was thought that these cards might be considered as being perhaps the first move towards conscription. In this connection they sought the assistance of the church. I do not know whether they consulted other high dignitaries of the church but I do know that they consulted a high dignitary of the church in Montreal. I do not know what passed between him and the ministers who interviewed him, my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) and my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Blondin), but the impression was conveyed to this high dignitary that there would be no conscription. The Minister of Justice stated the other day that he had made no promise. Of course, I accept his statement. He made no promise but, whether he made any promise or not to the high dignitary when seeking to obtain his assistance, the impression that he left on the mind of this high dignitary was that there would be no conscription. I grant that my hon. friend may have made no promise but that was the impression left on the mind of the gentleman whose assistance it was important for him to secure. But, my hon. friend said, in addition, that even if he had made a promise. and even if at that time conscription were not intended under the changed conditions of things it now had to be resorted to. I ask my hon. friend in what way has the condition changed at all? The condition was the same last fall as it is to-day. Last fall we had men at the front just as we have to-day. My hon. friend knows that when we send men to war it is to face death and that there must be a depletion in the ranks. My hon. friend knew that as well last fall as he knows it to-day, but it never came to his mind to have the ranks replenished in any other way than by the voluntary system. So, here is a high dignitary of the church who has been deceived in this matter.

But, is it not a fact that when last year we, in this House, granted an extension of Parliament for one year, we had in our ears the solemn statement made by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, that under no circumstances would there be any deviation from the voluntary system? But, we are told, and it is the whole basis of this Bill, that voluntary enlistment has failed.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I must take exception to my right hon. friend's quotation. I do not think that I put it in the way he suggests.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My hon. friend stated, if he stated anything, that conscription was not contemplated.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes, exactly.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I asked him at the time what was the meaning of this 500,000 promise, I wanted to have a plain answer, and my hon. friend answered that conscription was not contemplated. We had his statement in our ears, when we granted this extension, that conscription was not contemplated, and yet within twelve months it was executed.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I must take exception again. My right hon. friend's chronology is very defective.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: In what respect?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The statement was made in January, 1916, if I remember correctly. My right hon. friend states that conscription was announced within twelve months.

[Sir Wilfrid Laurier.]

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Well, that would be only four months longer. The fact remains that the Prime Minister asked this Parliament to grant an extension which was a twelve months' extension, and during these twelve months he brought in a Bill which he said would not be introduced. The statement made to-day in justification of this measure is that recruiting has failed. Recruiting has not failed, but recruiting has decreased, I admit. If recruiting has decreased the fault and blame lie at the door of the gentlemen who occupy the treasury benches. I make that statement and I make it advisedly. We have had in this House, during this present session, recriminations and recriminations and differences between the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Sam Hughes) and my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden), and the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) as to what has taken place in regard to recruiting. The ex-Minister of Militia complained that he had been interfered with in his recruiting. He stated in one speech, and he repeated it here, that if recruiting had decreased, it was because his work had been interfered with by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance. There is no doubt about that. That is a statement that everybody has heard. Explanations or excuses have been from time to time offered. It may be true that the minister was never actually stopped in his recruiting, but he was told how not to recruit. He was told: Do not go to this part of the country, do not go to that part of the country, do not go amongst manufacturers, do not do this, do not do that, and the result was that, being interfered with the work stopped, and, of course, recruiting failed.

You will remember, Sir, the famous chapter in one of Charles Dickens works as to the effect of the circumlocution office. It is an exact description of what is taking place with this Government. Charles Dickens somewhere says, speaking of what he called the circumlocution office:

> The circumlocution office was (as everybody knows without being told) the most important department under Government. No public business of any kind could possibly be done at any time without the acquiescence of this circumlocution office. Its finger was in the largest public pie and in the smallest public tart. Whatever was required to be done, the circumlocution office was beforehand with all the public departments, in the art of perceiving how not to do it.

That is the case with my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes); he was told how not to do it; he was balked at every step, and here we have the consequence. When the Government places as the basis of this Bill the fact that there has been no recruiting for some time past, they do not impugn anybody but themselves, and they show up their own delinquencies. But, Sir, after all here is the Bill, as I said a moment ago, and we have it before us. The strongest indictment which was made against this Bill, in my humble judgment, was made by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) in a speech which he delivered a few weeks ago. He said that this Bill, if it became law, could not be carried out unless it were by the joint effort of a union government. What does this mean? If it means anything it means that the sentiment against this Bill is so strong, is so rooted in all parts of the community, that the Bill is such a departure from the traditions of the past, that it requires the efforts of the two political parties to put it into operation. If that be true, and if this measure was unavoidable, it should have come in, not as the measure of a party government, but as the measure of a coalition government.

I may be told that I was asked, and my friend from South Wellington may have had it in his mind that I was asked, to be a party to a coalition government. Sir, I was asked to form part of a coalition government when the policy had been framed, when the Bill had been prepared as a party measure, by a party government; and when it had been framed, deliberated on in council, determined upon, and launched before the public. When the Government could not retrace their steps, my poor assistance, such as it might have been, was sought. If, Sir, the Government had been in earnest, they would have consulted me before they determined on their measure. But they did not consult me, they did not ask my opinion upon conscription; they did not ask me what would be my opinion upon its possibilities, its results, and its dangers; they did not ask me to discuss with them the situation, against which they were determined to close their eyes; but when they had concocted a measure, then they were kind enough to ask me to carry on what they had devised in their wisdom. As in the play of children, they asked me: close your eyes and open your mouth and swallow. I refused.

Sir, some of my friends have reminded me, some of my Liberal friends have reminded me, that George Brown once entered into a coalition Government. He did, and under such circumstances nobody would blame him. In those days, party government in Canada had come to a deadlock. The powerful agitation of George Brown, asking for representation by population, had depleted the majority of the Conservative party until there was a deadlock between the two parties. Then mutual friends asked that George Brown should enter into a coalition. He asked the basis of it, and when representation by population was granted, which had been refused up to that time by John A. Macdonald, when the principle of union of the provinces had also been granted, which also had been refused by Macdonald, he then entered into a coalition. But, Sir, I was not approached in the same way. I have my views upon conscription. They have not changed. It is not a pleasure for me to find myself at variance with so many of the friends I have around me; but I thought and still believe that a measure of conscription, under the circumstances, was an apple of discord, and I could not accept it. That is all I have to say upon that point.

But I may be asked: what is your policy; it is not sufficient for the Opposition to say "nay" to any proposition, what is your policy? Sir, I laid my policy before Parliament upon the second reading of the Bill. I asked that a referendum should be had and the judgment of the people taken upon this question. I have not the merit of this policy; it did not originate with me; it was not my own device. Sir, it was asked by the whole organized body of labour in the Dominion of Canada. We are familiar with the strong resolutions which have been placed upon the table of this House, passed by the central labour organizations. Every member of this House, I would venture to say, at all events, the large majority of the members of this House, I am sure, have received from labour organizations within their ridings, petitions, resolutions and communications to that effect. I have received them by the bushel. They are there, before the House, and, Sir, under such circumstances I say I have no merit in having proposed that policy. That policy would have given us peace, harmony, and concord, which to-day are in much danger. Objections were made to it, and what were the objections? The objections were that this policy of a referendum should not be granted because, forsooth, the soldiers could not vote. Well, Sir, we passed a law two years ago to give the franchise to the soldiers, and by the same measure we established machinery to give facilities to the soldiers to express their views. Are we to be told that this law is a mere scrap of paper, that it is a mere dead letter, that it cannot be put into execution? Why, Sir, are we to be told that those who two years ago were so insistent upon passing this law intended it only as clap trap? If, Sir, when this measure was proposed, we on this side of the House had opposed it, and if we had defeated it, the welkin would have rung and would be still ringing with denunciation against those who had deprived the soldiers of the sacred right to vote. We did not oppose it; the law is there, and when we are told that the law cannot be put into force upon a referendum or an election, when we have given the right of voting to the soldiers, hon. members are simply playing with the common sense of the country when they advance such an argument.

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL: Is the right hon. member aware that the Act to which he is referring provides only that soldiers shall have votes in elections and not on a referendum?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Yes, I am aware of that. I am aware also that the Parliament which gave them power to vote in elections could give them power to vote on a referendum. The difficulty is not serious.

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL: Parliament has not done so; the Act is confined to elections.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: If there is to be a referendum, the law would have to be passed by this Parliament, and this Parliament could as easily give a vote to the soldiers on a referendum as on an election, and I would be the first to vote for it, and, I suppose, so would my hon. friend. The objection that a soldier could not vote on a referendum has no weight. It would imply that this Parliament refused him the right to vote, and nobody would suppose that. Moreover, as I said a moment ago, in Australia there have been both an election and a referendum upon this very question of conscription, and the soldiers voted upon both issues. That I do not know personally, but I am told it, and I have reason to believe it is true. More than that; in British Columbia there has been an election and there has been a referendum on the question of prohibition, and the soldiers voted on the referendum and in the election also. Are we to be told that what can be done in British Columbia, Australia and New Zealand cannot be done in Canada? To state such a proposition is simply to refute it. Furthermore, to-day I heard my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) tell us that he was against referendum because he was sure it would not carry. In other words, he said that a referendum would be defeated. Well, Sir, I ask, is that a reason why a referendum should not be taken? Again I ask: Where are we living now? Is it Canada, or is it Prussia?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: We want no more hypocrisy. If that is the position, no more can it be said that we are fighting to maintain the government of the people, for the people, and by the people. Sir, we have a vast country composed of different nationalities, brought here by the force of circumstances. We have opened our doors to all the working people of Europe to come here and help us build up this country, to develop it and bring it up to the standard we hope it will attain some day, and are we to be told that in this year 1917 we are going to deny a vote to the men whom we have made British subjects under the law? That is not British policy. It is the policy of Paul Kruger, the very policy which started the war in South Africa. When Kruger, after inviting British subjects to come and live in that country, denied them the privileges he promised them, and after giving them the privileges of citizenship, took away their right by an Act of Parliament, the war ensued. For my part, I do not believe in such doctrine as that. My hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) said a few minutes ago that, if there was to be a referendum, the whole of the French province would vote against it; the foreign voter would be against it, and the slacker would be against it. I do not want, in this country, to hear of any such division. I stand upon the broad line of Canadian citizenship.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Some hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I know very well that the same feeling does not appeal to all Canadians. I know that the majority of French Canadians have a certain way of looking at these things. I know that English Canadians look at them in another way, but when you tell me that all French Canadians are on one side, and all English Canadians are on the other side, I do not believe one statement or the other. It has been said that all the French Canadians are on one side and all the English Canadians are on the other side, and if that be so the English Canadians are more numerous, and they would carry the vote. It is not by such appeals as this that we can hope to settle this vexed question. It is simply by appealing to the better instincts of the people, and for my part I hope that the day will never come—and I am sure it will never come—that I shall appeal either to the prejudices of one man or to the prejudices of another.

Referring to the position which I have taken upon the floor of this House on this question, if I cannot defend it in Ontario as well as in Quebec, I want to lose my name as a French Canadian citizen, as an English Canadian citizen, and as a Canadian. I am prepared to defend my policy. I may be right or I may be wrong, but at all events I am sincere in my belief, and when a man speaks the voice of his conscience, there is no part of Canada where he should fear to state his views. I have been told that there is no constructive feature in the policy of a referendum. On the contrary, I say it is the most constructive policy which has yet been presented in this debate. I do not know how the vote will go. I have taken my pledge, and I repeat it again to-day with more fervour than before, that if the vote had gone for conscription the verdict would be accepted in every part of Canada, even in the province of Quebec, where it has been said it would not be accepted. When the people had spoken by way of a referendum, I believe that those who voted against it would, had it been carried, come forward to do their duty and uphold the law. If it were defeated, a duty would be imposed on all, and there would be a new basis, and a new appeal to the whole people of Canada to lend their best endeavours in the defence of a noble cause. But my hon. friend said that the minority must govern sometimes. I do not admit that proposition at all. If you admitted the policy that the minority could govern, you could say goodbye to representative institutions. My hon. friend was very badly advised when he referred to the referendum on prohibition in 1898. Let the hon. gentleman look at Hansard. I have not looked at it for twenty years, but he will find that the Government stated that they would not be satisfied with a bare majority, even if prohibition were endorsed, unless there was behind it such a body of public opinion as would insure its success. But when we found that prohibition had been carried by a vote of only 10,000 out of more than half a million, we thought we were not justified in putting it in force. I have been asked as to what my policy is. I may say that it is the same as it has been from the first. I am in this war to the finish.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I am in this war under the voluntary system to the last. I am in this war as Australia is in it to-day. Australia voted against conscription but still she is in the war. I am sorry that on an occasion of this kind I cannot see eye to eye with my hon friends on the other side. I do not want to speak severely of anybody. I do not want to introduce any bitterness that it is possible to avoid. I respect the convictions of all men, and I hope my own convictions will be respected.

In the position that I occupy on this side of the House, I am part and parcel of the machinery of the Government, and up to the 18th May no man occupying a position similar to that which I occupied, in any country, whether in England, France, New Zealand, or South Africa, gave to the Government a more consistent support than I gave them. But when the conscription measure was proposed I had to oppose it, and why? Because, presented as it had been presented, before the country, it had been made an instrument of coercion.

It is a denial of those principles of democracy which we hold dear and sacred. I oppose this Bill because it has in it the seeds of discord and disunion; because it is an obstacle and a bar to that union of heart and soul without which it is impossible to hope that this Confederation will attain the aims and ends that were had in view when Confederation was effected. Sir, all my life I have fought coercion; all my life I have promoted union; and the inspiration which led me to that course shall be my guide at all times, so long as there is a breath left in my body.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, nothing was farther from my mind when I entered the House this afternoon than to speak upon the third reading of this Bill. I am constrained to do so, however, because of the most remarkable performance of the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am afraid that his many thousands of erstwhile friends in Canada who have been so profundly disappointed at the course of his public life in recent years, and more particularly in recent weeks, will not gain very much encouragement or increased admiration of the right hon. gentleman from his deliverance to-day.

The right hon. gentleman tells us that his policy on this measure is still the referendum. But we are all able to remember that it is only a very few years since the right hon. gentleman told us that a referendum was no policy at all for any party or for any man. He tells us that his policy is always to have the majority rule; that nothing else is consistent with democracy and constitutional authority. But the very illustration that he gave of majority rule by way of referendum was an illustration of minority rule as a result of referendum. It was not the judgment of a majority which was given effect to in 1897, following the only referendum that has ever been held in Canada; it was the judgment of a minority that was given effect to then and thereafter for 14 years by the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition.

The right hon. gentleman tells us that it is all right to have a referendum now, because we can get the whole vote. He says that we can get the entire vote of the people because there is a Soldiers' Votes Bill still on the statute-book. I remember when the Soldiers' Votes Bill passed this House. I remember hon. gentlemen opposite—I remember the leader of the Opposition himself—telling the House that we might pass all the Soldiers' Votes Bills we liked; but that would not enable us to get the soldiers' votes. He said they had more to do than vote. A Soldiers' Votes Bill, put in operation at the time the Bill actually was passed would go further to get soldiers votes than it would go under the conditions of the war to-day. It was right and just that Parliament should extend to her soldiers and defenders the legal right to vote. What member of this Parliament would seriously contemplate deciding a big constitutional issue, involving the fate and faith of this country now and for generations to come, and deny to the soldier the legal right to cast his ballot? There were some hon. gentlemen opposite who two and a half years ago took that position; I do not know that any hon. gentleman would take it now. But what I want to impress on the leader of the Opposition is this: that while passing a Soldiers' Votes Bill extends a legal right to the soldier to cast his ballot, it does not physically make him capable of casting his ballot. We are asked by the leader of the Opposition now to revert to referendum, at a time when, of all times in our history and on a subject in respect to which of all subjects in our history, the circumstances least admit of a correct and just application of the referendum principle. That is chiefly why I object to it. We are asked to take a reading of the patriotism of this country at a time when it is impossible to read that patriotism with any approximation to fairness. What are the conditions to-day? Three hundred and thirty thousand of the keenest-blooded citizens of this countr are overseas. That 330,000 are the forward element of this population; the backward element are all among those at home. The most forward element of the population are overseas; and of that 330,000, what percentage will be permitted or physically capable, under the almost indescribable conditions that exist there, of casting their ballots, no matter how many Soldiers' Votes Bills have been passed?

The right hon. gentleman points to the example of British Columbia. Yes, British Columbia had a Soldiers' Votes Bill. They employed every facility that ingenuity could contrive to get the vote of the soldier in France. How did they succeed? They got votes from twenty per cent of the soldiers from British Columbia who were in France at that time; the other eighty per cent were disfranchised by the very fact that they were soldiers. Even in respect to that twenty per cent, such were the doubts that the balloting created that to-day commissions and legal proceedings are on the way to determine whether all or any of the votes were legally cast. Under these conditions the right hon. gentleman demands that we now resort to a referendum—that we shrink back and shudder—that we ourselves refuse to act. The proposal of the right hon. gentleman might disfranchise eighty per cent of the 330,000 men who are overseas—the aggressive portion of our people—of about 250,000 of the best sons of Canada. Is it any wonder that a great proportion of the red-blooded sons of this country say that the reason the right hon. leader of the Opposition now wants to take a referendum is because that forward portion of our population is overseas, and because, in the turmoil and the stress that prevails in France, the proportion of our population that is there cannot vote at all? It is no wonder that they are coming to that conclusion. Why should we marvel, then, that the right hon. gentleman finds himself bereft of the vast body of his friends in at least eight provinces of the Dominion?

Not only would 280,000 men, or thereabouts, be disfranchised if the proposal of my right hon. friend were accepted, but—what is worse, what is a more cruel outrage still—the moral influence of 330,000 men would be denied. What if those 330,000 men were here? What if they mixed among their fellows in Canada and could exert the tremendous influence that red-blooded men of that kind can exert among their people? Why should we to-day attempt to determine what is the average opinion of the Canadian people when the vast and virile influence of 330,000 men is stripped from this country and cannot make itself felt? I know men of that 330,000—men from my own constituency; I can name them—of strong, vigorous personalities and surpassing intellects; I would rather be without fifty ordinary voters than without one of those men. Shall we strip citizens of that type of their votes, strip them of their influence, and then read the measure of the patriotism and aggressive war policy of this country? I denominate such a proposal as an outrage, and I indict the authors of that outrage as the leader of the Opposition and those who vote with him.

The right hon. gentleman makes a special appeal that must be taken to have some considerable significance, because, so far as I know, there has been nothing in the proceedings of this Parliament to give rise to his fears or predictions. He makes an appeal against the disfranchisement of several hundred thousand of alien enemy origin living in this country to-day. Is there any significance to be attached to that appeal made by the leader of the Opposition at this time? Is it that he feels that those of alien enemy birth are particularly those upon whom he can best rely in the position he takes towards the war policies of Canada? If he has brought that belief into the minds of hon. members of this House, he has only himself to blame. It is not unnatural for him to suppose that if there are those in this country who might resist an aggressive war policy against the very nations from which they sprung, and therefore be found in support of the leader of the Opposition, it would be those very men. Is that the reason for his solicitude for the franchises of those of alien enemy origin in Canada. No one would regret more than I do that there should be interference with the votes of those men, but it ill becomes a politician to be so solicitous about the franchise of persons of alien enemy origin who are so little concerned about the franchise of the red-blooded men who are to-day fighting in his defence and mine. I am more concerned for the franchise of the soldiers than I am for the franchise of those of alien enemy birth or than I am for the franchise of any other class whatsoever. I am more anxious for the franchise of the soldier in a war election or a war vote than I am for the franchise of even the British population in this country. It is better to get the word of the soldier as to what should be done in this war than that of any other man. The policy of the leader of the Opposition—and to the honour of hon. gentlemen opposite be it said that he now suffers the most serious defection of his long political career—is to see to it that we get the votes of those who, of all people, might naturally be inclined to sympathize with the enemy, whether or not we get the vote of those who are defending the shores, the homes and the destiny of this our native land.

But my right hon. friend says that this policy is brought on too suddenly. He cannot stand the suddenness with which it was sprung upon him and upon this country. I remember hon. gentlemen opposite—and they are all now included in those who are supporting the leader of the Opposition—for months in this House taunting the Government of the day because we would not announce some policy of conscription. Who does not recall appeals by the score for compulsion from the Liberal press of our country? Who does not remember the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), day after day, from his seat in this House, wanting to know why the Government had not the courage to take a lead in this matter of conscription and to come out and state its position on the subject. We still have in our minds hon. gentlemen who sit now behind and support my right hon. friend in his attitude towards this war, telling us long ago that we had not moved fast enough on conscription, and that the time to have moved was a year ago.

What should a Government do? Should a Government, responsible for its own actions, responsible for leadership in great crises in a country's history, go out amongst the people and say: We do not know where we are on this subject, but we would like to know what you think about it? Should we go out amongst the people and say: We are drumming up the cause of conscription and trying to get all the friends for it we can, but for the life of us, we cannot tell what we think about conscription ourselves? We should immediately be asked: what is your policy? Where do you stand on conscription? And, unless we could answer definitely, we should be rightly sent back to our places and told to do our duty. The only initial step any government can take in any matter of public policy is to announce its position and appeal to the people to follow. Then we get the reading of the people's will, and the Government does not evade but discharges its obligations.

We are told by the leader of the Opposition: You have brought in your policy of conscription and then you have asked for coalition. He says: I do not like the priority; I do not like the order of precedence; you should have asked me for coalition first and then brought conscription in next. I have heard other hon. gentlemen say that we should have consulted the leader of the Opposition about coalition first and announced conscription next. But the leader of the Opposition himself says that no matter when we consulted him about coalition, he never would have come into coalition upon a policy of conscription. Where is the difference between going to the leader of the Opposition and saying: We invite you into coalition on a policy of conscription which we intend to announce, and going to the leader of the Opposition and saying: We are for conscription; we invite you to come in and cooperate with us on that policy? Had we on the other hand gone to him and said: we do not know where we stand, but we would like you to come in and help us in this matter of getting soldiers; his immediate reply, and that of his followers would have been: have you not the courage to take your own position, to pronounce your policy?—pronounce your policy first; that is the duty of a Government; then we will say where we stand.

We took the full responsibility. On no other basis than that of compulsory service, could coalition have been of any service to this country. That alone was the basis, and on that ground we took up our position. Then it was the duty of the leader of the Opposition to elect his course. He elected his course, and the tragic election he made is the reason of whatever disunion may exist to-day.

He tells us further—and I am surprised that the leader of the Opposition should use the sentences he does when referring to this subject—I cannot agree with you now that you introduce conscription, because you promised us you would not. And he went so far as to say that the leader of the Government, in January, 1916, stated that under no circumstances would the Government resort to compulsory service in Canada. The Prime Minister said no such thing. The leader of the Government, on every occasion when the subject has been discussed, whether in Parliament or before labour organizations, or before delegations of any sort, has been scrupulously careful never to say that under circumstances that might be conceived, conscription would not be introduced. In January, 1916, he said that there was no compulsory service Bill in contemplation by this Government. That was the absolute truth in letter and in spirit. Why? Because then—the necessity for compulsory service had never arisen in the smallest form on the horizon of this country; because at that time we were recruiting men at the rate of 1,000 a day; because there was no necessity to supplement the army of this country in France by the adoption of a compulsory law; because the State would not be imperilled by the continuance of the voluntary system, for that system was then successful. That is a long way from saying that under different or other circumstances there would not be a resort to compulsory service.

The leader of the Opposition tells us that we did not consult the various classes of people in this country. There is not a class of the people in this country that had not made representations to this Government and consulted with this Government on this subject of compulsory service. Those representations had been made and those consultations had between various sections of our people and the Government of the day since a time less than a year after the war began. And if there is one class of the people of this country who are in the weakest position possible to plead surprise on this subject, it is organized labour itself. The great body of organized labour indeed does not complain at all. Two or three office holders cannot speak for the labouring men of Canada. Several months before the policy of compulsory service was announced in Parliament representatives of organized labour came to this Government, and I believe came in the person among others of the very gentleman referred to by the leader of the Opposition this afternoon, and were told that we did not contemplate compulsory service in Canada. They were not satisfied with that, and asked the leader of the Government whether or not he would give an absolute continuing pledge that he would not put into effect conscription in this country. What did the leader of the Government do? In the plainest possible language he told that labour organization, and told Mr. Watters, that he would not on any account make any such promise or commit this Government to any such a pledge; that, in a word he would have to be governed by events as they transpired, and that whenever it appeared that the safety of this nation depended upon compulsory service he would not hesitate to resort to compulsory service. In the face of that plain intimation—and it is in writing—that the policy of Canada in the war as to the voluntary system or conscription must be dictated by circumstances, just as the policy of every other nation in war must be dictated by circumstances. Where is the organization that can plead surprise? For under the circumstances that have developed, it appears by the plainest figures ever presented to the mind of man, that unless conscription is resorted to we cannot sustain the defence of this country. No organization can plead surprise or bad faith; the words "bad faith" have no proper place at all in this connection, and I think the leader of the Opposition should never have used such words. No organization can plead surprise. But the gravest charge that could be brought against any administration would have been brought against this Government if in the face of the falling figures of our defenders in France; if in the face of figures that show seven casualties for one recruit in two months; if in the face of the appeal from the General in the field that there was the greatest possible need, the direst necessity for men; if in the face of figures which established that unless an impetus was given that under voluntarism had not been given to recruiting in Canada for ten months at least, our forces could not be maintained in the field; I say the gravest and most damning charge would have been brought against this Government if in the face of those facts we had been guilty of the crime of refusing to resort to any measures for strengthening the arm of this country and sustaining our defence.

We are told that this measure is coercion. It is coercion in the same sense that every law of the land is coercion, and in no other sense at all. Unless there is coercion, that is to say, power, behind a law, there might as well be no law. This is coercion in the same sense that the leader of the Opposition used coercion upon this country when he tied it up to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway project; it is coercion in that sense and in no other. And by the way, he tells us that because there was a difference of opinion, or alleged difference of opinion, between two members of the Government as to the method of proceeding in recruiting, we are answerable for anything that may now be complained of in the way of voluntary recruiting. Let me answer him. How wide would be his smile if a member on this side of the House were to rise in his place and say that the unfortunate position we find ourselves in to-day with reference to the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Transcontinental is entirely due to a difference of opinion that existed between the right hon. gentleman and his Minister of Railways in 1903 as to the character the Transcontinental should take! But infinitely more reasonable would be such an attitude than his attitude to-day.

This is no measure of coercion, because the only principle embodied in this Bill has been a principle imbedded in our law since Canada was a country; because his own Government placed conscription on the statute books of Canada in a wider, bolder and more drastic form than is embodied in this Bill; because from the day this nation took its birth in 1867 down to this hour the principle of conscription has been part of our military legislation, and has been applicable to this country at any time upon the word of the Government in a more drastic, extreme and more comprehensive form, by far, than is to be found in this Bill. Where is the coercion in a restricted, a modified, a moderate application of a principle that has been our law for fifty years? If we are to have no coercion—and he alone calls it coercion—if we are to have no force behind our law, better pass no law at all.

The right hon. gentleman started out by raising the shadow of civil dissension if this law should pass. He says that because of the serious cleavage of opinion on this subject, therefore we must retrace our steps. He points to this side of the House and says that there is a cleavage of opinion here; he points to his own side of the House and says that there is a cleavage there. He draws to my attention the fact that I and those associated with me have not been able to convince every hon. member on this side of the House that this Bill is a right and a just Bill. That is very true. What I stated, though, in my speech was not what the right hon. gentleman said I stated. What I stated was that if every hon. member in this Parliament were to go to his constituents and make clear the meaning of this law, its extent and purpose, then whatever difference of opinion there might be as to the expediency of the Bill, the whole of this country, in every section and in every province, would willingly support it when it became law and there would be no disunion. That is what I stated, and I call it to the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite. I lay that thought especially before the leader of the Opposition, because to no man should this responsibility come home with the force it should come home to him. If hon. gentlemen will lay this Bill—not a distortion of this Bill—clause by clause before their constituents, give the reason for it, the meaning of it, its purpose and its limits; then, though there might be difference of opinion as to the expediency of the measure, there would not be the slightest resistance to its operation, but all would loyally support the law of the land. I do not believe there is a gentleman on this side of the House coming from any province in this country —and now I take his own argument—who would for a moment rise in his place in this House, or rise in any other place in this country, and advocate resistance to this measure once it becomes the law of Canada. It is true there is some difference on the part of a very few of our supporters from Quebec as to its expediency; such as that is inevitable on every principle ever presented to Parliament. But because there is difference of opinion as to its expediency, does that mean there is disunion and that we must retrace our steps and retract our measure? I put another question to him who talks of schism and dissension: If we on this side of the House have not succeeded in demonstrating the justice of this measure to every hon. member who sits with us, what is to be said of the leader of the Opposition who has to an infinitely greater degree failed to convince those on his side of the House of the injustice of the measure now presented? His side is divided almost into two.

But why talk of disunion? From the first hour this Government took office until this afternoon, has there ever been a great measure passed by Parliament that was carried by so overwhelming a majority as was the second reading of this Bill? If ever there was evidence of a substantial majority of the thinking people of Canada in favour of a measure that evidence exists upon the measure that is now before the House. Why is it the leader of the Opposition is not able to retain behind him supporters who through five, ten, and fifteen years have been the most valued of his followers and the bitterest of our opponents? It is because opinion in this country of the substantial thinking people of every race is behind this Bill with such force that these hon. gentlemen cannot believe they are doing their duty to their country if they yield themselves any longer to the solicitation of the leader of the Opposition.

Why is it that this afternoon there rises in his place the hon. member for Assiniboïa (Mr. Turriff) than whom there never has been a more valiant—shall I say a more extreme, a more relentless party critic within the four walls of this House—why does he rise in his place this afternoon and say that on this issue, which goes to the very root of the defence of our country, which goes to the very question of our existence as a nation: "I hold myself no longer accountable to the leader of the Opposition, but I speak for the vast majority of the people of my country and I stand behind our soldiers in France." Does such a stand as that show disunion? No, it is because there is such an overwhelming majority of the thinking people of this country behind this measure that hon. gentlemen on both sides of this House agreeing with their views are bound to respect their wishes. If hon. gentlemen take this attitude it is because so vast a majority is behind the Government of the day that they would be failing in their duty to their country if they, thinking with that vast majority, did not support the Government on this measure. Why is it that the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) rises this afternoon and proclaims throughout this country that there is no meaning in the proclamation issued on Friday night out of a certain Liberal caucus in the city of Toronto that they were going at one and the same time to get behind Sir Wilfrid Laurier and win this war? It is because the hon. member for South Wellington knows that although he may talk, and hon. gentlemen may talk till Doomsday about winning the war, you have to get down to a definite, concrete plan, before you can win war or anything else, and because you cannot win this war behind the policy of the right hon. gentleman. Has the right hon. gentlemen ever lost a more faithful—may I say—a more affectionate supporter than the hon. member for West Lambton? (Mr. Pardee). The hon. member for West Lambton left the leader of the Opposition because there is such an overwhelming preponderance of sound public opinion in support of this measure that he has not it in his heart to vote against the Bill. It is because the overwhelming mass of his own party, concurrently with his own conviction, is behind the Bill; it is not because there is a difference of opinion but because there is a substantial unanimity throughout this country in support of the measure.

I deplore that cleavage should even be predicted, but I do not believe that there will exist in this country disunion to the extent of resisting the law of the land passed by a majority of the representatives of the people. I see no reason still for such a thing existing; I do not believe it will exist; but I repeat now what I have said before, that I would prefer—infinitely prefer—to have disunion between the forward and the backward portions of this country where we can settle it within our own borders than to have disunion between this nation on the one hand and this nation's defenders on the other. That is a type of disunion, a kind of disintegration, a tearing up by the roots of Confederation to use the words of the leader of the Opposition—that I do not want to see. There is a backward and a forward portion of the population of every country that ever existed in this world. You cannot point to any nation, even though it be an autocracy, much less can you point to any nation whose institutions are built on the bedrock of democracy, where there does not exist a distinctly forward and aggressive portion of the people in all national aims, and where there does not exist a portion that lags behind, a class which has to be brought forward and who are rather an impediment than an assistance in any national movement. Does the leader of the Opposition believe that the only way in which we can get on harmoniously is to move just as fast as the slowest? Is that his contention? Is that his position? Undoubtedly that is what he is doing; he is moving with the slowest. In Canada, in the midst of a war that demands the utmost speed that any war ever demanded of a nation, if we can only produce union by walking at the speed of and abreast with the backward portion of the Canadian people, then I do not want union in Canada; I am ready rather to face disorder or dissension. Is our arm in this conflict in which our liberties, our very lives are involved to be measured by the strength of the arm of those who do not want to be in the conflict at all?

If there is one man between the shores of this country who is responsible for the shadow of disunion I say it is the leader of the Opposition. It is only two months ago since an offer was made to the right hon. gentleman, which, if it had been accepted, would have cemented together all, or almost all, in this House and throughout Canada who stand behind this war. That offer he declined—an offer, than which a more generous was never laid at the feet of a political opponent by a statesman in power—and he declined on one ground only: that we should insist on walking in this conflict with those who hold back instead of walking with those who would go forward. Let the leader of the Opposition beware, let him not deceive himself; the coalition that he refused in the Commons and in the Government of Canada has infinitely more effect to-day than he has any idea of. There is a coalition among the people of the country that will astonish the leader of the Opposition when the word of the people is heard. This coalition has gone on among the people, although it has failed amongst the members of this House by virtue of the conduct of the leader of the Opposition—attributable to him, and almost to him alone.—The people that he feign would divide are united now, and they will stay united until this war is won. They will decide that the Government which vigorously carries forward the war is the Government which represents them no matter whether it be Liberal or Conservative, or both. It is the fault of the leader of the Opposition, and on his head the charge will rest so long as time endures that in this, the vastest, most perilous struggle in which this or any other nation ever engaged, there was not such a union of those who want to win the war as would produce for the sons of Canada the greatest assistance in their struggle to the death in Flanders. That is a responsibility that I would not want to have becloud my memory after my days on earth are done. It is a responsibility that the leader of the Opposition lightly and airily assumes.

There was a time when the influence of no man in this country, whether in the province of Quebec or elsewhere, was so great as that of the right hon. gentleman. I beg of him this afternoon to go where his influence still is great and speak of this measure as this measure is. Let him not speak of it as hon. gentlemen of his own race have spoken of it in recent weeks at Sunday meetings in their province, but let him tell the people of his own province that within the four corners of this measure there is no word of unfairness and no element of injustice to the French Canadian people. Let him say that although he himself has spoken on this measure in this Parliament on three or four diffrent occasions, he had never alleged for an instant that there was a shadow or fragment of injustice in this Bill against the race which he represents and from which he springs. Let him repeat these things to the people of the province of Quebec, to the sane, thinking people of that province, and represent to them their duty to march on with the rest of Canada. Let him, their leader, see that they are sanely led, and I feel satisfied that they will be ready to perform their duty. But I repeat once more that of all the prices we must never pay for harmony in Canada, the price we must most of all decline, is national dishonour. No nation can survive a cost like that.

We either have national aims, a national will and a sense of national honour, or we have not. Have we national aims, have we any national will, have we a trace of national honour, if we send 100,000 men into the battlefields of France, into the furnace of war, before the cannon of Germany, and leave them there to be decimated and destroyed, abandoned by the people of this country?

Let the right hon. leader of the Opposition say now whether the time has not come for him to take his place beside those who sustain the national will and the national honour of Canada. Let him not be found any longer among those who hold back in this country, whether they be of alien enemy origin or not. Let him be found with those who press on. And if he is found there, then there will not be many hon. members from the province of Quebec or many public men of that province who will, with very much influence, appeal to their compatriots to resist this Bill. Then there will not be found the disunion which he predicts this afternoon; nor will there be encountered a disunion infinitely worse than that which he describes—a disunion between the nation at home and its defenders overseas.

SUPPLY.

House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Miscellaneous—Canada Gazette, $21,000.

Mr. GRAHAM: Could the hon. minister inform us if a profit is made on the publication of the Canada Gazette, and if so, how much?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have not been in the habit of looking on the Gazette as a money-making concern, but I think there is a slight profit. I do not know how much, but I will get the information for my hon. friend.

Mr. GRAHAM: The public have to pay a pretty good price for advertising in that publication. It being an official notification, so far as notice to the public of anything about to take place is concerned, it might as well be buried in the river, unless it be a case where the party interested has a solicitor watching the Gazette very closely. In such case he can discover when the notice appears. The Government gives its patronage, war advertising and otherwise, to its own friends, but I would rather see it in a Tory paper alone, even if it had a very few subscribers, when the notice is supposed to reach the public, than to have it buried in the Canada Gazette. In a great many Bills passed by the House we provide that notices shall be inserted in the Canada Gazette, and that is supposed to be notice to the public. I submit it is not notice to the public except, in the sense which I have indicated. During this session, in dealing with the important measures, I think the House has insisted on a paragraph being inserted that, in addition to notice in the Canada Gazette, similar notice shall be inserted in some of the newspapers. The Government ought to make it a practice in all their measures where the public is supposed to receive notice, to provide that such notice be printed and published in newspapers, because the ordinary notice in the Gazette alone is not sufficient, and there should be a supplementary notice in some publication where the people interested in the matter would be able to find it right at their homes, or at any rate, be able to get the information looked for as soon as possible. It is possible, under many of our statutes, that a man might take some action which would deprive an individual of rights that he or she may have possessed, of which action he or she never would have had the slightest notice from the publication in the Canada Gazette. Did the minister ever consider that the practice should be changed and that notice to the public should not be considered sufficient, if simply published in the Canada Gazette?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That question has often been considered, but the fundamental idea is that the Canada Gazette is the official publication and is not a paper for general advertising. It is designated as the one official place in which the notices of statutes and orders in council shall appear, and consequently publication in the Gazette constitutes legal notice. In nine cases out of ten, perhaps ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, the legislation of which notice is given in the Gazette, in regard to important charters, rights of incorporation, etc., is in the interest of certain corporations or parties, and the notices are watched by the solicitor, so that notice in that way is effective. The only other alternative is to advertise generally in the newspapers, because notice in two or three newspapers would not be sufficient. If we started to advertise in the newspapers, we would immediately get into a general system of advertising, and it has always been considered that it was best to avoid that, on account of the greater expense, and if the argument as to expense is good at any time, it is certainly good at the present time.

Mr. CARVELL: I quite appreciate the statement by the minister that the Gazette is official, and I can tell the hon. gentleman from South Renfrew that it is very necessary in many legal matters that we have some official document to be used in court as evidence.

The production of the Canada Gazette in court is, in many cases, prima facie proof of publication. I know that to talk about the expenditure of $21,000 to a Government that is spending money by the hundred of millions may be considered as somewhat picayune. But I do not understand how they dispose of that $21,000. I suppose they have an editor who has nothing to do. I do not see what in the world he would have to do except read proof. The matter is all furnished to him; it is all official. He does not have to write editorials; he does not have to look after advertising or financing. Many people who run weekly newspapers in which the same amount of paper is used as in the Canada Gazette would be glad to publish the Gazette and pay all expenses for $10,000. I do not see how they get rid of $21,000, unless it is because the expenditure is made in Ottawa. Of course. that accounts for almost anything in the way of expenditure of public money.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If there is anything in the department which is run on strictly economical grounds, it is the Gazette.

Mr. CARVELL: I should be glad if my hon. friend would give me two minutes' explanation of this expenditure.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Does my hon. friend regularly read the Gazette?

Mr. CARVELL: No.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: He is a lawyer; he gets copies now and then.

Mr. CARVELL: I file it away; it becomes useful sometimes.

[Sir George Foster.]

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Sometimes it is very thick. A tremendous amount of printing is involved.

Mr. CARVELL: I know that there is some printing in it, but it is not like the ordinary newspaper, where the type is set up every day. The advertisements and notices in the Canada Gazette stand for three and four weeks at the time. If there is any real explanation of this expenditure, we should like to have it.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I think my hon. friend (Mr. Murphy) can tell you all about it.

Mr. MURPHY: I can tell my hon. friend something about it, but it is rather difficult to understand, in view of the practice at the Printing Bureau in connection with the Gazette, why this amount is required. It is true that the Gazette has grown very large in volume. But the Printing Bureau treats every other department just as a newspaper would treat a customer; it makes them pay for the advertising inserted. All advertising that is done in connection with the incorporation of companies is charged up against the Department of the Secretary of State. I have no doubt that all the orders in council and things of that kind which have been printed in the Canada Gazette in connection with the war have been charged up against the Militia Department, the Privy Council office, or some other department. In view of the fact that the Printing Bureau receives pay for the advertisements published in the Canada Gazette, it is difficult to understand why $21,000 is required.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Every cent that goes in as revenue in respect of the Canada Gazette goes into the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. CARVELL: I know that very well. What I am complaining about is that it takes $21,000 to run that little paper. I do not know what the receipts of the Canada Gazette are; if they got in $22,000, then there was a profit of $1,000. Even so, I do not see why the profit should not be twice as much. A man at a typesetting machine would print the Canada Gazette in a week—and he would have so little to do that he would not know what to do with himself. He would be worse than the ordinary civil servant in Ottawa. He would work until about eleven o'clock in the morning; he would leave at three in the afternoon and play golf the rest of the day. That would account for about $35.

Then you have pressmen, that would be $20 or $25 more; then you have paper and ink. The actual cost of setting up the paper would only be about $5,000; but in this case the country is paying $21,000. That is what I am complaining about.

Printing Bureau—Plant, repairs and renewals, $7,000.

Mr. CARVELL: What do they do with the old machinery that they put out? A good deal of it must be thrown away. Would it not be well to notify the newspaper people in the country that they can get very valuable machinery in this way at a low price?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Machinery does wear out; there is no doubt about that. In some cases it is scrapped because of its being entirely worn out. In other cases, I do not know what they do with it; but they dispose of it in some way. I will hand my hon. friend's name to the Printing Bureau and ask them to notify him when they have any old scrap printing machinery to dispose of, and to inform him as to the price.

Distribution of Parliamentary documents, $45,000.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not wish to find fault, but there has been a great deal of discussion about the distribution of Parliamentary documents. Many suggestions have been made with a view to bettering the conditions. A change has been made within the last year which, I think, is an improvement. We are notified that a certain report is ready for distribution and that the members can get copies if they apply for them. But even with this saving, we are adding $5,000 to the cost. I should like to have an explanation.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I shall have to ask the Clerk of the House to give me some information on that point. Let the item stand for the present.

Miscellaneous printing, $100,000.

Mr. CARVELL: Does that include the printing that is distributed amongst friends in different parts of the country, or is it business done in Ottawa, or what is it made up of?

Mr. NESBITT: I would suggest that this item stand until we get the details of the expenditure of last year.

Expenses under the Canada Temperance Act, $5,000.

Mr. CARVELL: Some time ago I raised a question about some elections under the Canada Temperance Act in New Brunswick, on account of the passing of the prohibitory law. There are, I think, seven or eight counties in which the Canada Temperance Act is in force, and many people, myself included, would like to see that Act repealed in order that the prohibitory law may come into force. We felt that it was a mistake to have an election upon the matter, for this reason—my right hon. friend will remember that under the Canada Temperance Act, no matter how the local option vote may go, there can be no further decision or appeal for three years. It is a provision of the New Brunswick prohibitory law that, as soon as peace is declared, a plebiscite of the people shall be taken as to whether the prohibitory law shall continue in force or not. I hope the prohibitory law will be maintained, but if it be not my right hon. friend will see that if we voted out the Canada Temperance Act in those counties in which it is in force, it will be three years before we can get it into force again.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That matter was brought up, and it has been before the Minister of Justice, and I have discussed it with him and some other members of the Cabinet. I think there is a method by which that problem can be solved.

Mr. CARVELL: I very much hope so.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We are trying to arrange a method if it is possible to arrange one. My hon. friend will have noticed that one of the counties is moving for an election for the repeal of the Canada Temperance Act.

Mr. CARVELL: Four or five counties are doing so.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Of course, that can be done, but there is trouble and expense occasioned.

Mr. CARVELL: I believe that in practically all of those constituencies an election would result in a repeal of the Act. What I am concerned about is that in case the Act should be repealed, and then by a plebiscite taken, we shall say, a year hence, prohibition should be repealed, we shall be in a position of temperance constituencies subject to license. If this could be brought into force by an order in council for a limited time under the War Measures Act, then if the Prohibition Bill should be defeated upon the referendum, we could dissolve this order in council and come back to the Canada Temperance Act, which, in my judgment, is very far ahead of license.

Mr. GRAHAM: Is it the intention of the Government to bring in a Bill at this session dealing with the interprovincial traffic in spirituous liquors where the provinces have passed prohibitory laws within their own borders?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That matter is under the consideration of the Department of Justice at the present time.

Miscellaneous—To provide for the expenses of the Acting High Commissioner, London, England, $12,000.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There is an increase of $2,000 in this item, due to the increased cost of living and the increased expenses generally.

Mr. GRAHAM: Would it be out of place to ask if any change has been suggested as to the High Commissioner's office.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Not to my knowledge.

Mr. GRAHAM: The Government have not discussed the advisability or otherwise of having a new High Commissioner?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The matter of the High Commissionership is not under consideration.

Miscellaneous—Grant in aid of the Canadian General Council of the Boy Scouts Association, $5,000.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In answer to a question put by my right hon. friend when this item was under consideration some time ago, I might say that the Canadian General Council of the Boy Scouts' Association is composed of prominent gentlemen representative of all the provinces of Canada. This council exists for the purpose of promoting generally the object of the Boy Scout movement in Canada. The honorary head is His Excellency the Duke of Devonshire; the Dominion commissioner, Lt.-Col. Sir Percy Sherwood, and the honorary secretary, Mr. Gerald H. Brown. Headquarters at Ottawa.

The records of the association as at June 30, 1916, show that there were 1,032 Boy Scout officers and 17,542 Boy Scouts in Canada.

The Dominion Government grant of $5,000 is distributed in toto to the provincial committees, to be expended by them in promoting the general work of the Boy Scout movement. The grant is divided according to the membership in each province, the division in 1916 being as follows: Alberta, $661.13, British Columbia $289.93; Ontario, $2,016.26, Saskatchewan, $428.02, Manitoba, $564.23, Quebec, $539.47, New Brunswick, $260.58, Nova Scotia, $212.13, Prince Edward Island $28.25; total, $5,000.

Miscellaneous—Canadian Associated Press—Towards expenses of a National News Service, $50,000.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That requires some explanation.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: This is an important item. The Canadian Press Limited is a co-operative news agency of which all publishers of daily newspapers in Canada are members and stockholders. It does not operate to make profit. The expenses of operation are assessed against the individual newspapers according to an established basis. The officers of the organization comprise representative journalists in different parts of Canada. The grant is to be applied towards the expense of maintaining a day and night leased wire news service over the three great natural gaps, namely, between Ottawa and Winnipeg, Calgary and Vancouver, and Montreal and St. John. The bridging of these gaps will make it possible for the association to operate a national news service from coast to coast. The estimated cost of maintaining a twenty-four hour national leased wire for one year over the three natural gaps, as submitted to the Government by representatives of Canadian Press Limited, is as follows:

Ottawa to Winnipeg	$32,000
Winnipeg to Victoria	18,000
Ottawa to Maritime Provinces	20,000
	$70,000

The Canadian Press Limited was established in 1910. It was designed to be the national news gathering and distributing association of the Dominion. I think that briefly explains the nature of the work carried on by the press association. The object of the grant is to promote the dissemination of news through the agency of the Canadian Press Limited in different parts of Canada. It will not be necessary that they should in future rely upon news from American sources. There are some newspaper men in the House who could give a very much more lucid explanation than I can of the operation of the association. From the national standpoint this grant is regarded as being very necessary and desirable by the newspapers of Canada in order that Canadian news may circulate freely between the East and the West.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Are all newspapers entitled to the benefits of this service, or only members of the association?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am informed that the Canadian Press is a co-operative news agency of which all publishers of daily newspapers are members and stockholders. The officers of the association are the following:

E. F. Slack, Gazette, Montreal, president; E. H. Macklin, Free Press, Winnipeg, first vice-president; W. J. Blackburn, Free Press, London, Ont., second vice-president; J. S. Lewis, Star, Montreal, secretary-treasurer. Directors, J. F. MacKay, Globe, Toronto; J. E. Atkinson, Star, Toronto; J. H. Woods, Herald, Calgary; E. W. McCready, Telegraph, St. John; J. Ross Robertson, Evening Telegram, Toronto; W. F. Kerr, Leader, Regina; G. Fred Pearson, Chronicle and Echo, Halifax; John Nelson, News-Advertiser, Vancouver, B.C.; W. L. Roblin, Telegram, Winnipeg; W. M. Southam, Citizen, Ottawa; Lorenzo Prince, La Presse, Montreal.

Miscellaneous—Expenses under the Naturalization Acts, $11,000.

Mr. GRAHAM: The Naturalization Acts have changed very materially during the past two years. There is a rumour constantly floating around the corridors, and it has been voiced in the speeches of one or two hon. gentlemen in this House, that the Government contemplated bringing in a Bill to disfranchise certain naturalized citizens of Canada. I think the Government, before asking for this vote to provide for the expenses of carrying out the Naturalization Acts, should take the House into their confidence and tell them what is their intention in this respect. The hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), I believe, would be the man who would know.

Mr. DOHERTY: As I am appealed to as the man who ought to know, I may say that I am not aware that the Government has reached any decision to take the course which has been mentioned.

Mr. GRAHAM: Has it been considered?

Mr. DOHERTY: I am not in a position to say what may be occupying everybody's mind, but I confess that I have not myself given consideration to the idea.

Mr. GRAHAM: What expenses are incurred in the carrying out of the Naturalization Acts? Does not the individual himself pay some portion of the expense?

Mr. DOHERTY: The administration of the Naturalization Act is under the Department of the Secretary of State, but I know that the party has to apply to the judge of a court to obtain a certificate. Provision is made for a certain payment—I think it is $2 or something of that kind—to the clerk of the court who does the work. I think there are some other incidental expenses in connection with the administration of the Act.

Mr. CARVELL: That is news to me. I have had some experience along this line of business, but in our country the man who applies for naturalization pays his own expenses, and it is news to me if the clerk gets $2, or any amount, from the Government.

Mr. DOHERTY: I think that under the Act there is provision for payment of some remuneration to the clerk of the court. The item might stand while I consult the Act.

Item stands.

Miscellaneous printing, $100,000.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The amount expended last year was $99,965, so that the vote this year is practically the same. It is for printing the departmental reports.

Mr. CARVELL: Are they printed at the Bureau?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes, and most of them are now distributed from the Bureau.

Distribution of Parliamentary documents, $5,000.

Mr. TURRIFF: Why, at a time like this, should this vote be $3,000 more than last year?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am informed that more matter has been sent out. The whole subject will be discussed when the reports of the two special committees are before the House. The committees order the printing of the documents.

Miscellaneous, supply of Canadian publications to library of High Commissioner's office, $1,000.

Mr. GRAHAM: Would "The Fiddlers" be among that contribution to the library?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am not sure, and it did not seem worth while sending a cable to get the information.

Mr. GRAHAM: Cables are sometimes sent on just as silly errands.

Miscellaneous—Public Archives, $60,000.

Mr. GRAHAM: I suppose every effort is made by this branch of the service to keep up to the necessities of the present period in regard to collecting everything that might be of future use, interest and information with regard to the war. I imagine there would be a good deal of work, even now, in connection with this branch of the service along these lines, and that what might be obtained that would be of use in the future can hardly be calculated.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I think that matter is being very thoroughly and sufficiently handled. Some months ago I took the matter up, in the absence of the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden), with Dr. Doughty, the Dominion Archivist, and a plan was elaborated which covered the gathering of necessary information with reference to the war, and all its subsidiary activities and services, both in Canada and on the other side. Dr. Doughty, about a month ago, left for the other side. He has two assistants with him, one of whom, I think, was appointed from the forces there, and the other went with him. They are carrying out the plan in connection with the Records Office in London, and with the other offices which are engaged in services along that line. The idea is to have the whole thing mapped out as one plan, and all the offices operating upon that plan, under the general supervision of Dr. Doughty. The plan was very elaborate and very thorough, and he assured me that it would really do what had probably never been done before. Whilst the thing was going on, and before the war was ended, and consequently before the records had got out of hand, they were all being tabulated and scheduled and kept in proper place, so that they should be available for the future historian.

To provide for the expenses of the Conservation Commission, $80,000.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is the same as the vote for last year.

Mr. MACDONALD: Would the minister be good enough to give us a short statement, showing the results of the expenditure, and what advantage we obtain from it?

[Sir George Foster.]

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: As my hon. friend knows, the Conservation Commission was constituted with an independent management, and its honorary officers are distributed throughout Canada. Sir Clifford Sifton has been chairman of the commission since its inception. The staff which is doing the work is in Ottawa. I do not know the size of the staff. Mr. White is the controlling personage in it, and they are carrying on explanatory and examination work generally in reference to the resources of the country. One operation which they have been carrying out is the tabulation, in so far as possible, of the timber resources of Canada. They have, up to the present time, I think, thoroughly finished plotting out a number of provinces and are carrying that work through. They placed an annual report upon the Table, which I have no doubt hon. members have carefully and diligently perused, and they issue monograms from time to time on matters concerned with their general work. I have not the direct supervision of it myself, but have just a general idea of the work.

Mr. OLIVER: I desire to draw the attention of the Government to a certain condition existing in Northern Alberta, and, I believe, in Northern Saskatchewan and Manitoba, that, it seems to me, might very well call for examination and consideration by this conservation commission. There is, particularly in Northern Alberta, in the part that is not occupied by settlement—but into which settlement is pressing a magnificent growth of white poplar. The poplar grows very large, clean and straight in that country, and millions of acres are occupied by that growth. In that country the white poplar grows on good soil, which is very suitable for farming. Settlers pressing into that country naturally desire to get the land under cultivation at the earliest possible moment, and in dry years fires accidentally start, and do marvellous work in clearing the land; in other words, destroying this magnificent growth of white poplar. If it were possible to turn that wood to account, say, in the making of paper, it would be a tremendous gain, and a conservation of the resources and wealth of this country of enormous value. The poplar will be destroyed by process of settlement, unless something is done to turn it to account while it is still in its natural condition and suitable for such development.

I have made some enquiries in regard to the possibilities of using it for paper, and it has not been convenient or possible for me to obtain definite and direct information on the subject. I, therefore, make the suggestion that the commission take up this matter, and consider how far the white poplar can be used for the purposes of making paper, and under what conditions it can be properly worked up. The area of country affected is very great, and, with the pressure of settlement, the poplar will disappear without having been of use to any one. As a matter of fact, at the present time it has no value. It is a detriment and impediment to the settlement of the country, and the settler does not use any means to protect it; in fact, it may be suggested that sometimes, in the dry years, he drops a pipe of tobacco by accident and great damage results.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Some time ago I called the attention of my right hon. friend (Sir George Foster) to a question which I think should receive the immediate attention of the conservation commission. I do not rise to advocate at the present moment the closing of all distilleries in the country, but the point to which I wish to call attention is in connection with the distilleries. It has been discovered in Germany and Sweden —but the invention is of Swedish origin— that alcohol was distilled with the residue of a liquor which comes out of every sulphite manufacture. Tests were made some years ago in Sweden and in Norway by an inventor, and this large quantity of liquor, which was allowed to waste by being run into the sea—where it had the effect of destroying fish—was found to be the means of producing alcohol through another process. In Sweden and in Germany this liquor of sulphite is used for alcoholic purposes. Four years ago the invention was taken hold of by an American sulphite paper manufacturer, who has established a distillery which produces alcohol of the purest kind from that liquor. There are in this country large sulphite mills. If that liquor, which now goes to waste, were utilized for the purpose of manufacturing alcohol, large quantities of grain would be saved for use as food and a supply of alcohol could be secured for use in the munition plants. The case is abundantly clear; within twenty-four hours the establishment can be visited and full information obtained. I do not now remember the name of the city where this plant is established, but one of the officers of the Imperial Munitions Board visited the place this last winter and reported on the whole question.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The matter was brought to my attention by several persons, my hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) amongst them. I had a conversation with a gentleman who knew a great deal about it, and I asked him to give me a complete report on the subject. As soon as I get that report I shall be very glad to look into into the matter.

Mr. GRAHAM: Is it true that large quantities of goods upon which the duty has not been paid or which have not been called for are every year destroyed by the Customs Department at various large centres throughout Canada? I heard of one case where valuable liquors were destroyed; these might well have been sent to the hospitals. Other articles might have been disposed of by sale and the proceeds given to the Treasury. At this time we are all being asked to economize in our own homes, and I think that this practice of destroying goods should not continue when there is need for the articles which are so disposed of.

Mr. REID: Some time ago it was brought to my attention that goods that had not been claimed, or upon which the duty had not been paid, were being destroyed. I took the matter up with the Commissioner of Customs. The provision in the Customs Act which deals with that matter does not give us power to dispose of such goods, if they are not sold, other than by destroying them. When they are sold by auction, they do not bring anything like their value. It did seem too bad that goods that could be used for some practical purpose should be destroyed, and I took it upon myself to distribute some of these goods as the hon. member has suggested. Some liquor which had been seized, and which would otherwise have been destroyed, I handed over to the hospitals at the nominal price of one dollar. I gave instructions to the commissioner that goods of any value that had collected at these places, and that might be used in hospitals or charitable institutions, should be sent to Ottawa. When they get to Ottawa they are handed out to some charitable institution at the nominal price of one dollar, and a record is kept to show that they have been so distributed.

Mr. GRAHAM: I know that there is such a provision in the Act as my hon. friend has suggested.

Mr. REID: I think that we are handling the matter in a satisfactory way.

Expenses of the Pecuniary Claims Convention with the United States, $5,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is this commission doing anything at present?

Mr. DOHERTY: Since the war began the operations of the commission have been suspended. This item was passed, as Hansard shows, when my estimates were passed. But by some error it has not figured in the Votes and Proceedings and therefore does not appear on the official record as having been passed. I am bringing it forward now so as to clear up the irregularity. This vote of $5,000 is merely to make provision in the event of the war coming to an end before the close of the current fiscal year.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The Pecuniary Claims Convention have given out findings in some cases. How many cases remain to be decided?

Mr. DOHERTY: Not having come prepared to deal with this matter, thinking it was passed, I cannot speak with any definiteness on that subject, but in a general way I think quite a number of cases remain to be disposed of.

Grant to assist the Canadian Association for the Prevention of Tuberculosis, $10,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Have the Government any one to represent them on the board of that association which is a very worthy one? I read the report which is sent annually to hon. members.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This is just a grant towards its expenditures which are very large.

Grant to the Canadian Handicrafts Guild, $2,000.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This society looks after and encourages, by teaching in some localities, and by giving prizes, manual work of a fine character.

Mr. KNOWLES: I would like to suggest that in the Parliament buildings which are being erected, some memorial or tablet be placed to commemorate the death of our late colleague, Mr. Law, who lost his life there under very distressing circumstances. No tablet and no stone of any kind marks his resting place, and it would be a nice idea and a thoughtful act on our part if somewhere in the corridors of the new Parliament buildings it were to be memorialized that the remains of the late Mr. Law rest in that building.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The suggestion of my hon. friend appeals to me personally, and I will see that the matter is brought to the attention of the committee that has general charge of the erection of the building. It is a sad thing to commemorate, but as the hon. member has said, there is no place other than in the Parliament buildings, where Mr. Law's remains do rest.

9 p.m.

Civil Government—Office of the Conservation Commission—salaries, $37,650.

Mr. GRAHAM: I think a motion was introduced in the House this session by the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Steele) urging the advisability of establishing a department of public health.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That has no connection with the commission.

Mr. GRAHAM: The conservation commission has a health department, and one of their officials has been overseas for some time inquiring into health matters. What is the commission doing in this regard, and has the Government given any consideration to my hon. friend's resolution that a department of public health be established?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not know that any special consideration has been given to his resolution. At all events, no decision was arrived at. As regards the health department of the conservation commission, their work, I think, must be very limited, but I will get the information for my hon. friend.

Mr. GRAHAM: I think they have done considerable inquiry work.

Arts and Agriculture—Towards the encouragement of cold storage warehouses for the better preservation and handling of perishable food products, $50,000.

Mr. GRAHAM: Is this for the encouragement of cold storage proprietors?

Mr. BURRELL: There are about ten or a dozen subsidies still due, and this amount is to cover these outstanding payments. We have been granting practically no subsidies since the war began.

Mr. MACDONALD: Under what authority was Mr. O'Connor appointed to make an investigation into the cost of bacon and so forth, and what has been done in regard to a further inquiry? Why was not the matter referred to a committee of the House of Commons?

Mr. BURRELL: My department has practically nothing to do with that. I understand that Mr. O'Connor was appointed by the Minister of Labour to make an inquiry into the cost of living, including cold storage. Perhaps the Prime Minister will answer my hon. friend's other question.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The Minister of Labour could give more information than I can, because it comes more directly under his department. An order in council was passed appointing Mr. O'Connor a commissioner for the purpose of obtaining certain information. The inquiring consisted in obtaining certain returns, upon which he based his conclusions.

Mr. MACDONALD: I saw in the papers that another order in council had been passed appointing certain gentlemen—I assume under the Inquiries Act—for the purpose of inquiring into the truth of the report made by Mr. O'Connor. I think the right hon. gentleman should make a statement with regard to the matter. It seems to me that the reasonable and proper thing to do, after receiving a report by a properly authorized official of this Government, would be to refer the matter to a committee of the House of Commons.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: These gentlemen were appointed under the Inquiries Act and under the order in council to which allusion has been made. The question was largely one of accounts, profits and so forth. The inquiry, in my judgment, was eminently one for gentlemen of the experience possessed by those who were appointed. It does not seem to me that a committee of the House of Commons, with all deference to their qualifications, would be the best tribunal for an inquiry which has to take into consideration complicated accounts, and deal with matters of a more or less complex nature in relation to very large business affairs. For that reason we thought it better to make other provision for an inquiry of such a nature.

Mr. MACDONALD: I assume the Prime Minister does not intend the constitution of this new tribunal to be any reflection upon Mr. O'Connor or his inquiry?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Mr. O'Connor himself, in his report, recommended a further inquiry.

Mr. NESBITT: Who constitute the commission?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Mr. Geo. F. Henderson, K.C., residing in the city of Ottawa, who has had a good deal of experience as a drainage referee in Ontario; Mr. A. B. Brodie, of the firm of Price, Waterhouse & Company, Montreal, and Mr. Geoffrey Clarkson, member of the firm of Clarkson, Gordon and Dilworth. I am informed that both of these gentlemen are very expert chartered accountants, and that they are as good men for the purpose as could be found anywhere in Canada.

Mr. CARVELL: The newspaper, the morning or this evening, announced that a gentleman from Chicago had been sent here by Mr. Hoover, the food controller of the United States, to act upon this commission and that his name was Connor, or O'Connor. Is there any truth in that?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The board consists of the three gentlemen I have named. The food controller, Mr. Hanna, has stated that Mr. Hoover, the food controller in the United States, has offered to place at the disposal of this board, in an advisory capacity, if it is desired, a gentleman experienced in questions of this character who is attached to the staff of the food controller i nthe United States.

Mr. CARVELL: Are these gentlemen working without remuneration, as stated in the newspaper?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: These gentlemen are.

Mr. NESBITT: Are these two accountants working without remuneration?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes.

Mr. NESBITT: They are very capable men so far as I know, but I do not know what in the world Mr. Henderson knows about investigating accounts.

Mr. MACDONALD: I see that in the United States legislation has passed Congress by which industries which produce articles that enter into the common life of every one, and which are also essential to the successful prosecution of the war, must be licensed by the Government. In view of the serious problems that arose during the past winter in regard to the consumption of food and other articles that enter into the life of the home, it would seem that the best method of dealing with the conditions that have arisen, and which have been disclosed by the report of Mr. O'Connor, would be to take hold of these enterprises, license them, and thereby control them in such a way that the difficulties complained of by Mr. O'Connor could not arise. I gather from reading the report that Mr. O'Connor obtained from the William Davies Company information as to the cost of the basic product which entered into the production of bacon, and that he also obtained the price at which the finished article was sold, but that they did not give him either the cost of storage or of delivery or any of the intermediate information. It is a most serious matter when an official of the Government, engaged in carrying out the duties which have been assigned to him under an order in council, makes the statements which Mr. O'Connor does and which the Government think of sufficient importance to inquire further into and develop. If the condition described by Mr. O'Connor exists in this particular industry, it does not seem to be an undue inference to draw that it may exist in other industries. More particularly in the winter months in Canada the cost of living will again become a problem of the most serious character. I would like to inquire of the Government whether they have considered the advisability of dealing with this whole matter along the line of licensing the men who are engaged in these various industries as has been done in the United States.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I will take into consideration the suggestions made by my hon. friend.

Mr. CARVELL: I have a suggestion to make to my right hon. friend which I hope he will at least consider, if he does not accept it offhand. There is no doubt that the result of the investigation of the production and sale of food products made by Mr. O'Connor has created a great deal of discussion in Canada. It is going to create more discussion. It is one of those things which will not down unless it is settled properly. Mr. O'Connor has made a report upon what my hon. friend says was insufficient evidence, and if that be true, I for one will feel that it is a great injustice that any firm should suffer on account of it. On the other hand the William Davies company have submitted a statement. And, by the way, it is costing an enormous amount of money to get it placed before the people of Canada because it has appeared in pretty nearly every daily newspaper in the country and they have to pay for that, because you can depend upon it the newspapers are not doing it for love. In this statement they entirely refute conclusions as well as facts set forth by Mr. O'Connor. I think it is very much in the interest of the country, of the public, of the consumer, of the William Davies company, of Mr. O'Connor and everybody else, that the real facts should be arrived at. There is a phase of this matter to which I might call the attention of the Prime Minister. In their lengthy statement the William Davies company particularly have referred to the fact that somewhere between two and three cents a pound, or nearly three cents a pound, should have been added to the cost of the product for inland and ocean navigation, commission to agents, selling expenses and all that sort of thing. But there is a large amount of that same quantity of goods which was sold in Canada and which did not cost any two or three cents a pound to deliver in Canada. The remainder, as my hon. friend (Mr. Nesbitt) suggests, was sold to the Imperial Government. I point this out to show that in any investigation of this matter the absolute facts should be arrived at. I do not want, in my public position as a member of this House, to make a statement about any person that might be considered unfair; but from my extended relationship with the chairman of this commission, in another investigation about a year ago, I should feel that possibly that gentleman might be there as much to prevent the truth from coming out as to elicit the truth. Therefore my suggestion is, very largely on account of the chairman that the Government has appointed, that counsel should be appointed to represent the people. Somebody can be found in Canada who will represent the people. I think he ought to be appointed by some tribunal other than the Government. If that is done and if the facts are brought out and an honest report is made, I believe the people will be satisfied and that justice will be done. But I am very much afraid, from the experience I went through during a somewhat troubled investigation a little over a year ago, that if there is not some counsel to watch things, you will get everything else but truth and honesty in the report.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I understand that Mr. O'Connor was appointed a year or so ago to carry on several investigations in connection with different matters. I am told that he is a gentleman of ability, well known to the right hon. Prime Minister and that he was his own appointee in the Justice Department. Mr. O'Connor was called upon to make an investigation into the cold storage business after the public had been roused by the soaring prices of commodities which were sold by these concerns. It is stated that he associates himself with experts, that he goes from one concern to another and finally publishes a lengthy report. In my judgment he seems to reach final conclusion in that report. He speaks of the patriots who live on the earnings of the people, and treats them in a very high-handed way. Mr. O'Connor must be pretty sure of his findings and conclusions to assail, as he does in his report, the gentlemen who control the cold storage establishments in Canada. Mr. O'Connor has made that report. It is before the country, it is printed and distributed; and immediately we see in the press the counterpart of that report in the publication of the defence of the other party.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: A paid advertisement too.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Of course. And the Government appoint a commission to revise the work of their own commission. In all candour, I say to the right hon. gentleman that I do not understand those proceedings, nor will the people of the country understand them. The people have confidence in Mr. O'Connor's integrity and in the work he has performed for the Government. So I submit, that the suggestion of my hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell) should be heeded by the country. The people, the consumers, ought to be specifically represented before that commission, or they will not have any confidence in the report which will be made on the report of Mr. O'Connor. The people ought to be represented by the best legal talent, because this is a very serious question. There have been more rumblings in the public since the publication of the O'Connor report than I have heard on all questions that have arisen since the beginning of the war. It seems to me that under those circumstances it is the duty of the Government, in connection with the work of the commission investigating the Government's own commission, to see that every safeguard is provided for the people of the country, the consumers, who are paying such huge profits to cold storage companies, and who are not in a mood to be laughed at. It will not do if this commission is appointed only to whitewash the gentlemen who in this report of Mr. O'Connor have been branded before the public.

Mr. NESBITT: I have nothing to say against Mr. Henderson or any other lawyer, but this is purely an auditing commission; it is an audit of the statement of these men who differ with Mr. O'Connor. You could not get any more capable men to audit it than Price, Waterhouse & Co., or the Clarkson people. What they want of any one to guide them is more than the business people of the country can understand. No business man would choose a lawyer to be at the head of a commission that is an auditing commission. No one can tell Price, Waterhouse & Co., or Clarkson & Co. their business in auditing, and why Mr. Henderson or any other lawyer should be appointed on a commission to guide such men as that, is more than I can comprehend. It only spoils the result of the commission, whatever that may be.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not think my hon. friend need be under an apprehension that it will spoil the result of the commission. Mr. Henderson is a practising lawer in the city of Ottawa. Notwithstanding what the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) says with regard to him, I understand and thoroughly believe that he has a reputation of the highest character as a member of the Bar, and that his work for many years past as drainage referee in Ontario has been most satisfactory in every way. He has conducted the proceedings before him in such a way as to indicate that he has judicial temperament and he has undertaken——

Mr. CARVELL: Does the right hon. gentleman say, a judicial mind?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I said judicial temperament. I suppose that men who afterwards ascend the Bench and are distinguished by their judicial temperament are not so apt to show it when engaged as counsel on one side or the other in a case. That is hardly to be expected. My hon. friend would undoubtedly show a very fine judicial temperament if he were on the Bench, but still, when engaged on a case at the Bar, that quality would not be so manifest as it might be afterwards when he had ascended the Bench.

Mr. CARVELL: I would remind my right hon. friend that there are limits to the lapses to which a counsel may descend.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not know anything of the incidents to which my hon. friend alludes. We consulted the food controller and it was thought desirable that there should be a chairman of the commission, either a judge or some one having judicial experience. It was learned upon inquiry of Mr. Henderson that he would undertake the work and do so in a purely honorary capacity. I have no doubt he will discharge his duties with fairness, impartiality, and thoroughness. So far as the accountants are concerned, they are men, as I understand, of the highest standing in their profession, and men whose report with regard to some matters that are not dealt with fully in the report of Mr. O'Connor, must be accepted with every assurance that it is fair and correct.

Mr. NESBITT: I have nothing to say against Mr. Henderson; I have only to say that he is not an auditor, he is not a bookkeeper, and he would be no use in the world in guiding these two men, who are perfectly capable of auditing any accounts.

Mr. KYTE: This Government have established several new records since they came into office, but I think that in the matter of investigating investigators they have established a record which probably will retain for them the laurels for many years. In the past, when the public interest required that an investigation be held, a public functionary was charged with the duty, and he would not be so charged unless he had the ability to discharge the functions of his position. When he made his report that was the end of it so far as the general public was concerned. This is not the first time that a royal commission has been appointed for the purpose of making inquiries in the public interest, but this Government, finding that the report was not satisfactory to themselves or their friends, have gone further and appointed another inquirer to investigate the conduct of the investigator. This is the second time within the last few months that the Government has taken that course. When Mr. O'Connor was appointed to inquire into the conditions with regard to the proprietors of cold storage warehouses and their relation to the cost of food products, I think the people generally were satisfied that he would make a thorough investigation and a perfectly honest report. He has made his report. Friends of the Government are hurt; they complain, and the Government good-naturedly appoints a court of appeal for their friends who feel aggrieved. This court of appeal is going to sit on the findings of a Commission appointed by the Government and paid out of the public treasury.

That the public have some interest in cold storage plants would be obvious from the fact that large subsidies have been paid from time to time by this Government to assist in erecting these cold storage warehouses. The Government are co-partners with the proprietors in respect of these institutions, and if ever there was a subject that properly and fairly called for public inquiry it is the conduct of the proprietors of these cold storage warehouses.

Mr. O'Connor made his report. I have no doubt the public had every confidence in the correctness of the conclusions at which he arrived, but the friends of the Government, who feel aggrieved, have secured the consent of this Government to the appointment of another commission. So that by the time this inquiry is concluded the friends of the Government will have such a report as will suit them, and such as they seek to have, all of which is to be at the expense of the public. With reference to Mr. Henderson, whose name was mentioned here as the chairman of this commission, he is the gentleman who a year ago, appeared for Colonel J. Wesley Allison before the Royal Commission to inquire into certain allegations arising out of the expenditure of public moneys by the Militia Department. No person had any objection to Colonel J. Wesley Allison securing the services of Mr. Henderson. He discharged his duties faithfully to his client, I have no doubt. But he was selected by Colonel Allison because he was a friend of the Government. Mr. Henderson is very close to the Government, and as Colonel Allison was very close to the Government at that time, or, at all events, pretty close to certain members of the Government, it seemed desirable that he should be entrusted with Colonel Allison's defence before that commission. I think I heard the right hon. Premier state that Mr. Henderson's position was purely an honorary one, and I assume, from that, that he is not to be paid for his services by the Government. Is that correct?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It is correct.

Mr. KYTE: Mr. Henderson had a good client a year ago; if I mistake not he had two good clients, because, while he was retained by Colonel Allison, I rather suspect that his services were paid for by the Government. There was a large array of counsel who took part in the proceedings, and it would be rather odd if Mr. Henderson were not paid by the Government, if he rendered a bill for his services to the Department of Justice. I say, then, that if Mr. Henderson, undertakes to discharge these duties which have been assigned to him without compensation it is perhaps because he was so well remunerated for the services he performed for Colonel Allison and the ring which surrounded Colonel Allison a year ago, that he can afford to discharge these duties free. It seems to me rather extraordinary that Mr. Henderson should have been selected. Mr. Henderson appeared for Colonel Allison before the Royal Commission. The charges and allegations made against Colonel Allison, which the Royal Commission was appointed to investigate, arose out of certain transactions of the Munitions Board in respect to the letting of contracts. The Munitions Board, as constituted at that time, gave a certain contract for the manufacture of fuses to a company through Colonel Allison, from which contract he and his friend Lignanti succeeded in putting a large sum of money into their pockets. It so happens that the head of the Imperial Munitions Board is Sir Joseph Flavelle, president of the William Davies Company. I wonder if the people cannot draw their own conclusions as to why Mr. Henderson has been selected, without pay or remuneration, to guide the deliberations of this commission in the course of the appeal from Mr. O'Connor's report. It was pointed out by my hon. friend from North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) that a lawyer or a professional man had no proper place in this commission. It is a matter entirely for accountants, and it will strike the general public as being strange that Mr. Henderson is the man of all others in Canada who should have been selected as chairman of that commission for the purpose of guiding its deliberations. The chain of events and the chain of logic are perfectly plain and obvious, and it will be obvious to the general public. If the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) desired to get a report in which the public would have absolute confidence, inasmuch as he does not appear to have confidence in the report of Mr. O'Connor, he would have done well to go outside of the selection which he has made when he took Mr. Henderson for chairman of that commission.

I will summarize the facts again. Mr. Henderson was counsel for Colonel Allison a year ago when Allison's conduct in connection with contracts obtained from the Munitions Board was under investigation by the Royal Commission, Sir Joseph Flavelle, the head of the Imperial Munitions Board, is the head of the William Davies Company, the company that is most sorely hit by Mr. O'Connor's report; and we have Mr. Henderson again sitting in that commission, as the right hon. Premier said, in a sort of advisory capacity, so that he may steer the investigation, to the end that the William Davies company be hurt as little as possible as the result of the inquiry.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In the first place, my hon. friend's assertion that Mr. Henderson's services were paid for by the Government is absolutely destitute of the slightest foundation—

Mr. KYTE: I did not state absolutely that they were paid for by the Government.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The hon. gentleman endeavoured to insinuate and create the impression that they were paid for by the Government. I want to tell the hon. gentleman and the committee that there is absolutely not one shadow of foundation for any such statement. The hon. gentleman should not have made the statement, unless he had some warrant for it. He knew perfectly well he had not any warrant for it.

Mr. KYTE: I beg pardon—

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Let me finish. In the second place, if my hon. friend had read the order in council before speaking, he would have known that, under the order in council in question, it is provided that when returns are made, and a report upon these returns is submitted to the Government, the Government may, if it deems proper, appoint an examiner to inquire into the matter further, so that the action which has been taken by the Government is precisely in line with the order in council under which Mr. O'Connor made his investigation. It is perfectly true that the gentlemen who have been so appointed have also been given all the powers that could be conferred upon them under the Inquiries Act, in order that, if any power were wanting under the order in council alluded to, they would have that additional power under the Inquiries Act. With reference to the point my hon. friend endeavoured to make with regard to Sir Joseph Flavelle, the chairman of the Munitions Board, I would like to inform the committee that he was not consulted as to the personnel of the commission, nor as to any one of them. All the members of the commission were recommended to us by the food controller. He thought it desirable that there should be a lawyer on the board with these two accountants. He thought that would tend to make the inquiry more thorough, for the reason that a board appointed in this way has the power to examine witnesses under oath and therefore must determine what is evidence and what is not evidence, so that the presence of a lawyer with these two accountants was thought to be a desirable thing. As far as the controversy of last year is concerned, to which my hon. friend last called attention, the contracts in question were not given by Sir Joseph Flavelle, of the Imperial Munitions Board; they were given to the persons whom the hon. gentleman mentioned, long before Sir Joseph Flavelle had anything whatever to do with the giving of contracts for munitions.

Mr. KYTE: What does the hon. gentleman think of the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman from Carleton, that some person be permitted to appear before this commission on behalf of the public?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have already said to my hon. friend that we will take that suggestion into consideration.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I may perhaps be a little out of order in referring to this question. But inasmuch as the question of cold storage is before the committee, and inasmuch as Mr. O'Connor's findings have been under consideration, I want to state what the public opinion of my province is with regard to this question generally. It is this: A food controller has been appointed and an extensive department organized for the purpose of food control, especially in connection with cold storage companies and organizations of that kind. Certain revelations have been made regarding the products handled by some of these cold storage companies. Our organization along the line of food control is somewhat similar to that which they have in Great Britain and in the United States. The people think that we ought to have more action from the food controller and less action on the part of commissions. The result of the revelations that have been made ought to be the immediate control of prices where high charges have been made. The people know that Canadian flour made from Canadian wheat, and bread made from that flour are cheaper in England than in Canada, and that the products of Canadian packing firms are sold at a lower price in the Mother Country than they are sold here. The people want to know why such things can be, especially in view of the fact that we now have a food controller. Our food controller is engaged in a good work. A meeting was held in Toronto last night at which the women were addressed by the food controller upon the subject of thrift. The people do not want a food controller who will wait for a long report before he takes action. He may wish to have an initial report on which to act, but he ought to be sufficiently competent to investigate for himself; he ought to have at his services officials who will help him to ascertain whether or not, for instance, the statement made in connection with the price of bacon justifies immediate action on his part. If it be proved that the prices are exorbitant, the food controller, by virtue of the powers that the Government have under the War Measures Act, should take such steps that immediate relief should be brought to the Canadian consumer. They are getting results in England through the regulation of prices. We are gradually getting to that ourselves; some of the commissions having to do with the fixing of the price of wheat in the West are getting down to work, and I have no doubt that good results will be brought about. I think that we have a competent food controller, but what we expect is not investigations by commissions, but the regulation of prices, especially in such cases as are exemplified by the difference between the price of Canadian flour here and the price of the same flour in England. The food controller and his staff ought to be able to show in one week whether the charges for bacon and bread and flour in this country, the ordinary, every-day necessities of life, and all those articles of food that pass through the hands of the cold storage people, are fair and reasonable. If they are not fair and reasonable, then the people ought to get relief. I do not think that the people are satisfied to pay 52 cents a pound for bacon. I met yesterday a man who receives a fair salary, and I had occasion to ask him what he was taking home to his family on Saturday night. He said: I bought one pound of bacon, and I paid 52 cents for it. I was told on the same day that the price of a hog's carcass on the market was about 22 cents a pound. That is a large price, but there is quite a difference between 22 cents a pound for fresh pork and 52 cents a pound for bacon. I think that sufficient evidence has been sent broadcast over the country to justify quick action in the way of regulating the price of food. The Government would be wise in getting down to the essential issues concerning prices. What we want is not so much an investigation by one commission of the findings of another, as some definite action, as quick as we can get it. As to what has been disclosed, I do not for one moment reflect upon the packing plants. I am not in a position to pass judgment upon them. But I say this: if I were the food controller, I would know within a week whether excessive prices had been charged, and under the powers vested in me I would intervene if the prices were found to be too high. That is what the food controller is doing in England every day. What is true of food is true of coal, gasolene, coal oil, all the necessities of life, which have been increasing in value since the war began. I called attention the other day to the long discussion that we had in connection with the Bill which was to-day read the third time in the House. It is not discussion we want; it is action, intervention on the part of the food controller where excessive prices have been charged. I believe that our food controller has no lack of assistance, and if his work is properly organized he should be able to give the people that for which they are asking; control and regulation of excessive food prices during the period of the war. If we do not have action soon, encouragement will be given for other kinds of extortion.

While what I say may not be quite germane to the subject before the House, it is certainly germane to the situation in the country which calls for immediate regulation and for the reduction of the excessive charges made in connection with ordinary foodstuffs and ordinary necessaries of life.

Mr. TURRIFF: Possibly the cold storage plants that have been reported on more particularly by Mr. O'Connor may not be included amongst those that the Government have assisted, but the Government for years back have been advancing large sums of money for the purpose of securing the erection of cold storage plants with the idea that they would enable food products to be carried over from one season to another to the advantage of the consumer. According to Mr. O'Connor's report, however, these cold storage plants are being used for the purpose, not of helping the farmer or the consumer, but of buying the product at a low price and storing it and later on making the consumer pay an enhanced price for it. Somewhat the same thing existed in connection with the terminal elevators in the West, and it was found necessary for the Government to intervene and to take over the control of the terminal elevators. Has any action been taken by the Government to look into this matter in order to find out if it is in the interest of the consuming public that these cold storage plants should be placed under the absolute control of whatever department looks after that particular class of work? I presume it would be the Department of Agriculture. If no action has been taken, it is time something was done along that line. Will the investigation that is going to take place under this new commission that has been appointed to investigate Mr. O'Connor's report ascertain the amount of profit that the William Davies company made during the past year, and will it ascertain if the amount this company paid in under the excess profits tax is the correct amount or not? The O'Connor report shows that this firm sold 120,000,000 or 130,000,000 pounds of bacon, and that there was a difference of five cents per pound between the cost of the bacon delivered at their warehouse and the selling price. The company did not give Mr. O'Connor the cost of storage and of delivering, but Mr. O'Connor got those costs from other storage plants, so that his figures cannot be very far wrong. According to his figures, there is a profit on what was sold to the War Department of between four and five million dollars. There is, of course, to be deducted from that the amount chargeable for storage and delivery, but there is to be added to that, the profit on all the bacon sold 10 p.m. by this company to the people of Canada at a very high price. Perhaps the Minister of Finance could say whether his department is making any investigation, in view of the facts that have come to light by the O'Connor report, as to whether the amount turned in as this company's share of excess profits—I think it was $107,000—is the proportion they should pay, or whether their true profits have been hidden, as I understand it is customary for companies to make profits show as low as possible during the years in which they have to pay taxes to the Government. If the report of this new commission is unsatisfactory, a third commission will have to be appointed to investigate the report of the one now being appointed. Unless this commission makes a thorough investigation from beginning to end, the people of this country will be very much dissatisfied, and at the present time they are very much exercised over what has come to light. If some of the members of that commission are appointed for the purpose, not of bringing out evidence, but of keeping evidence from coming out, the commission will be most unsatisfactory, and it will not clear up anything and the people will be still more dissatisfied than they are at present.

Mr. CURRIE: In regard to this cold storage controversy, a great deal of misrepresentation has been made to the public, and the case has not been fairly stated. The facts of the case as shown in the documents are these: Mr. O'Connor asked for statements not only from those who deal in food, but from those who deal in anthracite coal, sugar and other articles. The public impression was that the price of sugar was far too high. The sugar companies—we all know they are called trusts—were investigated, and the commissioner found that, as a matter of fact, they were not making what would be considered a fair profit. He then came to the cold storage question, and he asked the cold storage companies to submit their figures. All of the cold storage companies, with the exception of one or two, gave their figures for everything as accurately as they had them themselves. I understand very few of the companies are so organized that they can give a statement of costs, because unfortunately in this country most of the manufacturing concerns have not gone thoroughly into the question of factory costs and accounting, and they cannot tell where they stand only once every six months or every year. A proper business organization should be able to give a statement of its cost each day. The William Davies company, which is under investigation—and I am now speaking from the report—were asked to give the cost of the raw material, the cost of manufacture, the overhead cost and the selling price. Nowadays, every one in the manufacturing business is pestered every other day by some investigator coming in and wanting to know the cost of this and that. In Ontario, within the last year or two investigations have been made in connection with various matters, for instance the Workman's Compensation Act, and as the result of these investigations for no reason, an advance of something like 700 per cent was made in the rates last year. Everybody wants to know how much money is being made, so they can get some of the profit. The William Davies company did not give the cost of the manufacture and the overhead cost, the result being that the report made by Mr. O'Connor, which was made in good faith, gave the selling price and the cost of raw material, and said the difference was gross profit.

In other words, Mr. O'Connor gave the gross profits not the net profits of the Davies company. That was all right, because they would not give him the figures, so he states in his report. The public, however, at once jumped to the conclusion that it was the net profit, and imagined that the company were making enormous earnings. Everybody in the manufacturing business knows that a great many items have to be taken out of the gross profit before you can get the net profit. Overhead charges alone run to about twenty per cent in the manufacturing business. The Davies company rightly complained. They said to the Government: Your commissioner has not done us justice; he has misstated the facts. And they asked for justice and further investigation. It seems to me very strange that when the Government steps in and tries to put an end to profiteering they should be subject to criticism from hon. gentlemen opposite. As the Davies company demanded justice, the Government could not very well leave the matter to Mr. O'Connor, so they appointed two firms of accountants who are thoroughly equipped to go into the whole question of the net profits, which the William Davies company say in their advertisements amount to less than one cent a pound.

The Government are next criticized for having appointed a lawyer on that commission. Bear in mind that it is the Government that is being attacked through their commissioner. Hon. gentlemen opposite assume that the Government is trying to let the William Davies company out of it. But it is just the opposite. The William Davies company say that a false report has been given to the public by the Government. The Government must therefore have a capable counsel to support their commissioners, and I have no doubt the Government have appointed a capable man. What is the use of saying the question is one of accountancy pure and simple, as was stated by my hon. friend from North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) a moment ago. At first glance it would look as if it were so; but bear in mind that these companies that are being investigated might refuse to give certain information. They refused certain information to the commissioner in the first instance, and in the second investigation they may not let the commission have access to certain books. I am not very fond of appointing lawyers to all these commissions, but it seems to me—and I appeal to all the lawyers in this House—that it is necessary to have a lawyer on the commission because questions of that kind might arise from time to time, and when they do occur what person is better fitted to deal with them than the gentleman who has been appointed? He could set the legal machinery in motion to compel the companies to disclose the information.

I do not think this discussion is particularly pertinent to the item under consideration, and as this subject, the Flavelle report, is to be brought before the House in another form, I do not see any necessity for continuing this debate to-night, especially as the matter is now under judicial investigation. Whenever the Government take any step that is in the interest of the public, hon. gentlemen opposite always get up and criticise it, or else their papers give them the credit. That is one of the beauties of a strong opposition. But as I have pointed out, this subject is really not pertinent to the item, and as it will come before the House later on in another form, I do not see why we should continue this debate.

Mr. CARVELL: We are all very much obliged to my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) for the lecture which he has just delivered to us on what we ought and ought not to do on this side of the House. As a member of this House, I suppose he has the right to lecture us if he wants to, but so far as a few of us here are concerned at all events, notwithstanding his lecture, we are going to carry out what we consider to be our duty to the public, and we are not very much interested whether we should discuss this subject upon this item or not. I made no attack on the Government or on the William Davies company. I tried to state the case as fairly as it could be stated. I stated that Mr. O'Connor had made one report, and that the William Davies company were spending an enormous sum of money in placing another report before the public. If the statements contained in the advertisements of the Davies company are correct, they are making a profit of a little less than one cent a pound. As a business man, I say that that is not at all an unreasonable profit. It may amount to a large sum of money in the case of that firm, because they are doing a very big business. But if they are making five cents a pound on a food necessity of the people, I say that that is an unreasonable profit, and I would like to see the matter settled once for all, so that the public will know the truth. I object to the chairman of the commission, because I do not think the people will get justice. I hope my position is so plain that even the hon. member for North Simcoe will understand it.

Mr. CURRIE: My hon. friend changes his position so often that it is hard to follow him.

Mr. McKENZIE: Whether it is proper to discuss this subject on this item or not, we have been discussing it, and notwithstanding the injunction of my hon. friend from North Simcoe I think we might as well go on with it. We very often depart from the proper rules of procedure in this House until the hon. member for Simcoe corrects us, and then our sins, of course, are on our own hands because he points out the exact line of procedure, the evidence and the whole business. He is at once the judge, the jury, the evidence and the court of appeal. I am very glad that, although the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) is not here, and not many members of the Government, we still have the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) with us. He is a lawyer and has a great deal of knowledge as to how matters of this kind should be conducted. I wish to keep closely to this O'Connor report, because it is important to the people I represent. I represent thousands of people who are non-producers —able, capable workingmen, who must feed their families, and feed them well if they can, and it is important to them to know whether the O'Connor report is correct or not. If the report is correct, then some steps should be taken to implement it in such a way as to benefit the people who have to buy the goods which these companies are selling at such exorbitant prices. I come from the same province as Mr. O'Connor. He has been a lawyer of standing in the province of Nova Scotia for the last twenty-five years. He is well known to the Premier, and by reason of the knowledge the right hon. gentleman had of him, Mr. O'Connor has been brought here and given a position of prominence and responsibility under the Government. He was appointed to make a certain investigation. I did not see the terms of reference, but I take it for granted that if the business of the Government is done in a businesslike way the matters which Mr. O'Connor had to investigate were properly tabulated and submitted to him. The Government would say to him: "Here are certain matters to be investigated; get the evidence and report upon it." I should be surprised indeed if Mr. O'Connor were given carte blanche to investigate anything that happened to occur to his mind, for if that is the way the Government does business, surely there will never be an end to the reports they receive. I take it for granted, however, that certain questions were submitted to Mr. O'Connor, and that upon these questions he made certain findings. I appeal to the Minister of Finance as a lawyer and a man of strong commonsense, as to what should be done if Mr. O'Connor's report is not full and satisfactory. The parties who are not satisfied want a new trial. Mr. O'Connor says that as a court he asked these parties for certain facts in the course of his investigation, and that they refused to give him the facts. I am sure the lawyers in the House will agree with me that in the higher courts once a litigant has refused to furnish certain evidence he cannot give that evidence later on just when he pleases.

If he is once asked to put in the facts and he says he is not able to do it, or refuses to do it, that is the end of it. That is the hard and fast rule of court and it is a proper one. I would not ask Mr. O'Connor or any investigator to follow rigidly that rule. The Minister of Labour had this question up in the House the other night. He admitted that Mr. O'Connor's report was prematurely given to the public and that there was some further evidence that Mr. O'Connor should have had before he made his report. Then, the Government should have asked him to reopen his court and hear this evidence and when he had all the facts to make his report complete. But, a most extraordinary and absurd course is taken. The Minister of Finance is the only lawyer in the Government who is here, and I appeal to him to say if this is not the most extraordinary and ridiculous course that could have been taken. Whoever heard of such a thing as allowing a judge to hear a part of a case and conclude it, as he thought, and then, when it was discovered that new evidence should be brought in, discharging that judge and appointing another to begin de novo. The proper thing, the logical thing, would be to make application to the judge who had heard a portion of the evidence and get permission to put in further evidence, and then allow him his conclusions on the whole matter. But, it is proposed to have a new court starting over again, and we are entirely ignorant of the terms of submission to that court. Then, we shall get an endless, senseless, indecisive decision or something else which may be absolutely foreign to the matter with which Mr. O'Connor was dealing. It is not fair to the reputation of this gentleman to have his report treated in that way and to be subjected to adverse criticism based on an entirely different set of facts and circumstances. I submit that, at all events, if this court is to be reconstituted, the Government should have made him a member of it and he should have sat with that court. Then he would be able to see whether the facts which he investigated were getting a fair show or not. When the report comes in, if Mr. O'Connor is a member of that court and if he agrees with that report amending the decision that he has given—adding to it or taking away from it—the people will have some confidence in it. But, if the Government merely constitute another court that, as has been suggested by my hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Kyte) will bring in the kind of decision that the friends of the Government want brought in, and if they deal with questions different from those which are dealt with in the report of Mr. O'Connor, there will be no confidence in the report and the people will be just as much dissatisfied with conditions as they were before. The Minister of Finance knows very well how readily the people will believe that there is something wrong about these extraordinary prices, as there must be. Mr. O'Connor says that, while some of them may be permissible under the law, they are not respectable. He says that if a good many of these transactions had taken place after the passage of this order in council under which he was acting he would have deemed it his duty to report the matter to the authorities in the provinces where the transactions took place that it might be criminally prosecuted or submitted to the Attorney General for his opinion upon the question of its criminality. These are the opinions and the statements of a very respectable man from my own province, a man whom I have known for the last twenty-five years, and I have every confidence that in so far as the facts were submitted to him he has done the right thing. If there is any further evidence, let it be submitted to him and to the rest of the court. Then we shall have reason to have some respect for the last findings of this court. Otherwise, I submit there is no business about it, there is no practice properly followed, and we shall have just as much right to start de novo, to try the results that will be obtained by the commission that is now investigating, as the Government have to institute this new tribunal. We are told that these people are working for nothing. I am sick and tired of this business of people working for nothing. The next thing we find is that they are overpaid. If you get a thing for nothing you usually pay for it all that it is worth. If the Government are expecting a report for nothing it is safe to conclude that that will be all that it will be worth.

Mr. CARVELL: Would the Minister of Finance lay on the Table the order in council appointing this last commission?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think it was laid on the Table to-day.

Arts and Agriculture—For the administration and carrying out of the provisions of the Agricultural Instruction Act, $25,000.

Mr. CARVELL: Is it the Agricultural Instruction Act which provides that certain moneys shall be handed over to the provinces amounting to $10,000,000?

Mr. REID: The details of the whole sum are set forth below.

Mr. CARVELL: What becomes of the $25,000?

Mr. BURRELL: The $25,000 is to cover the cost of the administration of the Act. We have four or five officers in connection with the general inspection work. It also covers publication and a part of the cost of the publication of the Agricultural Gazette, which publishes the record of the work that the provinces do under the $10,000,000 grant.

Mr. NESBITT: What inspection is there?

Mr. BURRELL: The vote as it stands this year will be $1,100,000. The officers work in collaboration with the provinces. There is correspondence and there are consultations and inspections from one cause or another. We have a commissioner, an officer in Quebec who thoroughly understands the French language, an officer and a stenographer in the office and an additional inspector for keeping in closer touch with the provinces in order to co-operate more fully with them in all lines of work.

Mr. CARVELL: Does the minister exercise any supervision over the provinces as to the manner in which they shall invest their portion of the fund? Up to the last three or four months the $45,000 or $50,000 which was handed over to my province was entirely eaten up by salaries. When I saw this $25,000 item, I wondered if it was just a continuation of the same old story, because, so far as education in New Brunswick was concerned, it was practically nil, but so far as the multiplication of offices was concerned, it was a wonderful success.

Mr. BURRELL: I am sure my hon. friend can hardly expect me to agree entirely with that version of the story. An agreement is entered into with each provincial government, conforming to the general principles of the Act. As a rule the suggestions of the provinces are followed, but if we think that certain proposed expenditures do not conform to the general provisions of this Act we have negotiations with the province and possibly some alteration is made. The appropriation of the money for the current year, 1917-18, for New Brunswick includes, under the head of agricultural schools, capital account, construction and equipment, furnishing, agricultural and dairy schools, $1,000; salaries and maintenance, $3,000. Under the head of instruction and demonstration, it includes district representatives, $8,000; bee-keeping demonstration and instruction work, $500; soil and drainage instruction work, $4,000; horticulture, demonstration work, $5,500; short courses, $3,500; for live stock educational work, $7,000; dairying, $4,000; poultry, $1,600; fertilizer educational and demonstration work, $3,000; for entomology, $1,000; young people's clubs, $2,000; agricultural societies, $4,000; women's institutes, $4,500; educational instruction in public, high and normal schools, household science, training teachers, grants, $9,785; school fairs, educational work, $1,725. This makes a total of $64,110. Although it may be true that a good deal of this seems to go in salaries, I need hardly point out that it is along the lines of the best work done in all progressive countries that is strengthening the educational side of agricultural work. That is what brought Belgium and Germany to the state of efficiency which they had attained shortly before the war.

Mr. CARVELL: I appreciate that, and I am glad to get this list of the distribution of the moneys. I quite understand that a large amount of that money, if properly expended, ought to produce valuable results. I do not know whether there will be any change or not; I sincerely hope there will. I noticed among the items read by the minister, $4,000 for drainage and soil. That is one of the greatest scandals we ever had in New Brunswick. They simply hired half a dozen fellows who did not know anything about running the business. They would work for a few hours wherever they wanted to. It was a machine, but it was a political machine. My friends are in power in New Brunswick now, and if they carry on this thing in the same way that the others did, I hope my hon. friend will withdraw the grant and exercise some sort of a supervision over it himself. I hope we shall have a better condition of affairs. Then there is a poultry expert at $1,600. The poultry expert was simply the brother of one of the members for the county of Kings, a barber who kept a few hens. He was out of a job, and so they made him a poultry expert.

Mr. McKENZIE: His own hens?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, his own hens, a few in the back yard. If my friends in New Brunswick are doing no better than their predecessors were, I hope my hon. friend will withdraw the grant, because a very large amount of this money was not properly expended, and did not go to the education of the people. If he will carry out this policy on the lines laid down there, and if this money is used for educative purposes, it will be all right, and I wish we had twice as much, but I hope there will be some supervision.

Mr. BURRELL: My hon. friend is aware that I cannot have a personal knowledge of all these expenditures. I agree that if there are any grievances of this kind they should be remedied, and I shall be glad to do all I can to remedy them.

Mr. COPP: Does an official go from the minister's department to the different provinces to inspect the work?

Mr. BURRELL: Yes.

Quarantine—Salaries and contingencies of organized districts and public health in other districts, $225,000.

Mr. McKENZIE: May I bring to the notice of the minister some complaints in connection with the quarantine station at Halifax? I understand the minister has more than one doctor at that place. I am told there is an old official who was appointed nearly twenty years ago. Dr. Mackay, and then there are two other doctors who are assistants under him.

Mr. BURRELL: One, I think.

Mr. McKENZIE: I think there are two. At all events, it was so reported to me. Those assistants get more than double the amount paid to the chief man.

Mr. BURRELL: My hon. friend knows that Dr. Mackay is allowed to carry on private practice as well.

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister will find the others are carrying on private practice as well as Dr. Mackay. The great difficulty is that the assistants were appointed since 1911 and Dr. Mackay was appointed before that. Dr. Mackay is supposed to be a Liberal, and his officials are the nominees of strong supporters of the Government, and they have the old style pull. It is rather scandalous to my mind that a man of the standing of Dr. Mackay, one of the first practitioners in Nova Scotia, a surgeon who is the peer of any in Canada, should be getting only $1,000 a year, and young men who are his assistants should be getting somewhere in the vicinity of $2,200 and $2,500.

And that is solely and simply because Dr. Mackay happened to be a Liberal and the others were Tories. I want the minister to explain if there is any other reason. I bring the charge home to him, and tell him that that is what it is for. Whoever his advisors in Halifax are, if the hon. minister looks up Dr. Montizambert's report, he will find that he is a regular watchdog for Toryism since the change of Government in these particular matters; that he does not like Dr. Mackay, because Dr. Mackay was a bigger man in his profession than ever Montizambert was born to be, and Dr. Mackay will not fall down and worship him; and he is to be punished by being kept down to the first salary he got of $1,000 when he was appointed some twenty years ago; and this young man put over his head at double his salary and more. I place these facts before the minister as strongly as I can, and if he will look into the facts he will find it is nothing but partisanship; and I protest against it.

Mr. BURRELL: The hon. gentleman is extreme in his statements. Dr. McKay was appointed by the Liberal Government, and the very salary he is complaining of was given him by that Government, and given under conditions similar to those which exist to-day. With regard to the other man, it was considered absolutely necessary to appoint a man who would give his whole time to the work, a bacteriologist, and it was not easy to secure such a man. There have been changes. One man has gone to the war, and I think I am within the facts in stating that one of the men who occupied the position since that time is not a Conservative at all. However, I shall be glad to bear in mind what the hon. gentleman says, and, although I do not agree with his statements, I shall be glad to post myself thoroughly.

Mr. CARVELL: Is it under this vote that there is a tug of some kind—I have forgotten its name—employed in the city of St. John?

Mr. BURRELL: Yes.

Mr. CARVELL: I thought I had the papers here, but my memory is very good. I can give the minister the facts pretty nearly as they are. The tug is owned by a man named Elkin. Unfortunately, Elkin was, and I presume is still, of the wrong stripe politically. Of course, he could not rent the tug to the department. Elkin rented the tug to a Mr. McNeill, and if my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) were here he would be able to tell you exactly who McNeill is. He is a very prominent member of the patronage committee of the Government party in St. John. McNeill pays, I think, $500 a month to Elkin for the tug. He rents it to the minister for $900, and there it goes on, year after year. These things are well known to the people in St. John. Complaints have been made about Mr. McNeill pulling down $400 a month for five or seven months out of the year. I give my hon. friend the names and the amounts, because it is common property down there, and it is common knowledge of the minister, but it goes on just the same. We hope the time will come very shortly when there will be a way of stopping these things, but at least for the present we would like to know how long it is to continue. The time will soon arrive when it will commence again. It starts in the autumn, and continues during the winter. The steal is not more than $2,000 a year, but it is an absolute patent steal, known to everybody.

Mr. MACDONALD: All over the province.

Mr. BURRELL: If I had known this matter was coming up I should have had the information.

Mr. CARVELL: It is the Lily M.

Mr. BURRELL: I think it is.

An hon. MEMBER: Not the Minnie M.

Mr. BURRELL: No, not the Minnie M., but the Lily M. The deputy and Dr. Montizambert looked into the matter, and we came to the conclusion it was a proper and business-like arrangement.

Mr. CARVELL: For McNeill.

Mr. BURRELL: No, for the Government. A responsible officer of the Government advised me in the matter. I cannot enter into a discussion, because I do not remember the details, but I know I felt justified in making the arrangement, or I should not have made it.

Mr. CARVELL: I am sure I am correct. I might be a few dollars out one way or the other. I know there is a rake-off of $400 a month being made by a member of the Conservative patronage committee in the rent of the tug, and I do not think it is necessary to hire the tug at all, because it is tied up at the wharf for a long time. The minister could hire all that work to be done by other men there for $500 a year. It is simply a straight steal; that is all there is to it.

Mr. BURRELL: I think the hon. gentleman is wrong.

Mr. CARVELL: No, I am not wrong.

Mr. BURRELL: If there is not a boat there in proper condition, and at the service of the Government, we would get in some strange predicaments.

Mr. CARVELL: This boat only goes out to Partridge Island occasionally. I have no doubt my hon. friend is sincere in his statements, because these gentlemen are very shifty in St. John, and they can put up as smooth a story as any man in any part of Canada, and no doubt they did put it up, but there is nothing in it but graft.

Public Works Health Act, $12,000.

Mr. CARVELL: Is any portion of this devoted to the hospital up on the Hill, near the new Parliament buildings now under construction?

Mr. BURRELL: No.

Mr. CARVELL: From what vote is that provided for?

Mr. REID: Public Works.

Mr. CARVELL: That private hospital on the Hill is one of the funniest institutions in Ottawa.

Mr. REID: We have a number of patients there.

STELLARTON, N.S., POSTMASTER.

Mr. MACDONALD:

Who is the acting postmaster at Stellarton, Nova Scotia?

Mr. DOHERTY: With reference to this question, it may be stated that W. G. Miller has been appointed postmaster at Stellarton, N.S. The existing premises being unsuitable as regards site and accommodation, it was necessary to move the post office to a more suitable site and to fit up the building in such a manner as to afford the public proper accommodation. The transfer of the Stellarton post office has, therefore, been deferred until the necessary alterations to the new building are completed. In the meantime, the late postmaster, Mr. A. M. Inglis, is acting as postmaster. The new building will be ready in the course of a very short time.

ENLISTMENT OF PERSONS OF FOREIGN BIRTH.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Some time ago the member for Saltcoats (Mr. MacNutt) asked a question with regard to the enlistment of aliens under the voluntary system and under the Military Service Act. The matter of the enlistment of such persons under the voluntary system has been under consideration by the military authorities not only of this country but of the United Kingdom as well, and there has been consultation between the two Governments with regard to it. Upon that consultation the general policy under the voluntary system of recruiting has been not to enlist men of alien enemy birth for combatant service. With regard to the policy under the Military Service Act, it would not be considered desirable to enlist for combatant service any man who, under the policy that has been carried out in respect of voluntary enlistment, would not be accepted. The same principle, we think, should be applied to both: that is, such a man should not be enlisted for combatant service.

RECRUITING OF CANADIANS IN THE UNITED STATES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. OLIVER: Will the Minister of Militia be good enough to make, at his convenience, a statement in regard to the recruiting in the United States of Canadian battalions for overseas service?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: A question in regard to that matter, asked by the member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), was answered to-day.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not think that the answer given to the question of the member for Pictou conveys the information that I am desirous of obtaining. I should like to have a statement of the policy of the Government in regard to the matter. I do not particularly desire the details; I want to know how far it is intended to carry this practice and upon what principle it is formulated. Are these instances merely exceptional, occurring for some exceptional reason, or are they in accordance with a well defined policy of the Government?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: If the information contained in the question which I answered is not sufficient I will make a note of what my hon. friend says now and will make a statement in the matter within a day or so.

CORRECTION—MR. KYTE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. KYTE: The Journal-Press newspaper of to-day's date contains the statement that I did not vote upon the third reading of the Military Service Bill yesterday, and that I did not state whether I was paired or not. That statement is incorrect. I voted against the third reading of the Bill, and my name is recorded in Hansard as having so voted.

DELAY OF HOMESTEAD PATENTS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. McCRANEY: I am in receipt of a telegram from Mr. G. Harmon Jones, Secretary of the Military hospitals commission in Saskatchewan I wish to ask the Minister of the Interior a question with regard to it. The telegram is as follows:

Settlement of returned soldiers on lands seriously retarded by delay of patent on account of failure to complete improvements. Possibly amendments contemplate removal of this obstruction. If not, cannot some method of relief be devised? The matter is urgent and soldiers considerably agitated over it.

I understand that duties are remitted in the case of homesteads belonging to soldiers returned from overseas. I would like to ask the minister if he will facilitate the issue of those patents.

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: I understand the minister to say, in answer to the member for Saskatoon (Mr. McCraney) that the duties on homesteads of returned soldiers are remitted. Does that apply to residence duties only, or does it include also improvement duties?

Mr. ROCHE: The terms of the order in council are to the effect that any person who had made a homestead entry prior to enlistment has his residence duties counted while he is away. That is the point raised in the telegram read by my hon. friend (Mr. McCraney).

Mr. OLIVER: Then that remission does not cover improvements?

Mr. ROCHE: No.

QUEBEC AND SAGUENAY RAILWAY.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. LEMIEUX: Does the Minister of Railways and Canals intend to bring in any legislation this session with respect to the Quebec and Saguenay Railway?

Mr. COCHRANE: I made a statement to the House some time ago that we were going to bring in legislation.

WAYS AND MEANS.

WAR TAX UPON INCOMES.

The House in Committee of Ways and Means, Mr. Blain in the Chair.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Minister of Finance): Mr. Chairman, the enactment of the Military Service Bill which has just passed through the House will result in material increase in and acceleration of the war expenditures of the Dominion.

By that Bill, provision is made for calling an additional 100,000 men to the forces of Canada. In view of the expenditure involved, and in order to maintain the credit of the Dominion, it is necessary that we should adopt further taxation measures. Apart from this necessity from a financial standpoint, there has arisen, in connection with the Military Service Bill, both in this House and in the country, a very natural and, in my view a very just, sentiment that those who are in the enjoyment of substantial incomes should substantially and directly contribute to the growing war expenditures of the Dominion.

In view of these considerations, I desire to-day to lay before this committee proposals for a national measure of income taxation. I may say that the adoption of such a measure is a distinct innovation in federal fiscal legislation. Hitherto we have relied upon duties of customs and of excise, postal rates and other miscellaneous sources of revenue. It is true that since the outbreak of the war we have adopted the Business Profits War Tax Act which is a measure of direct taxation akin to income taxation, but not so wide in its scope. As the members of the committee are aware, the Dominion Government, under the provisions of the British North America Act, is empowered to raise revenue by any mode or form of taxation, whether direct or indirect. On the contrary, the provinces, and, by consequence, the municipalities which derive their taxation powers from the provinces, are confined, in the raising of their revenues, to measures of direct taxation. For this reason, since the outbreak of the war, I have hesitated to bring down a measure of federal income taxation. As I have stated, the provinces and the municipalities are confined to direct taxation, and I have not regarded it as expedient, except in case of manifest public necessity, such as I believe exists at the present time, that the Dominion should invade the field to which the provinces are solely confined for the raising of their revenue.

There is a further fact to which I have alluded in my Budget speeches since the outbreak of the war. Canada is not a country of concentrated wealth. We have a sparse population of some 8,000,000 people, scattered over an immense territory as large in area as the United States of America, almost as large as the continent of Europe. The result of that is that the cost of administration of an income tax measure will be quite substantial, and the cost of administration is always a factor which should be had in mind in connection with the imposition of taxation. Generally speaking, if the cost of administration of a tax is disproportionately heavy, it is not a good tax. I do not say that the cost of administration of such an income tax as I shall propose to-day will be unduly heavy, but the fact that we shall have to cover the entire Dominion in our administration of the measure has been an element to which I have given some thought when the matter of income taxation has been under my consideration and the consideration of the Government in the past.

Furthermore, Canada has been and will continue, during the lifetime of those present here to-day, to be a country inviting immigration. I have, therefore, thought it desirable that we should not be known to the outside world as a country of heavy individual taxation. There is another feature which has had some influence with me in hesitating to bring down an income taxation measure, and that is the fact that the people of this country, from the very outbreak of the war, have been most generous in contributing from their incomes to the Patriotic, Red Cross and other funds connected with the war.

We are, however, confronted with grave conditions arising out of the war and with, as I have stated, an increased and accelerated war expenditure due to the measure which has just passed the House and which will enable us to continue to play our part in this great conflict. The war continues, not only on an undiminished, but on an ever increasing scale. I believe it is the will of the people of Canada that we should continue to exert to the utmost our human and material power to the end that final and decisive victory may be obtained. I do not believe any other end than such final and conclusive victory will satisfy the high spirit and aspirations of the free people of the British Empire. No matter what the cost may be in man-power or in treasure, I believe it to be the will of the people of this country that we should persevere unto the end.

In view of what I have said as to the financial situation, as to the increased demands which will be made upon us, and as to the purpose of the people of Canada in this war, it is manifest to me, as I think it will be to most of the members of this House, that the time has arrived when we must resort to this measure of direct taxation. I am confident, Mr. Chairman, that the people of Canada whose patriotism during this war has been so often and so nobly proven will in the light of present conditions, which call for it, cheerfully accept the burden and the sacrifice of this additional taxation.

I shall now explain to the committee the nature of the proposals which I purpose laying before them. In framing these proposals we have had regard to certain conditions which I think ought to be taken into account in connection with a measure of this kind. In the first place, we must not be blind to the fact that the cost of living has materially, and indeed, greatly increased in this country, as it has all over the world since the outbreak of this war, and that has a bearing upon the question of the exemption which should be allowed in an income tax measure. We have also borne in mind the fact that in most of the provinces of the Dominion there is a municipal tax upon income more or less heavy, running as high as two or three per cent. In addition to that, there is in some of the provinces a direct income tax levied by the province itself. So we must bear in mind that when this measure becomes law the people of this country whose incomes make them subject to the several income taxation laws in force in Canada will be liable to three different sets of income taxation—first, income taxation by the municipality, secondly, income taxation by the province, and thirdly, income taxation by the Dominion.

There is another matter which I have thought proper to bear in mind, and that is the existing income taxation in the United States of America. For 3,600 miles the territories of the two countries adjoin, and there is a continual flow of population over the border. As I stated earlier in my remarks, we are inviting immigration to this country; we are inviting those of good character and capability from all nations in the world to make their home in Canada. The United States and ourselves occupy the northern half of this continent, and I think it would be undesirable, except for the gravest reasons of national necessity, that our income tax should be substantially heavier than that in force in the United States. The American measure which I have had in mind for the purpose of comparison only when drafting this Bill is the measure which is now before Congress, and which provides for a very much heavier degree of taxation than is provided for by their existing legislation, or by the legislation which existed before the outbreak of the war.

In a measure of income taxation we should consider first, what amount of exemption should fairly be allowed. On the one hand, we must be careful that the entire burden of the taxation is not borne by a particular class, and on the other hand, we must see to it that our taxation is not oppressive to those whose incomes are barely sufficient to enable them to sustain the burden of the cost of living as it is to-day. It has appeared to us that it would be proper to fix the limit of exemption at $3,000 in the case of married persons, and $2,000 in the case of unmarried persons and widowers without dependent children. So that, so far as this measure is concerned, a married man who has an income of $3,000 or less will not be subject to its provisions. An unmarried man, or a widower without dependent children, having an income of $2,000 or under will not be subject to its provisions.

We have also thought it advisable to adopt the principle of graduated tax. Within certain limits of income it is proper that an income tax should be uniform, but when we reach the higher salaries I regard it as just and proper that the rate of taxation should increase as the scale of income increases. Our proposals are therefore as follows:

We propose to levy an income tax of 4 per cent upon incomes exceeding $2,000 per annum in the case of unmarried men and widowers without children, and exceeding $3,000 in the case of other persons, and in addition thereto a supertax of 2 per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $6,000 and does not exceed $10,000; and 5 per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $10,000 and does not exceed $20,000; and 8 per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $20,000 and does not exceed $30,000; and 10 per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $30,000 and does not exceed $50,000; and 15 per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $50,000 and does not exceed $100,000, and 25 per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $100,000.

Mr. NESBITT: Is that the net tax or the supertax?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Let me recapitulate. First, there is the exemption of $3,000 in the case of married men, and $2,000 in the case of unmarried men and widowers without children. Subject to those exemptions there is a 4 per cent rate upon all remaining income no matter how large it may be, and in addition to that 4 per cent there is the supertax as I have stated.

Mr. GRAHAM: Are all salaries up to $2,000 and $3,000 respectively exempt, no matter what the amount may be?

[Sir Thomas White.]

Sir THOMAS WHITE: All are free to that amount. If a man has an income of $100,000, $97,000 will be the amount unexempted. On this he will pay 4 per cent, plus the supertax.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Would the minister again recite the supertax figure from $5,000?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: First, there is the 4 per cent and in addition thereto the supertax of 2 per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $6,000 and does not exceed $10,000; 5 per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $10,000 and does not exceed $20,000; 8 per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $20,000 and does not exceed $30,000; 10 per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $30,000 and does not exceed $50,000; 15 per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $50,000 and does not exceed $100,000, and 25 per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $100,000.

I was about to inform the committee as to how this tax works out in concrete cases. The following statement will show:

INCOME TAX.

Income of	Unmarried men and widowers without dependent children, exempt $2000.	All other persons exempt $3,000.
$ 4,000	$ 80	$ 40
5,000	120	80
7,000	220	180
10,000	400	360
12,000	580	540
15,000	850	810
20,000	1,300	1,260
30,000	2,500	2,460
50,000	5,300	5,260
75,000	10,050	10,010

150,000	29,300	29,260
200,000	43,800	43,760

Mr. DEVLIN: If the question is not premature, might I ask the minister whether the income tax will apply to the revenues derived from industrial profits already taxed?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I will come to that a little later, under the exemptions.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will the minister define what income is?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Income will be defined in the Bill, but I may say it is the net profit or gain arising from any business in which a person, as defined in the Act, is engaged—salary, income from investments whether stock, mortgages, or otherwise. In other words, we have endeavoured to give a definition of income as wide as possible so that everybody in Canada shall be subject to the tax, provided the income is over the amount of exemption.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The point upon which I would wish information is whether the liabilities will be considered before the income is fixed.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: "Income" means any income, not deducting living expenses. If a man has a business and his gross receipts are, say, $100,000, but his operating and under expenses are $50,000, the income would be $50,000. Of course you cannot tax a man on his liabilities.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: I suppose municipal and provincial taxes will be deducted?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In connection with a man's own business, yes; in connection with a man's own home I should say no, however that is a question which we will have to deal with a little more fully in committee.

I may say this measure applies to the income of the present year. It provides for returns by all parties subject to the tax before February 28 of next year. There are a number of exemptions under the Act, mostly of those institutions that do not operate for gain. I do not know that it is necessary I should specially refer to them here. Apart from those exemptions which I shall be glad to mention in committee and take up more particularly when the Bill is before the House, there are certain exemptions which I should mention here. My hon. friend from Wright very properly asked as to whether those who are paying a very heavy business profits taxation are subject to this income measure. The House is aware that liability to the Business Profits War Tax Act of 1916 and the amendment thereto of this year comes to an end on December 31 this year, and it is not the intention to renew that measure. When that measure was imposed it was retroactive to the extent of one year so that in 1916 firms and companies subject to its provisions paid in respect of their profits of 1915; those liable on account of their profits in 1916 paid this year and those liable in respect of any accounting period falling in during this year, 1917, pay the tax next year. I think it is only just and proper that those who pay the very heavy business profits tax—much heavier than this tax—upon an accounting period falling in during the present year should not be called upon to pay this income tax unless it chances to be heavier than the tax they are paying. The result of that view is that we shall exempt from the taxation which would be payable by such firms and companies under this measure the amounts paid by any taxpayer under the Business Profits War Tax Act, 1916, and any amendments thereto for any accounting period ending in the year 1917. In the case of a partnership, each partner shall be entitled to deduct such portion of the tax paid by the partnership under the Business Profits War Tax Act, 1916, as may correspond to his interest in the income of the partnership. In addition to that, we provide that taxpayers shall be entitled to deduct from the amount which would otherwise be payable by them for income tax under this measure the amount paid by them for taxes during the year 1917, and in any year thereafter, under the provisions of Part 1 of the Special War Revenue Act, 1915. That means that if the taxation under the Special War Revenue Act, 1915, is greater than the income tax, they pay the greater taxation, but if, on the other hand, this income tax is greater than the tax to which they are now subject, they are permitted to deduct from the income taxation the tax to which they are liable under the Special War Revenue Act, 1915.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Does the exemption of $2,000 or $3,000 apply to corporations?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I will come to that. We are providing in the legislation also that we shall levy an income tax on corporations and joint stock companies earning an income exceeding $3,000. In England there is no super tax upon companies, but their shareholders are liable to it. We are providing by this measure that joint stock companies and corporations shall be subject to a tax of four per cent. Their shareholders are liable not only to the tax of four per cent but to the super tax. But, in estimating the income of any person subject to the tax, we credit him with the amount which has been paid by the company from which he derives dividends under the provisions of this Act, the idea being to avoid double assessment. Let me give a concrete case.

Mr. MACDONALD: Is that the same practice as is followed in the United States?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes. That question gives a great deal of difficulty. In Great Britain they have not imposed a super tax upon corporations or companies. In the United States they have an income tax called the normal tax to be paid by corporations and joint stock companies. They provide—and we have similarly provided—that, while the shareholders of these companies are subject to the super tax, the amount of the normal tax upon dividends shall be deducted from their income. It will be obvious to the committee that it is not possible to impose the super tax upon a company, much as we should like to do so, for this reason: Take a company that is owned by hundreds of shareholders, that has a capital of $1,000,000 and that earns six per cent; it would have an income of $60,000. Take another company with $2,000,000 capital and which earns six per cent; it has an income of $120,000. Although both derive six per cent, if you applied the super tax, because the income of the $2,000,000 company is larger than that of the $1,000,000 company, you would make one set of shareholders pay so much more than another set of shareholders. Accordingly, we get over the difficulty by making joint stock companies and corporations subject to a four per cent tax, called the normal tax, and then we make their shareholders liable to a super tax giving them an allowance equivalent to the normal tax upon the dividend that they derive from such companies.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What about the revenue derived from American companies?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If my hon. friend is a holder, as I hope he is, of the shares of any corporation either in this country or any other country, he will be liable to pay in respect to the income derived from such companies no matter whence or how it is derived. If my hon. friend has such income, he has to pay provided he is a resident of Canada.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What about foreign corporations?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Foreign corporations will pay in respect to their earnings upon their business in this country.

Sir HERBERT AMES: What about a dividend that has already been taxed?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In the case of a resident of Canada?

Sir HERBERT AMES: Yes.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In the case of a resident of Canada, if he was taxed in respect of his dividends in a foreign country, he would be entitled to deduct the amount of such taxation from his income for the purpose of ascertaining the amount on which he should be assessed here. So far I have not been able to reach a conclusion, although I am glad to have an open mind on the matter, that he should be allowed to deduct the amount of such tax from the taxation which he would pay upon his entire income.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Do I understand the minister to say that foreign corporations are subject to his income tax only to the extent of the profits gained in this country?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes, I am speaking of a foreign corporation domiciled in a foreign country and carrying on business in Canada, but if a Canadian company carries on business here and throughout the world you assess it on its entire income.

Mr. MACDONALD: How about an alien who lives in another country and who has stock or interests in Canada from which he gets an income?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We do not tax any but residents of Canada.

Mr. MACDONALD: The United States impose such a tax?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I believe they do but I am of the opinion that it is rather an unwise tax. I do not see how we can hold an alien liable unless we provide to cut off a portion of his income at his source and that would raise questions as to what his real income was and as to whether it was proper to do that. This Bill will not apply to aliens unless they are living in Canada.

Mr. MACDONALD: What would be the course with regard to a British citizen who lives outside of the boundaries of Canada but who draws an income from Canadian sources?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is a very vexed question, a question which has been often raised in England and is before the British Government now; that is to say, the question of double income taxation. My own view is that there should not be double income taxation within the Empire.

Mr. MACDONALD: Take the case of a Britisher who lives in the United States; he is not taxed upon income that he derives from Canadian securities.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think he is.

Mr. MACDONALD: I am inclined to think not. I think their taxation is confined to income arising within the country but still there may be some question about that. Why should not he be liable to taxation in Canada?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In the first place he is not a resident of Canada. There is another thing. We must bear in mind that we must not be too astute or too eager to tax an alien in respect to the small investments he may have made in Canada. I would fear that too stringent taxation in that regard would deter men from investing in this country—and we want investment.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What about the people who transform their present holdings into, say, Dominion war loan securities, which are free from any taxation?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Government war loans are free from any income taxation, and they must be. It is absolutely impossible for this Government to issue its bonds to the amount which is and will be required for the war expenditure of the Dominion unless those bonds are income tax free, so far as Dominion legislation is concerned. The reason is that men buy securities to yield a certain interest rate. Sometimes the difference between 5.30 and 5.40 per cent will determine whether a man will or will not buy a bond. My hon. friend knows that the value of securities is regulated having regard to market conditions and the value of all other securities, and in offering Dominion issues, put out as we must put them out to finance a war of this kind, the uncertainty of an income tax so far as the future is concerned, or a heavy income tax so far as the present is concerned, means that people will not buy those bonds to the extent they otherwise would. And there is this further point to be considered. If you should sell your Dominion bonds without that provision that they are income tax free it would only mean that you would have to sell them to yield a higher rate than they yield to-day. So it is as broad as it is long; you would not get as much for your issue of securities as you get for them to-day, free of income tax. That is a question that has perplexed many Chancellors of the Exchequer. In the United States they have issued their loans free of income taxation for the reasons I have mentioned. Even in England, which is the home of income tax, where they struggled to the utmost against issuing securities free of income tax, in connection with the last loan in London they gave an alternative, one free of income tax and another subject to it. There is in the Bill provision for assessment, appeal and collection. I have placed no time limit upon this taxation measure; but I do suggest, and I should like this suggestion to be on Hansard, that after the war is over this taxation measure should be deliberately reviewed. What I have in mind is this: In the period after this war, as in the past, we will continue to invite people to come to this country. We shall need men of enterprise, men of ability, to bring in capital and develop our immense undeveloped resources. In reviewing this measure after the war, I think consideration should be given to the question whether the taxation is so heavy that it would operate to prevent men of that type from coming to this country and giving us the benefit of their enterprise and their capital and their ability. I have placed, as I stated, no time limit upon the measure. We cannot see very far ahead in these days. We do not know how long this war will last. We do not know what the attitude of the people of this world or of this country will be upon many questions, social, industrial, financial and fiscal. Therefore I have placed no time limit upon this measure, but merely have placed upon Hansard the suggestion that, a year or two after the war is over, the measure should be deliberately reviewed by the Minister of Finance and the Government of the day, with the view of judging whether it is suitable to the conditions which then prevail.

I therefore beg to lay upon the Table the following resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient:

1. To levy an income tax of four per centum upon income exceeding two thousand dollars per annum in the case of unmarried men and widowers without children, and exceeding three thousand dollars in the case of other persons, and, in addition thereto, a supertax of two per centum upon the amount by which the income exceeds six thousand dollars and does not exceed ten thousand dollars, and five per centum upon the amount by which the income exceeds fifty thousand dollars and not exceed twenty thousand dollars, and eight per centum of the amount by which the income exceeds twenty thousand dollars and does not exceed thirty thousand dollars, and ten per centum of the amount by which the income exceeds thirty thousand dollars and does not exceed fifty thousand dollars, and fifteen per centum of the amount by which the income exceeds fifty thousand dollars and does not exceed one hundred thousand dollars, and twenty-five per centum of the amount by which the income exceeds one hundred thousand dollars.

2. To levy an income tax of four per centum upon income exceeding three thousand dollars in the case of corporations and joint stock companies.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to detain the committee for more than a moment at the present time, as it is quite clear that the proposal which is submitted by the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White), can be more properly and profitably discussed when we are considering the bill founded upon the resolution. I have no doubt that the principle contained in the taxation proposals just submitted to the committee will be approved of by the country. The advantages of the proposal are quite obvious. It will augment our revenues, which is very desirable and very necessary indeed; but, better than that, it will equalize taxation in this country, and that is obviously desirable. I think the House will approve also of the suggestion, of the declaration of the Minister of Finance—

WAYS AND MEANS.

INCOME TAX PROPOSAL.

The House resumed in Committee of Ways and Means, Mr. Blain in the Chair.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: When the attendance of this House was required in the upper chamber, I had observed that the country would at least approve the principle involved in the taxation proposal submitted to the committee this afternoon by the Minister of Finance, and that if there was any criticism of the same, it would relate entirely to the details of the proposals. The details of the resolution can be more profitably discussed when the Bill founded on the resolution is printed and distributed amongst the members. The taxation of income is as the minister has stated, a new form of taxation in this country except in so far as it is employed in the several provinces. My experience is that while there is an income tax in several of the provinces, still it is not enforced very rigidly and in the strictest sense I would think that there is still in Canada hardly any such thing as an income tax. One great value of this form of taxation will be that the taxpayer will take a greater interest in the expenditure of any money which he contributes directly to the public treasury. One of the evil effects of indirect taxation is that the taxpayer is apparently never fully seized of the fact that he is contributing anything in taxation to the public treasury. Consequently, he is as unreasonable in his demands upon the public treasury as are people who never contribute one cent either directly or indirectly. It is in the interest of sound national finance that we should have in this country some form of income taxation, and I have no doubt that once we have embarked upon it, the judgment of the country will be that it should be continued for many years to come.

The minister is a little alarmed that the imposition of taxation of this kind may, in the future, impede immigration. He left the impression upon me, at least, that in his mind there was a fear that the intending immigrant would consider an income tax as unfair and oppressive. I hardly look at the matter in that light. Our taxation in this country is by no means light to-day; it is very high; indeed, it is excessive. The fact that it is paid indirectly in the form of customs taxation makes the average taxpayer blind to the fact that it is from him we obtain all our revenue. The average rate of customs duty to-day is, I suppose, 35 or 40 per cent, and nobody could say that that was a light rate of taxation. The minister, therefore, need not be apprehensive that in the future immigrants might be deterred from coming to Canada by reason of the imposition of the income tax. If the country is in fear that our taxation would impede immigration in the years to come after the cessation of the war, such fear can easily be removed by a lower rate of customs taxation, which is now very excessive.

I wish to refer very briefly to the statement made by the Minister of Finance in justification of his taxation proposals. He stated that he was urged to do this by reason of the fresh burdens which this country was about to assume owing to the passage of the Military Service Bill. That is hardly a good ground upon which to justify the resolution. It may be that the introduction of the Military Service Bill has accentuated in the minds of the people of this country the fact that from the beginning of he war up to the present time the Government has not imposed a sufficient burden of taxation upon the people in order to meet in proper proportions our unusual obligations due to the war. The Minister of Finance, in discussing his Budget proposals on the 24th of April last, took very strong ground against the imposition of an income tax, and argued very carefully and seriously the undesirability of imposing such form of taxation. I am not inclined to agree with him when he says that the justification of the income tax is due to the fact that we are about to engage in larger military operations by reason of the passage of the Military Service Bill. The truth is that almost since the beginning of the war we should have had in this country some form of income taxation. I do not say that it should have been imposed immediately at the commencement of the war, but I do say during the past two years we should have had some form of income taxation. Hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, and, I think, some hon. gentlemen opposite impressed this upon the minister on various occasions, in particular when we were discussing the annual Budget speech of the Minister of Finance. I am, however, sure the country will welcome the proposal submitted to the committee this afternoon. The only criticism which hon. gentlemen, or the country generally, will make to the proposal will have relation to the details and not to the principle.

I wish to say just a word or two in reference to the details of the resolution, although it might be proper to reserve discussion of such details until the Bill is printed. The exemption in respect to unmarried men is too high. We must realize —and if we do not it will be unfortunate for the country in the future—that we are rapidly piling up a tremendous national debt, which will tax to the limit the resources of this country and its people in the future.

We are enjoying commercial prosperity notwithstanding the war, and it seems to me that now is the time to impose upon the people of this country the utmost of taxation. According to the statement read by the Minister of Finance an unmarried man with an income of $4,000 will pay a tax of $80; with an income of $5,000, a tax of $120; with an income of $7,000, $220; with an income of $10,000, $400; with an income of $12,000, $580; with an income of $15,000, $850. I submit that this is certainly not an oppressive tax to impose upon an unmarried man or widower without dependent children. I think it is a very, very moderate tax, in fact, too moderate. I think an unmarried man with an income of $4,000 should be obliged to pay more than $80 taxation under this measure. I believe that the young men of this country enjoying a salary of that amount would be glad to pay a higher tax, at least during the war, and until there is a reconsideration of this taxation Bill. I do not intend to occupy the time of the hon. members now in discussing further this particular detail; I merely say that in my judgment the proposed rate of taxation in this respect is not sufficiently high. I also think that the exemption limit in the case of an unmarried man might be lower than $2,000. I make this statement believing of course that after the war the question of income taxation will be reconsidered and modifications made to meet then existing conditions. It seems to me that an exemption of $2,000 is quite substantial in the case of an unmarried man, and I think it could very well be reduced. I do not know exactly what are the provisions of the income taxation measure now before the United States Congress, but as the Bill was introduced and as it stood on July 7th it provided for an exemption of $1,000 in the case of single persons, and $2,000 in the case of married persons and the heads of families. Those provisions were still in the Bill when it was reported to the Senate. The Bill, however, was re-committed to the Senate Finance Committee, this being necessitated by the addition of certain clauses providing for the prohibition of the manufacture of spirits which reduced the estimated revenues, and I do not know now how the legislation now stands.

There are many other features of the resolution which require consideration by the committee, but until they are before us in the form of a Bill I shall reserve discussion upon them. I should like to know what amount of revenue the Minister of Finance expects to receive from this income taxation.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is a very difficult question to answer. In fact, it is almost impossible to do more than guess at the amount, because we have never had a tax of this kind in Canada; but roughly speaking, we hope to get $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 a year at least.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: If the minister anticipates that amount of revenue, it justifies the statement I made a few moments ago that we should long ago have had federal income taxation in this country. My hon. friend always resisted the introduction of income taxation on the ground that it would bring in very little revenue. In fact, I think that on one occasion he said it would not bring in more than $3,000,000 or $4,000,000 a year at most. However, I am very glad indeed to learn that he anticipates a revenue of $15,000,000 or $20,000,000.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is merely an estimate. When I dealt before with the question of how much revenue we would obtain from an income tax in this country I always took into consideration the results of the American taxation, which was very much lower than this. Assuming that their population is thirteen times as large as ours, and that their wealth is from twenty to forty times as great, I thought that on the basis of their income tax, which for the reasons I have given I did not feel justified in exceeding, we would not obtain more than $3,000,000 or $4,000,000 a year. The new income taxation proposals in the United States, which have not yet been translated into legislation, provide for a very much higher rate than their existing law, and while our taxation is about on a par with their new proposals, it is double or more than double the taxation I had in mind when I made the estimate of $3,000,000 or $4,000,000. I have always held the view that our income taxation here should not be materially heavier than the taxation in the United States, for reasons that will be obvious to the committee. Whether or not we will get $15,000,000 from this taxation I am not prepared to say, but on talking it over with the commissioner of taxation we reached the view that we might get that figure.

My hon. friend says that we should have introduced this measure earlier. I do not desire to enter into any controversy over that, but I would like to point this out. For a considerable period after this war broke out the business and industrial interests of this country were greatly dislocated, and I cannot imagine anything that would have been more unwise, in 1915 at least, than to have brought in an income tax measure, because at that time owing to the dislocation which prevailed on account of the war it would have been a most serious and discouraging burden upon the people of this country. We had a pretty prosperous year in 1916, and I brought down the Business Profits Tax, which is giving us a very handsome revenue. The idea of that was to take a portion of the abnormal profits earned by firms and companies during the war. This year we increased that tax, and having regard to the financial condition of the country at the time I brought down the Budget, having regard to the fact that our revenues from all sources enabled us to pay all ordinary expenses, all capital and special expenses, all the increased interest charges due to the war, and all pensions, and still have left some $60,000,000 to devote to the payment of principal on war expenditure, I thought it inexpedient and unnecessary to bring in an income tax measure. But, with this new measure now adopted by the House, and having regard also to the fact which I mentioned, which is a most important fact, that by reason of the compulsory provisions of that measure there exists a just and proper sentiment that those who have substantial incomes should contribute substantially to our growing expenses of the war, I felt this to be a proper measure to bring in at this time.

In answer to what my hon. friend says about the unmarried men, I would like to state I traversed all that ground before bringing this measure down. There are many men who are unmarried because they have others dependent upon them. I do not believe there are very many single men without dependents who have large incomes. There are many unmarried men who have incomes of $2,000, $3,000 or $4,000 who have many dependents upon them that the public know nothing about. I know of many such cases. I thought if we made a distinction of $1,000 between the unmarried men and the married men, in favour of the latter, that it would be a fair distinction. When I was in Washington I made some inquiry about the reduction of the exemption limit from $4,000, which is the limit under the existing legislation—

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Three thousand dollars in the case of unmarried men, and $4,000 in the case of married men.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I was speaking of the married men. I made some inquiry with regard to the reduction from $4,000 to $3,000, and from $2,000 to $1,000, and, while I am not prepared to mention names, I may say it is felt there that they have gone quite a distance in reducing the exemptions to $2,000 and $1,000 respectively. I know this is a subject on which differences of opinion may exist, but, having regard to the cost of living and to the fact that a married man has dependents, and that many single men have dependents, and for that reason do not marry, I felt if we fixed the exemptions at $3,000 and $2,000 it would be about fair play.

In the United States, as I said, the corporations are liable to the normal tax, while their shareholders are liable to the general measure of taxation which embraces both the normal tax and the super tax. Therefore, in this regard, our taxation follows the same principle as the British and the American taxation.

Mr. CARVELL: It is not very often that I heartily congratulate this Government on the measures it introduces, but I do so on this occasion. I have some objection to the details, but to my mind the principle is such a step in the right direction that we can very well forgive the Government for any error of detail it may make. I can hardly forgive my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) for reminding the minister that he stated some time ago that this income tax could not be worked out, because that was almost finding fault with the minister, or trying to point to some of his delinquencies in the past.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: He is improving.

Mr. CARVELL: He is improving, yes. We know it can be worked out, and it is not new to this side of the House. I find in Hansard that, in the month of August, 1914, I advised the minister that it could be worked out.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That was the wrong time.

Mr. CARVELL: There has not been a session since at which I did not renew the statement. No measure has passed this House since I have been here which has given me as much satisfaction as has the introduction of an income tax. I realize the tax will probably not be maintained as it is now after peace is declared. In all probability there may be a grading downwards to some extent, but I hope the income tax has become an institution in Canada, and that it will remain for all time. We must not close our eyes to the fact that enormous liabilities have been incurred in Canada in the conduct of this war, and that enormous liabilities will be incurred in the future. Everybody has come to the conclusion that this cost cannot be met by increasing the customs tax on goods coming into the country, in other words, you cannot produce sufficient revenue by customs and excise.

I know of nothing as fair and just upon everybody as an income tax. It produces a condition of affairs by which, after the war is over, we can discuss questions of trade, commerce and tariff much more intelligently than we have ever been able to discuss them. We have heard the cry "you will ruin manufacturing," and "you cannot get revenue." The minister has shown to-day—and I am satisfied it will be thoroughly demonstrated—that we can get revenue by means of an income tax.

I do not agree with the minister, however, that the exemptions should relieve the unmarried man to the extent of $2,000 and the married man to the extent of $3,000. I think the exemptions should only have gone to the extent of $1,000 and $2,000 respectively. What I shall say now will be without wishing to be sarcastic or anything of that kind. Probably, when we are discussing salaries, or taxation, we are apt to be guided to some extent by the conditions existing in Ottawa. We know that in the different departments at Ottawa, a man who is receiving only $2,000 is, in his own mind, a menial, and in the eyes of the people of Ottawa is not entitled to any kind of social distinction. When, however, a man in the ordinary country districts of Canada—and I do not care what part it may be—receives a salary of $2,000, he is looked upon as being in pretty affluent circumstances. There is no part of Canada, even including the city of Ottawa, where a married man in receipt of a salary in excess of $2,000 should not pay taxation on the excess. The same principle applies to the unmarried man. A man who is not supporting a wife or family in this country, in this time of stress, ought to pay much more heavily than the minister is providing for under this legislation.

I look upon this as purely a war tax for the present, although I was glad the minister did not state he would abolish it at the close of the war. It will never be abolished, because the good sense of the people of Canada will see it is kept in effect for all time. Inasmuch as it is a war measure at the present time, I think we could apply more drastic conditions to it than we are applying, and get more revenue from it. I would suggest to the minister that there should be less exemption to the unmarried man than is provided for in this Bill. When an income reaches $10,000, or even $5,000, you are only exempting a married man to the extent of $1,000 more than the unmarried man. That is no distinction whatever. When you reach an income of $15,000, or $20,000 it is a mere bagatelle. In the practical working out of this scheme the unmarried man with a large income really pays no more than the married man. With these two exceptions, the Bill suits me. I heartily congratulate the minister and the Government on the fact that they have finally taken the grip and have introduced a measure which the people have been looking for for many years past.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I wish to emphasize the point which my hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell) has just made by calling the attention of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance to the figures he gave the committee this afternoon showing the amount payable by a married man, and then by all other persons when the income reaches a large sum such as $15,000 or $20,000. This will make very clear the point of my hon. friend from Carleton:

Income.	Unmarried Men.	All Other Persons.
$15,000	$ 850	$ 810
20,000	1,300	1,260
30,000	2,500	2,460
50,000	5,300	5,260

The difference is very small and it makes clear the point of my hon. friend from Carleton.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: When you get up to these incomes of $30,000, $40,000, $50,000, $75,000 or $100,000, I do not think we need worry about how much a married or a single man has to pay. How many single men are there with incomes of $15,000, $25,000 or $30,000? I think that with very few exceptions the single men who have comparatively large incomes have others dependent upon them. That is one of the reasons why they do not marry. I do not believe there are many single men with incomes of $15,000, $20,000 or $30,000. The only unmarried man I can recall who had an income of $20,000 or $25,000 and who was about 35 years of age, enlisted when war broke out and was killed at the front only the other day. Do not let us be too hard on the unmarried man who happens to have an income of $3,000, $4,000 or $5,000. He may have some maiden aunts, a mother or some other dependent relatives. The people of Canada are pretty careful of their relatives. That is to me one of the great glories of this country. I think you will find that there will be some special circumstances where there is an unmarried man who has a large income. Make a distinction of $1,000 and then let the Bill run on. We need not worry if the married man with an income of $30,000 and paying $2,500 by way of income tax reflects that a single man who does not appear to have any dependents pays only $40 less. I think the Bill will work out fairly well as it is.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am glad that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance has seen through the mists, that the clouds have rolled away, that what seemed insurmountable and impassable difficulties have disappeared, and that we now have a measure which looks to the obtaining of revenue from those best able to pay. I am not alarmed at the introduction of direct taxation if properly and carefully administered. After all, as has been pointed out, if a man has to go directly into his pocket, or to his bank account, and pay a certain amount into the coffers of the country he is going to inquire, perhaps, a little more carefully how that money is expended than he does now, when it goes into the pockets of somebody else every time he buys certain goods. The Minister of Finance has pointed out rightly that the provinces have given to the municipalities the right to impose taxation on incomes. In some cases the provinces are exercising that right direct themselves. In a time like this particularly that taxation will be found to be comparatively small. Even if it were not, the circumstances are such that the imposition of direct taxation is fully justified, particularly as the vast majority of the people will not be taxed by this measure at all, but only those who receive salaries and incomes enabling them to pay it without being seriously hurt. After all, not to go outside of this House, who of us has been really hurt in the matter of taxation in this war so far? None of us. I have not asked the minister yet whether he intends to include in this taxation the sessional indemnities of the members. For myself, I would say: yes. I think these ought to be called incomes for the purposes of this Act.

There is another question which will arise, and that is the situation in the city of Ottawa. Owing to an arrangement between the Government and the city of Ottawa, incomes in this city have been largely exempt from taxation. I mean Civil Service incomes. I think the incomes of ministers of the Crown have been exempt under the same arrangement. I presume that under this Bill none of these exemptions will be allowed, because this is something outside of the municipal income taxation. The arrangement between the city of Ottawa and the Government was merely to cover the incomes derived by those in the employ of the Government at Ottawa, the municipality accepting a certain amount from the Government for certain municipal purposes, through the Improvement Commission largely. This being outside and separate, I presume there will be no exemption for the purposes of this Act in the city of Ottawa any more than there will be in any other city in Canada. I think there should not be.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: All are liable.

Mr. GRAHAM: The question of taxation is one that affects us all, and we are directly touched by it to a certain extent. I take it for granted that when this war is over there will be of necessity a readjustment not only of this system of taxation, but there will have to be, owing to new conditions, a readjustment of our tariff and all that kind of thing. I would not be surprised to see, when this war is over, a revolution in our tariff. The introduction of an income tax, tapping a new source of revenue, will make it easier to deal with the larger question from the point of view of revenue. The Minister of Finance has said that the Business Profits War Tax Measure will become inoperative at the end, I think, of next year.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The tax will be collected next year, but it will be on this year's accounting period, which will be the last accounting period.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is the intention now; but my hon. friend sometimes changes his mind on taxation, and perhaps whoever may be Finance Minister a year from now may say: we are going to have this business profits taxation continued. I am not sure that it should not be continued, because, at least until the war is over, I am inclined to think we must not let go of any source of revenue we now have.

What I am calling attention to is that while that is the suggestion to-day, whoever has authority and responsibility at the end of the last accounting period will have to take the responsibility of either renewing that Act or letting it expire through flux of time. The Finance Minister has also told us that one reason for the imposition of this tax at the present time, in contradistinction to not introducing it some time ago, is the fact that the Military Service Act is becoming law, and will entail considerable expense. The other reason given by the Finance Minister is a good and substantial one, that is, that when we begin to compel men to go and sacrifice themselves at the front, it is high time to compel those who stay at home, and who are able to do so, to pay more taxation. But to say that it will be more expensive to have the Military Service Act—

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I should say that it will greatly accelerate the expenditure, owing to the increased number of men.

Mr. GRAHAM: As a matter of fact, from the standpoint of expenditure, military service under the compulsory measure will be much less expensive than under the voluntary system. What I mean is that 100 men going under the voluntary system cost much more money, generally speaking, than the same number of men under this system, for this reason, that under the voluntary system thousands upon thousands of men have gone and left families, while under the compulsory service Act the younger men without families will be taken first. There will be no separation allowance for wives, there will be no money to be paid out of the Patriotic Fund for children. I submit that if we had had the compulsory service measure in force at the beginning of the war—and now I am speaking only financially—

Canada would have been millions and millions of dollars ahead financially at the present time. So I think that reason of my hon. friend is rather an excuse than a reason.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I had regard to the numbers. Recruiting had slowed down and it was to the increase in numbers that I referred.

Mr. GRAHAM: There is another question that comes to my mind in reference to what was said by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean). We have been careful under other taxation measures to exclude to a large extent the men engaged in agriculture, and the reasons have been obvious. We are all very anxious to fill up our new country with men to go upon the land, and the object of excluding them from the taxation that we have had heretofore was that our immigration should not be retarded by the bugaboo of heavy taxation. On the contrary, it has been our desire to do everything to encourage rather than discourage immigration. I presume that under this measure incomes derived from any source whatever will be taxed; there will be no exceptions except those outlined. That being true, I am rather inclined to think that $2,000 is not too high an exemption for a single man, and $3,000 for a married man. We have to view Canada as a whole and endeavour to do what is best for the whole Dominion. We want to get all the money we can, but we do not want to frighten any person away; rather we want to impose our taxation in such a fair manner that, not only will no young man, or older man either, whom we want to go upon the land, be discouraged from doing so, but capital will not be deterred from coming into this country. We know that if the investing public, either in the old land or in the United States, come to the conclusion that the Canadian Government and the Canadian Parliament are reckless in their imposition of taxation, or are led to believe that the Government will deal unfairly with capital coming into the country, great injury will be done to Canada. We must avoid that because only if Canada is prosperous and successful after the war, through the investment of money and the development of our resources, can we hope to offer inducements that will bring to Canada the class of settlers whom we desire. I believe that the young man who goes to the West, for instance, and takes up farming, has plenty of discouragements before him now; and while his profits with a good crop may be as high as $2,000, I say he is using that money immediately for the payment of his property and for the development of the country, and it is not unfair that he should be exempted to the amount of $2,000. If I were going to say anything I would exempt the married man a little more than he is now exempted, rather than reduce the exemption to the single man. We must remember that the conditions in Canada are not the conditions of England, England is a self-centred, small, compact country, and there is no man in England who is settled out miles and miles from any settlements, with the hardships that are undergone by men who go into our new country to open it up. Conditions here are altogether different from those in England. There they have the moneyed classes, divided into three or four different castes. We have nothing of that kind here. We want to have some system of taxation that will bear as equally as possible upon all classes.

I am not sure as to the working out of the measure, and I agree with the Finance Minister that what he estimates as to the income from this tax can only be an educated guess, or perhaps an uneducated guess in this instance. This kind of taxation has never been imposed in Canada except through the provinces and municipalities, and without being at all harsh, I think it is fair to say that this imposition has been somewhat loosely made in some province and in many municipalities. It will depend altogether upon the machinery that is provided in the Bill for ascertaining the incomes that are being obtained throughout this country. The explanation of the Finance Minister as to the exemptions of incomes that have been affected by the business profits war tax is a bit intricate, and, while I think I understood it, I prefer not to deal with it until I see it in cold print and have an opportunity of reading it. I think the Government has made an advance step and I am not going to chide them for not doing so before. I shall simply say that if they had started sooner, they would have been farther along the road at the present time.

Mr. NESBITT: Does the minister propose to deduct the amount of the income taxes, paid to the provinces and the municipalities?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No, that is not the intention, a man may be liable upon his income for municipal taxation, for provincial taxation and for Dominion taxation under this measure.

Mr. NESBITT: As I understood, if a corporation pays more under the present business tax than it will pay under this measure, it is exempt under this measure.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes, it is exempt under this proposed legislation. A firm or corporation which is liable to pay the Business Profits War Tax for an accounting period ending within this year will be permitted to deduct from the income taxation to which it would be liable under this measure the amount which it pays under the Business Profits War Tax Act in respect of that accounting period.

Mr. MACDONALD: In considering the deductions made, are subscriptions to the Patriotic Fund taken into consideration?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In the Bill which I shall lay before the House, a man will be entitled to deduct from his income, as part of his expenses, his contribution to the Patriotic, Red Cross, and other war funds approved by the minister. That does not mean that he will be allowed to deduct that amount from the taxation to which he is liable. Let me put it this way: Suppose the income upon which a man would be liable under this Act is $10,000. Assuming that he has contributed $1,000 to those funds, he would be liable, under the Bill as I shall present it to the House, to income taxation upon $9,000. That is a matter which will, no doubt, be discussed in committee, and upon which I have an open mind.

Mr. MACDONALD: I have seen conflicting statements as to the total expenditure of the Government for war and other purposes. Information of that kind should be available in considering this measure.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Of course, our war expenditure is very heavy and is growing rapidly from day to day, notwithstanding the fact that we are making fair headway in our payment on account. In anticipation of the question which the member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) has asked, I had a statement prepared by the assistant deputy minister as to the outrun since April 1 of this year. My Budget speech practically covered the fiscal year ending March 31. My hon. friend will recall that as a result of last year's operations we paid our running expenditure, our capital and special expenditure, the interest upon our national debt, including the increased debt due to the war, and all pensions. In addition to that, we were able to devote $60,000,000 to payment upon principal account. The statement which I have received as to the period from April 1 to July 20, will, I am sure, be interesting, as well as gratifying, to the committee.

The total revenue from April 1 to July 20, was, in round figures, $78,276,000. Our total expenditure for that period, ordinary, capital and special was $40,821,000, leaving a balance applicable to our war expenditure of $37,000,000. That is to say, since April 1 of the present fiscal year we paid our ordinary, capital, special, pensions and increased income expenditures, and we have $37,000,000 to the good, applicable to our war expenditure. In a foot-note the deputy minister says:

> These figures represent receipts and payments which have passed through the books of the Finance Department to July 20, 1917, together with a close estimate of expenditure to July 20, 1917, not yet passed through the books.

So that, while the figures may not be mathematically accurate, they represent a close estimate.

The total war expenditure of Canada in Canada to July 20 was $388,627,000. The total war expenditure elsewhere, including estimate of maintenance of troops in France from September 30, 1916, to July 20, 1917, at 6 shillings per man on an average of 117,000 troops, was $234,600,000, making a grand total of estimated war expenditure to date of $623,000,000.

Mr. MACDONALD: That is since 1914.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is the entire expenditure since 1914.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What was the war expenditure from April 1 to July 20, 1917?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: War expenditure, Canada, from April 1 to July 20, 1917, $39,702,000. It will be interesting for the committee to observe that the amount which we have to the good is just about, though not quite, equal to our own war expenditure in Canada. I have not a statement here as to how much we have spent in Great Britain or abroad from April 1 of this year to July 20. All I can give is a general statement as to our expenditures elsewhere than in Canada since the outbreak of the war. I propose later, probably within the next week or ten days, to make a financial statement, in which I shall advert particularly to this matter, because I want the House and the country to keep informed as to the financial situation. I think it is right that they should know the facts, and as minister it is my duty to lay those facts before them.

The total amount which Canada borrowed from Great Britain to July 20, 1917, was, in round figures, $317,000,000. That includes everything. On the other hand, we advanced to Great Britain up to July 20, 1917, $302,000,000. The amounts are about equal, subject to this: we repaid Great Britain $107,000,000 of the liability which we owed her, by an issue of securities of 3½ per cent dollar bonds due March 1, 1928, $95,000,000; and 4½ per cent dollar bonds due December 1, 1915, $12,400,000—a total of $107,000,000.

We repaid Great Britain our liability by the issue of those securities. I used the word "repaid," because those securities are pledged in New York for the indebtedness of Great Britain there. Therefore, the balance due by Great Britain to Canada on open account on July 20, 1917, is about $95,000,000. This statement is necessarily a fragmentary and partial one. When I make my financial statement to the House a little later on, I shall point out the extent of our estimated expenditure during the next few years and also inform the House as to the financing which we are doing here for Great Britain in order that Great Britain may purchase in Canada, munitions, cheese, hay, oats, flour, and other supplies. I have proceeded upon the assumption that it was our duty to do what we could to assist the financing of Great Britain in buying munitions and foodstuffs in Canada. In the first place, it is our duty because in that way we are materially assisting her in the prosecution of the war, and secondly, it is of great advantage to this country from a business standpoint and from the standpoint of our agriculture that Great Britain should be able to purchase in Canada munitions, raw material, supplies of all kinds, cheese and other foodstuffs. We have been able to do much in the way of assisting Great Britain to make those purchases. In my statement I shall refer to the extent of the assistance which we have rendered and are about to render.

It is necessary that we should extend liberal financial assistance to Great Britain to purchase in Canada by reason of an element to which I hesitate to refer, because I know my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) takes decided objection to it. I refer to the question of exchange. My hon. friend says that whenever I find myself perplexed or driven into a corner, I always resort to the exchange question. I would like to say to my hon. friend from Pictou, who knows more about exchange than is indicated by the remarks he has made respecting it to myself, that the exchange question is one of the most extreme importance; its importance cannot be overestimated. In a word, this may be said: Great Britain can buy upon this side of the Atlantic only to the extent to which she can borrow upon this side of the Atlantic. Practically confined as Great Britain is to using the proceeds of her borrowings in the United States to purchases in that country, it is necessary that Canada should furnish credits to the Imperial Government to the utmost extent that we possibly can to enable her to purchase those munitions and foodstuffs so greatly needed by her army and by her civil population at this time. We have endeavoured to do that to the utmost of our power.

Mr. CARVELL: Would not the minister add to that ability our purchases from Great Britain?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In the exchange situation, and having regard especially to shipping, and to the dislocation of British industries during the war, our imports from Great Britain are small, while our exports are great.

Mr. MACDONALD: The other day I saw in an advertisement of the war savings certificates issued by the minister's department the statement that we were spending $2,000,000 a day on our obligations in connection with the war. Has the minister any computation of what our obligations amount to day by day at the present time?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Both here and abroad?

Mr. MACDONALD: I am referring to a statement made in an advertisement in an Ottawa paper.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I observed that advertisement, which was not published by the authority of the department, or of the National Service Board, which has been assisting in promoting the sale of war certificates. I interested myself to have that statement withdrawn because it was misleading. Our expenditure is on no such basis.

Mr. MACDONALD: Perhaps the minister, when he comes before the committee again, will tell us what the war expenditure is day by day. In framing this measure the Minister of Finance no doubt had in view the object of bringing home to all of our citizens the seriousness of the situation. There has been too much talk in this country of " business as usual," and of the prosperity of the country being so great. Some hon. gentlemen have gone so far as to give some credit to the Government for that prosperity, whereas it is due to the huge quantity of supplies required in connection with the war, and to a great extent the people of this country have not realized the tremendous issues and the very great obligations this country is assuming and must assume in order that we may play our part in the war.

There seems therefore, to be this anomaly in the range of taxation the minister purposes imposing. Take the man who has an income of $5,000, which is an ample amount for any man to live on respectably in this country. After you deduct the tax he pays, he is left with an income of $4,880. After income tax is deducted the man with an income of $7,000 is left with $6,780; the man with an income of $10,000 is left with $9,600; the man with an income of $12,000 is left with $11,420; the man with an income of $15,000 is left with $14,150, and the man with an income of $20,000 is left with $18,100. Leaving out altogether those who have extremely large incomes, under the taxation proposed by the minister, you have a condition in regard to men with incomes between $5,000 and $20,000, under which my hon. friend does not really bring home to the door of the man who is wealthy and has much money to spend the stern necessity of the situation. $100 is of more consequence to a man with an income of $4,000 than it is to a man with $10,000, and the man with an income of $20,000 is left with over $18,000, which in Canada is a princely amount to live on. The percentage does not increase at the rate at which it should increase.

This taxation inevitably involves the strictest possible economy in detail. Every year the Government spends amounts varying from two or three to four hundred dollars on small matters in various parts of the country, and if the strictest economy is not exercised in these small expenditures the impression that it is desired to create by this legislation will be entirely lost. A measure of this kind imposes on the Government the duty of exercising the strictest economy even in the smallest expenditures. Although the ordinary citizen has but a faint conception of an expenditure involving millions of dollars, when he sees $2,000 or $3,000 wasted before his very eyes he gets the impression that this Government is not exercising the economy that it should, and I would particularly impress that phase of the situation upon the Minister of Finance.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The one thing which will stagger the people of this country in connection with these income taxation proposals is the fact that they will be called upon to pay three sets of income taxation; first, a municipal tax, which I think exists in every province—it certainly exists in the province of Ontario, as all residents of Ottawa know too well—secondly, a provincial income tax, and now, superimposed upon these two taxes, comes the federal income tax. I do not say that I am opposed to a system of income taxation. Indeed, I warned my hon. friend a year and a half ago, when he introduced his business profits tax, that he would yet have to come to the income tax, which of all taxation measures is the most natural and the fairest. According to the best authorities, such as Adam Smith and Thiers, the income tax is the least objectionable of all systems of taxation, because it makes no distinction as between the taxpayers. The Minister of Finance stated at that time that an income tax would involve too large an expenditure in its administration. However, he has changed his mind, and to-day he lays before the people of this country a system of taxation which will bear heavily upon the taxpayers of Canada. The minister states, however—at least, that is what I gathered from his remarks this afternoon—that this income tax is only temporary, that when the war is over it will be either revised or wiped out. Personally, I do not share the optimism of my hon. friend on this point, because as a student of history, I remember that when the first income tax was introduced in England by the younger Pitt at the time of the Napoleonic wars, a distinct pledge was given that it was only for the duration of the war, but Sir Robert Peel, Mr. Gladstone, and all the other great chancellors of England had to admit that the thin edge had been introduced into the taxation system of the United Kingdom, and the income tax was there to remain. In spite of the hopes of my hon. friend, bright as he thinks they are, I really believe that the income tax has to-day entered into the politico-economic system of Canada, to stay there for many generations.

Let me now emphasize what has just been said by my hon. friend from Pictou. If the people of this country have to be bled, and bled white, it seems to me that the duty devolves upon this Government to exercise the strictest economy in its expenditures; the Government should be implacable in its reductions for the sake of economy. In the present financial crisis which prevails all over the world—and that it is world-wide is made abundantly clear by the last presentment that was made to the British House of Commons by Mr. Bonar Law, as given in to-day's papers—it seems to me that the Government should reduce its ordinary expenditure to a minimum. I dare say that the Minister of Finance has read the article which was published a few weeks ago in the financial edition of the New York Post by Mr. Hirst, the late editor of the London Economist, possibly the greatest financial authority in the British world. In that article, after calculating the war indebtedness of the different warring nations, he predicts that sooner or later, and probably sooner than later, some of the warring countries will be forced to repudiate their national debt. I do not say that this will happen in Canada, but it is well to pay heed to this warning from one of the highest financial authorities in the world. I am not referring to the war expenditure, although that, of course, should be very closely checked by the Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Militia and Defence, but I say that the ordinary expenditure should be reduced by at least 50 per cent. There is no reason why to-day we should be building wharves, breakwaters, post offices and armouries in this country. There is no reason why at this present session, when we are asked to pass this drastic legislation, the Government should insist upon the passing of the Quebec and Saguenay implementing Bill. There is no reason in the world for that, and if this miserable piece of legislation is insisted upon, it will revolt the people.

Then there is the Highways Bill, which it is intended to introduce during this session. That Bill involves an expenditure of millions of dollars, and for what purpose? The highways are primarily under the jurisdiction of the provinces, and that expenditure if decided upon should be under provincial control. If we were living in ordinary times I for one would say: Very well, let the Dominion Government increase the provincial subsidies, and let those subsidies be specifically applied, so as to connect the highways of the different provinces from ocean to ocean.

But we are told that such will not be the measure, that, on the contrary, it will afford the Government an opportunity at the proper time to spend vast sums of money for the highways of the Dominion. It is further stated that this expenditure will be the means of procuring employment for returned soldiers. Have we reached the point that Canada will spend millions of dollars to make navvies of our returned soldiers? While I do not look upon the returned soldier as a first-class colonizer, or as a desirable agriculturist, still it is far better to direct the soldiers on the land in the West, according to the legislation introduced the other day by my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior, rather than to reduce him to the status of a navvy. Pray, do not insult the soldier by branding him as a navvy on his return. My hon. friend expects that the people of this country will voluntarily submit to this taxation. Perhaps so, but they will expect him to be the faithful watchdog of the treasury and see that no extravagant expenditure is made, such as the Quebec and Saguenay expenditure and the Highways Bill expenditure.

Now I come to the point I raised a moment ago, the Dominion War Loan security. I quite agree with my hon. friend that the people of the country should be impressed with the fact that it is right and proper that such security should be free from all taxation. I approve entirely of that principle. Perhaps I did not make myself clear on the subject, but the point I wished to place before my hon. friend was this—by this exemption of taxation as regards the Dominion War Loan securities, you invite, so to speak, capitalists and investors generally to transfer their funds from industrial investments to Dominion War Loan securities, and thereby you create this bonded aristocracy to which I referred the other day. I would like my hon. friend to examine that point and see whether it is right that a gentleman drawing dividends from industrial investments liable to taxation should transfer his holdings into Dominion War Loan securities and thereby avoid all taxation. I know my hon. friend gave good reasons, and reasons which I approve of as being quite proper and patriotic, why our Dominion War Loan should be exempt from taxation.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Is is not likely that those industrial investments would be earning more than five per cent, and is not that a reason why investors would not withdraw from industrial investments in favour of the war bonds?

Mr. LEMIEUX: If my hon. friend will consult the market returns he will see that since the beginning of the war there has been many a slump in the market, and there is much uncertainty in the minds of the investor as to the aftermath. Owing to that uncertainty, people are disposed—and indeed more than disposed to transfer their holdings into Dominion war loan securities. As a matter of fact, many of them have actually done so.

Sir HERBERT AMES: May I point out the fact that an industrial security usually brings a very much higher return than the Government war securities. If the industrial security does not bring a higher return than five per cent, it only sells for fifty or sixty cents on the dollar, and if a man wished to convert such industrial securities into war bonds, he would only get about half the amount of war bonds.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend is too keen a business man not to know that practically all industrial holdings which pay large dividends to-day are war industries. The war will come to an end some day, and those securities will be valueless or practically so, then you will have to build up new peace industries, and it may take years before they are in a position to yield the same average return as they yielded in ante-war times. Take the paper industry for instance. I happen to know a little about the business, because I represent one firm dealing in pulp and paper, and I have seen the European and United States contracts that firm had before the war. Compare those figures with the contracts which they are making to-day, and tell me if the present contracts will last long after the war, when we shall have reverted to normal conditions? It is only a passing prosperity. As was stated last year by my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), it is a fictitious prosperity. Take any industry, and tell me if present conditions will continue after the war? Perhaps in the case of the steel industry they may, because of the reconstructive period which will ensue, but do you believe that after the war conditions will be the same with any other industry as they are at the present time? And that the large dividends now being earned will continue? Therefore, I say to my hon. friend from St. Antoine, that the investors who receive to-day those large dividends, dividends for which war conditions are primarily responsible, will not fail to acquire non-taxable war bonds.

Do you believe that these people will ever live in a fool's paradise and not think of the aftermath, when as the first news of peace is flashed out there will be a slump, when values will decrease and dividends will vanish? It may be that I am somewhat pessimistic but my hon. friend knows that in the main I am right. The average investor who is the recipient of large dividends knows that the Dominion War Loan bonds are gilt-edged securities, even if they do yield less than those industries which to-day are so prosperous, and he will hasten to convert those securities into Dominion War Loan bonds. That is the practice of a sound business man and I do not know of any Scotch investor who would not do that.

Sir HERBERT AMES: To sell you must find a purchaser. Try to sell industrials to-day and find out how easy it is.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I hope that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance will look into the question and see if there should not be a maximum transfer in these cases. I simply throw out the suggestion to my hon. friend that he may think over it. On the whole, having supported the participation of Canada in this war, I shall support this measure. The income taxation measure, which, in spite of what my hon. friend stated this afternoon is here for many, many years to come will, I humbly submit, act on the people of this country as a sobering influence. I am, with all my heart, in this war, but I always stated that we should not go beyond our means and resources. Many titled gentlemen who are always ready to launch this country into imperialism and militarism will pause and ponder when reading their morning paper to-morrow. They will then realize that taxation measures constitute the sobering influence upon their dreams of imperial and military domination.

Mr. McCREA: With regard to the exemption of married and single men I think the limit is probably quite low but it should be graded. The responsibilities of a single man who gets beyond $10,000 a year are very much less than those of a married man. A single man who has an income exceeding $10,000 should be graded very much higher than he is. A single man may have dependents, a mother and sisters to support, but as a rule he has not nearly the responsibilities a married man has. He has not the responsibility of housekeeping, of keeping a family and providing for their future as a married man has. I think it would be well for the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) before this Bill finally passes to consider this matter. I think he will find that it is only reasonable that a single man without any family or responsibilities, when he gets beyond a certain amount, should be graded very much higher than a married man.

There was another matter that I notice the minister did not refer to. What effect will this Bill have on the income of soldiers at the front? There are some men who have investments and their incomes will be subject to taxation. I would like to know if it is the intention of the Government that a soldier who would be subject to taxation under ordinary circumstances will be subject to taxation under this Bill? It does not appear right.

On the general principle of taxation of incomes I must congratulate the minister. I am pleased to see that he has shown that his mind is in a sound state. It always is pretty sound but it is now better than ever. I was pleased to hear him state that he was not in favour of the policy of taxing industry or energy or of putting an obstacle in the way of a man who puts his energy and ability into the building up of the business of the country. In my judgment, it is a shortsighted policy to tax men of that class because they are the men who are building up this country. I was glad to hear the minister say that he had realized this fact and that the business taxation would be terminated in one year. If the minister had gone a little farther and had remedied his mistake in interfering with the price of news print paper and placing it at a cent a pound less than it could be produced for I would be inclined to give him absolution.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I desire to say just one word in reply to my hon. friend from Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea) about the unmarried men. There is more to consider in connection with a measure of taxation than the amount which might be taken from the taxpayer. There may be unmarried men in Canada of great ability and great enterprise whose activities mean much to this country. If we tax them too drastically the question comes as to whether they would—I do not mean immediately, but in the future—be liable to remain in Canada.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, they would remain and get married.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There is always a question as to whether unmarried men, enterprising, able, about to make Canada their home, may not be debarred from doing that by too heavy an income tax. I just throw out these suggestions to my hon. friend. My own view is strongly that a distinction or a discrimination of $1,000 in favour of married men is about as far as we should go. I do not believe there are many unmarried men in Canada getting salaries from $10,000 up to $50,000. An unmarried man who has an income of that kind usually has a good many dependents.

In regard to what my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) said as to the exemption of income from Dominion bonds he agrees with me and I think most men will agree, that these bonds should be free from taxation. There must be a certainty about a bond of that character. The public will not buy it in the large volume in which the issues are made unless they know positively that it is free from income tax present or prospective. As to whether people will sell out stocks and bonds, try to realize on the securities they have and buy Dominion bonds, I may just say to my hon. friend that these things adjust themselves. If a man has a mortgage investment that pays him seven per cent, it would not pay to change it into Dominion income bonds because the yield would be very much less than that which he is now obtaining. This income tax will have this effect, I think, and I hope it will tend to make an excellent market for Dominion bonds. While that market exists for Dominion bonds it means that you can put your issues out at an advantage. You can sell them at a lower interest yield and the country gets the advantage. I am not at all apprehensive that it will bring about a serious dislocation of the business of the country. It will benefit the market for and the price of Dominion securities and that is a matter that is desirable in the national interest. But I do not believe that people will sell out a mortgage investment or other securities and buy Dominion bonds because the rate of yield which they get from these other securities is much higher than they will get now or in the future from the Dominion issues which are not subject to taxation under the provisions of this Act.

The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) asked me for certain information which I now have, and which I shall place upon Hansard. I find that the war expenditure of Canada in Canada from April 1 to July 20 of this year was $39,700,000; that the estimated expenditure elsewhere than in Canada, including France, was $62,600,000. That means that the total expenditure from April 1 to July 20, on war account, was $92,000,000. That is at the rate of a little less than $840,000 a day. Let us say, in round figures, that $850,000 to $900,000 a day represents the war expenditure of Canada at present.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The hon. member for Pictou had in mind an item that appeared in the Ottawa Citizen to the effect that the expenditure amounted to $2,000,000 a day.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is incorrect.

Resolution reported, read the first and the second time and agreed to.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I will introduce the Bill to-morrow.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

THE SOLDIER SETTLEMENT BOARD.

Hon. W. J. ROCHE (Minister of the Interior) moved the second reading of Bill No. 116, to assist returned soldiers in settling upon the land and to increase agricultural production.

Mr. J. G. TURRIFF (Assiniboia): Before this Bill is read the second time, I want to put myself on record as being absolutely opposed to the principle of putting on the land men who are not accustomed to farming. Undoubtedly, returned soldiers who have been farmers will be able to make good; the aid given by the Government under this measure will be an advantage to them as well as a general advantage to the country, but I understand that the provisions of this Bill apply to returned soldiers from any part of the Empire. Not one in fifty soldiers from Canada or from other countries who have not been accustomed to living on farms can possibly make good under this proposal. It is proposed that men who for the last two or three years have been living in large communities, as it were, with plenty of company, shall be sent to land belonging to the Government which is situated twenty, thirty or forty miles from a railway—because in many cases you have to go that far from railway communication in order to get good land. By making an advance of $2,500 to men of that kind who occupy these lands, it is expected that they will make good. We had experience with that class of settlement in the West in early years. People of different nationalities were brought into the country, placed upon land and given an advance of $600, a mortgage being taken just as is proposed here. These people did not understand farming. They spent several years at the work, but in the end they lost everything, they were unable to pay one dollar of the money that was advanced to them, and the mortgage companies, or whoever advanced the money, took over the lands in lieu of the debt. In those days $600 would buy almost as much as $2,500 will buy to-day.

This policy may well be applied to men who know something about farming, but some other method should be adopted of giving a start to the men who are not accustomed to farm life or living long distances from towns. A better way of looking after returned soldiers who are not accustomed to farming would be to follow the example set by Alberta. There they have established schools in which men of education are trained to become school teachers, while those who are not fitted for teaching are put into a technical school and taught trades. By following this course, such men can be put in a position to earn a good living, with resulting advantage not only to themselves, but to the country generally. The Government will make a great mistake if they pass a general law under which returned soldiers from all parts of the Empire, inexperienced in agriculture, will come into Canada and occupy land. They get a quarter-section of land, we advance them $2,500—and five years afterwards they will not be worth a dollar. It turned out that way in practically every instance in the past; why should the chances for success be any better now, especially in view of the fact that we are dealing with men who will not be content to live a long distance from railways, separated from social intercourse, and put up with the conditions that any man has to put up with who pioneers in a new country a long distance from railway communication? I know a good deal about it; I went through it myself. Many difficulties have to be overcome, and I say that only the men who are accustomed to life on the farm will make good under this proposal.

Hon. W. J. ROCHE (Minister of the Interior): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid that if we were to follow the advice of the member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) we should be discouraged from attempting to place upon the land any person who has not had experience in farming. As I have explained, the desire of the Government under this legislation is twofold: first, to do something for the returned soldier by placing him upon the land; secondly, to increase agricultural production. Every other country is, with good hope of success, adopting a land policy, not confining it at all to those who were previously upon the land; I do not see why we should be discouraged from doing the same thing in Canada. The cases referred to by the member for Assiniboia are cases in which there was no supervision of the expenditure. In this instance the loan to the returned soldier will be expended under the supervision of the Board of Commissioners who will be appointed for that purpose. Besides, it is the intention to grant loans, not to persons inexperienced in agriculture, but only to those recommended by the Board of Commissioners, who will first satisfy themselves that the persons in question measure up to the qualifications set forth in this legislation. It is the intention to provide agricultural training for the men who have never had agricultural experience. Australia and New Zealand are encouraging soldiers to go on the land—not only their own soldiers, but British soldiers as well. We are safeguarded by advancing loans only to those who are recommended by the commissioners as being likely to make a success of agricultural work. And, as I have said, the commissioners have supervision over the expenditure of the money.

Mr. TURRIFF: Will this legislation apply to the soldiers of India?

Mr. ROCHE: No.

Mr. TURRIFF: Does the Bill not so provide? What about British subjects from India?

Mr. ROCHE: The legislation defines "settler" as follows:

> Any person who has served in the naval or military expeditionary forces of Canada during the present war, or who was engaged in active service during the present war in the naval or military forces of the United Kingdom or of any of the self-governing British dominions or colonies.

So that it does not apply to the class of persons referred to by my hon. friend.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

The House went into committee on the Bill, Mr. Rainville in the chair.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. OLIVER: In regard to subsection (c), the minister will remember that the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) made a certain suggestion in reference to the inclusion of citizens of Canada who served in the forces of the Allied countries. There are some such cases, and the hon. member was anxious to know if the minister could see his way clear to accept that suggestion.

Mr. ROCHE: The hon. member for Bonaventure particularly referred to the French and the Belgian reservists who were summoned to the colours and who were citizens of Canada. I have an amendment here to meet the wishes of the hon. gentleman. I beg to move:

That subsection (c) of section 2 be amended by inserting after the word "Colonies" in the fifteenth line, the words "or who being a British subject resident in Canada before the war has been engaged in active service at one of the seats of war in either the naval or military forces of any of His Majesty's Allies in the present war."

Mr. TURRIFF: A few minutes ago the minister stated that in the past the classes of people who had failed under a system something like this were people who had settled on the land and been given advances of money, the expenditure of which was not subject to supervision. I know of two colonies that were settled under somewhat similar conditions and that were under very strict supervision, and success did not result. Take the crofter settlement of Moosomin and the crofter settlement in the vicinity of Killarney in southern Manitoba. These were well supervised; the men were put on the land and given an advance of $600. And yet not 2 per cent of them made good. They lost their land, and they lost that money. The parties who advanced the money took the land back in the end, and it was only after many years of experience in the country that these settlers, after starting absolutely on their own account without a dollar, began to make some advancement and to meet with some success. While it might be all right to incur a loss of $2,500 in the case of any of our returned soldiers, when you come to run the risk of incurring a loss of $2,500 on any soldier from any of the other parts of the Empire who chooses to come here and who may be passed upon the commission, the country is undertaking to spend many millions of dollars and will probably incur a loss of millions without helping on development. I am absolutely convinced that, with the exception of men who are accustomed to farming, not two per cent of the returned soldiers who settle on the land will succeed.

Mr. ROCHE: They will have to prove their ability to the satisfaction of the commission.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 3—Boards.

Mr. OLIVER: I notice that the commissioners may be removed at any time by the Governor in Council for cause. Those commissioners will have very important powers, and it is, I assume, desired by the Government that in matters of administration they should exercise those powers as a commission without let or hindrance on the part of the Government. That is to say, the Government will lay down certain limits within which this board shall have full power to act. Does not this provision in regard to the dismissal of the commissioners hold them under the authority of the Government to a degree that is not altogether desirable? If it is the idea of the Government to have the commission independent of departmental administration, it would seem to me that the appointment should be made somewhat more permanent than it is in this section. I am not urging that that should be the policy of the Government, but if it is the Government's policy then the wording of the section should give a greater guarantee of independence on the part of the commission.

Mr. ROCHE: This is not a new provision; you will find it in the appointment of the Railway Commission. I think this was drafted from the wording of that appointment. There has been no suspicion even of anything there in the nature of political control. The term "for cause" means for some very grave cause, for instance, if one of the commissioners were to become demented, or anything of that nature, or if some irregularity occurred.

Mr. OLIVER: If this provision is parallel to that in the Railway Commission, it ought to be satisfactory.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Dominion lands to be reserved.

Mr. OLIVER: When we were discussing the resolution, I raised a question as to the advisability of what might be called permanent reservations, such as are contemplated by this section. While we desire to meet the purposes of the Bill by giving priority of right to those taking advantage of the provisions of the Bill, we do not wish unduly to prejudice the ordinary settlement of the country. I think at the time I suggested to the minister and if I did not, I desire to suggest now, that instead of a permanent reservation to continue until three years after the war being made, provision be made that reservations may from time to time be made for the purpose of giving soldier settlers priority, but that any such reservation shall not continue for a longer period than six months. That would give the soldier settler priority during the period of six months, but it would not hold back other settlement awaiting the time when the soldier settler might find it possible to take advantage of the provisions of this Bill.

Mr. ROCHE: I think the object is that this power should be exercised with discretion by the commissioners. They need not necessarily place the reservation on certain lands for three years. It was deemed advisable, however, to stipulate that no land should be reserved for a longer period than three years after the close of the war, because we were convinced that any person taking advantage of this legislation would do so within that time. Of course, it would not be wise to lock up any large reservation for a period of two or three years and say that nobody should go in there. I think the commissioners would be guided largely by the number of applications they received from returned soldiers to go on the land. For instance, after a certain number of applications had been received they would ask that a certain township, we will say, be reserved, and the soldiers would have priority for a certain length of time. I do not suppose that the commissioners, as soon as this legislation comes into force, would go out and select a large area of land and say that they were going to make a reservation of that land for three years for the returned soldiers. We set three years as the maximum, but of course it might be very much less than that. The commissioners will operate under regulations to be approved by the Governor in Council, and I think they will take the view that I have suggested.

Mr. OLIVER: The wording of the section places the matter under the direction of the minister, and after the minister's declaration of policy I have no objection to this power being given; but my understanding is that the policy of the department will be as stated by the minister a moment ago.

Mr. TURRIFF: What is the idea of the Government extending this privilege to returned soldiers from all parts of the Empire? Why should Canada undertake the expenditure of the many millions of dollars that this Bill will entail for soldiers from other portions of the Empire? It seems to me that we shall have a pretty big job on our hands looking after our own returned soldiers without making ourselves responsible for the welfare of returned soldiers from other parts of the Empire.

Mr. ROCHE: As I stated when I introduced this legislation, our first duty will undoubtedly be to look after our own returned soldiers, and I fancy that for at least one year after the war we shall have very few returned soldiers coming to us from the armies of Great Britain or our Allies, because the transportation companies will probably require a year to bring home our own soldiers. I understand that Lord Shaughnessy said some time ago that it would take at least ten months after the close of the war to get our own soldiers back to Canada, so I think within that time we need not look for any immigration. I hope the hon. gentleman's expectations in one respect may be realized; so many of his colleagues, and many who are not his colleagues, have expressed the conviction that comparatively few of our own soldiers will go on the land no matter how attractive the inducements may be. At all events, it is certain that we will not be rushed into an expenditure of millions in looking after our soldiers in this way. They will have to show their bona fides to the commission, and the commission will satisfy themselves that the applicant has the experience in agriculture and the other qualifications set forth, before recommending that the loan be advanced by the Government.

Mr. TURRIFF: I would point out that returned soldiers from other parts of the Empire can get to Canada much more easily than they can get home in many cases, and I think many of them will come here direct instead of going home to their own country.

Mr. OLIVER: I wish to draw attention to the last two lines of subsection 3 of section 4:

> The minister may grant . . . . a free entry for not more than 160 acres subject to such conditions as in the opinion of the Governor in Council are necessary to secure the use of the land for the purpose for which it is granted.

That is to say, the homestead regulations which are embodied in the Dominion Lands Act are to have no parallel in this Act, as the regulations are to be the subject of Orders in Council. Following the same line of argument that I used a day or two ago, regarding game preservation in the Northwest Territories, I would respectfully urge that the conditions upon which the settler may acquire the land and the use he must make of it should be set down in plain terms in the Act, so that everybody could see exactly what they are. I think that is only fair to the soldier, and only fair to the country and everybody else.

Mr. ROCHE: The trouble lies in the impossibility of knowing at this time just what conditions should be imposed. As a matter of fact the commission will determine that, and we will act upon their recommendations. The commissioners will recommend regulations to us which will set forth conditions such as are set forth in section 3. That is the manner in which it has been done in New Zealand, Australia, and the other British colonies. In both New Zealand and Australia there is very little in the statutes. Their Acts are mere skeletons. I have the New Zealand regulations before me, and the Act is administered almost entirely by a set of regulations which were recommended by the local board. I cannot see how it would be possible in passing this Bill to impose the conditions under which this land may be secured when, as a matter of fact, the Governor in Council will have to depend upon the commissioners for knowledge of those conditions.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not see the matter in the same light as the minister has placed it. The Government is asking the House to assent to a provision of a very important nature, when we have no knowledge as to what we are assenting to. We simply give a blank cheque to the Government for them to fill in as they please. In my judgment that is not good legislation, and is not fair either to the soldier or to the country. The fact that this is done in Australia, or in New Zealand, or in some other country, does not at all settle the question so far as Canada is concerned. We have greater experience in the matter of the settlement of homestead lands than either Australia or New Zealand could possibly have, and instead of our being guided by their action, I should think our action would be a guide for them, allowing, of course, for the great difference in climatic conditions which make it impossible for us to accept the land regulations of Australia and New Zealand as being applicable to Canada. I may go so far afield for a moment as to say that during this session of Parliament we have been taking part of our legislation from London and part from Washington, and we have made no objection to it, but when we begin to bring in legislation from New Zealand and Australia, I think it is really overdoing what may be a very good thing. In making any arrangement for the disposition of our own lands, to our own soldiers, we should let our people know exactly what we are doing beforehand, so that there may be no misunderstanding as to the character of the offer we are making.

Upon this condition depends the whole character of the offer. The conditions may be such as will actually debar the settler from taking advantage of it, or receiving any advantage from it. On the other hand, the conditions may be such as to create a situation in which the country will suffer very seriously instead of being benefited.

Mr. ROCHE: I would call my hon. friend's attention to section 8, which provides that:

> (1) The Board may, with the approval of the Governor in Council, make regulations,—
> (a) Prescribing the manner in which entries for land and applications for loans may be made;
> (b) prescribing the conditions upon which free entries and patents for the land may be granted and issued.

—and so on. The hon. gentleman will see that the Board itself, with the approval of the Governor in Council, makes the regulations. I think that would accomplish the purpose that he has in view. I am sure that there will be a disposition on the part of the Board, as well as of the Governor in Council, no matter what Government is in power, to deal most leniently with the soldiers and to make the conditions bear as lightly upon them as is consistent with carrying out the policy which we all have in view. I cannot see the necessity of incorporating certain of the conditions upon which they get the land in detail in the statute. I think that a certain latitude must be allowed to the Board to lay down conditions by way of regulation, as they have done in New Zealand and Australia.

Mr. OLIVER: It has been recognized as being necessary, ever since we began to administer homestead lands, that the conditions under which those homestead lands might be acquired should be set out in the statute and not be made the subject of Orders in Council. We are going into an arrangement here which reaches very much farther in the matter of governmental responsibility than the ordinary homestead regulations, and all I ask is that we give the same assurance of stated facts to the conditions that we found necessary in the case of ordinary homesteaders. If this was necessary in the case of ordinary homesteaders, it is very much more necessary in the case of this special class of people with whom we have to deal.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Loan to settler not exceeding $2,500.

Mr. OLIVER: I assume that the soldier who has rendered service and has returned will be eligible, under this section, to secure a loan on his homestead?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

Mr. TURRIFF: Will a returned soldier who is eligible as a homesteader be able to take a homestead and then get from the Government under this Bill an adjoining quarter section in addition?

Mr. ROCHE: This Bill does not interfere with a man's homestead rights, so that he can qualify for this 160 acres upon being a soldier and in addition he can exercise his privilege of homesteading under the Dominion Lands Act and take an adjoining homestead.

Mr. TURRIFF: Will he be allowed to take a homestead in this reserve?

Mr. ROCHE: Either in or outside of the reserve. He will not be confined to the reserve.

Mr. TURRIFF: A man who has not had a homestead in Canada will be able to secure a half-section under this Bill?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

Mr. JAMESON: What arrangement, if any, does the minister purpose to make for settling soldiers in those provinces in which they desire to settle? I would like to know if any provision will be made for the expropriation of land of a suitable character and what steps will be taken in that direction.

Mr. ROCHE: All the public land outside of the three prairie provinces is Crown land in the right of the provinces and each of the provinces has a land settlement policy of its own. Some of the provinces have already passed legislation with special reference to the returned soldier. Others possibly have in contemplation legislation with special reference to the returned soldier. We thought it advisable, after consultation with the representatives of the various provincial governments, to leave the disposition of the Crown lands of the various provinces entirely to the provincial governments. Some of these provinces, notably Ontario, at the last session of the provincial legislature, gave 80 acres of homestead land in the Northern part of the province to any returned soldier who wished to settle on it. I do not think that Nova Scotia has adopted legislation as yet with special reference to the returned soldiers. However, the returned soldier who desires to locate upon Crown land in Nova Scotia, or who has a little capital of his own and desires to purchase some land, may utilize this section and secure a loan to the maximum amount of $2,500, just the same as those soldiers who want to locate upon the free Dominion lands in the West. The loan part of this Bill is available to the returned soldier in any province of the Dominion and with reference to any land upon which he may desire to locate.

Sir HERBERT AMES: What course will be pursued where there is already a loan policy on the part of the province? Will both loans be available?

Mr. ROCHE: In that respect the commission will have to measure up their security. They will have to get the necessary security, which is a first mortgage on the land, and if the provincial government have already granted a loan to the returned soldier on provincial Crown land and got a first mortgage, the soldier would not be eligible under our legislation unless he utilized our loan for the payment of the first mortgage, giving us a first lien.

Mr. JAMESON: The difficulty I foresee is this: In certain provinces in Canada, notably, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick, there are no free lands suitable for settlement.

Mr. COCHRANE: There are in New Brunswick.

Mr. JAMESON: I do not speak definitely of New Brunswick, but in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward there are no Crown lands suitable for settlement. This Bill is going to work very great unfairness to these provinces. In the western provinces the Crown in the right of the Dominion possesses certain lands. There a returned soldier, or anybody else. if he is a suitable settler and can comply with certain conditions, gets 160 acres. Then, after getting 160 acres of land, he has the benefit of this clause by which he can secure a loan of $2,500 for the purpose of carrying on. In Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island these lands are not available. There should be some provision for placing these provinces in as advantageous a position as the West for the purpose of securing settlers. A broad, generous policy should be adopted, and where suitable lands are found in these provinces the board which is created by this Bill should have the right of expropriation, —not necessarily a right to be harshly exercised, but the right of expropriation where circumstances warrant it—and these lands should be placed at the disposal of returned soldiers upon such terms as will work out a fair policy for all parts of Canada. There are a good many soldiers who will come back to this country who will not desire to go to the West. Soldiers from the Maritime Provinces, I have no doubt, will prefer to remain there, but under this Bill they will not have the same privileges as men desiring to settle in the West will have. It is a matter of such great importance to the people of this country and to the soldiers who hope to settle on land that a proper policy shall be entered upon that I hope the minister will not put this Bill through committee to-night but that he will take into consideration what I have said and will endeavour to broaden the scope of the Bill to some extent so that powers of expropriation will be given to the board, because in no other way that I can see can fair play be meted out to the provinces and to the soldiers themselves.

Mr. ROCHE: I imagine that there will be so much rivalry between the various provinces to retain their own soldier population within the confines of these provinces that they will be only too pleased to adopt land settlement policies of their own and do the same as the provinces of Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick have already done. New Brunswick is expropriating land other than its own Crown lands. Most of the Crown lands are disposed of but they have a land settlement policy under which they are purchasing unoccupied lands and farms and making them available for returned soldiers. There is no reason why Nova Scotia should not inaugurate a similar policy for her returned soldiers and vie with the other provinces in retaining her own soldier population.

The province of Prince Edward Island sent a deputation here and explained to us that it is their intention to expropriate certain land and they desired to know if they could co-operate with us and take advantage of this loan. We assured them that we would be only too pleased to have them do so. A returned soldier in Nova Scotia, who has a little money of his own and desires to remain in his own province and take up farming, may purchase whatever land he likes but whether he remains in his own province or whether he desires to take up a prairie farm, we will, under the provisions of this Bill, advance him $2,500 to pay for the farm. That would strike me as being a much fairer policy than that the Government should step in and expropriate land within these provinces for soldiers to locate upon. I am satisfied that the provincial governments would be only too pleased to do their utmost to supply any available Crown lands they have of their own to keep their own soldier population within their own provinces.

Mr. JAMESON: If the minister pursues his argument a little further he will see that, upon his own statement, it is quite unnecessary for the Government to introduce this Bill at all. If the provinces will do it, why have this Bill?

Mr. ROCHE: The hon. gentleman overlooks the $2,500 entirely.

Mr. JAMESON: No, I am not overlooking it at all. I am speaking of the acquisition of the land. It is going to work a great unfairness to those provinces where the lands are not held in the Crown in the right of the Dominion. Of course, I can do nothing more than express my views to the minister and indicate the course which, in my opinion, the Government should pursue. Instead of adopting this unsatisfactory policy I can only point out what in my judgment would have been a better and a proper policy.

Sir HERBERT AMES: While the Returned Soldiers Committee were meeting a large number of deputations waited upon us, many of which referred to land settlement. We found that no two provinces asked for the same thing in the matter of land settlement, and we have a large number of memorials in our evidence, which members can read for themselves, coming from various provinces with reference to the conditions of settlement of returned soldiers. We found in each case that the proposals were adapted to the particular conditions of the provinces themselves. If these provinces were to control their own regulations, we thought the better way would be to allow each to take its own time to work out a policy of its own with reference to the assisting of returned soldiers having reference to the peculiar conditions obtaining in each province. A number of the provinces have already passed statutes and they are planning several more. One proposition for land settlement that has been very popular in the Maritime Provinces is the community settlement plan. Several projects were submitted to us, the essential idea of which is that land should be expropriated, a central village established in each area and small farms within a radius of it taken by persons who might have a house and a barn in the little village that it is proposed to create. All the schemes have special reference to the province wherein they were devolved, and it seems to me that we can rely upon each of the provinces adopting legislation which will suit the soldiers of these different provinces.

Mr. TURRIFF: The hamlet system of farming has never been a success in the western provinces. It has been tried a number of times. There is, or was, a clause in the Dominion Lands Act providing for settlers adopting the hamlet system. But, it does not amount to anything and it has never been made a success except by the Mennonites and Doukhobors. English-speaking people would not make a success of that system in the West. I would like to ask the minister whether men who have gone overseas and who have been sent back will come under this law.

Mr. ROCHE: We have not drawn the line so fine as that. We have defined "settler" to mean "any person who has served in the naval or military expeditionary forces of Canada during the present war."

Mr. TURRIFF: That would bring them in.

Mr. ROCHE: That covers the point.

Sir HERBERT AMES: If a man joins to-day, spend a week in the expeditionary force expecting to go overseas, and is then discharged, is he entitled to the benefits of this Act? He is a member of the "expeditionary forces of Canada" on active service.

Mr. ROCHE: The commission will exercise a discretion in that regard. The loan shall only be given to a man "who has left the forces with an honourable record and who has been honourably discharged." If he has been discharged on account of any irregularity, he would not be eligible, and the commission would exercise a discretion in that case.

Sir HERBERT AMES: Will men who enlisted, were passed as medically fit, served a short time in Canada in camp or barracks, went to England and were found to be unfitted for soldiers and were discharged, be entitled to the benefits of this Bill?

Mr. ROCHE: I do not see any reason to deny them the benefits inasmuch as we are desirous of getting increased production and getting soldiers on the land. We are not making a gift to any individual. We are desirous of getting a quid pro quo, and the quid pro quo is a soldier settler. We should not offer any interference or any bar to any returned soldier who desires to settle on the land. We ought to make the interpretation pretty broad. Any person who has joined the Canadian Expeditionary Forces for active service would be included.

Sir HERBERT AMES: It seems to me there should be some recognition of the degree of service rendered, and that a man who has only served a week or so in Canada should not be compared with the man who has actually gone to the front or who has given two or three years of service. As far as getting at the facts is concerned, and that sort of thing, you might make a classification as between the men who have been in France and the men who have only been a few weeks in the service here. There should be a differentiation. I do not think that any man should get special privileges unless he has actually gone overseas.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: What are the special privileges? Has a soldier, to get a land grant, to do settlement duties and make improvements the same as an ordinary settler?

Mr. ROCHE: That was all discussed a few moments ago.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Well, I was not in.

Mr. ROCHE: He has to comply with certain conditions which will be recommended by the Board of Commissioners, and approved by the Governor in Council under conditions that will be laid down by regulation.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: In some of the other provinces where land grants were given to veterans on previous occasions there was great difficulty. The soldier was anxious to avail himself of the free land grant, but not to settle on the land. This was unjust to adjoining settlers and retarded development. These returned soldiers must become settlers?

Mr. ROCHE: Undoubtedly they must be permanent settlers.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: So that the returned soldier does not receive much favour in respect of the land, but he receives this loan of $2,500, at a rate of interest not much below the ordinary rate, with which he can start operations. I should think that to induce the soldiers to go on the land some further inducement will be necessary. I am glad that the Bill is to apply to other provinces than those in which the Dominion holds lands. Otherwise there would be discrimination against the older provinces. After their experience as soldiers I doubt if these men would wish to settle on isolated farms, and by the provision enabling the purchase of lands they can be given farms in the older provinces where they may be more comfortably settled. I was impressed by the measure introduced this afternoon to assess large incomes for carrying on the war. The soldier is making the greatest sacrifice, and it is only right that the rich man at home should give of his wealth to assist in carrying on the war. I think our treatment of the returned soldiers should be generous, that we should do even more than is proposed by this Bill. Many of these men will not like the idea of going into the newer districts and becoming pioneers after their experience of the last few years.

Mr. OLIVER: I have the authority of Lord Shaughnessy in support of a view which I advanced on the same line as the argument of the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland). I said that it would be economical and in the interest of rapid increase of production if prairie land not under cultivation, but situated in the vicinity of railroad communication were expropriated at a fair price and then distributed among the soldiers on fair terms. With the financial assistance given them by this Bill they can bring that land into production in the shortest possible time. We should be getting a return upon our investment, and the soldier himself would be doing better than if he became a pioneer. But it may be said that that would increase the investment of the country on behalf of the soldier. It does and it does not. It does increase the initial investment required in payment of the expropriated land. That would be an additional amount, but it would be no additional risk. The $2,500 would be a loan to the soldier to purchase stock and machinery upon which the Government would hold a lien, and of course the land would be worth what the Government paid for it. If the payment for the land were extended over a long period of years at a moderate rate of interest, while the original investment of the Government would be increased, the risk of loss would not only not be increased, but would be very greatly lessened, and the results in the matter of increased production and of self-support by the soldier would be reached in a very much shorter time. I observe provision in section 5 empowering the Government to take such action as I have suggested. Is that in contemplation?

Mr. ROCHE: The principal reason for putting that in is to enable any soldier who desires to go on land other than Dominion land to acquire land wherever he likes. It is thought better that he should buy the land than that the Government should expropriate it. If, as has been suggested, we are going to lose a lot of money under our free land grant and the advance of $2,500 to the soldier, the country would be much more involved if, in addition, we expended millions in expropriating lands which might remain on our hands for a long time. It is true we should have the lands, which would be of value, but in war times we have better use for our money than buying lands which may not be required even for the purposes of settlement for years to come. This provision is to enable the soldier to purchase land wherever he may desire. He can use the money in clearing the land and getting started.

Mr. OLIVER: I am not the originator of this suggestion; I first saw it mentioned on the authority of Lord Shaughnessy, of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I think that everybody must pay some respect to a suggestion in regard to land settlement coming from such a source, especially in view of the fact that the organization of which Lord Shaughnessy is the head is the owner of a large amount of unoccupied land. He said that he was prepared, on behalf of the company, to take the same chance as anybody else and have the land expropriated for this purpose. While the policy of the Government does not at the moment contemplate any such action, under this subsection, it would be possible for such action to be taken. May I urge upon the Minister of the Interior and the Minister of Finance the advisability of taking up that question and of discussing it with those who are well posted on the subject? Having had as great experience, perhaps, in the matter of homestead settlement as any other member of the House, I am strongly of the opinion that in the end it would be better for the settler, and better for the country, to adopt the suggestion that has been made than to depend upon the occupation of distant, unimproved, uninviting and, to some extent, inaccessible land, such as our present homestead land largely is.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It has frequently been suggested that it would be a wise policy for the Government to buy extensive tracts of land and sell them to settlers who have a certain amount of capital—the last having always been regarded as an essential feature. In order to get the Northwest settled up, it may be necessary for the Government to expropriate lands at present held in private ownership—as my hon. friend suggests, and as, I think, Lord Shaughnessy suggests—and to sell them to settlers coming in who have a certain amount of capital, which would be a measure of security to the Government, the Government possibly making a further advance to those settlers. The question of the expropriation of lands held by railway companies, or in private ownership, convenient to railways, is really one of the larger questions of settlement; it is a wider question than that which is now under consideration. It is, I think a matter that is well worthy of consideration. At present there is the financial difficulty in the way of considering it, even if it were regarded as otherwise practicable and as good policy. As to this particular measure, we are advancing $2,500 to any soldier who may desire to settle upon Dominion land in the West on terms of settlement to be established by the commission and approved by the Governor in Council. In the case of a man taking free lands, $2,500, or even a less amount, would be of substantial assistance to him in establishing himself and his family on the farm. A comparatively small percentage of those who have gone on free lands in the West have had as much money as that to start with. Moreover, there are provinces in which the Dominion has no lands, and it was regarded as desirable that this measure should afford also a degree of assistance to the soldier who might not desire to take up free lands in the West, but who might desire to remain in Ontario, Quebec, or the Maritime Provinces. Under the provisions of this Bill, the $2,500 is available to such a soldier. We had a provincial conference here in which this matter was discussed. All the Provincial Governments are greatly interested in the matter; they all proposed to take steps to secure their share of the soldier settlement. New Brunswick has already a land settlement scheme, and they intended to proceed actively with it. Under that scheme a soldier could buy from them land which was owned in the right of the Crown, or that had been expropriated or otherwise acquired under their Land Settlement Act. We are asked if this $2,500 would be available to a soldier so settling upon land in New Brunswick. The answer was, as the minister has stated, that the $2,500 would be available, secured, of course, as provided in the Bill; and to that extent it would afford substantial assistance to the soldier settling upon land in New Brunswick. The soldier in New Brunswick might desire to go into intensive farming and to take up from ten to fifty acres—not necessarily 160 or 320 acres. The $2,500 would enable him to take up a small farm, especially if he had a little money of his own or had received such assistance from the Provincial Government as I have mentioned. Quebec is interested in the matter; Quebec has Crown lands. Ontario intended to proceed actively with this land settlement scheme, and has so proceeded. It seems to me, therefore, that the Government is well advised in giving a loan of $2,500 to the soldier who settles, first, upon the free lands of the West; or, secondly, upon the free lands of any of the provinces, if the provinces make provision for making those lands available to the soldiers, as I believe they intend to do; or, thirdly, upon any land that he may have acquired. Some question was raised as to the rate of interest, five per cent. That is a lower rate than the Dominion can borrow money at to-day. The valuable feature of these loans is that they are spread over a long period of years, with a gradual amortization of the principal. I had a good deal to do with this measure, because, if it is availed of to a considerable extent, as I believe it will be, it will involve very heavy financing. It seemed to me that the measure would be very helpful in the establishing of soldiers on the land. I put it to my hon. friend, as a man who knows the West, that a scheme of the kind that has been suggested, having to do with the larger question of settlement, is not likely to succeed unless the settler to whom the land is sold by the Government has himself a substantial amount of capital which will represent his stake in the property. Given settlers such as we get from the United States, who have capital of two or three thousand dollars, to whom loan might be made by the Government under some general scheme of land settlement after the war, the adoption of such a suggestion might result very advantageously to the West, and consequently to the whole of Canada. It is a matter to which we should be glad to give consideration.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not want the minister to take what I have said as a suggestion that the Government should go into a general scheme of expropriation of prairie land. I only suggested that, in so far as it might be applicable to this Bill, under which we are really taking hold of a special class of people and giving them special privileges, the expropriation of this unused land, if made would be in order that the land might be acquired at a fixed and reasonable price. But I think the Minister of Finance hardly caught my suggestion, which was that the purchase price of the land would be in addition to the cash amount advanced which would be for the working of the land. Suppose we paid $20 an acre, which would be a very high price for raw land. That would mean $3,200 for a quarter-section. That, of course, would add very considerably to the obligations of the Government, but it would, I contend, add to the security of the total investment, and, besides, bring a return very much more quickly than could be expected where the settler spent his $2,500 and spends four or five years of his time in bringing into production a part of a wooded quarter-section which might be ten, fifteen, twenty, thirty, forty, fifty or seventy-five miles distant from a railroad over roads which might be very difficult. Surely the man who has a quarter-section in open prairie within ten or fifteen miles of a railroad, with good roads leading to it, and who is given an advance of $2,500, will produce a greater and quicker result to the country and to himself than the man who has to spend $2,500 in the improvement of a bush or brush farm.

Mr. TURRIFF: I quite agree with the suggestion made by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver.) The Saskatchewan Government, at the last session of the local legislature, took power to do this very thing —that is, to purchase unoccupied lands held by speculators. Their idea is to purchase those lands at their value, or as cheaply as they can, and to re-sell them to adjoining settlers or to any other settlers who are prepared to go on the lands, and to give them thirty years for repayment of the purchase price. The object of the local Government is to get more people into the province and more land brought under cultivation.

Mr. MARCIL: I was not in the House when section 2 was passed, but I understand that my suggestion was adopted and the Bill amended accordingly. I must thank the minister for having accepted my suggestion. I have had the opportunity of learning in Montreal, since this matter was mentioned in the House, that those who did take part in the war either for France or for Belgium would have thought an injustice had been done to them if they had been left out. Although I have never been west of Winnipeg, I have for twenty years been legislating here on matters connected with the West. Since this matter of land settlement has come up, I have had the advantage of being a member of the Returned Soldiers Commission and attending meetings at Montreal, Toronto and Ottawa, and the impression gathered was that unless very substantial inducements are given to the soldiers to go on to the land, very few of them will do so.

In Toronto, we were told that out of six or eight hundred men at that time who had been asked as to what their future intentions were, only two per cent declared their intention of going on the land. The same thing might apply in Montreal. It is no exaggeration to say that the great bulk of those who enlisted in the military forces of Canada came from the cities and towns, and that a relatively small number came from the rural parts. If those returned soldiers are to go on the land, we shall have to give them good inducements. Some valuable suggestions have been made here to-night by the hon. members for Edmonton and Assiniboia. It strikes me as most extraordinary that the Dominion Government should allow large tracts of land to remain unoccupied and uncultivated along the line of any railway in any part where the Government can exercise jurisdiction, and thus compel settlers to go long distances from railroads. The idea of expropriating lands and of giving the soldiers first choice is an excellent one and one well worthy of being looked into. I am sure the House will agree that anything that can be done for the returned soldier will be heartily supported by hon. members on both sides of the House.

Mr. OLIVER: In regard to this land grant, what will be the decision of the Government as to the point at which responsibility to the returned soldier begins? I think the question was asked and the minister made the reply that it would be provided under regulation made by the board. Has the Government not a definite policy on that point? That is to say, will men who have never gone overseas come within the provisions of this Bill?

Mr. ROCHE: We did consider that point, and the question was discussed as to whether we should include the soldier who enlisted but who did not leave Canada to go overseas. For instance, suppose a man enlisted just before the war ceased. He might not have the privilege of going overseas. Inasmuch as we desire to secure as many settlers as possible for the land, we decided to include those, so that they could take advantage of the provisions of the Bill just the same as those who went overseas.

Mr. OLIVER: A large number of men who have enlisted in Canada, have been discharged in Canada as unfit. Will they be included?

Mr. ROCHE: Any person who has enlisted and who has been honourably discharged, through no fault of his own, would be included.

Sir HERBERT AMES: What would be the position where that clause does not coincide with the corresponding clause in provincial legislation? For instance, the Ontario Act provides that:

> The lands set apart shall be reserved for location by persons who since the fourth day of August, A.D. 1914, have been upon active military or naval service with the British forces, out of Canada, against the King's enemies.

In other words, you cannot take advantage of the Ontario Bill for agricultural settlement unless you have been out of Canada. Therefore, there would be a wide class who could take advantage of this Bill, but who could not take advantage of the Ontario Bill.

Mr. ROCHE: That shows that our policy is much more generous than the policy of the Ontario Government. Hon. gentlemen might as well compare the acreage given by the Ontario Government with the acreage given by the Dominion Government.

[Mr. Marcil.]

The Ontario legislation provides for only eighty acres whereas we provide for 160 acres. The Ontario Government charges 6 per cent whereas we charge only 5 per cent. They have also more restrictions as to the class of individuals who can take advantage of their legislation. There need be no difficulty at all on that score. Each legislature has paramount jurisdiction within its own sphere. I think that what has been said goes to prove that our legislation is much more generous to the soldier than the legislation of the Ontario Government.

Sir HERBERT AMES: The Ontario Government legislation restricts the offer to men who have gone overseas, and I think it is the same in New Brunswick.

Mr. MARCIL: That is not fair to the men who enlisted in good faith and who were not given the opportunity of going overseas, but were sent to Bermuda, and on their return to Canada were discharged. The Ontario legislation leaves them out entirely.

Mr. GLASS: Could a soldier receive assistance from this Government and from the Ontario Government as well?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

Mr. GLASS: Supposing the Ontario Government had a first mortgage on the soldier's land. What security would the Dominion Government take if they also loaned money to him?

Mr. ROCHE: The facts of receiving assistance from the Ontario Government would not interfere with the soldier's receiving this loan. With this loan he might be able to pay off the first mortgage the Ontario Government held against his land, giving us a first mortgage, and use the balance of the money in working his farm.

Sir HERBERT AMES: Would it be possible for him to take one farm under the provincial government and one farm under the Dominion Government?

Mr. ROCHE: Certainly.

Mr. MACNUTT: This Bill deals only with settlement by soldiers, but I wish to say a few words in connection with the general settlement in the West. I think such a discussion is in order because the same principle obtains. Whether a man is a returned soldier or an ordinary settler, we want him to be successful; that is the main thing. There are two classes of land in the West. One is the homestead system of free government land, and the other is the system of purchasing lands that have been acquired by land corporations, railway companies, and so on. The good homesteads which attracted people to the West in the first place have been pretty well exhausted, although there are no doubt still many acres of good homestead land in north Saskatchewan and in the Peace River country. It seems to me, however, that the policy of the Government should be to settle successfully those lands that are in the vicinity of towns, with schools, a railroad, and other conveniences. It is better worth a man's while to pay for land of that kind than to go a long distance away and get land for nothing, providing of course the terms of payment are made easy. The difficulty of which I have seen so many instances is not so much the cost of the land, as the terms of payment. A man may be unfortunate and be put back for a year or two, but if he is able to meet his payments he will remain. I have found farmers a very optimistic class of people. I have known some to be hailed out completely, and just as soon as they could get on the land again they would have teams out ploughing for next year's crop, and then go and work with the team for somebody else to earn enough money to carry them over the winter. I have known some of them hailed out two summers running. The people who settle in the West want to make homes for themselves and, with an eye to the future, they are willing to put up with a great many hardships if only they can make both ends meet. That is the class of people we want in the West, whether they are soldiers or not. We should do everything we can for the soldier, but I do not see why this other class of good settlers should not be included in a plan for settling the older parts of the country, even if the settlers have to pay for the land. But they should not have to pay for it on the short terms that are now allowed. I have known many cases where good settlers, with good outfits, have bought good land. They would have to make a first payment down, and sometimes it would be three years before there would be any return, and their capital would be all eaten up. A great many of these men have left their farms altogether, and others have rented them on tenant shares. They could not make the farms their own, because the payments were not spread over a sufficient number of years. The provincial government of Saskatchewan has taken this matter up to a certain extent, but I think it is a matter for the Dominion Government to deal with. It would not require any new railways to develop these lands in the vicinity of the towns. The Government could gradually expropriate the lands, and sell them to bona fide settlers on long terms. I do not think there are many lands that are purchased from speculators in less than six payments. I have made a little calculation. I have put ordinary good land at $20 an acre, six payments, 6 per cent interest. Without going into details a man would have to pay in five years a first payment down of $533, with the interest added each year. Altogether in the five years he would have to pay $3,838.20 on the six-payment plan. If the payments were spread over 25 years at the same interest and the same price, in the five years he would have to pay only $1,754.68, or a difference of $2,083.52. Of course, under the twenty-five payment plan he would still have a lot of payments to make at the end of the five years, but he would be able to make them. It is the first few years, when nothing is coming in, that eats up his capital.

With regard to returned soldiers and settlers generally I would say, let them make a first payment down to show they are bona fide settlers, then for the next couple of years let them pay the interest only. This would not cost the country anything. Land bonds could be sold, I suppose, and if a man were to give up his land—I do not suppose many would—somebody else would take it up and work it. I do not think there would be the slightest charge on the country. Do not confiscate these lands by any means, but gradually expropriate them. At the same time no speculator should be allowed to unload lands on to the Government; there should be no favouritism of any kind; the matter should be handled in a business-like way. If this plan were carried out, then, if a settler had a bad year, he would not have a heavy payment to make and could carry on. I should say after about eight or ten years an ordinarily successful settler could start making definite payments.

Mr. CURRIE: That is provided for in subsection 6 of section 6 of the Bill.

Mr. MACNUTT: I did not read the Bill through. If it is provided for I am endorsing what is in the Bill. If the hon. member has no objection I will continue to endorse it. This is not a new idea. Two or three years ago, when I first thought of it, I believe it was fairly original. With regard to soldiers particularly, and with regard to any settlers, I would make it easy for them to pay interest, if nothing else, for two or three years. The great thing is that they shall not be obliged to use up what capital they have, whether it is loaned to them by the Government, or whether it is their own. I live out in the western country and I generally know what I am talking about with regard to matters pertaining to the West. I will give you an instance as indicating the accuracy of the statements I have made. Three years ago about forty families came from the United States and settled about twenty miles south of me, on land they had purchased. Last spring twenty-nine of those families went away, and the rest will follow them. They gave up simply because the payments were too large and came too fast, and they thought they had better go while the going was good. The principle of the thing is this: the people who are there must have a certain capital to work on, unless they want to go away back and homestead, in which case they can make their own capital, as the first homesteaders did. Of course, it takes a great many years to do this, and I do not know that we have very many people who would care to do it at the present time. I do not believe the soldiers will want to do it.

Mr. CURRIE: Will the hon. gentleman repeat what he said about the soldiers?

Mr. MACNUTT: The soldiers would not care to go away and isolate themselves a long distance from the railways and from civilization, because they are so accustomed to community life. Of course, some of them might do it. At the same time, I think it would be far better if they settled on some good lands, of which there are millions of acres in the West, in the hands of different companies. If they were able to buy these lands on easy terms, I think it would be far better than if they went away from civilization altogether. It would be to the advantage of the country, because when you put in a lot of settlers, before long they will require transportation facilities, and you will be obliged to build new railroads for them. We have railroads now running through these lands, and our country roads are getting into pretty good shape. We also have our schools, and our little towns. These towns would become larger and the business men would become more successful; they would have more customers, and living might possibly become cheaper on that account. The country will have a great burden to bear later on, altogether apart from the soldiers. The more settlers come into the country the easier the burden will be borne, and if you make it so attractive that the settlers will come, they will bear their share of the burden. It is a wonderful country, but there is no use trying to settle it and then have the people leave the land, because if that happens matters are a great deal worse than they were before. There are altogether too many abandoned farms at the present time. I know of a man who lived about two miles from me, who came up from the United States and bought a section of land. Last winter he sold everything and went back to the States to live on an eighty-acre farm. He found the payments were coming too fast.

Mr. CURRIE: Was it also because German is taught in the schools there, and he could not have his children taught English?

Mr. MACNUTT: No, nothing of the kind. There is no German taught there. If the hon. gentleman would go out there and live for about three years, he would know something about the country. A little trip through the West once in a while does not give one very much knowledge of it. The point I was making was that it is of no benefit to the country, or to anybody, to get people in unless they become successful and stay there. Neither is it a good plan to make it too easy for them to come into the country. We want the right class of settlers, who know some effort is required on their part, and who know they can make a success of it if they put forth the effort. If, however, they are up against heavy land payments, which come too fast, they will simply get broken-hearted and leave the country, and the result will be a worse state of affairs than before.

Mr. OLIVER: Section 6, which deals with the loans and the payments of interest, is specific. I was asking that similar specific provisions be made with regard to the use to which the lands would be put, that is with regard to the settlement duties. I think it is very much more necessary that the settlement duties should be indicated in the Act than it is that the terms of the loans should be set out, although I find no fault with the latter, on the contrary I think it is very commendable.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Sir Thomas White the House adjourned at 9.45 p.m.

Thursday, July 26, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

WAR TAX UPON INCOMES.

FIRST READING OF THE BILL.

Hon. Sir THOMAS WHITE (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 117, to authorize the levying of a war tax upon certain incomes.

He said: This is the Bill founded on the resolution which I introduced yesterday.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE DOMINION LANDS ACT AMENDMENT.

On the motion of Hon. W. J. Roche (Minister of the Interior), Bill No. 107, to amend the Dominion Lands Act, was read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

On section 1—Cancellation and compensation for improvements.

Mr. OLIVER: This Bill contains a large number of details, and it may be that I have been remiss in not following up the work, but I would not like to be compelled to consider all these many details to-day, not having seen them before.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There is no need of going into any of those sections to which my hon. friend objects. We might run over the Bill and see what part is not controversial. There is no other business ready just at the moment.

Mr. OLIVER: Has the Bill been available to hon. members in the shape in which it is now laid on the Table.

Mr. ROCHE: It has been distributed.

Mr. OLIVER: When?

Mr. ROCHE: Only to-day.

Mr. OLIVER: That bears out my point. I was saying that the Bill contains a large number of details which require careful consideration before hon. members can be in a proper position to assent to or dissent from them. I would very much rather have had some little time to study these details before being compelled to take the Bill up and go through it in committee.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No doubt the Minister of the Interior will agree that any of the sections as to which my hon. friend thinks further consideration will be necessary can stand, and the minister can give his explanations which will assist my hon friend in his consideration.

Mr. OLIVER: Under the circumstances, the Bill having just been distributed, it being a Bill of detailed amendment and we not having had an opportunity to compare it at considerable length with the present Act, we shall have to ask you, Sir, to be good enough to read each section.

1. Subsection two of section fifteen of The Dominion Lands Act, chapter twenty of the Statutes of 1908, is amended by inserting after the word "latter" in the tenth line thereof, the words "or to any other person or persons adjudged by the minister to be entitled thereto as dependents of the former holder of the land," and by adding the following at the end thereof:

"The person who may subsequently secure the land, either under entry or by sale or otherwise, may be required to pay any and all amounts due for principal and interest then charged against such land for seed grain, fodder or other relief advanced by His Majesty to the former or any preceding entrant or holder of such land, in such manner as the minister may direct."

Mr. OLIVER: Will the minister give an explanation in regard to this amendment?

Mr. ROCHE: The members of the House will see that in the Bill as it has been distributed, in addition to the amendments that the Chairman has just read, there is in one column the reading of section 2 of the present Act and in the opposite column the reading of the section as it will be after amendment, the portion that has been added being in darker type. The explanation of the first change is to clothe the minister with authority to order that moneys collected for improvements made by a former entrant shall, instead of being refunded to the said former entrant, be paid to his wife. In many cases of desertion the woman is unable to obtain an assignment from her husband, although it may be shown in some instances that she has advanced money to her husband to effect improvements. As the law now stands, she has no redress.

There may be other cases where it would be advisable to make a refund to the father or mother or some other near relative of the former holder of the land, on proof being furnished that such relative is the person most entitled to receive the money.

The practice of the department, where the wife has been abandoned, is that after she has been abandoned for two years, she will be allowed to make entry for the land in her own name. At present the practice is that a woman who is allowed entry is supposed to have her residence count from the date of entry, but we desire to take the opportunity of allowing the woman to have her residence count even before she has received her entry if she has been residing upon the land subsquent to her desertion. This particular provision means that where the husband has made certain improvements under the existing Act, those improvements may be collected from the next entrant. We do not desire to collect from the deserted wife, but to have authority to pay over the value of the improvements to the wife.

Mr. NESBITT: Less the amount of indebtedness?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes, if there was anything due. The second change is in connection with the advance of seed grain, fodder and relief made in 1914 and 1915. In some cases the party obtaining the advance failed to complete the duties in connection with his entry, and such entry has been cancelled. In cases of this kind it has been decided that any one taking up the land later on will have to pay the amount of the advance. In every case, a person obtaining entry for cancelled land is required to pay the value of the improvements remaining upon the land at the time he secures the entry. The amount so collected for improvements is applied on the seed grain debt, but if the value of the improvements is not equal to the amount of the seed grain indebtedness, the party securing the land is required to make up the remainder of the indebtedness. For instance, we have a lien on the land of any one who received advances from us in 1914 and 1915 under our seed grain distribution. If the homesteader abandoned that land and we had no lien upon it, the next entrant who applies for cancellation would receive a free entry for that homestead. But when we have a lien upon the land, in order to protect the treasury we insist that whoever takes up the land must assume the indebtedness over and above the value of the improvements.

Mr. OLIVER: If I have been able to correctly gather the purport of the minister's remarks, I would say that the first change with regard to the dependents of a homesteader is a very proper one. But there is no doubt in my mind, in regard to the second change, that the charging of the whole indebtedness against the subsequent entrant for an abandoned homestead will in many cases have the effect of preventing the entry from being made. There are many cases in which a large indebtedness has been incurred on account of seed grain and fodder, and if another bad season occurs this year—and I am afraid that some parts of the country may be facing a bad season—many homesteads may be abandoned, particularly those on which the Government has a lien. I think the Government would be well advised not to charge against the incoming settler the indebtedness incurred by the previous homesteader in regard to seed grain and fodder relief, beyond the fair value of the improvements upon the homestead, because if more than the value of the improvements is charged against the incoming settler he will to that extent be deterred from taking the homestead. I am quite sure that the amount of the lien will not be sufficient to deter the homesteader in all cases, but I am equally satisfied that it will be sufficient to deter him in a large number of cases if the indebtedness is greater than the actual value of the improvements. In that case he will be required to pay for something that he does not get, and there are very many people, of course, who object very strongly to paying for something which they do not get, but which somebody else gets. That sentiment, apart from the actual values, will have a serious effect in deterring the re-occupation of abandoned land. If, on the other hand, the Government undertook to collect from the incoming settler the value of the improvements only which the previous homesteader had made, and which the incoming homesteader would have the benefit of, there would be no such impediment to the re-occupation of the land, and the Government would in all probability get all they possibly could get out of the transaction in a large number of cases. That would encourage the re-occupation of the country, and not deter it, as I am afraid it will be deterred by the provision which the minister is placing in the Act.

Mr. ROCHE: Unless we take some means of protecting the treasury, we are liable to lose a very large amount of money. I do not think we should leave any stone unturned to protect the country against such loss when we have at our hand this method of collecting the indebtedness. I do not look at the matter in exactly the same light as my hon. friend, when he says that the subsequent entrant is paying for something that he does not get. In one sense that is true, but the incoming settler does get the land, and land in a thickly settled portion of the community—and it was here that the distribution of seed grain was made—is more valuable than far-distant homestead land. Our experience thus far would not lead us to believe that this provision will be a deterrent against the re-occupation of the land. We have had a number of cases where men were only too pleased, in fact volunteered, to pay off the seed grain indebtedness for the privilege of being allowed priority of entry. The land is valuable, though in some cases there are very few improvements. If the improvements were valued at $300 and the indebtedness at $400, the incoming settler pays the $300 for the improvements in any case, and he is then called upon to pay the other $100 in order to release the Government lien. As we have already had many cases where men were only too pleased to assume this indebtedness, I do not imagine this provision will be a deterrent to the re-occupation of the land, and if we do not have such a provision I fear that the country will be liable to a very serious loss.

Mr. OLIVER: I have no wish to put the Government in the position of failing to collect indebtedness that is due to the country, but I am compelled to take a view very different from the minister's in this matter. The minister speaks of the willingness of the incoming settler to pay off the seed grain indebtedness, and, I presume, the value of the improvements besides.

Mr. ROCHE: The indebtedness over and above the value of the improvements.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not gather that that is the wording of the section.

Mr. ROCHE: He would have to pay for the improvements in any case, and the amount he pays for improvements is applied on the seed grain indebtedness.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not think that is made clear in the section. However, the policy of the department is good enough in that particular. The minister speaks of these seed grain liens having been taken in thickly settled districts, where the land is of sufficient value in itself to make it a business proposition for the incoming settler to pay off the lien.

Under such circumstances of course that is the business way for the transaction to go through, but I am compelled to take the view that the large majority of those cases are not in the thickly settled parts, but are rather in the isolated sections, otherwise the men would not have abandoned the land. The land is worth just as much to the farmer as it is to the incoming settler, as land or as a speculation, and inasmuch as no business lien can be held against the land there is no reason why he should abandon it. The outlying localities, where the pressure of settlement has not given value to the land, are where abandonment will take place largely, and where it is important that the Government should secure re-occupation of the land. In those localities it is very much more important to secure re-occupation and production of the land than it is to secure the repayment of the balance of the seed grain lien. I would not ask the minister to delay this section, because I think its purpose as explained by him is perfectly clear. I have made my protest against the view taken by the minister, and I am willing to have the section pass. At the same time I must contend strongly that the minister has made a statement of the case which, in my judgment, is not generally applicable, and it will not work out as he suggests, but will act as a deterrent to re-occupation and cultivation of the lands.

Mr. ROCHE: This legislation was intended to harmonize with our existing practice. I do not know that there have been very many cases of this character, but there have been instances where the applicant for cancellation voluntarily desired to assume the obligations for the sake of getting the land. The last distribution of seed grain was largely in the south, in the pre-emption area. As the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) well knows, many of those men abandoned the land because of getting into difficulties in other respects, for instance, because of a poor crop, or getting out of their depth financially, or because of indebtedness to implement dealers, merchants, or others. Personally I would not be in favour of throwing that land open and losing money, and the only other thing we could do would be to sell the land outright by public auction, to the highest bidder. It is much better to let them get the land free by assuming the seed grain obligation, rather than put it up at public auction with that obligation as the upset price. In the cases which have come before us so far we have been allowing this to be done. I do not anticipate the difficulties my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) foresees in this regard.

Mr. OLIVER: I am aware that has been the practice in the past, and it is because of the instances which have come to my attention that I have spoken of. The minister has, no doubt, heard of cases where the incoming settler has come forward and offered to take over the land at that price, but he has not heard of the number of cases where the land has lain vacant year after year simply because of the lien against it, which is a condition very much more detrimental to the welfare of the country than the mere matter of the collection of the balance of the money. Of course, I do not wish to see the money lost if that can be avoided, but neither do I want to see the land kept out of production, or settlement deterred, because of this condition. It very often happens that a business man has to take the position that the first loss is the best, and that it is better to close the account, take the loss, and start afresh. This is my view in regard to this matter. It is better not to hold the land out of occupation in the hope of collecting the balance of the lien. I admit there are special exceptions, but they are a very small minority.

In regard to the suggestion that the land should be sold for the purpose of realizing the seed grain lien, I would protest most strongly against any such action, because I think it would create a most unfortunate condition of affairs.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: How does the hon. gentleman expect the Government will obtain repayment of the money it has lent to the farmer on the security of the farm? Does he suggest the Government should relinquish the security?

Mr. OLIVER: Yes. Take the case of a farmer who owns a piece of land which he leases to a tenant on crop payment, and this tenant, by some means or other, finds a means of beating him on the deal. What does he do? He takes the loss and re-leases the land to a man who will produce from it at the first opportunity. He does not hold the land vacant until somebody comes along who will pay him the loss he made through the previous tenant and also assume obligations for the future, which is the position the minister is taking on those abandoned homesteads against which seed grain liens are outstanding. My hon. friend (Mr. Schaffner) would not do it in his own business, and it is not good business for the Government.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: The case suggested by my hon. friend is not a parallel one. I could understand the argument in regard to other debts apart from the Government loan, but in the case of the seed grain lien, for which the land is security, it is practically money belonging to the state.

Mr. OLIVER: Surely.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Holding by husband deemed holding by wife in certain cases:

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will the minister explain that section?

Mr. ROCHE: My experience has shown that the department should be given authority to issue patent for a homestead within three years from the date of entry. In the case of a deserted woman, the department grants her an entry upon proof being furnished of not less than two years' time. In the meantime she is required to make the land—for which her husband held entry—her home and also to keep up the improvements. As the law is now constituted, a woman in this position is not entitled to patent until after the expiration of three years from the date she is granted legal entry. Inasmuch as she is required to make the land her home for two years before being granted entry, it is desirable that the department should have the right to grant her a patent immediately on proof being furnished that she has completed the required six months' residence in each of three years calculated from date of desertion, in addition to the other requirements of her entry. It seems too bad not to allow the time she has spent doing the duties prior to the date of entry in her own name and therefore we desire to issue the patent three years after the date of desertion.

Mr. PUGSLEY: A person might put in five years on the land, or five years might pass, and if he actually put in six months in three of these years he would be entitled to his patent. The amendment is not limited to the case of a wife deserted by her husband; it is general in character and it provides that a patent may issue after six months' residence in any three years, not three years immediately preceding the date of entry. Therefore one might go on the land, be in occupation this year, perhaps spend a month on it next year, then go off to work somewhere else, probably in the United States, come back, remain a little time and the next year after that put in six months, be absent again the following year and the year following that again put in six months. As long as he puts in six months in one of the three years before he applies for the patent he will get it. If this amendment were limited to the case of a wife who was deserted by her husband I could understand the propriety of it.

Mr. ROCHE: Prior to September, 1908, the practice followed under the Dominion Lands Act permitted settlers to count residence in any one of the following ways: (1) From date of entry; (2) from date of commencement of residence either before or after date of entry, or (3) six months' residence in each of three calendar years.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Must they not be succeeding one another?

Mr. ROCHE: I do not think that is compulsory.

(4) Homestead year and calendar year combined, or otherwise shifting the date for the commencement of the term as may be most satisfactory to the settler.

When the Act of 1908 came into force the methods of calculating residence were restricted to the first two.

In some cases a settler, by a technicality is deprived of a portion of his residence, and it is, therefore, desirable that the former method should be re-established, as it is often found that while a settler may not have performed six months' residence, in each of three years, counted from date of entry or from date of commencement of residence, either before or after date of entry, he has performed six months' residence in each of three years, calculated from some other date than is allowed by the Act of 1908.

This is in effect going back to the practice of the department prior to September, 1908, and it is to deal with cases of hardship where a man through some technicality is deprived of his period of residence by reason of not complying with the existing legislation. We thought it was only right to have this amendment to enable us to revert to the old practice.

Mr. OLIVER: I think the amendments go very much farther than my hon. friend has suggested to the committee. Let me compliment the minister on the preparation of the Bill for presentation to the House. It certainly is in very convenient shape for a thorough understanding of its purposes. The explanations and comparisons are very desirable. But, I desire to make a comparison between subsection (b) of the present Act and subsection (b) of the amended Act as they appear in parallel columns. Subsection (b) of the present Act recites that:

> To have resided thereon at least six months in each of the three years from the date of entry or date of commencement of residence.

As it is proposed, subsection (b) will read:

> To have resided thereon at least six months in each of three years.

The difference between the two is that there is no fixed starting point as to residence in the new section while there is a starting point provided in the present Act. One is the commencement of residence and the other is the date of entry. Whichever occurs first is the date that will be taken as the basis of the term during which residence must be performed. There is no other conceivable right under which a homesteader can earn a patent than that of his residence or under his date of entry. When these two definite starting points are abandoned there is an uncertainty in the requirements of residence to be met by the settlers which does not make for the good administration of the Act, for the good settlement of the country, or for the satisfaction of settlers. My hon. friend has spoken of the desirability of there being a greater elasticity in the fulfilment of residence requirements. I agree that it is desirable that there should be some measure of elasticity, that there should be a considerable amount of discretion left to the administration in that particular. But I maintain that for the satisfaction of the settlers themselves, it is in every way desirable that whatever may occur in regard to the completion of residence duties there should be no uncertainty about the date of commencement. The date of commencement should be a fixed date for definite reasons as provided in the present Act, namely, it must be the date either of the commencement of residence or the date of entry. I would certainly urge very strongly that to omit that fixity of date is a very great blemish on the Act as it is proposed and will do incalculable damage in deterring the settlement of the country because in the administration of the land there will be cases of dissatisfaction on account of the different treatment that one settler will get as compared with the other. The success of homestead settlement depends largely upon the confidence that the homesteaders have in the granting of the rights that they earn and in order that there shall be that satisfaction it must be known beyond question what these rights are and when they begin although there must always be a certain amount of discretion left as to the time in which these duties are completed. I consider that the minister is making a great mistake in making the changes which he proposes in the particulars I have mentioned.

Mr. ROCHE: The hon. gentlemen takes it for granted that we are abandoning the two methods in use under the old Act. We are not doing that at all; we are simply adding another option to the terms of residence. Because of cases that have been brought to the attention of the officials of the department in which grave hardships would have been imposed on settlers had the rule been strictly followed of counting the time of residence from the date of entry or the date of the commencement of residence either before or after entry, and in which cases there has been some elasticity in the application of the rule, this amendment has been proposed. We are not foregoing anything, but simply restoring, in addition to the existing options, the condition that existed before the legislation of 1908.

Mr. OLIVER: The minister has a majority and can force the Bill through, and I do not wish to delay its passage. But I point out to him that it was under the provisions of the Act of 1908 that the largest settlement in our history occurred in the Prairie West, and that there was the greatest satisfaction in the relations between the homesteaders and the department. Had there not been such satisfaction there would not have been such extensive settlement. I am not going to ascribe a sinister motive to the minister or to the Administration, but I am going to assert that only sinister results can follow from a condition in which the point of commencement of the rights of the homesteader is left in doubt or in question.

Mr. ROCHE: There is no doubt. Why did not those sinister motives exist prior to 1908 when there was similar legislation?

Mr. OLIVER: I do not wish to rake up past memories, but the provision of 1908 was adopted because, under the Administration that my hon. friend proposes to revert to, there was dissatisfaction, which had been a deterrent to settlement, and I point out that it was under the changes in the Act of 1908 that the great progress in western settlement was made, showing beyond question that the Act had not been made less adaptable to the conditions, but if anything more adaptable. I am not assuming sinister motives, but pointing out the certainty of sinister results; that when the homesteader goes to the land office and asks for his patent and he does not know when his rights begin, they will begin when the Administration say they ought to begin.

Mr. ROCHE: Oh no, they will be published in regulations and sent broadcast.

Mr. OLIVER: This is the Act, this is not a regulation, and the Act provides that the settling of points in reference to men's rights shall depend on the judgment of the department.

Mr. ROCHE: No.

Mr. OLIVER: I shall have to disagree with the minister; that is what the Act says and provides. That is an unfortunate provision and is bound to lead to dissatisfaction and complaint on the part of settlers who have been treated differently from their neighbours, and who will ascribe such varying treatment to sinister motives, where they consider they have had the worst of the deal. I suggest that the minister leave subsection (b) of section 16, where it is today. It will not interfere with the exercise of reasonable discretion in the relaxation of conditions when the patent has to be issued. I say it is bad administration not to make specific provision in the Act so that every man will know exactly when his rights begin.

Mr. ROCHE: To show that there is no sinister motive behind this, I will take the hon. gentleman at his word and place the responsibility on his shoulders for any lack of elasticity in the future. My suggestion of this legislation was in order to make it easy for the homesteader, and to give the department a little more elasticity. At present they have the option of counting residence from the date of entry or from the date of commencement of residence either before or after entry, and my suggestion was simply to add two other provisions. They would be under the same conditions as the other two, only there would be two more options. But the hon. gentleman thinks there is something sinister behind this, and I am agreeable to leave the section as it is.

Mr. OLIVER: I expressly said I did not suggest sinister motives, but I did suggest sinister results.

Mr. TURRIFF: The people I represent are not now much interested in the working of the Homestead Act as practically all patents have been issued for homesteads in my constituency. But I should not like to see the minister drop this amendment.

I think it is perfectly right, as it leaves the homesteader all the opportunities he had before to count his residence from the date of entry or from the date when he went into residence on his homestead. He has all the advantages he has had up to the present, and he has one more opportunity, of getting his six months in in each year for three years. He had not that option before and to that extent, in my judgment, the amendment is to the advantage of the homesteader, and I think it should carry.

Mr. ROCHE: That was the idea.

Mr. OLIVER: I want to say that I probably represent a larger proportion of homestead area than any other member, and in my judgment I would desire that the minister should make the change as suggested.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: Is the argument presented by the hon. member for Assiniboia that it gives the homesteader one more advantage, correct? If it is, for Heaven's sake let us give it to him, he has hard times now.

Mr. OLIVER: It gives the Administration one more opportunity to grant or withhold, with or without cause, and thereby create dissatisfaction amongst the settlers, and retards settlement. It was because of that that the change was made in 1906, and the change was followed by a stupendous success in the homesteading, not only in the volume of homesteading, but in the satisfaction between the homesteaders and the Government. There was no other period in the homestead history of Canada when there was as much satisfaction between the homesteader and the Government as during that period and under that law. All that I am asking is that that provision, which was placed there for good reasons, be continued in the interests of the homesteader.

Mr. TURRIFF: At present, when the homesteader applies for a patent, he either goes to the land office and interviews the official there, or he gives notice, and the homestead inspector comes to the settler. The officials in the land office and the homestead inspector are all well posted as to just how a homesteader can apply for and secure his patent, and I venture to say there is not one case in ten where the homesteader does not consult with the officials and the inspector, and makes his application as prescribed by these officers. Many of the homesteaders do not understand the regulations absolutely, and it comes back to the same thing, that this gives the homesteader one more opportunity and it does not take away one single iota of the advantage that he has at the present time. If the regulation governing what is proposed here is published, I do not see that any official of the department can vary it once it is published.

Mr. ROCHE: Apparently the views of the hon. gentleman from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) harmonize with my own views, and I have as much right to pay attention to the views of the hon. gentleman from Assiniboia as I have to pay attention to the views of any other member of the House. I should like to have his criticism of the section, and also the criticism of other members from the West. I should like to get their opinion on it before consenting to revert back to the former legislation. I have not any strong views myself. I want to do anything I can to aid the homesteader and make it easier for him, whilst imposing the usual duties on him. That is the only object I had in view, and I should like to know just exactly the feeling of the other members from the West with regard to the change I have suggested.

Mr. BRADBURY: I was not in the House when the discussion commenced, but I do not see why the hon. gentleman from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) is objecting to the amended section. I represent a large number of homesteaders, and I have, time after time, realized that the law as it stood militated against the homesteader, and I for one in this House felt that we should do everything we could to assist the homesteader. The changes are simple, giving the homesteader another opportunity of making good and performing his work. I think it would be a policy that would be condemned by the homesteaders all through the West, and by every member in this House, if we proposed to do anything at all that would militate against the homesteader, and I should like the hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) to reconsider his attitude.

Mr. OLIVER: I am unable to find any word in this section that gives the homesteader any right that he does not possess under the previous section, but, by the omission of the words in the previous section, I can see very plainly that those who are in charge of the administration of the law can take away from the homesteader rights which he might very well think he had, and that is something I do not wish to see. I desire to avoid friction between the homesteaders and the Administration, but my hon. friend opens the door for such friction by taking out of the law that provision which does not, and cannot in any way, interfere with the rights of the homesteader to get his patent, and which only establishes beyond question the date and place and circumstances under which his rights begin. That is what he is taking away from the homesteader, and that is what I object to. In the constituency I represent, and in the adjoining constituency, one of the hon. gentleman's officials, a land agent, has twice been a candidate in the provincial election. In another constituency in the neighbourhood one of his timber inspectors has been a candidate, and in the constituency I represent one of his timber inspectors was a candidate at the last provincial election. and was supported in his candidature by one of his homestead inspectors. Under those circumstances, while I am not accusing my hon. friend of sinister motives, he will pardon me if, representing a pioneer community, I have some question in my mind as to taking away from those pioneers the specific right that they shall date the beginning of their right from a fixed point set down in the Act, and make them dependent on inquiry from the homestead inspectors or the land agent, or the timber inspectors, or some other officials of this Government, to find out when and where their rights begin.

4 p.m.

Mr. ROCHE: The hon. gentleman overlooks the fact that there will be no more doubt in the mind of the homesteader under this section than there is at the present day under the old section. This Act is printed and available for any homesteader, and he can read the Act as it will be amended, just the same as he can read the present Act, and the Act gives him the privilege of having four options. He has one option more than provided under the present Act. There is no taking away of any right.

Mr. OLIVER: Would the hon. gentleman read the section of the Act with reference to options?

Mr. ROCHE: I have read it, but I am telling the hon. gentleman that he still has the same right——

Mr. OLIVER: Will the hon. gentleman read that portion of the section which sets out the additional options the homesteaders have.

[Mr. Oliver.]

Mr. ROCHE: The present Act provides that the time shall count, (1) from the date of entry, (2) or from the date of commencement of residence, either before or after date of entry. Now we propose to add to that.

Mr. OLIVER: Where do you add to it?

Mr. ROCHE: We add the words "six months in each of the three years."

Mr. OLIVER: Will the hon. gentleman read the paragraph where he makes that addition?

Mr. ROCHE: This is the explanation and object of the Act as it will be administered. The explanation of this section reads:

(3) Six months' residence in each of three calendar years.

(4) Homestead year and calendar year combined, or otherwise shifting the date for the commencement of the term as may be most satisfactory to the settler.

If this legislation passes it is intended to give these other two privileges in counting the time, in addition to the provision in the existing Act. That is the result of the Act.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend has stated that certain intentions of the department in matters of administration are contained in the Act. They are not contained in the Act, and the omission does not interfere with the additional consideration that he suggests he is so ready to give to homesteaders. He takes away from the homesteader the fixed date upon which the homesteader knows by Act of Parliament that his rights begin, and he substitutes nothing for that, except the statement that he is going to administer the Act in a certain way.

Mr. ROCHE: Section (b) at present reads:

(b) To have resided thereon at least six months in each of three years from the date of entry, or the date of commencement of residence.

The amended section will read:

(b) To have resided thereon at least six months in each of three years.

And that leaves it—

Mr. OLIVER: Entirely in the hands of the department to say when it shall begin.

Mr. ROCHE: Exactly. The hon. gentleman must take it that the Act will be administered by the officials appointed by my hon. friend's (Mr. Oliver) Government in the best interests of the settlers. The officials the hon. gentleman appointed during his regime are still administering this Act.

Mr. OLIVER: I am sorry to say that that is not absolutely correct. I do not wish to enter into an argument with the minister, but that does not happen to be true. The minister has told the House that he is withdrawing from the Act, as it stands, that fixity of right which enables the homesteader to say: I began my residence on a certain day, or I made my entry on a certain day; my rights began then, and under the terms of the Act I am entitled to my patent. By taking out these words, the minister can give or he can withhold a patent just as his officials see fit, and I want to say that in the section I represent, where such a large portion of the people are homestead settlers, this is a serious matter, and when the officials of the minister take the political attitude they do in connection with elections, it makes it a very much more serious matter. I did not wish to bring these matters up, but I am anxious to secure, within the four corners of this Act, the guarantee of the rights of the settlers I represent. I am very much more anxious to get those rights defined in an Act of Parliament than I am to accept the verbal assurance of the minister that his intentions are to give the homesteaders their lands under more favourable circumstances than in the past.

Mr. ROCHE: The hon. gentleman sees sinister results, and it seems strange that in his interpretation of this Act, he sees something that is going to result so disastrously to the best interests of the homesteaders and probably of his own political party. I am not at all anxious to see any legislation passed in this Parliament that can in any way be utilized by any official to the detriment of the homesteader or even to the detriment of the hon. gentleman's political party. If it will meet his views any better, to have the matter more definite, I am willing to incorporate in the legislation itself the four explanations that I have given, and to add to subsection (b) which reads in the present Act:

> To have resided thereon at least six months in each of three years from the date of entry, or the date of commencement of residence.

The other two provisions:

> Or six months' residence in each of three calendar years; or homestead year and calendar year combined, or otherwise shifting the date for the commencement of the term as may be most satisfactory to the settler.

I am willing to incorporate those two provisions within the Act itself, if that meets with the wishes of hon. gentlemen.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not see where the first two provisions that the minister mentions are contained in the Act, but if he does incorporate in the Act those four provisions that he has in the explanations, that will be satisfactory. We shall then know exactly where we stand and it will not then be a matter of discretion on the part of the administration at all.

Mr. CURRIE: I am not very well versed in the homestead law, but it occurs to me that some change should be made in the law or in the regulations so as to assist those returned soldiers whom we expect to take up this land. Those men will have largely to work together as a community.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: Was the hon. gentleman here last night?

Mr. CURRIE: Yes, but this has to do with the homestead regulations as they stand. If the soldier takes up land under the Bill which was passed last night, he is given a loan. Under this Act, however, he has to conform to the regulations as they appear. The law should be relaxed so that the soldier, if he is in a soldiers' community, may not have to reside on his homestead. The soldier may be a married man and on both sides of him there may be unmarried soldiers, and there should be some method by which those men can form a community, and residence on a man's own farm should not be essential, but he should be permitted to operate his farm and have residence within say one and a half or two miles from his farm count as residence. In that way you would have the soldier settlers in communities. Under the old law the settler was compelled to live on his farm and he was not allowed to go two or three miles away to work for another farmer. Under the present conditions of labour, if a homesteader works his farm and does his duty, he should be permitted to put in residence when assisting another farmer in the neighbourhood.

I know cases of young men who have gone out to the West and taken up homesteads and who have put in their three years' residence. By the time they got their patent, they were so sick of the whole thing that they would mortgage their farms and leave the place altogether. That is why there are so many vacant farms in the West. Some provision should be inserted in the Act to prevent men, when they get their patents, from leaving the community and selling out their farms to the loan companies. I know of sections in Upper Canada where farmers took up land years ago and where they still have the titles vested in the Crown. They will not take their title over because they do not want the land mortgaged. The term of residence in the West is altogether too short, and the tendency is for the settler to get rid of the land and to turn it over to a loan company, which will buy it by way of a mortgage for about $2 an acre. The land lies fallow for years and after five or ten years there is a lot of good land unoccupied, and when any one wants to buy it, the loan companies charge $20 to $25 an acre for it. There is too much speculation. The land should go to the actual settler and he should be made to settle on the land. Many young men who took up homesteads three or four years before the war did so in order to get a piece of land, and as soon as they completed their residence and got their patent, they sold the land and left the district. Those are sections of the western provinces in which the people do not want to live continuously daily on their land, and we should have some regulation whereby the soldiers will be permitted to live in small communities and work their land.

Mr. BRADBURY: You do not seem to think the soldier should live on his farm.

Mr. CURRIE: I want the soldier to live on the land, but every settler, for the first two years after he goes out to that country should be given a certain amount of latitude so that he can hire labour to assist him in the improvement of his farm. After those two years are up, and after he has hired help to assist him in getting his land broken up, he should be compelled to settle on the land.

Mr. BRADBURY: The minister has the power to grant an extension of time.

Mr. CURRIE: I go out to the West two or three times every year, and I see thousands of acres of land lying vacant. That is not in the interest of the country. Many Americans and many men from Ontario have taken up homesteads, and after putting in three years' residence and getting their patent, they say: we will sell our homesteads for $800 or $1,000 and get out of the country.

Mr. ROCHE: The Soldiers' Settlement Act under which they can secure 160 acres is separate and distinct entirely from this Act.

Mr. CURRIE: I am quite aware of that.

Mr. ROCHE: After the soldier or any one else gets his patent, the Government has no jurisdiction over what he may do with his own property. You cannot compel a homesteader who has got his title to reside upon his land or prevent him from selling that land. That would be interfering with personal rights and liberties in a way that nobody would tolerate for one moment. The homesteader who has got his title has just as much right to dispose of his property as the man who purchases land.

Mr. CURRIE: All I have to say is that as far as the soldier is concerned I think he will be looking after himself pretty well when he comes back, and any regulations we are making here at this moment will not count for much. The soldier will do what he thinks is right, and he will be represented here by those who will get that done.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: Would the minister consider placing a provision in the Bill allowing entry to be made for soldiers by proxy?

Mr. ROCHE: That is already allowed.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: The reason I ask is that I have received a letter from a young man in a corps now in France, who says that he and his chums all intend to take up land in the Northwest, and they want to be all together. If there is already such a provision in the Dominion Lands Act or in this Bill, I think it will be availed of to a considerable extent.

Mr. PUGSLEY: To my mind it is absolutely clear that the effect of the amendment would be to allow a man who had made entry for a homestead, to take up his duties at the end of two or three or more years if the minister and those representing him chose not to give notice of cancellation. I understand that under the law at present the homesteader must begin his residence duties in the year immediately succeeding the date of entry, and put in six months in each one of the three years.

Mr. ROCHE: If he does not, somebody will apply for cancellation of the homestead entry.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Under this amendment the minister need not cancel the entry, and with all deference to the minister I think that somebody must have had this provision put in with that intention, so that some favouritism might be shown. The minister is not a party to it, of course, but I cannot conceive of a law being framed in such a way as to allow of that being done, unless somebody had the provision put in for that very purpose. If it is intended that the three years residence necessary to enable a man to get his patent payment should begin either on the date of entry or on the day he commences his residence duties we ought to put in the amendment "in the succeeding three years." If we do not do that the homesteader will not know what his rights are, and some homesteaders will be getting their patents five or six years after they make entry, while in the case of other homesteaders certain Government officials might insist that their residence duties must commence immediately after making entry. If the amendment is carried as proposed it is very indefinite and liable to interpretation one way by one set of officials and another way by another set of officials.

Mr. ROCHE: I think it would make the provision entirely too restrictive to adopt my hon. friend's suggestion. There is in the Act at present a provision enabling the Government to cancel a homestead if patent is not applied for within five years. If a man is away from his homestead for more than six months there is always somebody on the lookout to cancel it, and it is very seldom that we do not receive an application for cancellation in such cases.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 4—Issue of patent to disabled volunteer, a British subject or alien ally.

Mr. ROCHE: Section 23 of the Act, as it now stands, enables patent to be issued at once to any homesteader belonging to the Canadian forces who is disabled while on active service. It is desired to extend this to apply to members of the British or allied forces. It is further desired to provide, in case the holder of the land is killed while on active service, that the patent may be issued in his name immediately without the performance of further duties.

Mr. OLIVER: When a patent is issued in the name of a deceased soldier, in what way does the patent reach his heirs?

Mr. ROCHE: Letters of administration have to be secured in the ordinary course.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Supposing a deceased soldier left a widow and no will, would she be entitled to only one-third of the homestead.

Mr. ROCHE: Letters of administration would have to be applied for just as in the case of a civilian.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: Would she get the entire property?

Mr. ROCHE: That is for the courts to decide. The patent would issue in the soldier's name and the widow would no doubt apply for letters of administration.

Mr. McCRANEY: Why are letters patent issued in the name of the deceased soldier? Under the law at present I understand that if the homesteader dies, letters of administration are filed with the department, and the patent issues to the person mentioned in the letters of administration. I do not see that the minister is getting anywhere by this departure from the usual practice, because letters of administration must be obtained in any event. When the minister has received notice of the death of a homesteader, I understand that under the present law letters of administration, or letters probate, as the case may be, are filed and acting on that the minister issues the patent. Under this Act, in the case of a deceased soldier the patent will be issued and registered, and no one can deal with the land until the registrar receives the letters probate or the letters of administration, as the case may be. The whole thing has to be gone through in the same way in both cases, and I do not see why the minister is making this departure.

Mr. ROCHE: The hon. gentleman would prefer the old method?

Mr. McCRANEY: I do not see why you should deal with the homestead of a deceased soldier in one way and the homestead of a deceased civilian in another way.

Mr. CURRIE: Is it a fact that in some of the western provinces the widow of a soldier who dies without making a will does not inherit the property of her husband?

Mr. McCRANEY: I do not know of any case of that kind. In any event the law of the province governs the way in which the property shall be dealt with.

Mr. CURRIE: Is it not true that the Alberta law still holds against the widow? In other words, the children may inherit, but the widow cannot.

Mr. McCRANEY: As I understand it, the widow is entitled to one-third, and the children two-thirds of the property.

Mr. CURRIE: Six or seven years ago, one of my friends told me the first thing he did when he got married was to make his will in order that his wife might inherit his property in Alberta, because without a will the law of Alberta did not permit of the wife inheriting from him.

Mr. McCRANEY: I think my hon. friend is in error. Probably he has in mind the fact that in Saskatchewan and Alberta, until recently, it was within the power of the husband to make a will cutting his wife out of any interest in the estate. This has been changed, I believe, in both provinces.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I am under the impression that under the laws of Alberta if a man dies without a will the wife is entitled to one-third of the estate. I should think the minister would be well advised if in the case of a soldier killed on active service a patent was immediately issued to his wife, because the pension will be probably her only means of support, and that is only a matter of about $384 a year, if she gets the full amount. If she had not the land she would be left in a very precarious position. I think the country would not suffer in any way if a patent were issued immediately under such circumstances.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: Why should it not be so in every case, whether it refers to the widow of a soldier or not?

Mr. OLIVER: This is a special provision in regard to soldier's homesteads, and it differs from the action to be taken in regard to the ordinary homesteader, because the patent is issued without further duties or further responsibility, the idea being to close up the transaction at once in favour of the widow. I think the idea of the hon. member from Strathcona is a very good one, and I would urge that in the special case provided for by this section the patent should be issued to the widow, and that it should not be a matter of letters of administration at all. If she is the widow of a soldier who was a homestead entrant in good standing, the patent should issue to her immediately without any question except as to proof of identity. There is no legal reason why this should not be done. The granting of the homestead is an act of grace on the part of the Government, which has a perfect right so far as authority is concerned, to give the homestead to the widow. Having this right, I maintain it would be a just and proper thing to do, instead of leaving the widow subject to whatever may be the laws of the different provinces in regard to her heirship of her husband's property. It is but fair and just that she should be given the homestead patent, and I think that would be appreciated by our soldiers and their dependents.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: The suggestion made by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Schaffner) is a sensible one. I do not see why we should make a distinction between the widow of a returned soldier and the widow of any other man, and I do not see any reason why the minister should change his plan. I have every consideration for the widow, but I have also some consideration for the orphans, and to my mind there is no reason why the orphans should be cut out entirely. I do not know that a soldier's widow is any better than any other man's widow, and I do not know that you are any more positive she will not abuse her rights, if you give her any special rights, than you are that any other man's widow will not. The only safe way is to leave the property to be dealt with according to the laws of the province in which it is situated. It is true there is some difference in the laws of the provinces. For instance, in the province of Saskatchewan, if a man dies leaving a widow and no children, the widow gets the whole of the property, if there is no will. I understand this is not the case in some of the other provinces.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: It is the same in Manitoba.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: I think the legislatures of the different provinces are thoroughly cognizant with all the phases of the matter, and will deal with it properly. I am willing to grant all the concessions you possibly can to the soldier, but there is no reason why you should make a difference between a soldier's widow and any other widow.

Mr. ROCHE: The practice has been to issue patent to the administrator when an ordinary homesteader died. The reason we have asked the change is because of the requests which have come in from the estates of some of the deceased soldiers, desiring to expedite the issue of patents. We thought there would be less delay in getting matters wound up if we did not wait for the issue of patents until the letters of administration had been secured from the local courts. The patent is issued in the name of the deceased homesteader, and after the administration papers are gotten out the local courts of the province take the matter up.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: Is there a distinction between the widows and orphans of returned soldiers and other widows and orphans?

Mr. CURRIE: My hon. friend is making a mistake in referring to the widows and orphans of returned soldiers. There is no discussion except as to the widows of soldiers who are killed at the front. There is a great deal of force in what has been urged by the hon. member from Strathcona (Mr. Douglas), so that title should issue direct to the widow. Take the case of a widow whose husband has had a farm, and the settlement duties are not completed; she has to get letters of administration before she can obtain title to that property, or before she can have it arranged so that she and the children may acquire the property. In order to get letters of administration somebody must go security for her, or she must go to a trust company and pay a large sum of money out of her estate to get them to put up the necessary security. Of course this is very fine, and makes a lot of work for lawyers—and I like to see them get as much work as possible, because some of them need it—but the property should go to the widow of the soldier without any charge whatever; then she will have an immediate security on which she can raise funds to educate her children.

The wives of deceased soldiers are entitled to every consideration. There will not be very many cases that will come under this law because every soldier at the front carries his will in his passbook and if his body is found the will will also be found. Arrangements are made for copies of these wills being sent to an officer at headquarters. There are very few cases in which soldiers do not make their wills, but in case there is no will in the passbook, or if no passbook is available, I think it would be only proper that the state should give the property direct to the widow and avoid having the widow chasing around to get a lawyer or paying a trust company five per cent to look after the estate. I quite appreciate the remarks of the hon. member for Strathcona (Mr. Douglas). I believe that the wives of soldiers who are at home would very much appreciate it if a concession were made in that regard. I do not think anybody would be hurt by such a change in the law.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON. In case, there are children, they would be cut off entirely.

Mr. CURRIE: They could homestead when they grew up.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: Supposing there were young children they would be cut off. The widow might marry and the children would get nothing.

Mr. CURRIE: My hon. friend is accustomed to police court cases where mothers abandon their children, but the mothers of Canada and the wives of soldiers are not built that way. They will attend to their children.

Mr. DOUGLAS: A case I have in mind is one of a mother with two or three small children. The husband was killed at the front He had a homestead. I wrote to the department to know what disposition would be made of the land and they said that the homestead would go to the heirs of the husband on letters of administration or of probate being taken out. This woman was depending on the farm for her livelihood. Her husband was cut off without any notice and there was no accumulation of savings. The cases of a civilian's wife and soldier's wife are not parallel. I think my hon. friend from Qu'Appelle has not fully considered the matter when he says that soldiers and civilians' wives should be treated the same way in connection with a patent for a homestead. This man to whom I have referred went out to do what he considered his duty to the country. It is to be supposed that if he had remained at home he would not have been killed. The widow is left with two or three small children and under the letters of administration she has to retain that land until these children become of legal age. In the meantime it is a source of expense instead of revenue, whereas, if the patent were issued to herself, she could dispose of the land and use the proceeds for the education of her children and the maintenance of herself until her children were able to take care of her. As the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) says, the cases will be very few and everything should be done to assist the dependents of those who have given their lives for the cause of the country.

Mr. ROCHE: This amendment was introduced at the request of some of the estates of deceased soldiers. There are two alternatives—continuing the usual practice of issuing patents to persons who have taken out letters of administration or issuing them as proposed in this legislation in the name of the deceased homesteader leaving the disposition of the estate to be provided for under provincial law. I am afraid that if we were to issue a patent in the name of the wife a grave injustice might be done to the children. Such a proceeding would practically confer on the department the functions of a court and might land us in difficulties. We have two alternatives—we may stick to the present practice of issuing the patent in the name of the party who has taken out letters of administration or issue it in the name of a deceased homesteader, sending out the patent, and leaving the letters of administration to be dealt with subject to provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. McCRANEY: I see there is a difference between the estate of an ordinary homesteader and that of a deceased soldier where the duties not only of residence but of cultivation are remitted. From the departmental standpoint it would result in cleaning up the books of the department if the patents were issued directly in the name of the deceased soldier but when it went into the registry office it would have to be dealt with under letters of administration.

Mr. OLIVER: I want to say one word on behalf of the widows of deceased soldiers, of the women, whose husbands being homesteaders, have gone to the front. There are differences amongst soldiers and amongst their wives as there are amongst other people. Some are less deserving than others, no doubt, but I want to go on record as holding the view that the wife of the soldier in the large majority of cases, and particularly the wife of a homesteading soldier, is making a sacrifice for the welfare of this country that is entitled to consideration at the hands of this House. In the large majority of cases the married homesteader who volunteers does so because of the inspiration of his wife. It is unthinkable that the married homesteader volunteers contrary to the wishes of his wife. If the woman has made the sacrifice that she has made with regard to her husband for the cause of the country, I claim that she is in an entirely different position from the widow of the ordinary homesteader who dies in his bed under ordinary circumstances. In either case it is pitiable, it is deplorable, but in the one case neither the homesteader nor his wife has made any sacrifice for the public good. They have suffered no disabilities because of any sacrifices they have made. They have used every endeavour that lay within their reach to improve their conditions and to earn the patent of their homestead. The soldier is in a different position. He has offered himself as a sacrifice for his country, he has suffered under conditions inconceivably more terrible than those that the homesteader on his land could suffer and his wife has suffered from conditions such as are almost indescribable. There comes to my mind an item which I saw in a newspaper a few days go relating an incident that occurred amongst the pioneer settlers north of the Saskatchewan, in the constituency of my hon. friend (Mr. White). A homesteading soldier had gone to the front and his wife was carrying on the cultivation of the homestead. She was driving a seed drill, the horses ran and the result was that she was badly cut up—lost an arm and an eye and is disabled for life. That could not have occurred if her husband had not been at the front. The condition of the wife of the homesteader who is at the front is different from that of the homesteader who is remaining at home doing his best to fight the battle of life under the ordinary conditions of homesteading.

Mr. CURRIE: She generally works the land in place of her husband who has gone to the war.

Mr. OLIVER: Many of them have not done so but they have suffered deprivations that entitle them to consideration at the hands of this House. While there may be exceptional cases, I maintain that, on the average, the mother can be even better trusted to care for the children than the father. It is true that sometimes mothers desert their children, as occasionally fathers do, but as a rule, in this country, we trust either the mother or the father, and the one as much as the other, to see that the children are cared for. I cannot see that there would be any detriment to the children if the patent were granted direct to the mother, and I can see a great disadvantage in restricting the mother and children in the full enjoyment of the land, and putting them under expense in merely holding it.

Mr. CURRIE: I might add that I have witnessed several hundred wills made by soldiers, and I think in every case but one the soldier willed all his property and everything of which he was possessed to his wife. I think the law should be such that the department could grant the patent direct to the widow. This would avoid expense and inconvenience to her in having to apply to an official referee every time she wishes to spend money. There is no reason why this should not be the law, unless we believe that the women of Canada have not the instincts of motherhood. I should like to see an amendment to the effect that the title should go to the wife, or that she should be named as administratrix. Otherwise she may have to go to great expense in securing the administration of the estate. I know of dozens of cases in Ontario where women have had to undergo great hardships and to live almost on charity because of provisions in wills that there must be an administrator.

Mr. DOUGLAS: The principle involved in the change suggested is involved in the amendment to clause 16, where in the case of a deserted wife the entry of her husband is granted to her. So I do not think the minister is departing from the spirit of the Act when he grants the patent direct to the wife of a deceased soldier in a case such as that brought to his attention this afternoon.

Mr. ROCHE: I think that there the deserted wife is recognized as the head of the family, and she performs the rest of the homestead duties.

Mr. DOUGLAS: In the explanation it says that the patent shall be granted to her on proof being furnished that she has completed the required six months' residence in each of three years.

Mr. McCRANEY: If I understood the point taken by my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. Currie), the suggestion is, not that the homestead of the deceased soldier shall go to the widow, but that in the case of intestacy, it shall go to the widow, and otherwise to the persons named in the will.

Mr. CURRIE: In case there is no will.

Mr. McCRANEY: Before the department would come to such a conclusion it must have the certificate of the proper Probate Court that no probate has issued and no letters of administration have been granted.

Mr. CURRIE: In the case of a soldier only one signature to the will is required, and on the back of his passbook there is a simple blank form of a will. There is a probate department attached to the War Department here which looks after the estates of deceased soldiers, and ascertains if they have left wills. Probably within three months it would be definitely known whether a soldier had left a will, and if no will had come to light in that time, then his homestead should go to the widow. I am quite willing to trust the widow. Because perhaps one woman in a thousand goes wrong, that is no reason why this Parliament should legislate against the rest of the women.

Mr. McCRANEY: My hon. friend states as a fact that one witness is sufficient for a soldier's will. My recollection is that such a will is good so far as personal property only is concerned, not for the purpose of devising lands. I think you will find that is the case not only in Saskatchewan but in a number of the other provinces.

Mr. CURRIE: I do not think that any provincial law or any law we may make will override the Army Act.

Mr. ROCHE: The Soldier's Settlement Bill provides that the privilege of taking up land is accorded under that Act to the widow of a soldier just as to a returned soldier, and therefore she would participate in the loan of $2,500—as a soldier would, besides having her pension.

Mr. DOUGLAS: The minister should not overlook the fact that the homestead of a deceased soldier is not his homestead, because he has not earned it, and that the department is giving certain privileges to the wives of deceased soldiers inasmuch as they are granted exemption from fulfilling the conditions under which the man got his homestead entry.

Under these conditions, it would only be fair that the department should grant to the wife the complete title to that homestead, as a mark of favour. She is not earning that homestead any more than the man earned the homestead until the conditions are fulfilled, but, in the unfortunate case of the man being killed, the department is lenient enough to grant him the homestead. Why not make the homestead issue direct to the wife?

Mr. ROCHE: There seem to be divergent views in the House in regard to this section. I do not wish to spend all day on it and we can allow it to stand.

Section stands.

On section 5—issue of homestead letters patent to British subject only:

Mr. OLIVER: Perhaps the hon. gentleman would give us a short explanation of the many subsections, and it might not be necessary to read them.

Mr. ROCHE: Provision is made for:

1. Issue of patent in the name of an alien entrant killed in action whether he was a member of the British or Allied forces.

2. Provision for the issue of patent to an alien serving with the British or Allied forces, who has completed his duties but cannot secure naturalization.

For instance, there are some of these men who are perhaps military French reservists, who have completed their duties, but who, by reason of being at the seat of war, are unable to become naturalized because they are not in the country. The hon. leader of the Opposition brought a case to my attention, and under the War Measures Act we took steps to allow the patent to issue. This legislation will affect that person.

Provision is also made for the issue of patent to an alien female homesteader who is debarred from the right to receive patent under the present Act unless she is a British subject. A widow of British nationality, who enters for a homestead in her own right, would cease to be a British subject should she subsequently marry an alien, and, unless her husband then became a British subject by naturalization, she would be deprived of the right to obtain patent for her homestead by the present law. In the same manner, the deserted wife of an alien would be unable, during the lifetime of her husband, or during the continuance of her marriage, to become a British subject, and under the present law she is also debarred from the right of receiving patent for a homestead.

Mr. OLIVER: There are three explanations and six subsections.

Mr. ROCHE: They are all included in that, except that (f) is not a new provision, but is merely transferred from chapter 28 of the statutes of 1914.

Mr. OLIVER: This explanation of paragraph (f) seems to be very lengthy. Could the hon. gentleman state what it is?

Mr. ROCHE: In 1914 the naturalization Act was amended by providing for world-wide British nationality, after five years' residence in Canada. At the present time, in order to earn a patent for a homestead, it is only necessary to put in three years, and then proclaim the intention to become naturalized. The explanation of paragraph (f) is:

Notwithstanding anything in the Dominion Lands Act, chapter 20 of the statutes of 1908, or any other statute, any alien who has not resided in the British Dominions or been in the service of the Crown for the period necessary for naturalization, shall be entitled to obtain letters patent for a homestead in the same manner as if he were a British subject: Provided that he satisfy the Minister of the Interior that in all respects save such period of residence or service he is qualified to be naturalized and declare upon oath his intention to be so naturalized as soon as he has completed such period of residence or service.

2. This Act shall come into operation on the first day of January, nineteen hundred and fifteen.

In preparing the present amendment to section 25 of the Dominion Lands Act, it was thought advisable to include in one section all the cases where naturalization is not necessary before obtaining a homestead patent and therefore chapter 28, above quoted, is being repealed and the wording of it included in the present proposed amendment to section 25 under paragraph (f). This is merely a transfer for convenience in referring to the statutes.

With reference to paragraph (f) it might be stated that during the present war subjects of enemy countries are not allowed to take advantage of this provision, but must submit a certificate of naturalization before patent is allowed.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: Is there any provision for compelling the patentee to carry out his promise and his oath that he will become naturalized, and is there any punishment in case he fails to do so? It seems to me that an alien might sometimes make oath in order to get his patent. Would it be advisable, in the minister's opinion, to have some punishment inflicted upon him, in case he should violate his oath and not carry out his promise?

Mr. ROCHE: There is no penalty for that.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: Is the question of whether there should be a penalty or not worth considering? I merely throw it out as a suggestion.

Mr. OLIVER: I think this section is of sufficient importance to warrant a little discussion. Up to the time of the passing of this law in 1914 it was understood to be the foundation principle of our homestead law that we did not give homestead patent to any man who was not a British subject. That was, I think, our foundation principle, I believe it was a sound principle, and I do not think it should be departed from, if the interest of the country can by any means be otherwise served. When we brought in the Naturalization Act of 1914, requiring five years' residence to secure naturalization, there at once arose a clash between the terms of the Homestead Act and the terms of the Naturalization Act, and, in order to get over that difficulty, this section was added to the Dominion Lands Act, which grants homestead patents to aliens. We can make the homesteader take all the oaths we require, but we do not compel him to become a British subject, because, when he has put in his three years' residence, there still may be reasons why he should not become a British subject, and the great principle at the very foundation of our Dominion Lands Act has been departed from in a most important particular. I should like to know how far the minister has recognized that condition, and in what way he does recognize it, because circumstances have come to my attention where aliens were refused patents, or were unable to get patents, because they were not able to become naturalized. The man had put in his term; he had fulfilled the conditions of his entry, but still he was not able to get his patent, because the department was not willing to carry out the letter of the law, as it appeared on the statute; that is to say, while the law said: "this man is entitled to patent at the end of three years," as a matter of fact he could not get it. Has it been the policy, or is it going to be the policy of the department to grant patents to aliens on the fulfilment of their homestead duties?

Mr. ROCHE: The hon. member is not referring to alien enemies?

Mr. OLIVER: No, to aliens.

Mr. ROCHE: As the hon. gentleman states, since the Naturalization Act of 1915 was passed, we have been granting patents to aliens, and it was provided by an amendment to the Dominion Lands Act that patents would issue upon the declaration of their intention of becoming British subjects. There may be a certain weakness in that in not providing a penalty if a man does not take out his naturalization papers, but I do not know that any cases have occurred in which at the end of five years they have failed to take out naturalization papers. The alternative is that we should issue patent at the end of five years. We did not extend the time because we thought that if settlers had to put in five years' residence and do the duties, before they could get patent, that would probably retard immigration. We decided that the best way to deal with the subject was to issue patents at the end of the accustomed period of three years providing all the duties were done, and providing that the homesteader declared his intention of becoming a British subject. Whether, in the opinion of Parliament, it is necessary that the time should be extended so as not to issue patent until the end of five years, or whether it is necessary to impose a penalty, is of course, another consideration. But even if at the end of thre years we do compel an alien to become naturalized, there is no reason whatever why such person, as soon as he receives his patent, might not dispose of his land to another alien thus leaving the land still in the hands of an alien. If, however, it is considered there is a weakness in the existing Act, I am open to suggestions, as to the best methods of remedying the same.

Mr. OLIVER: I am not criticising from the point of view the minister has indicated, but am stating that in administering this Act during the past several years, the department has apparently, by raising impediments, refused to give to aliens the benefits of the Act. The alien, for one reason or another, was not able to get naturalized, and difficulties were thrown in the way of getting his patent, so that he did not get it. Was that an accident, or did it happen by design? What was the policy of the department in the past, and what is to be its policy in the future? Is it to be the policy that an alien—not an alien enemy—on fulfilment of his three years' duties, may get and will be given his patent?

Mr. ROCHE: Upon inquiry, I do not know of any cases of the nature suggested by the honourable gentleman unless the parties were alien enemies During the war, of course, some difficulties have been thrown in the way of alien enemies. In war time, under the War Measures Act, alien enemies cannot secure patent. I am not aware that the department have thrown any difficulties in the way of aliens securing their patents. If the hon. gentleman can bring any such cases to my knowledge, I shall be glad to have them looked into. It is not the policy of the department to throw any obstacles in the way of aliens securing patents.

Mr. OLIVER: The policy of the department then is that if the alien has fulfilled his duty, and if he is not an alien enemy, he can get his patent. The other position is that the alien has received the material advantage of citizenship, although still an alien. What I want to get at is this: Is there any mutual obligation existing between the alien and the Government on the one part or on the other as a result of this material advantage which the alien has secured?

Mr. CURRIE: This has to do with the Naturalization Act which used to give a man the privilege of becoming a citizen after three years' residence The Naturalization Act which is in force in this country now is virtually a subject of treaty with Great Britain, and it extends the time to five years. I suppose the view of the department was to continue to grant the patents at the end of the three-year period, following the American practice. A man has to put in six or eight years' residence in the United States before he can become a citizen. After he goes to the United States and has been resident there for some time, he can take out what is known as his "intention." He can go before a justice of the peace or some other federal officer and subscribe to a declaration that he intends to become a citizen of the United States, and in that declaration he foreswears allegiance to the country he has left. The federal law will not allow a man to be a captain or to hold a certificate for various things unless he is a citizen of the United States. Some of the States make matters easier. For instance, the state of Michigan declares a man eligible to do everything under the Federal Act, who has made a declaration of his intention and who was a citizen of contiguous territory. That throws the citizenship open to a Canadian. In the state of Washington or some of the other western states, they go so far as to say that if a man makes a declaration of his intention to become a citizen, he is entitled to all the rights of citizenship and can not only hold land but vote. The idea in this Bill is to follow the American practice, and it would enable Americans to obtain title to their land if they made a declaration of intention at the same time as they applied for their land. They will have to put in three years' residence after that before they can become citizens. I do not think this Parliament has anything to do with whether the term of residence for naturalization is to be three years or five. That was settled with the British House of Commons by arrangement. If a man goes through all the same motions as he would before a justice of the peace when becoming a full citizen, he should get his land just as before he could in three years become a citizen and get his land.

Mr. McCRANEY: Are those who declare intention to become citizens of the United States liable to be drafted under the law which has just been put into force there? This question brings up the very point as to whether a person who is an alien and who has not completed his citizenship duties, while receiving the advantages of citizenship, may not, if an alien, be liable to draft.

Mr. CURRIE: I understand that question has been answered in the last day or two in the United States by the statement that they are going to draft all aliens, and if the aliens do not wish to serve, they will be deported. That is a simple method of settling the problem.

Mr. OLIVER: Under this law, the alien gets the benefit of all homestead rights. I understand from the minister very definitely that it is not the intention or part of the policy of the Government to withhold in any degree his homestead once he has earned it according to the terms of the law. He is on an absolute equality with every other man. Am I correct in that?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: Does this declaration of intention make the homesteader subject to obligations to the state other than are imposed on any other alien?

Mr. ROCHE: Obligations as to military service?

Mr. OLIVER: Take that, for instance.

Mr. ROCHE: I should not like to give an opinion offhand on such a delicate point as that. It has never been brought to my attention before, and has nothing whatever to do with the administration of the Dominion Lands Act. I really could not say definitely whether or not he would be amenable to our Military Service Act.

Mr. OLIVER: I think it has everything to do with the administration of the Dominion Lands Act. It is a fundamental principle of the Dominion Lands Act that we do not give our free land to anybody unless and until he is ready to assume all the obligations of citizenship. That was the fundamental principle of the homestead law during all the years previous to 1914, and I want to know if that principle is being absolutely departed from—or is there some saving provision that will protect the public interest in that regard? It is a matter of very great interest to know whether the man to whom we have given all the privileges of citizenship in our power, as regards the ownership of land, renders himself liable, for instance, to military service to the state. Does this declaration of intention bring him under any such obligation in any way?

Mr. McCRANEY: This discussion suggests to me that perhaps we had better revive our three-year citizenship, which was a citizenship as regards Canada only. We have now a five-year citizenship, which is a citizenship in the British Empire. I can see there is a hiatus here between the three years and the five. We may have gone too far in doing away with our three-year citizenship, as regards the imposing of the obligations of citizenship on those who obtain free-grant lands from this country.

Mr. CURRIE: I do not think that can be changed, but the man could take an oath that he would take out his citizenship papers at the end of five years, and he could at the same time obligate himself not to claim citizenship in any country in the meantime. He could take oath that he would be amenable to all the laws of the state, military service included; in other words, he could take oath that he would become a citizen or assume all the obligations of citizenship. Then, if at the end of the five years, he did not take out his papers as he had sworn to do, he could be punishable under the Criminal Code for having taken a false oath.

Mr. McCRANEY: I do not think any court would prosecute a man who in an affidavit expressed an intention to do some act in the future.

Mr. CURRIE: He swears definitely that he will take out his papers at the end of five years; that is taking an oath, not expressing an intention. The oath taken in the United States is very, very rigid. Not only does he declare his intention of taking out papers, but at the same time he foreswears any citizenship that he at that time holds. I have seen lots of copies of the oath of intention in the United States; they can be seen in the Library here. The declaration of intention is a solemn oath that from that minute forward the man forswears—not that he is going to forswear, but forswears then and there—all his privileges as a citizen in any other country, and more particularly, he takes an oath against the sovereign of the country to which he at that time belongs. So it is a most solemn oath. I should think that if a man obtains under false pretenses all the rights of citizenship as regards free land, he could be punished under the ordinary law of the land if he took such an oath falsely.

Mr. THOMSON: I think my hon. friend should study the law before he attempts to lay down legal propositions.

Mr. CURRIE: What is the law on this point?

Mr. THOMSON: I do not think you can prosecute a man for false declaration of intention. I have had some experience myself, and I know positively that you cannot prosecute a man for obtaining anything under false pretenses, if the false pretenses relate to the future. It would be impossible to prosecute a man for obtaining his homestead under false pretenses in the way that my hon. friend suggests. There may be some other way of doing it—and I am merely throwing this out by way of suggestion. It seems to me that rather than go through all the rigmarole suggested by the hon. member for Simcoe, we might better adopt the suggestion of the hon. member for Saskatoon and revert to our old plan of three-year citizenship for this particular case. We might allow Candian naturalization only—not British citizenship—to the person who required it for the purpose of taking out his homestead patent, or we might provide a penalty in case the homesteader failed to take out naturalization papers within a reasonable period after the time set. It seems to me there should be some compulsion on a man who gets the benefits of Canadian citizenship, and refuses to carry out his undertaking to the department given in the agreement conferring on him those benefits.

Mr. ROCHE: There appears to be a weakness in our existing law in that one point. The Act, of course, was passed when no war was in sight. I think perhaps the best way out of the difficulty might be for the man to obligate himself, in the declaration of intention, to discharge the duties of citizenship, and penalties could be provided in case of his failure to do so.

Mr. OLIVER: What is the position in regard to alien enemy homesteaders? I have no doubt that many homesteaders of alien enemy nationality have taken up land and were continuing to take up land until they were prohibited by the order in council in December last.

Mr. ROCHE: Under the order in council, which was passed under the authority of the War Measures Act, no alien enemy is now allowed to secure a homestead entry, but those who had secured homestead entry prior to the passng of the order in council are allowed if, they can get naturalized in the meantime, to secure their patents. We did not think it right, when they had made their entry under normal conditions and according to the regulations, to withold the patent if they could get naturalized.

Mr. OLIVER: I suppose a man of alien enemy nationality would have to reside in the country for five years before he could become naturalized and before he could get his papers?

Mr. ROCHE: Three years, up to the end of this year. There were some who had made entry prior to the passing of that Naturalization Act, and the time will expire at the end of this year.

Mr. OLIVER: Until the passage of the order in council no distinction was made between a homesteader of alien enemy nationality and a man who is only an alien?

Mr. ROCHE: No.

Mr. OLIVER: I wish to be very clear on that point, because I am afraid there have been impediments thrown in the way of such men getting their patents, even after they had fulfilled their duties, and I assumed it was the policy of the department. I did not discuss it with the department, of course, but from the difficulties that were raised it seemed to me that possibly the department had a policy on the subject and did not intend to give patents to homesteaders of alien enemy nationality.

Mr. ROCHE: Not unless they become naturalized.

Mr. OLIVER: Then I am to understand from the minister that the man of alien nationality who entered for a homestead in good faith previous to the order in council prohibiting such entry is treated just the same as anybody else?

Mr. ROCHE: Except that he has to be naturalized.

Mr. OLIVER: The man of alien enemy nationality must be naturalized before he gets a patent, and he can be naturalized on a three years' residence?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes, under the law at present, and up to the end of this year.

Mr. CURRIE: I think it will be news to this country to know that alien enemies can take out naturalization papers here during the present war and become voters. In no other country at the present time is an alien enemy permitted to become a naturalized citizen. In fact, in Great Britain, to take out naturalization papers during the war, subjects an alien enemy to very severe penalties. This is also the rule in practically every other country in the world. The Government should take immediate cognizance of this fact. I understand that under the War Measures Act an order in council was passed to prevent alien enemies from taking out naturalization papers. After the war broke out there was a rush of alien enemies to become naturalized, and the Government should take immediate steps to prevent a continuance of this. I do not think the country should grant any particular favours to alien enemies who are resident in this country simply because they cannot get out of it and go to fight us on the French front, if they are of military age. To grant these men the privileges of colonization and citizenship and the right to vote during the war is an absolute crime, and I protest most strongly against it. It is an insult to the men in the trenches who are fighting against those alien enemies, to think that those aliens can become citizens of this country and be entitled to the same privileges as a Canadian. I will go further and say that if those alien enemies were in their own country they would not be entitled to have the rights of citizenship which they have here. They would not be allowed to vote. If those men of military age now taking up land in our West were in Germany or Hungary, none of them would be entitled to vote, and to say as we are saying now that we are going to make citizens of them during the war, give them votes, and give them land, is a shame, and the men who are to-day fighting in the trenches should know what is being done at home. If these alien enemies had the privilege to-morrow, every one of them would go over and fight for Germany and Hungary. They are all called to the colours, and the only reason they do not go is because they cannot get ships to take them there, and this country would not allow them to go. There is not a British subject in Germany to-day who is permitted to take up land and become a citizen. There is not a man of British origin in Germany who is not interned and whose property has not been sequestrated. Those alien enemies have no rights in this country, except what we accord them as a matter of humanity. I would not like to see them interned, but it is a downright shame to give them citizenship while this war is on and while their hearts are with the enemy and they are organized all over this west country and established in the West to defeat this Government and every one who has taken part in this war.

So far as I am concerned, and I think I speak for the soldier in the trenches, we deeply resent the conduct of the people at home who will pander to these alien enemies and will permit them to take up the rights of citizenship when they are of military age and when they still hold their citizenship in Germany and Hungary, and where there is no law which compels them to forswear their allegiance to those countries. I deeply regret that this country has not seen fit, so far, to take the same action as has been taken by all the other Allies with regard to aliens, and to see that they are deprived of the rights to become citizens during the war. We are at war, and if we do not disturb them or take their property away from them, it is simply because we view these matters with justice. Persons of British origin who owned property in Germany have had their property taken away from them and have been locked up in jail. Dr. Béland, a member of this House, has been treated in that way, and why? Because he happened to be a Canadian. I say again that those men who are colonized in the various constituencies of the West, who are of military age and who are alien enemies, have no right to the privilege of citizenship during the war, and I protest most strongly against this Government or any other Government giving them the rights of British subjects while war is on. I do this feeling that I am expressing the views of the men who are fighting the battles of Great Britain, and Canada, and who are trying to play the game on the square, and who do not like this crooked political game going on in different sections of this country. Our men are giving this country and the Mother Country all that is best in them. They are willing to sacrifice their blood, their lives, and while they are fighting in the trenches in Flanders this country goes on making citizens of Germans and Hungarians who are of military age and who are reservists in the German, Austrian and Hungarian armies. I protest with all my force against that, and I say this House should take action before it closes to see that those of alien enemy birth who have been given the rights of citizenship should be restrained from voting during the war; or, in other words. from putting their arms up against the men who are at the front because there is not one of these men in the West, who, if given the right to vote, would not vote against any candidate who was friendly to this war or to our soldiers. It is all right enough to talk, but I have met these Germans at very close quarters and I know them. I am just as willing to fight the German reservist right here as I am to fight the German soldier on the plains of Flanders. He is most dangerous at home. I protest, in the name of the soldiers at the front, against permitting these aliens to exert any hostile influence on behalf of our enemies. In the name of heaven, what right have these men to raise their hands and use their votes against the men in the trenches as they are about to do? I cannot see any difference between the man across the river, in Quebec, who is against conscription and comes out in the open and says: I want a referendum before conscription is put in force, and the man who sits in this House and says: I will vote for conscription but I want to come back to this House with the votes of the German reservists or the Huns. That is straight talk and it might as well come out here as anywhere else. I believe that I speak on behalf of the man at the front who is ready to lay down his life, and I say that it is an insult to him that this House of Commons should pander to the votes of aliens of this description who are being made British citizens and whose votes for winning the war may overbalance the votes of the soldiers at the front. I call upon this House, I call upon the minister, to see that none of these aliens are granted their land until after the war is over. They would not be citizens in their own country entitled to vote, so we are not taking away from them anything they would have in their own country. Nor, would they be able to take land in their own country unless they belonged to a certain select class. Therefore we are not taking anything away from them in that respect. Many hon. members of this House, who are fond of declaring themselves to be supporters of soldiers and returned soldiers, especially hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of this House, take the stand that these aliens are entitled to take possession of their lands, be naturalized and vote. Those who should be citizens and entitled to take land and vote in Canada should not be alien enemies.

Mr. ROCHE: I did not expect that the Naturalization Act would come up for discussion while the Dominion Lands Act was under consideration. At the present time alien enemies are not allowed to make entry for land in Canada and they have not been allowed to do so since the passage of the order in council under the War Measures Act. The question of issuing naturalization certificates is one that is within the discretion of the courts. Some judges have taken the view that aliens, when they applied for certificates of naturalization, were entitled to have those certificates issued, in the usual order of things, in peace times as in war times. On the other hand, Chief Justice William Meredith took the position that he would not issue a certificate of naturalization during war time. It is a matter of discretion with the judges as to whether naturalization should be conferred upon an alien enemy during war time or not. After this year that will disappear and the Government will have more jurisdiction in the matter. At the present time it remains with the courts to exercise their discretion but under the proposed amendment of the Naturalization Act the judges will refer the matter to the Secretary of State and he will have jurisdiction over the question as to whether a certificate of naturalization shall be issued or not.

Mr. CURRIE: That is all right. I do not wish to disagree with the minister. He states exactly what is a fact, but I still hold that under the War Measures Act that right could have been taken away from the alien enemy and should have been taken away from him long ago. It will be a matter of great surprise to the people of this country to know that alien enemies are being granted lands and are being allowed to become citizens. They are the same alien enemies who are gathering nightly in the little huts and school houses in the West devising ways and means of doing up this country and this Government. We all know that these alien enemies are fighting and plotting not only in this country but in the United States. If you lock them up, if you intern them, they are ready to mob anybody who has anything to do with them. I have seen them in the pens in this country. These alien reservists should not be treated as British subjects during war time. After the war is over, I would be true to the British traditions, I would be the first to wipe away the tears of the widowed German, I would be prepared to deal fairly and squarely with the foe, as Great Britain has dealt with the foe in South Africa; but, during the war, when our best blood is being shed, when the country is struggling in death grips, and when, possibly, in the next two or three weeks, we will have to decide in an election whether the support of this country is going to be given to our brave men at the front or whether we are going to have a damper put upon it by the alien enemy in this country, I am firm in the belief that the rights of British citizenship should not be accorded to those who would use those rights to our disadvantage. That order in council should pass now, and the practice of according the rights of citizenship and voting to alien enemies of military age should stop. I protest most vigorously against it. Every man who has returned from the front will be of the same opinion. I feel that in speaking as I do, I am only representing their views. I believe that I am also representing the views of the men in the trenches who know the cowardly enemy that they have to fight at the front. The Germans fight us unfairly without any judge or referee to see that fair play is dealt out. Many men who have taken up land in the Canadian West are now fighting our men in the trenches. A great many of them have been taken prisoners, and we know this. Many of the men who are still in the West would do the same thing, and if they are not doing it, it is simply because they could not get ships or the right to go over. If they could get ships and the right to go, they would go to-morrow to fight against our men in the trenches. Under these circumstances, what are we going to do? Are we going to have in this House after the next election thirty-five or forty members who owe their election to the votes of these Hungarian and German reservists who are now given British citizenship, and who will outvote our soldiers at the front? This House should put a stop to that. I think I speak for the men in the trenches when I say that they will not support any man or party who is pro-German in so far as this House is concerned. Any member of Parliament who stands up and says that these German reservists in the West are entitled to become citizens now and to vote at the next election, will not receive my support, and he should not receive the support of any Britisher in this country.

Mr. TURRIFF: There is a great deal in what my hon. friend (Mr. Currie) has said that I do not agree with. We invited people to come to this country from different countries of the world. A great many Austrians, Galicians and Germans came into Canada. They came on our invitation and on our agreement that if they did certain things we would do certain things. They were promised that if they came in they would be allowed to get a quarter-section of land as a homestead on a payment of $10 entry fee, and that if they lived on the land for six months each year for three years and applied for their naturalization papers, they would get their naturalization papers, become British subjects, Canadian citizens, and would also get the patent for their land. I do not believe that the fact that war has been forced upon the world by the ruler of one of the countries from which these people come is a sufficient reason why Canada should adopt the German principle and make a treaty, of a bargain, simply a scrap of paper to be burned up whenever it suits one's purpose to do it. The Austrians, the Galicians, the Polanders—the bulk of those people would not go back if they could go back; you could not force them to go back. They came away from these countries to avoid being conscripted and forced into war whether they wanted it or not. That does not apply to the same extent to the Germans; I agree that some of them would go back. But a very considerable number of Germans from the West are to-day fighting in the Canadian ranks, on the Canadian side. When I was in the West within the last month, I came across one man who was born in Germany, who has been out here for a number of years, a man 33 or 35 years of age, married and with a family of children. This man's father and mother are in Saskatchewan. His mother cannot speak any English, and his children cannot speak any German. That man's two younger brothers enlisted in a Canadian regiment in the town of Oxbow, and they are in the trenches to-day fighting for Canada and for the British Empire. I ask any member if he would disfranchise these men and their brothers and their fathers. There are many such cases. I saw a statement some time ago that six per cent of the voluntary enlistments in Canada were foreigners. I do not mean to say that six per cent of them were foreigners from enemy countries, but a very considerable percentage were. I know quite a large number in my own constituency, of Germans and Austrians, Germans chiefly, who have gone to the front with Canadian regiments. It is quite probable that it is advisable now to so change the law that men from these countries will know that if they come into Canada they will not have the same privileges as they would have had if they had come earlier. But to enact a law now that shatters the arrangement we made with them, that goes back to our agreement with them, I think would be very poor policy. We hear a great deal in this country about living in harmony and about conciliation—well, well, that is not the way to bring that about. If Great Britain had taken that stand in South Africa we should not have had South Africa to-day as one of the strong pillars of the Empire. The one thing that has made Great Britain the greatest colonizing power in the world is that she has treated people from all parts of the world well and fairly, and has carried out her agreements with them, whatever those agreements may have been, and I do not think the Government would be justified in breaking an agreement that they made with these people who happened to come from countries with which we are now at war.

Mr. CURRIE: I will answer the hon. gentleman in one or two words. He, in common with a great many others who are pandering to the pro-German vote in the West are going about this country saying: Oh, we made an agreement with these poor people; they come under a special agreement with the Government, and we must do this and that for them; it does not do to break an agreement. I want to tell the hon. gentleman that, so far as civil contracts are concerned, there is not a contract in this country with an alien enemy that holds during the war. That is the law. Why should we place a weapon in the hands of these men in the West, as we are doing day by day, whereby they are going to strike down the men in this House and those people in this country who are sending their sons and brothers to this war? There is no law that I have ever been able to discover, international or otherwise, that justifies a course of that kind. I am very pleased that the hon. gentleman got up in his place to defend pro-Germanism in the West. I am sure that I, in common with a great many other people in this House, are not being very greatly amused, but very greatly alarmed, at the extent of the movement that has recently been organized in Canada for the purpose of destroying the historical Conservative party and putting in place of that party a so-called Unionist party. Does this new party hold the same views as the hon. gentleman?

Mr. LEMIEUX: May I—

Mr. CURRIE: I beg your pardon. Let me speak and after I have finished the hon. gentleman can make a speech if he pleases. I was going to say a great movement is organizing, with many newspapers subsidized from one end of the country to the other to bolster up a Union Government. We will all welcome a Government of any kind in this country, call it what you like, that will end this war one day sooner, or save one life, but I, in common with others who have done a little bit for the war, dread that this may be a wooden horse that has been saddled and prepared, inside of which we may find something like 40,000 or 50,000 pro-German votes in the West which are going to send down forty or fifty members to support us in this House in carrying on the war. I cannot see anything like win the war in that. I say that, so far as I am concerned, as a soldier I denounce any attempt to pander to these Germans in the West, and that any man who stands up in this House or on the hustings in this country to advocate that these Hun reservists should have votes or should have any rights except those of minors is deserving of condemnation. They should not have the full rights of British citizens during the war. I say without any reservation that I have no confidence in any man who stands up in this House and says that they should have those rights, nor in any man who is a supporter of a propaganda in this country to win the war, for which apparently there are millions of dollars. May I be permitted to suspect very much where that money is coming from. Why, pray, should any British gold be spent to get German votes in the West to send members to this House? What is the object? When the hon. member went to the West years ago there was one tribe of Indians up there called the Blackfeet, and often when they were on the warpath they turned their snowshoes so that if a scout of the enemy ran across their tracks he would think they were travelling in the opposite direction to that in which they were going. I have travelled long enough in politics in this country not to be deceived when any individual or parties turn their snowshoes.

Mr. OLIVER: I wish to correct the hon. gentleman—the Blackfeet did not use snowshoes.

Mr. CURRIE: What did they use?

Mr. OLIVER: Ponies.

Mr. CURRIE: It was the ponies, I acknowledge it. Perhaps it was another tribe that used to turn their snowshoes and so try to deceive people as to the direction in which the warpath was being taken. That cannot go on in this country. No win the war party can pander to the votes of Hun reservists, and I say this so far as my party is concerned, even if I speak alone, and so far as any man in the Liberal party is concerned who wishes to see the war end, I say it is our duty to take cognizance of everything peculiar that is going on and to stand to our arms to-day in defence of this country and our soldiers, and in condemnation of those who stand up in this House or elsewhere and support the Germans voting in this country or having the right to be made citizens of this country or of exercising any political influence during the war.

Mr. TURRIFF: My hon. friend need not undertake to lecture me in this House. I am supporting the war as much as my hon. friend is, and the Germans of my constituency will support me in supporting the war. There are not many in my constituency, but those that are there will support the war. I have Germans in my constituency who went across with the first contingent to fight for Canada; and they are fighting there still.

Mr. CURRIE: I want to tell the hon. gentleman that every German who went over with the First Contingent, and I believe every man of German birth who has yet gone over, has been detained in England or else has been sent back here. With very few exceptions, unless they had the special permission and authority of the minister, they were not allowed to go to the front. There are no men of German birth in the trenches. I know of only one man of German birth from Canada who entered the trenches, and he was a young man from Stratford, Kahn, or from that district. To tell me what I know is absolutely not right and absolutely not true—that these men of German birth, German reservists, are sent over to the front to fight in the trenches—it is inconceivable: they cannot get within twenty miles of the trenches. The hon. gentleman says that, because there is an exception, because a few of these men have gone over to England where they are under observation, we should take the whole lot of these reservists to our bosom, and all that sort of thing—and let them vote. We have the evidence plainly before us in the late provincial election that, in the province from which he comes, every one of these Huns has his knife out for the Conservative party and the win-the-war party. He cannot stand up and tell me otherwise, because I know it, and I say it is no reason, because some Germans have enlisted and gone over to the war—because there are two or three exceptions of that kind—that we should shut our eyes. A few exceptions do not prove the case. In fact, the hon. gentleman gave his own case away when he said the Germans would go over and fight against us if they had a chance. Still he wants them to vote against our soldiers. There is no distinction in this country between Germans and Hungarians. We now learn with astonishment that if a German has resided for three years in this country he can get his citizenship papers and vote at the next election. I appeal to hon. gentleman of this House: do you think it is fair and right to our soldiers? Do not you think it is an insult to the men you have sent to the front? If you do this, you will put it in the hands of German alien enemies to snipe our soldiers in the back. That is what they will do.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I was going to say to my hon. friend that, although the hon. gentleman from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) does not hold exactly the same views with regard to the measure passed the other day in this House as I do, I resent, as every hon. member in this House should resent, the insinuation of my hon. friend (Mr. Currie), when he said a moment ago that the member for Assiniboia was defending pro-Germanism in the West, when everybody knows that his son died for the cause a few months ago. I hope the hon. gentleman will withdraw.

Mr. CURRIE: I saw a wounded German-Canadian come back to this country, and I have seen his father, a German, deny him admission to his house. The son, if alive, would disown him.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The hon. member for North Simcoe is a gentleman, and I think he should withdraw the statement he made with regard to the hon. gentleman from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff).

Mr. CURRIE: It is my word against the word of the hon. gentleman from Assiniboia. I say he is supporting the German party, the Hungarians and the Germans of the West, in this House, and that he stands for them, and that he thinks they should have the same citizenship and rights as the Canadian who is fighting in the trenches, and I say he is wrong and the people will not support him.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The hon. gentleman said that the hon. member for Assiniboia defended pro-Germanism, which is quite a different thing.

Mr. NESBITT: I am glad the hon. member for North Simcoe said there were some exceptions, because I was going to tell him that I knew one who, not only was in France, but was severely wounded, and was just as brave a young fellow as ever stood in clothes.

Mr. CURRIE: And those very men would be the first to vote for and support what I suggest.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

SUPPLY.

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Excise—Salaries of officers and inspectors of Excise, and to provide for increase depending on the result of excise examinations, $581,-318.75.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will the minister explain the increase of $5,442.50?

Mr. SEVIGNY: It is due to statutory increases.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How many excise officers has the minister in the district of Montreal and how many in the district of Quebec?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Thirty-five to forty in Montreal and ten to fifteen in Quebec.

Mr LEMIEUX: I should think there was a larger number of officers both in Montreal and in Quebec. How many inspectors of excise are there?

Mr. SEVIGNY: We have only one inspector in the district of Montreal and one in the district of Quebec.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Have any new appointments been made recently in those two districts?

Mr. SEVIGNY: We have recently appointed four new officers in Montreal—four returned soldiers.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What are their names?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Mr. Barbeau, Mr. Gariepy, Mr. Gallaher and Captain MacKay Papineau.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I have lately read a very severe arraignment of a new patent medicine which is largely advertised in Montreal and Ottawa papers. The name of the medicine which everybody has seen advertised in the papers is Tanlac. In this criticism it is stated on good authority—I do not accept it as being true, because I do not know myself—that this Tanlac is nothing but a substitute for liquor; that it contains a very large percentage of alcohol. It is being very severely criticised by the friends of temperance. I do not know whether I read this arraignment in the organ of the prohibitionists or not, but I suppose the attention of the minister has been called to the matter. If Tanlac is really nothing but a substitute for alcohol, the department ought to look carefully into the matter and see that no such medicine is offered for sale, especially in provinces, counties or cities in which the sale of liquor is prohibited.

Mr. SEVIGNY: No representations have yet been made to the department in regard to that patent medicine, but the department will certainly take the remarks of my hon. friend into consideration.

Mr. PROULX: Are all proprietary medicines analysed in the department?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Some of them are, but not all.

Mr. PROULX: I thought a law was passed some years ago compelling manufacturers of proprietary medicines to give their formulæ?

Mr. SEVIGNY: It is still the practice. Every proprietary medicine should be registered with the department, and if it is not registered an analysis of the medicine must appear on the label.

Mr. BOIVIN: Will the hon. minister give us the names of the employees who were dismissed to make room for the four returned soldiers whose names were given to the committee?

Mr. SEVIGNY: None were dismissed.

Mr. BOIVIN: I understand then the amount of $5,442.50 is to pay the salaries of these new employees?

Mr. SEVIGNY: No.

Mr. BOIVIN: How are their salaries provided for?

Mr. SEVIGNY: From the contingent account.

Mr. BOIVIN: Can the minister give us any idea how it happens that, after the excellent temperance legislation which was put into effect by this House at the instance of the Minister of Justice last year, doing away with the consumption of liquor in seven or eight of the nine provinces, it is now necessary to have more employees to inspect the output of the distilleries than were necessary before this legislation came into force?

Mr. SEVIGNY: As my hon. friend knows, we have no prohibition in the province of Quebec.

Mr. GRAHAM: You have, after nine o'clock.

Mr. SEVIGNY: After nine o'clock, yes. It is not improbable that having prohibition in other provinces the liquor trade in the province of Quebec has increased.

Mr. BOIVIN: Does the minister mean to tell us that there is more liquor consumed in the province of Quebec now than there was heretofore?

Mr. SEVIGNY: That is not what I said.

Mr. BOIVIN: Does the minister mean the trade has increased? Has the number of distilleries in the province of Quebec increased?

Mr. SEVIGNY: No.

Mr. BOIVIN: Has the number of distilleries in any other part of Canada increased?

Mr. SEVIGNY: No.

Mr. BOIVIN: Has the output of distilleries increased?

Mr. EDWARDS: Is it not the case that even in provinces where prohibition is in force the distilleries are engaged in the manufacture of alcohol for munitions purposes?

Mr. GRAHAM: Were any of those officers employed in Hull?

Mr. SEVIGNY: No. They were employed in Montreal.

Mr. BOIVIN: Can the minister tell us from the excise figures whether the consumption of alcohol or of alcoholic beverages manufactured in Canada has increased during the past year? He surely must have the figures from the department.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I understand the trade has diminished slightly during the last three months.

Mr. BOIVIN: And, with the trade diminishing, and this Government preaching economy, it is appointing other employees where they are not required, to do work that was done by a smaller number of employees when the output of the distilleries was greater. Although the minister admits the traffic is diminishing, still the Government is increasing the number of employees, and at the same time preaching economy. Will the minister explain why those extra men were appointed?

Hon. Mr. SEVIGNY (translation): Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend knows that the city of Montreal is the largest in the Dominion, and it is in the Montreal district that my department collects the bulk of its revenue; I will go further, almost half of its revenue comes from the Montreal office. I may add that Montreal's liquor trade has increased substantially on account of the material increase in the shipments to the province of Ontario.

Mr. BOIVIN (translation): Montreal shipments to Ontario?

Hon. Mr. SEVIGNY (translation): Yes.

Mr. BOIVIN (translation): Can the hon. minister tell me whether the Ontario distilleries have ceased doing business?

Hon. Mr. SEVIGNY (translation): Two of them have shut down.

Mr. BOIVIN (translation): And the others which have no right to sell in their province ship liquor to Montreal and, under the frendly eye of the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) these beverages are sent back into Ontario.

Hon. Mr. SEVIGNY (translation): I cannot tell my hon. friend what is going on, but I have heard the wine and liquor dealers of Montreal say that they were doing quite a large business with Ontario.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Although the province of Quebec has not adopted prohibition, it is well known that the number of licenses has been decreased materially within the last five years. During the past year there has been a still greater decrease on account of the very severe policy inaugurated by the Gouin Government. In Montreal and in Quebec the number of licenses has been decreased as the result of new legislation. Outside of four or five large centres in the province there are no licenses. If you travel on the Intercolonial from Levis to Matapedia and from Matapedia to Gaspé, you will not find a single licensed establishment. There is one license at Gaspé, but it is not a license to serve liquor over the bar. Between a province that has adopted prohibition and my own province, which is on a fairly temperate basis there is not a very material difference, because I am pleased to say that in the province of Quebec within the last ten years the movement in favour of temperance has been so well managed by the churches and by the Government that almost every municipality is under temperance legislation. I might mention as instances the city of Three Rivers, the city of Joliette, and the city of Hull, where a vote was taken lately. One can see the wave in favour of temperance. People have decided that they will eventually banish the bar. Treating has been abolished in Montreal——

Mr. GRAHAM: And in all Quebec.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes, that is so. The step was especially important in the city of Montreal, because it has a population of about 700,000.

Mr. BOIVIN: The minister said that two of the large distilleries in the province of Ontario had been closed?

Mr. SEVIGNY: That is my information.

Mr. BOIVIN: Will the minister tell us what has become of the employees who were attached to those distilleries? Are they still drawing salaries from the Government?

Mr. SEVIGNY: We are reducing the staff every day.

Mr. BOIVIN: I understood the minister to say that nobody had been dismissed.

Mr. SEVIGNY: In Montreal.

Mr. BOIVIN: Have they been dismissed elsewhere?

Mr. SEVIGNY: When they are no longer required, their services are dispensed with.

Mr. BOIVIN: How many employees have been dismissed?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Four employees have recently been dismissed in Ontario because their services were no longer required.

Mr. BOIVIN: Four employees have been dismissed in Ontario recently, and four have been added in the province of Quebec, and yet there is an increase in salary of $5,442.

Mr. SEVIGNY: This increase is not on account of new employees, but on account of the annual statutory increases.

Mr. BOIVIN: Do the employees of the Department of Inland Revenue ever die, or are any of them ever dismissed from the service? I have been in this House for six years, and every year since this Government has been in power there has been an increase in the estimates, under the head of excise, of about $5,000 on account of statutory increases. I should have thought that when the older employees leave the service through death or otherwise, the new men taken on in their places would be started at lower salaries and that there would consequently be a decrease in the amount required for statutory increases. In the ordinary course of nature the older employees must gradually be leaving the service, and new employees added. The expenditure incurred by this department is continually growing, although the revenue is decreasing. The minister tells us that the distilleries are being closed, that there is less liquor being consumed in Canada as a whole, yet in spite of this decreasing revenue the expenditure increases—and this at a time when the Government is preaching economy and imposing taxes. If the minister can explain this perpetual increase I shall be obliged.

Mr. SEVIGNY: The increase on account of salaries is very small, but the increase in the revenue is very large. In excise alone we have an increase of $1,000,000 this year.

Mr. BOIVIN: If the consumption of liquors has been decreased, where does the increase in revenue come in?

Mr. SEVIGNY: There is a decrease of about $200,000 on the liquor traffic, but there is an increase of $1,000,000 on tobacco.

Mr. BOIVIN: Is it not a fact that the increased returns from tobacco are due to the special war taxation which was imposed upon tobacco during the first year of the war? I think the minister knows well that the excise duties upon tobacco, cigars, cigarettes and every other form, were increased by the Minister of Finance. That extra taxation is collected, I understand, by the same employees who collected this taxation before the increase of about 10 per cent. If there is an increase in the excise duties upon tobacco, it is due to the fact that the duties are higher. Why is it that extra employees are put on to collect the extra money coming in from this source?

Mr. SEVIGNY: The increase in the excise returns upon tobacco is not due to the higher duties but to the increased consumption.

Mr. BOIVIN: Is it not a fact that the duties upon tobacco are higher than they were three years ago?

Mr. SEVIGNY: The duties were increased in 1915.

[Mr. Boivin.]

Mr. BOIVIN: Is the increase just mentioned by the minister an increase over the consumption of last year or over the consumption of 1915?

Mr. SEVIGNY: It is an increase over the consumption of last year.

Mr. BOIVIN: How much of an increase?

Mr. SEVIGNY: The increase is $975,000 on all sorts of tobaccos, cigars, cigarettes, chewing tobacco, etc.

Mr. BOIVIN: Has the minister any idea on which form of tobacco the increase has been the greatest?

Mr. SEVIGNY: I cannot say offhand, but I shall be only too pleased to let my hon. friend know if he will come over to the department to-morrow.

Mr. BOIVIN: What has been the decrease in the revenue upon alcoholic beverages?

Mr. SEVIGNY: About $200,000 for the last fiscal year.

Mr. BOIVIN: Is the number of employees the same as the year previous?

Mr. SEVIGNY: The number in Ontario has been decreased and the number in Quebec increased.

Excise—For extra duty-pay at large distilleries and other factories, $16,000.

Mr. SEVIGNY: Officers, not only of my department but of every department, are entitled to extra pay for overtime, and that accounts for this item.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I suppose officers of the department are doing extra work at the large distilleries which are turning out alcohol for the Imperial Munitions Board? Last winter I was at Renfrew, and saw the very large plant that is distilling alcohol there for the board. I suppose you would have an officer there, for instance?

Mr. SEVIGNY: We have one officer in each of these establishments.

Preventive service—Contingencies, $15,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What are the contingencies?

Mr. SEVIGNY: This amount is required to pay the salaries of our preventive service officers. The service has been reorganized and rendered more effective within the last year and a half.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How many officers are there?

Mr. SEVIGNY: About 150 all over Canada.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister will remember that when his Estimates were last before the House he promised to give us an explanation in regard to the increase of $142,000 under Excise, $26,000 under Weights and Measures, and $10,000 under Adulteration of Food.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I have the explanation here and when we reach these items I shall be only too glad to give the information.

Mr. MACDONALD: There seems, apparently to be a new system of grouping these items. We have only one item under the heading of "excise," while in the estimates as formerly brought down, there was a separate resolution for each one of these items. Why is the minister asking for $54,000 more this year than he asked for last year?

Mr. SEVIGNY: This fund of $101,000 was created last year, and voted in the Estimates for the year 1916-17, for the purpose of bringing under one service all the preventive officers of the different branches of the department. Most of our preventive officers were temporary employees, who had been paid up to the moment of their permanent employment, out of the contingencies account of the excise, weights and measures, and food branches.

There have been appointed to date, in that service, about 106 preventive officers, who had been on the temporary list of officers for several years past, some as long as fifteen years. The average salary of these officers is to $950 per year; therefore, the sum necessary to pay them reaches $100,700.

This service is still in the course of organization, and there are still about sixty-four temporary officers, receiving a total salary of a little over $51,000. A large proportion of these officers will be appointed permanently in the near future, to complete the organization, and a certain number will be dismissed as excise work diminishes on account of prohibitory laws.

Nearly all these are temporary officers. Most of these temporary officers are, at present, employed in the Excise Service. It has been the policy of the department to transfer these officers to the preventive service, when they can be spared from excise.

The department has under consideration at present, the project of embossing promissory notes, checks, etc., with the two-cent stamp, free of charge. At present these commercial instruments are embossed by the British American Bank Note company, at the cost of $1 per thousand, when an order is above 15,000, and $1.50 per thousand, when under that figure, with a minimum charge of $5. The Banker's Association claim that they should not be called upon to pay the cost of embossing the checks, any more than the consumer is called upon to pay the printing of the war stamp. The department is inclined to favour the request of the Banker's Association. If the project is brought into practice, it will be necessary to purchase five or six embossing machines. Each machine will have to be manned by an officer skilled in the work of this nature, and additional employees, besides the operator, will be necessary. The salary required, under that heading, would probably amount to about $15,000. As this is an entirely new undertaking for the department, it has been thought advisable, for the present, to pay the salaries in connection with this additional staff of the stamp branch of the department, out of this preventive service fund. Therefore, the $54,000 of an increase, under this heading, is to cover the payment of the additional permanent preventive officers to be appointed, and also the salaries of the new stamp staff.

That this new preventive service has proven effective is apparent by a comparison of the revenue from the war stamp duty, and from the excise duty on tobacco and cigars. The preventive service within the last two years was instructed to see to a strict application of the tobacco laws and regulations, a matter which had received but little attention in the past.

Moreover, after the Special War Revenue Act was introduced, the department undertook a campaign of education, which lasted several months. Then it became evident that this law was being violated by a very large number of druggists and merchants, without any excuse whatever, and the discovry of violations of the law.

In comparing the figures below, with regard to the revenue from tobacco, one must take into consideration that the enlistment of 400,000 men has taken away from Canada, a large number of tobacco consumers; also that the department has consented to give to the soldiers in training, or going overseas their tobacco duty free, at a loss of revenue to the extent of four or five hundred thousand dollars, for each of the last two years. Notwithstanding all this, the revenue from tobacco has increased, thanks to a better and stricter observance of the tobacco laws, through the agency of our preventive service, as may be readily seen by glancing at the following figures:

Tobacco Revenue.

Revenue on tobacco for	1915-16..	$10,222,783.78

Mr. BOIVIN: Is it not a fact that the increase the minister has just mentioned in the war tax on patent medicines is due to the fact that when this tax was first put into operation the department had no stamps printed, and the revenue from that branch was included in the receipts of the Post Office Department because postage stamps were used?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Our stamps were printed within two months of the passing of the Act.

Mr. BOIVIN: Is it not a fact that the war tax stamp is more generally used now and is better known than it was two years ago?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Yes, because the preventive service of my department has seen to the application of the law.

Mr. BOIVIN: So that this large increase in expenditure has been for the purpose of making people buy war stamps instead of postage stamps to put on patent medicines?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Oh, no.

Mr. BOIVIN: The minister told us that $101,000 which was set apart in the Estimates for 1916-17 for this service had not been sufficient and that there was a balance of some $35,000 or $40,000 which he had been obliged to take last year out of another fund to pay for this service.

He was requested by the hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) to explain exactly how this money had been appropriated, and he promised that he would give this information on the items of Preventive Service and War Stamps. I think this would be the proper time to say where that balance was obtained and how it was appropriated to this service.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I have a memorandum about this matter. This item for 1914-15 was $151,000. It was reduced the next year by $21,000, and left at $130,000. It was still further reduced last year by $70,000, and left at $60,000.

Mr. BOIVIN: I was referring to the item immediately preceding the one with which the minister is dealing. I would like to know where the minister got the money to pay these employees.

Hon. Mr. SEVIGNY (translation): For many years, for over fifteen years, there were in the department temporary employees who were paid from the contingent fund. When the House passed the new Act to increase the revenue, we availed ourselves of these temporary employees to educate the people, to look after the proper administration of that Act, and we have come to the conclusion that it would be clearly in the interest of the department to retain this staff who were performing such a good service and so, instead of keeping them on as temporary, the department intends to appoint them as permanent employees. In the past, they were paid from the contingencies; in the future, they shall be paid from this sum of $155,000 which we ask for this year. Last year, we asked $101,000 for the temporary clerks whom we have made permanent. We still have fifty temporary employees. We intend transferring several of these clerks to the permanent staff, and it is for that reason that I am to-day asking the House a sum of $155,000, in order that this staff of permanent officials be paid out of this same item.

Mr. BOIVIN (translation): I quite understand the hon. minister's remarks, only he is not answering my question at all. I asked the hon. minister if that service had cost him more than $101,000 last year, and if that service has not cost him more than $101,000 last year, why should it cost $155,000 this year? He answers the second portion of my question by saying that he intends making the temporary clerks permanent and paying them larger salaries.

Hon. Mr. SEVIGNY (translation): I did not say that. Not a larger salary and from this amount of $155,000.

Mr. BOIVIN (translation): But when the Estimates were before the House, on June 15, the same hon. minister told us that there had been an error in making the estimates last year, and that this amount of $101,000 last year had not been large enough to pay these employees, that it had cost $155,000, that he had been forced to take the money somewhere else, without telling us where he had taken that money, and that is the explanation we would like to have to-night.

In order to refresh the hon. minister's memory, he has stated, on page 2479 of the Hansard, unrevised edition:—

Mr. Sevigny: I am informed by the officers of my department that last year an error was made by the accountant of the department in making an estimate of $101,000, and that we have had, on account of that error, to make an expenditure from the War Fund. It is to meet the exigencies of the service that we ask for $155,000 this year.

Now, a debate ensued in the House. The hon. minister has not been able to satisfy the Opposition members as to the right he had to take that money from the War Fund to cover an error, to make up a deficit in the amount entered in last year's Estimates, by reason of an error made by one of the officers of his department. He promised to give us some further explanation; to-night he tells us more employees are needed this year, or if more are not needed, that some temporary ones should be appointed as permanent and to pay them under a new heading, if you may so call it. That portion, if I understand it right, refers to the coming year, but it is the explanation as to last year that is not yet given us and that we would like to have.

Hon. Mr. SEVIGNY (translation): As to the explanation for the last year, here it is: Last year, we had an amount which had been voted us and which was not adequate to pay the employees on duty in my department. Seeing that we were without sufficient funds, that we needed revenue as it was impossible to leave unpaid those working for the department, as it was impossible to discharge them, we have sought some means to pay them.

After consulting the Auditor General, the latter authorized us—the department—to pay them from the War Fund. I have used the expression "War Fund" because the $125,000 item in the estimates is called the "War Fund," in my department. This fund is generally known as the "War Fund" in the department, and, on account of the error I have mentioned, seeing that we had not enough money to meet the expenditure, we were authorized by the Auditor General to take a sum of $27,000 from that war fund.

Mr. BOIVIN (translation): That fund is the vote which reads as follows:—

To provide for stamps, stationery, salaries, travelling expenses, etc., in connection with war tax.

Hon. Mr. SEVIGNY (translation): Yes.

Mr. BOIVIN (translation): Well, if the hon. minister was obliged to take from this fund the sum of $54,000, how is it that, this year, it is not reduced by this amount of $54,000, for I see that this item is still for the same amount, this year?

Hon. Mr. SEVIGNY (translation): It is because, as I have just stated, the Government intend to put in an outfit to print the stamps to be used upon the cheques and the notes. Now, to set up this service, we must purchase five or six machines which we can get only in England.

Mr. BOIVIN (translation): How much do these machines cost?

Hon. Mr. SEVIGNY (translation): From $1,300 to $1,500 each.

Mr. BOIVIN (translation): Six machines like these at $1,500 would amount only to $9,000. That leaves quite a margin, and I would like to know how the hon. minister intends to expend it.

Hon. Mr. SEVIGNY (translation): Does my hon. friend mean the balance of the $54,000?

Mr. BOIVIN (translation): Yes.

Hon. Mr. SEVIGNY (translation): As I have just said, there are in my department some temporary employees.

Mr. BOIVIN (translation): We have provided for that. In last year's estimates we had an item:—

To provide for stamps, stationery, salaries, travelling expenses, etc., in connection with war tax.

Mr. BOIVIN: The hon. gentleman says that there was a mistake, that that item should have been $155,000. That is admitted. He took the balance of $54,000 last year out of the vote to provide for stamps, stationery, travelling expenses, etc., in connection with the war vote, which vote last year was $125,000. That closed the books last year. Whether it was or was not right to do what the hon. gentleman did, I do not propose to discuss at present; I will leave that to other hon. gentlemen. But the fact remains that the hon. gentleman now admits that he took $54,000 from the item to provide for stamps, stationery, and so forth, and applied it to the item of Preventive Service salaries, which, owing to mistake, was not large enough. This year he tells me he will increase this item of $101,000 to $155,000 in order to provide for the $54,000 he had to take out of another item last year. I now ask the hon. minister why he did not reduce that other item by $54,000 which he did not need last year. He tells me he intends to buy four or five machines for the purpose of embossing drafts and cheques, with the two-cent war stamp which machines would cost about $5,000, and which would very rightly come under that head. I now ask him what becomes of the balance of $49,000, which he has already provided for this year in his vote of $155,000, which I must say, in all fairness to the hon. minister, he has explained to the House, as far as this year is concerned, in a very satisfactory manner. But I cannot understand why the other item is not reduced. If he had $54,000 too much last year, and if he only required to use $5,000 for other purposes this year, there should be a reduction of $49,000, especially when we are imposing new taxes every day and preaching economy.

An hon. MEMBER: And imposing an income tax.

Hon. Mr. SEVIGNY (translation): From what my hon. friend has just said, we would have spent last year more money than we had. There is one point which my hon. friend forgets: in February last, my predecessor had asked the House a certain amount of supplementary estimates in order to make up for the difference in the votes we needed in 1916-17; the House granted the amount asked for. My hon. friend will now allow me to read to this House a memorandum which I caused to be prepared in order to reply to the questions which were put to me when this item was first submitted to the House. This refers to the $90,000 item.

This item for 1914-15 was $151,000. It was reduced the next year by $21,000, and left at $130,000. It was still further reduced last year by $70,000, and left at $60,000. The preventive service was, at that moment, in the course of organization, and as it was necessary to create a special fund for special service, it was deemed that $70,000 could safely be taken from that item and transferred to the preventive service fund, which would be paid the permanent officers after being transferred from this temporary service. The total expenses under that heading amount to $107,954.-

9 p.m. 80, in which is included the expenditure for special assistance of $27,697.12. This latter amount was used to pay temporary preventive officers, whose duties were more especially connected with the observance of the Special War Revenue Act, and was, after consultation with the Auditor General, transferred to the item of $125,000 voted in connection with the War Tax. This left a balance expended of $80,257.68, or $20,257.68 of a deficit. This was covered by a supplementary estimate of $30,000, which was asked for two or three months before the end of the fiscal year, at a time, when the exact amount of the deficit, could not very well be ascertained. The item is brought to $90,000; that is to the amount actually voted last year—$60,000 in the main estimates, and $30,000 in the supplementary estimates, above referred to. It is deemed that this amount of $90,000 will be about sufficient, in view of the general increase of divers items, such as travelling expenses.

(Translation): So that my hon. friend can see that with the amount of $30,000 which was voted us in the month of February last, and with these $60,000 voted at the last session, we are asking, this year, the same amount exactly.

Mr. BOIVIN (translation): That makes $90,000.

Mr. MACDONALD: What is the sum total of the minister's explanation? Will he tell us why he asked for $54,000 more to carry out the work of the department in connection with the salaries of preventive officers. He tells us that the auditor of the department made a mistake last year, and only asked for $101,000 instead of the necessary amount; then he proceeds to read a memorandum in which he confuses these items, travelling expenses, etc. There was an increase of $30,000 last year, and he proceeds to tell us his department spent some $20,000 more than they asked for last, and that when they found they were spending this $20,000 more, they got a vote for $30,000, not knowing how much the deficit was going to be. Then he refers to the following item, which is the one which specially relates to the war tax, and which is the vote Parliament gave for the enforcement of the war tax, and which has nothing whatever to do with the preventive staff, stamps, stationery, salaries, travelling expenses in connection with the war tax. My hon. friend asked for $125,000 and he tells us a certain amount of money was taken to pay the deficit on some previous vote, but he does not tell the House what it was. When this matter was before the committee on a previous occasion all these figures were gone into. He tells us this deficit, which was due to an error of an accountant of the department, was taken out of the war fund, out of the money voted under the War Measures Act. That is what he believed a month ago. What possible right has the minister to take out of the money which was voted under the War Measures Act any sums of money whatever?—because that is the money upon which this country is going to pay interest for all time, or until the debt is wiped out.

But that is what he told us before. Now he confuses those three items, giving us an explanation which is no explanation at all. The result of the whole thing is that the minister is asking the country to give him, for those items which have no reference to this item for expenses in connection with the war tax, $84,000 more than was voted last year. The proposition is ridiculous. The minister has the greatest possible temerity in coming to this House with such a proposition.

Mr. SEVIGNY: Last year, as I have already stated we had to pay the temporary preventive officers of my department, and when we saw that there was not enough money to pay them, we inquired of the Auditor General and he told us that there was no objection at all to paying them out of this item:

To provide for stamps, stationery, salaries, travelling expenses, etc., in connection with war tax.

And that was done by the department with the authorization of the Auditor General.

Mr. MACDONALD: If the minister had so much more money than was necessary for the purpose of providing for stamps, stationery, salaries, travelling expenses, etc., in connection with war tax, why is he asking for the full $125,000 this year? Why did he pay, under the item of "preventive service, salaries," employees for services rendered under this other item in connection with the war tax?

Mr. SEVIGNY: It is because the service is permanent now. We wanted an amount to pay the permanent service. That is something new that we did not have last year.

Mr. MACDONALD: That has nothing to do with the matter at all. My hon. friend's predecessor obtained from Parliament $125,000 for the purpose of paying expenses in connection with the administration of the war tax. He did not need to spend more than one-half of that amount for the purpose of enforcing the war tax. Now he says that he desires to employ permanently a number of preventive officers, the necessity for whom nobody has yet ascertained, and because he employed a number of temporary officers who are called preventive officers under that item, he diverts the money from the war tax item for the purpose of paying his preventive officers. He asks Parliament to vote $84,000 more than last year to pay these officers, and at the same time he asks for $125,000 more for the purpose of enforcing the war tax, when he expended only half that amount last year.

Mr. SEVIGNY: We are not employing new officers. We have for many years past had temporary officers.

Mr. MACDONALD: Where are they?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Throughout the whole country.

Mr. MACDONALD: What are they doing?

Mr. SEVIGNY: We have 150 temporary officers throughout the country.

Mr. MACDONALD: What are they doing?

Mr. SEVIGNY: They are engaged in the preventive service, and they are performing their work very well, as shown by the fact that our revenues are increasing every day.

Mr. MACDONALD: Where are they?

Mr. SEVIGNY: In Montreal, Quebec, Toronto, Halifax.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend must have employed many of his political heelers.

Mr. SEVIGNY: We have an officer in Pictou.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska) (Translation): Mr. Chairman, the hon. minister states that he had much difficulty in finding the money needed to pay those employees, the preventive officers; that he had to take the money from the next following item. Those employees were temporary ones whom he made permanent, because, among other things, their services are essential to educate the people. Has the hon. Minister the list of those employees?

Hon. Mr. SEVIGNY (translation): No, we do not have it here.

Mr. LAPOINTE (translation): The hon. Minister has in my county one of these preventive officers to educate the people. In the county of Kamouraska, there is a man named Pantaléon Courcy, preventive officer for the Inland Revenue Department. This gentleman draws a salary from the Department. He was appointed before the war; he continues drawing his salary, and he does absolutely nothing for the department. His name is Pantaléon Courcy, of St. Pacôme, Kamouraska county. I pray the hon minister to remember that name. He is drawing a salary at a time when the country evidently needs all its available funds; when we are obliged to impose new and very heavy taxes upon the people. The department is employing election people and pays them salaries, when the strictest economy should exist. The hon. minister says that there are one hundred and fifty of these preventive officers. If the 149 others are doing what Pantaléon Courcy is doing in the county of Kamouraska, to earn his salary, I do most strongly protest, and I ask the hon. minister to put an end to paying useless salaries to people who are doing absolutely nothing for the department.

I believe I may challenge the hon. minister to produce any report whatever from that gentleman to the Inland Revenue Department, unless it be one in which he claims his salary.

In the neighbouring parish of St. Philippe-de-Néry, there is another gentleman who was postmaster, who had been appointed postmaster after the last general elections—the Liberal postmaster having been dismissed—a certain Mr. Roy was appointed in his stead. That appointment was not very popular in the parish, and in order to rally the Government's partisans who were refusing to vote in a local by-election which was subsequently held, they divided the St. Philippe post-office, and they established another one, two arpents from the first, in the village of St. Philippe-de-Néry. There are two post-offices, one in St. Philippe West, and the other has the pompous name of St. Philippe East. There are a few feet separating one from the other. This, Mr. Chairman, still exists during the war.

The first postmaster, Mr. Roy, was very angry to find his revenue cut down by the establishment of an extra post office. The Inland Revenue Department was just the one to heal his wounds, and a position was given to this man also. He is now food inspector. He draws a salary from the department; that is to say he resides in St. Philippe parish, he never travels, he does nothing for the department, he draws a salary and they keep on imposing taxes in the county of Kamouraska, as in all other sections of the country.

In the Customs Department there is one Mr. Desjardins, who draws a salary as a preventive officer for that department, who does absolutely nothing, his services are in no way required, not more than those of Mr. Roy; all these parties are drawing salaries from the public treasury during the war, when everybody is paying heavy taxes, as I have just said.

[Mr. E. Lapointe.]

My hon. friend states that he has made permanent these temporary employees, and that he is obliged to take from an item voted for some other ends the money required to pay these gentlemen.

For my part, I wish to protest as strongly as I can on behalf of my county, of those whom I represent. The hon. minister should put an end to this scandalous system; he should suppress those positions which do not exist as such, which are nothing but a trick to pay salaries to Government creatures. This should be immediately done, rather than to continue imposing new taxes.

Hon. Mr. SEVIGNY (translation): I must say to my hon. friend that the observations he has just made will be taken into consideration. It is the first time I have heard of Mr. Courcy, and moreover, I am informed by my deputy minister, that he does not believe that this party named Courcy is still in the employ of my department

Mr. BOIVIN: I understood the Minister to say in connection with these three items: preventive service, travelling expenss, etc., that the employees made permanent this year were in the service last year, but that last year they were paid out of the fund known as Contingencies.

Hon. Mr. SEVIGNY (translation): Those employees are also engaged to see that the war measures are enforced, such as are under my department; then we have paid from the item—

To provide for stamps, etc., in connection with war tax.

—with the Auditor General's authorization.

Mr. BOIVIN (translation): Then, with the Auditor General's authorization, these employees were paid from another item?

Hon. Mr. SEVIGNY (translation): There is also the word "salaries."

Mr. BOIVIN (translation): Then, the hon. minister admits that he has in his department, this year, with a few exceptions, the same number of employees he had last year, except that this year, without increasing their salaries, to reward their good services and in the country's interest, he has appointed them as permanent employees; but that it does not cost any more to the country, whether they be permanent or temporary clerks.

Will the hon. minister explain to us how it is that, for the same number of employees, he is asking this year for $87,000 more than he asked last year?

Hon. Mr. SEVIGNY (translation): I am not asking for $87,000, the hon. gentleman forgets that in February last, the House completed the amount. Therefore, it does not make $87,000.

Mr. BOIVIN: How much short were you? Is it not true that the supplementary estimates called for $30,000, and that these supplementary estimates were accompanied by an explanation from the minister, stating that he had been obliged to spend $20,000 more; that in order to provide for any contingency, he is asking to-day, in his supplementary estimates, $30,000?

In the supplementary estimates, $30,000 is applied for the House of Commons is informed that there is no intention of increasing the number of employees nor the salaries. Instead of increasing salaries by $30,000, they are increased by $87,000, even should it be necessary to present, as it will surely be done, some further supplementary estimates.

Hon. Mr. SEVIGNY (translation): I pointed out to my hon. friend that we intend making a new departure in my Department; we intend buying machines to emboss notes and cheques. This improvement is being urged upon us and, of course, a staff shall be required for this new service.

Mr. BOIVIN (translation): This cheque embossing staff will then cost the country the sum of $55,000, since that is the difference between last year's and this year's estimates. Therefore, if this service is to cost the people of this country the sum of $55,000, would it not be better to let the big manufacturers and the large business firms pay that expenditure or else let things stands; that is to say, that the employees of these firms shall themselves stamp their notes and cheques. I do not hesitate to say that it is with the object of helping along those gentlemen, that the department propose to have these cheque books prepared so that they will not be obliged to put these stamps on, and the poor fellow who cannot afford to get a cheque book will have to buy his postage stamps as in the past. I cannot see there is a reason to burden the estimates with this rather large amount of $55,000.

Hon. Mr. SEVIGNY (translation): I beg to point out to my hon. friend that, while being an improvement upon the present system, this new departure will also be an economy to the country. Just now, a large number of people are using common postage stamps and my hon. friend certainly knows that the Government pays a commission of 20 to 50 p.c. for the sale of such stamps.

Mr. BOIVIN (translation): Is it not true that a large number of people, now using postage stamps on their notes and cheques, will still be obliged to use the same in the future, for I have no doubt that these cheques you are going to have embossed by special machinery, bought in England, shall be for the use of firms such as the Royal Trust Company, the Capital Trust Company, the Toronto Trust Corporation and other such firms, while a large number of people, as I have just said, will buy their stamps in the future as they did in the past, and that the Government will always have to pay a commission of 20 to 50 per cent upon these stamps.

Is it not true that this expenditure, which the Government intend to make and which this House is asked to authorize to-night, is meant to save work to the employees of the big firms, which are more able to make this expenditure than the Government?

Hon. Mr. SEVIGNY (translation): My hon. friend knows that this improvement has been asked us by the Bankers' Association. He knows that the cheques which every one uses are taken from the banks.

Since the banks will be given embossed cheques, if my hon. friend wants a cheque book, the bank will give it to him with the stamps embossed upon the cheques.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister is still at where he began. The minister is asking for an increase of $9,000 over last year for the inside service of his department. For the outside service, he is asking for an increase on excise alone of $142,442.50, or a increase on the two items of over $152,000. Then there is also an increase of $87,000, made up of $3,000 for preventive service contingencies, $54,000 preventive service salaries, and $30,000 travelling expenses, fuel, etc. My hon. friend is asking for this increase of $87,000 in war time when everything is being taxed. When we asked him to account for this increase he told us there were a lot of preventive service officers employed throughout the country, that the accountant or his office made a mistake in not asking for enough money last year, and that they had to take the money out of the war vote. All of which is unintelligible to others in explanation, more particularly in view of the fact that I have here the estimates of last year, and I find that for contingencies there was a sum of $10,000 and for other preventive service salaries last year there was $101,000 voted, and for travelling expenses, rent, fuel, and stationery, there was $60,000 voted. The year before, for the three items, there was only $143,000 voted. In 1916-17 there was $161,000, or an increase of $28,000 for that particular service.

Mr. SEVIGNY: Will my hon. friend permit me? In addition to this item of $60,000 voted last year, we had another amount of $30,000 voted in February last.

Mr. MACDONALD: I quite understand that.

Mr. SEVIGNY: So, this item should read $90,000 instead of $60,000.

Mr. MACDONALD: If my hon. friend will look at th estimates of last year he will find his predecessor got $161,000 for carrying on the preventive service, whereas the year before it only cost $143,000. My hon. friend tells us he had a Governor General's warrant out of some fund which gave him $30,000 more, and that was passed at the beginning of this session. This means my hon. friend spent last year $191,000 on a service which only cost $143,000 the year before.

Mr. SEVIGNY: Our increase in revenue last year was a million and a half dollars.

Mr. MACDONALD: The increased revenue was either from excise or from war tax. When we asked my hon. friend what these preventive officers did, he said he employed 150 extra men to educate the people, and he got the Auditor General to let him take so much money out of the war tax fund. Speaking on this subject last year, my hon. friend's predecessor said in answer to a request by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) for an explanation of the increase:

> There is an increase of $5,051.25 in the first item, which is due to statutory increases and changes. There is no increase outside of that. On the second item, for extra duty paid at large distilleries and other factories, there is an increase of $1,000 due to increase of business. The same explanation applies to the increase of $500, in the third item, duty paid to officers serving longer hours at other than special surveys. In the fourth item, preventive service contingencies, the increase is only apparent because it was made up of several items. The department is creating a new fund, so as to bring the preventive service under one heading. The creation of this fund does not occasion an increase, because certain amounts are taken from other funds, such for instance as the appropriation in connection with the adulteration of food. In preventive service contingencies, there is a decrease of $3,000, in excise contingencies a decrease of $70,000, and in gas and electric light inspection, a decrease of $11,000.
> Mr. Lemieux: You take from other services and apply to this new service?
>
> Mr. Patenaude: Yes.
> Mr. Lemieux: And you do not increase the general vote.
> Mr. Patenaude: There is no increase at all. You will find a decrease in all these items.

The result was that this Government came to the House last year and said: We are going to reorganize the preventive service, and it is not going to cost the country a single dollar more. Yet although the department had a vote for preventive service of $28,000 more last year than it had the year before the minister (Mr. Sevigny) tells us they spent $50,000 more on that service, and employed 150 men throughout the country. What were these men employed for? The money is voted for those services in the vote for salaries, extra duty pay at large distilleries, duty pay to officers serving longer hours, and so on. My hon. friend talks in an uncertain way about war taxes, and about tobacco, and so on—matters which have no relevancy whatever to this question. Why did my hon. friend spend $58,000 more last year in employing extra preventive officers, for which he had no warrant or authority, when his predecessor declared in Parliament last year that what was being done would not cost the country one cent more? In addition, having admitted to the House that out of the vote of $125,000 which was taken for the administering of the war tax last year, he had sufficient surplus to repay the $50,000 which he had overexpended for preventive services, my hon. friend is now asking to take this full $125,000, which is $50,000 more than was needed last year. I submit, he must place upon the Table a statement of the number of additional preventive officers he employed, where they were employed, and what their particular duties were, and a statement of what possible reason there could be to spend $60,000 in preventive service, without authority and in the face of the representations that anything that was to be done would not cost a single cent more. The Minister of Finance is taxing everybody, yet the Minister of Inland Revenue comes along with heavy increases in his Estimates, without any warrant whatever, and spends this money, as my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) said the other night regarding another matter, like a drunken sailor.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: Would the minister tell me if there are any preventive officers in the county of Laval, and if so what are their names and what salaries do they draw? If the minister has not the list with him to-night, I would be pleased to have the information later on.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I will see that a list of those officers is prepared and sent to my hon. friend to-morrow.

Mr. MACDONALD: I think this committee is entitled to know who those additional preventive officers were, where they were employed, and their salaries, in order to find out where the $87,000 has gone. The committee is entitled to that information before the vote passes.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I would be glad to give my hon. friend the information but I have not the list before me.

Mr. MACDONALD: Then let this particular item stand and go on with the others.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I have a list of the temporary employees of the department.

Mr. MACDONALD: But my hon. friend seems to forget that he has a vote, and his predecessor had a vote which will be found at page 20 of the Estimates of this year—which provided for the officials of the department in the Inside Service and for contingencies. This year the amount is $202,412.50, which is an increase of about $9,000 over last year. It has no relation to this vote. This is a vote for the Outside Service altogether. If it is not, my hon. friend should ask for his money under the Civil Government Estimates and not under this.

Mr. SEVIGNY: Here is a list of the preventive officers in the Outside Service.

Mr. MACDONALD: I want the additional ones on which my hon. friend is spending this $87,000. I do not want the whole list. We can get that in the Civil Service list.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I think my hon. friend is wrong when he says that $87,000 was paid to temporary officers last year. I am informed by my deputy minister that the amount paid was $27,000. If my hon. friend wants the list of preventive officers I can read it.

Mr. WILSON: If it is not too long you might as well give it now.

Mr. MACDONALD: If my hon. friend only paid $27,000 for these officers, why is he asking for $87,000 more this year?

Mr. SEVIGNY: I am not.

Mr. MACDONALD: By reference to page 84 of the estimates it will be seen that my hon. friend is asking for additional amounts over last year as follows:

Preventive Service—Contingencies	$3,000
Preventive Service—Salaries, rent, fuel, stationery, etc.	54,000
Travelling expenses	30,000
Total	$87,000

Mr. SEVIGNY: What about the $30,000 voted in February for last year?

Mr. MACDONALD: That is so much more.

Mr. SEVIGNY: That is for last year.

Mr. BOIVIN: The minister says that there was a special vote in the supplementary estimates put through in February last, of $30,000, for the purpose of paying salaries last year. He tells us that these salaries, which were not provided for in the estimates last year, amounted to $27,000, and that they were provided for by the $30,000 vote. My hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) asks the minister if the estimates last year were short $27,000. If that is so, and if there are increases this year to the extent of $87,000, there is a discrepancy of $60,000.

Mr. SEVIGNY: If my hon. friend will figure up the amounts in the estimates he will realize that he must be wrong. They are, $155,000, $90,000, $125,000, making a total of $370,000.

Mr. BOIVIN: But I was referring to the increase. I take it for granted that what was voted in 1916-17 was more or less honestly expended and that the department was justified in asking for as much this year. But, if the department asks for $87,000 more this year than it had last year, we want to know what is to be done with the money, especially in time of war when we have new taxes imposed upon us every other sitting of the House.

Mr. SEVIGNY: Last year there were the following items: $101,000, $60,000, $125,000, and in February last $30,000 making a total of $316,000. This year we are asking for $155,000, $90,000 and $125,000, making a total of $370,000. Consequently, there is an increase of $54,000. It is the intention of the department to establish a plant for embossing cheques and it is probable this new organization will cost at least $25,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: A plant in Ottawa?

Mr. SEVIGNY: A plant in Ottawa for embossing cheques.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I think there is a contract between the Government signed by the Finance Minister and the American Bank Note Company for the printing of all bonds, stamps, etc.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I do not know exactly what the contract is between the Government and the company, but I am informed that the company prefer not to emboss cheques, and are willing that the work should be done by my department.

Mr. BOIVIN: What about the difference between $25,000 and $54,000?

Mr. SEVIGNY: It is for the complete organization of the preventive service in my department, which is very important. This service is doing well and we have only to look at results to realize it. The revenue, on account of the good service of the employees, is increasing every year, and the department should get some credit for that.

Mr. BOIVIN: The minister omitted from his calculation an increase of $3,000 under the head of contingencies for the preventive service. If he will add that to the $54,000 he will have $57,000 as the exact amount of the increase.

Mr. SEVIGNY: A few moments ago my hon. friend said it was $87,000.

Mr. BOIVIN: That was before we had deducted the $30,000 provided for in the supplementary estimates and which should have been $27,000 instead of $30,000. Leaving out that $30,000, we still have a difference of $57,000. The minister tells us he is going to provide for the installation of this plant for embossing cheques, which, I understood him to say, was going to cost $25,000. The minister will remember that he told the committee about an hour ago that it was not his intention to increase the personnel of his department.

Mr. SEVIGNY: It is not my intention, but if it is necessary I will do it; if it is not necessary, I will not do it.

Mr. BOIVIN: Therefore, without having any idea whether it is going to be necessary or not, without having any idea of the number of employees which must be added, without having any intention of increasing salaries and without any intention of increasing the personnel unless absolutely necessary—and with the right the minister always has to come back to this House with his supplementary estimates next year to provide for any slight increase in the number of employees who may be employed—he asks us to-day for an additional vote of $57,000, and the only explanation which he gives to us is that it is the intention of the Government to instal machinery for embossing cheques for the advantage of banks and large financial corporations.

Mr. SEVIGNY: And for the advantage of my hon. friend, too.

Mr. BOIVIN: Not at all.

Mr. SEVIGNY: For the advantage of everybody.

Mr. BOIVIN: Your hon. friend can continue as he has been doing, buying the war stamps at two cents each and placing them upon his cheques when he has any funds in the banks to issue cheques upon. That is what your hon. friend will continue to do and what most of your hon. friends on both sides will do. But the large corporations, and especially the trust companies, may find it more convenient to have their cheques embossed. The Government is going to spend $25,000 for their convenience, and the balance of the $57,000 is placed there in case it may suit the convenience of my hon. friend to hire more employees, like the one referred to a moment ago, who does absolutely nothing. Why not make the employees now in the department work before new ones are taken on? Why employ useless men, men who do nothing from the beginning of the year to the end? The minister said that five of these machines could be purchased for $1,300.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I said $1,300 and $1,500.

Mr. BOIVIN: Now the plant is to cost $25,000. It may be that the personnel will eat up the balance. If so it is a bad investment for this Government.

Mr. SEVIGNY: We expect to make lots of money for the Government with this new organization.

Mr. BOIVIN: How much and in what way?

Mr. SEVIGNY: The Government will not have to pay a commission of from twenty per cent to fifty per cent on the sale of postage stamps.

Mr. BOIVIN: I understand that that commission is paid only in small country post offices where the war stamps used on cheques will be very few. The minister cannot get away from the fact that these cheques are to be embossed for the convenience of the big corporations. If these corporations do not wish to pay employees for affixing the stamps to their cheques, they should pay for the embossing of their cheques But, passing over the $25,000, what of the other $32,000? My hon. friend says it is for employees whom he may engage later on. He cannot say whether it will all be needed or not for employees who may be taken on upon the eve of a general election. It is currently reported in the House that we shall have a general election this year, and here is the minister asking us to place $57,000 in his estimates to employ people during the course of the year if it becomes necessary to do so. Who is going to decide, after this House has been dissolved, whether those employees are necessary or not? It will be the minister. How many preventive officers will be employed in Dorchester out of the $57,000? Nobody knows. The vote should not be passed if we cannot be told why the money is needed by the Government.

Mr. SEVIGNY: It is needed by the department to organize the preventive service.

Mr. MACDONALD: Was there no preventive service before?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Yes, but the business of the department is increasing all the time.

Mr. MACDONALD: In what way?

Mr. SEVIGNY: I am informed by the deputy minister that two years ago we had no well organized preventive service. Since we have organized the preventive service all over the country the laws of the department have been better enforced and the revenue has increased every year. It is the opinion of the department that this preventive service is rendering very valuable and important service.

Mr. MACDONALD: If the minister thinks there never was any preventive service until he took charge of this department he is under a strange and weird delusion.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I said two years ago.

Mr. MACDONALD: We have had a preventive service since Confederation. My hon. friend's predecessor did not talk of creating a service but of bringing the preventive service under one head. He said that was not going to increase the cost to the country. My hon. friend said that last year he employed additional men. I asked for the names, and he said he would give them. I should like to have them. If the information is to be of any value, we must have the names and places where these men are working, and the increased amount my hon. friend is asking, together with an indication of the number of new men who have never been employed, who are now to be employed by him. My hon. friend has not the statement ready, and as it is a warm night, I am willing to let the three items in regard to preventive officers stand, and let him proceed with his Estimates.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I will see that the lists are sent to Hansard.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Finance to this item, "Preventive service—salaries, $155,000." That sum is being asked to cover the salaries of preventive service officers, as against $101,000 a year ago. The Minister of Inland Revenue tried gallantly to defend the item, but he will admit that it is no defence. It is election gold, and nothing else. Here we are asked to vote this year $54,000 more than last year for the preventive service of the country, when my hon. friend is coming before Parliament with this legislation imposing a new burden on the people of a most drastic nature. The item may not appear very large to my hon. friend, but if so, it is because at the present day he is dealing with millions and hundreds of millions. But the item will strike the popular imagination as a large amount, and it is by pruning away such useless expenditure, such election expenditure, that my hon. friend will really be what he ought to be, the faithful watchdog of the treasury. We are living in extraordinary times. We are asked, day in and day out, to pay from our income in order to maintain our position at the front and help the Allies to win the war, and this should be the primary consideration of the Government. I said yesterday, when my hon. friend introduced his income tax resolution, that I considered it was a logical sequence of our entering into this war, that while I would approve of the measure, yet the public and the taxpayers of this country would expect that the chief tax gatherer would cut off all unnecessary expenditure. We are this evening discussing an item which is not a very important one, I confess, but looking at the figures for the preventive service salaries this year, we are asked to vote $155,000 as against $100,000 last year. The minister has explained that with this $54,000 additional he would, if need be, pay extra officers. Now we are not in a mood to accept such a vague explanation, and the people will not listen to such a lame explanation. Let my hon. friend do the heroic thing, and drop this increase of $54,000, which evidently is put in the estimates in view of the general election. On the eve of that election we shall have a crop of preventive officers from one end of the country to the other. Extravagance is always to be condemned, but if, perchance, extravagance had to be condoned, and not condemned, it would be whilst we were in prosperous times, when there was no war, when the Government did not require to have recourse

10 p.m. to drastic taxation measures. Surely, Mr. Chairman, I expect from my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White), in whom I have, I must say, some confidence—I should even say, much confidence—better things. It is true he has erred; it is true that he is not with the party with whom he was long associated. I believe he has erred, but I believe that he is honest, that he means well, and that at the present time he is doing his best to weather the storm which has gathered around him. I appeal to him, and I am in earnest and sincere about it. The hon. gentleman is taxing right and left, he is taxing the war profiteers, and he has done well in doing so. He is taxing, I hope, the gentlemen, the patriots who were so sternly rebuked by the officer of the Government, Mr. O'Connor, the other day. He is taxing the common people. The income tax will reach the common people, and the country is patriotic enough to accept those taxation measures, but with some apprehension, I must confess. The country is so patriotic that there is no revolution in sight. On the other hand the country will expect from the Minister of Finance that there shall be no trifling, as in the present instance, with the ordinary expenditures. I said yesterday that you could reduce by fifty per cent the ordinary expenditure of the Government until the war was over, and I stick to my statement, and I say that here is one instance where my hon. friend should cut off this $54,000, which is an absolutely useless expenditure.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I must confess that I am somewhat overwhelmed by this unexpected compliment by my hon. friend from Rouville. I think there must be something very peculiar in this case, when he finds it necessary to resort to such an unaccustomed and such an unusual course as that which he has pursued. He has stated that the Government might cut the ordinary expenditure of the Dominion in half. He might just as well have said that we could cut it down to 25 per cent of the present amount. There would be just as much truth in the one statement as in the other, for a statement that the Dominion Government could cut down the expenditure by one-half is simply an absolute absurdity. Since the war has broken out the Dominion Government, as a Government, and myself, as Finance Minister, have endeavoured in every way possible, so far as the ordinary expenditure and the capital expenditure of this country is concerned, to keep within the closest possible bounds, because we have been aware of the burden which the war has imposed and will impose upon us.

I need not go into figures, but I can make this general statement, that, except in so far as the Dominion Government was committed on capital expenditure so that withdrawal would mean heavy loss in work partially completed and in contracts that had been entered into, we have in every way possible reduced our expenditure. There is a matter in connection with our war time expenditures that is not appreciated in this House. It is generally assumed that all ordinary expenditure should be reduced. Upon many of the departments, apart altogether from the war, the expenditure has necessarily been increased, the cause indirectly being the war. In addition to that, we must remember that the trade of this country is double what it was before the war, and that means that the public services of this country have had to rise to the occasion. Take the Post Office Department. Does any one mean to suggest that with the enormous volume of business that is being done to-day the expenditure of the Post Office Department could or should be decreased? The other day, when I had the Civil Service Bill before the House, the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) and others protested that we did not pay the Civil Service of this country enough. Now we hear to-night that we should cut the expenditure in half. The expenditure of the Post Office Department is necessarily increased by reason of the increased volume of business. My hon. friend is thinking of 1911 and 1910, when the trade of this country was $750,000,000. To-day we are confronted with a situation in which the trade of this country is $2,000,000,000. All the departments administering the Government's functions in connection with that trade naturally have an increase in their expenditure. Take the enormous revenue we are deriving from the Customs Department to-day as compared with 1914, or 1910, or 1911. Does anybody say that there should be a reduced staff in the Customs Department today, seeing that it is swinging the volume of business it does? You cannot expect a reduction. The same is true of the other departments. Take my own department. The other day the question was asked, no doubt to make it do service on the election platform: How many employees had you in 1911, and how many employees have you to-day? The answer which I gave indicated that we had considerably over 100 more temporary employees in the department than we had in 1911, and the statement is sent out to the country that the Department of Finance has over 100 more employees than it had in 1911. Of course, we have over 100 more employees, and if we had an additional fifty, we would not have too many to handle the volume of work in the department in connection with the war loans of the Dominion. The administration of the department has necessarily been increased. I had to create a staff throughout all Canada for the purpose of administering the Business Profits War Tax Act. I had to have a commissioner in every province to represent myself, and those men had to have with them assistants for the purpose of administering the Act. Does the Dominion lose anything—does the taxpayer of the country lose anything—by reason of the fact that we have created a staff for the administration of the Business Profits War Tax Act? Is it good business or bad that we should spend $100,000 in the administration of the Act, and as a result of the taxation take in for the Dominion of Canada twenty, twenty-five or thirty million dollars a year? The Minister of Inland Revenue has explained to the House the item for preventive officers. What does he want preventive officers for?

Mr. MACDONALD: What explanation has he given?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I was not in at the time, but I know what explanation he would give, because I know the only explanation he could give.

Mr. MACDONALD: He has not given any.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The only explanation he could give is that they were required for the purposes of his department.

Mr. MACDONALD: He did not say that.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The very fact that the item is in the estimates indicates that they are required.

Mr. MACDONALD: The Minister of Inland Revenue does not know anything about the matter.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: How are these men appointed? The Minister of Inland Revenue makes his recommendation to the Treasury Board, and the board inquires: Why are these men wanted? The answer is: They are wanted for the purpose of protecting the revenue of the Dominion of Canada. The work of the Inland Revenue Department has been immensely increased since this war broke out, not only in connection with the ordinary work, but in connection with the Special War Revenue Act of 1914, all the taxation imposed by that measure, the tax upon patent medicines, upon perfumery—those subjects that have been under consideration here to-night. Is it good business or bad that the Department of Inland Revenue should take such action by way of creating the necessary staff for the purpose of safeguarding the revenues of the Dominion? Supposing that by the expenditure of $50,000, $500,000 or $1,000,000 is saved to the Dominion. Is that money wasted that is spent on that staff? My hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) says that it is put in the estimates for election purposes. That is simply balderdash. My hon. friend should not put forward such an argument to the country at this time when the people are excited over various matters. My hon. friend should not say that $54,000 has been put in the estimates to allow preventive officers to go through the country to promote the political ends of this Government, because that is not true. The Minister of Inland Revenue has put in this $54,000, to cover the appointment of preventive officers. As I have already stated, when he wants to appoint an officer, he brings his recommendation before the Treasury Board which is informed as to why that officer is required, and the appointment is made by recommendation to Council by the Treasury Board, that board, as I have said, acting on the recommendation of the minister. This item of $54,000 does not commit the Government to its expenditure unless it is regarded as necessary.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend is wrong.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: How am I wrong?

Mr. LEMIEUX: The Minister of Inland Revenue is not asking for $54,000; he is asking for $155,000 as against $101,000 a year ago, when the War Tax Act was in force. There is an increase of $54,000.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Let us assume that that is so. The Minister of Inland Revenue estimates that he will require that amount because it is necessary to protect our revenue further than it is protected at the present time. Why does the Minister of Customs appoint additional officers? He appoints them because they are required in connection with his department, to safeguard the revenue of the Dominion. The same thing is true of the Minister of Inland Revenue. My hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) is beside the mark when he speaks of voting $54,000 for the purpose of promoting the political ends of this Government, because that is not the fact; it is not true. My hon. friend should be reasonable in his criticism. This $54,000 will not necessarily be expended unless it is required.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend is manufacturing an explanation for the Minister of Inland Revenue. He has indulged in one of his flights of eloquence about the war and other subjects which have no relation under Heaven to the explanations which we have been endeavouring to secure from the Minister of Inland Revenue in regard to this matter. What we have been trying to get from the Minister of Inland Revenue is some explanation why he wants $87,000 more than last year.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Will my hon. friend allow me to suggest to him that I was answering a direct question asked me by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) and a direct criticism which he passed upon the ordinary expenditure of this Government, and that I confined myself absolutely to the point at issue which he raised in his speech?

Mr. MACDONALD: Then am I to understand that the Minister of Finance was not undertaking to help the Minister of Inland Revenue out of a dilemma?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Minister of Inland Revenue required no assistance from me. I was answering the hon. member for Rouville.

Mr. MACDONALD: Beautiful, beautiful! For the last two hours we have been endeavouring to get some intelligible explanation from the Minister of Inland Revenue of the increase in the expenditure of his department. He has already given us three or four different explanations, and at this moment I defy any hon. gentleman in this House to tell us why this increase was made. The minister gave us as one explanation that last year the accountant of his department made a mistake and the expenditure had to be made up from the war fund. The predecessor of the Minister of Inland Revenue, on whose behalf the Minister of Finance would no doubt have talked just as eloquently as he has to-night, last year had an increase of $28,000 over the year before, and, speaking on this item, said:

> The department is creating a new fund so as to bring the preventive service under one heading. The creation of this fund does not occasion an increase because certain amounts are taken from other funds, such for instance as the appropriation in connection with the adulteration of food.

Now either the accountant made a mistake last year or he did not, and if the explanation of the Minister of Inland Revenue is correct, then the remarks of the Minister of Finance are wholly irrelevant. Who was the official that made this mistake, and how did the mistake occur? I find that this matter was before Parliament last year at the time Mr. Patenaude was in charge of the department. The Minister of Public Works also took part in the discussion, and if, after the full and free discussion that was had then, the accountant again made such a mistake, all I can say is that you have a pretty state of affairs in the Inland Revenue Department.

Talking about the war does not do away with the absolute necessity of hon. gentlemen finding out what was the reason for the statement made by the Minister of Inland Revenue as to the error made by the accountant. Let us know what the facts are. The minister says on account of this error $50,000 was taken out of the war fund.

Mr. SEVIGNY: Not $50,000, but $27,000; I have said that more than three times already.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend went on to say:

> I am informed by the officers of my department that last year an error was made by the accountant of the department in making an estimate of $101,000, and that we have had, on account of that error, to make an expenditure from the War Fund. It is to meet the exigencies of the service that we ask for $155,000 this year.

That is what the Minister of Inland Revenue stated in this House only four weeks ago. He says now that it was only $27,000.

If that is true, why does he want this $28,000 more. The minister should give us some intelligible explanation as to what he is going to do with the $54,000 increase over what his predecessor asked the House for last year. We have no objection on this side of the House to the minister getting his estimates through, but let us have some sensible explanation of a condition of affairs which my hon. friend himself says exists.

Mr. SEVIGNY: The increase asked for by my department this year is $57,000.

Mr. MACDONALD: Pardon me—$87,000; made up of $3,000 for preventive service contingencies, $54,000 preventive service salaries, and $30,000 travelling expenses, etc.

Mr. SEVIGNY: My hon. friend will remember that in February last an amount of $30,000 was voted by the House for my department.

Mr. MACDONALD: That makes $117,000 of an increase this year.

Mr. SEVIGNY: That amount of $30,000 was voted for 1916-1917, so that only leaves an increase of $3,000 for contingencies, and $54,000 for salaries, or $57,000 altogether.

Mr. MACDONALD: The $30,000 that was voted was for travelling expenses?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Last year $60,000 was voted for travelling expenses, rent, fuel, stationery, etc. When the department saw that that amount was not sufficient, we decided to take $27,000 out of the $125,000, with the approval of the Auditor General, to pay the preventive officers. Before doing that, the accountant of my department had a consultation with the Auditor General and was advised that there was nothing wrong in arranging matters that way. The officers were doing the same work that is covered by this item for stamps, stationery, salaries, travelling expenses, etc., in connection with war tax. When the accountant of my department, who is a very good official, saw that he had the authority of the Auditor General he had no scruples about taking this amount of $27,000 out of the $125,000. This year, in February, we asked Parliament for the sum of $30,000 to pay the expenses of 1916-17, that is last year, and the amount was voted. This year there is an increase of $57,000 over the amount voted last year, and out of this $57,000 it is the intention of the department to organize a plant to emboss cheques, which it is estimated will cost about $25,000. That leaves a balance of about $32,000 of an increase for this year.

It is all very well for my hon. friend to say that the expenditure of the department is increasing all the time, but he should not forget that the revenue of the department is also increasing. In the preventive service as organized by my department there was an increase in revenue of $1,500,000 last year. Now I put it to the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), is it not wise to spend $50,000 or $100,000 if by so doing we can increase the revenue by $1,500,000? Competent officials of my department assure me that next year they anticipate an increase in revenue of $2,000,000, instead of $1,500,000. Under these circumstances I think it is only reasonable and businesslike to make the expenditure asked for in these estimates.

Mr. MACDONALD: The pyrotechnics indulged in by my hon. friend, and which he has learned from his colleague, have no relation whatever to this item. My hon. friend has a separate item covering the payment of salaries of officers and inspectors of excise, who collected the extra money that came into that department, and there is an increase of $5,442,50 in that item.

But my hon. friend's explanation is that in the item of travelling expenses, rent, fuel, and stationery—for which $60,000 was added last year—he spent $27,000 more, and that was the money which he says he took out of the item in connection with the war tax. He told us earlier in the evening that it was on account of extra salaries paid to extra officers, and now he tells us that the $27,000 was on this item for which he is asking $90,000, namely, travelling expenses, rent, fuel and stationery. It is clearly evident that my hon. friend thought he would follow the example of his colleague, but he was entirely out of touch with his explanations, because he was paying travelling expenses, rent, fuel and stationery, and he paid $27,000 more last year than his people estimated. If his explanation helps the House, or helps his friends, and if he has told us anything, they are perfectly welcome to the information.

Mr. BUREAU: May I ask the minister if in the increased expenditure he includes the salaries of the people employed to go around the drug stores and see if the war tax measure is being enforced?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: If that be so, and if there is such an increase, it was unnecessary for my hon. friend the Minister of Finance to get wrathy about the accusations made by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), when he said there might be some election game in it. I was very much surprised when I saw the hon. minister get somewhat heated over it. May I give an example of what is taking place? In the city of Three Rivers where I live, they had an officer who came and bought Blue Jay corn plasters from eight or nine drug stores. Next morning the proprietors of the stores had summonses to appear before the magistrate. Now all the gentlemen who keep drug stores in Three Rivers are not of the same political complexion, some of them are Tories, some are Grits. So far as the Tories were concerned, this officer seemed to forget the war was on, because while all the Grits were before the magistrate not one Tory came. I went to court and put the question to this officer as to how he happened to forget the defeated candidate in the last Three Rivers election and did not buy any Blue Jay corn plasters from him. I may state here that these men were not drug store keepers, not druggists properly speaking. They sold patent medicines, toilet articles, etc. They did not know there was a chemical composition in this corn plaster, and advantage was taken of it.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Will my hon. friend permit a question? If this additional expenditure for preventive officers was intended to promote the interests of the Government at the coming election, is my hon. friend aware that those estimates were brought down before an extension of term of Parliament was denied by the other side of this House? The hon member for Rouville says that the intention of this item was to engage preventive officers to assist in the coming election. On this side of the House we have not wanted any election, and when those estimates were brought down there was no election in view.

Mr. BUREAU: That is not an answer. We knew public opinion wanted a general election. If the Minister of Finance was asleep, we were not. Every one was clamoring for a general election.

An hon. MEMBER: Only in Quebec.

Mr. BUREAU: This "only in Quebec" business is played out. The difference is that in Quebec people speak their minds and you daren't. Go outside of Quebec and you will find that the hypocrites, when they get behind the door to make their mark will not make it for "no election;" and they will not make it for conscription either. The Minister of Finance is quite a financier, but he has given an explanation here which I do not quite understand. He justifies greater expenditure because we get greater revenue from the Customs Department. May I ask if it takes a man more time to figure out fifty per cent than it does to figure out twenty-five per cent? If you increase the duty from ten per cent to twenty per cent, does the minister say that will justify the doubling of the staff of the Customs Department?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: What about the increased volume of business?

Mr. BUREAU: My hon. friend spoke of the increased revenue. He said the revenue from the Customs Department was greater.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Increased revenue comes from increased volume of business.

Mr. BUREAU: It comes from increased duty also. Let me come back to my Three Rivers merchants. Will the Minister of Inland Revenue tell me what instructions he gives those gentlemen when they start out on work of that kind? Is there a regulation to the effect that they are to protect all the Tories, and haul up all the Grits, or are there any special instructions given? I would also like to know where he gets his men, who recommends them, and how they are appointed? If I have to see $55,000 of an increased vote passed to get a party a lot of political friends I want to know how they proceed.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I have before me a memorandum showing that in Three Rivers proceedings were taken against: A. Beliveau, P. Dufresne, C. Kleiner, M. Nassif, Pharmacie Pelletier, Pharmacie Williams, A. Boisseau, E. Briere, E. DesBois, Genest and Cloutier, E. Moise, C. Prince and R. O. Dumont.

Mr. BUREAU: What about the Pharmacie Normand, the proprietor of which was the Tory candidate in 1911?

Mr. SEVIGNY: There was no report to my department against the Pharmacie Normand. At present we have six cases pending, and seven others resulted in a fine of $50 each. There was no exception.

Mr. BUREAU: I may tell my hon. friend that the people who paid the $50 pleaded guilty, and there are no cases pending in Three Rivers. The other complaints were dismissed.

Mr. SEVIGNY: When were they dismissed?

Mr. BUREAU: When they were tried.

Mr. SEVIGNY: When was that?

Mr. BUREAU: At the time you summoned them. You know the date. It was during the course of last spring. That very same day I sent a man to buy some Blue Jay corn plasters at the Pharmacie Normand, and there were no war stamps on it. My hon. friend's officer was not aware of that.

Mr. SEVIGNY: In that case the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) failed in his duty.

Mr. BUREAU: There is no use in my hon. friend talking that way. He is not in Dorchester now.

Mr. SEVIGNY: The next time my hon. friend goes to the Pharmacie Normand and finds they do not put stamps on articles which should be stamped, if he will take it up with me, we will institute proceedings right away.

Mr. BUREAU: The men employed by the Minister of Inland Revenue were apparently unable to find Mr. Normand's place of business. I forget the exact reason why the other cases were dismissed. I believe it was because of some technicality in the laying of the complaints. Proper instructions were not given to the officers, and the informations were badly laid. I believe that was why the actions were dismissed. Those who paid the $50 pleaded guilty to not having put the stamp on these Blue Jay corn plasters.

An hon. MEMBER: All Grits?

Mr. BUREAU: They were all Grits. There were four other stores but they were not brought up. I do not know why, unless it was that they were Tories.

Mr. GLASS: I suppose the Tories put the stamps on?

Mr. BUREAU: I tell you they did not. I went around myself, got the stuff, and there were no stamps on it. The Tories are being protected by my hon. friend. It need not bring such a laugh to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance or such a broad smile to the faces of my hon. friends opposite. It is an absolute fact. It is only by deeds of the past that we are enabled to judge what will take place in the future, especially with an election pending.

Mr. GLASS: Assuming that the statement of my hon. friend from Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) is true, and that the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue has been showing partiality to the Conservatives in Quebec, I feel that I have a grievance against the minister, for in the part of the country from which I come the proceedings that were taken against merchants for infringements of this Act happened to have been taken against Conservatives.

Mr. BUREAU: They are too far away from the minister; he cannot keep his eye on them.

Mr. BOIVIN: Upon what system are these employees, these informers, paid for laying these complaints and for travelling around the country?

Mr. SEVIGNY: They get half the fine.

Mr. BOIVIN: Do they get a salary apart from getting half the fine?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Yes, $900; too small in my judgment.

Mr. BOIVIN: In cases where prosecutions are not proceeded with under orders from the department, do they get any portion of the amount that they would have received had the case gone on?

Mr. SEVIGNY: They receive nothing except their pay.

Mr. BOIVIN: In that case who pays the travelling expenses?

Mr. SEVIGNY: In many cases, when it is a first offence, and when an affidavit is sent to the department stating that there was no intention to disobey the law, we are not severe, and I think my hon. friend knows it himself.

Mr. BOIVIN: My hon. friend has said that in some cases where an affidavit is sent by the person complained against to the effect that he had no intention of disobeying the law and that it was only an occasional infraction, the department have remitted the fine on payment of costs. What becomes of the costs in those cases where his own political friends are not proceeded against?

Mr. SEVIGNY: In all such cases the costs are paid by the defendant. In the two cases that are very well known to my hon. friend from Shefford, that is what happened.

Mr. BOIVIN: For the benefit of my hon. friend from Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) I have explained the case of two friends in whose behalf I applied to the department in connection with a fine. In those two cases the fine was not collected when an affidavit was filed to the effect that the violation was not intentional, that it was not customary, that the sale was made by a young employee during the absence of the merchant. In those cases the fine was not collected, but the costs were collected. Who paid the costs in the case of the complaint laid against Mr. Welch, druggist, of Waterloo, where the complaint was withdrawn? Were any costs paid by the defendant Mr. Welch who happened to be a Conservative?

Mr. SEVIGNY: I will inquire about this special case.

Mr. BOIVIN: It will be very interesting to the electors of Shefford, especially those who have paid their fines.

Mr. SEVIGNY: Who was representing Mr. Welch?

Mr. BOIVIN: I think that Mr. Davidson, the defeated Conservative candidate, represented Mr. Welch.

An hon. MEMBER: Is he a lawyer?

Mr. BOIVIN: He is not a lawyer, but he administers the patronage in Shefford county.

Mr. SEVIGNY: Is Mr. Davidson a lawyer?

Mr. BOIVIN: He is not a lawyer, but the case never went into court.

Mr. SEVIGNY: Then there would be no costs?

Mr. BOIVIN: There was the cost of making the complaint, of reporting it to the collector at Sherbrooke, of sending notices from Sherbrooke to Ottawa and the salary and travelling expenses of the officer.

Mr. SEVIGNY: Unless they were paid by Mr. Davidson.

Mr. BOIVIN: They possibly may have been paid by Mr. Davidson, but I have my doubts about it.

Mr. BUREAU: I understand from the minister that half the fine goes to the informer or excise officer?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: And that man gets besides $900 a year?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: Plus travelling expenses?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Yes.

[M. Boivin.]

Mr. BUREAU: Does the minister think that it is the proper way of administering his department to give the informer half of the fine? And will he give us the reasons for that policy?

Mr. SEVIGNY: It is considered by the department the only effective way. It is nothing new. You will see it done every day in our province under the license law.

Mr. DELISLE: Not half.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I do not know exactly what the amount is.

Mr. BUREAU: Officers under the license law get fifteen per cent. They used to get half the fine but they are doing away with that. What can one think of the minister's statement that the only effective way of carrying on the administration of the department is to give fifty per cent of the fine to the informer? I think that to give $900 to the man who does what this man did in Three Rivers, plus his travelling expenses, is overpaying him unless the money is to be turned over to the Dorchester election fund or some other fund unknown to the House. You cannot get men who will go around and fish for information for half the fine, and if you do, you get a class of men who are not a credit to the department. If you have a good officer and if his salary is not sufficient, raise it. Out of this $57,000 that is being asked for by the minister, there should be enough to raise the salaries of each of these officers to such a point that it will be possible for him to live and do his duty.

I do not believe in giving the informer one half of the fine because those who will do that are generally not the class of men required for this sort of duty. If they were paid a salary and travelling expenses I think the Government should get the benefit of all fines collected.

Mr. MICHAUD: How much was paid to the informer at Three Rivers during the last twelve months?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Seven people were fined $50 each; that would mean $175 to the informer.

Mr. BUREAU: The minister says there are other cases pending. What are they?

Mr. SEVIGNY: The cases of A. Belineau, P. Dufresne, C. Kleiner, M. Nassif, Pharmacie Pelletier, Pharmacie Williams.

Mr. BUREAU: Has there been any report to the department about these cases?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Not yet.

Mr. BUREAU: When were the complaints made?

Mr. SEVIGNY: During last spring.

Mr. BUREAU: Is not the minister aware that all those cases were dismissed by the magistrate last spring at the time the others pleaded guilty?

Mr. SEVIGNY: We have no report from the lawyer.

Mr. BUREAU: I will not make a report, it is not my duty. To whom was the $175 paid?

Mr. SEVIGNY: I think to Mr. Hardy, of Quebec.

Mr. BUREAU: Has any inquiry been made by the department about the cases now under advisement before the court?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Probably.

Mr. BUREAU: What is the probability and what was the kind of inquiry? Probably it will rain to-morrow.

Mr. SEVIGNY: This matter is handled by the secretary of the department, and we have confidence in our lawyer. When we send a case to a lawyer we have confidence in him, and we are waiting for the report.

Mr. BUREAU: That is not an explanation. A client generally inquires of his lawyer how his case is progressing.

Mr. SEVIGNY: That is what we do.

Mr. BUREAU: Those cases were all tried at the same time and some pleaded guilty.

Mr. SEVIGNY: Were you there at the time?

Mr. BUREAU: I was there in Court last spring, and the cases were dismissed because the informations were not properly laid. Why did the minister not inquire about the cases?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Were you there when the others were fined?

Mr. BUREAU: The cases were never tried, the defendants deposited their $50.

Mr. SEVIGNY: And were the cases of those fined pleaded at the same time as those dismissed?

Mr. BUREAU: I have sat here for seventeen years, and this is the first time I have heard a minister call on the Opposition to give him information about his estimates. The minister does not find it worth while to look after this business, after bringing practically all the men in a particular business in the town into Court. There has been ample time for the minister to get reports about status of the cases.

Mr. SEVIGNY (translation): I do not quite understand my hon. friend. He states that these cases have been dismissed and at the same time that some of the parties were fined.

Mr. BUREAU (translation): They pleaded guilty.

Mr. SEVIGNY (translation): They pleaded guilty and have been fined $50. Once more my hon. friend maintains that these cases have been dismissed, whereas from the reports in the department, they would still be under advisement. How could we have a report stating that seven parties have been fined $50 as provided by the Act, and no report concerning the cases which, according to my hon. friend, have been dismissed?

Mr. BUREAU (translation): I see the point that the minister is trying to make. I will answer him in English.

The minister asks how it is he has received the money when fines were imposed and that he has no further report about the cases dismissed. That is just the question I am asking the minister. He has been derelict in his duty if he does not know what was done in these cases.

Mr. SEVIGNY: My hon. friend says the cases were dismissed, and my answer is that the cases were not dismissed.

Mr. BUREAU: All right.

Mr. SEVIGNY: And the information we have in my department is that the cases are pending.

Mr. BUREAU: When did the minister get the last report on these cases?

Mr. SEVIGNY: I am sorry, I have not the date before me tonight.

Mr. BOIVIN: How is it he has let the cases drag on since February last without asking for a report?

Mr. SEVIGNY: We have asked for reports. We have many cases, not only in Three Rivers and Quebec, but all over the country. We follow them as well as we can, and we ask for reports. We have every confidence in the lawyers who represent us.

Mr. BOIVIN: Does the hon. minister want the House and the country to believe that, when a case is taken in the month of February, and he receives fines from a certain number of cases tried at the same time, and asks for a report concerning the other case, and there is no report received up to July, he is going to continue his confidence in that attorney, and to continue to entrust the business of the country to him?

Mr. SEVIGNY: My hon. friend knows very well that if you take an action say in Montreal, it may come before the court three years from now.

Mr. BOIVIN: If my hon. friend had practised law as much as he wishes us to believe we would know that there is a great deal of difference in cases before a Superior Court and cases before a district magistrate. A case may drag along in the Superior Court in Montreal for years, but a case before a district magistrate does not drag along for two or three months or two or three weeks in any place in the country. There is no congestion in the district magistrate's court.

Mr. SEVIGNY: How long did the Lepage case continue in my hon. friend's own district? My hon. friend knows that it was about a year.

Mr. BOIVIN: My hon. friend knows that the Lepage case had nothing to do with the administration of his department, and it would be altogether too long to explain to this House and the country the good fortune that attended Mr. Lepage in his liberation from the jail, through the good offices of the present Minister of Inland Revenue.

Mr. SEVIGNY: Under the hon. gentleman's recommendation.

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes, it was asked for by the minister. The Lepage preliminary inquiry did not take a year, or six months, or two months. It was over in a month. Lepage was condemned to stand his trial. He remained under bonds for practically three years, awaiting a term of the Court of King's Bench. And when that term was held he refused to come before the court. He obtained an order for speedy trial before the district magistrate, and after that the trial was over inside of six weeks. Why did not the minister ask for a report in those cases at Three Rivers? Upon what date did my hon. friend receive the fine in the cases in Three Rivers?

Mr. SEVIGNY: The date is not mentioned here.

[M. Sevigny.]

Mr. BOIVIN: I rose to ask a question a little while ago, and I think it is very important information for the House. What amount has been collected by the 11 p.m. department in general, not from any one section of the country, but from the country as a whole, in fines for infractions of this Act? And how much did the collection of those fines cost the country?

Mr. SEVIGNY: I will add it up.

Mr. BOIVIN: I am perfectly willing that it should be brought down later. I thought it would be a good thing for the country to know.

Mr. McKENZIE: The last night we discussed the hon. minister's estimate. I brought to his notice certain correspondence that took place between his department and the Auditor General. This correspondence is found on pages 37, 38 and 39 of the first volume of the Auditor General's Report for the last fiscal year. In the correspondence the Auditor General complains that the department has been employing temporary assistance without complying with the law. The Minister of Finance told us that every thing in connection with the employment of men in the hon. minister's department is performed with mathematical accuracy, on chronometer time, and that being so, I am surprised that the Auditor General found it necessary to engage the attention of the department in many cases to find out how it was that some eleven men, as appears on page 38 of this correspondence, were employed without any apparent authority, or without complying with any regulation. I understood the hon. Minister of Finance to say to-night, in the language of the law, which he was throwing around the Minister of Inland Revenue, that that very learned and responsible body, the Treasury Board, had to have a hand in this before anybody was appointed.

Mr. SEVIGNY: What is the date?

Mr. McKENZIE: The date of the letter is the 21st December, 1915. This is the latest report of the Auditor General, and up to the end of this correspondence no satisfactory answer is given why those men were taken on without authority and retained without any authority. I did not press this inquiry on the former occasion, because the minister could not be expected to know at the time, but that is now nearly a month ago. Perhaps the minister forgot that I brought this matter up on that occasion. I was promised some information in regard to it. I find on page 1-39 of this volume what appears to me to be an irregularity in view of the high standard set in these matters by the Minister of Finance. I find this letter:

Audit Office,
November 15, 1916.

Sir,—I have again to call your attention to the correspondence between your department and this office in regard to the employment of Mr. J. A. Cantin as a temporary excise officer. The objection taken was that he could not be properly employed except under the authority of an order in council.

The only action I can find that has been taken was his transfer to the position of temporary acting inspector of electricity at Quebec at the same salary of $1,400.

Was that appointment made by order in council and has he passed the necessary examination prescribed by section 11 of the Electricity Inspection Act of 1907, which states that the Governor in Council may appoint inspectors or assistant inspectors, but not until they have passed a qualifying examination?

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

E. D. Sutherland, for A. G.

The Deputy Minister of Inland Revenue.

I find on 17th November, 1916, this answer from the Department of Inland Revenue:

Dear Mr. Sutherland,—I have your letter of November 16, concerning Mr. J. A. Cantin, Acting Inspector of Electricity at Quebec, at the salary of $1,400 per year.

I may say that Mr. Cantin is a very efficient officer, and has been preparing for his examination ever since he has been transferred to the Gas and Electricity Branch. He will be in position to pass this examination about the 15th of January next, when his position will be rectified.

Hoping this will be satisfactory.

This letter is signed by the deputy minister. Mr. Sutherland replies to that on 21st November, 1916, stating that the explanation is not at all satisfactory. There is scarcely a young man in Canada but would be glad to join the Civil Service and then attend some educational institution in which he would prepare for an examination while being paid at the rate of $1,400 per annum. The explanation given here is not satisfactory.

The reason for passing the Civil Service Act is that men shall join the Civil Service only after they have properly qualified. When inquiry is made in regard to the matter I have mentioned, not by a party who might be captious about these matters, not by a man like myself who might be trying to find fault, but by the Auditor General, the only explanation given him is that there is a young man, or an old man, or whatever he may be, attending school for the purpose of passing an examination, and in the meantime he is receiving $1,400 a year from the department, without the slightest pretext on the part of the minister of complying with the Civil Service Act. At all events, there is no pretext to be found in the explanation given by the deputy minister. When these estimates were before the committee on a former occasion I asked for, and was promised, an explanation. I may say, not only to the Minister of Inland Revenue, but to every minister in the Government, that there is a great deal of complaint about the infraction of the Civil Service Act, and the criticism is made that the Government apparently consider it is really on the statute book for the purpose of being violated and evaded rather than observed. It would be much better to throw the thing open altogether than have the farce or pretext of a Civil Service Act when the Act is not observed, when not the slightest attention is paid to it. When it suits the minister to make room for a friend, that friend comes in; he is paid a salary, and the explanation is given that he is at school somewhere, and while he is at school he is getting a salary. That is not good government; it is not fair to the people, who, at their own expense, are studying in order to pass the examination, that others should be permitted to become qualified at the expense of the Government and be placed in positions which they do not deserve and for which they have not the required qualifications under the law. I protest against such things, and I hope they will be remedied, and that we shall not be met with such conduct as this again. I hold responsible for this line of action the Minister of Finance, as he is, ex-officio, a member of the Treasury Board. He told us that not only had we the Auditor General and the head of the department, but we had this higher and stronger protection, this great bulwark for the protection of the people, the Treasury Board, of which he himself is the head and front—but over his head evidently goes this man with his $1,400 a year, although he has not the slightest pretext of qualification for the position. I would invite the Minister of Finance to make another eloquent speech in the endeavour to explain away this situation.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is too late and too hot.

Mr. McKENZIE: The Minister of Finance speaks with such vim and absolute disregard for time or hot weather.

Mr. SEVIGNY: Mr. Cantin was in the service at Quebec when the position of inspector of gas and electricity at Quebec became vacant, and Mr. Cantin was transferred to that position at the same salary on the understanding that he would pass his qualifying examination in electricity. I am glad to say that he did pass an examination and consequently he is to-day legally appointed.

Weights and Measures, gas and electric light inspection, $393,950.

Mr. BOIVIN: I understand from the note I have just received from the minister that he will give us to-morrow the information that I asked for a moment ago. I have no objection to the item passing if the minister will give the committee the information before his Estimates are finally passed.

Mr. SEVIGNY: The deputy minister informs me that it is $10,000.

Mr. McKENZIE: Will the list of officials that the minister promises to put on Hansard contain the dates of appointment and the addresses of the appointees?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD: Under which one of these items does the $27,000 come?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Under salaries.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend is asking for an increase of $26,000 in the Weights and Measures branch. I could understand there being an increase in expenditure under Excise, owing to the additional revenue, though my hon. friend did not put it on that ground. But I cannot understand why there should be this increase of $26,000 under Weights and Measures. I find that last year his predecessor, in war time too, asked $145,000 for salaries of officers, inspectors and assistant inspectors of Weights and Measures, which was an increase of $52,650. The minister is now asking for an increase of $10,000 on that one item, and for an increase of $15,000 for rent, fuel, etc. What is the reason for that increase?

Mr. SEVIGNY: The actual expenditure in connection with this item of $80,000 last year was $73,229. The deficit was covered by supplementary estimates voted previously to the adjournment of the House on account of the departure for England of the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden). It is estimated that the department will need the amount asked for this year as travelling expenses have been steadily increasing, and as the branch is developing constantly to keep pace with the industrial activities of the country, as is evidenced in the increased fees collected for the last three years as follows: Fees collected in 1915, $105,000, in 1916, $112,000, and in 1917, $131,630, showing an increase of $20,000 of fees collected by the department over last year.

Mr. MACDONALD: And my hon. friend proposes to spend $25,000 more for the sake of that $20,000?

Mr. SEVIGNY: This branch is not considered by the department as a revenue producer, but a service that is run in the interest of the public.

Mr. MACDONALD: Why are you putting it forward, then, as a revenue producer?

Mr. SEVIGNY: I quoted the fees collected merely as an evidence of the increased work the department is doing.

Mr. MACDONALD: Does my hon. friend really attempt to say that it is going to cost this country $25,000 more in order that the officials of the Weights and Measures branch may collect $20,000 more fees all over the country? It would not take the officials of the department ten minutes to collect that $20,000 if it was scattered all over the country.

Mr. SEVIGNY: To illustrate how the work of the department is increasing, last year we had to examine 300 more elevator scales in the West than the year previous. This service is run in the interest of the public. The officers must be paid their salaries and travelling expenses, and the only reason we are asking for an increase is that the service is expanding.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend says that there was an expenditure of $73,000 last year, which was $8,000 more than the vote. On June 15, in answer to a question in the House as to this increase, he said:

> We were given $65,000 last year by Parliament, but we were short by $15,000, and it is to cover that deficit that we are asking for $15,000 more this year.

Now my hon. friend tells us that it was not $15,000 more than they spent last year, but only $8,000 more; still he asks for $15,000 when the over-expenditure last year, according to the written statement he gave, was only $8,000. What is he going to do with the other $7,000?

Mr. SEVIGNY: These estimates were prepared in November last, before the end of the fiscal year, and at the time we had not an exact idea as to how we should come out. Our total expenditure last year was $73,229, and it is figured that the amount required in my department this year will be about $80,000.

Mr. MACDONALD: The explanation about these estimates being prepared last November has no relevancy at all to the matter. On 15th June my hon. friend told me that the over-expenditure was $15,000; to-night he tells us it is only $8,000. It was on account of the fact that the over-expenditure was said to be $15,000 that he attempted to justify asking for $15,000 more. If the hon. minister wanted to pay the slightest attention to economy, upon what principle does he attempt to get $7,000 more for a service when he would be amply in funds to provide for it, according to his prepared and written statement to-night, with $73,000 instead of $80,000? My hon. friend need not speak about the Estimates having been prepared in November. On 15th June, with his deputy sitting beside him, and after the financial year had ended, he told us it was $15,000; now on reflection he finds it is only $8,000.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I can assure my hon. friend that economy is practised in my department. I must say that generally speaking the officers in the department are underpaid, considering the high cost of living. This applies particularly to the officers in the Outside Service.

An hon. MEMBER: Don't they get half of the fines?

Mr. SEVIGNY: We have about 150 preventive officers, and we have collected about $10,000 in fines. That does not give a very large dividend to each officer. Every day I receive requests for increases in salary, and it is my intention to go before the Minister of Finance shortly and ask him to increase those salaries. We have practised economy to such an extent that we now realize that our officers are not sufficiently paid.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend is coming back to that again, and is giving us this homily about salaries. We are not talking about salaries at all. We are now discussing rent, fuel, travelling expenses, and stationery. Not a cent of that is salaries. It is simply an extravagance of $8,000. The minister could facilitate the passage of his estimates if he would decrease this item by $7,000, which, according to his statement, is surplusage.

Mr. SEVIGNY: It would be a pleasure to me if I could decrease it, but I am informed by the officers of my department, who are very competent officials, that the service is increasing and that these amounts are required. It is very easy to show this. In 1915 the fees collected were $100,500. In 1916, the fees collected were $131,000. That is a big increase.

Mr. MACDONALD: But, you are spending $25,000 more in order to get the $20,000. I have been a member of Parliament for a good many years, and I never saw any minister come here with evidence of such incompetency in his department as the minister has shown here on the two occasions he has come to the point. Either he is absolutely incompetent himself, or his officials are incompetent. How does the minister explain the fact that a month ago he told us he had spent $15,000, and on that basis he asked for $15,000, and now he comes and says he spent $8,000, and although he only spent $8,000 he wants $15,000. In justification of that he says, "We collected $20,000 more in fees"—and the next moment he says he wants to increase the salaries of his officials. He is increasing salaries to the extent of $10,000, and his predecessor increased them to the extent of $32,000 last year. My hon. friend has shown clearly in his own statement that he is asking for $7,000 for which there is no necessity under competent administration, and he ought to reduce the vote.

Mr. SEVIGNY: We consider this amount required. It is not my intention to answer the compliment paid me by the hon. member for Pictou.

Mr. COPP: I would like an explanation of this item:

> Provisional allowance of not more than $150 each to officers in Manitoba and provinces west thereof, whose salaries from any government service do not exceed $2,500 . . . $11,000.

Mr. SEVIGNY: It is considered that west of the Great Lakes the cost of living is higher than in the eastern provinces. This practice is followed not only in the Inland Revenue Department but also the Post Office Department.

Mr. COPP: I think it is absolutely unfair that officials in the western provinces should be given more than those in the eastern provinces. Living expenses are no higher in the West than in the East. Men living in the Maritime Provinces and Quebec are under the same expenses as those in the West.

Mr. SEVIGNY: According to the information we have in the department, the cost of living is higher in the West than the East—(I am ready to admit that the cost of living is very high in the East too). It is for that reason that we grant this amount.

Mr. COPP: I have not yet been able to learn that the cost of living in the West is any higher than it is in the East. The time has arrived when preferences of this kind should be cut out, and officials all through the Dominion treated equally in regard to salaries, instead of a little gift and sop being given to officials in one portion of the Dominion while similar treatment is denied to others. Referring to the minister's reply to my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), that it was his intention to give increased salaries to the Outside officials, it seems to me that the argument is not sufficient to justify this increase. Any hon. gentleman who has anything to do with patronage is always able to find numerous applications for any vacancies that occur. It is easy to get applications for these positions from men who know what the salary is, and therefore the argument in that regard does not afford any answer to the question as to why this increased vote is being asked for. Not only have we not found any difficulty in securing applications to fill these vacancies, but my experience has been that we have too many applications. The minister would be starting out in the right direction if he would put all the officials in his department in the same position, give them equal salaries, and cut out this gift of $150 to western officials.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I can promise my hon. friend that I will give my best consideration to his remarks.

Mr. McKENZIE: I see an item here of $80,000 in connection with the metric system. In Nova Scotia the Department of Education and our superintendents of education do not give any recognition practically to the metric system. There has been some agitation in favour of it. I was always against it myself as an innovation that is not workable at all, and one which will create a good deal of disturbance if there is an attempt made to put it into force, at least in the province from which I come. Why are we spending money in connection with the metric system?

Mr. SEVIGNY: This is to meet the wishes of teaching institutions all over the country. It is not the intention to establish a new system.

Mr. MACDONALD: If the minister would be good enough to bring down a statement of the objects to which these increases of $10,000, $15,000 and $1,000 are to be devoted, I think, considering the lateness of the hour, we might allow the item to pass.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am really serious about the metric system. We had it up a couple of years ago, when the Hon. Mr. Nantel was Minister of Inland Revenue. I always make a fierce attack upon the metric system when it shows its head. I can tell the minister that if he wants rebellion and revolution he will impose upon the Scotchman of Nova Scotia the metric system.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I will certainly do my best to avoid that revolution.

Mr. GRAHAM: Will the minister bring down that information for the hon. member?

Mr. SEVIGNY: I do not see what further information I could give. The service is increasing all the time.

Mr. MACDONALD: Why could you not bring down a statement of what you are going to do with the money?

Mr. SEVIGNY: It would, of course, be only an estimate prepared by officers of the department, as is done in every department.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister's predecessor provided for the increasing cost of living, etc., when he voted an additional $23,000 for the officials of this department. The minister is now supplementing that with another $10,000, making $42,000 in two years. That is in a department whose whole revenue is not more than $300,000.

Adulteration of food, etc., and the administration of the Act respecting fertilizers, $50,000.

Mr. MACDONALD: Will the minister make a statement with respect to the $10,000 increase here?

Mr. SEVIGNY: In considering the estimates I decided that $40,000 would be enough for this year, so I will move to reduce the item from $50,000 to $40,000.

Mr. MACDONALD: So that we have by our efforts here to-night saved the Minister of Finance from the necessity of taxing some person $10,000.

Amendment agreed to.

On motion of Sir Thomas White the House adjourned at 11.55 p.m.

Friday, July 27, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

REPORT PRESENTED.

Report of the Superintendent of Insurance for the Dominion of Canada for the year ending December 31, 1916.—Sir Thomas White.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. FRANK COCHRANE (Minister of Railways) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 118, to amend the Government Railways Act.

Mr. GRAHAM: Explain.

Mr. COCHRANE: This is to put the Government railways under the railway commission, just the same as any other railways, with the exception of claims against the railway and the expropriation clauses of the Railway Act.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister's statement is rather indefinite. Does that mean that the operation of the Government railways will be placed under the board, or simply the freight and passenger tariffs?

Mr. COCHRANE: It includes everything except expropriation clauses and claims against the Government railways

Mr. MACDONALD: The railways will be operated by the Government?

Mr. COCHRANE: Oh, yes.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

DR. BRUCE'S REPORT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir SAM HUGHES: I desire to ask the Government or the Minister of Militia for information regarding the publication of the answer of Colonel Bruce to the so-called Babtie report. I should also like to know whether the Babtie who is at the head of the commission inquiring into Dr. Bruce's report is the same Dr. Babtie who was involved in the notorious scandal in connection with the British Medical Service in Mesopotamia, and who has been practically relegated from the service.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I speak subject to correction, but I think the last time this question was asked in the House the Prime Minister stated that he proposed sending Dr. Bruce's report to the minister of the overseas forces for consideration, before laying it on the Table, and he gave certain reasons for that. I know nothing more about the matter than what was stated by the Prime Minister at the time. With regard to my hon. friend's other question about General Babtie, I have heard nothing about the matter to which he refers.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Surely the Government would not let a valuable document like that pass out of their hands without keeping a copy. I might say that it would be possible for me to furnish the Government with a copy if they have not got one. I think in the interests of the country the report should be laid on the Table and printed for distribution.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I will draw the Prime Minister's attention to the matter.

Mr. MACDONALD: Is the report of Dr. Bruce being witheld until some answer to it can be prepared?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I have no more information on the subject than was given to the House by the Prime Minister, but I shall be glad to direct his attention to my hon. friend's question.

Mr. MACDONALD: As this matter comes under the Militia Department, and as there is no Minister of Militia except my hon. friend and the so-called acting minister in England, how is it that my hon. friend comes to this Parliament and says, as Minister of Militia, that he knows nothing whatever about this matter? If he does not know, who does? Why has not Dr. Bruce's report been laid on the Table?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The Prime Minister gave what I presume was a satisfactory answer to the House a short time ago, since then no further information on the subject has come before me. The matter was one which the minister of the overseas forces has to do. He is a colleague of mine, in control of the overseas forces in Great Britain. He is subject to the Prime Minister's direction, and not to that of the Minister of Militia, as my hon. friend seems to think.

Mr. MACDONALD: Are we to understand that there are two Ministers of Militia, one here and one on the other side, although there is no constitutional authority for the appointment of that other one?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The order in council creating the position of minister of overseas forces was laid on the Table. It states exactly what his position is and what his duties are. He reports to the Prime Minister.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. A. DESCARRIES (Jacques Cartier) (translation): Mr. Speaker, when the vote was taken on the third reading of Bill No. 75, Military Service Act, 1917, I was not in my seat in the House. I was under the impression that the vote would be only taken during the night, so that I was aboard the train on my way to Ottawa when the vote was taken. I wish to state that, if I had been here, I would have registered my vote against the measure.

EMPLOYMENT OF RETURNED SOLDIERS.

Hon. WILLIAM PUGSLEY St. John City): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Militia—

An hon. MEMBER: Which one?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I am the one here.

Mr. PUGSLEY: We have two Ministers of Militia, and it is sometimes rather confusing. The question I wish to ask is of very great importance as affecting recruiting, if the opportunity for voluntary enlistment has not been entirely cut off. I am informed that the Veterans' Association in the city of St. John, composed of nearly 300 returned soldiers, has recently passed a very strong resolution protesting against the employment in New Brunswick of men and officers—and some of the officers are employed at very high salaries—who have not been to the front. The opinion expressed by the veterans is that these positions ought to be given to men and officers who have been to the front. I understand that a copy of the resolution has been forwarded to my hon. friend the Minister of Militia. I would like to ask him if he has received the resolution, and what action he purposes taking with regard to it.

Hon. Sir EDWARD KEMP (Minister of Militia and Defence): The resolution to which my hon. friend refers has not yet reached me. There is a good deal to be said in respect of the opinion expressed by the Veteran's Association, as set out by my hon. friend from St. John. There are a certain number of surplus officers in Canada, and we are having the matter investigated by a competent board, with a view to seeing which officers should be retained, and which can be dispensed with, so that they may revert to civil life, particularly at this time when there are better opportunities for employment than there may be when the war closes. The matter is actually under investigation.

PREVENTIVE OFFICERS—INLAND REVENUE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: When the estimates of the Minister of Inland Revenue were under discussion last night, the minister promised that a list of the temporary preventive officers of his department would be placed on Hansard. This list does not appear in Hansard. I do not think that is treating the House fairly. The estimates were passed with the understanding that this list would be furnished, and I ask that it be placed on Hansard tomorrow.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Minister of Inland Revenue is not present at the moment, but I may say that a member of the Hansard staff spoke to me last night when I was leaving the Chamber, and stated it would be irregular to place such a list upon Hansard unless it had been read in the House.

Mr. MACDONALD: Except by consent.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is probably the explanation of the fact that the statement does not appear in Hansard. However, I shall bring the matter to the attention of the Minister of Inland Revenue.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: The Minister of Inland Revenue was quite ready to read the list last night, and it was only by unanimous consent of the committee that its reading was dispensed with, with the understanding that it would be given to Hansard.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I will direct the attention of the minister to the point. Hansard, of course, would have no objection of embodying such a list in the report, if it is regular to do so. I should think it could be done with the unanimous consent of the House, but not otherwise. I assume the House is unanimous in consenting to it.

And consent being given.

INSURANCE ACT AMENDMENT.

PROPOSED NEW ENACTMENT.

House in committee on Bill No. 53, an Act respecting insurance.—Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Since this Bill was before the House it has been carefully considered by the Banking and Commerce Committee. I explained upon its introduction that I was extremely reluctant to take up so important and so extensive a measure of legislation at this session of the House, but that the insurance business was, by reason of a decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council which challenged the constitutionality of the Dominion Insurance Act, in such a condition that this legislation is deemed absolutely necessary in order that the Department of Insurance may exercise proper control over that business throughout the Dominion.

On section 3—Application of Act:

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Bill with the amendments made by the Banking and Commerce Committee has not been reprinted. The Banking and Commerce Committee made an amendment to subsection 2 of section 3 of the Bill, as follows:

(2a) To any contract entered into or any certificate of membership or policy of insurance issued before the twentieth day of July, eighteen hundred and eighty-five by any assessment life insurance company.

This is simply a transfer of an existing section 75 from another part of the Act to this section, where it would appear to be more appropriately placed.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Licenses:

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I have an amendment to subsection 3 of section 4—

Mr. PUGSLEY: Was section 3 passed?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes, but we would be glad to consider anything my hon. friend may have to suggest.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Section 3 refers to the application of the Act, and states the cases to which it shall not apply. For instance:

To any contract of marine or inland marine insurance effected in Canada by any company authorized to carry on within Canada the said business.

What was the reason of this exception? If the Act applies to all Canada, why does it not apply to a contract of this kind?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The reason is that it is not possible for any one country to control marine insurance, which may be effected anywhere. That is the explanation given me by the Superintendent of Insurance. I have not a personal knowledge of it myself, any more than my right hon. friend has, but it seems to me a reasonable explanation.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I would hardly think because a contract of marine insurance is universal, it applies to all countries. Neither this country nor any other country can have any legislative control over it. If you make a contract of insurance in London, or Paris, or any other part of the world, it must be subject to the law of some country.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The superintendent informs me that the risk is upon the high seas and consequently it is not possible, in his opinion, for the Government of any country to effectually control marine insurance.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That would apply to marine insurance on the high seas but the Bill also excepts inland marine insurance, which would cover insurance on the great lakes and on rivers and insurance in the different provinces, which would be entirely within the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada. My hon. friend must get a better reason than that.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The reason I have given is a very good one. The exception applies to ocean marine insurance as well as inland marine insurance. I was addressing myself first to the question of marine insurance, that is to the question of marine insurance, and the answer which the Superintendent of Insurance gives seems to me to be a very reasonable one. At all events, I believe his opinion is entitled to weight in the matter. As far as inland marine insurance companies are concerned, I am informed that a change was made in 1910, when my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) was Prime Minister. It was made by reason of representations, which would seem to me to be well founded, that it would not be fair to subject the agents of inland marine insurance companies to the provisions of this Act in competition as they are for business with companies not subject to the jurisdiction of the Dominion of Canada. I can understand that there is a real difference between marine insurance and other kinds of insurance as far as this Parliament is concerned. At all events I would point out to my hon. friend that if there is any objection to it there was the same objection to it in 1910 when my right hon. friend made an exception of this kind of insurance.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: If my hon. friend would always be as careful to respect the laws passed by the former regime it would be all the better for him. In the meantime, I am not satisfied with the reason given us why, as a general proposition, we cannot legislate on this question, because of the universal form of the contract, applying as it does to the high seas. I am satisfied that they have a law in Great Britain on the matter. If my memory serves me aright, in my time we had some correspondence with the British authorities on the subject. They claimed that they could legislate on these matters as against the colonies. For the reason that their shipping is much more important than ours, they claimed jurisdiction. We did not always agree with them but still we did not contest the point. There must be some law somewhere and if they can legislate on the subject, why can we not legislate here?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think there is no doubt that we can legislate, that we have the power to legislate, but it is not regarded as expedient that we should legislate upon this question because the companies subject to our legislation would be in competition with companies outside and they would not get the insurance business.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does not that argument lose force when you come to consider that there is the same competition in regard to fire insurance? One of the greatest competitors of the fire insurance companies established in Canada arises from the operations of the mutual companies of the United States. They insure properties in Canada, and although they have never made a deposit with the Government, they do a very large business. It is true that the contract cannot be enforced in Canada. A party sustaining a loss caused by the destruction of, or damage to, his property cannot recover against these mutual companies in Canada but must go to the country in which they are located for the purpose of enforcing his rights. They are very large competitors of the legalized insurance companies having their offices in Canada. The same argument, in so far as fire insurance is concerned, would apply to the case of marine insurance. As my right hon. friend has stated, marine insurance companies are incorporated in Canada. Some companies are incorporated in Canada and other companies are licensed to do business in Canada. I do not see why the law should not be made to apply to marine insurance companies just as well as to fire and life insurance companies. The Minister of Finance has stated that some years ago, under certain legislation, marine insurance companies were excepted. I understand the object of the present law is to get over difficulties in regard to insurance which have arisen by reason of the decisions of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The minister apparently is urging the passage of this Bill, which is of enormous importance at the present time, because of an intimation that decisions of the Privy Council have thrown the insurance business into a state of confusion. If they have it seems to me that their judgment would affect the position of marine insurance companies. If it is desirable to pass a general Act which would relieve the insurance companies from the difficulties caused by the decisions of the court, I think it ought to be applied to all insurance companies doing business in Canada as well as to fire and life insurance companies.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No question has been raised as to this exception which was inserted in the Act. The case is not at all on all fours with that of the fire insurance companies which are licensed to do business here, which have to conform to the conditions of this Act and which are in competition with the mutuals outside of Canada. There are no marine insurance companies complaining of this legislation. In 1910, I find representations were made by the transportation companies that unless these companies were exempted from the provisions of this Insurance Act there would be discrimination against the St. Lawrence route and Canadian ports generally in so far as insurance was concerned, which would mean an increase in insurance rates and an increase in freight rates upon the St. Lawrence route. If my hon. friend desires that these inland marine insurance companies should be subjected to the provisions of this Act, and if we should meet his request, it would only mean that ocean freight rates to his own port of St. John and on the St. Lawrence route would be injuriously affected. My hon. friend does not want to bring that about. It seems to me that his objection is ill founded.

It is true that we are bringing this measure down by reason of the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council raised no objection to inland marine insurance companies being exempted from the privisions of this Act, nor did they advert to the status of these companies in their decision. By reason of that decision, because it is so far reaching, it is unfortunately necessary that we should re-enact the entire Insurance Bill, and that is why we are now considering this section with all the other sections, although it was not touched by the decision of the law lords of the Privy Council.

Mr. NESBITT: I spent a good deal of time in the committee when the Insurance Act was enacted in 1910, and the reason given by the minister is the reason why we exempted these marine insurance companies. Besides that, there has since been no trouble over it, so far as I know. I do a good deal of marine insurance when I am at home, and I have never experienced any difficulty since that time.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: By what law is it regulated, the British Act?

Mr. NESBITT: The British Act. So far as concerns any companies doing business in Canada that I know of, they are regulated by the British Act, and we have not interfered with them. We did not interfere with them then because it was represented to us that this might make a difference to the St. Lawrence route insurance, and also to the inland waters insurance. That is why we exempted this marine insurance at that time, and this Bill makes no change from the Act of 1910.

On section 4—Licenses may be granted to Canadian and foreign companies:

Mr. SINCLAIR: In section 4 there is a clause providing for Lloyd's Association to be licensed to do business in Canada. Would that include the right to carry on marine insurance? Provision is made in section 3 that such an association may be licensed.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Permissive:

Mr. SINCLAIR: That would mean that they can carry on marine insurance in Canada if licensed?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: They may apply for a license, but they would not do so because they are exempt under section 3, which we have been discussing. It is open to a marine insurance company to take out a license under the Act, but as that entails a certain deposit and a fulfilment of the requirements of the Act, it is not at all probable that any marine company would take out a license, as they are exempted from doing so under section 3.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Subsection 2 of this section provides that a foreign company incorporated outside Canada, the moment it becomes licensed to do business in Canada, shall be deemed to be a company incorporated under the laws of Canada; in other words, shall be deemed to be a company incorporated under the Canadian company law.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why not? How on earth can it be deemed to be a company if incorporated under the laws of Canada unless it is deemed to be a company incorporated under the laws which provide for the incorporation of Canadian companies.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I quite appreciate the point raised. It attracted my own attention, and it has been carefully considered by the Deputy Minister of Justice. If my hon. friend will turn to the interpretation section and look at the definition of "Canadian company" he will find that that definition excludes any British or foreign company "which becomes incorporated under the provisions of this Act by reason merely of obtaining a license from the minister as herein authorized." That, therefore, excludes from the meaning of the words "Canadian company" any British or foreign company which becomes incorporated under the provisions of this Act by reason of obtaining a license under the Act.

To come back to subsection 1, which is under immediate consideration, my hon. friend's point is, will the effect of this legislation be to make, let us say, a New York incorporation a Canadian corporation? I need not say to my hon. friend (Mr. Pugsley), as a good lawyer, that it is not within the power of this Parliament to make a New York corporation into a Canadian corporation.

Mr. PUGSLEY: You attempt to do it.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am sound in my law as to that. In the first place, the Dominion Government has not jurisdiction to do it. There is nothing clearer than this: that a company incorporated under the laws of any country remains subject to the laws of that country; that is to say, its domicile is that country. It is open to this Parliament to say that a foreign company shall be deemed to be a Canadian company for the purposes of this Act, but that does not make it a Canadian company in the same sense as a Canadian company incorporated under the Dominion Companies Act.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister does not limit it to the word "deemed;" it says it shall thereupon and thereby become and be a company incorporated under the laws of Canada; not merely "deemed to be," but "shall be."

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Then let us say still I am correct, because, in the first place, this Parliament, no matter what words are used, cannot make a New York insurance company into a Canadian corporation. That is the starting point.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Then why attempt to do it?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Because, for the purposes of this Act, it is necessary to put it in precisely the same position as a Canadian company. I made a suggestion myself, which the Deputy Minister of Justice ruled against, that it should be made clear that, by the insertion of the words "for the purposes of this Act," we were not trying to make a foreign corporation a Dominion corporation. The Deputy Minister of Justice, however, upon a full consideration of the purposes and effect of the Bill, by this section confirmed these words that my hon. friend now takes exception to, and did not regard it as expedient that the words "for the purposes of this Act" should be inserted after the word "be." All I can say to my hon. friend is that we are trying now to make the Act constitutional. The constitutionality of the Act has often been impugned, and recently so in a rather vague way, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council has declared it so. In that decision it was suggested that it would be possible for the Dominion Parliament to frame legislation, providing the wording was apt, which would give it the jurisdiction which we now seek to regulate the insurance business in Canada. These sections which we now have under consideration have received the most painstaking attention on the part of the Deputy Minister of Justice and outside counsel.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What outside counsel?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think Christopher Robinson of Toronto. I hesitate, therefore, to make any change in this wording, which has been so carefully considered and deemed essential, in order that this Act may be held to be constitutional, should its constitutionality be challenged, as it has been in the past.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have the greatest possible respect for the Deputy Minister of Justice, for his legal standing and great knowledge, and for the ability of Mr. Christopher Robinson. He is a young man of great ability doubtless, but these men are not legislators here. The responsibility is upon us, the members of this Parliament, and notwithstanding what my hon. friend says as to their opinion, it strikes me as a most anomalous and extraordinary thing to use the language which is contained in this section. There have been two or three occasions on which Parliament has given to foreign companies incorporated outside, the status of companies incorporated in Canada. I remember one occasion when a telegraph company, incorporated in France, I think, was given the status and powers of a company incorporated in Canada. I think a company incorporated in the state of New York was given power by the New Brunswick legislature to operate a street railway in New Brunswick, when I was a member of the Government of that province, or at all events, a member of the legislature. It was given power to operate in New Brunswick, the same as if it were incorporated in that province. But there are very rare instances where such a power has been given. It has always been the policy of this Parliament, and the policy of the legislatures, when people seek to get the status of a company to operate in Canada, to tell them to go to the Parliament, or to the legislatures of the provinces, and receive their corporate powers. By this section it is proposed to make a foreign company a corporation under the laws of Canada, not merely for the purpose of this Act, which I might be able to understand, but with this extraordinary section, for which there is no precedent in the legislation of this Parliament, or, I venture to say, in the legislation of any legislature of any province in Canada. I declare most positively there is no precedent for this extraordinary language. It is provided that a foreign company incorporated by a foreign legislature shall, the moment the license is granted, become a corporation under the laws of Canada. The section reads:

> Any company other than a Canadian company which may obtain from the minister a license or a renewal of a license shall thereupon and thereby become and be deemed to be a company incorporated under the laws of Canada with power to carry on throughout Canada, or in such part or parts of Canada as may be specified in the license, the various branches or kinds of insurance which the license may authorize.

Mr. NESBITT: Why does the hon. gentleman object to it?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Because it is unnecessary, and if you are going to incorporate a foreign company under the laws of Canada, you must know what powers you are giving to that company.

Mr. NESBITT: We give them all the powers a Canadian company would have, as long as they take out a license.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Let us do that, but do not let us make them a corporate body.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We do not have to.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend is wrong when he says: We do not have to. If a company is incorporated in Canada, and becomes a Canadian company, in order to become such, it must be incorporated, either by this Parliament or under the Companies' Act of Canada. If it is incorporated by Parliament, certain restrictions and limitations are thrown round its incorporation. If it is incorporated under the Companies Act, it becomes liable to all the obligations imposed by the Companies Act. It has the powers which are conferred by the Companies Act, but here we propose, in vague and general terms, to create that foreign company a company under the laws of Canada. Under what laws? Under the Companies Act?

Mr. NESBITT: Under this law.

Mr. PUGSLEY: No, not under this law.

Mr. NESBITT: The moment we license them they become a company.

Mr. PUGSLEY: They become a company under the laws of Canada. Are they under the Companies Act? Will the provisions of the Companies Act apply to them and govern their meetings, if they have meetings in Canada? Will it govern their obligations in Canada? Will the Companies Act apply generally to such a company, so far as applicable? The hon. gentleman will see they are not to become a company merely under this law and for the purposes of this law. If that were so, I could understand it, and I do not know that I would have any objection to it, but they are to become a company under the laws of Canada, and every law which applies to companies in Canada would necessarily apply to these companies which take out licenses. The Minister of Finance says that this is controlled or regulated by paragraph (d) which reads:

"Company" means any corporation incorporated under the laws of Canada or under the laws of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland or of any British possession other than a province of Canada, or of any foreign country for the purpose of carrying on the business of insurance.

That does not affect it at all. That simply gives the definition of the word "company." Why could the minister not say that this section applies to any company incorporated in a foreign country, obtaining a license to carry on business in Canada? Why is it necessary to transform a foreign company into a company incorporated under the laws of Canada? Why state a falsehood in the statute? Why put in the statute a provision which is a farce, not a reality? My hon. friend has stated that we cannot make a foreign company a Canadian incorporated company, no matter what language we use. Why, then, use language which cannot effect the contemplated result?

Mr. NESBITT: Can we not make a foreign company come under the laws of Canada, so far as Canadian business is concerned?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Undoubtedly we can.

Mr. NESBITT: That is all we are doing here.

Mr. PUGSLEY: We are doing much more than that. We are declaring by section 2 that any foreign company obtaining a license shall thereby become and be deemed to be a company incorporated under the laws of Canada, with power to carry on throughout Canada the business of insurance.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: What would be the objection to a foreign company becoming a company incorporated under the laws of Canada?

Mr. PUGSLEY: The objection is manifest. The law of Canada governing companies is the Companies Act. There are a hundred provisions of that Act to which a foreign company would not want to be amenable. Is it intended to make all the provisions of the Companies Act applicable to foreign companies, or is it not? Does my hon. friend (Mr. Middlebro) think that we can do that? Does he think that we intend to do that?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: I do not think that we can make a foreign company a Canadian company against its will.

Mr. PUGSLEY: But we are going to do that.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: We are not going to do that, because we cannot.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Then if we cannot do it, why attempt to do it?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: For the purposes of this Act.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is not for the purposes of this Act. The minister wanted the words: "for the purposes of this Act" put in, but the Deputy Minister of Justice advised against that; therefore the provision is not designed only for the purposes of this Act. Any company which comes under this provision will be deemed an incorporation under the laws of Canada for all purposes. If this section passes, the moment a foreign company obtains a license under this Act, it thereby, under the clear language of the section, becomes a company incorporated under the laws of Canada.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: To the extent of Dominion jurisdiction only.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If it becomes a company incorporated under the laws of Canada, surely it becomes a Canadian corporation; surely the company laws of Canada then apply to it.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Then what laws of Canada do apply to it?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: This Act.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It does not say this Act.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No other Act.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Then why not say, under this Act? I see no objection to providing that foreign companies should become and be deemed to be incorporated for the purposes of this Act.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I did not, either.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend is right in his view, and I think that if he had had his way he would have been doing the sensible thing. If Parliament passes this section in its present form, it will be doing something unparalleled in legislation, and for which no good reason has been stated.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am very much more modest than my hon. friend. I put forward the same suggestion, but when it was pointed out to me by the Superintendent of Insurance that the Deputy Minister of Justice, who had argued this case up to and before the Privy Council, was of opinion that those words should not be inserted, I bowed in deference to his opinion.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will the minister state the reasons for his opinion?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not know what reasons the Deputy Minister of Justice had for his opinion, but I am quite satisfied that although the words are not inserted the effect is practically the same as if the words were in. My hon. friend seems to think that the Parliament of Canada or the legislatures of the provinces cannot legislate with respect to foreign corporations.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I did not say that.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I agree that my hon. friend did not say that they could not legislate, but he rather indicated that they did so very rarely—indeed, that it was an improper thing for them to do. But it is a very common thing to do. Take the case of a company incorporated under the laws of Ontario which desires to carry on business in Manitoba. Application is made on its behalf to the legislature of Manitoba and an Act is passed which makes the company, for the purpose of that Act, a Manitoba incorporation. It proceeds, therefore, to carry on business in Manitoba under the authority of that legislation; otherwise it could not lawfully carry on business in that province. There is no doubt that this Parliament cannot make an American corporation into a Canadian corporation; that is to say, it cannot give it any wider powers; it cannot cut down its original powers. But it can limit the exercise of those powers within Canada; it can determine the conditions under which that company shall carry on business in Canada, and it may declare that that company is deemed to be a Canadian corporation in the carrying on of the business which it is authorized to carry on. We desire to make it perfectly clear that this Parliament has authority to require a foreign corporation to take out a license and to conform to the provisions of this Act before carrying on business in Canada. That is a point that might be contested. In order to make that absolutely beyond legal question, we enact here that a foreign corporation—I shall quote the language of the section:

4 p.m.

> Any company other than a Canadian company which may obtain from the minister a license or a renewal of a license shall thereupon and thereby become and be and be deemed to be a company incorporated under the laws of Canada with power to carry on throughout Canada, or in such part or parts of Canada as may be specified in the license, the various branches or kinds of insurance which the license may authorize.

The purpose of that subsection is perfectly clear to me, and I think it is to my hon. friend. In order to give the Dominion Government plenary authority over this company in carrying on the business of insurance within Canada, it is to be deemed to be, and by this legislation becomes, for the purposes of this Act, a company incorporated under the laws of Canada. The question might be raised before the courts or before the Privy Council as to the constitutionality of this law; as to whether the Dominion Government had the right to require a foreign corporation to take out a license before it could do business in Canada, or make provision as to how it should carry on its business after obtaining the license. A sufficient answer to that would be: by this legislation, within the clear limits of its constitutional authority, the Dominion Parliament declares this foreign corporation to be a Canadian company, with power to carry on business as permitted by the license which it has taken out.

At first blush I had the same view that my hon. friend now has, that we should insert the words "for the purposes of this Act." I used almost the same language as my hon. friend. But when the responsible legal advisor of the Government, who has lived on this case, took an opposite view, and with much greater modesty than is possessed by my hon. friend from St. John, I thought his opinion and not mine should govern, and gave way; because we are enacting here a measure that has to stand the test of the law courts, and with all due deference to the hon. member for St. John, no matter what respect I may have for him as a legislator—and I shall make no statement on that to-day—I would rather have the opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice on a strictly legal point in a case with which he has been identified for so long a period.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The extraordinary nature of this legislation is my excuse for taking up a little more of the time of the House. The difference between the minister and myself with regard to modesty is that mine is normal and his abnormal; the modesty he has shown to-day is certainly abnormal. Surely when the minister comes to us with a piece of legislation in regard to the terms of which he is surrendering his own judgment to the judgment of the legal advisor of the Government, he ought to be in a position to tell us why the legal advisor insists upon this extraordinary language being used, language which did not commend itself to the judgment of the Minister of Finance in the first place. The Minister of Finance has studied law. I would say that he is a good lawyer. He has had a long business training, and I would regard his judgment upon a matter of business legislation as exceedingly good. He comes here to-day and tells us that his judgment has been overruled, and he asks Parliament to adopt this extraordinary piece of legislation—legislation which creates a foreign company, the moment it obtains a license, a corporation under the laws of Canada, not merely for the purposes of this Act, but for all purposes. The foreign company is thus created a Canadian corporation under the laws of Canada, not under this Act merely, but under any law which relates to companies incorporated in Canada. I think the minister ought to tell us why that change was made. Why would it not be sufficient simply to declare that no company other than a Canadian company shall be allowed to do business in Canada without first obtaining a license therefor from the Minister of Finance, and on obtaining said license such company shall become subject to the provisions of this Act. That surely would be sufficient. Why it is necessary to make this radical departure from what is recognized as good legislation, and to declare a foreign company a company incorporated under the laws of Canada, I fail to understand. I do not think the minister believes for a single moment that this is good legislation. I think he realizes that his own view was the correct one. The company might properly be named a corporation for the purposes of this Act. I think that is the minister's own view, and yet he yields to the view of someone else. Whether the deputy minister has personally given his opinion, or whether it was simply some official under him, I do not know, but the minister asks this Parliament, as if we had no sense or intelligence, to pass this extraordinary legislation against what was his own view when he was first considering the Act, and against what I believe is his own view to-day. He is not able to give us a single reason why this language should be used.

Mr. NESBITT: I do not know anything about the law and I have no right to discuss a legal point, but it looks to me that section 2 simply intends to make these companies Canadian companies in so far as doing business in Canada under this Act is concerned. I do not see that it affects the companies under any other Act. It seems to me the section will accomplish what we are trying to do.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Let us insert the words "for the purpose of this Act." I beg to move that the after the word "Canada" in line 7, the words "for the purpose of this Act" be inserted. That would avoid the absurdity which would otherwise be in the statute. It would do no harm, and would clearly carry out what I believe is the intention of the committee.

Mr. NESBITT: All the big companies have copies of this Act and they have not complained so far as I know.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not think it would be wise to adopt this amendment. It was considered by the Banking and Commerce Committee and the Deputy Minister of Justice advised against it. My hon. friend asks for a reason why it should not be inserted. The onus is on him to show that it should be inserted, but I will give him one reason why it should not be inserted. Its tendency would be to qualify and cut down the effect of the language as it now stands. By this legislation which is thought to be necessary in order to make this Insurance Act constitutional, it is provided that:

> Any company other than a Canadian company which may obtain from the minister a license or a renewal of a license shall thereupon and thereby become and be and be deemed to be a company incorporated under the laws of Canada with power to carry on throughout Canada, or in such part or parts of Canada as may be specified in the license, the various branches or kinds of insurance which the license may authorize.

That unquestionably brings that foreign company under the jurisdiction of this Parliament. Now if the amendment of my hon. friend were accepted—and I have stated that it had occurred to me that such an amendment might be inserted—the effect would be to diminish the strength of the section as it now stands, by qualifying it. How qualifying it? For the purposes of this Act. I have no doubt in my mind that the effect of the section as it now stands is that for the purposes of this Act the foreign company becomes a Canadian corporation, but as the matter is so important from a constitutional standpoint, and as the Department of Justice has specially advised against our qualifying it——

Mr. NESBITT: Was it the deputy minister?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes, so I am informed by the Superintendent of Insurance, who took this matter up with him. Therefore I am unwilling to consent to the amendment, although I suggested the same amendment to the Banking and Commerce Committee myself. Our object is to make the provision constitutionally valid beyond all question.

With all due deference to the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley), a constitutional question is a legal question, and I do not see how members of this House can override the opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice and change language which has been considered for the definite purpose of making the constitutionality of the provision beyond question.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I move:

That the words "for the purposes of this Act" be inserted after the word "Canada" in line 7 of subsection 2 of section 4.

How can that injuriously affect the constitutionality of this section? The minister must bear in mind that we are charged with some responsibility, and if we are not going to express our opinion and decide according to our judgment there is no object in consulting this committee, and we might as well remain outside and let the chairman and the minister pass the Bill through without us.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I should not like the hon. member for St. John to hold the view that I object to taking his opinion, or to considering the amendment. I am only answering what he said.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If the Minister of Justice, in his place and with the responsibility that rests upon him as a minister, says it is better to leave these words out, I am quite willing to yield to his view, but to ask us to put through a clause absurd and nonsensical upon its face—and I do not hesitate to say it—incorporating a foreign company as a corporation under the general laws of Canada, strikes me as something the minister should not do without having the assurance of the committee that those words will in some way affect the constitutionality of the section, or prevent the carrying out of its purpose.

Mr. NESBITT: Why not allow the clause to stand until my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) satisfies himself in regard to the point he raises?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If this is voted upon I shall direct the attention of the Deputy Minister of Justice to the debate which has taken place on this section, and if he sees fit to change his view, I will bring the matter before the House again at a later stage. I do not like to be put in the position of passing upon the opinion of Deputy Minister of Justice, or having it overridden by the hon. member for St. John. I would rather have it voted upon here, and afterwards if the Deputy Minister of Justice feels that the views of the hon. member for St. John can be met without in any way weakening the effect of the section, I shall be agreeable to meet his views.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That only shows the minister is determined to put the section through just as it is, without being able to tell the committee that there is any reason for it, and even going the length of telling the committee that it is against his own judgment, and that it is put through because an official of the department, for whom we all have great respect, thinks it is desirable. The Minister of Justice is the responsible minister of this House, so far as legal questions are concerned. I do not think the Minister of Finance should hesitate to yield to such a reasonable request as I have made. I can assure him that by doing so he will not lose any time in the consideration of the measure. I do not wish to overrule the view of the Deputy Minister of Justice; possibly he is right and I am wrong. I have often been wrong, but sometimes I am right. It is just possible I may have hit upon the right interpretation of this section. I am constrained to believe the Deputy Minister of Justice is wrong in the view he has taken. This is a very important matter. We are establishing a precedent in legislation, when we declare that foreign companies shall become companies incorporated under the laws of Canada. We are establishing for all time, precedents, which I do not believe exist in any other country in the civilized world. That being so, we should not hesitate for a moment to take the advice and guidance of the Minister of Justice.

Amendment negatived on division.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I stated to the House that this question was raised by the Banking and Commerce Committee, and an amendment suggested substantially in the terms of the amendment made by my hon. friend from St. John. That amendment was submitted to the Deputy Minister of Justice, who stated it was unnecessary and objectionable. The reason I have asked that my hon. friend's amendment should be voted down is because he seemed to impugn my word with respect to what had been done. I will say to my hon. friend, because I am just as anxious—

Mr. PUGSLEY: If my hon. friend will permit me, I did not impugn his word at all.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That was the effect of what my hon. friend said. He said we should get the opinion of the Department of Justice. As a matter of fact, we have the opinion of the Department of Justice. The Deputy Minister of Justice has been connected with this insurance case from the beginning to the end. I will submit the amendment to him, and if in his opinion it can be adopted, without weakening the effect of the section, I will see it is included.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Let me say again to my hon. friend that I did not impugn his word at all.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Not in so many words.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I did not come within a thousand miles of it. I did not doubt for a moment what he said. What I suggested was that the Minister of Justice, whose duty it is to guide this House on legal matters, is not present, and it is only a matter of reasonable courtesy that this section should be allowed to stand until he is here. I also said if the Minister of Justice advises that the insertion of this proposed amendment would be undesirable or would in any way weaken the Act, I would withdraw from the position I have taken. I am rather surprised that my hon. friend has so little confidence in his colleague the Minister of Justice that he would refuse to allow him to give an opinion and to guide this committee as to the right lines to follow.

On section 4, subsection 3—Lloyds associations:

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I have to insert after the word "or," in the 16th line, the words "any association of persons." The reason is to more accurately describe the system of inter-insurance which is not confined to individuals, but applies to corporations as well. The use of the word "persons" would cover both cases.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Is this a new section?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is practically the same as in the old Act.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I see that it authorizes a number of individuals to be licensed to carry on insurance business. Is there any limit to the subjects that this association would insure? In Lloyds you can take out a wager policy. You can get a policy, for example, that the war will terminate before the end of the present year by paying a sufficient premium. Perhaps you could get a policy that the present Government would win the next election, but in that case it would require an enormous rate of premium. Does this mean that when an association is licensed to do business it can do any kind of business it wishes?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No; it can only do the business it is authorized to do under the license. We have authority to license a company to carry on the class of wagering business referred to by my hon. friend, but in the exercise of our discretion I think it probable we would not do it. There is power to do it. They might apply for such a license and we would have to consider the question whether we should issue it or not. So far we have not granted licenses for so-called freak insurance.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The license itself will indicate the kind of business that is permitted.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why is the word "individuals" used in reference to the word "association" on line 3, and in the amendment you use the word "persons?" Is there a different interpretation for the word "persons" from that of the word "individuals?" "Persons" would include a corporation, while "individuals" would not. Is it intended in one case to exclude corporations and in the other to admit them?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The word "individuals" would not include "corporations," but it is the correct word to use in respect to Lloyds, because Lloyds is not a corporation, but an association of individuals. I think there is no question about the propriety of this definition of Lloyds. Now we come down to the amendment "or to any association of persons." That word "persons" is wide enough to embrace corporations as well as individuals.

Subsection as amended agreed to.

On section 4, subsection 4—provincial companies:

Mr. PUGSLEY: What is meant by "faculty?"

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am informed by the superintendent that the word "faculty" is used by the Privy Council in its judgment. It is not a usual word, but the idea is to make this legislation constitutional having regard to that decision.

Mr. PUGSLEY: This is a very important section. If it passes in its present form the effect will be that a company incorporated and under the control of a provinical legislature upon obtaining a license from the Minister of Finance becomes a company incorporated under the laws of Canada. Therefore, it would, ipso facto, be in the future entirely amenable to the laws of Parliament and would be taken wholly out of the jurisdiction of the provincial legislature which gave it life.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is the same question we were discussing a few moments ago.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is a little broader here.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The judgement of the Privy Council was to the effect that the Dominion Parliament has no jurisdiction over a provincially incorporated insurance company which not only does business in its own province but outside of that province. In other words, a provincially incorporated insurance company, no matter whether confining its business to the province of its incorporation or carrying on business under proper legislative authority in other provinces of Canada, is not within the jurisdiction of the Dominion Parliament unless it submits itself to such jurisdiction. The effect of this subsection is to permit provincially incorporated companies to submit themselves to Dominion jurisdiction, as many of them will. It is necessary that we should make them Dominion companies so as to have jurisdiction over them once they take out a license, and it is necessary in the opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice that we should make a provincial corporation a Canadian company so as to give us jurisdiction over it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Could that not be worked out in some way without removing them wholly from the jurisdiction of the provincial legislature?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not think we have wholly removed them.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It says:

> 4. The minister may grant to a provincial company which has the faculty or capacity to carry on its business throughout Canada and to obtain the license hereinafter mentioned, and has complied with the provisions of this Act in that behalf applicable to a Canadian company, a license authorizing the company to carry on its said business or any part thereof throughout Canada or in any part or parts of Canada comprising more than one province which may be specified in the license, and the company shall thereupon and thereby become and be and be deemed to be a company incorporated under the laws of Canada.

I venture to say that the moment that license is taken out, although that is the object of it, the effect will be to remove these provincial companies, incorporated by the provincial legislatures, having certain restrictions which the legislatures have thought wise to impose upon them, ipso facto from the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures. They will become Dominion corporations incorporated under the laws of Canada, which means this Parliament, and it seems to me they then become subject only to the jurisdiction of this Parliament. Have the governments of the different provinces been communicated with about this clause?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Bill has been sent to all the provincial departments of insurance many weeks ago. I do not agree that these provincial companies become by this legislation Dominion companies in the sense that my hon. friend has in mind. I do not believe their charters are repealed or that this Government has authority to repeal their charters. Their capitalization and powers, and any statutory provisions applicable to them as provincial incorporations, all remain in full force and effect. If a company obtains a license and wants to carry on business in Canada under that license, then it becomes a Dominion company subject to this Act. My hon. friend knows as a lawyer that very nice constitutional questions may arise. It is said that there is no legislation through which you cannot drive a coach and four. It may be that they will try to drive one through this, but this is the language which has been recommended by the Justice Department and by special counsel to meet the situation created by the Privy Council's decision.

Mr. SINCLAIR: For example, take a company incorporated in Nova Scotia, with a provision in its Act of incorporation that the head office of the company shall be in Nova Scotia. By section 51 the shareholders may change the head office from one province to another. If they should move the head office from Halifax to Toronto, which Act will govern, the Act under which the company was incorporated in Nova Scotia or this Act?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think that what the public should do in this case is to call in a lawyer and take his advice. That is a hard one.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is going to be the effect of this Act, if it is not the intention.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend will realize that we are confronted with a condition and not a theory. The condition is that the Privy Council has said that the Dominion Parliament has no jurisdiction to regulate the business of an insurance company incorporated by a provincial legislature carrying on business in its own province, or even outside its province. If we had this Act, many provincially incorporated insurance companies would desire, for the sake of their standing if nothing else, to be subject to Dominion jurisdiction. One way in which they could bring themselves within the Dominion jurisdiction, although difficulties might arise, would be to take out Dominion incorporation and have the assets and liabilities of the old company assigned to the new. This provision has been inserted to give such companies the right to make application to take out an insurance license and subject themselves to the jurisdiction of the Dominion Insurance Act. It is pointed out to me by the Superintendent of Insurance that this provision has been in the Act for many years, that the principle of licensing provincial companies is not a new one, but one of many years' standing.

Mr. PUGSLEY: These words are entirely new.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Some of them.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Are not the words "and the company shall thereupon and thereby become and be deemed to be a company incorporated under the laws of Canada" entirely new?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: And they are the vital words of the section of which I am complaining.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: They are the vital words, and the words intended to give the Dominion jurisdiction.

Mr. PUGSLEY: And to take the jurisdiction out of the provinces.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: For the purposes of this Act.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why not say so. I urge that after the word "Canada" in line 18, the words "for the purposes of this Act" should be inserted. If you do not do that you are sure to have litigation. The minister speaks of getting rid of litigation. But he is opening a wide door, and for years in the future the lawyers will rise up and call him blessed and say what a great man he has been for the profession, and how many trips he has given them across to the Privy Council.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Well, they are a good lot.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes, they are good fellows. How is it possible to argue that this is not going to take jurisdiction out of the provincial legislatures? Here is a provincial company which comes and gets a license. There would be no objection to declaring that it is to become, for the purposes of this Act, subject to the jurisdiction of the Department of Finance and is not to be permitted to carry on business except under the terms of this license. That would be quite reasonable and possible, but for some occult reason hidden in the minds of the officers of the Justice Department that has not yet penetrated the mind of the Minister of Finance, this Parliament is declaring that the moment the company obtains its license it, ipso facto, becomes what it is not, and what nobody can pretend it is—in the words of the Act it "shall thereupon and thereby become and be deemed to be a company incorporated under the laws of Canada." I have asked the minister to put in the words "for the purpose of this Act." It appears he will not do it, because, for some mysterious reason, it may impair the validity of the section.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I will say the same thing as I said before: if the sense of the House is that these words should be inserted, or if the Minister of Justice, after looking into the matter, is of the opinion that these words may be inserted without weakening the effect of the section, I will see that they are inserted.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Stands.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No; I want it carried.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It strikes the minister's pride. He wants it carried.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No. I told the hon. gentleman from St. John that this amendment had been inserted at my request in the Banking and Commerce Committee. I told him that after the words had been inserted, the deputy minister advised that they should be left out, and they were left out. It seems to me the onus, so to speak, is not upon me to insert those words, and then have them taken out afterwards, but I think we should pass the section as it stands, on the understanding that I will again consult the Minister of Justice, and draw his attention to the observations of the hon. gentleman from St. John, and, if necessary, the section can be amended at a later stage.

Mr. MONDOU: I have listened to the debate and the explanations given by the Minister of Finance in regard to these incorporated companies. A company incorporated in Quebec can go into Ontario and make a deposit and do business. A company incorporated in Ontario can go into the province of Quebec and make a deposit there. These companies, by taking out licenses, can operate in the different provinces of the Dominion. Supposing these companies want to take a Dominion license under this Bill, and apply to the Department of Insurance, will this legislation effect the companies which take out licenses from the Dominion, as far as inspection and everything provided in this Bill, or will it be done according to the local charter of that company? My opinion is that it will, and that it will not be affected by this Act, and I should like to know if my opinion is shared by the Department of Insurance. I take advantage of the presence of the Superintendent of Insurance to make the inquiry. I think that the companies that I have referred to will be governed by their charter, and their status will not be changed.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I agree with my hon. friend.

Mr. MONDOU: As regards the internal laws of the administration of the department, they will be administered according to this Act, and those laws will govern. These companies will have to make their returns to the Department of Insurance in Ottawa, but that is the only matter in which the company will be interfered with by the department. Is that the opinion of the department?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I would not like to express a definite opinion as to the precise effect of this provision, but that is my view.

Mr. MONDOU: That is the interpretation given by the department?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Returns, assets and inspections.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Deposit for license:

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In this section the word "may" is substituted for "shall." It is thought that the minister should not be under an absolute obligation, and that it should be made permissive. The word "may" has a well understood meaning, and it is practically the same thing.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—License not granted to same company for life combined with other insurance:

Sir THOMAS WHITE: This section is the same as the old section, except in the 33rd line the words "in full settlement of the policy and as a substitute for all other benefits and privileges thereunder" are struck out.

Mr. PUGSLEY: They are not struck out in my copy.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Bill has not been reprinted. Therefore the hon. gentleman has not the amendment before him, and I am calling attention to the amendments as we proceed.

Section agreed to.

On subsection 2 of section 8—Six classes:

Mr. SINCLAIR: What is weather insurance?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Insurance against hail and tornado, carried on to a large extent in the West. It is a very important branch.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The various other kinds of insurance are defined, but this is not.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is defined in the charter of the company carrying on the business.

On section 9—license not granted where charter authorizes excess of classes:

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I beg to move that the words "incorporated elsewhere than in Canada" in line 16 of this section be struck out, and that the words "British or foreign company" be inserted before the word "company." The provision will then read: "Provided, however, that any British or foreign company which has," etc. That is for the sake of uniformity. British and foreign companies are defined in the interpretation clause.

Mr. PUGSLEY: After foreign companies take out a license in Canada they cease to be incorporated elsewhere than in Canada; they are incorporated here.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: A company that is incorporated elsewhere than in Canada is either a British or a foreign company. It is thought better to substitute the words "British or foreign company" for "incorporated elsewhere than in Canada."

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 31—Life companies:

Mr. SINCLAIR: I see in the margin on page 15, opposite line 38, "Fire and inland marine companies," but there is no reference to inland marine companies in the section.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I beg to move that the words "and inland marine" in the margin be struck out.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 41 (a), subsection 4—Winding-up Act:

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will the minister explain?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The reason is that if the provisions of the Dominion Winding-up Act are applied, a great deal of unnecessary expense is incurred in the event of re-insurance being effected as provided in this section. My hon. friend will observe the declaration that any section or sections of the winding-up Act shall not apply is to be made by the court. That is the safeguard upon the section.

On subsection 6—Deposits outside of Canada:

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why should not the provisions of this subsection apply to a provincial company licensed under this Act, as well as to a company incorporated by Parliament under the Companies Act?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It would include a provincial company, because a Canadian company by the definition contained in section 2 (e) means a company incorporated under the laws of Canada.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Subsection 2 (e^1) defines a provincial company in an entirely different way.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The point my hon. friend raised when we were discussing subsection 4 of section 4 is important here. A provincial company which makes application for and obtains a license becomes a company incorporated under the laws of Canada. If my hon. friend will look at section 2 (e) he will find a "Canadian Company" means a company incorporated under the laws of Canada, therefore a provincial company becoming by this statute a company incorporated under the laws of Canada, it becomes a Canadian company.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does it?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Within the meaning of the Act, yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What is meant by the words "provincial company" then? Section 2 (e^1) states:

"provincial company" means a company incorporated under the laws of any province of Canada for the purpose of carrying on the business of insurance.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Before it takes the license.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Then it becomes a Canadian company, and is a company incorporated under the laws of Canada?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Within the definition.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I asked my hon. friend as to why certain provisions should not apply to provincial companies as well. I understood the minister to admit that there was a distinction between a company incorporated under the laws of Canada and a provincial company which became licensed under this Act. It seems to me that you are going to have confusion. The courts will hold that a company incorporated by a province, and which is a provincial company, the moment it gets the license under this Act, becomes a Canadian company because you have given a special definition to "Canadian company" and "provincial company," as follows:

"Canadian Company" means a company incorporated under the laws of Canada for the purpose of carrying on the business of insurance, excluding however any British or foreign company which becomes incorporated under the provisions of this Act by reason merely of obtaining a license from the minister as herein authorized;

"Provincial company" means a company incorporated under the laws of any province of Canada for the purpose of carrying on the business of insurance.

Under these definitions, I should think the courts would consider the expression "provincial company" to mean a company incorporated under provincial legislation. However, if the minister is satisfied that the term "Canadian company" is broad enough to apply to a provincial company, I shall not pursue the matter.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There is no doubt that in this insurance legislation, which purports to deal with provincially incorporated companies, there is room for a difference of opinion. That is inherent in the subject matter.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why not have another definition to this effect: A Canadian company shall also include a provincial company after it obtains, and while it continues to hold, a license under this Act? Then there will be no doubt.

Subsection agreed to.

On section 42—Valuation of policies of life insurance in Canada.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister will see that a provincial company ceases to be a provincial company the moment it gets its license, and a foreign company ceases to be a foreign company.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No, they become Canadian companies for the purposes of this Act. I do not believe that anything we can do will change the powers given them by the legislatures that incorporated them, nor change their provincial or foreign status —except to this extent, that they become subject to this Act as Canadian corporations while they are carrying on business in this country under license.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister has put forward the view that a provincial company, the moment it obtains a license, ceases to be a provincial company because, in the words of the section, it shall become and be deemed to be a company incorporated under the laws of Canada." If the words "Canadian company" applied to a provincial company then equally would a foreign company, the moment it has taken out a license, be and become a Canadian company. The same reason applies in one case as in the other. And yet, all the way through the statute apparently it is intended that the words "Canadian company" shall include provincial companies by reason of their obtaining a Dominion license while British and foreign companies shall still have a distinctive name and not be included under the words "Canadian company". I think there is going to be confusion in the interpretation of the Act.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think it is clear that for the purposes of this Act a foreign company taking out a license here, and a provincial company taking out a license, become Canadian companies subject to the definition as contained in paragraph (e) of section 2.

"Canadian Company" means a company incorporated under the laws of Canada for the purpose of carrying on the business of insurance, excluding however any British or foreign company which becomes incorporated under the provisions of this Act by reason merely of obtaining a license from the minister as herein authorized.

I will modify what I said to this extent that, while a provincial company taking out a license would become a Canadian company as defined, a British or foreign company would not.

On Section 53—Commissions to agents:

Mr. SINCLAIR: Does the Bill place no restriction on the amount of commission?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We have not thought it necessary to restrict the amount. The time may come when we shall feel obliged to do so.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Why say at the end "unless it is determined in advance?"

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not see any object in these words. The superintendent informs me that the object of the section is to have an established rate of commission so that the rate will not vary unless determined in advance. This requires the company and its agents to enter into a contract.

Mr. MARCIL: Has any move been made to bring about uniformity in insurance legislation between the Dominion and the provinces in order to protect policyholders, so that, for instance, a company before undertaking business would be required to make a deposit sufficiently high to guarantee its policyholders?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: By the Act of 1910, the Dominion Parliament assumed to regulate provincially-incorporated fire and other insurance companies doing business outside their own provinces. It has been held that the Dominion has no such power. We are now proposing to enable any provincially-incorporated insurance company to take out a license and subject itself to the provisions of this Act. But many companies will not do that, and they will still remain subject to provincial legislation and will carry on business subject only to the safeguard provided by the several provinces. We could not assume authority over such companies unless the British North America Act was amended or unless we could get the provinces to enact legislation similar to ours so as to bring about uniformity in insurance laws in the Dominion. Personally, I think that would be a highly desirable thing to do. We would be delighted if that were done, because protection would be afforded to the public, and that is what my hon. friend wants. Unfortunately, all the provinces would not take the same view of this matter as we do, and a considerable feeling of jealousy in regard to provincial rights enters into the question. A good way of dealing with it would be—if the time were opportune—for the Dominion to take the initiative—and get representatives of the several provinces to meet and take up the whole situation frankly. Public men generally look at public questions in the same way at a public conference, and I think a good deal might be done along that line. In the midst of the war it is difficult to find time for things like that, but I think my hon. friend's idea is a good one, and we might be able, at a conference, to agree upon uniform legislation, the object of which would be to protect the public. Of course, provincial legislatures are just as desirous, and the provinces are as anxious to protect the public as we are.

Section agreed to.

On section 56—Salary agreement for not more than five years:

Mr. SINCLAIR: I intended to ask the minister in regard to the policy of allowing directors to take commissions. The first provision of section 56 appears to imply that the directors of the company may be allowed to make a contract to secure business, and obtain a commission from the company on the business secured. Is it not rather unusual that that right should be extended to the directors who are representing the shareholders as well as the policyholders? If a director is allowed to decide the question of commissions for himself, he might be liberal. I want to know what the minister thinks of that section.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think my hon. friend has misread the section. I direct his attention to section 55, which says:

> No salary, compensation or emolument shall be paid to any director of a Canadian company carrying on the business of life insurance for his services as such director unless authorized by a vote of the members in the case of a mutual company, and by a vote of the shareholders and other members, if any, in the case of a company having capital stock.

Section 56 reads as follows:

> No such company shall make any agreement with any of its directors, trustees, officers or agents, to pay for any services rendered or to be rendered, any salary, compensation or emolument, extending beyond a period of five years.

That would prohibit a company making an arrangement with a director for emolument for a period of ten years. The principal reason for this is that it was drawn to our attention that some most improvident contracts had been entered into, notably one in the case of the Union Life. There was a company called the National Agency Company which acted as agent for the Union Life and had an agreement with the Union Life extending over three years, whereby the National Agency Company was to receive a commission upon all business obtained for the Union Life. When we threw the Union Life into liquidation the claim of the National Agency Company became a very heavy one, for they were prepared to set up this as a contract worth several hundred thousand or a million dollars, because for thirty years they would be entitled to take commission upon all the business of this company. A claim like that, of course, is not allowed by the courts, but no doubt the sum that would be allowed, if the contract were held to be valid, would be a serious matter, as far as the rights of policyholders and also of other creditors were concerned. It was a most improvident contract, and we have inserted a provision in the Insurance Act, which limits the contract to a period of five years, with this limitation:

> That the restriction shall not apply to agreements with agents in respect of insurance secured or to be secured by such agents, such insurance amounting in any year to less than twenty per cent of the total insurance secured in that year by the company.

That is the explanation of that provision.

Section agreed to.

On section 59—Investment of company's funds:

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There is an important feature introduced into section 59, lines 16 to 20, as follows:

Debentures secured by rates or taxes levied under the authority of the Government of any province of Canada on property situated in any such province and collectable by the municipalities in which such property is situated.

The object of that is to make available, as investments for insurance companies, debentures in the municipally owned telephone systems in Saskatchewan and the West. That matter has been before me for some time, and I promised at the first convenient opportunity to introduce the necessary legislation.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It seems very reasonable. This section reads, beginning at line 25:

(ii) The debentures or other evidences of indebtedness of any company which has paid regular dividends on its preferred or on its common stock for a term of at least five years immediately preceding the date of investment in such debentures or other evidences of indebtedness.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is a change. That also arose out of our experience with the Union Life. That company had at one time among its assets the debentures of its own agent, the National Agency company. We have made the eligibility of the debenture depend upon the standing of the company, which seems a sensible thing to do.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is a question in my mind, whether, with regard to life insurance policies which are held for the benefit of widows and orphans, provision should be made for investing the money in the debentures of any private corporation or whether it should not be limited to Government and municipal debentures.

I am inclined to think it should be so limited. The regular payment of dividends for five years upon common or preferred stock is no assurance of the permanent success or prosperity of a private corporation. It is risky to allow the moneys of insurance companies or savings banks to be invested in any other public securities, municipal or government debentures. This is apparently a new provision; I have grave doubts as to its wisdom.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The range of investment is greatly narrowed under this provision; it is a step towards what my hon. friend has in mind. Formerly they could invest in debentures; now we limit their powers of investment in debentures to debentures of the kind here described; that is to say, debentures that are more likely to be permanently good than those authorized under the existing Act as investments. I am disposed to agree with my hon. friend; I would narrow very considerably the powers of insurance companies to invest their funds. This, however, is the answer that has always been made to me when I have raised the question or when I have been considering it with the Superintendent of Insurance. Our companies are in competition with British and foreign companies carrying on business in Canada. My hon. friend knows that the extent of the advantage given under an insurance policy depends upon the rate of interest earned by the company. If we confine our insurance companies to Government and municipal securities yielding lower rates of interest than are obtained by other insurance companies upon another range of investment, we put our companies at a disadvantage in the matter of offering attractive policies and obtaining business. By reason of the war, the yield rate is so high upon the kind of securities that my hon. friend has in mind—Government and municipal securities—that there is not the same objection to the course which he has suggested as has obtained in the past. However, I should not be at all surprised if on the next revision of the Insurance Act, some few years from now, this question should be very carefully considered; it might be practicable to confine insurance companies to a range of investments which would be absolutely safe.

I should be glad if the committee would oblige me by rising and reporting progress. At eight o'clock we will take up the Public Works estimates, and, if there is no objection, the estimates of the Militia Department. I have to leave town at seven o'clock. We will allow this important section to stand.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Some members are away who desire to be present when the Militia estimates are taken up. There is no objection, however, to the Public Works estimates being taken up.

Section stands.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has my hon. friend considered the suggestion I made the other day with reference to insurance policies held by men who are subject to the military service law?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not believe that my hon. friend's suggestion is practicable. In the first place, hundreds of thousands of men have already enlisted and gone overseas; a question would rise at once with regard to their policies. Then you have some men who may be called to the colours under the Military Service Act who are insured for $10,000, $20,000, $50,000, even $100,000, while others have no insurance at all. There would be no means of establishing uniformity. The Superintendent of Insurance has been looking into the question of policies; in most cases I understand that the insurance involving war risk is allowed to run at an increased rate. If that rate is not paid, the face of the policy is, in some cases, cut down to the amount of the reserve.

Mr. NESBITT: To the extent that the amount of premium paid will permit, and in proportion to the increased rate demanded by the insurance company.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend referred me to the proposed action of the United States. I may point out that that action is proposed in lieu of pensions. The feature of our military service which has a bearing on this question is the pension system. When this Bill is under consideration further my hon. friend will raise the question and I shall be prepared to discuss it further with him. It does not appear to us, however, that his suggestions are practicable. It would not be fair to ask the insurance companies, as pointed out by the member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) to assume heavily increased risks without heavily increased premiums. When you consider whether the additional premium should be assumed, you are confronted with all the difficulties that I have mentioned, not only with regard to the men who are now to be called, but in regard also to the men who have already gone overseas.

Mr. NESBITT: Nearly all the policies provide that after two years no such question can be raised.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think that is true with regard to many policies. Policies taken out since the outbreak of the war contain a special clause with reference to military service. When you come to deal with the question of arranging to take care of the life insurance of thousands of men, having different amounts of insurance, some having no insurance at all, you are confronted with a very difficult question. One man puts his savings in life insurance; another man pays off the mortgage on his house; another places his savings in a bank. The only way to deal with them all uniformly is under a pension system, as we are now doing. That is all I can usefully say on the subject at this stage.

PRIVATE BILLS.

TORONTO, HAMILTON & BUFFALO RY. CO.

House again in committee on Bill No. 39, respecting the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway Company.—Mr. Thomas J. Stewart.

Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Mr. T. J. STEWART: When this Bill was before the Committee of the Whole it was referred to the Department of Justice for a report. I have the report now before me. It is a very lengthy document, and the greater part of it is a citation of the statutes, etc. I do not think it necessary that I should delay the House by reading it. If there is no objection I will simply have it published in Hansard.

The committee consenting:

July 16, 1917.

Sir,—I have the honour to reply to your letter of 5th instant submitting a draft Bill respecting the Toronto, Hamilton & Buffalo Railway Company, with a request for my opinion upon the question whether Parliament has power to amend or vary the agreement exhibited in the schedule to the Bill.

The parties to this agreement, which is dated November 15, 1897, are the Hamilton & Dundas Street Railway Company, a provincial company incorporated under a special Act of the Legislature of Ontario, Statutes of 1876, chapter 87, and the Toronto, Hamilton & Buffalo Railway Company, which, though originally incorporated by a special Act of the Legislature of Ontario, Statutes of 1847, chapter 75, became a Dominion corporation under chapter 86, Statutes of Canada, 1891, which declared its undertaking to be a work for the general advantage of Canada, and the company to be a company subject to the jurisdiction of Parliament.

By clause 8 of the agreement it is provided that the contract shall continue in force for the period of twenty-one years, and for a further period of twenty-nine years if the sanction of Parliament and the Legislature be obtained to legalize this extension. This provision, ex facie, suggests that neither of the contracting corporations had the capacity or power to bind itself by such an agreement for a period exceeding twenty-one years, and the railway legislation in force at the time the agreement was entered into (Revised Statutes of Ontario, 1897, chapter 207, section 77, and Statutes of Canada, 1888, chapter 29, section 238) indicates this to be the fact. The Legislature of Ontario, on the petition of the Hamilton & Dundas Street Railway Company and the town of Dundas, appears to have ratified the agreement by chapter 60, Statutes of Ontario, 1898, and now Parliament is asked to do likewise on behalf of the Toronto, Hamilton & Buffalo Railway Company.

I observe that upon representations made on behalf of the town of Dundas, the railway Committee of the House of Commons has recommended an amendment to the Bill which will have the effect of extending the agreement merely for four years, i.e., until 1922, instead of the period of twenty-nine years contemplated by the agreement; that the authority of Parliament to make such an alteration in the terms of the agreement has been questioned in the House, and that it is under these circumstances that the matter is referred.

The proposed amendment to the Bill obviously would effect a material change in the terms of the original agreement, and in my opinion this is incompetent to Parliament, seeing that the Hamilton & Dundas Street Railway company is a provincial corporation and consequently that its contract rights and obligations are not within the legislative authority of Parliament.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

Deputy Minister of Justice.

E. P. Hartney, Esq.,
Examiner of Private Bills,
Room 308, House of Commons, Ottawa.

I am pleased to inform the committee that since the Bill was up before the parties have come to an understanding, and I therefore move that sections 1 and 2 be stricken from the Bill. Sections 3 and 4 have already been struck out, which leaves the Bill composed of sections 5 and 6. Those two sections have already been passed by the committee and recommended to the House. I have been asked by the promoters of the Bill to correct a statement made by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) who said that the tracks of this railway ran on the main street of the town of Dundas. The main street runs north and south, and when it reaches King street, which is really the main street, it runs east and west. The railway crosses Main street about a quarter of a mile from King street, and runs at right angles to Main street. The promoters of the Bill thought it was unfair to have it understood that they were trying to run a railroad through one of the main streets of the town, when it is not so.

[Mr. Stewart.]

SUPPLY.

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Rainville in the Chair

Public Works—chargeable to income—Annapolis Royal—repairs to pier, $2,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: There was $2,300 in the estimates last year and only $300 expended. Why was this kept in the estimates? I would suggest that this might very well be reduced.

Hon. ROBERT ROGERS (Minister of Public Works): It is the re-vote of the balance necessary for repairs, consisting of new covering, stringers and guards.

Mr. MURPHY: How comes it that only $300 was expended out of a vote of $2,300?

Mr. ROGERS: We did not get the covering and that is the principal item.

Mr. MURPHY: Timber?

Mr. ROGERS: Timber for covering.

Canning—repairs to wharf, $2,500.

Mr. KYTE: I would like to call attention of the hon. Minister of Public Works to the wharf at Port Malcolm in the county of Richmond. That wharf was purchased six or seven years ago, and it was put into a state of repair suitable for all public purposes. I am informed that during the last three or four years it has been very much neglected so that at the present time it is absolutely useless and as things now are the money that has been expended on it is wasted. Port Malcolm is the centre of a very important community in the county of Richmond. Several vessels are owned there and there are a number of fishermen's boats. Complaints have been made to me that owing to the way the wharf has been allowed to get into disrepair it is absolutely useless. Would the minister be good enough to look up his files in the department and ascertain whether there has been a report from the resident engineer asking that repairs be made to that wharf this year.

Mr. ROGERS: I have not in my mind any report that has reached the department but possibly there might be one. I shall be very glad to take note of the matter and supply the report to my hon. friend. I will also give attention to what he has said respecting the necessity for some improvements.

East River—improvements, $140,000.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Will that finish the East river improvements? When will the work be completed?

Mr. ROGERS: We will have it completed this year, the chief engineer informs me.

Mr. KYTE: What is the total amount expended upon that work?

Mr. ROGERS: The contract was $398,000 and there have been expended on gates $124,000.

Mr. KYTE: Has the work been done by contract?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. KYTE: Who were the contractors?

Mr. ROGERS: Roger Miller & Sons were the contractors for the gates, and McDougall Bros. for the other part.

Mr. KYTE: Is any dredging being done there at the present time?

Mr. ROGERS: No.

Margaree—repairs to breakwater, $900.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: For some time I have been trying to get some dredging done at Margaree harbour. Tenders have been asked for temporary dredging. The harbour is in a very bad state. Is it the intention of the department to have the dredging done this season?

Mr. ROGERS: Have tenders been asked for recently?

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: Yes. I was assured early in the season by the department that the dredging would be done before now, and I noticed the advertisement in some of the local papers down there a short time ago.

Mr. ROGERS: If we are asking for tenders we must be proposing to go ahead with it.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: I am glad to know that it is the intention to go ahead.

Mr. ROGERS: I will be glad to have it looked up and give my hon. friend a memorandum of what we propose to do.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: I do not know what can be done at Margaree harbour with this vote of $800, because the condition of the public works there is really a scandal. For the last five years the Government have absolutely neglected this place. I suppose that an expenditure of $20,000 would not properly repair the works that have been destroyed. If this $800 had been spent five years ago, and spent at a season of the year when work could be done successfully and the greatest amount of work possible done for the money spent, and if $200 had been spent every year since then, it might have saved the public works there, but $30,000 would not repair the works at Margaree Harbour now. All this destruction went on with the knowledge of the department, because at least every month brought an engineer down to Margaree Harbour to make a report. I have endeavoured to get the department to spend a little way to preserve the old piers, but they have disregarded my representations and nothing has been done. Last year there was a small amount in the estimates and I call the attention of the minister to the fact that these small amounts of $300 or $400 spent in the fall of the year, in September, October and November could not be of very much service in preserving the piers in view of the stormy weather conditions. Anybody acquainted with conditions on that coast must know that it is impossible to get a dollar's worth of work for a dollar during those months. That is just what occurred last fall. About a dozen men were at work putting in two or three hours a day and, I suppose, getting full pay for it. I do not find fault with them, for the reason that the men were doing the best they could because they had to fight the conditions on that stormy coast, but this Government seems to regard this as the proper season to spend the public moneys—the clearest evidence of business incompetence and dishonest handling of public funds. I protest against the absolute neglect of public works at Margaree Harbour. These works in their present condition stand as a monument to the utter incapacity of this Government; and are a scandal and a crime, and the minister should blush in shame for the way in which his department has treated the matter. When an effort is made to replace these works the country will have to pay sorely for this neglect. If ever there was a necessity for immediate action in this case, I want to put myself on record as protesting against the indefensible neglect of the public works at Margaree Harbour as well as all the public works in the county.

Mr. ROGERS: The harbour at Margaree is so situated that it suffers a great deal from storms and I quite agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Chisholm) that probably it would have been much better to have, in the first place, spent a sufficient amount of money to have made it a permanency rather than to have gone on temporizing and spending small sums each year. But, my hon. friend can understand that it is necessary for me to follow the advice of the engineers. I will take it up and see if the engineers can bear out the statement my hon. friend has made in respect to the matter, because I can assure him that I shall be very glad indeed to correct it if it is possible to do so.

Mr. CHISHOLM: The engineers, of course, made their reports honestly, representing the conditions as they were. This is not the first time I have had occasion to bring this up. Five years ago a very small expenditure would have saved all the work now required, which will cost $20,000. The destruction is going on yearly and each time the work was damaged an engineer was sent down and made a report, but nothing was done, and the whole industrial conditions in a large portion of the county served by this harbour has been seriously wrecked and the lives of our fishermen greatly jeopardized. The neglect is almost criminal.

As to dredging, the present condition at Margaree Harbour, is the result, in part, of the destruction of the piers which protect the channel from the sand flow. The mouth of the harbour is being filled with sand, and no effort has been made to stop the drift. Formerly small vessels could enter with ease, but to-day fishing boats can hardly enter at any time, but particularly is this so when we have a north or northwest breeze, all on account of the shoal water. This is an important fishing station where the fishing establishments enjoy a prosperous business; and, besides, a population of 8,000 to 10,000 depend upon this post for transportation. It is therefore important to make the channel passable for boats, or else these large industries will be paralyzed. I wish the minister would rush the dredge there as rapidly as possible, as no company will undertake this work after September 15. The work should really have been done in June or July. The minister was good enough to promise me early this season that this work would be undertaken with as little delay as possible. Needless to say, I am disappointed.

Mr. ROGERS: We have already called for tenders for this work. I will see about the tenders at once, and see that the work is gone on with.

[Mr. Rogers.]

McKay's Point, repairs to breakwater, $600.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: What repairs are being made there?

Mr. ROGERS: Raising the stone on the seaward side of the outer end of the breakwater for 300 feet up to high water. It is estimated that 420 cubic yards of stone will be required, costing $525, and superintendence, etc., $75.

McMair's Cove, repairs to breakwater, $900.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What is being done there?

Mr. ROGERS: The work consists of sheeting, re-balasting and protecting by stone a portion of the seaward basin and strengthening about 70 ft. to the inner basin.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Is it intended to go on with the work this year?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Two or three other items in the county of Antigonish which were put in the estimates at the time of the by-election a few years ago, when it was important that the people there would be in a good humour, and which have appeared in the estimates each year since, have disappeared. Are they being abandoned altogether?

Mr. ROGERS: My hon. friend will find that we have abandoned practically all capital expenditure for new work in connection with public works of this kind that have been voted for one or two years and the work not carried out.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Does the minister intend to keep his full staff in Antigonish for the future? I understand there are quite a large number of men in his office at Antigonish. I should be obliged if the minister would read the names and state the salaries of the employees in that office.

Mr. ROGERS: I have not the names before me, but I can get them for to-morrow; I do not know exactly what staff we have there. We are cutting down in every place possible, and if we have the office at Antigonish over-manned we will reduce it immediately.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Has the minister made any reduction in Nova Scotia? Has he cut down the staff?

Mr. ROGERS: Of course, a number of our staff in Nova Scotia have gone to the war. There has been a reduction of thirty per cent on that account alone, and we propose, if possible, to further reduce. My hon. friend will have seen by the press that we are trying to pare down as much as possible during the war.

Mr. SINCLAIR: There is another item which appeared in the estimates for a number of years, for a wharf at Cole Harbour in the county of Guysborough. The minister purchased the site, and has had several surveys since he took charge of the department, and I do not find any item in the estimates in the present year. Will the minister say what his plans are in regard to that wharf?

Mr. ROGERS: It is like many other items we were proposing to go on with when the war broke out, and we were delayed for the first year and second year, and now we have removed these items from the estimates, until war conditions have improved, at all events, and as soon as they improve we hope to restore these items, and carry out the work as quickly as possible. The hon. gentleman will agree with me that it is wise to take all those items out of the estimates, so that we may know exactly what our expenses are going to be.

Port Hillford—repairs to breakwater, $1,800.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Does the minister intend to go on with this work?

Mr. ROGERS: The district engineer there asks for $1,800, covering renewal and new stringers for the entire breakwater, and we propose doing the work this year.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The work will be done this season?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, that is the report of the engineer.

Mr. SINCLAIR: There is very great need of some dredging at that point. There was a report from there a few days ago that the steamer which serves that coast was unable to call at Port Hilford, on account of the fact that the sand had filled up around the wharf. The steamer can only land at the outside of the wharf, and on stormy days it is found impossible to call there at all. It is an important fishing station, and this steamer service is the only communication with the outside world. As the fishermen are being asked now to produce all they can, and they are doing everything in their power in that direction, it is very disheartening for them not to be able to ship their fish. The main trouble is the want of a small amount of dredging. It has been required for a number of years, but the condition has now become so bad that the steamer cannot get inside of the wharf where the shelter is, so that on stormy days she has to pass Port Hillford without calling. If this dredging were done the steamer could make her call even in stormy weather. I wish the minister would have the matter looked into, and do something if possible in the way of dredging that harbour.

Mr. ROGERS: The engineer says that this matter has come to his notice, and there is apparently a necessity for some dredging there. We have the dredging facilities, and we hope to be able, in the very near future, to make the necessary repairs.

Shubenacadie River—To pay the Dominion Atlantic Railway Co. for the enlargement of draw span on railway bridge and construction of warping piers, $23,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What does the hon. minister say to that item?

Mr. ROGERS: The sum of $23,000 is required to pay the Dominion Atlantic Railway company a contribution for substituting a swing span for the lift span in the railway bridge over the Shubenacadie river, in accordance with the provisions of order in council dated January 15, 1917. The work consisted in the removal of the old western piers and replacing them by a pivot pier that supports a swing arch bridge, which gives a clear opening of 45 feet, to enable vessels to pass through without being lightened. An order in council was passed on 16th August, 1899, approving of the plans submitted by the Midland Railway company for the construction of a bridge having a lift span of 29 feet over the Shubenacadie river. This span was found to be too small, and an order in council was passed on the 14th March, 1911, authorizing that an agreement be entered into with the Dominion Atlantic Railway company and the Dominion Government for the substitution of a larger lift span having a length of 45 feet, and it was stipulated that an amount not to exceed $23,000 was to be paid the company on the satisfactory completion of the work.

West Arichat—repairs to wharf, $700.

Mr. KYTE: What repairs are to be effected by this vote?

Mr. ROGERS: Covering, three-inch plank, $196; stringers, $75.60; fenders, $42.24; sheathing, $52.80; guard rail, $40.32; round timber, $25; mooring posts, $60; labour, $140; stone for approach, $56.25.

Mr. KYTE: Was some of this work done during the past year?

Mr. ROGERS: No, not the work I have described. There was some other work done last year.

Yarmouth Harbour—repairs and improvements, $4,500.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Some years ago, when I was a minister, there was a well thought out plan for the improvement of Yarmouth harbour. We thought certain improvements were necessary to make it safe for the very considerable amount of shipping which was going through there. I should like to ask the minister if that work has been completed, and what are the plans, and what is to be done with this $4,500.

Mr. ROGERS: In 1916-17 we did have in the estimates an item of $64,000 for work in Yarmouth harbour. In view of the conditions, this item has been dropped for the present; the vote now asked for is simply to provide for the necessary repairs to keep the harbour in as good condition as possible until such time as we shall be able to restore the item. The harbour of Yarmouth is a very important one, upon which a considerable amount of money has been spent during the last few years. The expenditure of a large sum of money will be required in order properly to complete it.

Mr. KYTE: Is it intended to provide in the supplementary estimates for any further works of a similar character in Nova Scotia?

Mr. ROGERS: We have not anything in particular in mind. There may be some, but they will be very small.

Mr. KYTE: I understand, then, that it is not in contemplation to provide in the supplementary estimates for the construction of new wharves. The reason why I ask is that during the election in Nova Scotia last fall the Government engineers were very busy spying out sites for wharves and breakwaters, and the expectations of the public in many localities were aroused by the activities of the minister. I have in mind four or five sites for wharves that were located in the county of Richmond during the elections in November last, and I am sure that it will be a great disappointment to the friends of the minister in that constituency when they are told that no provision is to be made for the construction of those wharves. If our expectations are not altogether disappointed, there will be renewed activity on the part of the officers of the minister's department in Nova Scotia and elsewhere throughout Canada during the next few months. The minister ought to give an earnest of his good intentions by placing an amount in the supplementary estimates to make good the promises made during those elections in Nova Scotia.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: What work is being done at Inverness harbour, and what work is in contemplation?

Mr. ROGERS: The chief engineer advises me that only work that is urgently necessary is being done. It does not amount to more than two or three hundred dollars.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: The work is of urgent necessity; it is the opening up of a new harbour, upon which a large amount of money was spent five years ago. I cannot understand what work could be accomplished with two or three hundred dollars in the opening up of a new harbour.

Mr. ROGERS: I will look it up and let my hon. friend know to-morrow.

Mr. SINCLAIR: It is difficult for members on this side to understand how the minister spends so much money when he does so little work. For the last two or three years we have been told that it is only in cases of urgency that any work at all is done in his department. But I find upon looking at the public accounts for the last fiscal year, page 73, in a comparative statement of the expenditures in the Department of Public Works for a number of years past, it is set forth that in 1910-11, when the minister took office, the expenditure of his department was $8,621,431, while last year the expenditure was $12,039,252, an increase of $4,000,000. That is an extraordinary increase, especially in view of the fact that so little work is being done. I suppose there never was a time in the history of the Dominion when there was less activity in the Department of Public Works than there has been during the last two or three years; yet the expenditures of the department last year were over $12,000,000. I would like the minister to give some explanation of this increase.

Mr. ROGERS: My hon. friend is including in this amount very large works that we are carrying on in St. John and Halifax and at other points, in connection with which the expenditure has been very large for some years. I did not know that my estimates were coming up to-night, or I would have had with me a statement giving the figures of the expenditure during the past few years.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I am not referring to the expenditures in St. John harbour or anywhere else in Canada; it is the expense of running the department that I am talking about. This item covers departmental expenses; it does not cover the expense of building wharves and opening up harbours.

Mr. ROGERS: I am afraid my hon. friend has not looked very closely into the figures. I do not know where he arrives at the amount of $12,000. However, I shall be glad to have it looked up and to supply him with any information that he may desire. He is mistaken in his statement regarding the increased expenditure. The general expenditure of the department has been reduced from year to year and will be further reduced this year. I will supply the figures when my estimates come up again.

Mr. PUGSLEY: May I make a slight correction in my right hon. friend's statement? In attempting to justify the large expenditure of his department, he refers to the expenditure in St. John and Halifax. My hon. friend has forgotten that all the expenditures on account of harbour improvements at Halifax are charged to the Department of Railways, and not to his department; so my hon. friend cannot account for the enormous increase in the expenditure in his department since he became minister, on that ground.

Mr. ROGERS: I quite agree that the large expenditures come under the Railway Department, but a considerable number of items in connection with the work at Halifax come under my department. For instance, we have purchased a dry dock site, and there are several other items running into a large sum of money.

Mr. COPP: What repairs are being made to the wharf at Amherst Point?

Mr. ROGERS: Sheathing corner of wharf, ten feet each way, $150; rebuilding corner, 5,600 cubic feet cribwork, at 8 cents a foot, $448; raising portion of the side 600 feet, at 8 cents a foot, $48; contingencies, $54; total of $700.

Mr. COPP: This wharf is just a few miles from my home. There is a tidal river there, and I understand that the river bed has become filled in to such an extent that it is impossible for vessels to get to the wharf. Has the department any report on that?

Mr. ROGERS: The chief engineer informs me that no such report has been received, so far as he remembers.

Prince Edward Island—Little Sands—wharf improvements, $1,600.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: What improvements are to be made there?

Mr. ROGERS: The estimated cost is as follows: Sheathing, $1,050; ballast, $300; iron, $250; total, $1,600.

Souris—repairs to breakwater, $1,000.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: What improvements are to be made to this breakwater?

Mr. ROGERS: The amount is made up as follows: Timber, $150; ballast, $600; plank, $90; iron, $60; contingencies, $100; total, $1,000.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: What part of the breakwater needs repairing?

Mr. ROGERS: The chief engineer says that several very severe storms occurring between 13th and 16th December, 1916, displaced the four top tires of face timbers on the seaward side of the breakwater for a distance of 40 feet immediately inward of the outer block, together with a small portion of the covering, as also the sheathing on the sloping face of the old block.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: Does the engineer state that $1,000 will be sufficient to make all the necessary repairs?

Mr. ROGERS: That is the estimate.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: Will there be anything further in the supplementaries?

Mr. ROGERS: Not that I am aware of.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: Notwithstanding the engineer's report, I know that $1,000 will not be sufficient to make the repairs that are necessary, as the damage done was very much greater than that. When was the addition to the breakwater made, and what was the cost?

Mr. ROGERS: I have not the details here, but the total expenditure on the Souris breakwater since 1875 amounts to $489,000. I could get the figures for my hon. friend if he requires them.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: I should be glad to have them. I think the extension, which was built in 1913 or 1914, cost in the neighbourhood of $70,000. The work must have been very poorly done, because almost as soon as it was completed repairs had to be made, and repairs have had to be made continually every year since. The old breakwater, which was completed many years ago, needs but very little repairing, which would look as if the extension had not been properly built. I think it would be very much cheaper to have the work done thoroughly at once, rather than to have these temporary repairs made from year to year. If the Government would spend enough money to put the breakwater in proper shape to stand the storms they would save money.

9 p.m.

Mr. ROGERS: My hon. friend is better acquainted with the local conditions than I am, but I understand that the chief damage to the Souris breakwater occurred during its construction, when very severe storms were experienced in that locality. In regard to the old breakwater, I am afraid my hon. friend is in error. We have to spend some money there almost every year.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: That is natural, but they are only small repairs.

Mr. ROGERS: The principal damage to the new breakwater occurred as the result of heavy storms between the 13th and 16th December, 1916.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: I may inform the minister that $1,000 will not be sufficient to make proper repairs.

Mr. ROGERS: I quite agree with my hon. friend.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: The money will largely be wasted, and next year we will probably have to spend a much larger sum because of the repairs being of such a temporary character.

New Brunswick—Bathurst — Harbour improvements, $85,000.

Mr. TURGEON: Are the contractors still at work in Bathurst?

Mr. ROGERS: We are now calling for tenders. We thought we could continue the old contract, but found we could not do it without calling for tenders.

Mr. PUGSLEY: When I was Minister of Public Works I initiated the work in Bathurst harbour, and had some of the Government dredges employed there, as I thought that was the better way of doing it. I would like to know why the operations of the Government dredges were abandoned, and tenders called to have the work done by private parties.

Mr. ROGERS: We have Government dredges there now working in the outside harbour, but we let the contract for the work in the inner harbour. It was considered better that we should adopt that course, and it has worked out very satisfactorily. I think my hon. friend (Mr. Turgeon) will bear me out in the statement that we have done very good work and that satisfactory results have been accomplished.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What were the prices paid for dredging during the past year.

Mr. ROGERS: Thirty cents per cubic foot.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is for work in the inner harbour

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Who were the contractors for that work?

Mr. ROGERS: The Northern Dredging company.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Who compose the Northern Dredging company?

Mr. ROGERS: I really could not say.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Who are the officers?

Mr. ROGERS: A man named Nagle.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The well-known Mr. Nagle? To say "a man named Nagle" would imply he is just an ordinary man, not very well known. I can assure my hon. friend that Mr. Nagle is a very prominent citizen of New Brunswick. Is Mr. Richard O'Leary also an officer of the company?

Mr. ROGERS: We have nothing to show that he is. We do not know.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Then, I judge Mr. Nagle is president of the company? The contract must be signed by the officers of the company?

Mr. ROGERS: The work has been carried out at the request of Mr. McLean. who is building a large pulp-mill there.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I was not asking my hon. friend as to the reason for carrying out the work. I am quite satisfied the work is very meritorious, and Bathurst harbour is deserving of development to any reasonable extent. That I believe this and that my hon. friend from Gloucester (Mr. Turgeon) believes it is evidenced by the fact that this work was undertaken several years ago when the Liberal Government was in power. The fact that the improvements were requested by Mr. McLean does not give us any information as to who the contractors are. I presume Mr. Nagle is president of the company?

Mr. ROGERS: I have not any idea.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Perhaps the deputy minister would know.

Mr. ROGERS: The deputy minister informs me that he has no definite knowledge as to whether Mr. Nagle is president, or secretary, of the company.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Then it is either one way or the other? Mr. Nagle is either president, or secretary, and Mr. O'Leary is either secretary, or president.

Mr. ROGERS: I do not know Mr. O'Leary in the matter.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Mr. O'Leary is a very respectable and a very prominent citizen.

Mr. ROGERS: I am glad to hear it. I must cultivate his acquaintance.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not think my hon. friend would have any difficulty in becoming acquainted with him. He is very prominent citizen. What amazes me is that the minister should have so little information as to those prominent gentlemen who are doing this work—gentlemen who are not in any way connected with Bathurst harbour, and who had nothing to do with dredging work, so far as I ever understood, until my hon. friend's Government came into office, when they apparently developed suddenly into dredging contractors. I should be under the impression that my hon. friend might have heard something in regard to those gentlemen. Perhaps the minister could tell me how much has been paid to this company already for dredging?

Mr. ROGERS: For 400,000 cubic yards at 25 cents per cubic yard, $100,000; 1,181,403 cubic yards at 30 cents, overtow one cent; and surveys and inspections, $20,000; total, $504,000.

Mr. TURGEON: Is the Government dredge still working on the outside harbour?

Mr. ROGERS: It is working in Bathurst harbour, I am not sure whether it is in the inside or the outside harbour.

Mr. TURGEON: Is it the suction dredge "Restigouche"?

Mr. ROGERS: No, it is a ladder dredge.

Mr. COPP: My hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) has been trying to get some information with regard to the dredging company engaged on this work. He referred to two of the prominent gentlemen connected with the organization, but he overlooked one, Mr. W. B. Tenant of St. John, a very prominent gentleman, who occupied a very important position in the Methodist church, and who has since given up that admirable calling and become a stockbroker, and a promoter in different organizations. Probably the minister does not remember the gentleman. I would like to ask him whether this gentleman had anything to do with this organization?

Mr. ROGERS: This is a very large contract for dredging. It was let by public tender to the Northern Dredging company, and they have evidently carried on their work satisfactorily in view of the fact that they have not become better acquainted with the head of the department and are not making any trouble for the department. I have not had the pleasure of seeing the gentleman whom my hon. friend introduced as being a member of the church in good standing. I am sure that my hon. friend from Gloucester will bear me out in saying that good work has been done by the contractors there. I know of no complaint in respect to the way in which the work has been carried on there. I am very glad to know that we have had such satisfactory work from this firm who were the lowest tenderers.

Mr. COPP: I am very glad to know that in connection with a work of this kind the minister thought it necessary to have a chaplain in charge.

Cape Bald—repairs to breakwater, $1,500.
Dorchester—wharf improvement, $1,500.

Mr. COPP: Would my hon. friend explain what it is proposed to do at Cape Bald and Dorchester?

Mr. ROGERS: This re-vote of $1,500 for Cape Bald is asked for by the district engineer to continue construction of protective work along the outer face of approach and pier head, composed of reinforced concrete caissons filled with ballast and meagre concrete, and for general repairs. The estimated cost is as follows: 10 caissons at $40, $400; forms, labour and services of diver in placing, $200; concrete and stone filling in caissons and breakwater, $400; general repairs, $500. Total, $1,500.

Mr. COPP: Are those repairs necessary because of some damage to the pier during last year, or are there some additions that are being made?

Mr. ROGERS: This work is asked for by the district engineer, and it is to continue the construction of protective work along the outer face of approach and pier head.

Mr. COPP: I see by the Auditor General's Report that last year some $4,000 was expended on the same work. This breakwater was built some years ago, and I was wondering whether it required these extra repairs because of damage by ice.

Mr. ROGERS: During the fiscal year 1915-16 the work done consisted of building 11 large and 26 small caissons, of which the large, together with four from the previous year, were placed in a length of 55 feet at the outer end of the approach and across the outside face of the pier head; also placing 22 of the smaller caissons on top of the large ones to protect the face of the work up to the level of low water, and building a scow 18 x 10 feet, and re-filling a section of the breakwater with ballast. That is what was done with the money spent last year.

Mr. COPP: Now, as to the Dorchester wharf.

Mr. ROGERS: This amount of $1,500 is asked for by the district engineer to rebuild a short section about 30 feet long and 10 feet wide at upper end of old railway wharf, so called, to remove the yearly accumulation of mud from vessel beds in front of both wharves, to continue the filling and surfacing of the departmental or lower wharf with mud and gravel, and to replace the old worn and decayed plank covering, as follows: To rebuild upper end of railway wharf, $600; to remove accumulation of mud from beds, $300; filling and surfacing departmental wharf, $600; total, $1,500.

Mr. COPP: This is also a new wharf completed in 1915-16 at a cost of $11,600 or thereabouts, and I presume that these repairs are also necessary because of some damage to the wharf.

Mr. ROGERS: During the present year the mud was excavated from the beds in a length of 150 feet, 14 feet wide and 2 feet in average depth, and a considerable section of the departmental wharf is being filled and surfaced with mud and gravel, in the course of which the old stringers are being removed for use in rebuilding the end of the old railway wharf. The expenditure will be about $800.

Mr. COPP: Of course, this work will be done this season, I presume? Does the minister know that the railway tracks and siding running down to the Intercolonial wharf have been removed and that this wharf is of no value to the people at the present time? The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane) is here and I am very glad that he is because his department took up the rails last spring. I have no objection to this proposed expenditure, as it is necessary, but the wharf is really of no use to the people unless the track is replaced so that they can get their freight to and from the wharf. I hope the Minister of Public Works will confer with the Minister of Railways and and Canals and see if it is not possible to get rails down again.

Mr. ROGERS: We have nothing to do with railways.

Mr. COPP: I know the minister has nothing to do with railways, but the Minister of Railways has and it is absolutely impossible for the people to get along with any degree of satisfaction in that locality because they cannot use this wharf for freight coming in and going out—coal, for instance. This wharf cost between $40,000 and $50,000, it is an important shipping point and I sincerely trust that the Minister of Railways will arrange to replace these rails. I think the Minister of Public Works will require the use of the rails to get his material down to the wharf.

Great Salmon River—Repairs and improvements to breakwater, $1,100.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will the minister state what repairs are being made to this breakwater?

Mr. ROGERS: This amount of $1,100 is asked for to renew the covering on the western breakwater, and to construct an extension 240 feet long and 18 feet 6 inches wide to this breakwater. The estimated cost is as follows: 20,400 ft. B.M. covering 3-inch at $32, $652.80; 10,200 ft. B.M. break timbers at $35, $357; contingencies, $90.20; total, $1,100.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is it intended to go on with the work this year?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The minister should give some explanation of the large items for harbours and rivers generally. This vote is $60,000 for Nova Scotia, $14,000 for Prince Edward Island, and $50,000 for New Brunswick, making $114,000 altogether. What use does the minister intend to make of this vote?

Mr. ROGERS: This vote has been customary for many years. It is for the maintenance and repairs of wharves generally all over the province for which the vote is taken. This enables the department to make repairs in case of damage by storms, and so on. I do not think my hon. friend can suggest that the vote is being abused.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think it is regrettable that the minister has omitted from the items for New Brunswick the vote for the St. John river and its tributaries. Many years ago the entire burden of constructing wharves upon non-tidal waters was borne by the provinces, the Dominion Government refusing to contribute anything. Of recent years that policy has been departed from and wharves have been built on inland waters by this Government. About 20 years ago this Government adopted the policy in a number of cases of assisting the provincial governments in the construction of wharves. In more recent years still there has been a special vote for the building of these wharves. These have all been omitted from the present estimates. Upon the St. John river and other non-tidal waters in New Brunswick, there are a number of wharves in need of repairs and these repairs have been made from the vote to which I refer.

Mr. ROGERS: The policy of co-operating with the provincial governments was evidently found unsatisfactory. The provincial governments desired to withdraw from the arrangement and claimed that it was the duty of the Dominion to look after all wharves of this description. So, in place of this vote to cover this work by co-operation with the various provinces, we have adopted the usual practice of having a specific vote wherever there is necessity for a wharf on the St. John river or any place else. That plan has been adopted by the department and has worked satisfactorily. Then there is the general item in the estimates for general repairs of wharves throughout the province. My hon. friend will agree that the new plan will work as well as the old one, because, wherever a wharf is found to be necessary, we provide it and carry out its construction just as is done on tidal waters.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I cannot agree with my hon. friend. In last year's estimates he will find the same vote for harbours and rivers generally and then a vote of $10,000, not for any specific wharf, but for the river St. John and tributaries. This is the first year that item has been dropped. The vote to which I refer was $10,000 last year and $34,000 in the preceding year. There appears to have been $24,000 spent in the years 1915-16 on the general vote for the river St. John and tributaries. I am sorry that a course which was adopted after full consideration has been departed from, because it is always difficult to resume such a practice.

Could my hon. friend give me some information in regard to matters which I know would be of very great interest to the people of St. John, in regard to the work being done upon the western side of the harbour? I would like to know just what work is now being done. I do not want to go into past work, or the expenditure—because that would take considerable time, and he might not be prepared for such a discussion this evening—but only to refer to the work now under way. The wharf on the western side of the harbour, which was constructed by the Government, has sagged over sideways and I believe is in a very unsatisfactory condition. Under the original contract, for which tenders were called when I was minister, it was provided that the wharf and crib should be filled with stone, instead of being allowed to be filled with earth or mud excavated from the harbour, which my hon. friend will understand would not form nearly as good a support as stone, the tides might affect the construction, whereas stone would remain absolutely solid. The wharf has not exactly tumbled over, but very nearly. I do not know whether the filling caused the wharf to sag or not. It would save a great deal of difficulty if means were taken to restore it to its proper position, and keep it from tumbling over further into the river. I should like, also, to ask my hon. friend whether it is intended to proceed without delay with the extension of the breakwater to Partridge Island. That is a work which has been in contemplation for a considerable time. It is rumoured in St. John that the contract awarded some three years ago has been abandoned, and a new plan has been devised for the work, and tenders are to be called for.

Mr. ROGERS: In connection with the St. John River, the vote of $10,000, which was in contemplation, was in connection largely with the work carried on by the Government on the other end of the river, and now I understand the lumbermen are taking care of that, and it is not necessary for us to provide for it. However, there may be some reason why that matter should be further considered, and I will look it up. As to the work at West St. John, I may say that there has been some difficulty in regard to berth 16, owing to the fact that we did not have very good bottom. The water was very deep and some difficulty was experienced, but nothing serious at all, and it is entirely satisfactory now. We built upon that particular wharf a large shed, which I understand turned out to be entirely satisfactory, and, in adition to that, we have a report from our engineers that there is immediate necessity for the completion of berth 17. The engineer says that it will cost about $150,000 to complete that berth, and there is necessity for it by reason of the fact that the shipping by way of St. John is growing very rapidly. An item will be brought down in the estimates to complete berth 17. With respect to the breakwater at Negro Point, we called for tenders some two or three years ago, but the tender price at that time seemed very high. I think it was something like $600,000 or $700,000; but the work they proposed was to be carried out by the use of granite instead of the ordinary stone, and a further plan has been prepared for the use of stone from Partridge Island, and we expect to be able to get the work done much cheaper by the use of granite. We are going to call for tenders in a few days. This work is absolutely necessary to protect the harbour on the west side of St. John, and I am going to propose, before Parliament closes, that we vote an amount sufficient to carry out the work of building the breakwater, on the recommendation of the engineers that it is necessary to preserve the berths that have already been constructed in the west harbour of St. John.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I suppose those estimates will be ready in a few days?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: With regard to the depth of the water at the berths, I noticed in the papers, either to-day or yesterday, that the United States authorities have been informed that if they would dredge out Portland harbour to a depth of 35 feet for the larger vessels, the Canadian Government, during the war at all events, would be very glad to avail themselves of Portland harbour in connection with the Canadian export trade. That is a matter in regard to which the people of the Maritime Provinces are naturally very jealous. After a long struggle, commencing thirty years ago, the people of the Maritime Provinces succeeded in getting St. John and Halifax recognized as the winter ports of Canada. I should be very sorry indeed to see any change in the policy in that regard. Of course the question which is raised as to deepening the harbour of Portland to 35 feet is an important one, if that depth is required for the safety of the largest vessels which come to Atlantic ports, and if St. John harbour is not deepened. Is it proposed to make the depth of water at the berths in St. John harbour 35 feet at low water?

Mr. ROGERS: The dredging of the harbour of Portland is, of course, entirely in the hands of the United States Government. I had no knowledge that there was any proposal to adopt Portland harbour as against the harbours of St. John or Halifax. No Canadian who has a knowledge of our harbours and of the amount that has been expended in their improvement and development would think of doing anything to disturb our programme of developing our own harbours and carrying our traffic through our own ports. That is the policy of the Government; everything will be done to develop the harbour of St. John, where a great increase of trade has taken place during the last couple of years. That policy, so far as I am aware, will be continued in the future, in order that we may develop these harbours as rapidly as possible to keep pace with the increasing trade.

Mr. PUGSLEY: In the very interesting statement which he has made—a statement which, I am sure, will be appreciated by the people of St. John, my hon. friend has omitted to answer my question whether it is proposed to have a depth of 35 feet at low water so as to afford sufficient accommodation for the larger ships. My hon. friend says that he has not seen any suggestion with regard to the use of Portland harbour for Canadian trade. If he will look at to-morrow morning's papers he will see that a very interesting situation has arisen in Congress in consequence of a letter which the British Ambassador wrote a few days ago to a member of the United States Senate approving of the proposed deepening of Portland harbour in order to accommodate Canadian export trade. A question has been raised in Congress as to the interference with the internal affairs of the United States by the ambassador of a foreign Government. Some senators have suggested that the British Ambassador ought not to express any opinion whatever as to the expenditure of any money in Portland harbour. In his letter, the British Ambassador —he is authorized by the Canadian Government to say so—says that if the harbour is deepened to 35 feet, the Canadian Government will use it for a large part of its trade during the winter. It would be unfortunate if the Government by reason of stopping short of the depth which is necessary for the accommodation of the largest ocean vessels, should lose the trade which legitimately belongs to Canadian ports. I trust that my hon. friend will take that into his careful consideration in connection with the deepening of the present berths and also with regard to any new berths that may be constructed.

Mr. ROGERS: We are dredging to a depth of 32 feet at low tide at St. John. I did not know that there was any necessity for going deeper. Of course, if it is necessary to go deeper, we will have to make provision for it and dredge the other three feet. It has not been brought prominently to the notice of the department that the depth of 35 feet was necessary. As to the statement of the British Ambassador, I confess that I had not heard of it. I am glad, however, to be able to inform my hon. friend that the British Ambassador has not interfered with our programme of deepening and developing the harbour of St. John. My hon. friend can rest assured that all our energies will be bent to the development of our own harbours and to preventing the trade of our country from being diverted to any other than our own ports. When I was in England it was suggested that in the case of rush orders it might be more convenient that some of the trade of this country should be shipped through other ports than St. John and Halifax, especially in the winter months. I at once registered a strong objection to any such proposal, and I have not heard of it since. I believe the course that I adopted on that occasion had the effect of changing the minds of those who had that course in view. That is the only time that I ever heard any such proposal. As I have said, the country can depend upon it that the Government will do everything in their power to develop as rapidly as possible our own harbours in order that they may be able to take care of all Canadian trade.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister states that the matter of going below 32 feet had not been brought to his notice. I regret to learn that, because in 1911 when I was minister I determined upon sinking the crib sites to a depth of 40 feet. The object of that was to allow for the depth of water in the berths being 35 feet, my idea being that the crib sites should be at least five feet below the level of the berths. I did that because I was aware that the harbour of New York is dredged to a depth of either 40 or 45 feet—to 40 feet at least. Ships are getting bigger every year, and there are a large number of ships crossing the Atlantic to-day which would not come into a harbour where there was not 32 feet of water at the berths; it would not be safe for them to come, they want 35 feet to avoid the danger of the ship scraping along the bottom. There is always more or less filling in from the surrounding water; that is going on all the time at St. John harbour. So I concluded six years ago that in order to bring St. John harbour up to first-class standing it was necessary to provide in the very near future for a berth of 35 feet, and that is why I made provision for sinking the crib sites to a depth of 40 feet. I would like very much if the minister would consider making provision for a depth of 35 feet at the new berths. The very fact that the British Ambassador has put himself in writing in reference to the proposed deepening of the Portland harbour to a depth of 35 feet, stating that if that were done the Canadian Government would use that harbour for purposes of transport during the war, shows that the big shipping companies demand that depth of water for the safety of their large vessels. It is all very well to have an open harbour like St. John; it is all very well to have a large number of berths, which we are striving for, but unless we have them to the proper depth the big ships will not come, and our Maritime Province harbours will not be regarded as first class harbours to which the most important trade of the world can come. In my judgment—and I am speaking from information received from those most qualified to speak on the subject—we shall not be able to attract to our harbours the big ships trading on the Atlantic unless we have a depth of at least 35 feet at the berths.

Mr. ROGERS: There may be some force in what my hon. friend has said, but it is hardly likely that within the next few years there will be any larger ships on the Atlantic than there are to-day. It is probable that the ships will be smaller and more numerous. My hon. friend's remarks remind me that a couple of years ago, when we were considering the construction of a dry dock at Esquimalt and Halifax, the Admiralty stoutly stuck to their request that we have a depth of something like 40 feet. So I am inclined to think there may be some force in what my hon. friend has said, and the department will give his suggestion careful consideration, and see whether it is necessary to have a depth of 35 feet of water at berths 16 and 17 at St. John.

Mr. COPP: May I impose on the good nature of the minister for a few moments to draw his attention to the unfortunate position in which the town of Sackville is placed through lack of wharf accommodation. A few years ago when 10 p.m. my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) was Minister of Public Works, we impressed upon him the necessity of giving us very much improved wharf accommodation, with the result that an appropriation was made and a contract let for a new wharf a little removed from the old location. This wharf, which cost something like $40,000, was partly completed when the present Minister of Public Works took office, and has been finally completed since. We had hoped, of course, that when the new wharf was completed the railway would run a spur down to it, which would give the people of Sackville proper wharf facilities. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Cochrane), however, for some reason or another,—if anybody in that locality advised him to act as he did, it was bad advice—refused to build the spur, and the people in that portion of the county of Westmorland are now in the unfortunate position of having no wharf accommodation at all. Those who do not know the Minister of Railways as well as I do, might think that this had been done purposely, but I would not for a moment charge the minister with discrimination against the people of Sackville. At all events the spur line was not constructed. Since then the Minister of Public Works has made a reasonably large expenditure for repairing the old wharf, where we had rail connection. I do not know the exact cost of that work, but the wharf was repaired, and while the accommodation was not sufficient it was better than none at all. Last spring, however, the Minister of Railways, apparently learning that the people of Sackville were getting some accommodation, tore up the rails from the old wharf and we are now absolutely without any rail connection to the public wharf at all. I am just in receipt of a letter today from Sackville which says that the ice has carried some portion of the old bed away, and a vessel which arrived there within the past week to discharge a cargo put out to sea again without discharging her cargo, because at that point there is a tidal river and when the tide dropped the vessel slid because of the condition of the bed. I think the minister should see to it that immediate attention is paid to the river bed near the wharf so that vessels may discharge their cargo in safety. It would need only a small appropriation, and could be made under the general heading of improvements to harbours and rivers, I suppose. It would hardly be necessary for the minister to send the engineer down there, because the caretaker of the wharf would be able to have the bed of the wharf attended to so that vessels could discharge their cargo. I think the new wharf was completed in 1912, at an expenditure of $40,000. I do not believe a vessel has ever tied up to it yet, and it would seem to me that unless the minister puts some one in charge of the wharf it will be falling into disrepair. I would therefore urge him to have his engineer in that section of the country keep his eye on the wharf, because I still have hopes that we may get rail communication with it yet.

I hope when that is done we shall have our new wharf in a proper state of repair, and will be able to use it. I only make the latter reference and suggestion in the interest of the department, because after that amount of money has been spent there the wharf should not be allowed to go into decay, or to get out of repair, for the sake of the small expenditure necessary to keep it in good condition.

Mr. ROGERS: My hon. friend will quite appreciate the fact that I am not very well acquainted with the local conditions of the two wharves he deals with, but I shall be very glad to have the matter looked into by the engineers and see if anything can be done tending to an improvement.

Harbours and Rivers—Maritime provinces generally, $5,000.

Mr. McKENZIE: Some years ago there were certain improvements made by dredging at a place called Little Bras d'Or, in the county of North Cape Breton. I would like to ask the minister if the work was completed? Little Bras d'Or is an arm of the sea, and was rather shallow for vessels to enter. A considerable amount of money was expended during the years 1909, 1910, 1911 and 1912, but I am informed the work was never really carried to completion, and a danger to navigation existed because of its unfinished condition. Can the minister say whether it has been fully carried out or not? At some places it was cut down to a depth of about twenty-two feet or more, but I am told some parts were left unfinished. Of course, the capacity of an entrance of that kind is limited by the shallowest part. Was the original plan of dredging carried out, and if not has the minister any intention of finishing it? What is left undone would be comparatively small, but while it is left undone it spoils the effect of what has been finished.

Mr. ROGERS: I regret I have nothing before me that supplies the information my hon. friend asks for, but I have asked the deputy minister to take a note of it, and I will be glad to answer my hon. friend's question to-morrow.

Rivers and Harbours—Quebec—Cape Cove, repairs to pier, $1,200.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I wish to offer the same criticism as was offered by my hon. friend from Inverness (Mr. A. W. Chisholm). Last summer I spent some time in the counties of Gaspé and Bonaventure, and I travelled from one harbour to another. To my great surprise I found that practically all the piers and wharves which were solidly built years ago had been partially destroyed by the heavy seas of the Baie de Chaleur. The wharf at Cape Cove is no exception to the general rule. One of the wharves in that section which is especially interesting to me is the wharf at Percé, because Percé is a stopping place for the various steamers which ply between New Brunswick and Quebec and the Gaspé coast. That wharf there was built at a cost of about $80,000, and last year I saw it was cut in two, due to the lack of repairs. I would urge upon my hon. friend to give special instructions to his local engineer, and have a report made to the department giving an outline of what expenditure is necessary to put those piers and wharves in good condition. Having spent so much money it is a great pity that we should be now confronted with the situation that they are absolutely useless.

Mr. ROGERS: It is quite true the heavy seas down there do a great deal of damage to some of our smaller wharves. This is especially the case in regard to the Percé wharf mentioned by my hon. friend. The matter is under the consideration of the department, and a report is being made on it. It is very probable it will receive some attention in the supplementary estimates. In the opinion of the department there is a pressing need for improvement.

Rivers and Harbours—Clarke City—Reconstruction of wharf, $4,500.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is the paper industry, which made Clarke City and gave it its name, still operating? I understand this wharf was built for the company which was carrying on business there. I believe it was a big concern, and employed a large number of hands.

Mr. ROGERS: The information before the deputy minister is that it is still operating. I understand it is the company which is pressing for these repairs.

Rivers and Harbours—Gaspe deep water wharf—Repairs, $17,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is the nature of those repairs? That is the terminus of the Atlantic Quebec and Western railway.

Mr. ROGERS: This amount of $1,700 is required to effect necessary repairs to the wharf, and is made up as follows:

Removal and replacing of 12,750 cubic yards ballast inside of pier	$ 7,650.00
Iron rods and plates at $6 per 100 pounds	5,684.58
Timber—76,183′ B.M. at $40 per M. 14,500′ B.M. spruce at $30 per M.	3,842.32
Total	$16,816.90

Mr. LEMIEUX: I understood that the wharf was completed.

Mr. ROGERS: The district engineer has this to say:

From three feet below low water level to high water level the outside creosoted timber is bulging out and will have to be secured into place by a system of tie rods and fenders so as to prevent the same thing occurring in the future, and to prevent the bulging out of the double set of cribs which form the sides of the pier.

He adds that a double set of tie rods will have to be placed—utilizing the rods already placed by contractors—every 8 feet and held at each end by an iron strap over four pieces of hardwood. The iron straps will also be held in place by screw bolts and supported against the creosoted face work by four channel irons.

Harbours and rivers generally—Repairs and improvements, $75,000.

Mr. BUREAU: I see nothing here for the St. Maurice river. Dredging generally in rivers, I understand, is done by the Department of Marine and Fisheries. I have reference to the part of the St. Maurice which lies within the harbour of Three Rivers. This river is in a peculiar position. It has always been maintained and improved by the Department of Public Works because it is not used so much for navigation generally as for industrial purposes. There are big industries located on the St. Maurice. At the mouth of the river the Canada Foundries Limited have established a plant, and they desire to bring in their iron ore by boat and up the mouth of the river for a short distance. It has become necessary, in the interest of these industries, that there shall be some dredging and some small improvements made. I do not think that the amount involved is very considerable, and I would ask the minister if out of this amount which is now being voted a certain sum could be appropriated to this purpose. I think an application has been made by these people and that they have explained the conditions and circumstances to the department. It is in the public interest that the work should be done.

Mr. ROGERS: If there is an urgent necessity for the work I suppose that an amount could be taken out of the general vote for dredging which applies to Quebec and Ontario. There is an amount covering work of this kind. We have not reached the estimate yet but work of this character would come under that head. I have not in mind the particular work that my hon. friend refers to, at least it has not been brought to my notice in such a way that I could explain the details of it, but I shall be very glad to have it looked into and see if a certain portion of the dredging money that is voted can be applied to that particular work.

Mr. BUREAU: My reason for asking the question is that, this being within the limits of the harbour of Three Rivers as defined by the Act, I was anxious to know whether the Department of Public Works would take charge of it. Part of the harbour is not used in any way for navigation purposes. There are no docks, except private docks which are used by barges that haul pulpwood and the produce of the mills. If it remains for the Department of Marine and Fisheries to do this work, I do not think there is much hope of having it done.

Mr. ROGERS: I understand that the harbour of Three Rivers comes under the commission. The Department of Public Works has been doing the dredging there and I presume if there is necessity for further dredging, we will have to carry it out.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: How much of the $75,000 voted last year under the same general head has been expended?

Mr. ROGERS: Forty-seven thousand dollars was expended last year.

Laprairie—Protection works, $85,000.

Mr. MARTIN: What is the nature of the work at Laprairie?

[Mr. Bureau.]

Mr. ROGERS: Building a roadway.

Mr. MARTIN: Last spring I went across Victoria bridge and I found four or five feet of water on that road. In the early spring we find about fifty feet of ice on the road and it stops traffic there for six or seven days. It is the only way of reaching Montreal from the south side of the St. Lawrence. Is it the intention to spend this money during next summer?

Mr. ROGERS: We have had a good deal of trouble with this particular work. The work acts as a dyke and a protection and also as a road. A contract was recently let for its completion and the contractors are at work. They have promised to have 100 or 200 men at work every day from Monday next in order that they may get it completed as soon as possible.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Who are the contractors?

Mr. ROGERS: The Carleton Construction Company.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is the amount of the contract?

Mr. ROGERS: Seventy-nine thousand dollars.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The minister expects the work will soon be through?

Mr. ROGERS: We want to try and get it through this fall.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It is an eyesore. People travelling out of Montreal are stopped immediately at the outlet of the city. I have been over that route on several occasions. If the minister completes that work at the earliest possible date he will render great service to the travelling public.

Mr. ROGERS: Last year we built a temporary length of road which gave good service for a time. We are pressing the contractors and urging them to get the work completed as rapidly as possible. A few days ago we made further representations to the contractors and they gave us very strong assurances that they were endeavouring to carry out the contract and to have it completed within the next three months. We are giving them this opportunity to go on on condition that they keep a certain number of men at work every day.

Mr. EDWARDS: Is this the Montreal end of King Edward island?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes. The ice washes away the land on this point on the river and it is work which properly appertains to the Federal Government.

Mr. EDWARDS: I do not wish to raise any objection, and I should like the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) and other hon. gentlemen from Quebec to remember that, if in the future I ask the Government to give some assistance towards building another piece of road that properly appertains to the Federal Government, and happens to be in the county of Frontenac.

Murray Bay—Repairs and improvements to wharf, $3,500.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How much was spent there last year?

Mr. ROGERS: The amount was $4,200.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It is a very creditable work. The wharf was too narrow.

Rimouski harbour improvements, $170,000.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: How much was spent last year at Rimouski?

Mr. ROGERS: Eighty-five thousand dollars.

Rivière Ouelle—Repairs and improvements to wharf, $5,400.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Would the minister give instructions to his wharfinger at Rivière Ouelle to see that the railing on the wharf is strengthened? This is the terminus of a branch line from Rivière Ouelle station to Quaie St. Denis. The wharf is frequented by many people, and for the protection of the public the railing should be strengthened. I happen to pass there often, and I am surprised that there are not more accidents.

Ste. Anne des Monts—Landing pier, $6,650.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Was any work done here last year?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes. We spent $34,000. That is to complete the landing pier.

Mr. ROBB: I notice the minister has dropped from these estimates the item of $15,000 for deepening La Guerre river.

Mr. ROGERS: This was included in a large number of items dropped from the estimates this year, that is items that had been revoted a number of times.

Ontario public works, harbours and rivers, $333,850.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not think that Ontario members expected that Ontario public works would go on to-night. It is nearly 11 o'clock, and perhaps the minister would consent to the committee rising.

Mr. ROGERS: No objection at all. I quite appreciate the opportunity given me to-night of proceedings with my estimates instead of waiting till a later date.

Progress reported.

On the motion of Mr. Rogers, the House adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

Saturday, July 28, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

WRECK OF DREDGE CAPE BRETON.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. KYTE: I desire to call the attention of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) to a claim which has been made by the widows of the men who were drowned from the Government dredge Cape Breton in the month of January last. I have a letter from one of thos widows urging that whatever appropriation or gratuity the Government proposes making should be paid to them at once, as, speaking for herself, she and her family are in dire need. In the absence of the hon. minister during the present session, the matter was discussed in the House, and the Acting Minister of Public Works was good enough to intimate it was receiving the attention of the Government. I would urge that whatever action is to be taken be taken immediately.

Mr. ROGERS: Provision is being made for the widows of those who were drowned in the accident referred to, and the amount which it is proposed to pay will be brought down in the supplementary estimates, probably next week, and as soon as these are passed the amounts will be paid.

FORBIDDEN CIRCULATION IN CANADA.

Mr. OLIVER: I desire to ask if the Government is prepared to make a statement in regard to the suppression of the book, "The Fiddlers"?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The Government is not prepared at the present time, but probably will be at the beginning of the week.

Mr. OLIVER: May I be permitted to remind the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) that at the end of last week the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) promised to bring certain information before the House during this week. If the delay is simply because the Prime Minister happens to be absent, possibly he may bring the matter forward when he comes in. The action of the Government has attracted a great deal of attention throughout the country, and in the interests of everybody I think the sooner the question is settled the better.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The Prime Minister will not be in the House to-day. The information the Prime Minister promised is being prepared, but it is not intended to lay a statement before the House until a complete statement can be made. No delay which it is possible to avoid is taking place in the securing and preparation of the information.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not wish to continue the discussion, but may I point out that I made a specific request for answers to two simple questions, and that is all I am pressing upon the Government. I think that in fair consideration to a member of the House those answers should be forthcoming.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There is no disposition to deprive my hon. friend of the information which is asked, but he can easily see that it is possible to answer two questions, and yet leave the case so uncompletely stated as to be unfair, to both sides.

PROHIBITION OF EXPORTATION OF WHEAT FROM CANADA.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. OLIVER: Can the Government make a statement to the House in regard to the announcement which appears in the morning paper to the effect that the Board of Grain Supervisors has prohibited the exportation of wheat from Canada? And will the Government explain the full meaning of the action announced some time ago in regard to the fixing of the price of wheat at $2.40 a bushel?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The information I have is that the Board of Grain Supervisors fixed the maximum price for this year's crop, to take effect after 1st August, at $2.40 per bushel. Since this price was fixed it has been ascertained that parties are taking wheat bought at, say, not more than that figure, and are proposing to export it to the United States. The Board of Grain Supervisors has therefore issued an order prohibiting the taking of grain from the elevators and sending it across the border, where the price has not yet been fixed. This order is issued by virtue of the ample powers given to the board to direct the destination of grain bought at the prices which it has fixed.

Mr. OLIVER: Do I understand that this applies to the crop harvested last year, or does it apply to the crop now growing?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: What I have stated refers to last year's crop. This year's crop is still to be garnered.

Mr. OLIVER: I understand the order in regard to the fixed price only takes effect on 1st August, and therefore the wheat is not yet under that control as to price. Is that correct?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is correct.

Mr. OLIVER: My right hon. friend did not answer the question we had under discussion the other night, as to whether this is merely a maximum over which wheat cannot rise, or does it mean that the owner of the wheat will get $2.40 a bushel for it?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not know what the owner will get but the price fixed is for last year's crop, now in store. The maximum price is $2.40.

Mr. OLIVER: There is no assurance that the owner of the wheat will get $2.40; he must take what he can get?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not know what the owner can get.

Mr. OLIVER: The owner must take what he can get but he cannot get more than $2.40?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That would be my rendering of it.

APPLICATION FOR RELEASE OF THOMAS KELLY.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. LEMIEUX: I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) if steps are being taken to secure the release of Kelly from the penitentiary?

Mr. DOHERTY: There have been petitions and applications at different times looking to the release of Thomas Kelly. These applications have not been finally disposed of.

SUPPLY.

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Mr. MARCIL: Before the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) proceeds with the estimates for Ontario, as I was not present last evening, I would like to refer to the item of $500 for repairs to wharf at Anse aux Gascons. There was a storm last spring which did considerable damage to this wharf. I put a question on the order paper and I think the minister replied that it would probably require an expenditure of $2,500 to put the wharf in good condition. I would like to know if this $500 is all that is to be expended this year or if an additional amount will be put in the supplementary estimates to make up the $2,500 which, according to the engineer's statement, is required.

Hon. ROBERT ROGERS (Minister of Public Works): I understand that the department is considering a proposition to put an additional sum in the supplementary estimates.

Public Works—chargeable to income—Harbours and Rivers — Ontario—Bowmanville—Repairs to pier, $10,000.

Mr. MURPHY: I observe that that sum has been placed in the estimates for two succeeding years but there does not seem to have been any expenditure. Why is the work not being done?

Mr. ROGERS: The item is to provide for the reconstruction of the superstructure of the pier for a length of 80 feet, and other repairs. It is regarded as a necessary work but it seems that arrangements have not been made to proceed with it. It is kept in the estimate because of the pressing necessity that appears to exist. It will be taken up at the earliest possible day.

Mr. MURPHY: Is it kept in the estimates in view of the pressing necessity that appears to exist or in view of election requirements?

Mr. ROGERS: No.

Mr. MURPHY: Is there any intention to proceed with it?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. MURPHY: When?

Mr. ROGERS: As soon as possible.

Mr. MURPHY: Is the work going to be done by contract or day labour?

Mr. ROGERS: It is a repair work, and, wherever it is possible we do work of this kind by contract in order to avoid day labour as much as possible. Nothing has been settled as yet as to how this particular work will be done.

Mr. MURPHY: The minister does not know whether it will be done by day labour or contract?

Mr. ROGERS: My opinion is that it will be done by contract.

Mr. MURPHY: Tenders will be invited?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. MURPHY: When will the tenders be advertised for?

Mr. ROGERS: The chief engineer is looking into the matter with a view to calling for tenders.

Bruce Mines—Repairs to and reconstruction of wharf, $1,000.

Mr. NESBITT: Is this supposed to finish the work?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Cobourg—Repairs to east pier, $15,000.

Mr. MURPHY: I observe that this sum also appeared in the estimates last year and there does not seem to have been any expenditure. Why not?

Mr. ROGERS: We spent $11,000 last year.

Mr. MURPHY: Is this a revote in part?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. MURPHY: How much?

Mr. ROGERS: Four thousand dollars.

Mr. NESBITT: It shows in the estimates $15,000 last year and $15,000 this year. That is not quite correct?

Mr. ROGERS: No, these estimates were made up before the year closed.

French River Dams—Repairs and maintenance, $5,600.

Mr. NESBITT: Is this supposed to finish that work?

Mr. ROGERS: It is for maintenance and some small repairs.

Goderich—Repairs to harbour works, $3,000.

Mr. NESBITT: For Goderich $90,000 was voted in 1916-17; $3,000 is a re-vote. Will that finish the work?

Mr. ROGERS: The work is finished; this is simply some repairs.

Kingston—Harbour improvements, $52,000.

Mr. NESBITT: Will that finish the work?

Mr. ROGERS: The work is finished. This completes the payments.

Mr. MURPHY: Who had that contract?

Mr. ROGERS: The Thunder Bay Dredging company.

Newcastle—Repairs to east pier, $17,500.

Mr. MURPHY: That has been in the estimates for a couple of years, but apparently nothing has been done. Why is that?

Mr. ROGERS: The principal reason is that, as my hon. friend understands, we are economizing as much as we can.

Mr. MURPHY: I did not understand that.

Mr. ROGERS: Where it is possible to get on without doing any work, we adopt that course. According to the engineers, there is necessity for having the money available in case we should be obliged to go on with the work.

Mr. MURPHY: It is surely improper to put in votes year in and year out and do nothing. The minister does not know whether there is any necessity for that work being done or for keeping the item in the estimates. There are several other items in this block in the same position.

Mr. ROGERS: This item is for the construction of a new pier-head on the east pier, of solid crib-work, 36 feet wide and 112 feet long. This is needed because of damage caused by a storm. The harbour was constructed originally by the municipality about 60 years ago.

Mr. MURPHY: The place cannot be very important or the work very urgently needed, as nothing has been done although the item has been in the estimates for two years. If it has been possible to get along without it thus far, why not get on a little longer, and drop the item altogether?

Port Stanley—Harbour improvements, $96,000.

Mr. MURPHY: What is this?

Mr. ROGERS: A new breakwater. This is a very important shipping point and it is necessary to build a new breakwater to preserve the harbour.

Mr. NESBITT: Is this supposed to cover the cost?

Mr. ROGERS: No, the contract price is $120,000.

Mr. MURPHY: Who has the contract?

Mr. ROGERS: M. J. Hogan.

Saskatchewan and Alberta—Harbours and rivers generally—Repairs and improvements, $20,000.

Mr. McCRANEY: There is an amount of $9,500 which is carried forward. Would the minister be good enough to explain that?

[Mr. Rogers.]

Mr. ROGERS: This was a lapsed appropriation of last year. It was entered up by the Finance Department when our estimates went over there.

Mr. McCRANEY: Was there any expenditure made during the past year?

Mr. ROGERS: Not out of that amount. We had probably a similar vote to this last year, without that $9,500.

Mr. McCRANEY: What amount was expended last year?

Mr. ROGERS: For some reason or other the Finance Department added together various items which, were unexpended, amounting to $9,500. Those were dropped, and this amount has been transferred by the Finance Department.

Mr. McCRANEY: Was there any money expended under the item last year?

Mr. ROGERS: Not out of that sum, but we had the vote for harbours and rivers generally last year the same as this year.

Mr. McCRANEY: Did the department spend any money out of it?

Mr. ROGERS: Only about $900.

Mr. McCRANEY: Will the hon. minister tell me on what harbours and rivers that $900 was expended? My recollection is that only on the North Saskatchewan river are there any Dominion Government works on which such an expenditure could be made?

Mr. ROGERS: I do not appear to have a statement before me as to what expenditure was made. I will be glad to supply it to my hon. friend.

Mr. OLIVER: What has the Government in mind as to improvements to be made out of this vote?

Mr. ROGERS: This is a general vote that applies in the two provinces generally for harbours and rivers, that we may be prepared to take care of anything that may require to be cared for during the year. In the western provinces they do not appear to have the pressing need for expenditures that they have in the eastern provinces where the vote is pretty well used up.

Mr. OLIVER: I hope the certificate which the minister gives the western members, in regard to the moderation of their demands on the treasury in this time of stress, will be well recorded. Our friends from other parts of the country might follow our example.

Fraser River (lower)—Improvements, $20,000.

Harbours and rivers generally—Repairs and improvements, $75,000.

Mr. MURPHY: In connection with these two amounts, will the hon. minister say whether, in view of the fact that the same amounts appear in the estimates each year, there has been any expenditure last year under the vote, and if so how much under each of these heads?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, I have a long list of the items expended last year. The items run from $125 up for the repairs of small wharves in British Columbia.

Mr. NESBITT: The first of these two items; must have been all for one work.

Mr. ROGERS: This amount of $20,000 is asked for by District Engineer Worsfold for the maintenance of the snagboat Samson. The snagboat is used for the purpose of removing snags from the channel of the Fraser river from Chilliwack to the gulf of Georgia, 75 miles, which greatly benefits the shipping and fishing industry on the Fraser. The amount asked for is based on a monthly estimated cost of $1,600.

Mr. NESBITT: The whole of this $20,000 was paid to this snagboat for keeping the Fraser river dear?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. NESBITT: Is not the entry in the estimates, "appropriations not required for 1917-18" a rather peculiar one? Should it not be "appropriations not required for 1916-17"?

Mr. ROGERS: That might be a better way of expressing it. These entries were put in by the Finance Department.

Mr. NESBITT: Does it not mean the amount not required for last year's vote?

Mr. ROGERS: It means the amount in last year's estimates that we have not spent. We are not continuing the items this year.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Some discussion has been taking place during the last few months in the Manitoba press concerning works in British Columbia. What progress has been made with the dry dock at Vancouver? I observe that there was some difficulty between the city of Vancouver and the Canadian Pacific Railway company with regard to the matter.

Mr. ROGERS: The difficulty between the Canadian Pacific Railway company and the city was with regard to other matters, so far as I recollect.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is the work proceeding?

Mr. ROGERS: Not with the dry dock.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is the policy of the Government in that regard?

Mr. ROGERS: The policy is set forth in our Dry Dock Subsidies Act. We have expressed willingness to give a subsidy to any company that will undertake to construct a dry dock.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The old subsidy?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes. I hope, before the session closes, to ask Parliament to adopt an amendment to the Dry Dock Subsidies Act, because it is almost impossible to get any company to build a dry dock under the provisions of that Act.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Was any contract entered into, or was the matter left in abeyance?

Mr. ROGERS: About two years ago a firm applied for the subsidy and we agreed to grant it, but they were unable to carry out the contract, owing to financial difficulties.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The Government now propose to amend the Dry Dock Subsidies Act; after that they will enter into a contract with any firm that will offer to build a dry dock at Vancouver.

Mr. ROGERS: Any firm at all.

Mr. OLIVER: The sum of $75,000 is made available for repairs and improvements in British Columbia, for distribution at the discretion of the department. In other provinces the distribution made is made by specific vote, in very much larger proportions. It does not seem justifiable that out of a comparatively small total vote a large proportion should be taken for distribution without the knowledge or authority of Parliament. It simply places $75,000 in the hands of the minister, which he can distribute wherever he thinks necessary or desirable.

Mr. ROGERS: The sum of $75,000 is voted for Quebec, just the same as for British Columbia. Conditions are rather different in British Columbia, in view of the fact that frequent expenditure is necessary, under the general vote, in connection with streams and freshets.

Mr. OLIVER: There are only fourteen items in the British Columbia list and there are over forty in the Quebec list, some of them running down as low as $600.

Harbours and rivers—generally, $40,000.

Mr. McKENZIE: An hon. gentleman who is not present to-day wanted one item of the British Columbia estimates left open for discussion.

Mr. ROGERS: Any member can discuss any item he likes, so long as the estimates are on. We will not hold him down to any rule.

Dredging—new dredging plant, Ontario and Quebec, $65,000.

Mr. NESBITT: Where are these dredging plants located?

Mr. ROGERS: This is to build a light-draft dipper dredge. It will be built in the shipyards at Ottawa.

Mr. MURPHY: Where is to to be used?

Mr. ROGERS: Anywhere in Quebec and Ontario. The two provinces work together in the matter of dredging.

Dredging—Ontario and Quebec, $500,000.

Mr. MARCIL: Has any plan been laid out with regard to dredging in the province of Quebec?

Mr. ROGERS: The dredges are all being operated now; this amount is to provide for their operation in various places.

Mr. MARCIL: Is any dredging being done in Baie de Chaleur?

Mr. ROGERS: No, we are not doing anything there at present.

Mr. NESBITT: Where are the larger dredging operations being carried on this year in Ontario?

Mr. ROGERS: At Port Burwell and Toronto—these are the largest items.

Mr. McKENZIE: How much of the appropriation for dredging in the Maritime Provinces goes to Nova Scotia?

Mr. ROGERS: I do not know that we would have a statement such as my hon. friend suggests, because the dredges are at work in the three provinces and go from one to another. We do not have the items separate for each province.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is any dredging of any importance to be done in Nova Scotia this year?

Mr. ROGERS: We are doing a considerable quantity at St. John, Liverpool, Lockeport and other places.

Mr. McKENZIE: Unfortunately for us, St. John is not in Nova Scotia.

[Mr. Oliver.]

Mr. ROGERS: It is in the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. McKENZIE: I asked about Nova Scotia.

Mr. ROGERS: We are doing some dredging at St. Peter's.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is in connection with the completion of the canal?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: Last night I asked the minister for some information about dredging done in the entrance to the Little Bras d'Or harbour. He thought he would be able to give me information to-day. Has the work been completed, or in what condition is it?

Mr. ROGERS: I had a memorandum taken of the question asked by my hon. friend last night and this is the reply I have received from Mr. Dufresne:

Refering to your inquiry regarding dredging at Little Bras d'Or, N.S., I send you herewith a sketch showing the work remaining to be done on this channel to complete the work. I also attach the estimate sheet descriptive of the remaining work. The amount of material to be removed is 14,300 cubic yards and the location of this material is shown on the sketch in the contour lines within the channel upon which soundings are marked. Our records show that between 1911 and 1913, 42,330 cubic yards have been removed by our dredge No. 6. There is no record of any contract work having been done at this place, going back as far as 1906.

It was the intention to have placed No. 6 (Cape Breton) on this work, this being one of the reasons why the dredge was being returned to Cape Breton waters. Upon looking over our records, I also find that no one has been urging the completion of this work.

That is, apart from our own engineers.

Mr. McKENZIE: Possibly I was not urging it as strenuously as I should have done. This work was never under contract; it was always Government work, and when the Government thought proper to knock off work, of course, it being entirely under their own control, there was very little said about the matter. The reason why I would like to see the work finished is because one of our growing coal mines is on this harbour. It was on account of the work done during the years the minister speaks of that they are able to ship. Formerly they had to go in a roundabout way some forty miles to get to sea, going past the upper end of the island of Boularderie. The opening of this channel means that they have to go only a very short distance to get to sea. The mine is becoming more important since this opening was made, and my reason for urging the completion of the work is to enable the operators to ship more largely from that mine. It is important in these times that we should be able to produce as much coal as possible. If we could finish this work and thus enable larger vessels to come in, the production and shipment of coal from that place would be increased. If at all possible, a part of this appropriation should be applied to the completion of the channel. The difficult part was the commencement of the work, as a considerable quantity of rock had to be taken out. Certain strips have still to be cut out, but there is no great difficulty about completing the work, and it should be completed as early as possible. The full channel is not completed, and consequently there is no mariners record of the entrance for sea captains and owners of shipping and they cannot charter their vessels to go there until there is a complete record and they are sure that there is a proper entrance.

Mr. ROGERS: About four-fifths of the work has already been done, and as a result the channel is passable to most of the boats; at least any that we have heard of have been able to get in and out. Unfortunately, we lost the dredge mentioned in the memorandum which I read. Had it returned safely to Cape Breton, we should have had this work completed by this time, but we are temporarily delayed for lack of a dredge in that locality, because we have not one to replace the one that was lost. I do not think it will be long before we can find one, and this work will be completed as soon as possible.

4 p.m.

Mr. McKENZIE: There are two very capable dredging companies in Cape Breton and one at Guysborough. They have been accustomed to doing work around Cape Breton. If the minister undertakes to do the work, he will have no trouble in getting a dredge. The Guysborough dredge is controlled by Captain Wells, a friend of the minister's. I saw him here the other day, and I am sure he would be only too glad to undertake the completion of this little job if he was asked to do it.

Dredging—Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, $90,000.

Mr. OLIVER: Where is this dredging to be done?

Mr. ROGERS: This is for the maintenance of our plants in the three provinces.

Mr. OLIVER: There is no dredging contemplated?

Mr. ROGERS: Some dredging work is being done in the Red river at the present time. I do not know of any dredging going on in Saskatchewan just now.

Mr. OLIVER: What about Alberta?

Mr. ROGERS: No dredging is going on there at present. I do not think there has been any application for any. We had a dredge at Craven doing some work, but it is finished now.

Mr. OLIVER: There is no work to be done there now?

Mr. ROGERS: Not that we have application for.

Mr. OLIVER: Has the dredge been removed from there?

Mr. ROGERS: The dredge is there yet.

Mr. OLIVER: The only dredging going on is in the mouth of the Red river?

Mr. ROGERS: That is all.

Dredging—British Columbia, $550,000.

Mr. OLIVER: What dredging is that?

Mr. ROGERS: This is the general dredging appropriation for operating the Government plant and carrying on dredging.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is any dredging being done at Vancouver harbour?

Mr. ROGERS: We have a good deal of dredging to do at Vancouver harbour.

Mr. LEMIEUX: To what extent?

Mr. ROGERS: Widening the entrance to the harbour. Splendid work is being done at Vancouver.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is it being done by the department?

Mr. ROGERS: All this is being done by the department.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is the area dredged?

Mr. ROGERS: Our dredge was doing the work of widening the approach to the harbour. The inside of the harbour is another thing, of course, and is let by contract.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will my hon. friend state how many cubic feet were dredged to widen the harbour, and what was the cost?

Mr. ROGERS: I have not the information before me. I will look it up.

Mr. OLIVER: Is the work under this vote being done only in Vancouver Harbour, or is the work being done in other harbours as well?

Mr. ROGERS: All over British Columbia.

Mr. OLIVER: What is the work in contemplation under this particular vote? The Government must have some definite intention as to the expenditure.

Mr. ROGERS: We are dredging in Vancouver, in the Fraser river, in Victoria, in Nanaimo, and at certain other smaller points.

Mr. EDWARDS: Are there any dredges operating in the lower part of Lake Ontario, in the neighbourhood of Kingston, say, at present?

Mr. ROGERS: Not at present.

Mr. MURPHY: How is this British Columbia dredging done? Is it done by contract, or by dredges owned by the department?

Mr. ROGERS: Entirely by dredges owned by the departfent.

Slides and booms, $5,000.

Mr. NESBITT: Are we to understand that the Dominion Government maintains slides and booms? I was under the impression they were maintained by the lumbermen.

Mr. ROGERS: They are maintained by the Government and the Government collects tolls from the lumbermen.

Roads and bridges—Dominion roads and bridges generally, $5,000.

Mr. NESBITT: Where has the Government any roads or bridges?

Mr. ROGERS: We have several interprovincial bridges.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I certainly do not object to this item, and I think there should be interprovincial bridges in the East as well as in the West. I wish to refer particularly to the connection which should be made between the province of Quebec and the province of Ontario, at Vaudreuil. Those who travel from Ottawa to Montreal will have noticed that they have to cross either on the Canadian Pacific Railway bridge or on the Grand Trunk bridge from Vaudreuil to Ile Perrot, and then from Ile Perrot to Ste. Anne. There is no place in eastern Canada where there are more trains and more passengers than at this particular point. I have on two occasions called the attention of the Government to the necessity of transforming the four bridges between Vaudreuil and Ste. Anne so as to make them accessible to foot passengers. It seems to me it would be the easiest thing in the world to do as was done between Montreal and Charlemagne where the Canadian Northern crosses the Rivière des Prairies, and provide for the crossing of foot passengers over the two branches of the Ottawa river. At present motorists leaving Montreal for Ottawa have to cross on two ferries, one from St. Anne to Ile Perrot and one from Ile Perrot to Vaudreuil. This crossing usually takes an hour and a half, including the time spent in waiting for the ferry. It is an antiquated system and does not at all meet the requirements of the present day. I do not say the Government should build two bridges, considering the serious conditions with which our country is confronted and the heavy demands made on our finances, but I would suggest that the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Railways and Canals should confer with the two railway companies and with the adjoining municipalities with a view to meeting the public needs in this matter. When I speak of the adjoining municipalities I do not mean only the rural municipalities, Vaudreuil, St. Anne and Ile Perrot, but I include the city of Montreal, which is very much interested in the construction of those bridges. I would see to it that the city of Montreal, the other municipalities, and the Government each pays its share. I have not consulted the engineers on the feasibility of the project, but it seems to me that it is quite possible to construct two pathways on those bridges, which would be of very great service to the public. I am spokesman of the electors of the county of Jacques Cartier, and of the city of Montreal, and I am sure I voice the sentiments of both provinces in advocating this improvement. It is really surprising that in that section of the country, which is so much frequented by the public, we still have to cross the two rivers on an out-of-date ferry.

Mr. ROGERS: I think my hon. friend's remarks would have been more in place if they were addressed to the Minister of Public Works for the province of Quebec.

Mr. LEMIEUX: This is an interprovincial matter.

Mr. ROGERS: The district is entirely within the borders of the province of Quebec. I grant you it is an important and a very necessary improvement. But it is not interprovincial and my hon. friend is probably aware that the Government have never undertaken the expenditure of any money upon the construction of any bridge save and except an interprovincial bridge.

Mr. MARCIL: How about the bridges over the Rideau canal?

Mr. ROGERS: Those are canal bridges which are entirely different. When the Minister of Railways undertakes to construct a canal, of necessity he has to build bridges over it.

Mr. MARCIL: There is a canal at St. Anne.

Mr. ROGERS: That does not apply to this particular case. What my hon. friend has referred to is the construction of a bridge between Vaudreuil and Ile Perrot and Isle Perrot and Ste. Anne, which is not interprovincial in any sense. Nevertheless, this suggestion is a most deserving one. We discussed it last year, and during the past two or three years I have received deputations urging very strongly the necessity of some work of this kind being done. I was so impressed with the necessity of it that on more than one occasion I assured a delegation that if they would take the matter up with the province of Quebec, where it properly belongs, and if the Government of Quebec would say that they would adopt that policy and see it carried out, I would undertake to recommend to Parliament that certain assistance be granted in carrying out the work. The same condition holds good, so far as I am concerned, now. I quite agree that there is an absolute necessity for the construction of bridges between Vaudreuil and Ile Perrot and Isle Perrot and St. Anne. I hope the day is not far distant when the Quebec Government will undertake this work, which is so necessary, and which will supply an outlet between the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, and will save time and avoid inconvenience as spoken of by my hon. friend from Rouville in that it takes an hour and a half or two hours to get across by the ferry.

Mr. MURPHY: Does the minister suggest an entirely new bridge?

Mr. ROGERS: An entirely new bridge. There is no bridge at all except the railway bridges.

Mr. MURPHY: I was wondering whether he meant an extension of the railway bridges or the construction of a new bridge.

Mr. ROGERS: That will be a detail. I understand the engineer has worked it out in both ways.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I was suggesting the alteration of the present railway bridges so as to make them available for highway traffic. I think it is quite feasible. I do not know what the opinion of the engineer is, but I have heard it stated on good authority that these bridges could be transformed so as to make them suitable for highway traffic. My hon. friend is quite right when he says that the bridges are within the province of Quebec entirely but the boundary line of Ontario is only a few miles distant. While this work falls under the control of the provincial government, my hon. friend should not forget that when the Canadian Northern Railway company built their bridge at Rivier des Prairies, at the other extremity of Montreal Island, they had to build a bridge not only available for railway traffic, but also for highway traffic. Certain conditions were inserted in the Bill and they were subsidized accordingly. I have no doubt that when these bridges were built the companies received subsidies from the Ottawa Government, and it was then that the authorities should have seen to it that the bridges were made suitable for highway traffic. I will make a suggestion to my hon. friend. I understand that within a short time the Grand Trunk and Canadian Northern Railway companies will come before this Parliament for aid in the nature of loans or subsidies—I do not know which, but it is pretty certain that these two railways are making their annual visit to the Government and to Parliament to obtain aid. When they come we will examine their claims and pass upon them. But if the Government should perchance decide to give some additional aid, let us say, to the Grand Trunk Railway company, it seems to me it would be a small matter to induce the company under these circumstances to so alter the bridge between Vaudreuil and Isle Perrot and between Isle Perrot and St. Anne as to facilitate the use of the bridge by the public generally. It should be very easy, when the railway company comes before Parliament to ask for additional favours, to get them to remedy a grievance that has existed for so many years. I hope my hon. friend will take note of my suggestion.

Mr. ROGERS: I am afraid my hon. friend is somewhat in error as to the railway conditions. I am not aware that the Grand Trunk are making any application for aid to the Grand Trunk railway. There may be such an application for the Grand Trunk Pacific, but the bridge referred to by my hon. friend is a Grand Trunk bridge entirely. As to the proposal to have a highway bridge attached to, or constructed in connection with, the railway bridges that are already built, that is probably the cheapest and best idea that could possibly be worked out, but it is difficult for the Dominion Government to take any lead in the matter by reason of the fact that they have never before contributed to any bridge under these particular circumstances. We have many times had applications for such assistance. We have an application for assistance to the construction of a bridge over the Peace river, and it is an application which I hope we shall be able to favourably consider, because the Government of Canada own and control all the land in the vicinity and the construction of this bridge as a highway bridge attached to the railway bridge being constructed there would be of inestimable value to the people of the Peace River district. I hope to urge on my colleagues and on Parliament that some assistance be given to the construction of a bridge under those circumstances in that particular locality.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Would my hon. friend, or the Minister of Railways, be kind enough to ask one of the engineers to prepare a little plan of the additional work which would be needed to have a passageway for traffic attached to both the Canadian Pacific and Grand Trunk bridges? It would cost very little to have a plan prepared. When we see the plan we shall know if it is feasible, and the approximate cost of the work. When we are in possession of the plan I will ask the Government of Quebec to do its share towards the construction of that additional passageway, and we can then ask the Ottawa Government and the municipalities to contribute to the cost of that addition.

Mr. ROGERS: I think we have had a plan prepared; at least there has been a report by the engineers. I think it was made in respect of a new bridge, but I am not sure whether the engineers have notice of the possibility of the bridge being attached to the railway bridge as my friend suggests.

Mr. LEMIEUX: A new bridge would, of course, solve the difficulty. I am not advocating that, in view of the financial situation, but, if the two bridges can be utilized, I should like to see a plan prepared by the department, without committing the department or the Government, that would show the approximate cost of the two bridges. This would be of assistance in getting financial aid from the province of Quebec and the city of Montreal.

Mr. ROGERS: I do not know that we could attach a bridge to the railway company's bridge wtihout the company's consent.

Mr. EDWARDS: If the Grand Trunk Railway is applying for financial assistance, they can perhaps judge of the extent to which they can count on my hon. friend's support by the degree of his eagerness to secure this bridge. I am entirely in sympathy with the idea of constructing a bridge at this point. The more my hon. friend considers it, the more he will regret the course taken by some hon. gentlemen in opposing the Dominion Highways Act, which might have met just such cases. The fact that the bridge would be altogether within the province of Quebec is merely an incident; it is in reality an interprovincial bridge, and the necessity for it requires no argument.

Mr. PROULX: Another interprovincial bridge, which was undertaken by the late Government whose policy was continued by this Government, is that between Hawkesbury and Grenville, across the Ottawa river. Only last year the vote for this bridge was dropped. The need for this bridge is becoming more urgent each day. The united counties of Prescott and Russell adopted a bylaw last October to improve over 200 miles of highways within the two counties. One of the main arteries is a road between the provincial boundary and the boundary between Russell and Carleton. The counties of Prescott and Russell are now building a road from Hawkesbury west towards Ottawa. The municipalities north of the Ottawa river, between Grenville and Montreal, have formed an association. They intend to improve the road from Grenville to Montreal and expect aid from the Government of Quebec. The road between Hawkesbury and Ottawa can be completed within a few years. It is the intention of the two counties to improve the road as rapidly as possible. They have the assistance of the Ontario Government. This will make a very beautiful road, following the river on both sides between Montreal and Ottawa. I hope the minister has not abandoned the project.

Mr. ROGERS: This bridge between Hawkesbury and Grenville is, of course, an interprovincial bridge. I can assure my hon. friend that I am very sorry, for more reasons than one, that, in view of the policy of retrenchment, we have had to drop this item from the estimates. Sir George Perley feels very keenly on this. It was promoted by him in view of the fact that it affects his constituency to the degree it does, at Grenville, and he was most pressing for years to have this carried out. This year we felt it necessary to drop this in common with many other items, for the present year at all events. But we hope conditions will improve in the near future, and that this work will be gone on with. I quite agree as to the necessity of completing it at the earliest possible date.

Mr. PROULX: I am glad to hear the minister's statement because it will help the municipalities on the north of the Ottawa river to get assistance from the provincial government to improve the road if there is a possibility of the bridge being built.

Mr. MARCIL: I have been reading the debate of the 9th of May last year. I want to give the Minister of Public Works a little of my own experience with regard to interprovincial bridges. With the assistance of Mr. Blair and Mr. Fielding, it took us about seven years to bring New Brunswick, Quebec and the Dominion into line and to make provision for the construction of the interprovincial bridge on the Restigouche river at Matapedia. After seven years we finally succeeded, by using the pillars of the old Intercolonial railway bridge to support a highway bridge. The only way we succeeded was by having the Dominion take hold of the matter. As long as we had to rely on the provinces, we found that when Quebec was ready to proceed New Brunswick was not ready, and when New Brunswick was ready something held Quebec back; and nothing was done for seven years, until the Dominion took the lead, and we secured subsidies from both provinces. The bridge has been built and has given immense satisfaction to that district, and will continue to give satisfaction for many years to come. The same story may be told about the Ottawa river. The late Mr. Beemer undertook to erect the interprovincial bridge about thirty years ago. It was only when the Dominion took charge of the work that construction proceeded. The same thing may be said with regard to the bridge between Bonaventure and Campbellton, where both provinces are willing to do their share. Nothing will be accomplished at Vaudreuil and Ste. Anne unless the Public Works Department steps in. The provincial governments cannot touch these railway bridges, both of which are federal structures. No bridge can be placed in between the Canadian Pacific and Grand Trunk bridges except with the co-operation of the Dominion authorities and the permission of the Railway Board. Therefore, the Dominion must take the lead in this matter, as they did in the case of the bridge at Metapedia, and as I hope they will shortly do at Hawkesbury and at Campbellton. The Minister of Public Works has been heralded as a promoter of highways, and if we are to have good highways in these districts, we must have these bridges between the provinces. and wherever a railway bridge is affected, the lead must be taken by the Federal authorities. If the hon. minister will go to Montreal he will see the two bridges running parallel, and he will see that it would be the easiest thing in the world to put a highway bridge between them, and I am sure the province of Quebec would be pleased to contribute her share of the necessary expenditure, and I do not know if Ontario would not be willing to do its share. As the hon. gentleman from Frontenac well knows, these bridges are close to the borders of Ontario, and the people of eastern Ontario cannot reach Montreal by highway, except by passing over the bridges when they are erected. Therefore I think they are very much interested in the matter. If the minister wants something done in the matter, he will have to make up his mind to take the lead, because if he leaves this matter in the hands of the provinces, it will remain as it has remained for a long time.

Mr. ROGERS: I quite appreciate the importance of the construction of certain bridges, and of course in regard to important work of this kind, it is necessary for Parliament to take the lead; and I, as one member of this House, would be glad to urge upon the Minister of Railways and Canals, who has a Bill before Parliament for such works as these, to press that Bill to a conclusion. I am sure he will have the unanimous support of members on the other side of the House, and I am satisfied that the Upper Chamber will approve of the Bill when submitted to them, and the Government will be able to carry out their programme, notwithstanding the financial condition of to-day. If the project is carried out, the service will be of great value to both provinces.

Edmonton—repairs to bridge, $3,500.

Mr. OLIVER: I wish to support the Minister of Public Works in his remarks in regard to the advisability of providing highway facilities in connection with the railroad bridge now being built across the Peace river. The bridge is one of the largest in Canada. I think the railroad bridge will be in the neighborhood of sixteen or seventeen hundred feet in length. The river has a normal depth, in low water, of sixteen feet, and in high water between fifteen and twenty feet higher. It is a mountain stream, and carries great quantities of driftwood in high water. Besides the ice, when broken by the rising water is still thick. Thus the conditions demand a strong bridge at that point. The railway company is building a bridge, and this is a most opportune time to secure permanent traffic facilities by some arrangement with the railway company, because the foundations, if strong enough to withstand the conditions I have indicated, are easily able to carry the additional weight of a highway. But of course the railway company cannot be expected to supply those highway facilities. The railroad which has been built from Edmonton to Peace river, 310 miles, has been built entirely on the guarantees and loans of the provincial government. So that as the Dominion Government owns all the natural resources of the country which are now in the process of development, and as the development will necessarily be helped by affording facilities for settlers to cross this great stream, I think that the Government would be well advised to take into favourable consideration such application as may be made for substantial assistance towards making this a traffic bridge as well as a railroad bridge.

For half cost of reconstruction of telegraph lines jointly owned by the Anglo-American Telegraph Company and the Dominion Government, $17,000.

Mr. MURPHY: What are the relations between the Government and the telegraph company, in relation to this line?

Mr. ROGERS: The Government subsidized the company.

Mr. MURPHY: Is it an American company?

Mr. ROGERS: It is called the Anglo-American, but it is an English company.

[Mr. Rogers.]

Mr. MURPHY: Where are its headquarters?

Mr. ROGERS: London, England.

Mr. MURPHY: How much of the line has been constructed?

Mr. ROGERS: I was going to proceed with this particular line this year, as soon as we got the money.

Mr. MURPHY: No work has been done.

Mr. ROGERS: Not particularly.

Mr. MURPHY: Where is it to extend?

Mr. ROGERS: Along the Prince Edward Island railway.

Mr. MURPHY: Is there no telegraph system there now?

Mr. ROGERS: Our own line there practically requires to be rebuilt. Originally the Government built it in conjunction with the Anglo-American Telegraph Company, the cost being about $35,000.

Mr. MURPHY: Is it not usual to have these telegraph lines form part of the railway system? If this telegraph line follows the route of the Prince Edward Island railway, why is this amount separated from the railway vote?

Mr. ROGERS: The only explanation I can give is that it was started this way many years ago, and the system has never been changed.

Telegraph and telephone lines, Saskatchewan and Alberta—Peace River line, office and dwelling at Dunvegan, $3,325.

Mr. OLIVER: Is it intended that the amounts voted this year for the Wood Mountain telegraph line and the other two on the Peace river shall be expended?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, there is pressing need for these.

Mr. OLIVER: Is it intended to make the expenditure in all three cases?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: Where has the department decided to place the new office building at Dunvegan? Is it on the bank of the river, or is it on the upland?

Mr. ROGERS: I have not the information here.

Mr. OLIVER: There is a Dunvegan telegraph office on the upland, above the river. The valley is from 800 to 1,000 feet deep, and that office is of no serious value to the river navigation.

Steamers passing up and down the river cannot reach a telegraph office that is a thousand feet above the valley and back from the river a couple of miles. On the other hand, the settlement is on the upland, and an office in the valley is of very little advantage to the settlers of that community. The location of the present office building is not convenient for the settlers, because it was built with regard to a speculative townsite that was laid out there.

Mr. ROGERS: The deputy informs me that the lot which has been purchased is on the upland, not in the valley.

Mr. OLIVER: In view of the fact that the railroad now touches the river at Peace River town, and that there is considerable steamboat navigation up and down the river, as there was not before, there should be telegraph accommodation at the river crossing. The wire crosses there going from Dunvegan to Spirit river and Grande-Prairie, and I would suggest that there be an office in the river valley near the ferry crossing, where the Hudson Bay store is situated and where there is a stopping place. I would suggest also that a commission office be located at some point on the plateau where the wire passes through the settlement. An office so situated would be convenient for the use of the settlers. No one office can answer the convenience of both the river traffic and the settlers of the district.

Mr. ROGERS: How far would the offices be apart?

Mr. OLIVER: The Waterhole post office is about nine miles from Dunvegan. At that place there are a couple of stores, a stopping place and an agricultural hall. The agricultural fair of the district is held there. It is hardly what you would call a village, but there is a centering of business at that point, and a commission telegraph office would be a great convenience. It may be the intention of the department to put their permanent Government office in that settlement; that, of course, would be entirely satisfactory to the settlers, but it would not take care of the requirements of the river navigation.

Mr. ROGERS: It is evident from my hon. friend's description of the conditions there that we should have an office at both places.

Mr. OLIVER: Yes. I suggest that there be a permanent office in one place and a commission office in the other. Is the minister going on with the building at Grande-Prairie?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: I wish to call the attention of the minister to the desirability of extending the Lac la Biche telegraph branch to Lac la Biche railway station. At present the Lac la Biche telegraph branch leaves the line at the town of Athabaska. It runs to the station at Plamondonville, where there is an office run on a salary basis.

Then from Plamondonville to the Roman Catholic mission on the bank of Lac la Biche, there is, I believe, a telephone connection. Lac la Biche mission is about six or eight miles from Lac la Biche railway station, and you have the peculiar situation that you have a telegraph line which ends within a few miles of the business centre of the district, which is, therefore, at a great disadvantage in transacting business. I have urged on the minister that the line be extended from Plamondonville through the Roman Catholic mission to Lac la Biche station. The extra line that would have to be built would be about eight miles long. It would give Lac la Biche station the advantage of direct telegraphic communication with the city of Edmonton and with the world, and would give the Government telegraph line business that it does not get now.

British Columbia mainland telegraph and telephone lines—General repairs and improvements, $22,400.

Mr. MURPHY: What is the increase of $8,400 due to? The amount asked for last year was only $14,000.

Mr. ROGERS: These are new lines. They have nothing to do with the appropriation of $14,000 of last year at all.

Mr. MURPHY: This is new work?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes. It is largely rebuilding the lines. The old rotten poles have fallen down, and we have to rebuild the line.

Architectural branch—Salaries of architects, clerks of works, inspectors, draughtsmen, clerks and messengers of outside service, $60,000.

Mr. MURPHY: Are the different classes of employees covered by this item located at Ottawa or outside of Ottawa?

Mr. ROGERS: Some are in Ottawa and some are outside of Ottawa.

Mr. MURPHY: What does the item cover?

Mr. ROGERS: It provides for the salaries of our staff of the Outside Service.

Mr. MURPHY: Are these architects employed outside the city of Ottawa, and are they employed by the year to do certain work?

Mr. ROGERS: They are on the regular staff and are employed by the year. This appropriation is asked to make provision for salaries of architects, clerks of work, inspectors, draughtsmen, clerks, messengers, etc., of the Outside Service, in connection with repairs, renewals, improvements, etc., which have to be undertaken from time to time on the public buildings in the different provinces of the Dominion, in order that larger percentages than heretofore of the general appropriations made by Parliament for such work may remain available for use on the works proper, as they are increasing rapidly in number and extent from year to year in all the provinces. These employees are at Charlottetown, Halifax, St. John, Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto, Winnipeg, Regina, Edmonton, Calgary, Victoria and Vancouver.

Mr. MURPHY: This item is intended to be supplementary to the appropriation for specific work. There is a certain appropriation for a certain public work, and this item covers the salaries of the architects and others who may be engaged in connection with such work?

Mr. ROGERS: This represents the staff employed in carrying out the different work in each province.

Mr. MURPHY: This is only an estimate.

Mr. ROGERS: No. There are specific salaries for specific individuals.

Mr. MURPHY: Who is employed at Charlottetown?

Mr. ROGERS: Mr. J. J. McDuff.

Mr. MURPHY: Is he an architect?

Mr. ROGERS: He is clerk of works. He has a salary of $1,000 a year. We have Mr. Thomas A. Hastings at Toronto who looks after public buildings throughout Ontario. His salary is included in this appropriation.

Mr. MURPHY: What is his salary?

Mr. ROGERS: $2,100. Mr. H. E. Hamilton is a stenographer in Mr. Hastings' office.

Mr. MURPHY: Mr. Hastings is not an architect?

[Mr. Murphy.]

Mr. ROGERS: No, he is inspector of public buildings throughout Ontario.

Mr. MURPHY: Has the minister some architects permanently employed at Toronto? If so, who are they and what are their salaries?

Mr. ROGERS: We have no permanent architect there. We have an architect there at present looking after important work that is being carried on. I refer to Mr. Wright in the department here. He does not appear in this list because he is on the staff at Ottawa.

Mr. MURPHY: What work is Mr. Wright looking after?

Mr. ROGERS: The postal station that is being constructed at the station at Toronto. We have a share in that work, and we keep our own architect there looking after our interests. Mr. Wright, one of our best men, has been selected for that very important work.

Mr. MURPHY: This is an estimate really to provide for salaries for these different classes of employees in connection with work that may be undertaken outside?

Mr. ROGERS: No, this is in connection with work that is already being carried on. Mr. Hastings is our permanent officer at Toronto. He inspects all public buildings in Ontario to see that they are kept clean and in proper repair, and if any trouble arises, or if there is any demand for repairs on any public building in any part of Ontario, the department asks for a report from Mr. Hastings and he visits the place and makes a report.

5 p.m.

Mr. MURPHY: What about the draughtsmen?

Mr. ROGERS: We have none at Toronto. There is one in British Columbia and one in Quebec.

Mr. NESBITT: Does the minister have messengers in the outside service?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, at some places. We have one at Montreal.

Mr. NESBITT: For whom does he work?

Mr. ROGERS: For the clerk of works, the superintendent of buildings, and so on.

Engineering branch salaries, $435,000.

Mr. MARCIL: May I ask the minister if the Government keeps the same staff of engineers when no work is being done as when the work is going on?

Mr. ROGERS: Over 30 of our engineers have gone to the front.

Mr. MARCIL: How many have not gone, and are still drawing pay?

Mr. ROGERS: We have 270, when they are all there.

Mr. MARCIL: Practically no work has been done in my district for three years. I do not know if every other district in the country is the same. This would permit of a reduction of at least 50 per cent in the engineering staff, but, as far as I can judge, the same staff is still engaged, and paid.

Mr. ROGERS: Almost every staff has been decreased recently.

Mr. MARCIL: But the amount mentioned here is the same as for 1916-17. I would recommend that the minister have a review of the condition of affairs in the Quebec district, and see the amount of money which is being wasted. Take, for instance, my own constituency; I think I am safe in saying that for every dollar spent repairing a wharf there, about $20 have been in salaries of engineers, inspectors and so on.

Mr. ROGERS: I should be very glad to check it over. We are trying to practise economy just now.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has the minister appointed special inspectors for the West lately—for instance, Mr. Brydon Jack, and Mr. Gerry?

Mr. ROGERS: Mr. Brydon Jack is superintending engineer for the three provinces.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is his salary?

Mr. ROGERS: It is not very large. I am not sure of the exact figures. Somewhere between $2,000 and $3,000 I think.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has Mr. Brydon Jack been recommended by the commission? Was he appointed under the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. ROGERS: No.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And Mr. Gerry?

Mr. ROGERS: We have no Mr. Gerry.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has not the minister appointed a superintendent of plumbing and heating in the West?

Mr. ROGERS: He is not appointed for plumbing and heating.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is his appointment?

Mr. ROGERS: There is such a man in some branch of the service. I do not know what his appointment is.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am better informed than the hon. gentleman.

Mr. ROGERS: There is such a man in the employ of the Government but I do not know what position he holds.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And my hon. friend does not know what salary he gets?

Mr. ROGERS: Not exactly.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How long ago was he appointed?

Mr. ROGERS: Quite a while ago—several years ago.

Mr. MURPHY: I did not quite understand what the minister said in regard to the appointment of Mr. Brydon Jack.

Mr. ROGERS: He is superintending engineer for the three provinces.

Mr. MURPHY: Is he an engineer?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, he is a very highly qualified engineer.

Mr. MURPHY: When was he appointed?

Mr. ROGERS: Very recently.

Mr. MURPHY: How recently?

Mr. ROGERS: A month or two ago.

Mr. MURPHY: What did the minister say his salary was to be?

Mr. ROGERS: Between $2,000 and $3,000.

Mr. MURPHY: Who held the position previously?

Mr. ROGERS: We never had a superintendent in the western provinces, as we have here. This gentleman covers the three provinces. He is a very capable man and it is very desirable that we should have the benefit of his services.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How old is he?

Mr. ROGERS: About 45 years of age.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has he had much experience?

Mr. ROGERS: He has had a long experience. He was in the university out there.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Was he practising in Winnipeg?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, and he was in the university.

Mr. LEMIEUX: As a professor.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. MURPHY: Is he to devote all his time to his new position?

Mr. ROGERS: Absolutely.

Monument to His late Majesty King Edward VII, $10,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has it been decided where this monument will be erected?

Mr. ROGERS: The most favourable location is the corner of the East Block overlooking Connaught Place.

Mr. LEMIEUX: May I ask if my hon. friend has recently received a request for a contribution towards the erection of the Hébert monument in Quebec? Hébert was the first settler, and a monument is to be erected in his honour in September. I understand the committee has made a request for a contribution, and I would like to know if any action has been taken.

Mr. ROGERS: I have no recollection of the matter being brought to my attention.

Mr. MURPHY: Will the minister inform the committee whether this monument to His late Majesty has been completed, and who the artist is?

Mr. ROGERS: The order was given to a man named Alward, but he work has not yet been completed.

Mr. MURPHY: What stage is it in?

Mr. ROGERS: I believe he has not made much headway. We have not been hurrying him.

Mr. MURPHY: There has been some expenditure, has there not?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Did the department follow the usual custom in the way of having a competition before the order was given?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, there was a competition, and the trustees of the National Gallery were appointed judges.

Mr. MARCIL: Do I understand that this monument is to be placed on the brow of the hill on Wellington street, and is that the only place that could be found for it? It seems to me the place there is very small.

Mr. ROGERS: That was selected as the most favourable location.

Mr. MARCIL: Why should it not be put on the main Parliament grounds, in front of the main Parliament Buildings? This is a monument to one of the greatest sovereigns that England has ever had, and I think it should not be relegated to one of the smaller buildings. Why should it not be put opposite the main building, or on the Senate side?

Mr. ROGERS: I am sure that was considered. Of course, in the placing of a monument one must have regard to the particular design. A design that would be suitable on the corner of the East Block overlooking Wellington street or overlooking Connaught Place might not be suitable up on the main Parliament grounds.

Mr. MARCIL: Seeing that the monument to Queen Victoria stands to the West, I should think the question of placing this monument to the East might have been considered, or some one consulted about it. I am sorry to say the opinion of artists I have spoken to is that the distribution of those monuments around the Parliament grounds has not been altogether in the very best taste; some of them show to advantage, and some do not show at all. I should think the most prominent place would be selected for a monument to a sovereign.

Mr. ROGERS: A location in the east end might be all right, but we already have two monuments there, one to Sir John A. Macdonald and one to Baldwin and Lafontaine. I presume those who have charge of the location of the monument have considered all the circumstances before deciding definitely. The position decided on was selected as being the most suitable one.

Mr. OLIVER: It seems to me that the location of the Baldwin-Lafontaine statue was anything but fortunate, having regard to the appearance of the grounds or the merit of the work. I give that opinion to the minister and he can use it or not as he pleases. I certainly think that the statue in that position does not add to the attractiveness of the grounds.

Mr. ROGERS: Where would you suggest as a location for it?

Mr. OLIVER: I would say in any other place than where it is.

Mr. McKENZIE: As to the location of the monument of his late Majesty, we have a monument of one distinguished sovereign already, and I think the place where the minister will locate the second ought to be correspondingly prominent, if possible. The monument to her late Majesty Queen Victoria is in a very good place, and that to the next sovereign for whom we shall erect a monument should be equally prominent, if possible. I would protest against putting it in any secluded place.

Mr. ROGERS: I am advised that those who claim to have knowledge of such matters look upon the site at the corner of the East block as being by far the most suitable, desirable and prominent, and second only to the location of the monument of Queen Victoria.

Mr. MARCIL: I do not want to insist on this matter, but take the case of a stranger coming to Ottawa and visiting the Parliament buildings. He naturally visits the central building first, and what will attract his attention chiefly will be that which will be within the range of his vision as he approaches that building. On the one side you have Queen Victoria and on the other Edward VII. But if you have Queen Victoria on the one side and the visitor has to go around a departmental building to discover the monument of King Edward VII, he will naturally conclude that King Edward VII occupied, in our estimation, an inferior position.

Mr. ROGERS: I am afraid I cannot agree with my hon. friend. The first thing that he will do will be to visit the Chateau and when he gets filled up and feeling comfortable he will start out to make an inspection of the Hill, and the first thing he will meet will be the monument to King Edward VII. It is looked upon as a very desirable location.

Construction and operation of water storage dams on the Ottawa river and tributaries, surveys in connection therewith, and settlement of land damages, $115,000.

Mr. ROGERS: This amount of $115,000 is required for the construction and operation of dams and sluiceways at points on the Ottawa river and its tributaries. The object is to store spring floods and augment the low waterflow thus equalizing the run-off of the Ottawa valley throughout the year. This also necessitates the purchase of lands damaged by maintaining reservoir surfaces at high stage during summer and autumn.

Mr. MURPHY: Where is the work located?

Mr. ROGERS: Timiskaming.

Mr. MURPHY: What staff is employed?

Mr. ROGERS: Our regular staff in Ottawa carry on the work.

Mr. MURPHY: A special staff?

Mr. ROGERS: Some are special, but it is the Ottawa staff.

Mr. MURPHY: Who is the head of the staff here?

Mr. ROGERS: Mr. Coutlee.

Dry docks generally—inspection, etc., $10,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is that in virtue of the statute?

Mr. ROGERS: This is for inspection, etc., on our work at Quebec.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What progress is being made with the new Quebec dry dock?

Mr. ROGERS: We are at work on the outer chamber and we expect it will be finished this fall.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Who is the contractor for the stone?

Mr. ROGERS: That is a subcontract with the Davis company; we nave nothing to do with it.

River gaugings and metering, $20,000.

Mr. MURPHY: What is that?

Mr. ROGERS: This amount of $20,000 is to provide for the collection and investigation of data as to the fluctuations of various rivers, and to pay salaries of gauge readers at various points; to purchase recording apparatus; to meet travelling expenses, etc. The work is necessary in order to collect data as to the fluctuations of various rivers so that information regarding all rivers will eventually be on record.

Mr. MARCIL: Who declares a river navigable or floatable? The question was put to me by a constituent who wanted to know whether the Matapedia river, running into the Restigouche, was a navigable or floatable river? I could not answer the question. He seemed to think that it rested with the federal authorities.

Mr. ROGERS: It is very largely a legal question. A difference of opinion arises very often as to whether a river is a navigable river or not. Sometimes one court decides in one way and another court decides in another way. Cases have been taken to the Privy Council for final decision. It would be very difficult to give my hon. friend any specific information.

Mr. MARCIL: Is there a list in the department of the rivers that have been declared to be navigable or floatable?

Mr. ROGERS: We have no such list, but we have a general and accepted knowledge of the navigable rivers in Canada by reason of our dealings with these rivers in connection with plans for the construction of bridges over them and that sort of thing.

Mr. MARCIL: If I should ask the minister to have a list prepared of the rivers declared to be navigable and floatable in the province of Quebec, could he oblige me with it so that I would be able to see whether the Matapedia has been included or not? I know it is a floatable river for lumber, but the question is as to whether it is navigable.

Mr. ROGERS: I am not quite clear that it would be possible to give my hon. friend any very correct list, because we have not in the department a list of that sort. We have a general knowledge of the rivers that are navigable and those that are not. If there is any particular river about which my hon. friend would like information, he can have anything we have in the department.

Mr. MARCIL: I would be satisfied if the minister would give anything he has in connection with the Matapedia river.

Mr. ROGERS: We shall be glad to get that.

Miscellaneous—National Gallery of Canada, $8,000.

Mr. ROGERS: This is simply to pay the salaries of the staff.

Mr. MURPHY: Do the purchases for the National Gallery include those works of art in which the former Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) appears, some of which are upstairs now?

Mr. ROGERS: No, they do not belong to the National Gallery.

Mr. MURPHY: Nor the lithographs?

Mr. ROGERS: No, they are not included in the Art Gallery, and that is the only thing I am responsible for.

Mr. OLIVER: Where is the National Gallery?

Mr. ROGERS: We have loaned many of our pictures to different art associations throughout Canada, largely for educative purposes. We hope in the near future to be able to provide a proper gallery.

Mr. MARCIL: Have any steps been taken to secure paintings commemorating the heroic deeds of Canadian soldiers in this war?

Mr. ROGERS: I know that that has been discussed, but that will come under the Militia Department. No action has been taken, so far as the Art Gallery is concerned.

[Mr. Rogers.]

Mr. PROULX: Where are "The Chords of Love" hanging now? Have they been loaned to anybody?

Mr. ROGERS: I do not know, have you missed them?

Mr. OLIVER: Has any arrangement been made in the conduct of the National Art Gallery for the punishment of the perpetrators of some of the atrocities that are up there now?

Mr. ROGERS: I am afraid that I shall have to consult Sir Byron Walker and Senator Boyer and those who have it in charge.

Mr. OLIVER: Surely the minister will not disclaim the doctrine of ministerial responsibility?

Mr. ROGERS: No, but I am unable at the moment to answer the hon. gentleman's question without consulting those responsible?

Mr. OLIVER: I hope he will consult them and be able to give an answer at a later date.

Mr. NESBITT: May I suggest to the minister that on Hallowe'en he lend those wooden things to the boys?

Mr. MURPHY: The totem poles?

Surveys and inspections, $130,000.

Mr. MURPHY: Are there any surveys in progress?

Mr. ROGERS: When we receive an application for any work we have to send some one out to make an inspection.

Mr. MURPHY: Is not this work of a permanent character?

Mr. ROGERS: This $130,000 is required for defraying the expenses of surveys and inspections to be made during the year 1917-18 in connection with harbour, river, slide, boom, and bridge works and other works under the Public Works Department. The expenditures last year were: Maritime Provinces, $17,000; Quebec, $17,000; Ontario, $13,000; Manitoba, $2,000; Saskatchewan, $2,000; British Columbia, $5,000; geodetic levelling, $2,605; miscellaneous, $2,000. I have given the amounts in round numbers, but $63,000 was spent.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I do not know how the minister can justify an expenditure of this kind, because he said last night that he did not intend to undertake any new work in connection with harbour and river improvements. And it would only be a foolish waste of money, unless we took in every work of the Government in Canada. I hope the hon. minister will not spend the money in that way. If he does not project any new works on harbours and rivers in Canada during the coming fiscal year, we should not have a vote for such a large amount for making surveys. If it is not intended that anything should be done in regard to these surveys, the vote is not necessary.

Mr. ROGERS: The hon. gentleman is quite correct. This item is necessary to provide salaries for those employed making the survey, and carrying out the work I have just quoted to my hon. friend, in connection with harbours and rivers, slides, improvements, etc., under the control of the Public Works Department. The hon. gentleman is aware that we have a great many improvements to make and a great many repairs in all the provinces of Canada. This item covers all the provinces of the Dominion, and it is, therefore, not a very large item in view of the necessary work to be carried out.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I always understood that the minister took the cost of the survey out of each particular vote, where there was a vote, and this apparently is a general item for cases where there is no vote, and it must refer therefore, to new work. Because in any case where the minister has any improvements to make, and there is a vote in the estimate, he will charge the cost of the survey to that particular vote.

Mr. ROGERS: My hon. friend is rather in error. We do not take the cost of work of this kind out of the amount voted for the different works. For instance, an application is made for the building of a wharf at some point, or repairs to a wharf; the first thing we have to do is to send our men to make a survey for that work. That has been the practice for years. In 1910-11, $114,000 was spent on this work, and in 1911-12, $103,000, and in 1912-13 the amount was $138,000, and it ran up the following year to $157,000. Year before last it dropped to $117,000, and last year it was $63,000. My hon. friend will surely give me credit for economizing when I tell him the item has dropped to about half the former estimate.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Will the hon. gentleman reduce it more this year?

Mr. ROGERS: We will reduce it all we can.

Monument to memory of the late Hon. Thos. D'Arcy McGee, $8,000.

Mr. MARCIL: This item has been in the estimates for ten years, more or less.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It will be there for many years. This is not the proper time for it.

Mr. ROGERS: This monument has been lost. It was sent over to Belgium to be cast, and was destroyed by the Germans.

Mr. MARCIL: The model is lost?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I understood it was under cover behind the library.

Mr. ROGERS: That is the pedestal.

Mr. MARCIL: Can another model be made? It would not do for the Irish people to labour under a grievance. They have laboured under many grievances.

Mr. ROGERS: They never had a grievance.

Mr. MARCIL: I think it would be unfair to have one of the Fathers of Confederation set aside. There should be a means of getting another model.

Mr. ROGERS: No danger of an Irishman like me overlooking it.

Mr. MARCIL: Will anything be done this year?

Mr. ROGERS: I have not taken it up.

Mr. MARCIL: There is an Irish convention on the other side of the ocean to settle all their troubles, and this would be an appropriate year to settle this matter.

Mr. ROGERS: We have not any troubles in Canada.

Mr. MURPHY: Will the hon. minister state the particulars of the loss of the monument?

Mr. ROGERS: The sculptor made his model. These models are sent occasionally to a country where the best casting is done. This model was sent to Belgium, and, unfortunately, it was overtaken by the Germans and destroyed.

Mr. MURPHY: The model?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, this model.

Mr. MURPHY: Is the artist at work on a new one, or has the matter been left in abeyance?

Mr. ROGERS: The artist was so discouraged over what happened that we have not heard from him, but we are in hopes he will revive and take up the work.

Mr. MURPHY: So that nothing has been done since the loss of the model?

Mr. ROGERS: No.

Mr. MURPHY: Was the sculptor paid for his work up to that point?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, he had an advance of $2,500.

Mr. MURPHY: Is that all?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. MARCIL: Where is the monument to be placed?

Mr. ROGERS: Right behind the library. The pedestal is already there.

Mr. MURPHY: I regret that the memory of my hon. friend from Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) is not better than it is in regard to the fixing of the site for this monument. The site was originally selected by the present leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) when he was Prime Minister, and by the then Minister of Public Works, the member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley). The monument was to be erected in the centre of the Plaza, or Connaught Place, but when the present Government came into power one of the little agitations started, which, when assiduously cultivated, sometimes spread, and when properly directed, sometimes have an effect. This agitation was started, and the site of the monument was changed from the position selected originally to an insignificant site in the rear of the Parliament buildings, and my hon. friend from Bonaventure will find an illuminating discussion on the subject which took place in the House, which was participated in by two gentlemen who have since gone to their reward. They have been promoted upwards. That is the explanation regarding the site.

Mr. ROGERS: I am afraid the hon. member is rather in error. I do not think any site was selected by the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition to-day, and the member for St. John who was then Minister of Public Works. I do not think there was any definite decision about it.

Mr. MURPHY: Oh, yes.

Mr. ROGERS: They might have looked at different sites but no site was selected, and if they had selected a site on Connaught Place, I would not hesitate to say that I would be very glad to change it, because I would not want to belittle the memory of D'Arcy McGee by putting his monument in such a place. The proposed site is one of the most beautiful that could be secured.

Mr. MURPHY: The hon. gentleman is mistaken. The site was selected. I could show the hon. member the discussion in Hansard, when an effort was made in the House, by some of his friends to induce the leader of the Opposition and the Minister of Public Works to change their decision with regard to the site. They refused to change the site, and that site was selected. That is where the monument would have been placed if the Liberals had remained in office. Since the Liberals went out a couple of agitators, one of whom has since been rewarded by a position in the public service, advocated a change in the site, and women's societies and historical societies used their influence and got the hon. gentleman's friends to change the site.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Hysterical societies.

Mr. MURPHY: It was prior to the time the hon. gentleman (Mr. Rogers) became Minister of Public Works.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The days are going by. We will have an election soon, and the Liberals will be back in office in a few months; Sir Wilfrid Laurier will be Prime Minister and he will unveil the monument to Thomas D'Arcy McGee.

Georgian Bay Ship Canal Royal Commission, $25,000.

Mr. NESBITT: What is the total expenditure to date?

Mr. ROGERS: About $40,000 altogether.

Mr. NESBITT: Is it not more than that? An item has been in the estimates in respect to this matter for years past.

Mr. ROGERS: We have spent only the amount of money that I have named.

Mr. NESBITT: You got $25,000 last year.

Mr. ROGERS: That was not all spent.

Mr. NESBITT: Your estimates are misleading; they have been misleading in several of the items.

Mr. ROGERS: The hon. gentleman is probably confusing the work of the Georgian Bay canal with that of the commission. Recently there has been no work except that done by the commission.

Mr. NESBITT: Is it not time that this item was struck out? In a time of war, the voting of $25,000 for such a purpose as this is simply wasting public money.

Mr. ROGERS: I would not like to say that it is a waste of money, because if my hon. friend will go to the office of Mr. Sanford Evans and make an examination of all the data that he has collected, he will agree that the money has been well expended and that full value has been received. I agree that we should not go on further with this work. We have already given notice to Mr. Evans and those connected with him that we will close up the office very shortly —temporarily, at all events, until the war is over. No further expenditure will be made.

Mr. MURPHY: I must express my admiration for the Minister. He says that he is going to give notice that this office will very shortly be closed. That must mean, then, that the Government have found another position for Mr. Sanford Evans, because this Commission was created to give him a job. The people of the Ottawa valley and those interested in the matter understand quite well, without any inspiration from the Government or any intimation from me, that this Commission was appointed for the purpose of killing the Georgian Bay canal project, and that that project, so far as the Government is concerned, is as extinct as the dodo and has been so for the last three or four years. Why Mr. Evans and the rest of his staff are kept at work, unless it be to provide them with jobs, nobody can understand; I am sure that nobody can justify it. The Minister said to the member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) that if a gentleman interested in the matter were to call at the office of the commission he would see that a great deal of data has been collected. It is true that much data has been collected, but no public benefit has resulted from its collection. The minister may think that he is getting away with this thing, but he is not deceiving anybody; everybody knows the purpose of this Commission; everybody knows that Mr. Evans and his staff do nothing but draw their salaries. They are not rendering any public service; their business was to kill the Georgian Bay canal project, and this they have accomplished, so far as the Government is concerned. Why continue this expenditure any longer? Surely my hon. friend is mistaken when he says that the total expenditure has been only $40,000.

Mr. ROGERS: That is what my deputy informs me.

Mr. MURPHY: This item has been in the estimates for several years. The commission has had a fairly large staff, and it is surprising to hear that only $40,000 has been expended. However, if the minister says that on inquiry he finds that that has been the total expenditure, I have no criticism to offer. I do submit, however, that this office ought to be closed at once. The gentlemen composing the commission cannot possibly be rendering any service for which the country should be called upon to pay. Everybody knows that the published documents emanating from the commission, and various addresses given by Mr. Evans at different times and in various parts of the country when he had nothing else to do, show that there is no further work to be done. I do urge upon the minister that he close up the office without delay and allow these gentlemen to seek other outlets for their energies.

Mr. NESBITT: If the minister is going to close this office shortly, why the necessity for this item of $25,000?

Mr. ROGERS: The fiscal year is fairly well advanced; this item covers part of the year that we are now in. These estimates were made up last October. The office is practically closed now. Sanford Evans is now drawing a salary as a member of this commission.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has he not been appointed to another commission?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, he has been doing some work on another commission; therefore he is not drawing a salary as a member of this commission. We told him that we were going to close the office, and the office is being closed. I am sure that my hon. friend (Mr. Murphy) does not desire to do Mr. Evans any injustice. When in 1914 we were pressed for the construction of the Georgian Bay canal, many people regarded the project as a very desirable national undertaking—and I believe that it is. Perhaps it was more desirable then than it is now, on account of financial conditions. We made an honest effort to secure men who would be able to get the most reliable information as to the practicability of undertaking this work. My hon. friend will agree that that was a sound principle upon which to start. Mr. Sanford Evans was selected as the man capable of doing that work. Any member of the House who will visit his office and examine his work will agree with me that the right man was selected for that position.

Now that conditions have changed and it is impossible to consider the idea of undertaking such national work at this particular time, we are closing up the office; but we are preserving the information we have, because Mr. Evans is a strong believer in the possibilities and advantages of the Georgian Bay canal.

Mr. LEMIEUX: But the Government is not.

Mr. ROGERS: The Government is strong believer in the advantages of that project, but this is not a desirable time for the Government to undertake work of this kind, and I am sure my hon. friend, no matter how favourable he might be to it, would not recommend our doing so. I am glad the committee agree with me that we are taking the right course in cutting off expenditure in the meantime. The information will be preserved until the day arrives when this great national undertaking shall be carried out to completion.

Mr. NESBITT: Is the minister going to drop the item?

Mr. ROGERS: A certain amount will be required to pay the incidentals in connection with closing up the work.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I would move that the item be reduced by $10,000.

Mr. ROGERS: I do not know what amount will be required, but if my hon. friend wants the item to stand, we will have a statement made of the amount we require.

To pay Western Dry Dock and Shipbuilding Co., Ltd., of Port Arthur, a portion of the fourth payment of subsidy due them upon their completion of the work covered by the agreement ratified by Chap. 57, 3-4 George V, 1913, notwithstanding that the work is not completed, $35,641.50.

Mr. MURPHY: The wording of this item shows that it is contrary to the provisions of the statute.

Mr. ROGERS: There are three buildings that the company did not erect in accordance with the original agreement, but the cost of those buildings has been deducted, and the company are being paid a subsidy only upon the work they have already done.

Mr. MURPHY: Why is the item inserted in this way?

Mr. ROGERS: I do not know of any other way in which it could be inserted.

Progress reported.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Rogers the House adjourned at 6 p.m.

Monday, July 30, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

COUNCIL FOR THE INDIAN TRIBES OF CANADA.

Mr. PORTER moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 119, to incorporate a Council for the Indian Tribes of Canada.

Mr. GRAHAM: Explain.

Mr. PORTER: Mr. Speaker, the object of the Bill is to incorporate a friendly society of the various tribes of Indians. A petition has been very largely signed by members of the bands throughout the different provinces asking for incorporation. The objects are numerous, but the principal ones are to promote education and morality and to facilitate the operation of their lands and the investment of their funds.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

WIDENING OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND RAILWAY.

STEAMERS BETWEEN ISLAND AND MAINLAND.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. J. HUGHES (Kings, P.E.I.): I would like to ask the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane) if the Government have come to a final determination in regard to the widening of the gauge of the Prince Edward Island railway, and, if so, what it is? I would like also to ask a question in regard to the running of the steamers between Pictou and Charlottetown and between Summerside and Point du Chêne for the balance of the year after the car ferry is put in operation. I would like to know whether they have come to a final determination in regard to that matter, and, if so, what it is?

Hon. FRANK COCHRANE (Minister of Railways): The Government has decided not to standardize the Prince Edward Island railway this year. In the first place, it will take a considerable time to make that change. The rails will have to be shifted over, the bridges will have to be widened, the road will have to be straightened and the rolling stock will have to be widened or newly built. Therefore, it is not desirable that we should go on with the work this year. Besides, the war is taking all the finances the Government has. In reference to the other question, it is not decided, but the Government will endeavour to keep on all the boats that there is business for.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: That there is business for?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: There is no doubt about that.

Mr. COCHRANE: Well, I do not know, and I do not think that the hon. gentleman knows either.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: I do.

Mr. COCHRANE: I hope the hon. gentleman is right. We will keep on all the steamers that are necessary.

FORBIDDEN CIRCULATION IN CANADA.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. FRANK OLIVER: Is the Government prepared to make a statement to-day in regard to the suppression of "The Fiddlers"?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am afraid I will have to ask my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) to allow me to report progress and ask leave to rise again to-morrow. There is no information that I have at the present time.

Mr. OLIVER: I will have to give notice that if I am not to get an answer to my question within a reasonable time I will have to ask leave to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing this matter which is one of urgent public importance.

THE TORONTO, HAMILTON AND BUFFALO RAILWAY.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT moved the third reading of Bill No. 39 respecting the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway Company—Mr. T. J. Stewart.

Motion agreed to.

On the motion of Mr. W. H. Bennett that the Bill do now pass and that the title be as on the Order Paper:

Mr. NESBITT: There was some trouble about that Bill. Did they get it arranged?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The promoter of this Bill (Mr. T. J. Stewart) is not here and I do not wish to take any responsibility about it. Still, it has been pretty well discussed. I did not happen to be here when the third reading was proposed.

Mr. SPEAKER: If no hon. gentleman seconds the motion the Bill will stand.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I will second it.

Motion agreed to.

BOARDS OF TRADE ACT AMENDMENT.

Bill No. 65, to amend the Boards of Trade Act, Sir George Foster, considered in committee, and read the third time.

SCIENTIFIC AND INDUSTRIAL RESEARCH.

HONORARY ADVISORY COUNCIL INCORPORATION.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER moved the second reading of Bill No. 83, relating to the Honorary Advisory Council for Scientific and Industrial Research.

He said: The outbreak of the war brought very forcibly home to the attention of most great countries of the world, particularly those on the Allied side of the contest, the march in advance that Germany had made in industrial and economic matters, which had made her the happy possessor of the basic raw materials in a great many of the different quarters of the globe, and had also transferred to her, in the process of years, practical monopolies in many of the key industries and basic industries of the world. So it happened that, after the war broke out, Great Britain especially found herself deprived of many processes which had been initiated, so to speak, in Great Britain itself by way of invention and primary development, but which had afterwards been gradually taken over by the German people and, under their peculiar and thorough methods, had come to be, as I have said, virtual monopolies; that is, Germany practically controlled the supply of the world and became the purveyor of these much needed and very valuable processes to the rest of the world. These matters were brought practically to the attention of the different Governments, and from that time France, Great Britain, Italy, the United States of America, Australia and Canada to a certain extent, have been practically alive to the situation and have been developing measures by which in the future they shall not be dependent for those basic materials and basic processes upon alien or foreign countries. The British Government took the matter up and appointed, in July, 1915, a committee of the Privy Council, consisting of six official and three unofficial members, who should have, in general, charge of the encouragement and promotion of scientific and industrial research. This committee of the Privy Council appointed a Council on Scientific and Industrial Research, advisory to the committee of the Privy Council. Sir William McCormick presides over this council, and associated with him are seven other members, eminent practical scientists of Great Britain. That Advisory Council undertook to make certain examinations, to find out certain information, and to make practically available, so far as it was able to do so, the agencies and facilities for scientific and industrial research which already existed in Great Britain, and, to co-ordinate as far as possible, the efforts of these dislocated and independent agencies for research, and, in general, to stimulate the desire for and promote the development of industrial and scientific research. The committee of the Privy Council were responsible to the Treasury Board for any moneys which would be placed at their disposal, and they rely upon the Advisory Council for examination, information, advice and counsel. Within a late period, at the end of last year, I think, or near the end of last year, after the Advisory Council had been at work for nearly a year, and had made their preliminary survey, the British Government granted a charter to the subcommittee of the Council, forming it into an Imperial trust, and they have placed at the disposal of that subcommittee of the Privy Council about a million pounds sterling for the various purposes which they had in view. This Imperial Trust is also allowed to take bequests that may be made from any quarter whatsoever, and to manage the funds made up of appropriations by the Government and of bequests from individuals or corporations. This scheme was at first entirely confined to the United Kingdom, but it soon became apparent that it might, with advantage, be extended in the scope of its work, and as a consequence communications were had with the Overseas Dominions, and the proposal was made that in such way as might be deemed best by the Overseas Dominions, co-operation in such research work should be had, and as a result of such cooperation, agencies were appointed or arranged for in the Overseas Dominions, through which there might be communication between and co-operation of effort, and the distribution of the results gained in the United Kingdom or in the Overseas Dominions. There are many cases in which research might be better undertaken by the parent society, or the committee in Great Britain, even though they particularly affected the Overseas Dominions. Other matters of research which were initiated or desired by the home society might be better carried out in Australia, in Canada, in India, in some other overseas dominion, and so the foundation would be laid for a generalization of the scope of this arrangement, and for concurrent action such as I have stated.

Since that time, Australia has appointed a committee and an advisory council, largely on the same lines, one has been established and in South Africa, and New Zealand is discussing and arranging for the appointment of an Advisory Council and a collaborating body. About a year ago the Canadian Government passed an order by which a subcommittee was appointed in Canada consisting of the Ministers of Agriculture of Labour, of Mines, of the Interior, of Trade and Commerce, and of Inland Revenue. These were appointed because each with the exception of the Department of Labour, has more or less work of that kind going on now. The Mines Department, for instance, has one of the best equipped laboratories on this continent, although not the largest by any means. The Department of the Interior has, in connection with McGill University, a laboratory at work chiefly upon woods, their tensile strength, and everything connected with them. The Committee of the Privy Council was appointed to take in and co-relate all the Government branches or departments which have some such agency at work at the present time. The Department of Labour was added as well, because labour forms a very important part in this matter, and the Minister of Labour was made a representative on that committee. Shortly after that subcommittee, following out the plan of Great Britain, appointed an Advisory Council of eleven members, consisting of three representatives of the industrial and business interests of the country, and eight scientists. Dr. Macallum of the University of Toronto, was appointed as the administrative chairman of this board. That Advisory Council was organized in December of last year, and has since been holding its meetings and going on with its work. I think it would be just as well for me to read an outline of the instructions sent by the Committee of the Privy Council to the Advisory Council. The memorandum reads:

> This Advisory Council, in a memorandum from the Chairman of the Committee of the Privy Council, has been charged with the following duties:
> (a) To ascertain and tabulate the various agencies in Canada which are now carrying on scientific and industrial research in the universities and colleges, in the various laboratories of the Government, in business organizations and industries, in scientific associations or by private or associated investigators.

> (b) To note and schedule the lines of research or investigation that are being pursued by each such agency, their facilities and equipment therefor, the possibilities of extension and expansion, and particularly to ascertain the scientific man power available for research and the necessity of adding thereto.
> (c) To co-ordinate these agencies so as to prevent overlapping of effort, to induce co-operation and team work, and to bring up a community of interest, knowledge and mutual helpfulness between each other.
> (d) To make themselves acquainted with the problems of a technical and scientific nature that are met with by our productive and industrial interests, and to bring them into contact with the proper research agencies for solving these problems, and thus link up the resources of science with the labour and capital employed in production so as to bring about the best possible economic results.

> (g) To inform and stimulate the public mind in regard to the importance and utility of applying the results of scientific and industrial research to the processes of production by means of addresses to business and industrial bodies, by the publication of bulletins and monographs, and such other methods as may seem advisable.

That sets out generally the plan and scope of the work of the Advisory Council, under the direction of the sub-committee of the Privy Council. These eleven gentlemen are all honorary members. They are men distinguished in business or in scientific and industrial research and knowledge. They give their time entirely free; their travelling and working expenses are paid. It was felt advisable that it should be the duty of one man to keep the machine in motion and to be the general director of its energies, giving all his time and effort thereto. He has been denominated the Administrative Chairman, taking exactly the same position with regard to our Advisory Council as Sir William McCormick takes on the British Advisory Council. A salary of $10,000 is paid to Dr. Macallum for this work. In this way we get the services of eleven men of distinguished attainments and of great capacity who give —I can very well attest that they have done so during the last six months—a great deal of their valuable services to the working out of the purpose set forth in these instructions. It is not the intention of the sub-committee of the Privy Council, of this arrangement, or of the Advisory Council, to duplicate work which is already going on. The intention is rather to prevent overlapping and to co-ordinate the work. The first work that they have undertaken is, in line with the instructions, to tabulate the scientific and research facilities, agencies and equipment in Canadian educational institutions, and to communicate with and to tabulate in the same way those agencies and facilities, outside of the universities, which are possessed by private corporations, public bodies, or associations for scientific purposes. On the other hand, they are to find out from the industrial and productive workers of Canada what are the peculiar problems which meet them in their work, how far they are trying to solve those problems and what aid can be given them towards that solution. They are to distribute such of these problems as it is possible to the different industrial and research agencies which are already established and which are doing work in Canada. That has been carried on in a very effective way. I think it would be interesting to the House to have a very short digest of the methods they are pursuing to get that information. That information is very widely disseminated; it has to be sought in every part of Canada, and it must be fully and accurately obtained if it is to be available as a reliable basis. Five or six great societies or associations have voluntarily banded themselves together for the purpose of getting this information: the Manufacturers' Association of Canada, the Canadian Mining Institute, the Chemical Society, and the Society of Civil Engineers of Canada, and an association of technical organizations of different kinds in Canada.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Does this last technical organization already exist?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: They are all in existence. The system they proceed upon is to prepare questionnaires which are sent out to all colleges and universities, scientific and research organizations, and are designed to secure in full the information to which I have referred. Questionnaires are sent also to the managers of industrial and productive interests in Canada, the questions being so arranged as to bring out what these respective bodies are doing in the way of research, what are the problems which cause them difficulty, how far they are solving or trying to solve those problems, and how far aid may be required. This inquiry spreads itself over a vast number of organizations, industries and productive associations. These bodies, united for that purpose, appointed a central committee of sixteen. This central committee appointed a general committee of five to see to the distribution and collection of these questionnaires. They establish headquarters in the different provinces through the members of their organizations in those provinces. To make a long story short, the questions get into the hands of the parties for whom they are intended, but they are not left there without assurance that they will be intelligently and fully answered, to the largest maximum percentages. So that field aides and helpers voluntarily working from the members of those five associations are enlisting in the field some seven or eight hundred men whose duty it is to explain what answers are required to the questionnaires — much valuable information can be given to facilitate the work of those who answer—to see that the questions are answered and that they are forwarded again to the central committee. These questionnaires have already been sent out, a large number of them are now coming in and the tabulation has been commenced. The House will see what a fund of wide, useful and accurate information will be in the hands of the Advisory Council when the questions come in and the information therein contained is placed at the service of the Advisory Council.

It is also of great moment that the man power which is eligible and available for research shall be multiplied in our Dominion. It is rather a sad thing that many young men who have come out from our different colleges and universities and who have developed strains of original research and scientific inquiry are later snapped up by concerns in other countries, particularly in the United States. Many of them are to-day doing yeoman service in the great industrial operations in the United States, some of them receiving princely salaries. On the other hand, we have had a very small number of such men, owing, I suppose, to our smaller development in rich industrial concerns and the lesser interest that has heretofore been taken therein. The result is that many of our young men have not been encouraged to remain and pursue their investigations and work in Canada.

One duty laid upon this Advisory Council is to endeavour to reinforce that staff in our own country, in the first place.

by creating an interest in industrial establishments. This interest is now rapidly being increased, the necessity for it being more and more seen and felt by our industrial operators. In this way there will be created a home, as it were, and a place for work and occupation in Canada. In the second place it is proposed to endeavour to reinforce that staff by taking hold of those young men before they have gone away, in so far as they have developed evidences of peculiar excellence in the way of research, and by a system of studentships and fellowships encouraging them for one or two years after they have come through their university or college, to take up and pursue lines of research. There are to be six hundred dollars studentships and twelve hundred dollars fellowships, and a limited number of those will be distributed, and the Advisory Council has for the last few months been trying to secure that class of young men in our different institutions who may be as it were pre-empted for that kind of work.

What I have said will indicate to the House what it is proposed to carry out under this system which has been inaugurated, which has its branches in all parts of the Overseas Dominions and which is being extended to India and to some of the protectorates as well. We have connection with the Advisory Council of Great Britain by assessors. One of the council is at present in Great Britain representing the Advisory Council as an assessor. He sits with the Advisory Council in Great Britain while he is present there during the summer; he gets to know all that they are doing; he gets all the information and knowledge possible; in turn, he gives them information as to what we in this country are doing, and he keeps up the connection between the two bodies. Similar connections are being kept up with other Overseas Dominions. Sufficient has been stated to show that in this arrangement there is the beginning of a very strong, active and useful organization which, in the ways that I have mentioned, will enforce the lesson of the necessity for science, industry and production marching hand in hand. If that has been necessary in preceding years, it probably has never been more necessary than at the present time, and it will probably be all the more necessary after the war has ended and the adjustments of peace are brought about. Then, more than at any previous stage of the world's history, there will be the necessity for knowledge and scientific help being given to the processes of industry and of production in order that the keen competition that is coming may be met, and that the utmost of productive output may be had. This is simply taking time by the forelock, but none too soon, to get this system into working order in Canada and in this way to prepare ourselves as far as possible for the productive and industrial work of the future.

This organization was created by order in council, and this legislation is simply to put in statutory form the mode of organization which was adopted and passed by order in council.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Who are the members of the Advisory Council?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The administrative chairman is A. B. Macallum, M.D., Ph.D., Sc.D., LL.D., F.R.S., Ottawa.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: He is professor of what?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: He was professor of Physics in Toronto University. The other members are:

F. D. Adams, Ph.D., Sc.D., LL.D., F.R.S. Dean, Faculty of Applied Science, McGill University, Montreal

T. Bienvenu, Esq., Vice-President and General Manager La Banque Provinciale du Canada, Montreal.

R. Hobson, Esq., President Steel Co., of Canada, Hamilton.

S. F. Kirkpatrick, M. Sc., Professor of Metallurgy, Queen's University, Kingston, Ontario.

J. C. McLennan, Ph.D., F.R.S., Professor of Physics and Director of the Physics Laboratory, University of Toronto, Toronto.

A. S. Mackenzie, Ph. D., D.C.L., President Dalhousie University, Halifax, N.S.

W. C. Murray, M.A., LL.D., President, University of Saskatchewan, Saskatoon, Saskatchewan.

R. A. Ross, Esq., E.E. (Tor.), M. Can. Soc. C.E., Consulting Engineer, Montreal.

R. F. Ruttan, M.A., M.D., Sc.D., Professor of Chemistry and Director of the Chemical Laboratories, McGill University, Montreal.

Arthur Surveyer, B.A. Sc., M. Can. Soc., C.E., Consulting Engineer, Montreal.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The project which has been elucidated by my right hon. friend is certainly well conceived, and the idea is a very commendable one. One feature which certainly merits my commendation is the fact that this council is to be connected with similar organizations in other parts of the British Empire, that is to say, the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa. Undoubtedly, if all those associations work with a common purpose, the object must be very advantageous. If that object which this legislation has in view was inspired by the German example, we should, if it is not yet too late, pay far greater attention to technical education than we have done before. If there is one thing in which Germany has attained superiority, it is in the application of the discoveries of science to all the arts, not only of peace, but unfortunately of war. The Germans have attained this superiority by their technical schools and the special attention which they have given to technical education. I am sorry that more attention has not been paid to technical education in this country, and the sooner we take up that subject, the better it will be for the interests. my right hon. friend has in view at the present time.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. W. H. Bennett in the Chair.

On section 3—Appointment of Council.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The Chairman of the Board receives a salary. Are any other members of the Council paid?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No, but the Council have a secretary, Mr. Challies, of the Waterworks Branch of the Interior Department. He is giving his spare time free for the first year to the secretarial work of the Council. He is very efficient, and the Council find him most useful. I think the honorary work which these gentlemen have undertaken to do is one of the finest exhibitions we have had, amongst many fine exhibitions, of personal service devoted to the good of the state.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is this Council to be a permanent organization, or merely temporary?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is not a temporary body at all. It is proposed to make it a permanent body and to have the benefits of its services in increasing degree from year to year. The Advisory Council are following out closely the same plan that has been adopted in Great Britain. There the Advisory Council get into communication with the great engineering, scientific and metallurgical societies, steel plants and industries of that kind, and subsidiary committees, working together under the supervision of the Council, are formed for the purpose of stimulating research and solving the various problems that come up. Three standing committees have already been set up in Great Britain, the Metallurgical Committee, the Mining Committee, and one other. Men eminent in these different lines have banded themselves together as committees and are working in co-operation with the Central Advisory Council.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Although I am not opposed to the constitution of the Council at the present time—in fact, I think, perhaps, it is the best body that could be appointed to do this work during the period of the war—I have no faith whatever in the ability of such a body to perform the work of this nature that it is so desirable should be performed in this country. I do not think it is possible for a body of scientific men meeting at Ottawa only two or three times a year to accomplish any results, and I do not think any member of the Council thinks otherwise. I do not think any good results can be hoped for from similar bodies in the United States or in Great Britain, although I concede that practical results may possibly be expected in Great Britain, which is an older country. The distances there are shorter, and the men who are voluntarily giving their services can readily be brought together, and they may have a good deal of time to give to this sort of work. But in this country every member of the council is engaged in other work, and cannot do justice to his ordinary vocation and at the same time render any great service to the nation as a member of the council. I am not however opposing the constitution of the council for the time being. I think the idea is a very good one indeed, but I hope the Government and the country will not commit themselves to the policy of making the council a permanent body. It can, however, blaze a trail for work to be done in the future by men who shall belong to the Cival Service of Canada, and who will be able to give their whole time to this research work.

4 p.m.

Mr. STEELE: I am sure the House must appreciate very much indeed the splendid patriotic spirit that has actuated the members of the council in giving their services gratis for this work. I wonder, however, if any other motive played its part in the appointment of a council of an almost entirely honorary character. I fear that we in this country, and this Parliament especially, are actuated to a considerable extent by a desire not to spend money on such work as this. I quite agree with the hon. member for Halifax that at the present time it is perhaps all right to accept the services of these men on the terms on which they have been offered, but I do not believe that any permanent useful organization can be built up in that way. I hope the Minister of Trade and Commerce and this parliament will get away from the old time parsimonious habit and be generous to this body. We should be ready to spend even hundreds of thousands of dollars on an organization that will do work that is not only necessary to this country at the present time, but which will bring vast profits to the nation generally in the future, if the work is carried on in an aggressive manner. I am sure that the personnel of the council is beyond criticism, but as the hon. member for Halifax has said, these men are all engaged in other work and cannot be expected to give up a large part of their time and energy to gratuitous work. I hope that before the next meeting of parliament the Minister of Trade and Commerce will lay a proper foundation for carrying out what must be regarded as a most extensive programme for a body containing only two paid officials to carry out for the benefit of the nation. I trust that in the near future we shall have in this country under the control of the Government a vast institute for industrial and scientific research. There is plenty of work for such an institute to do, work that would be of vast advantage not only to the manufacturing and industrial interests of the country but to the nation at large.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Sufficient unto the day are the possibilities thereof. When I said that this was a permanent organization I simply meant that it was not for this year only, for no man can tell what such an organization will grow into or what changes will be made. I think, however, all hon. gentlemen in this House will agree with me that an excellent beginning has been made. The first thing to do is to get a foundation of information and facts, and that is what these gentlemen have set themselves to do. They have agreed to pursue that until they do get this information and they have agreed to do it without pay as an honorary work for the country's benefit. What that may develop into one cannot tell.

Mr. NESBITT: What arrangement will you make for transmitting to the colleges and schools any information they get?

[Mr. Steele.]

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The information they get is chiefly, at the first, for their own working out. It is not so much information for the schools or colleges that is contained in the answers to these questionnaires that have been sent out, which answers are now coming in and being tabulated. But results as they do accrue will be published in various forms so that the information may become available to all who are interested in it and in so far as it is a matter of public interest to the public as well. Neither is it to be thought that these eleven, or nine, men are going to do all the research work themselves. I quite agree with my hon. friend that it is not possible for them to do that. They are chiefly the body which is to correlate and co-ordinate this information and form a plan which can afterwards be worked out. But, I think we were fortunate in getting gentlemen like these to undertake the preliminary work. A great deal more of this work will have to be done in the future than has been done in the past if Canada is to hold her own.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Who are the representatives of industry on this council?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Mr. Hobson of Hamilton, Mr. Surveyor, Mr. Bienvenue and Mr. Ross, who is a practical engineer. My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), spoke of the leaning which he rather had towards technical education; or he spoke of it as a matter that might be more generously and widely supported than it is at the present time. I think we all agree with him in that respect. But Germany itself has shown instance where immense expenditures have been made on scientific and industrial research which to a certain extent prepares the way for the better working out of technical education in the interest of the labourers, the artisans and the general working public. Numbers of these immense corporations in Germany have spent millions of marks themselves on scientific research, for solving problems the solution of which has given a tremendous impetus to all branches of industry in Germany. The same thing is taking place in the United States. Large industries in the United States are paying out millions and millions of dollars absolutely for this research and scientific work. We have done very little in that respect. We ought to do a great deal more but that does not preclude the substratum, the very important part, that my right hon. friend mentioned.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I do not at all condemn the idea which my right hon. friend (Sir George Foster) advocates—very far from it. In the United States and, indeed, in Canada, some of the large industrial corporations have special appropriations every year devoted to research and invention. I do not know how much they have spent in this way, but, especially in the United States, they have devoted very large amounts of money to these objects. In Canada large industrial corporations also have invention and research departments, but, I believe that the foundation of that work lies in technical education. That will afford the best basis for what you have now in mind.

Mr. NESBITT: As far as I understand, the German Government assisted private corporations in their researches, but the private corporations were the ones that really carried on the research work and established industries which spread throughout the world. I know that this work has been carried on by private corporations in the United States. My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce is quite right when he says that they have spent a large amount of money on their research department, but they are not going to tell you what they are doing. Is this council supposed to compile the information it gets from other people throughout the country? If a man has some secret in his business, he is not going to tell you what it is.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We do not ask him to do that. These big German corporations spent large amounts of their own money upon this work.

Mr. NESBITT: They did, but the Government assisted them.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The Government assisted them, but much less than we have believed. We have a somewhat exaggerated idea of the amount of assistance that the German Government has given to industry, trade and commerce. It has favoured them by legislation rather than by expenditures. It has really been by expenditures, combinations and co-operation amongst producers themselves in Germany that they have brought about the great results that have flowed to German industry.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Except in transportation.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Even in transportation. They have a system whereby they all work together. With reference to raw material, wherever it may come from, outside or inside of Germany, or from foreign countries, it is manufactured and goes back to be sold to the consumers, and in all this process there is a close co-operation between the different corporations themselves, each feeding into and helping the other. It is that and not so much subventions either to industry or to steamships that has done the work for Germany, although as regards steamships, railways, canals and transportation the Government has done a great deal.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Would the minister explain what is meant by industrial research? Do I understand that if an industrial concern encounters some difficulty in producing a product, some servant or employee of the council will be available for that industrial concern to investigate its particular business and point out to it the disadvantages under which it is operating, or the improper methods which it is employing and how, by the adoption of scientific methods, it can achieve different results. Is it the intention to loan the servants of the council to such a corporation or business body for such a purpose?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No, it is just the other way. For example, when I was in Cobalt last summer, I saw employed a process for separating ores, which had lately been put in operation in the United States, and which had just gone into operation in Cobalt, called the flotation process, by which oil and water forming globules absorb, or rather encase, the fine metallic portions and float them. They are now working over the old dumps in Cobalt, which could not have been worked by any other process.

There was an industrial problem. There was this reservoir of value, to a limited extent, which was unutilized. What is the method by which that ore, in fine and distributed parts, may be recovered? Scientific investigation went to work upon that problem and ultimately solved it, so that now it is patent that a very greatly improved and qualitative process has been brought into this sphere of the world's production.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That process had existed for many years, although it has been much improved in the last five years. But a research council would not help that very much; that would depend upon the ability and tenacity of some inventor, who would probably receive but little reward for his labour and skill.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is where some of the most important advances are to be made in the work of development, in connection with what we may call those lame ducks. A process has been scented; it has been partly started, it has done a certain amount of good, but it has come to a point where nobody seems able to move it any further, and, while partly useful, it has not perfected its purpose. Then someone is needed to take hold of that and, by research and investigation, hit upon the thing that will make it a perfect rather than an imperfect process.

Mr. NESBITT: I agree that that is where great help can be given, where an inventor arrives at a "fault" and cannot get any further. But how will this help that?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I explained the advantage that would be derived if we had, at the close of the war, as a result of the establishment of this council, twenty, thirty, fifty, sixty or one hundred agencies of research. My hon. friend will see that the method is one of finding out and co-ordinating, of compiling information and disseminating it, so that the best possible use may be made of all the agencies which exist in the country.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Would it not be better to employ a staff of highly trained scientific men to carry on the investigations? That would not mean a very large expenditure. Our industries in this country are largely in a very crude condition, although, of course, there are some exceptional industries that are well organized and very effectively and scientifically carried on. We will require more science in our industry after the war than ever before, and I agree with my hon. friend from South Perth (Mr. Steele) that we should not be niggardly in starting off this important body. I am not sure that even to-day, when we must carefully guard every dollar of expenditure, it would not be wise for us to appropriate quite a substantial sum for the establishment of a corps of highly skilled scientific men.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend would find many difficulties. In the first place, he would find it absolutely impossible to get a dozen or twenty trained first class scientific men. You cannot find them in this country or any other, at the present time. They cannot be got. I doubt if we could find half a dozen, such as we would like to have. Then, in order to carry on their work, these men require extensive and very elaborate equipment. We have in this country some of the finest equipments, although not the most extensive, and in these places you have trained investigators who, to a certain extent, will carry on these lines of investigation. We are trying, in the first place, to reinforce that small regiment of scientific investigators—I speak of it in that way because of their very small number in this country—and every man who can be got is being taken up by the industrial corporations.

I believe that this is the best possible way of initiating the matter and I think that in the future there will be very large and beneficent results. Some men in this country say we want a great central institute where you will have all of these research operations carried on. That is very good, and that may come some time, but it would be tremendously expensive and difficult to man.

Mr. NESBITT: We are not big enough for that yet. When the minister takes action he should get hold of some man who has made a study of scientific organization and industry. That is one of the things where the United States have applied themselves for the last four or five years, with greater benefit towards the cheapening of the cost of goods than anything that has happened in many years.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No doubt about that.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister has added another commission to the long list which this Government have appointed. Whenever there is anything to be thought out, instead of showing any initiative in grappling with problems by proper methods of organization, the Government have approached the matter by the creation of commissions. We are asked to stand round in admiring gaze and say to each other, "So and so, members of that commission, are working for nothing." That has been the case with several of these commissions. Somebody has been trusted with tremendous responsibility and willing to do the work for nothing, and the country is expected to believe some great work is to be achieved. What has become of the Economic Commission appointed last year, on which a large number of gentlemen were supposed to work for nothing except their expenses? Nobody has heard of anything they have done. Professor Macallum is a very worthy man indeed, and I have the highest personal regard for him. He would do good work, but there is no use asking a lot of college professors from one part of Canada to another to make a trip to Ottawa at a time when their classes are in session and all their energies must be devoted to the task of teaching young men who pay the class fees, and expect to get the best results. You cannot expect anything of a practical nature from a combination of that kind. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman from Halifax and the hon. gentleman from North Oxford when they point out that there is only one way to deal with this matter, and that is on business lines alone. These dilettante organizations will produce no results. We will get tired of one commission after another, appointed to report upon matters, when the reports never come, and the business men of the country reach that point where they say there is no use bothering about it. Why should we not appoint two or three well-known scientists and retain their services, to work all the time, and then you will get good results. You will get no results from Professor Macallum and these worthy gentlemen who visit Ottawa and lunch together, and then go back home and attend to their ordinary duties. Nothing in the way of development of the industries of the nation will ever result from that.

Section agreed to.

On Section 4—Administrative Chairman.

Mr. NESBITT: Why is his salary not stated?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is stated in the order in council.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Is Professor Macallum to reside in Ottawa?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Permanently?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: How old a man is he?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: 55 or 56.

Mr. STEELE: He is not old in years, but old in his knowledge of science. I do not think you could get a better man for the position within the bounds of Canada than Dr. Macallum.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not doubt his capacity and experience as a scientists, but these very qualities may disqualify him absolutely for the position of head of a board of this kind.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: As having too much knowledge?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Not as having too much scientific knowledge, but it requires some business capacity. The mere fact that he has devoted all his life to scientific pursuits may unfit him for a position as administrator. Frequently it does. He may be a very good man to have as a member of the council.

Mr. NESBITT: Has he got the ginger and the pep?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It seems to me a young man of some industrial and business experience would probably be more useful.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend, unwittingly probably, does an injustice to Professor Macallum. The hon. gentleman might make an inquiry as to Professor Macallum's business ability as well as his scientific knowledge, his ginger and his pep, and then tell me what report he gets.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: How do you spell that word "pep"? However, I am glad to hear that statement by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and I am not criticising.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Duties of Council:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The duties are not very large—simply to advise the subcommittee on scientific questions.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There must be some co-ordinating body which connects it with the Government and with the expenditure, a subcommittee of the Privy Council. This advisory council carries on its work under the supervision and instruction of the subcommittee.

Mr. MARCIL: Will this body come into contact with the Conservation Commission?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Now, this body co-ordinates with these different agencies, and they are all working in harmony.

Mr. MARCIL: Will it be above the Conservation Commission or on an equal footing?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We will not say which. They co-operate.

Section agreed to.

On section 10—statement of expenditure and receipts and audit thereof.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: This section provides that a statement of receipts and expenditure shall be laid before both Houses of Parliament. I would suggest that the time of submitting this statement be specified adding "during the first two weeks of the session" or words to that effect.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We might add after the words "Houses of Parliament" the words "within fifteen days after Parliament opens."

SUPPLY.

REPORT OF W. F. O'CONNOR, K.C.—DISCUSSION BY MR. KYTE.

On the motion of Right Hon. Sir George Foster for Committee of Supply:

Mr. G. W. KYTE (Richmond, N.S.): Mr. Speaker, before you leave the Chair I desire to discuss a report of great public interest which was laid on the table of the House on the 13th of this month. I refer to the report made by Commissioner Mr. W. F. O'Connor, K.C., which has been the subject of more or less discussion in the public press since the day it was made public.

I desire to congratulate the Minister of Labour upon having accomplished something in the direction upon which he set out when he passed the order in council authorizing inquiry into the cost of living in the month of November last. Several abortive attempts have been made during the past seven or eight months to deal with the cost of living, but the report of Mr. O'Connor is the first substantial benefit that has been derived from the activities of the Department of Labour since the war began. It had been called to the attention of this Government many times that the cost of living was bearing more and more upon the people and that in view of the extraordinary conditions arising out of the war, it was in the highest degree desirable that this Government should take action similar to that taken by all other belligerent countries. As early as the session of 1915 a motion was made in this House by the member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt), asking for the appointment of a food controller, or the taking of some other steps to prevent undue enhancement of the prices of the necessaries of life. No action was taken. Every session since then the matter has been discussed, but with the same result. In the month of May I had the privilege of moving the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing the extraordinary rise in the price of flour and other wheat products that was manifested in that day's market reports. The Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White), speaking for the Government, intimated that as soon as the Government of the United States should take action along that line this Government would take similar action. Fortunately for this country, it did not take the Government of the United States as long to act after it had become a belligerent nation as it took the Government of Canada. Some three weeks after war was declared by the United States a food controller was appointed in that country and legislation was introduced into both Houses of Congress giving him ample power to deal with this question.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Does my hon. friend say that that legislation is yet passed?

Mr. KYTE: No, but a food controller has been very actively on the job in the United States for many months.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Who?

Mr. KYTE: Mr. Hoover.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Mr. Hoover has performed no single official act since he came back to the United States by virtue of any authority conferred upon him by Act of Congress.

Mr. KYTE: He has not had legislative authority to perform any official act, but his activities are manifest just the same, and the results of those activities have been reflected here in Canada.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: So are the activities of my hon. friend, but they are not official.

Mr. KYTE: If the Minister of Trade and Commerce had directed the activities of his department into the channel in which we are all interested, perhaps better results would have been achieved.

What are the findings of Mr. O'Connor, the commissioner, in respect of the supply of foodstuffs? He investigated the operations of the principal cold storage companies, abattoirs and export houses in Canada and the effect of the operation of these companies upon the prices of bacon, eggs, cheese, beef, butter, pork, mutton and lamb are disclosed in the interesting report to which I have referred. On pages 3 and 4 of his report, Mr. O'Connor says:

> A few of the cold storage companies, however, have attained such dimensions and have so centralized the business in certain lines that as respects particular commodities particular companies are able to exercise a practical monopoly, especially of export business.

That is the very danger that members of the House of Commons anticipated immediately after the outbreak of war. War brings about unusual conditions. It brings about large aggregations; it brings about big business. The citizens of Canada have been congratulated many times upon the tremendous amount of money that has been expended in this country since 1914 in the manufacture of war munitions. The enormous profits which have been made in that branch of industry appear to have whetted the appetites of gentlemen engaged in the manufacture of supplies not necessarily applicable to war operations. Following the lead of the manufacturers of munitions who have been enjoying large profits, manufacturers of and dealers in foodstuffs have been able to tuck away snugly equally large profits and dividends. Discussing the question of bacon, Mr. O'Connor has given some startling figures. The total quantity of bacon handled by twelve of the largest cold storage houses in Canada during 1916 was no less than 150,000,000 pounds. Of that total amount, 140,259,202 pounds were handled, exported, and sold by two cold storage companies.

The names of these cold storage companies were not disclosed in the report of the commissioner, but since its publication two companies that profess to have been injuriously affected or unfairly represented in that report have come forward and disclosed their names. These are two of the largest dealers in food products in Canada, and, inasmuch as they have disclosed their names so far as the report of this commission is concerned, I shall have no hesitation in taking the House into my confidence and stating that the two companies are Matthews-Blackwell, Limited, and the William Davies Company, Limited, both, I understand, having headquarters in Toronto. Out of the total quantity of 151,000,000 pounds of bacon handled, sold and exported in Canada during 1916, no less than 140,259,202 pounds were handled by these two companies, or 93 per cent of the total. Of this quantity the William Davies Company handled about 64 per cent and Matthews-Blackwell, Limited, about 29 per cent. On the subject of bacon, Commissioner O'Connor says:

> With regard to bacon we find one company selling 97 millions of the total 1916 cold storage sales of 151 million pounds at a margin of 5.05 cents per pound. The margin of the same company the previous year was 3.67 cents on 57½ million pounds. There is no evidence of correspondingly increased storage or other costs. Ninety-four million pounds at least of the sales of 1916 were for export. The margin of 3.67 was sufficient, satisfactory and profitable in 1915. Why not in 1916? Company No. V it will be observed sold 42½ million pounds of bacon. Its margin was 3.56 cents per pound. The margin of its competitors was small. They were, however, feeding the home market. Its need was not so great. This bacon situation is in a class by itself and will stand some explaining.

We have heard it stated from time to time in justification of the creation of companies with large capital that by the operation of those large companies there would be a reduction of overhead charges and in the cost of operation, and that, therefore, the goods supplied by those large corporations would necessarily and properly be sold to the consuming public at a lower price. That has been the argument advanced every time the merging of companies engaged in the manufacture of foodstuffs or of other necessaries consumed by the people of this country was sought. But taking into account the immensely larger sales by the William Davies Company, Limited, and Matthews-Blackwell, Limited, in Canada in 1916 over preceding years, we are amazed to find that they were not content with the margin of profit earned in the years 1913, 1914 and 1915, but in 1916, when they did the largest business known in their history, they charged the highest prices that were ever paid by the consumers of this country.

At page 34, we have this statement from Commissioner O'Connor, referring to companies V and IX, which are the two companies I have mentioned:

> It will be observed that the sales of bacon of companies V and IX together cover 140,000,000 of the 151,000,000 pounds of bacon which were sold by all the cold storage companies of Canada during 1916. The total exports from all Canada according to the computations of the Trade and Commerce Department were for the same year 169,000,000 pounds. Possibly no more striking example of a monopoly of any one commodity can be cited from the trade records of any country supplying the Allies with food. These two companies are here mentioned together, but a distinction between their operations has already been clearly drawn with regard to their margins and the proportion of the quantity sold which was controlled by the respective companies. The cause which led to this unprecedented situation is not far to seek. The basis of a monopoly in this commodity existed before the war and the extraordinary conditions since have enabled its progressive development.

I turn to Table IV in this report, and I find that the margin of profit charged by twelve cold storage companies is given in one of the columns. Company No. 1 sold at a margin of 1.26; company No. 3 at a margin of 3.4; company No. 5—Matthews-Blackwell, Limited—at a margin of 3.65; company No. 7 at a margin of 1.6; company No. 9—the William Davies Company—at a margin of 5.05, and company No. 11 at a margin of 1.37. As I pointed out a moment ago, instead of large business and enormous turnover resulting in reducing the margin of profit and the cost to the consumer, we have here quite the reverse. The smaller cold storage companies that dealt in bacon during 1916 were content with a margin of profit varying from 1.26 to 3.65, but the largest dealer in bacon of all was not content with this margin of profit, but capped the climax by exacting a margin of 5.05 cents per pound.

The quantity of bacon sold by company No. 9, that is by the William Davies Company, was in 1913 approximately 85,000 pounds at a margin of 3.63 cents per pound; in 1914, 14,000,000 pounds at a margin of 3.6 cents per pound; in 1915, nearly 60,000,000 pounds at a margin of 3.67 cents per pound, and in 1916, nearly 100,000,000 pounds, at a margin of 5.05 cents per pound. The operations of company No. 5,—the Matthews-Blackwell, Limited—for the various years are as follows: In 1913, approximately 4,000,000 pounds of bacon were sold at a margin of 2.02 cents per pound. In 1914, more than 9,000,000 pounds were sold at a margin of 1.3 cents per pound. In 1915, nearly 30,000,000 pounds was sold at a margin of 1.2 cents per pound, and in 1916 more than 40,000,000 pounds at a margin of 3.5 cents per pound. The Matthews-Blackwell Limited following the lead given by the William Davies company increased its margin of profit from 1913 to 1916, notwithstanding that its turnover and the business transacted by that company in 1916 was far in excess of that of any other year of its history. The general margin for all the other cold storage companies of Canada has decreased from 1.06 cents per pound in 1913 to .7 cents per pound in 1916. With the exception of the two companies that I have mentioned, all the other cold storage companies doing business in Canada found their margin of profit was reduced. This illustrates the effect of active competition. The very reverse process has been exemplified in regard to bacon and the resulting higher margins. These are the two most striking examples shown in the records of the effect of competition in the one case and of practical monopoly in the other.

There are 110 cold storage warehouses in Canada operated by 67 companies. Forty per cent of the quantity of meat sold by the three largest companies is sold to the consumers through their retail stores. One company has 80 retail stores; another company has 40 retail stores. These large cold storage companies are in active competition with the smaller tradesmen and the butchers in the respective cities in which their branch establishments are located.

One would imagine that the advantage would be altogether in favour of the consumer in respect of the prices charged by these large companies, because they have greater facilities for handling their products; they can turn out their product at very much less cost, and can derive a larger profit from the by-products in respect of the goods which they handle. They have an advantage over the small butcher in respect of distribution facilities and the manufacture of by-products. The proceeds from these by-products alone should have enabled the abattoir companies to sell at a very much lower margin of profit than the small butcher. But that has not been the case. The larger the business, the larger the price charged the consumer, and the larger the profit; that is the experience the people of Canada have gone through, the very bitter experience, I am bound to say, during the last two or three years.

Take the matter of eggs. The William Davies Company sold 5,566,505 dozen eggs at a margin of 7.27 cents a dozen during 1916, whereas the other cold storage companies investigated were content with margins ranging from 1.74 to 5.38 per dozen. The total trade in eggs was centralized in a few of the largest cold storage companies. We have heard a great deal of complaint throughout the country, and particularly in the larger cities, as to the price of eggs during the last year. The investigation made by Mr. O'Connor has disclosed the fact that the greatest offender in respect of boosting the price of eggs is the large cold storage company, and not the retail dealer. Previous to 1916 the margin of profit on eggs charged by William Davies & Company and other companies under investigation was very much lower than the margin charged in 1916. Commissioner O'Connor finds:

> The disproportionate increase received by the cold storage companies as respects eggs and bacon would be justified if storage costs had correspondingly increased, but the figures submitted by the various companies for the last four years do not evidence a sufficient rise in storage costs to bridge this gap, so the cause must be looked for elsewhere and found. The rise in the price of bacon in 1916 was clearly a result of a practical monopoly brought about by a huge and unprecedented export trade demand.

As regards cheese, two companies alone sold over 50,000,000 pounds out of the 72,000,000 pounds sold by all cold storage companies in Canada in 1916. The total sales of cheese by three companies cover 70,500,000 pounds out of a total of 72,500,000 pounds sold by all cold storage companies in Canada during last year.

5 p.m.

With respect to beef we have a similar condition of affairs. Of 170,000,000 pounds of beef that passed through cold storage last year, 124,000,000 pounds was controlled by the seven largest abattoirs; 99,500,000 was sold by three companies alone; 113,000,000 pounds was sold by four companies, and 60,000,000 was sold by American companies in Canada, for home consumption at a smaller margin than that of the Canadian companies. That, Sir, is another striking feature of the food supply of this country. Dealers in beef on the American side of the line are able to supply the Canadian consumer with beef at a lower price than the cold storage companies of Canada charged in the year 1916. Before I am through with my observations I shall be able to show that the Canadian dealer in other food products is selling more cheaply in England to-day than to the consumers in Canada, because in Canada he has the advantage of a tariff which enables him to boost the prices, whereas in England the products are sold in an open and free market.

With regard to fresh and salt pork, the commissioner finds:

> The concentration of this meat in the hands of a few companies is almost as striking as in the cases of the other commodities mentioned, the margin of the seven abattoirs for fresh pork being larger than the common average. The same holds true of the totals for fresh and smoked pork , the margin of the large abattoirs being 1.94 cents per pound, the common margin for cold storage being 1.85; this in spite of the fact that the large abattoir has a very real advantage over the smaller, because of the former's superiors facilities for developing by-products.

There is another instance that the smaller company sold more cheaply to the consumers in Canada in 1916 than did the larger companies. On page 5 of his report Mr. O'Connor says:

> I do not mean to be understood as stating that there have not been cases of undue profit taking. Quite the contrary, as will appear at a later stage of this report when I shall express an opinion concerning certain seemingly excessive charging, which in my judgment, is none the less open to criticism because, for the most part, the commodities affected were destined for export to Great Britain and the allies overseas.. .. ..A very small profit, per pound or per dozen, will produce quite an aggregate, all the same, when the operations of a company cover many millions of pounds or of dozens. For this reason it seems to me that such companies may well be content in such times as these with a very minute profit, per pound or per dozen, indeed.

That is a very severe indictment of the majority of these companies in respect of their dealings with the consumers not only of Canada but of the allied nations. We are all exerting our very best efforts in order that the Allies may win as speedy a victory as possible. We have heard it preached that during war time there should be no profits, or at all events, that profits should be reduced to a minimum. I think everybody in Canada will subscribe to that doctrine, but unfortunately those whom we would expect to be actuated by at least an equal degree of patriotism as regards a speedy and favourable determination of the war are not the first to put those doctrines into practice. Commissioner O'Connor finds that:

> Individual instances of profiteering occurred during the year 1916. If they had occurred in the present year since the provisions of the Order in Council under which I am making this investigation, I would consider it my duty to recommend that the facts be laid before the proper Attorney-General for his consideration.

There have been instances of profiteering which were of a criminal character, the commissioner says, having regard to the order in council passed by the Minister of Labour some months ago, and it is only because that order in council was not in force during the period covered by his investigation that criminal proceedings cannot be taken against these companies. The commissioner states on page 32:

> We have been paying more for most of our food for domestic consumption than the Allies to whom it is exported. This was not the result of patriotism, but something quite different. . . . . .The proces in the home market exceeded those in the export market in 1916, for butter, by 1.82 cents per pound; for cheese, by 2.14 cents per pounds; for beef, by 1.24 cents per pound; for ham, by 6.11 cents per pound. For eggs, pork, and bacon the prices for home consumption were less than for export; eggs, by 3.76 cents per dozen; pork, by 1.08 cents per pound; and bacon, by 0.48 cents per pound.

While I am on this subject I also desire to call attention to the price of other products of Canada, sold in Great Britain at the present time, as compared with the price of the same commodities in Canadian cities, as follows:

London, England.	Toronto, Ont.	Montreal, Que.
Bacon—
Wholesale prices only { Canadian Wiltshire 27½.	Canadian Wiltshire 28 – 31	Canadian Wiltshire 31 – 32.
London Economist	Canadian Grocer	Canadian Grocer.
(Bacon sold wholesale in England is usually the Wiltshire side, which includes ham, shoulder and sides.)
Ham—
Wholesale prices only { Canadian 27 5·30.	Canadian 29½ – 31	Canadian 31 – 32.
London Economist	Canadian Grocer	Canadian Grocer.
Bread—
Retail prices. 5¾c. per lb.	7½c. per lb.	8c. per lb.
(These figures were computed taking four lb. of bread and costing 11½d. Quotations state that bread is selling in London as low as 10½c for four lb. loaf)
Flour—
Wholeaale prices. { Strong Bakers 10.45.	Strong Bakers, 12.40	Strong Bakers, 12.50.
London Statist	Canadian Grocer	Canadian Grocer.

(War flour, called Government Railway Food controller's order of April 4th required that 81 per cent of wheat must be retained in the flour and a minimum of 10 per cent of flour from other grain, barley, corn, rice, etc., must be added, up to a maximum of 25 per cent.)

But, making all due allowance for that difference, the price of flour in England, made according to the prescribed formulae which I have read, is very much less than the price of flour in Toronto and Montreal.

I notice that the William Davies Co., in their statement, say the Commissioner has not been fair to them in stating that their margin on bacon was 5·05 cents per pound. There can be no misunderstanding on the part of the reading public as to what Mr. O'Connor meant. He stated very clearly that he was only specifying the margin and not the actual profit and he gave the reason why he was obliged to confine himself to the margin. The William Davies company in their statement, claimed that 4·01 cents per pound storage, freight and delivery charges, ought to be deducted from the 5.05 cent margin given by Mr. O'Connor. You will observe that bacon sold for .48 cents per pound more in England than in Canada in 1916 and this fact goes to show that the William Davies company were not giving the consumers of Canada a fair deal because the cost of transporting bacon from Canada to England would be represented by this .48 cents. The William Davies company have therefore been charging the Canadian consumer 4.57 cents per pound over and above what they have any right to charge and over and above what they are charging the English consumer. The monthly sales of bacon by the William Davies company amounted to 75,000,000 pounds during 1916. Mr. O'Connor figures out a profit of quarter of a cent a pound and that for the twelve months, would amount to $225,000 which would be available for the shareholders with respect to the article of bacon alone.

You will observe that the monthly turnover of bacon, according to the figures given by the William Davies company to Commissioner O'Connor justifies him in coming to the conclusion that upon the basis of the actual turn-over for twelve months of 7,500,000 pounds a month, they made an enormous profit considering the magnitude of the transaction. The Davies company, in their statement, deny that they had a margin of 5·05 cents per pound, which nobody contends they had, and say that their actual profit was ·68 cents per pound. A profit of ·68 cents per pound on a monthly turn-over of 7,500,000 pounds would represent a dividend to the company's stockholders of 17 per cent upon the total common stock and bond issue of $3,545,000. It may be stated that my figures as regards the company's capitalization are not correct. They are the only figures I have been able to obtain, and as they were given a few days ago by a financial journal in Toronto, I assume they are correct. And if, as the William Davies company affirm, their profits only amount to .68 cents a pound, we still see what a tremendous income they had from bacon alone. When we take into account their enormous turnover in eggs, butter, cheese, beef, pork, both fresh and salted, and the different other products in which they deal in such tremendous quantities, we can understand what an enormous monopoly they maintain in this country and the tremendous dividends that must be shared by the fortunate stockholders of the company.

We will take the case of Swift & Company, dealing in similar products in Chicago.

In respect to the profits of the William Davies Company for the year 1916, as stated by themselves in the advertisement signed by the general manager of the company, an interesting comparison can be made with the profits derived from the business of Swift & Company of Chicago, one of the largest, if not the largest packing houses in the world. According to Swift & Company year book the certified net profit on cattle for 1916 was one-eighth of one per cent. per pound, live weight, or one-quarter of one per cent per pound dressed. The Davies Company's net profits according to the statement of the general manager amounted to .68 cents or two thirds of a cent per pound, or over half as much again as the Swift Company. And even this apparently slim margin gave the Chicago company in 1916 a net profit, after providing interest on bonds, of no less than $20,465,000. On its capital stock of $100,000,000 the Swift company pays eight per cent. per annum, with special dividends thrown in now and again to reduce surplus which is ever accumulating. For instance on Sept. 30th last, the surplus amounted to $60,000,000, while out of this surplus a special dividend of $33.33⅓ was paid the shareholders in November, 1916.

When we have a stated profit reduced to the decimal part of a cent, and when we take into account the enormous turn-over that is made by these companies, with an apparently small margin of profit on each individual pound of product handled, the profits and emoluments of these companies, taking into account the year's business, are tremendous.

There is another point which is worthy of note, and it is the enormous increase in the export business of the William Davies company as disclosed by Mr. O'Connor's report. Out of a total of some 112,000,000 pounds which the Davies Company dealt in during the year 1916, some 94,000,000 pounds were shipped to Great Britain.

The only other company that had a large export trade was the Matthews-Blackwell Company, but the export trade of the William Davies company was about five times greater than that of the Matthews-Blackwell company. This is a time when it is extremely difficult, as we know, to get shipping for the transport of our food supplies to the Allies. We all know that the crying demand of Great Britain and the other Allies is for food, and that the greatest menace which faces the Allies is the destruction of steamships and transport vessels by German submarines. Efforts are being made in every direction to speed up the construction of ships in order that the destruction of our carrying trade by German submarines may not cripple the ability of the Allies to keep themselves supplied with food. It is rather an extraordinary thing that, considering the tremendous difficulties that shippers of all kinds are experiencing in getting transport for supplies, the William Davies company were able to increase their export of foodstuffs to Great Britain enormously in 1916, as compared with 1914. I recognize that a member of this House, speaking on any public question, does so with a full responsibility, that anything he says may, by reason of his being a member of Parliament, be clothed with greater weight and effect than it otherwise might be. I shall, therefore, not go into details except to say that there is a general rumour—I do not know how well authenticated; if it is not true I will be the first to withdraw it—but the statement is made that facilities for the carrying of bacon from the William Davies company from Canada to England are afforded largely by the ships which are carrying munitions across to Great Britain.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Has my hon. friend any authority for that except rumour?

Mr. KYTE: I have stated my authority, and I shall be the first to withdraw it if it is not true.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Would it not be better that the statement should not have been made if you did not know it was true?

Mr. KYTE: I think there is rather too much of an inclination to pussyfoot with regard to matters in which the big interests are concerned.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Better to pussyfoot than to insinuate untruths, which are very damaging when put forth by a member of Parliament. If my hon. friend meant anything by his insinuation, it was that, in some wrongful way, the British Admiralty connived at the carrying of William Davies company stuff and discriminated against others. I do not believe there is a word of truth in it.

Mr. KYTE: What I have said I have said.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I know you have.

Mr. KYTE: And I have stated that if it is not true the William Davies company have ample opportunity to deny it, and I shall be the first to accept their denial.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Does my hon. friend think that is fair—playing the game straight—to insinuate and then say: If that is not true let some one deny it. He has not measured up to the statement he made that a member of Parliament ought to weigh his words.

Mr. KYTE: I am not going to enter into competition with the Minister of Trade and Commerce as regards playing the game fair. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) gave an illustration of how fair the minister played the game with him in connection with the investigation of the New Brunswick Central railway.

As I stated a moment ago, the William Davies company have given a statement to the public. They hurriedly rushed to the public press a day or two after the report of Mr. O'Connor was published, and, quite indifferent to the fact that Mr. O'Connor is a public official in whom the public repose considerable trust and confidence, they have this to say of the author of that report:

> The author of this inquiry shows a strange lack of even a fundamental knowledge of simple book-keeping, and a dangerous inability to co-ordinate figures. The following are specific and outstanding errors in the report.

And they then proceed to discuss what were apparently errors. But there was no error because, as I have said, Mr. O'Connor made it perfectly clear that he did not wish to convey the impression that the 5.05 cents per pound was profit, but that it was margin only. And why was he obliged to resort to the statement? Questionnaires, as the Minister of Labour pointed out, were forwarded to all these companies at the time that Mr. O'Connor undertook to make these inquiries. Certain information was demanded of each company, upon which information the commissioner would subsequently make his report. The Minister of Labour, speaking of this report, after having referred to the questions sent out, said at page 3798 of Hansard:

> One or two firms said: We cannot answer these questions; we are not in a position to give you the particulars.

[Sir George Foster.]

These were the particulars as to cost of transportation, insurance, cold storage charges from the time the commodities entered into the cold storage warehouse until they reached the point of consumption in Great Britain. The minister continued:

> Hon. gentlemen will see that in the case of bacon that is sold in Liverpool the delivery charges would be a very important matter. No answer was given to that question by the firm about which there has been so much talk during the last few days.

The firm of William Davies and Company refused to give the information to Commissioner O'Connor, because as they said, they did not have the information, and yet they castigate and criticise Mr. O'Connor because he set down the marginal profit instead of the actual profit itself.

On page 63 of his report, Commissioner O'Connor says of the action of a certain company:

> Its action was not in my judgment illegal, but was it respectable? Likewise as to the more aggravated, because continuous, exaction of excessive profits by another firm, on bacon; aside from the matter of illegality, is this sort of thing to be considered respectable? Mine may be as the voice of one crying in the wilderness, but I have to register in the negative.

If it has been as the voice of one crying in the wilderness, it reached the ears of certain ministers of this Government who decided to appoint another inquiry to investigate the work of Commissioner O'Connor. What has Mr. O'Connor found in his report? He finds that as regards at least one or two of these companies there has been profiteering, monopoly, undue enhancement of prices to the consumer, and withholding of food for purposes of speculation. As regards the latter charge, a newspaper report says:

> The increased holding of butter, eggs and pork are justifiable on the basis of an equivalent increase of sales since 1916, but that the increase of holdings of beef, bacon, ham, mutton and lamb are not justifiable upon that basis, and are speculative. Accordingly, he says the prices of these commodities should forthwith drop. The stocks of cheese, he thinks, are running too low.

Certain commodities then, according to this statement, have been kept in larger quantities than usual in these cold storage warehouses for the purpose of speculation as to how much further charges can be exacted from the consumer in respect of these commodities.

We have, as I stated, another commission of inquiry that has been constituted for the purpose, I thought, of doing the work that Mr. O'Connor said in this report he had not time to do. But that is not the case. The statement made by Chairman Henderson in Toronto this morning is that they are going to conduct an independent inquiry quite separate and apart from the work of Commissioner O'Connor. Mr. O'Connor realized and appreciated the difficulties he had in estimating the exact amount of profits earned by the William Davies company. He said:

> No specific data is given upon the point of storage costs, because it is believed that a special investigation is required into the value of the by-products of meat, and that some compulsorily applicable cost accounting system of storage and other costs on specific commodities should be established.

He says the means for providing such an expert examination is under way. From that I judge Mr. O'Connor was continuing his investigation for the purpose of ascertaining what was the exact margin of profit earned by the storage companies under investigation, and no one is better able to complete the inquiry than Mr. O'Connor himself. He has been in charge of this work for six months past. He conducted an enormous volume of correspondence. From his report I gather he was in correspondence with over a hundred cold storage companies, export dealers and abattoir companies in Canada. His work was not completed, inasmuch as I have said the actual margin of profit was not determined by him, but I cannot understand this Government, instead of supplying Mr. O'Connor with the accountants to enable him to get the proper information which was required, and which was called for under the circumstances, discarded Mr. O'Connor's services altogether, and called Mr. G. F. Henderson, K.C. I am bound to say that the selection of Mr. Henderson has not been a very happy one for the Government. His appointment was up for consideration a few days ago in this House, and while I have nothing to say as to the standing of Mr. Henderson at the bar of this province, or as to his ability and capacity to discharge any obligation that might properly be imposed upon him by this or any other Government. A few months ago Mr. O'Connor held an inquiry in the city of Ottawa as to the cost of certain food products, and the solicitor who appeared for the company upon trial was G. F. Henderson, K.C. He was retained several months ago by companies that were the subject of investigation by Mr. O'Connor, and I repeat, to say the least of it, the selection by the Government of Mr. Henderson as the chairman of that committee to revise the work done by Mr. O'Connor is a most unfortunate one, and I fear it will not have the confidence of that portion of the people of this country who are most interested in the results. I pointed out the other evening that Mr. Henderson appeared a year ago in the city of Ottawa as solicitor for interests that are, to a certain extent, allied with the interests which are on trial at the present time. He appeared for Colonel Allison before the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into certain contracts for the manufacture of fuses which Allison obtained for his confederates, from the then Shell Committee. The Shell Committee was disbanded, and the Munitions Board was appointed, and, to say the least of it, I think the Government should have guarded themselves against appointing Mr. Henderson, the solicitor for Colonel Allison, to act as chairman of the committee of the court of appeal, in which Sir Joseph Flavelle, the chairman of the Munitions Board, is more particularly interested than any other person, as against the interests of the consuming public of this country. The Government instead of taking immediate action to mend the matters complained of, as affecting injuriously the consuming public, both in Canada and the allied countries, appoint this new commission for the purpose of inquiring into a matter which is entirely subsidiary and quite apart from the main finding in Mr. O'Connor's report. Mr. O'Connor found there was monopoly, undue profiteering, improper withholding from the public certain foodstuffs, and that the food business in respect of certain lines in this country, had got into the hands of companies that were exacting larger prices than other companies of a similar character dealing in the same quality of goods. The question as to the actual profits made by the William Davies Company on the bacon sold by them is not the most important question. The important question is that there is a monopoly, that there is profiteering, that there is undue enhancement of prices, and while the consumers of this country are still suffering under the disabilities and disadvantages arising from those conditions, this new commission of which Mr. Henderson is the chairman, is leisurely whiling its time away in the city of Toronto, and nothing is being done to relieve the situation as it presents itself to the consumer at this moment. The commission met to-day in the city of Toronto, pursuant to notice. I have a report of the transactions as published in the Ottawa Journal to-day. It reads as follows:

Mr. Walter L. Breckells has been appointed secretary of the Commission.

The Commission consists of of Mr. Henderson, as I stated, and Mr. Brodie, and Mr. Clarkson, two accountants. The report proceeds:

No evidence was taken this morning and an adjournment was made, probably for two weeks, pending reports on the examination of the packer's books.

There has been an adjournment of two weeks, and inasmuch as it took Mr. O'Connor six months to get the information which enabled him to present the report which he has forwarded to the Government, what guarantee have we that the present Commission will complete the work in a shorter time? We will have a whole year gone by and nothing done, no action taken to relieve the situation which Mr. O'Connor discloses. The report proceeds:

Mr. Louis Heyd, barrister, who said he represented the consumers, asked if Mr. Clarkson was a member of the firm of Clarkson, Gordon and Dilworth, paid auditors of the books of the Wm. Davies Company.

Mr. Clarkson replied in the negative. Mr. Heyd said that he knew that Mr. Bain had the ability to conduct the investigation if he only had the inclination. Mr. Bain promptly replied that he had the inclination and a little more.

Mr. Heyd announced his immediate retirement when the chairman stated that Mr. Clarkson's old firm in which was the latter's father, had audited the company's books ten years ago. He said he had no desire to take further part in the investigation if there was any connection between a member of the commission and the William Davies Co.

I submit that under those circumstances this is another incident which shows that another of the selections made by the Government in the matter of this Commission is not the most fortunate one that could have been made. It may be argued that although the Clarkson Company audited the books of the Davies Company some ten years ago, that a representative of that company ought not to be prevented from acting on that Board. But I say that if there is an accountant to be had who never had anything to do with the employment of the William Davies company, the Government should have sought him out and avoided this suspicion, which will go abroad when the circumstances surrounding this appointment are made known. Mr. Tilley, who acted for the Davies Company, said he wanted an opportunity to criticise Mr. O'Connor's report and the means by which he arrived at his conclusion. Fancy! They wanted to criticise the means by which Mr. O'Connor arrived at his conclusion. The consuming people of this country are not concerned as to the means by which he arrived at this conclusion. Is it true that there is monopoly, profiteering, undue prices charged to them and that cold storage products are being kept in the warehouses for the purposes of speculation? These are the matters in which the consumers of Canada are concerned, and upon that subject there is no controversy, and no denial. The report proceeds:

We would not have been here to-day, said Mr. Henderson, "if there had been more frankness." He, however, pointed out that they were not investigating Mr. O'Connor, but were making an inquiry independent of the report."

So that whatever credit the Minister of Labour is entitled to for having appointed Mr. O'Connor to make a report upon the food prices in Canada, that credit is immediately taken away from him by the appointment, by his colleagues in the Government, of Mr. Henderson and two accountants who are going to proceed to have another inquiry altogether. What are Mr. Henderson and his accountants going to inquire into, in which the public have any concern? They are not so much concerned in what was the actual amount of profits which this company obtained on the sale of products. That can as well be dealt with later as now. The order in council does not disclose any other purpose for which the Commission was appointed. I have a copy of the order in council appointing this latter board of inquiry. It reads, in part:

The minister represents that returns have been made to him under such regulations by the William Davies Company, Limited, and Matthews-Blackwell, Limited, the first-named company being No. IX mentioned at page 30 of said sessional paper, and the second-named company being No. V also mentioned at said page 30, and that the said companies have taken exception to the said report so far as it concerns them.

It is because these two companies have taken exception to the report that this new commission has been appointed; the public who are concerned in the disclosures which Mr. O'Connor has made are not to be considered in the matter at all. The order in council proceeds:

The minister considers that the circumstances disclosed by such returns and in said report which recommends further investigation of the dealings of the aforesaid companies justify such investigation and examination of the premises, books, papers and records of the said companies as is in and by said regulation No. 6 provided.

Then they proceed, under the terms of the order in council passed last November, to provide that the Commissioners shall investigate as follows:

(a) The amount of margin between the first cost to each of said dealers and the price ultimately realized on sale or disposal by each of said dealers; (b) the net profit; (c) the specific elements or factors which have conduced towards or which have operated to produce the difference found between such margin and such net profit, indicating the extent of the operation of each element or factor; also to recommend in writing to the Minister of Labour a standardized system of costs accounting applicable to the business of cold storage, from the operation of which system the net profits of cold storage companies within Canada may from time to time be readily ascertained.

Not a word of authority is issued to this commission by this order in council to inquire into or to verify Mr. O'Connor's assertion that there is monopoly, that there is profiteering, that there is undue profit, that there is undue withholding of food products from the public for purposes of speculation. All these considerations are thrown to the winds; the report which was prepared so laboriously and so completely by Commissioner O'Connor is thrown into the discard until another report shall have been made by a more favourable court, upon which the Government may or may not take action, according as the spirit may move them when the proper time comes.

This is not the first time, Mr. Speaker, that the people have been handed out a gold brick in respect to legislation, taxes, and conditions which bear unfairly upon the consuming public. Take for instance, the excess profits tax. A great deal of credit was claimed by the Finance Minister a couple of years ago when he imposed his business profits war tax. It was pointed out by members on this side that that tax would, in the final analysis, be paid not by the company, but by the consumer. We know that the dividends of these companies increased enormously in the years 1915 and 1916 after the business profits war tax had been levied. The companies, by reason of the increased prices which they have exacted from the Canadian consumers, are able to pay the business profits war tax without suffering any loss. As a matter of fact, their dividends, after they deduct the business profits war tax from their earnings, are greater now than they were before that tax was imposed. The same thing is true with regard to the imposition of the increased tariff of 7½ per cent in the session of 1915. It was pointed out that while a limited amount of revenue would be obtained from the imposition of this increased tariff, what the Government would receive would not be at all comparable with the increased profits which the manufacturers would exact from the consumers of Canada by reason of their ability to add 7½pc. to their prices. In that respect the consumer, no person else, pays the tax. The tax upon patent medicine, banks, the taxes levied upon railway corporations—all these have come down to the consumer. If a person goes into a drug store to-day to buy a bottle of proprietary medicine, in addition to the price which he otherwise would pay, he has to pay two cents war tax. So that the poor man who buys the proprietary medicine is the one who pays the war tax, not the merchant or any other person who handles that medicine from the point of manufacture to the point of retail distribution.

I will refer to page 35 of Mr. O'Connor's report. He says:

The quantity of bacon sold by company No. IX was approximately, in 1913, 85,000 pounds at a margin of 3.63 cents per pound; in 1914, 14,000,000 pounds at a margin of 3.6 cents per pound; in 1915 nearly 60,000,000 pounds at a margin of 3.67 cents per pound, and in 1916 nearly 100,000,000 pounds, at a margin of 5.05 cents per pound.

So that as the war taxes were increasing, the margin and the profits were increasing in the treasury of the William Davies company. That illustrates what I pointed out a few moments ago: that the operations of the war tax levied by the Finance Minister have the effect of increasing the cost of the commodity to the consumer and the result to the company is that they earn larger dividends than ever before.

Another matter in which that part of the country from which I come is interested is the matter of salt. I called the attention of the Finance Minister a week or so ago to the great necessity that existed in the fishing communities of Nova Scotia for an adequate supply of salt. The Minister of Trade and Commerce then made a statement to the House which went to show that the Government was unable to do anything. But the Government of Newfoundland was able to do something. From day to day the Government of Newfoundland are causing ships laden with salt to arrive in the fishing ports of Newfoundland, and the result is that the fishermen are able to cure their catch—a catch which has been larger and more profitable to the fisherman than at any time in the colony's history.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend will find if he inquires—I think I stated so—that the Newfoundland people have got their salt because they have paid the rate of freight that was asked. The Government did not pay any part of it.

Mr. KYTE: The fact is that the Government of Newfoundland took the matter in hand, and their fishermen have salt; the Government of Canada took the matter in hand, and the fishermen of Nova Scotia have no salt.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The Government of Newfoundland took the matter in hand, but the British Admiralty proffered ships for this purpose and set the price of freight; no doubt the people paid that price, and got their salt. The Government of Canada took the matter up with the Admiralty. The Admiralty agreed to have the ships put at their disposal and placed a price upon the salt as to freight. As I understand it, the Canadian fishermen could not see their way clear to pay that freight; consequently they did not get their salt.

Mr. KYTE: The result is as I said: the Newfoundland Government got salt for their fishermen, but this Government failed to get salt for the Canadian fishermen. When I called the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to the matter in the House, he ended his remarks by saying that the Government did not have a peck of salt. The obvious rejoinder to this facetious remark on the part of the minister would be to say that the lack of salt probably accounts for the advanced condition of decay in which the Government finds itself. If it had more salt, it would be better preserved.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend would require all the salt that is in the ocean to keep him sweet.

Mr. KYTE: If the necessity on my part for salt is in proportion to the freshness of the Government, I shall require a great deal.

There is another matter in which the people of this country are taking a more or less languid interest. Leading members of the Government have been in favour of a coalition, that is to say, a coalition Government with the "coal" out of it, by which I mean the fire, glow, power and masterful energy of my right hon. leader (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I said the leading members of the Government are in favour of a coalition, because it is well known that the stars of lesser magnitude, whose light would be extinguished by an equal number of Liberal members who would be brought in to take their places, are not wildly in favour of coalition. But, while the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance are beating the bush to find Liberals who can be led or driven into the Government, they are preparing the way for a "Win-the-War" Government which shall comprise both political parties, by filling the vacancies in another branch of this Parliament out of Conservatives of the deepest dye, principally recruited from the ranks of the supporters of the Government in this House. The people of this country are beginning to wonder whether or not all this question of coalition is really honestly meant and seriously intended. It appears to me at this time when, at all events, some people in this country have an open mind on this question—and I had an open mind on it until it was absolutely closed by the conduct of the Government in appointing their partisan supporters to all the vacancies in the Senate a few days ago—if they wished actually to bring about a coalition of both political parties in order to form a Government to win the war, at least they would have shown their good faith by going "fifty-fifty" upon the appointments of senators instead of corralling all the appointments as they have done.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We had to get a "fifty-fifty" first.

Mr. KYTE: What is the Government going to do about the O'Connor report? They have appointed another commission, Mr. Henderson, Mr. Clarkson and Mr. Brodie. These gentlemen are not authorized to deal with the matters in which the people are most seriously concerned. They are not authorized to deal with the indictment which has been presented by Commissioner O'Connor against the cold storage companies of Canada. It is of no consequence to say, except as an incident, what the actual profit of the William Davies Company has been. That can be dealt with in another way and at another time. The interest and concern at the present time of the people of this country is how they are going to get rid of this monopoly; how they are going to get the necessaries of life at least at as low a rate as the Allies are paying for them, after shipping them 3,000 miles across the ocean. They want to know when this profiteering is going to cease. The O'Connor report as regards these matters stands as it was delivered in this House on the 13th of July, and the people of this country will demand instant action from the Government in order to remove the disabilities and the hardships from which, as Mr. O'Connor has informed this House and the country, the consumers of Canada are suffering at the present time.

Hon. T. W. CROTHERS (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, an officer of my department having made a report on cold storage commodities, which report was laid on the Table, and two of the largest cold storage companies in Canada, with whose products he dealt, having taken strong objections to his report, at his suggestion—contained in his report—and pursuant to clause 6 of the order in council passed last November, expert accountants have been appointed to inquire into the whole matter. Therefore, it is scarcely fair or proper to discuss this matter at this time, as it is really sub judice.

Mr. McKENZIE: Another commission will be right on the heels of this one. When are we going to discuss the question?

Mr. CROTHERS: My hon. friend referred to that the other day, and I pointed out to him the provisions of clause 6 of the order in council. He knows better than to speak about another commission; he knows that clause 6 of the order in council provides for this further investigation, and the order in council, as read by my hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Kyte) provided for it, so that it is in vain to speak about more commissions inquiring into what the present further investigation may find.

I am very much surprised to see my hon. friend from Richmond, who is a lawyer, finding fault with the appointment of Mr. Henderson as one of these examiners. The only objection my hon. friend gives is that Mr. Henderson, last winter, when a similar investigation was being held by Mr. O'Connor in Ottawa, acted for one of the merchants interested. If that came from a man who never saw a lawyer or knew nothing about them, I should not be surprised, but my hon. friend knows as every lawyer knows, that the best lawyers of the country are on one side of a case to-day and the next day are taking up the other side of a similar transaction. He will find one of the best lawyers in Toronto defending a notorious thief to-day and to-morrow he will find him prosecuting a notorious thief. For a lawyer to find fault with the appointment of Mr. Henderson as a member of this commission because he appeared before Mr. O'Connor last winter to see to it that a merchant of this city had an opportunity of getting all his evidence before him, is to say the least of it, most extraordinary. My hon. friend's argument will have no weight with the intelligent people, lawyers and others, of this country.

My hon. friend said on more than one occasion that Mr. O'Connor had found that there was hoarding and excessive accumulation on the part of those cold storage companies for the purpose of holding cold storage commodities until they should rise in price. If he will look at page 62 of the report from which he has been reading, he will find these words:

> I find that the operations of cold storage companies generally have been fairly conducted. There has been no illegal combination nor any excessive accumulation on the part of any company.

Notwithstanding the fact that my hon. friend had that statement before him, he repeated several times in this House this afternoon that Mr. O'Connor found that there was hoarding and excessive accumulation with a view to getting an enhanced price in the future. I need only refer to that to show how unreliable and untrustworthy many of the statements made by my hon. friend this afternoon really are,

His statements in many respects were not a fair representation of what Mr. O'Connor says in his report. He says that Mr. O'Connor found that there was a combination. The truth is that Mr. O'Connor on the very first page says that "there is nothing like combination among the various companies. There is a very lively competition instead." He found that there was no combination, no hoarding and no excessive accumulation.

Mr. McKENZIE: If it is such an excellent report, why did the packers find fault with it.

Mr. CROTHERS: I am not speaking for the Davies Company. Again on page 5 Mr. O'Connor said:

> On the whole the operation of the cold storage companies have stood the test of investigation well. The profits per pound or per dozen of most of these companies have been small, and have not to any degree contributed to produce the very high prices prevailing.

The mistake my hon. friend from Richmond made, and it has been made by many, was in confusing margin and profits. This afternoon my hon. friend used the two words indiscriminately. Mr. O'Connor is very particular in his report to point out that he is not dealing with profits at all, but with margins.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is there any difference made in the report between gross profits and margins?

Mr. CROTHERS: In works on economics, and by expert accountants the word "margin" means the difference between the cost price of an article and its selling price. In this particular case it would include the cost of cold storage, cost of delivery, overhead charges, etc. In the case of bacon delivered in Liverpool, for instance, the cost of delivery would be a very large item, especially at the present time when tonnage is so scarce. Mr. O'Connor points out in his report:

> It is desirable that the precise meaning attached to the word "margin" in this report should be very carefully noted. It represents gross, not net, profit on the commodity from the time it is laid down, all costs and expenses paid, in the storage warehouse. The questionnaires sent out to the various companies to secure specific information on margins demanded sworn testimony as to (a) the quantity of each commodity purchased during the year; (b) the cost of such laid down in warehouses, including freight and unloading charges; and (c) the total quantity sold during the year and the total amount for which sold. The average cost prices and average selling prices were computed. The difference between these is the margin referred to. The margin represents, therefore, the cost of storing, losses, interest on investment, overhead charges, any other expenses incurred by the cold storage company from the time the commodity enters the warehouse until it reaches the persons to whom they sell and the cold storage company's profit. It is the total charge imposed on the food from the time it enters the cold storage house until it passes into the hands of grocers or wholesale dealers.

He therefore made it perfectly clear that he was not dealing with net profits at all.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. CROTHERS: Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock, I was pointing out that Mr. O'Connor distinctly stated that he found no evidence of a combine in all his investigation of the 110 cold storage plants in Canada; that he found no evidence of hoarding or excessive accumulation, and that the management of the various cold storage plants in Canada had not materially contributed to the enhanced prices of cold storage commodities. He, himself, had in this report recommended that an expert accountant should be employed to make a further investigation to get the details of what he calls "margins."

He pointed out distinctly in his report that he was unable to ascertain what the net profits were until he had particulars of the margin, the margin including, in the case of a cold storage plant, overhead charges, cost of delivery and cost of selling the goods. In the case of bacon, about which there has been so much said, the margin includes the cost of delivery in Liverpool, a very important item. In reading Mr. O'Connor's report, you must bear in mind that he is not speaking of net profits; that it will be necessary to ascertain the particulars of these margins in order to find what the net profits were; and that he recommends the appointment of an expert accountant for the purpose of ascertaining the details which he did not have to enable him to come to a fair conclusion.

Mr. MACDONALD: Did not Mr. O'Connor have appointed what is known as a cost accountant purely for the purpose of ascertaining cost? There is a very great difference between a cost accountant and an auditing accountant.

Mr. CROTHERS: The accountants we have are not going to confine their operations to ascertaining the cost of these materials. The order in council requires them to ascertain the net profits amongst other things.

Mr. MACDONALD: That is impossible.

Mr. CROTHERS: The net profits involve the particulars of the margin.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Why has not the department, when the question of foodstuffs is so vital to the public, one or more cost accounts so that the commissioner would have their services at any time to investigate any one particular thing?

Mr. CROTHERS: The commissioner does not really need an expert accountant in his daily work. He is a man who earned his own livelihood at one time as an accountant.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is, only as an accountant.

Mr. CROTHERS: I did not say as an expert accountant, but he knows a great deal about accounting. The order in council, clause 6, provides for a further investigation when we receive the answers to our questionnaires. When advisable it confers power to authorize a man in writing to make a detailed investigation on the ground, to examine witnesses under oath, if necessary, and to examine the books and so on. Mr. O'Connor, in this very report under discussion, recommended that expert accountants should be employed to complete the information which he had not received from the firms.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Did they refuse it?

Mr. CROTHERS: They either refused or failed to give the particulars. I think I stated that a few days ago. I am prepared to repeat what I said a few days ago. The first question of these questionnaires that was submitted to these men—

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is the information verified by affidavit?

Mr. CROTHERS: Yes, verified by affidavit. Supposing it was bacon, ham, butter, eggs or any of those commodities, the first question required them to give the quantities they had on hand at a certain date, beginning with 1913 and then coming down through 1914, 1915 and 1916; the quantities bought and sold and the price at which they were bought and sold during the year. That brings us down to the end of 1916, and from that time forward we have been getting a monthly report from each, as well as from the dealers of anthracite coal, sugar, cold storage commodities, canned goods and so on. The question requires them to state the quantities they had at the beginning of the month of each one of these commodities, and there is a column in which they are required to set down the cost of the material laid down in the cold storage warehouse including freight and unloading charges. The next question requires them to give the cold storage cost, the cost of delivery and overhead charges. In answer to the next question they are required to give the quantities sold for home consumption and the price, and the quantities exported and the price. They failed to answer that particular question as to cost in cold storage, overhead and delivery charges. They said they could not do it. As a matter of fact, they did it two or three days after this report was laid on the Table, as those who read the statement in the Citizen and other papers know.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Is the minister satisfied they could not give that information?

Mr. CROTHERS: Well, they gave it two or three days afterwards in the newspapers. You will have noticed that they gave particulars of the margin—the margin being the difference in the cost of buying and selling.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What is the explanation? Why did they refuse this information to your officer?

Mr. CROTHERS: I am not prepared to say why but they did not give it. Mr. O'Connor recommended in his report that an expert accountant be appointed to ascertain what the net profits really were. We have appointed for that purpose Mr. Brodie, the leading member of the firm of Price, Waterhouse and Company, and Mr. Clarkson, the senior member of the firm of Clarkson, Dilworth and Company, accountants of Toronto. They are both firms of national reputation. I have no doubt they will make a thorough investigation and give a report which will command the confidence of the whole people. I am not here for the purpose of defending the William Davies Company but I am here for the purpose of seeing in so far as possible that the report made by Mr. O'Connor is not misrepresented. I am anxious that the whole of the evidence should go in. I had in my mind, when the order in council was passed last November, the idea that if we got these statements under oath for the four years and from month to month afterwards it would be a great check on business and would go a long distance to prevent any undue enhancing of prices. I have great confidence in publicity. I believe the work of the department has done a great deal in that direction already. This report will do a great deal to keep profits down to where they ought to be. We are continuing to get reports every month and we expect to continue on that line.

The hon. member for Richmond pointed out that according to Mr. O'Connor, with the smaller dealers, the margin did not rise as rapidly as it did with the William Davies Company for instance. That is very easily explained. The small dealers were not exporting their stuff to Liverpool. Any one who knows anything about the condition of trade knows that ocean freight rates have gone up by leaps and bounds during the last year or two.

It costs eight times as much to transport sugar from Cuba to Montreal as it did before the war. I do not know what the proportion is for the carrying of bacon across the Atlantic, but it is reasonable to suppose that the ocean freight has risen very rapidly, and that would tend to widen the spread or margin between cost and delivery price in Liverpool.

It was said that some statements which I made on the 4th June were in conflict with Mr. O'Connor's report. Nothing can be further from the fact than such a statement. I was then combatting an argument made by the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McCoig) that because this company—as was stated in a telegram which the hon.

member had received, which was subsequently denied by the president of the company—had endeavoured to insure $2,000,000 worth of commodities in their cold storage warehouse, therefore there was excessive storage and hoarding. I then gave the figures for several months back and demonstrated that the company were buying and selling $3,000,000 worth per month, so that, even if the statement contained in the telegram had been true, the quantity mentioned would have represented the buying and selling of that company for only half a month. I did not deal with margins, profits or prices. Mr. O'Connor, in the last words of his report, said that he found no evidence of a combine or of hoarding or of excessive accumulation. Thus there was no conflict between my statements and Mr. O'Connor's findings.

Mr. MACDONALD: Would the minister tell me where Mr. O'Connor makes that recommendation of further investigation?

Mr. CROTHERS: On page 4. He there says:

> Nor have I omitted to check the returns as to exports by the customs figures, nor to check those given from time to time as to domestic sales by examination of the actual invoices of purchasers, extraneously obtained. Further, in response to many suggestions from such companies that I personally attend and examine their books, I have caused it to be known that in due course an expert accountant will in all likelihood attend for this purpose. You will be aware that I have already recommended such action, for the purpose of verification and especially of securing an accurate computation of the profits upon by-products. I make the preceding statements to justify the claim that the figures hereinafter appearing may be accepted as highly reliable.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, the real purpose of this discussion is to ascertain whether or not the Government took the proper action on the O'Connor report. The contents of that report were of such a character that the Government should have taken action on it at once. What was the O'Connor report for? It was the report of a commission appointed by this Government, not for the purpose of amusement or of juggling with figures, but, surely, with a view to bringing about improvement in existing conditions. Shortly after this Government came into power I heard the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) inform a delegation that the Government was the physician of the nation. I did not think it was a very bad thing for the nation to have a physician, provided they had the right kind, a man who was capable of making a proper diagnosis and afterwards applying the proper remedies. Shortly after this I said in the House that this Borden Government physician should never have passed an examining board and should never have been licensed to practise in this country; that it had never shown any evidence of ability to prescribe for the nation.

If this O'Connor Commission had any purpose whatever it was to diagnose the condition of the country in relation to prices. The patient whom the Government was called upon to diagnose and treat was the ordinary consuming public who have to live on what little earnings they can make. After a great deal of bombardment from this side of the House, without any action by the ministers, after it had been stated by them that the investigation would be perfectly senseless—that it would be like trying to stop the tide in the Bay of Fundy to try to do anything to regulate prices—they at last went through the formality of appointing a commission. One of the commissioners was Mr. O'Connor, who was sent to make a diagnosis of the poor people who were very sick because prices were so high that they were not able to purchase proper food. Dr. O'Connor brings in a diagnosis and prescribes to his druggist, the Minister of Labour, that certain things should be done, certain medicines should be given to these profiteers that would make them give more reasonable prices. The ordinary person, having received such a prescription from his physician would use it in the hope that some remedy would avail.

Mr. McKENZIE: Yes, just as if a diagnostician recommends a further diagnosis to get further information.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes, just as if a diagnostician or a doctor had said: You will give the patient this medicine just now, and on the third day you can give him something else. Instead of going on with the prescription and doing something to relieve the patient, whose fever was up to 103 or 104, whose condition was likely to call, not for a doctor but for an undertaker unless something was done, what did the great physician at the head of the department say? He said, "Dr. O'Connor, we must not act upon your prescription."

Mr. CROTHERS: But we did act upon it.

Mr. McKENZIE: He said, "Doctor, we called you in, you have passed the board, and you are part of the machinery we are providing as physicians for the nation; nevertheless, although I am not a doctor, and I did not do anything to prescribe for the people, we must not act upon your diagnosis, and your prescription must not be carried out".

Mr. CROTHERS: But we did act.

Mr. McKENZIE: The learned doctor at the head of the Government said to the patient, whose condition was as I have described, "My dear fellow, you are very bad, Doctor O'Connor has prescribed for you, it is true, but I understand that within three months there is going to be a gathering in Toronto of the medical fraternity for the whole of the people of Canada, we will wait until we submit Dr. O'Connor's diagnosis and prescription to the gathering of the medical association. They may possibly tell us whether or not you will be benefited by his prescription. You may die in the meantime, but nevertheless, that is the course we are going to take". That is exactly the position in which they find themselves. Mr. O'Connor is called in, and makes a report. He says that certain things shall be done for the alleviating of the present conditions, so that the fishermen, or lumbermen, or farmers will be able to make a hundred cents earn as much as possible. All that suggestion is thrown to the winds, and we are to wait until it suits the heads of those great concerns such as Sir Joseph Flavelle, to come down from their mighty positions and give us the evidence which he thinks will bear out his contention, and let the poor men and women, who are looking for something to feed their children, go to the dogs. Who cares? They do not count for much. They may not have votes, and we are going to bring in a new Franchise Bill which will put them all through the mill, and if they are doubtful, they will be thrown in the waste, and make effective any opinion they may have about our conduct. Sir Joseph is an important factor, although the Minister of Labour may not care very much about him; but there is a "Minister of Elections," and he requires certain funds, and it must not be forgotten that when Sir Joseph Flavelle is called upon for a contribution, it can be put to him that he had things pretty much his own way. A moment ago we were told by the Minister of Labour that certain questions were put to Sir Joseph Flavelle as the head of the Davies Company. I do not know whether the "Davies," whose name is mentioned, cuts any figure or not. I do not know whether he is alive or not. It may be the name of an old firm. However, we know that Sir Joseph Flavelle is the head and front of the whole business, and with him we have to reckon. The hon. Minister of Labour is a lawyer of distinction, in practice for many years; and he knows, as well as he knows anything about the practice of the Court, that interrogatories are sent out to the defendant, or to a witness in the ordinary lawsuit, which are exactly the same thing as those questionnaires the Government are sending out. If a witness answers an interrogatory under oath in a certain way, that is the end of it as far as that trial is concerned. That witness will never be permitted to change that answer. In this matter a question was sent to Sir Joseph Flavelle, asking: What are your overhead expenses? What is the difference between your gross cost and your net cost, or your gross profit and net profit? According to the minister, he answered: I do not know; I cannot tell. According to every rule, in every proper court of inquiry in the country, Sir Joseph Flavelle is held to answer that he does not know. He cannot change it.

Mr. CROTHERS: Perhaps it would not be quite fair to deal with Sir Joseph Flavelle personally. These questionnaires were sent to the limited liability companies, and the affidavit in this case was made by the manager of the company and not by Sir Joseph Flavelle.

Mr. McKENZIE: The manager is the spokesman for the company and swears for the company, and, according to the minister, he swears that they cannot answer those questions. Mr. O'Connor went on without this information. He did everything he could to obtain it, but never got it. I am told he compared their overhead expenses with the everyday expenses of others, the only thing he could do. They refused to give him the information, and he used the information of other people in the same business, in the same locality, dealing in provisions similar to those which Sir Joseph Flavelle dealt in; and, basing his calculations upon this information, he reaches a certain conclusion. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the people of this country, that if ever any action was to be taken upon this report that would be beneficial to the masses of the people, it should be taken without the slightest hesitation, or without the slightest further consideration for any company which refuses to give the information when requested to do so. The minister, speaking in this House on the 20th July, said that it was only a day or two after the report of Mr. O'Connor was laid upon the Table that abundance of information was sent broadcast in the press. If this company, through their medium, swears that they had no information and could not get it on one day, and the next day give us abundance of information, in the ordinary case that would be perjury. If a man one day swears he has not the information, and refuses to give it, and gives it abundantly the next day, in ordinary parlance that is perjury.

Mr. CROTHERS: I do not think the hon. gentleman wants to be unfair to anybody, but I do not think he is quite fair in this matter. I am not concerned with anything except to get out the facts, but it is hardly fair to the company to say that in a day or two the information was sent broadcast. I think it was some weeks between the time they failed to give this information and the time it was published broadcast, as the hon. gentleman states.

Mr. McKENZIE: I meant a day or two between the time the O'Connor report was laid on the Table and made public and the furnishing of the information in the newspapers. I think that is what the hon. gentleman said.

Mr. CROTHERS: I thought you said, from the time they refused to give it.

Mr. McKENZIE: There was a few days between the time the report was laid on the Table and the time this information appearing in abundance in the press.

Mr. CROTHERS: I think that is right.

Mr. McKENZIE: If I were addressing a jury upon evidence of that kind I would tell them, if it was in my interests to do so, that those people had suppressed the evidence for improper purposes, and that when they did give it, no attention should be paid to it—that they were liars from the beginning; they were not to be believed; no weight should be given to their evidence.

Mr. CROTHERS: As a judge, my hon. friend would not, I am sure, put it that way to the jury.

Mr. McKENZIE: A judge would have to tell the jury this: This witness has sworn that he does not know anything, and he has already sworn that he knows something. It is for you to say, gentlemen; it is a question of fact; the credibility of the witness is a question for you, and I leave it to you. When my hon. friend goes on the bench that is what he will have to tell the jury in a case of that kind, and I assure him that his ruling and direction will be sustained by the Supreme Court.

Mr. CROTHERS: My hon. friend has had some experience; I am sure that when he was on the bench he never put it to the jury in that way.

Mr. McKENZIE: If I put it in any other way I should be misdirecting them and their verdict would not stand. No litigant who behaved as the Flavelle Company behaved in Mr. O'Connor's investigation would ever be allowed to come forward with fresh evidence. They had their opportunity; they were given these questionaires to answer; they swore that they had given all the information they had. Then they sat back to see what the commissioner would do. They hoped that he would say: I cannot make out a full report as far as these people are concerned; I have not the necessary data. But Mr. O'Connor is a keen lawyer. He did the very best he could. He took parallel cases, and, using the evidence that he gathered in these parallel cases, he made a final report as to what the profits were. Then the howl came; then came the rush, like that of the Gadarene swine, to the Government. They said: "We have nothing to do with this man; away with him; crucify him! Give us an absolutely new court; this objection which may be clearly urged against us will not apply to a new court. We have no right to come into Mr. O'Connor's court; we have barred ourselves from it; there is no law of evidence or practice by which we can come in. Give us a new court, and we will come in with the new evidence." Whatever may be said about judges and lawyers, they have the best and clearest system of making inquiries or investigations of this kind. I repeat that once a litigant refuses to give certain evidence he cannot come into court and make use of that information. But even if the company had thrown up their hands and said: We do possess the information; we are willing to give you the evidence to complete Mr. O'Connor's report—what should have been done? The minister should have told Mr. O'Connor: Open your court; take in these witnesses; withhold the report that you are about to make or make a supplementary report; take this evidence down, and then make your report accordingly. Surely that is what would have been done in any inquiry being carried on in a judicial way. Evidence was required on only one point, as to the difference between the gross profits and the net profits. Surely that is a matter of only very short inquiry. Mr. O'Connor says, pages 31 and 32:

> No specific data is given upon the point of storage costs, because it is believed that a special investigation is required into the value of the by-products of meat, and that some compulsorily applicable cost accounting system of storage and other costs on specific commodities should be established. The present storage charges are such as are arbitrarily fixed by the different companies and levied against their commodities. The existing intricate system of storage charging can best be investigated at the same time, and possibly a legal scale of charges can thereafter be established. The project of providing such an expert examination is under way.

That does not mean that a new court is necessary under a new order in council, and a new investigation beginning at the very foundation of things. The minister tells us that Mr. O'Connor suggests the constituting of this new commission. I do not think that Mr. O'Connor's words can be understood in that way. He simply says that an inquiry should be made into one single phase of the question and that the project of providing such expert examination is under way; that is, an examiner is being appointed by his own department. When that portion of evidence was furnished, the whole thing was complete; that was an end of it. I cannot agree with the course now taken by the Government. They are throwing away entirely the six months' labour of this faithful servant of the Labour Department. They are discrediting his report, saying that it cannot be accepted as arriving at a true conclusion. Accordingly, a new court is established, which will start all over again. The minister objected strongly this afternoon to my even suggesting that the matter would be kept indeterminately in the air by the holding of one investigation on top of another. I must confess that that is what it looks like. If the person who is affected by an investigation howls somewhat loudly when the report comes in, a new commission is appointed and from six to nine months' respite is given to the offender, who can go about without even seeking one dollar of bail.

I suppose the Minister of Labour did not know that a judicial inquiry had been promised in this matter. We discussed this subject on the night of July 20, and the next morning a dispatch was published over the signature of the Prime Minister promising a judicial investigation.

Ordinarily speaking, one would expect a judicial investigation to be an investigation held by a judge. It may not be that. The minister shakes his head as much as to say that it does not require a judge. That is just what I wanted him to do. Mr. O'Connor is just as good a lawyer as Mr. Henderson every day in the week, and, in making that statement, I do not detract in the slightest degree from Mr. Henderson's ability as a lawyer. I know nothing about his ability, but it does not disrespectfully compare or diminish the ability of any lawyer in Ontario to compare his ability with that of Mr. O'Connor as a practising barrister. If Mr. Henderson's investigation is a judicial inquiry simply because a lawyer is presiding over it, what sort of an inquiry is that held by Mr. O'Connor? Is not the one just as judicial as the other?

Mr. CROTHERS: The word "judicial" is not confined to a judge or a lawyer. The broader meaning of the word "judicial" is thorough, impartial, discriminating.

Mr. McKENZIE: Therefore, an officer appointed by my hon. friend was indiscriminating, partial and unfair? Is that the testimonial that the minister gives his officer, Mr. O'Connor?—

Mr. CROTHERS: That does not follow at all.

Mr. McKENZIE: —he was not fair; he was not impartial; he was not discriminating—

Mr. CROTHERS: That will not go down at all.

Mr. McKENZIE: —therefore, we will get Mr. Henderson who will be fair, who will be discriminating, who will be judicious,— I am sorry that the Minister of Labour cannot possibly keep my good friend Mr. O'Connor in the service, according to the testimonial that he gives him to-night, and that the minister must go outside for that excellent quality of fairness which he requires in officials. If we are having a judicial inquiry now, we had a judicial inquiry before, and if the only evidence of termination of this matter is that we are having a judicial inquiry now, that termination is not a particle closer than it was when Mr. O'Connor started out on his investigation six months ago. The Henderson commission adjourned to-day for two weeks. I fear that the young ones amongst the thousands of poor people in this country who are looking for more bacon, more flour, more of the good things of this earth to eat, will be in their little coffins before we get any remedy or relief from the Department of Labour.

Mr. CROTHERS: Does my hon. friend think it quite fair simply to say that there was an adjournment for two weeks without telling the whole of the matter, namely, that the adjournment was to permit the two expert accountants to examine the books? Does not my hon. friend think, in fairness, he should have added that?

Mr. McKENZIE: What is the good of the questionnaires? What is the good of the sworn testimony of those men? That is where the trick comes in; that is how this thing can go on interminably. There is no trouble in the world to send men to examine the books if further delay is required. The minister, a month or so ago, told us at great length about the extreme care that he took in getting replies by means of those questionnaires, and explained that people were obliged to swear to their answers. If I were in the minister's place and were looking for remedy and relief for the suffering masses of this country whom I was representing, I would draw the line at the information I received in reply to those questionnaires, and I would act upon the information I received in that way and the decision based upon it by my officer, to the relief of my people. If the other side was not satisfied, I would leave it for them to propound and work out their remedy against my action the best way they could, and I would not let my people suffer and give those men carte blanche to go on as long as they liked, and, with the outfit they have chosen themselves, to prolong this investigation indefinitely until perhaps the war is over and conditions have changed altogether. There is no justification for the course the minister has taken. The O'Connor report should have been acted upon. The people expect the minister to act upon it. And there is something the Government could do to better the conditions of things if they wanted to do so. If anyone reads the discussion that took place in this House on the 20th of July, as appears on pages 3798, 3799 and 3800 of Hansard, between the Minister of Labour, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean), the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) and myself, he will see that everything that has been stated here to-night as to the reasons for Mr. O'Connor's report being delayed, etc., is absolutely clear and fair, and that not a word is added to what was said at that time by the minister.

The Minister of Labour, in his remarks before six o'clock, wanted the House and the country to understand that Mr. O'Connor found things all right and that he found fault with nothing. In one place the minister finds Mr. O'Connor judicious and fair, and in other places he finds himself under the necessity of constituting another court because Mr. O'Connor was not judicious nor fair. Perhaps he was not judicious and fair when he said, in the second paragraph of his conclusions:

> Individual instances of profiteering occurred during the year 1916. These I have already identified. If they had occurred during the present year, since the provision of the Order in Council under which I am acting in the making of these investigations, I would consider it my duty to recommend that the facts be laid before the proper attorney general for his consideration as to their criminality.

That is a very sweeping statement from an officer appointed by the Department of Labour to make a fair report, and I am sure he made a fair report. What was Mr. O'Connor looking for? He was not looking for the ordinary class of thefts; he was looking for dealings in the commodities of life in this country, and he finds that bacon, flour and butter were sold in Canada at such prices that the transactions were of a criminal character, and he hands that report to the Minister of Labour, who is the guardian angel of the labouring classes. This guardian angel, instead of acting on that report, calls in another tribunal, and he is waiting to take action until, so to say, the medical association passes judgment on the diagnosis of Dr. O'Connor, who has told him that the conditio is desperate, and that immediate action is necessary. If there ever was a case of the doctors differing and the patient dying, it is the case before the minister, and in this case he refuses to take any action.

The report is a public document and the people know all about it, but everybody except the minister is willing to take action upon it. If the minister had a free hand I believe he would do something, but there are people higher up to whom he has to submit his conduct, and the Prime Minister—to whom I refer as the party higher up—without, I venture to think, consulting the minister, sends a telegram that another investigation will take place.

That investigation, of course, has to come about before the minister is permitted to do anything. Following his usual go-as-you-please plan, the Minister of Labour will not go to them unless they come to him. So we shall have a condition of "stand easy" between the report of the committee and the taking of action upon it. I suppose the minister will say when they come to him with a report, "I will do nothing at all. This is my turn for sulks. I had a report before you and you would not let me do anything upon it. Now, if you are ready to work, I am not. You can go ahead and see this thing carried through the best way you know how now." The minister may say that we on this side of the House are unfair and unreasonable and have no business to ask that anything should be done. Let that be so. But there is some evidence which I shall give to the minister to which that criticism will not apply. I have here in my hand clippings from newspapers in the province of Ontario. The first is from the Toronto Telegram, which says:

Ontario Conservatives will either see to it that Sir Robert Borden divorces his party from the very appearance of sympathy with the heaping up of war-time profits from the traffic in food products, OR an outraged people will divorce these Ontario Conservatives from their seats in Parliament.

I believe the Telegram was baptized in the same church and has taken the same sacraments, politically, as my hon. friend the Minister of Labour. He therefore cannot find fault with the orthodoxy of the evidence. Now comes a still better and more orthodox witness, the Toronto Mail and Empire, and I am sure the minister will accept this witness without his being sworn. The Toronto Mail and Empire says:

Each instalment of Commissioner O'Connor's report strengthens the case for official control of cold-storage in Canada. There is no evidence of a combine, as the charges made by different companies for the same service vary greatly. But the business is in so few hands that combination could easily be effected. As a matter of fact two or three companies handle so much of the trade in certain products that the Commissioner uses the word monopoly. The proportion of the meats, butter, eggs, and cheese exported or sold for domestic consumption that goes through the cold-storage process is so great as to surprise the public. Coming at a time when the cost of foodstuffs is pinching all but the wealthy, the O'Connor report has touched a sore spot, and raised an outcry which the Government cannot fail to hear.

People are in no mood to tolerate the making of fortunes or excessive profits out of the sale of the necessaries of life. They are disposed, with reason, to make less allowance for middlemen than for actual producers of food. The excess profits tax is designed to take for public use a large portion of any business earnings above the normal rate, but it does not, at the best, prevent a flourishing business from making wealth for its owners. This ought not to be possible in the handling or preparing of foodstuffs in this time of scarcity and privation. A Canadian policy of food control should be fearless, and should compel cold-storage companies and similar agencies to subordinate private to public interest during the crisis of the war. The cold-storage companies should regard themselves for the present as stewards of the people, performing the national and patriotic service which it is in their power to render. They should be part of the war organization of the country.

Another Conservative paper, the Toronto News, says:

The Daily News is strongly opposed to that form of unregulated competition which makes the plundering of the common people a possibility. Monopoly has been curbed in the past. It can be curbed again. Speculation in food products has been stopped in the past. It can be stopped again.

The News says a great deal more than that, but that is the sum and substance of it. These are all strong Conservative papers, and surely the minister will believe they are talking in the best interests of the people and in the best interests of the Government when they say that this thing has gone as far as it should go, and that action should now be taken on behalf of the people. When action is taken, if the profiteers and monopolists and trusts and combines have any answer to put up, they should go before the courts of the country; that is the time, and that is the only further opportunity that should be given them.

I submit that action should be taken on the O'Connor report at once, or at least as soon as the only evidence which Mr. O'Connor says was necessary to enable him to complete his report is available. Immediately upon that, proper action should be taken for the relief of the people, if relief is to be given at all. The minister may say, and it has been said by different ministers, that nothing can be done. If they had stuck all the time to that, people might have believed them; but, taking newsprint as a case in point, it is no more difficult to cut down the price of potatoes or pork than of newsprint; it is simply a matter of arriving at a figure and saying that that shall be the price and nothing higher, as was done in the case of newsprint. The only difference is that the thousands of poor women and children who are going to the grocery stores in this country have no pull, have no newspaper, have no lash over the head of the Government, and consequently they have to take the little they can get for their money. The newspapers had a lash over the Governmen 9 p.m. and when they applied for relief the Government with fear and trembling did quickly exactly what the newspapers wanted them to do. But the Government must not forget that a day of reckoning is coming, a day when the labouring man, the miner, the lumberman, the fisherman, the farmer and everybody else in the country, will have his say just as much as the newspaper barons had their say when they came and fixed the price where they wanted it to be fixed. The day is coming when the Government must account to the people for the way in which they have dealt with these matters, and therefore they should take the earliest opportunity of making their peace with the powers that be, before it be proclaimed too late. I fear, indeed, it is too late now. I fear that the Government have committed such manner and variety of sins that there is no remedy, no balm of Gilead that can relieve them from the fearful condition in which they find themselves to-day. They must go not only through the Jordan, but beyond, before the people of this country can put any confidence or trust in them

There was one matter about which the Minister of Trade and Commerce took the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte) to task for having mentioned—it was something about transportation to the old land, possibly in connection with the transport of munitions. We have a right, as the Minister of Labour to whom I am particularly addressing myself to-night well knows, to draw inferences from certain facts, and sometimes there is no stronger evidence than circumstantial evidence. Circumstances cannot lie, but persons can, as is evidenced by the manager of the William Davies Company who swore that he had no information, and now is thundering into the courts that he has abundance of information to swear to. The hon. member for Richmond pointed out that of the 169,000,000 pounds of bacon shipped out of this country during the year 1916, 108,000,000 pounds was shipped by the William Davies Company.

Another company, No. 5, which is the Matthews-Blackwell Company, found transportation out of the country for 43,000,000 pounds out of 169,000,000 pounds. The cry has been that transportation was not available, that people could not get shipping. This enormous proportion of the whole transportation of the country finds its way into the hands of this one company. Out of 169,000,000 pounds, transportation for 108,000,000 pounds gets into the hands of one man. This deduction may be absolutely wrong, but I submit it is the deduction that ordinarily we can draw from a certain set of facts. Sir Joseph Flavelle is the direct agent of the Imperial Government in this country as far as munitions are concerned. Sir Joseph Flavelle is in direct communication with the home Government. Sir Joseph Flavelle has monopolized to an enormous degree the contracts for bacon made with the home Government. What is the reason? The reason is that he was their agent, he was in touch with the Government on the other side of the Atlantic, and when he is dealing with them as their agent, giving them their munitions, the inference is that he might have let them know that he had pork to sell. That is the most natural thing in the world—"Here are the excellent munitions I have made for you and when you are going home with them, would it not be a nice thing to take some bacon along for the men? It is a proper thing to make room for this bacon in your ship and take it across."

Mr. OLIVER: It is just as necessary as munitions.

Mr. McKENZIE: It is just as necessary as munitions and it is a splendid thing that it is sent, but it is not fair to the rest of the community who are in this business. There are about one hundred concerns in this business. Ninety-nine of them cannot get ships while one out of the hundred, because of the accident of being chairman of this Munitions Board, finds an abundance of ships and has his goods carried to the other side. Perhaps there is nothing wrong about it but to the ordinary man it looks superlatively suspicious. That is all that my hon. friend from Richmond says. The air is full of that sort of thing. The right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce tells us that we must not touch the ark, that we must not touch the holy thing,—Sir Joseph Flavelle—and, with his sanctimonious air and his canonical garb of righteousness, he tells us that they have appointed a commission to push this inquiry very much further. I would remind the minister again that out of 169,000,000 pounds, 108,000,000 pounds was sent by one man, that the lion's share was sold to the home Government and that the agent of the home government on this side of the Atlantic was the man who had the stuff to sell and who did sell it. The ships that took it across were Government ships, and it would be interesting to know if he sent this pork in a ship right alongside of that in which he sent the shells or did he send them altogether in the same ship? Everybody else who wanted a ship could not get it. For that reason he had a monopoly of the whole business. That should not exist in this country. This is a place where the Minister of Labour professes to give fairplay to everybody. Everybody in this country ought to be on the same footing, but unfortunately we have a Government that is not self-possessed, a Government that is possessed by the trusts, and combines, that cannot do that good which they would desire to do but with whom evil is present as with Paul of old. They are struggling in the net and nothing will free them, until the people have a chance of passing judgment on these hon. gentlemen who are to-day misruling this country.

Mr. E. A. MACDONALD (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, I think the House and country will agree that we owe a debt of gratitude to my hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Kyte) for the very clear analysis which he made of the report of Mr. O'Connor and for the facts gathered from that report, which he placed before us in such a clear and succinct manner. We sometimes forget the perspective of the man who is earning his living and with whom the burden of existence is ever present. With respect to the item of bacon, which enters into the home life of every man in this country, we have to-day the fact that in the city of Toronto a person who buys a piece of bacon must pay 52 cents a pound. I make that statement in accordance with what we were told in this House last Wednesday by the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean). For over six months, and ever since this Parliament assembled, hon. gentlemen on this side have been pressing on the Government their duty to take up in a most drastic way this question of the cost of living. The hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) told us about these wonderful questions which were sent out and about this wonderful order in council, under which no prosecution ever has been suggested or initiated, although we have the statement here by his own Commissioner that illegal conditions have arisen under which the criminal laws should be enforced.

Mr. CROTHERS: I do not think the commissioner says that.

Mr. MACDONALD: Well, he says something pretty near that.

Mr. CROTHERS: He says that if this had occurred since the passage of the order he would have referred it to the Attorney General.

Mr. MACDONALD: He says that individual instances of profiteering occurred during 1916, and he goes on to say that if the order in council had been in force then criminal proceedings would have been taken. Within his report there is evidence which goes to show that there were transactions in regard to which prosecutions should have been initiated. My hon. friend kept on talking about this order in council and about this commissioner, whom he has had at work for the past six months and whose report he proposed getting some day, while every statement that he issued to the public indicated that the cost of living was going up. While orders in council were being passed but were not enforced, and while investigations were going on which were not concluded, prices continued to soar. Finally my hon. friend comes down to the House with a report by his commissioner in which certain definite findings are made. Without going into the details with regard to every article, let us take what he says in regard to the question of bacon. My hon. friend gives to this report his own imprimatur when he declares that this report comes from him, and that it has been submitted to Parliament as containing statements which are true. We find on page 30 of this report that a certain firm bought 65,000,000 pounds of bacon and sold 97,000,000 pounds, in round figures, at a margin of 5·05 cents per pound. The commissioner, in order to get this information, asked those engaged in the business to tell, first, the quantity of each commodity purchased during the year; second, the cost of such commodity laid down in warehouse, including freight and unloading charge, and, third, the total quantity sold during the year and the total amount for which sold. We gathered from the report that the William Davies Company, mentioned as No. 9 in this report, gave him the information called for by questions A and C, but declined to answer question B. I ask my hon. friend if the Matthews-Blackwell company gave that information.

Mr. CROTHERS: Speaking from memory, I think they did.

Mr. MACDONALD: Did the other firms give the information?

Mr. CROTHERS: I think, generally speaking, they did.

Mr. MACDONALD: As a matter of fact, did not every firm except the William Davies company answer these questions?

Mr. CROTHERS: I am not prepared to answer that.

Mr. MACDONALD: Will the minister give us to-morrow the Matthews-Blackwell company's statement in answer to question B, which the William Davies company did not answer?

Mr. CROTHERS: I think likely it is in this report; if it is not I will give it to you.

Mr. MACDONALD: I want to point out the extreme importance of the point I am endeavouring to make. The William Davies company gave to the minister, through his commissioner, this information, which is found on page 30 of this report, but they did not give him the information which would have enabled the country to have obtained all of this information without the second commission. They refused to give him the information which the minister says the Matthews-Blackwell and other people furnished. If the Davies company had given this information in answer to question B we would have had all the facts, and Mr. O'Connor could have given us, beyond the shadow of a doubt, exactly the amount which the William Davies company made, because he has given to us the amount which Matthews-Blackwell made, as he had the information relating to their case. Matthews-Blackwell's statement is given as No. 5 on page 30. Their margin was 3.65, whereas by the application of the same figures that were applied in Matthews-Blackwell case, where you add the cost of storage and the cost of delivery, which the Davies Company did not give, we find that the William Davies company made 5.05 cents profit, or nearly 2 cents a pound more than than Matthews-Blackwell did on their sales. Mr. O'Connor goes on to tell us what the margin is.

> The just character of a margin on any commodity is dependent upon (1) the expenses incurred in storing, handling and selling such commodity, (2) the demand for the commodity for export and for home consumption, and (3) the general condition of the market, so far as it affects replacement values. Storage handling and selling costs have risen somewhat but they are comparatively a fixed non-fluctuating charge.

Mr. O'Connor was able to make that statement because Matthews-Blackwell and several others of the storage people had given him the figures. He goes on to say:

> No specific data is given upon the point of storage costs, because it is believed that a special investigation is required into the value of the by-products of meat, and that some compulsorily applicable cost accounting system of storage and other costs on specific commodities should be established.

What is the significance of that statement? It is that Mr. O'Connor tells us that, applying the Matthews-Blackwell figures, the William Davies company charged over 1½ cents or nearly 2 cents a pound more for the same thing than Matthews-Blackwell charge, and which are included in their figures, 3.65. We have further this fact, that what Mr. O'Connor recommended was not a commission such as this Government has appointed, but a cost accountant who could go to the William Davies company and, by reason of his experience in cost accounting, get the exact figures which they had refused to give, although Mr. O'Connor had received them from these other people. What is the difference between an auditing accountant and a cost accountant? Every one having experience in business knows that an auditing accountant is one who examines the books kept by the accountant or secretary of a company to see whether the proper charges are made, whether the accounting is done properly and whether the profit and loss account has been correctly worked out. He never gets behind what is on the books. But the function of a cost accountant is to go into every detail connected with the cost of production. That is entirely apart from the question whether the William Davies company's books were properly carried on by their clerks. The man who is paying 52 cents for bacon is not interested in that problem, but he is interested in what their pork cost them and what price he is called on to pay for it in the finished state. Mr. O'Connor has given us what they paid for it, and what they got for it. He has received information, according to the minister—who has promised to give it us to-morrow—of what Matthews-Blackwell had to pay for cost of storing and for the intermediate handling, which would enter into the difference between the price they paid and the price they received.

The William Davies company had it but they did not give it. Why did not the minister, under the plenary powers which, if he did not possess them, could have been conferred upon him under the War Measures Act, before Mr. O'Connor's report was given to the public, exercise those rights, and why did not he demand from Davies, and compel him to furnish the information which Matthews-Blackwell and the other men furnished? But the minister did not do that. He employs a cost accountant to get the information they would not give, but which the other people did give. Mr. O'Connor says:

> Likewise as to the more aggravated, because continuous, exaction of excessive profits by another firm, on bacon; aside from the matter of legality, is this sort of thing to be considered respectable?

My hon. friend the Minister of Labour, without going to the trouble of sending for the cost accountant to get the information which he ought to have got, gives this country the report of Mr. O'Connor. He seems to be excusing Mr. O'Connor, and yet he puts his imprimatur on Mr. O'Connor's report. Either Mr. O'Connor has told us what is true, or he has told us what is not true. If he has told us what is not true, he should be dismissed; and if he has told what is true, then the minister has been derelict in his duty because he did not apply the cost accountant and get the missing data which Davies did not give him, and which Matthews-Blackwell and the others gave. If he had got that information the country would have known whether there was profiteering or abnormal profits in the storage of bacon or not. But the minister gives this report to the public, which the public are bound to accept as correct, and which, I am sure, the minister does not question, even now. I asked the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) the other day in regard to this matter, whether in dealing with this proposition and the appointment of this commission, he intended to reflect in any way upon Mr. O'Connor. The minister (Mr. Crothers) shakes his head, and agrees with that position. If that is so, where do we stand? We stand in this position; that bacon from the retail stores of this country costs 52 cents a pound; that Mr. O'Connor has reported, replying to the intermediate question, the data which he had from Matthews-Blackwell, as to the cost; and he tells us that this concern is making 5.05 a pound upon every pound of bacon which they sold.

Mr. WRIGHT: Does the Matthews-Blackwell admit the margin of 3.65?

Mr. MACDONALD: I think so.

Mr. WRIGHT: I do not think so.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend has not seen the report.

Mr. WRIGHT: The statement published in the newspapers disparaged that statement of 3.65 on bacon, just as much as the statement that Davies made 5.05 is disparaged.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend has not followed the point.

Mr. WRIGHT: The hon. gentleman has been making accusations against the Davies company, basing it on the assumption that Matthews-Blackwell made a profit of 3.65. Matthews-Blackwell repudiate that.

Mr. MACDONALD: They cannot repudiate it in view of the statement of the minister.

Mr. WRIGHT: They have repudiated it in the newspapers.

Mr. MACDONALD: This was under oath. Look at page 30 of the report.

Mr. WRIGHT: I have studied it as much as the hon. gentleman has.

Mr. MACDONALD: If Matthews-Blackwell swore to a falsehood, the hon. gentleman will stand by them, but the minister, who knows more about this than my hon. friend will agree with me that I am not stating what is incorrect when I say that these figures on page 30, under the head of "bacon," show that Matthews-Blackwell bought 49,000,000 pounds of bacon and sold 42,000,000 pounds; and paid out $7,128,476, and received $7,665,571. The average price paid by them was 14.47 cents a pound, and they received 18.03 cents a pound, and the 3.65 margin is absolutely correct. The hon. gentleman will agree with that.

Mr. CROTHERS: Yes. I think you will find in his report that Matthews-Blackwell reported two cents as the margin, and Mr. O'Connor expressed the opinion that they made a mistake, and that it must be more than that. Does that not appear in the report?

Mr. MACDONALD: Yes. If Matthews-Blackwell were correct in the figures which they gave to Mr. O'Connor, it is only a question of computation.

Mr. CROTHERS: He says it is not enough.

Mr. MACDONALD: It is only a question of ordinary arithmetic. If these figures in the report are correct, then 3.65 was the margin. Then there is the question of the intermediate point upon which the William Davies company did not give the information. That is the only thing, with the exception of the by-products, that O'Connor wanted further information upon. He had it from all the others. He applied to the William Davies company, and said, "According to those statements: you make 5.05 cents, and let us have a cost accountant." And the minister, instead of having a cost accountant and ascertaining the whole matter, as he could in a week, proceeded, unquestionably for political purposes, to appoint a commission, which will go peregrinating around the country two or three months, as the other commissions have done. In the meantime the price of bacon is 52 cents a pound, and these exorbitant profits are being obtained on the goods sold to the Allies. That is the situation. No remedy is being provided by the Government, and it is not attempted to be provided. My hon. friend does not question or discredit Mr. O'Connor's figures, or declare that they are open to suspicion; he puts upon them the impress of reliability and of truth. If those figures were questioned by the William Davies company, why was not the matter determined? Instead of grappling with this matter, and dealing with it on the basis of a report of a commissioner in whom the Government has confidence, they appoint a commission—we have probably 110 commissions appointed by this Government—and send them upon a long investigation from which perhaps they will never return—and in the meantime 52 cents is the price of bacon for the people of this country.

Mr. OLIVER: I want to discuss this question as something which is very much bigger than the William Davies company. It goes a great deal further, and calls for attention on very much more important ground. This country is face to face with a very serious condition in the matter of the cost of living. From the monthly reports issued by the Labour Department, it is clear that the cost of living in Canada has increased at least fifty per cent within the past five years. Some little time ago I made a calculation and offered it to the House, to the effect that the burden of the cost of food upon the people of Canada had increased by an amount of approximately $250,000,000 a year, as compared with five or six years ago. This is a burden on industry that can only be carried by increasing the values, or the price, of the product of industry; it is putting Canada absolutely out of the race as a country of industrial production.

Unless the cost of living to the man who depends on his industry for his living can be brought down, his wages must go up, and Canada cannot compete in the markets of the world with her industrial products.

Mr. CROTHERS: Where will the hon. gentleman go to find the cost of living less?

Mr. OLIVER: That is what we have put our friends in power for, and that, particularly, is what we maintain the Department of Labour for—to find some solution of this problem, which, I think, is very much bigger and very much wider than the William Davies company.

Mr. CROTHERS: How does my hon. friend reach the conclusion that if the cost of living in Canada is not reduced, Canada will be put out of business? Can he point to any other place where the cost of living is lower than it is here?

Mr. OLIVER: I think I can. The member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte) told the House to-day, on what I believe to be good authority, that the cost of living was less to-day in blockaded England than it was in producing Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. OLIVER: And less in blockaded France than it is in producing Canada.

Mr. CROTHERS: No, the percentage of increase in those countries is double what it has been in Canada.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend placed the figures before the House to-day. My belief is that they were correct, and that a condition exists in Canada for which there is no shadow of excuse. In years gone by the condition was not so serious, but within the past five years, as shown by the minister's own reports, the cost of living has gone up every month until it has reached a pitch that absolutely closes Canada out as an industrial country when she undertakes to compete with the rest of the world.

Mr. CROTHERS: The cost has gone up in the rest of the world just the same.

Mr. OLIVER: I say most emphatically that it has not; that Canada is to-day an example of a country more thoroughly and completely under the control of monopoly, trust and combine than any other country in the world, and more under that control in the matter of its food products than it is in regard to any other product.

Mr. CROTHERS: That is not the question at all. The question is whether the rise has been as rapid in other countries since the beginning of the war as it has been in Canada. In the great majority of cases—especially in the belligerent countries, but also in some neutral countries—the rise elsewhere has been more rapid than it has been in Canada.

Mr. OLIVER: That would be no excuse for the condition in Canada, even if it were the fact. Let us admit for the sake of argument, that it is the fact. Canada is an export producer; these countries are import consumers. In normal times, there is absolutely no parallel between the conditions in Canada, a country which is an export producer of food, and those in a country which is an import consumer of food.

Mr. CROTHERS: What about the United States?

Mr. OLIVER: Everybody knows that the cost of living is less in the United States than it is in Canada.

Mr. CROTHERS: Yet my hon. friend wanted our products to go in there free because they would get a better price.

Mr. OLIVER: Precisely, because Canada, as I say, is in the hands of the little ring of combines and monopolies, centering in Toronto and Montreal, who stand between the producer and the consumer. As a matter of fact, the producer in Canada gets less and the consumer in Canada pays more in all staple lines than is the case with the producer and the consumer on the other side of the line. About that there is no argument.

Mr. WRIGHT: Surely the hon. gentleman is aware that the difference between what the producer gets and what the consumer pays is greater in the United States than it is or ever has been in Canada?

Mr. OLIVER: There is no use in my discussing the matter with my hon. friend, because my information is absolutely to the contrary. My hon. friend can verify the facts by visiting the United States at any point along the boundary line. He will find that the staple necessaries of life are cheaper in the United States than they are in Canada, and he will find that the producer receives a better price than the producer in Canada.

Mr. WRIGHT: I may inform the hon. gentleman that I have studied the question, both in the United States and in Canada, to as great an extent as he has.

Mr. OLIVER: Then there is no use in our discussing the matter any further. I am compelled to maintain the position that I have stated; it is absolutely in accordance with my knowledge of the facts.

The minister has seen fit, and very properly, to make an investigation of the cost of food, particularly those classes of food which pass through the cold storage establishments. Such a large proportion of the food of the people does pass through these establishments that necessarily the question of the handling of the food and the profits made during the process of its passing from the producer to the consumer is an important consideration in settling the question of the high cost of living. The minister is to be commended for having appointed a commissioner as the first step in the effort of the Government, assuming it to be making that effort to reduce or secure a reduction in the cost of living and to put the Canadian consumer in the position in which he ought to be, but in which he is not, because of the existence of this combine amongst those who handle the production, preparation and distribution of food.

Mr. CROTHERS: In his report Mr. O'Connor finds that there is no evidence whatever of a combine amongst the 110 cold storage plants in Canada.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not wish to discuss Mr. O'Connor or his merits or his report; I am commending the minister for having appointed an investigator. I shall not discuss the question whether Mr. O'Connor is an efficient investigator. But it is a fact that Canada, a country of export production, has paid more for the necessaries of life under normal conditions than a consumer of the same necessaries of life three thousand miles away on the other side of the ocean.

Mr. MORPHY: Was that not true long before the war?

Mr. OLIVER: Yes. I do not know what the condition is at present. I would hope that what I have said is not true of the present, but I am afraid that it is. The member for Richmond has given figures to the House to show that it is true to-day; that notwithstanding the abnormal cost of transport across the ocean, we pay as much in Canada to-day for the products that we export as the consumer in Great Britain does. That is a condition for which there is no justification. It is not a condition which arises out of the law of supply and demand. Mr. O'Connor may find that there is no combine amongst the food handlers in Canada. I do not care what he finds in that regard. If it is a fact that the home consumer in Canada pays as much as the foreign consumer after the cost of transportation has been added, that is a condition that should not exist; it is not in accordance with the law of supply and demand, and it should be made the subject of Government regulation and control in some way. It is not for me to dictate or suggest how that control should be exercised.

But it is not a fair proposition that the Canadian consumer of a Canadian product which is produced for export should have to pay, not the same price, but a higher price than the consumer at the other end of the market across the ocean has to pay. Such a condition of things is plain highway robbery. It could not take place unless there was a combine, no matter what Mr. O'Connor says, and it is the business of the Government and of the Minister of Labour to ensure that that condition shall not continue to exist.

I commend the minister for his appointment of Mr. O'Connor, but I protest to the minister against the delay of further investigations. Mr. O'Connor was an official of the minister's department. He took long enough, in all conscience, to make his investigation. He has made his report. His report in some particulars is not very definite. He sets out a certain condition of facts which absolutely bears out what I have said in this House to-night. It is up to the Government and to the minister to take action in this matter to-day—not to-morrow, or next month, or six months hence—and to tell the House and the country what action they purpose taking.

Mr. CROTHERS: It is admitted by every one that a very important part of the expenses has not been given. The cost of cold storage, the cost of delivering the goods in Liverpool, the marine insurance and the cost of selling have not been given. Would my hon. friend have us take action before we get those particulars and know exactly what the net profits are? Those accountants have been appointed to get all those particulars so that we may have complete information.

Mr. OLIVER: If Mr. O'Connor is entitled to all the bouquets that he has been handed, having been six months on the job, he should have had complete information for the minister.

Mr. CROTHERS: He has recommended that an expert accountant be appointed.

Mr. OLIVER: I am not concerned with Mr. O'Connor; I am concerned with the minister and with the Government. Here is a report which makes a certain statement of facts in regard to a certain matter. I imagine there is no necessity for a further investigation in regard to some of those facts.

Mr. CROTHERS: The report does not pretend to be complete.

Mr. OLIVER: It ought to be complete. I hold the minister and the Government responsible for its not being complete enough to enable the Government to take action. After the report of the commission which was composed of an employee of the Government appointed by the minister, the other commission appointed is, to my mind, not a commission for the purpose of carrying out an investigation; it is a commission along the same lines as the Sir Charles Davidson Commission.

Mr. CROTHERS: My hon. friend is familiar with the order in council passed last November and with clause 6, which says, in substance, that when a return is made to me, I may appoint an examiner and authorize him to examine the books of the party and take evidence from witnesses under oath and so on. If he reads the order in council appointing these accountants, he will see that it is recited in that order that this is being done pursuant to the order in council of November last, so that this is simply carrying out the instructions we have under that order in council.

Mr. MACDONALD: Why did not the minister make the companies give the information in the first place?

Mr. CROTHERS: We might have sent an expert accountant at that time.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not wish to enter into a criticism of the details.

Mr. CROTHERS: I would like my hon. friend to go into the details.

Mr. OLIVER: The statement made by the minister is subject to the interpretation that when the first order in council was drawn it was drawn with a view to enabling a further postponement of action to take place. That is the only possible conclusion to place upon it.

To summarize what I have said, we are dealing with the biggest question that Canada has to face to-day. We have before the House a report, the result of six months' work under the direction of the minister himself, and, instead of our getting action under that report, all we get is another commission of inquiry. That is not what this country needs at the present time, and it is not what this country demands. It is not in line with the action that the same Government takes in regard to other matters. For instance, let us take the action of the Government in regard to the control of the distribution of wheat. We have appointed a Board of Grain Supervisors to control the wheat trade of Canada. They can take possession of all the wheat in all the elevators of all Canada at any time. They can sell it to whom they please, when they please, at what price they please, and they can do more than that; they can prevent the export of grain from Canada. Is that the result of an investigation by a special commissioner such as Mr. O'Connor in regard to the cold storage business? I do not know whether it is or not, but I know that this authority has been placed in the hands of the Board of Grain Supervisors and that they have taken action under that authority. There is as much money involved in the action that they take as there could be involved in dealing with those cold storage estblishments. On the 27th of July the Board of Grain Supervisors fixed a maximum price at which the wheat of the crop of 1916 could be sold after the 1st of August. Why is it not just as competent for a commissioner appointed by the Minister of Labour or by the Government to fix a price at which Sir Joseph Flavelle shall sell his bacon after the 1st of August? What is the difference? There has been much more investigation in the case of Sir Joseph Flavelle than there has been in the case of the wheat, but in the latter case the Government have taken action and in the former they have handed us a commission which simply means that they are not going to take action. Let us have action in both cases. At the moment, I am not complaining about the action in the case of the wheat, but if we are to have the greatest industry of all Canada placed under mandatory control, such as the wheat trade is placed under, then there is no reason why this other article of food should not be placed under equally mandatory control. The Board of Grain Supervisors have gone further than to fix a maximum price for wheat after the 1st of August. It seems that the price of wheat is higher in the United States than it is in Canada. My hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. Wright) will, I hope, not challenge that statement.

I find from the Ottawa Citizen of this morning that on July 28 No. 1 Northern cash wheat was worth $2.39 in Winnipeg, which is 1 cent below the maximum price as it will be after the 1st of August. In Minneapolis cash wheat was $2.90, and in Duluth $2.93. There was a difference of 50 cents a bushel between Winnipeg and Minneapolis and Duluth on Saturday last. Now, remember that the maximum price in Canada only was to take effect after the 1st of August, but the fixing of that maximum price depressed the price in Canada to 1 cent below the maximum figure, namely, to $2.39 instead of $2.40. Naturally, the owners of wheat in Canada would want to ship to the United States and get the benefit of that 50 cents a bushel. Now you can ship at least 1,000,000 bushels a day, and at 50 cents a bushel that would mean half a million dollars a day that the wheat traders could have made by shipping wheat from Canada to the United States.

Mr. CROTHERS: What would it cost to ship the wheat from Winnipeg to Minneapolis?

Mr. OLIVER: I could not tell my hon. friend, but it is just the same rate—

Mr. CROTHERS: It would not be 50 cents a bushel.

Mr. HANNA: What does my hon. friend understand by No. 1 Northern Minneapolis?

Mr. OLIVER: I understand wheat of No. 1 grade.

Mr. HANNA: Is it our Canadian Northern?

Mr. OLIVER: It is an American Northern.

Mr. HANNA: That is a different thing. Kansas wheat is coming in just now. That is the reason.

Mr. OLIVER: I think that would be a reason the other way. If Kansas wheat is coming in now it would depress the price at Minneapolis, but at Minneapolis the price was 50 cents higher than at Winnipeg for an inferior class of wheat, because their No. 1 Northern is not equal to ours.

Mr. CROTHERS: There is probably an error in the quotation from Minneapolis.

Mr. OLIVER: There is no error, because the quotation is about the same for Minneapolis and Duluth.

Mr. CROTHERS: There never was a spread of 50 cents before.

Mr. WRIGHT: Why do not our farmers simply send their wheat down there?

Mr. OLIVER: That is exactly what I was coming to. The reason is that this same Board of Supervisors have put on a prohibition against shipping wheat to the United States.

10 p.m.

Mr. HANNA: That prohibition is not in effect yet.

Mr. OLIVER: It is in effect.

Mr. HANNA: Not until the first of August.

Mr. OLIVER: It is in effect now. It was put into effect before the 1st of August to prevent this wheat going to the United States and taking that 50 cents premium in price.

Mr. MORPHY: That would be for the benefit of the working man in Canada, who would be getting food cheaper.

Mr. OLIVER: Not necessarily so. Unfortunately, the miller has the same call on the wheat that Sir Joseph Flavelle has on the hogs, and as between the price of the wheat that goes into the mill and the price of flour that reaches the consumer that is where the 25 per cent dividends of the Ogilvie Milling Company comes in. The farmer does not get the price for the wheat that the consumer pays for the flour, any more than the farmer gets the price for the hog that the consumer pays for the bacon.

Mr. WRIGHT: Flour is free.

Mr. OLIVER: No.

Mr. CROTHERS: Yes, it is.

Mr. OLIVER: Admitting that flour is free, bran and shorts are not free, anyhow. As a matter of fact the Government has taken authority, and has exercised that authority, in regard to the most important product that Canada has, absolutely to control the price, and not only the price but the sale also. It is not simply that they have taken the power, but they have exercised that power, and it is costing the holders of wheat in the West at the rate of half a million dollars a day from the time it was put into effect up to the 1st of August. I am not arguing at the moment whether that was wise or unwise, right or wrong. Although I hold that it was wrong as wrong could be, yet, for the purpose of my present argument, all I say is that the Government that could put its hand on the product of a western farm, first to fix a maximum price and next to prevent its export, when it was not prepared to handle the wheat or to protect the Canadian consumer in the milling of that wheat, has no warrant for saying that it cannot regulate the price of bacon just as it could regulate the price of wheat.

Mr. MORPHY: Would the hon. gentleman be in favour of the Government fixing an arbitrary price of $1.50 a bushel for Canadian wheat instead of $2.40? That would be for the benefit of the working man.

Mr. OLIVER: I am not discussing that at the moment.

Mr. MORPHY: Would you advocate that?

Mr. OLIVER: I shall have to allow my hon. friend to make his own speech, and ask him to allow me to make mine. What I want to say is that the Government cannot shelter itself behind all kinds of commissions from dealing with this question of the high cost of living, as it is affected by the abattoirs and the cold storage establishments, when the Government had taken means to control the price of that other great food product, the wheat of the western farmer. What they can do in the one case they can do in the other, and if they were wrong to do it in the one case, they should not do it in the other.

My hon. friend asked me about the cost of wheat and flour to the eastern consumer. Does he suppose that the eastern consumer gets that flour at the price the farmer gets for his wheat, any more than the eastern consumer gets his bacon at the price the farmer gets for his hogs? No, he knows that standing between the producer and the consumer is the miller in the case of wheat, and the pork packer in the case of bacon. Does he not know that the price the farmer gets for his wheat or hogs has no relation to the price the consumer pays for his flour or bacon?

Mr. MORPHY: My idea is that in view of the high cost of living the Government has been far too generous in fixing the maximum price for wheat at $2.40 a bushel. I think if the price had been fixed at $2 or $1.75 or $1.60, it would have been a very very advantageous price for any farmer to get for wheat for which he had only been getting $1 or $1.10 a bushel. If any one should complain, it is not the farmer in the West, but the working man. In my opinion the price is altogether in favour of the farmer.

Mr. OLIVER: That is not the point I was discussing.

Mr. MORPHY: That was the point I was discussing.

Mr. OLIVER: It is quite competent for my hon. friend to say what the western farmer should get for his product.

Mr. MORPHY: The high cost of living does not matter?

Mr. OLIVER: The point I make is that no matter what the farmer gets it is not what the consumer pays, and that the eastern consumer pays without regard to what the western farmer obtains.

Mr. MORPHY: You say so.

Mr. OLIVER: It is the fact. Where do these pork-packing establishments and these milling companies get their dividends if they do not get them out of the producer on the one hand or the consumer on the other? What this Government should do is not to prevent the producer from getting a fair price for his product, but they should prevent the middleman, the miller, the pork packer and the cold-storage man, from stealing from the producer on the one hand and from the consumer on the other. That is the duty of the Government, and the Government would be well advised to take that position. I must say to my hon. friend that, in my humble judgment, he is very unfortunate in making the suggestion as to a limitation with regard to the price that the producer of the West should receive for his wheat. In this particular season, it is to be regretted, but I am afraid it is likely to be true, the western farmer will receive a very small return on the amount of his crop. If he gets $2 or $2.50 for his wheat, it will not give him a return such as he could get a few years ago at a much less price. That is unfortunately the condition, and why should not the western farmer, with that unfortunate condition looming up this year, get the price that the markets of the world will afford him? You ask the western farmer to increase his production, but the only way you can get him to increase it is to give him a profit on the production he has. It is a short-sighted and most unfortunate policy on the part of the Government that they should exercise that power which is placed in their hands for the purpose of deliberately depressing the price of the farmer's product below the price that the markets of the world properly afford. Such action cannot be justified under any circumstances, and particularly it cannot be justified under the circumstances of this present year. I am perfectly satisfied for the Government to have the control that it has under the War Measures Act. I am perfectly satisfied that it should exercise that control under certain circumstances. But I say that when it exercises that control under the circumstances which, unfortunately for the country, exist this year, it is not justified and should not exercise it at the present time. But having exercised that control as they have, it is utterly and absolutely without excuse that they allow the pork barons to go on heaping up profits as they have done and taking them out of the producer and the consumer, one or the other. It is not only in the case of wheat that my hon. friends have seen fit to act. They fixed the price of newsprint paper. I am sorry that my hon. friend from Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea) is not here, because if he had been he would have enlightened the House on that matter. But the Government fixed the price of newsprint and then they held an investigation. In the case of pork they neither fixed the price nor held an investigation that has any termination to it. There is only one answer to all that, and it is that the Government is part of that combine, which to-day is putting Canada out of business as an industrial country, is making the rich richer and the poor poorer, and notwithstanding the flood of war money is leaving the country worse off than it was before.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN (Halifax): What are the powers of the Food Controller? Has he the power to fix the prices of food commodities?

Mr. CROTHERS: I would not like to undertake to say offhand. His powers are very fully defined in the order in council appointing him. I think he has power under certain circumstances to fix prices, but I would not like to state it without having the order before me. It is a rather lengthy document.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I would suggest that the minister acquaint himself with the powers granted the Food Controller because the investigation of Mr. O'Connor will be for nothing unless there is somebody to enforce the recommendations of his report. Mr. O'Connor, on page 62, states that:

> Now that a Food Controller has been appointed and very close co-operation established between that official and this branch of this department, I consider myself relieved from the making of any suggestions as to the amelioration of conditions as I may find and disclose them, deeming that the function of action concerning food prices and food conditions, as distinguished from that of investigation, is now his to perform, and that any recommendations of mine, even though valueless, or because so, might prove embarrassing. He will be furnished with a copy of this report, and all data secured on the investigation or to be secured will be (as he has requested, and as you as minister have directed) will be at his disposal.

I assume that when Mr. O'Connor made this report he felt that he was not in a position to make recommendations for the amelioration of the conditions which he was investigating for the reason that immediately before making his report a food controller had been appointed who would have absolute authority to regulate prices. If the minister does not know whether the food controller has these powers, and if this report has not been transmitted to him, the work of the commissioner is absolutely valueless. I would like to ask the minister what he proposes doing in this regard? Surely he does not mean that his commissioner shall do work that is unproductive and useless to the nation? The report has been before Parliament for some weeks, and surely that report has come into the hands of the food controller for action.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would like to remind the hon. gentleman (Mr. A. K. Maclean) that the minister (Mr. Crothers) has exhausted his right to speak.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: My hon. friend, the Minister of Labour may speak with the consent of the House, and I am sure there will be no objection to his again having an opportunity to speak. I have one other word to say before the minister rises to make any reply. This report has made it abundantly clear that this second investigation is absolutely unnecessary and purposeless. Mr. O'Connor has made it very clear in his report that he did not attempt to find what were the net profits of those engaged in connection with the food products which he has had under investigation. He makes it much clearer than I thought he had—my information was largely from the newspaper summaries of the report that he was dealing merely with the margin between the buying and selling prices. He recommends that to ascertain what were the actual net profits an accountant be employed. That is a very fair recommendation, and with the assistance which in this particular case the William Davies Company could render the accountant the whole matter could be closed up, I would imagine, in the course of a few days. Therefore, as the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) and the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) pointed out, a commission seems to be absolutely unnecessary and serves no good purpose; it means an expenditure of money by the country and delays action on the part of the minister or the food controller. I think the minister should rescind the appointment of the commission by the Government. It is not too late for him to recall the appointment. All the information could have been secured by the appointment of one cost accountant. I submit that the minister has not justified the appointment of this commission. It seems to have been appointed to suit the purposes of one of the manufacturing concerns whose business operations were the subject of investigation by Mr. O'Connor. They seem to have demanded it and the Government seem to have acceded to their request, but I say that there was no reason or purpose in doing so.

Mr. CROTHERS: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: By the unanimous consent of the House there can be no objection to the courtesy being extended to the minister of a reply; but if there is any objection it is not competent for him to speak again.

Mr. CROTHERS: I do not desire to take up any time, especially at this late hour. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) is labouring under a misunderstanding. I do not think he was here when I spoke about clause 6 of the order in council passed last year which authorizes a further examination by an examiner or examiners under oath, the production of books, and so on. My hon. friend will find that the men whom he calls the commission were appointed by reason of clause 6 of the order in council.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is the authority for the appointment. I ask, why was not the matter further investigated by Mr. O'Connor?

Mr. CROTHERS: Mr. O'Connor recommended that an expert accountant be got for the purpose.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: But not a commission.

Mr. CROTHERS: We do not call these commissioners; they are examiners. Messrs. Brodie and Clarkson are two of as expensive men as you can find in Canada. They, like Mr. Henderson, are working for nothing, as a contribution. Does my hon. friend suggest that these three men will waste time in order to delay the report? No, they will go through the books as expeditiously as possible, and they are doing so now.

Mr. ROSS: May I ask a question?

Mr. SPEAKER: The minister has exhausted his right to reply, but by courtesy he has been allowed to continue. That courtesy cannot be extended indefinitely because the rules are quite specific.

Mr. ROSS: I want only to ask a question.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is quite within his rights in asking a question, but the minister is not permitted to answer it.

Mr. ROSS: He was still speaking when I arose.

Mr. SPEAKER: He was not speaking, he arose to reply to a question by courtesy. The minister spoke this afternoon.

Mr. ROSS: I can speak with the minister on another occasion.

Mr. CROTHERS: Any time.

WIDENING OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND RAILWAY.

STEAMERS BETWEEN ISLAND AND MAINLAND.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES (Kings, P.E.I.): Mr. Speaker, I was very much disappointed this afternoon at the answers of the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane) to the questions I asked him. I feel satisfied that the people of Prince Edward Island will also be much disappointed. The minister seems to lack knowledge in regard to transportation conditions between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, and in regard to the quantity of produce that should be moved from that province to the mainland, and the very short period of time, under present conditions, given to the people to move it. Previous to 1911 we were making some progress in the improvement of our transportation facilities. A company having a small subsidy of $12,000 a year had supplied two very efficient steamers to carry on the trade in the summer season, and the Government had provided two very capable ice-breaking steamers to do the work in the winter season. Shortly after the present Government came into power they undertook to change these conditions and to improve the system, which had not been giving entire satisfaction. They decided to establish the car-ferry system, that is to provide a steamer to carry loaded cars between the island and the mainland. We were told that this could be finished in two years, and that then the Prince Edward Island Railway would be standardized to conform with the gauge of railways on the mainland so that cars could be loaded at the point of shipment and carried right through, loaded to the point of destination. This would avoid the heavy charges and delay caused by the double transfer of freight between car and boat. This promise of standardizing the gauge was repeated by the Government year after year. Considerable delay was experienced in the building of the terminals, but we were looking forward to improvement when they should be completed. In this expectation the people of the island submitted without protest to the sale of the two winter steamers to the Russian Government. It was pointed out too that it was for war purposes, and we were willing to submit to a good deal if it was to the advantage of the Allies in the great conflict. We were thus asked to make a greater sacrifice than any other province was asked to make, and we submitted without a murmur.

When the contract with the company to which I have referred terminated, the Government did not renew it, and they allowed one of the steamers, the better one, owned by the company, to be sold and to leave the service altogether. The Government bought the inferior one and kept her in the service. We are told by the Minister of Railways that the Government has no intention whatever of proceeding with the standardizing of the Prince Edward Island railway. He has not even stated that it would be undertaken at some time in the future, he held out no hope whatever. The car ferry will be of little or no use to the people of that province, until the gauge on the Island railway is widened, made to correspond with the gauge of the railways on the mainland. We will still have to transfer from car to car, and again from car to car, which will be no improvement over the former system, when we had to transfer from car to steamer, and from steamer to car. The minister intimated that we might not even have the use of the steamers now plying between Summerside and Point du Chêne, and the small steamer plying between Charlottetown and Pictou, once the car ferry comes into operation. If these steamers are taken off, and if we have to depend entirely on the car ferry under the conditions I have pointed out, transportation will be practically tied up altogether, and the people of Prince Edward Island will not be able to market their produce this fall. One of the great advantages of having the gauge of the Prince Edward Island railway widened would be that we could get refrigerator cars in which to load our perishable products, and therefore they would be comparatively safe during the month of November, thus extending the period of shipment. With the narrow gauge railway, we shall be obliged to ship to the terminal points in the ordinary cars, subject to frost and rot, but chiefly subject to frost, and subject to all the conditions that may be occasioned in that way. Last season a very large quantity of potatoes were frozen in transit, just because of the conditions that I have pointed out, and these potatoes were a total loss, to the shipper in most cases. And it was an ordinary season. The railway protects itself, because it provides on the bill of lading that it will not be responsible for frost, and the shipper has to take all the risks. The minister this afternoon stated that one of the objections to widening the gauge of the railway was that the bridges would have to be strengthened. Surely that objection could have been raised at any time during the last five or six years, just as well as it can be raised now. The minister must have known that the bridges would have to be strengthened when he gave the promise time and again that the gauge of the Prince Edward Island railway would be widened. If the steamer plying between Summerside and Point du Chêne and the small steamer plying between Charlottetown and Pictou be taken out of the service, it will be simply impossible to handle the freight at any one particular point. Last year we had two steamers working at Charlottetown, the car ferry and the Stanley.

We had also the Northumberland at Summerside and yet the congestion of freight was so great, and these perishable products were kept waiting so long, that they were destroyed. They were in bad condition even before the frost arrived. They were weeks on the road. The steamers could not take them across to the mainland, and finally when they were taken over it was so late they were caught by the frost and lost completely. Last spring the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Finance advised the people in every way they could to increase production, that it was very important under the conditions in which we find ourselves to-day that the food production of the country should be increased by every possible means. The farmers of Prince Edward Island took that advice to heart, and this year the acreage under roots is much larger than it has been for many years. The crop looks well; the prospects are good, but what is the use of producing if you cannot get to market? Under these circumstances, the widening of the gauge of the Prince Edward Island railway might be fairly classed as a war measure. Food is essentially necessary for the European countries now at war with Germany. Therefore production is most important in this country. The farmers of Prince Edward Island have done their share, but if the service is to be tied up and our produce is not to be carried across the Northumberland straits, what excuse can the Government give? I know the time is short. Not much can be done this year, but at least an effort can be made to do something, and the Government should give a definite promise that the steamers the Northumberland and Arranmore will be kept in the service between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, and that all the assistance which the Government can give will be given to the people of that province to move their products this year. The Government, however, will not, and the Minister of Railways does not, give that promise; they hold out no hope whatever. The Minister of Railways seems to take the attitude, when you speak to him on a business question in the ordinary affairs of parliamentary life, that you are offending him. He gives that impression. He has an irritable disposition and becomes apparently offended right off, and almost offensive in his remarks. Perhaps he does not feel that way, but it is unfortunate when we have business to transact with him in this House. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Railways have given the excuse that money is scarce in these serious times, and when we are at war we must economize, and that is given as a reason why the standardizing of the Prince Edward Island Railway has not been undertaken. But only a few days ago $3,000,000 was voted for some work on the Hudson Bay railway and for terminals at Port Nelson. That is not an urgent matter. I doubt very much if the terminals at Port Nelson will ever be any good. My firm conviction is that all the millions which have been spent and the millions which will be spent at Port Nelson will be thrown away. At any rate, that project can wait for a little while, but the matter to which I have drawn attention is very pressing and cannot wait, without inflicting great injury and great loss upon the people of the province from which I come, and to some extent loss upon all the other provinces as well. I think this question is of greater importance and advantage to the people of Canada as a whole than the question of purchasing the Quebec and Saguenay railway.

Mr. GRAHAM: I guess you are right about that.

Mr. HUGHES: I do not know that there is any particular work for the Government to do once they take possession of the Quebec and Saguenay railway. It is certainly not going to carry any produce from Quebec to the Labrador coast or to the more settled portions of Canada. If we are short of money, as no doubt we are, that is a railway that might very well wait while we proceed with things that are of far greater importance and far greater urgency, and, at the same time, carry out the promise of the Government. The Minister of Railways does not seem to be much exercised over the fact that the Government repeatedly made promises in regard to this matter. Now he deliberately throws the project to one side. The large expenditure that has already been made in the building of a car ferry steamer and of the expensive terminals at Cape Tormentine and at Point Borden, will be of little use unless the whole work is completed. I make this statement to-night in the hope that it will reach other members of the Government, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) who, I think, would possibly take a little more interest in this matter than the Minister of Railways appears to take. This is one of the things that the members supporting the Government and the senators and all representatives from Prince Edward Island should take up with the Government; they should not allow it to go on in this way. The matter is so important to the whole of the people of that province that the Minister of Railways should not dismiss it in the cavalier manner in which he put it to one side this afternoon.

I see the senior member for Queen's county (Mr. A. A. McLean) in his seat. I know that he took a deep interest in this matter some years ago. I remember his stating at a meeting that the whole work would be completed within two years from the time that it was commenced. The hon. member may have honestly thought so at the time, but now five years have passed, and the work is not yet finished. The members from Prince Edward Island should not allow this matter to rest where it is at present. We shall have at least 3,000,000 bushels of potatoes to dispose of this fall, to say nothing of cereals and other products of various kinds. We have very valuable fisheries but we cannot develop them properly until we are able to ship in cold storage, or in refrigerator cars; and this we cannot do until the gauge of the Prince Edward Island railway is widened. What has already been done is of no use whatever until the whole project is completed. The transportation facilities that we formerly had have been upset; communication is not as good now as it was some years ago, in consequence of the disarrangement that has taken place. It will remain that way until the gauge of the railway is made to correspond with the gauge of the line on the mainland, and until we can ship right through from the point of production to the point of destination. I shall be pleased to hear from the snior member for Queens county on this subject; perhaps he knows something about it which he would wish to state to the House.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN (Queens, P.E.I.): I have listened with interest to the remarks of the member for Kings county (Mr. J. J. Hughes) in this matter. I find that he disagrees with the member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald). The member for Pictou a day or two ago expressed the view that it was not necessary to have the gauge of the Prince Edward Island railway widened; he thought that the matter should be left over until after the conclusion of the war. So that two hon. gentlemen who were supporting the Liberal Government for many years and who never did anything in the matter, differ on this subject. Now that the work has been initiated by the present Government, the member for Kings comes before this House and finds fault. I regret as much as any man that the war has come on and that this work has been stopped. I did all I could to induce the Minister of Railways and the Government to proceed with this work. I am told, however, that the cost of the war is so great and the money stringency so pressing that it is impossible to go on with these large public works. Since 1912, when the Government initiated this work, a terminal has been built at Cape Tormentine for this car ferry. The Government purchased the New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island railway, at great expense. They built on the Prince Edward Island side of the Straits of Northumberland a great public work to receive the traffic between Cape Tormentine and Prince Edward Island. They purchased a car-ferry steamer, the Prince Edward Island, at an expense of between $800,000 and $900,-

000. This boat has done great service to Prince Edward Island; she has kept up communication better than any boat we ever had. It is true that the communication was between Pictou and Charlottetown. I do not cast any reflection upon the port of Pictou, but I think that when the terminals are completed between Cape Traverse and Carleton Point and Cape Tormentine, we shall have a better service than has been had between Pictou and Prince Edward Island.

The hon. member states that the work which has been done is of no practical value, owing to the fact that the gauge of the railway has not been standardized. I do not agree with him in that. I believe that the promise made by the present Government in 1912 that they would finish this great public work will be carried out. But we must take into consideration the present money stringency; we must take into consideration the fact that a war is on, and that every cent that Canada can obtain from all the various resources at her disposal is being used for war purposes. We must remember, also, that great public works have been stopped. The works on the Welland canal and on various other undertakings throughout Canada have not been proceeded with actively. I understand that a very small sum of money is being used to keep up the work on the Hudson Bay line. The amount now being devoted to that work is infinitesimal compared with the total amount necessary to complete it. I have urged on the Government right along the necessity of at least partially completing this work by standardizing the road between Charlottetown and Carleton Point and between Summerside and Carleton Point. I think that that is all that is necessary at the present time. Different boards of trade in Prince Edward Island have made representations to the Government to standardize the gauge of this portion of the road. I understand the amount to be expended in that work would be only about $250,000. If we can show the Government that the gauge of those portions of the road can be standardized for that comparatively small amount of money, the Government would probably go on with the work. Neither I nor my colleagues have been idle in making representations to the Government to undertake that work. I can, of course, see that if an election comes on, the hon. member for Kings, P.E.I. (Mr. J. J. Hughes) will have a great big flag to wave; that he will say that the work which the Government has undertaken has fallen through, and that it will never be proceeded with. That will be his cry.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: The hon. member is obsessed with the nightmare of an election.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN: There is no justification for a contention of that kind. Considering all the circumstances, this Government have done very well by Prince Edward Island in this respect, and I do not find any fault with them. But if a small amount would complete that work in order to move the great crop which is in the province this year, and which I understand will be double the crop that was produced last year—and that was a great crop—the Government would be justified in spending the small sum of $250,000. I will ask the Minister of Militia (Sir Edward Kemp) to report to the Minister of Railways that this work should be done and to use his influence with the Government in order that this small expenditure be made so that the business of the province may be facilitated. The business there is almost equal to that of New Brunswick and equal, so far as many products are concerned, to that of Nova Scotia.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: Why does not the hon. member go to the Minister of Railways instead of sending the Minister of Militia to him? The Minister of Militia is a very busy man and, not knowing the circumstances, he could not present the case as well as my hon. friend, who knows all the local conditions.

Mr. McKENZIE: The Minister of Militia could take the local force with him.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: Why does my hon. friend send a deputy?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I think my hon. friend, when speaking, intimated that he had already impressed upon the Minister of Railways—

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: And he gets nothing.

Sir EDWARD KEMP—the importance of the project, and I will draw the attention of the minister to the very important debate that has taken place regarding this matter.

Mr. McKENZIE: The hon. member for Queens, P.E.I. (Mr. A. A. McLean) wants the point of the bayonet to be used.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY.

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Militia and Defence — Allowances, active militia corps, $80,000.

Mr. MACDONALD: While many orders for returns have been issued during the last three months in regard to this important department of Militia, the minister has not brought down any of those returns except the one that he brought down to-day relating to the expenditure on a site in British Columbia. It is usual, before Supply is obtained, that information of that kind should be given, and I am rather surprised and disappointed at not receiving it. While no one on this side of the House desires to obstruct the passage of the minister's estimates, the minister owes it to the House to bring down those returns. Time after time, there have been placed on the Order Paper questions that might easily be answered by the department through the minister, and the minister has said: "Stand as order for return," and that is the last we see of the information. That is hardly a courteous way in which to treat hon. members of this House in regard to matters concerning an important department.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Will my hon. friend let me know, if he can, any particular return he desires in reference to the militia estimates?

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister has sufficient officials in his department to look after these returns. Some time ago, I started to make up a list of them, and I found many that had been entirely disregarded. The secretary of the department is, I assume, the official to whom these matters go. Is the House to understand that when orders for returns are issued, they are not to be obeyed at all, and that when the question is brought up, we are to be asked what particular one we want before the others. We want them all, and that is what we are entitled to have.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The questions that have been asked of the Department of Militia and Defence are perhaps as numerous as those asked of all the other departments put together, and the information asked for has been forthcoming with the greatest possible celerity. There are a few returns that are not yet ready but that will be ready shortly. I placed a return on the table of the House to-day, and I shall be able to place several more on the Table to-morrow. My hon. friend is not right in stating that no returns that have been asked for have been laid upon the Table.

Mr. MACDONALD: Will the minister give the dates?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I cannot give the exact day or month, any more than my hon. friend is able to give the information asked of him; but there have been returns laid on the table of the House.

Mr. MACDONALD: Not since we met after the adjournment in February.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I am under the impression that not a single return which has any reference to the militia estimates and which has been asked for, has not been laid on the table of the House.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister will recall that it was distinctly understood that, in order to facilitate the departure of the Prime Minister in February, when the militia estimates came up, any matters in reference to the appropriations for the war could be discussed. I assume that the minister is aware of that. How many officers in uniform are employed in and around the Militia Department on staff and other duties?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The officers on the Headquarters Staff are the Inspector General of Canada, Quartermaster General, Chief of General Staff, Adjutant General, Master General of Ordnance, Judge Advocate General, Director General Engineer Services, Director General of Mobilization, a Director General Medical Services, Director General Supplies and Transport, Director General Clothing and Equipment, Director General of Musketry, Assistant Adjutant General (2), Assistant Adjutant General (1), Military Secretary, Director of Artillery, Director of Stores, Chief Inspector of Small Arms, Director General Works and Buildings, Director of Military Training, Assistant Paymaster General, Director of Military Operations, Assistant Director of Supplies and Transport, Officer for Imperial Staff at War Officer, a/Officer i/c Stores Audit, Deputy Assistant Adjutant General, Assistant Director Engineers Services, Assistant Director Military Intelligence, Assistant Director Military Surveys, Assistant Director of Signalling, Chief Instructor of Musketry, Staff Office to Inspector General.

Mr. MACDONALD: And the non-commissioned officers?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: About 175 military clerks and 75 orderly clerks.

Mr. MACDONALD: Are these men on service pay?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: They are paid according to their rank in the militia. They form part of the Permanent Force and receive the allowance paid to members of the Permanent Force.

Mr. MACDONALD: They are not really in the Civil Service, but are treated as on active service and are paid accordingly?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD: How many of them are returned soldiers?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I cannot give the exact number, but it has been our policy to employ as many returned soldiers as possible. Whenever a vacancy occurs we seek out a returned soldier. A great many of the men on the staff are not physically fit for overseas service.

Mr. MACDONALD: Perhaps the minister would let me know how many of them are returned soldiers when his estimates are up again.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I shall be glad to.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Will the minister also inform me when next his estimates are up, how many men are employed at Halifax on the Headquarters Medical Staff, and everything of that nature?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I shall get that information for my hon. friend.

Mr. McKENZIE: In the county of Cape Breton we have very large coal, iron and steel industries, all contributing essentially to the production of munitions in this country. Right at the coal mines is the landing place of one of the Atlantic cables, and on account of that it has been necessary to have a home guard regiment right in the town of North Sydney and at Sydney Mines. It has done excellent work, and has been instrumental in maintaining good order in that vicinity. A large number of foreigners are employed at these mines and steel works, and I have reason to believe that we might have difficulty with these men if the regiment were not stationed there all the time. That is one of the chief reasons why the 94th Regiment has been kept there. That regiment has also been an excellent medium for sending men to the front, over 600 men and some excellent officers having gone forward from time to time. There is quite a large number of this regiment left, some at Louisburg, some at Glace Bay, some at North Sydney and some at Sydney Mines, defending the Marconi towers and other works. What I wish to bring particularly to the attention of the minister is that these men are complaining of the pay they receive. Many of them are heads of families and are getting only $1.10 a day. These men are doing a good service for their country, although they are not at the front, and it is almost impossible for a man to support his family on $1.10 a day. in view of the present cost of foodstuffs. I think the minister should take this into consideration and endeavour to get better pay for these men, who are rendering excellent service to their country.

11 p.m.

Mr. EDWARDS: All they get is $1.10 a day?

Mr. McKENZIE: That is all they get.

Mr. NICKLE: They get subsistence allowance as well.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Married men get $1.10 a day and 45 cents subsistence allowance.

Mr. McKENZIE: Even that is small pay under present conditions.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Yes, it is.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I wish to draw the attention of the minister to a matter concerning the pay of the men enlisted in the Forestry battalions. I understand that special pay has been given to men with special qualifications in these battalions, such as sawyers, millwrights, saw filers and so on. They enlist as privates, but if they are doing sawmill work or expert forestry work they receive extra pay. I believe the rates of pay are as follows:

	Per Day.
Sawyers	$3.00
Millwrights	3.00
Saw filers	2.25
Edger men	2.25
Engineers	2.25
Log setters	1.75
Cooks	1.75

They are promised this pay when they enlist in these Forestry battalions, but once they draw this pay the Patriotic Fund is cut off from their wives and families. Is that action taken by the Militia Department or is it by the local organization of the Patriotic Fund.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I cannot speak as to the correctness of my hon. friend's figures, but I have no doubt that what he says is right. Extra pay is given to certain classes of experts who join the Forestry battalions such as saw filers and those whom my hon. friend has named. He states that for that reason the administration of the Patriotic Fund withhold the allowance and give it to those who do not get that extra pay. The Government have nothing to do with the administration of the Patriotic Fund. It is a voluntary organization and I could not speak with authority as to what the Patriotic Fund Association do with regard to withholding the allowance from the few men who get extra wages.

Mr. DOUGLAS: The minister must recognize that some action must be taken by the Militia Department or the Patriotic Fund administration would not know that these men get this extra pay.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Any information in regard to the families of soldiers is readily given to the Patriotic Association by the department and vice versa.

Mr. DOUGLAS: The claim made in regard to this special work of the Forestry battalions is that these men have more arduous duties than the ordinary private or non-commissioned officer. Their hours are longer and they are called upon to do much more expert and arduous work than the private soldier getting $1.10 a day with separation and Patriotic Fund allowances. Quite a number of complaints have come from men who have been induced to enter these Forestry battalions on the understanding that, on account of the expert nature of the work, they would get added pay. When they found that the Patriotic Fund allowance was withheld from their wives and families they naturally felt aggrieved. I quite understand that the department has nothing to do with the administration of the Patriotic Fund but if these men were induced to enlist under false pretenses I do not think the department can shirk the responsibility.

Mr. NICKLE: I am one of the Central Executive of the Patriotic Fund and the proceedings are along this line: various standard allowances in different parts of Canada were determined upon as being such as to meet the requirements for reasonable subsistence. The men who received special pay in Forestry battalions were required to show what this amount was and if the total amount that they were receiving with respect to the work they were doing did not exceed what was considered a reasonable subsistence allowance the Patriotic Fund supplemented the money that the men were receiving, but if they were earning in connection with their work an amount which equalled a reasonable subsistence allowance the Patriotic Fund did not contribute. Whether or not there was any misrepresentation I cannot say, but it has been well understood for some time that no Patriotic Fund money would be paid where men were receiving more than what was reasonably necessary for subsistence.

Mr. OLIVER: I would like to point out in this connection that there is quite clearly a misrepresentation to the men. A man is engaged as a sawyer. He is to get extra pay but if the patriotic allowance upon which he depended for his family is cut off then there is misrepresentation to him for which the Militia Department will have to be held responsible. I hope this Parliament will not agree to a juggling between the Patriotic Fund and the Militia Department to deprive a man who has enlisted in good faith to render special services of the allowance that he had every reason to believe he would get upon his joining. If he renders the service he is entitled to the pay. This is an agreement between the man who enlists and the authorities and that agreement should be carried out.

Mr. EDWARDS: How much was each man promised by the Patriotic Fund?

Mr. OLIVER: I do not know.

Mr. EDWARDS: Of course not; it would be impossible to answer that.

Mr. OLIVER: It is not impossible to answer but I do not happen to be familiar with the grant. Unless the Patriotic Fund is considered to be an established grant supplementing the separation allowance there is a misunderstanding in regard to the rights of those who enlist. That being the case, the man enlists on the understanding that his family is going to get so much separation allowance and so much from the Patriotic Fund.

Mr. EDWARDS: No.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend has not enlisted. That is the understanding of those who enlist, and they have the right when they enlist to have that understanding. If those who control the Patriotic Fund say that is not the understanding then I say they are juggling with the men and are not treating them fairly. If the Militia Department is a party to that transaction it is not doing its duty towards these men and it is not doing the country any credit.

Mr. DOUGLAS: For special service, such as forestry work, inducements are held out to expert men to join on the understanding that they will get this added pay and their separation allowance as well as participation in the Patriotic Fund. I have seen dozen of appeals made to men in Edmonton asking them to join and holding out this inducement to them. These men leave expecting that their wives and families will benefit by this fund but after they get to England they find that the allowance is cut off. Sometimes they do not know it for months. I quite concur in what my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) says—these men are enlisted under false pretenses. I do not know whether the Militia Department is to blame, but I think there has been a misunderstanding and if so the matter should be righted.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I do not recollect having seen any complaints from any of the thousands of men enlisted in the forestry battalions in regard to this matter. My officers do not remember having received a complaint. I do not doubt that my hon. friend is correct in his statement, but no complaint has come to the attention of the department, so far as I know. The assigned pay, separation allowance and pay of a soldier are matters for which the Government is responsible. The Patriotic Fund is a voluntary organization whose practice is to supplement the pay and allowance given to the families. I am informed it is extended only to those who need a supplementary allowance, and in proportion to their needs. No soldier's family that did not need this extra allowance would make a claim upon the Patriotic Association. If they did, they should not get an allowance.

Mr. DOUGLAS: The minister knows that a complaint is not likely to be made by a private soldier, under military rules. The position of the Patriotic Fund is, of course, as the minister states, but the fact remains that these recruiting officers induced men to join under false pretenses by giving them to understand that if they joined the Forestry battalions as experts they were to get $2.25 per day, and their wives and children were to receive the allowance from the Patriotic Fund in addition.

Mr. OLIVER: Who is to judge of the needs of the man and his family?

[Mr. Oliver.]

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The local branch of the Patriotic Fund Association who are in a position to ascertain the condition of each family.

Mr. OLIVER: Surely the best judge of the needs of the family is the man himself, and if he enlists on the understand ing that he is to receive certain extra pay, surely that understanding should be lived up to. It is not creditable to either the Patriotic Association or the Government that there should be any juggling between the Government and the Patriotic Association to mislead a man and deprive him of what he believed was to be given to him.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: So far as my knowledge goes, there has never been any attempt to juggle in respect to the Patriotic Fund. It was organized by public-spirited citizens to take care of the families of men who enlisted, and money was contributed liberally. The representatives of the association have kept in close touch with the families, their homes have been visited, their children have been cared for. The association has stood to them in the relation of a guardian. There has been no attempt to juggle, and there has been very little complaint respecting the administration of the Fund.

Mr. EDWARDS: The only attempted juggling in connection with this matter has been on the part of the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver). Although he has kept himself in splendid practice along that line for some weeks or months past, he has made a mighty poor fist of his attempt at it to-night. He knows and the people know that the Government has nothing whatever to do with the Patriotic Fund. A recruiting agent asks a man to enlist. He has a right to tell that man that he will get certain pay from the Government and a certain separation allowance, a definite amount. He may tell the man that, even though he might be in a forestry battalion, he would have a claim on the Patriotic Fund if his necessities required it. That was all. But in regard to that, or any other statement of the kind, the Government is not responsible. The fund is administered through the local boards in the different counties. In my county of Frontenac the reeve of each township is the man who will best know the rights of any case where a call is made on the fund. Some families will get a certain amount per month, others in the same township will get twice as much, because their need is twice as great. The fund has been long enough in existence to have people understand that it is administered quite independently of the Government. The Department of Militia has nothing whatever to do with it. I think it is entirely useless for the hon. gentleman from Edmonton to try to make out that the department is responsible for it.

Mr. OLIVER: I will make another attempt. It is a fact that the agent of the department secures the enlistment of the men. It is on the representations made by the agent of the department that the man enlists. This man enlists, not as a matter of charity, but as a matter of business. These men are experts and enlist for pay, as well as for the benefit of their country. They are given definitely to understand that they are to receive pay because of their expert ability, and after they have enlisted, according to the statement made by the hon. gentleman from Kingston, the Patriotic Fund Association goes into the matter and if this man's extra pay is greater than the allowance his family would receive from the Patriotic Fund, his family does not get anything from the Patriotic Fund, and he, therefore, does not get any allowance whatever for his expert ability which the Government is getting the benefit of, and which they hired him for the purpose of getting the benefit of.

Mr. NICKLE: I made myself anything but clear, if my hon. friend so understood me. What I endeavoured to say was this: in each district throughout Canada there is a determination by the Patriotic Fund as to what amount is reasonably necessary to meet living expenses. If a man enters into a contract with the Government for special pay from the Government, in addition to his military pay and allowances, he gets that special pay. The contract with the Government is respected in every detail, but if the amount he receives from the Government, as special pay or otherwise, is in excess of the amount that is decided throughout Canada as being reasonable by the Patriotic Fund for subsistence in each district, then the Patriotic Fund does not supplement in any way what the Government gives, but it has no power to take, nor does it intend to take, anything from what the Government has directed to give the man.

Mr. OLIVER: It comes exactly to what I said.

Mr. NICKLE: Not at all.

Mr. OLIVER: That the expert man in a Forestry battalion in the end gets no more than the man who is not an expert.

Mr. NICKLE: Not at all.

Mr. OLIVER: That is absolutely the hon. gentleman's calculation, and that is the complaint my hon. friend (Mr. Douglas) makes.

Mr. NICKLE: The Patriotic Fund might give to a wife and family $10 a month in excess of ordinary pay. Take a private getting $1.10 a day and $20 separation allowance, if the man got $3 a day extra, that would be $90 a month; the Patriotic Fund could not deprive him of any part of that $90. He would still get his military pay and allowance, and the extra $3. I am taking that as an illustration. They can in no way take from him what the Government directs that he should receive. They would simply say, "You are getting more than the Patriotic Fund was granting to those similarly situated," but the Patriotic Fund will not supplement the amount. The man might get more from the Patriotic Fund in certain circumstances than the other man.

Mr. OLIVER: He might and might not.

Mr. NICKLE: It depends on the obligations.

Mr. OLIVER: But the principle is that the man who enlists for special pay, so far as the Dominion Government is concerned, is deprived of that extra pay by reason of the withdrawal of the Patriotic Fund, and the man who has no expert knowledge, as far as that is concerned, stands on an equality with the man who has expert knowledge. If the Government had no knowledge of that before, they have knowledge of it now, and if they have no co-operation with the Patriotic Fund, I say, for the sake of their own good faith, they should co-operate with it in that matter, and the authorities of the Patriotic Fund should know that they did make such and such a bargain with this man, and that the necessities of a family are to be governed by that bargain, and not by the views of the officers of the Patriotic Fund, who apparently pay no regard to the direction that has been made.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I know a case in point, bearing out what the hon. gentleman has said, of a man who enlisted, who had a wife and two children. Before he became a log setter he was getting $1.10 a day, which is $34.10 a month, $22 a month from the Patriotic Fund, and $20 separation allowance, making $76.10 a month. With the extra pay he got at the rate of $1.75 a day, his pay came to $54.25, separation allowance $20, which gave him $74.25 per month, and he actually was getting less as an expert than he was getting as a private soldier drawing pay from the Patriotic Fund.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I think it will be very desirable if any member with knowledge of such facts would draw the attention of the Patriotic Fund Association to them. That is an immense organization which does a great deal of good, and they are not trying to shirk their responsibility at all. They desire to act fairly with every family. I would ask my hon. friend, if at any time he has a family in mind, who, he thinks, are not being paid, to bring the matter to the attention of the hon. secretary of the association, Sir Herbert Ames, who sits in this House, or any officer of the association, and they will be very sympathetic in the matter.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Sometimes men do not care to go to the Patriotic Fund and state that their family requires the money. Here is a man who left a wife and two children and they are drawing $74.25. That is pretty fair remuneration, but that is not the point. He joined on the understanding that, as an expert log setter, he would get $1.75 a day and $20 a month separation allowance, and that his wife would participate in the Patriotic Fund, which he does not look upon as a charity at all, but simply as a part of his pay—he has been given to understand that in our province at least, I do not know what has happened in other sections. In our province, the Patriotic Fund money has been held out as an inducement, just in the same way as the pay and separation allowance has been held out, and he has been induced to enlist on that understanding, and he does not consider he is getting any charity when he is drawing $22 a month for his wife and two children from the Patriotic Fund.

Mr. McKENZIE: I wish to call to the notice of the minister, in view of the discussion we had about those different allowances, that in the case which I brought to his notice the man does not get anything from the Patriotic Fund or from the Red Cross for separation allowance.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: They get an allowance in lieu of separation allowance.

[M. Douglas.]

Mr. McKENZIE: I was not aware of that. The minister did not answer my request on behalf of these men, and I hope that, either now or when the matter comes up again, he will promise to give some consideration to it. It has been brought to my notice, and I should have brought it up in the House long ago, but was waiting for this opportunity to do so. I wish to impress upon the minister that the moneys these men get are not enough to support their family and themselves under present conditions.

Mr. MACDONALD: If the minister would pass all but one item on this page with which we are now dealing, and adjourn—

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I sympathize with my hon. friend in his request. I may say we tried to proceed on Friday last, and my hon. friend from Pictou asked to let the Estimates stand, and we got on late this evening. We could leave one item open, so that we could discuss any matter.

Mr. MACDONALD: I was assuming my hon. friend is coming back to-morrow.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD: There are certain explanations we must get to-morrow. I was only suggesting we should adjourn.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: My suggestion is that we leave one item on page 49 upon which we may later discuss anything.

Mr. GRAHAM: How many officers have we now in Canada in charge of the work of securing recruits for home defence, how much money is that work costing per day, and how many recruits have been secured through the efforts of those officers during the past month? A gentleman placed a case before me the other day; whether it was imaginary or real I should not like to say, but I think that there was some realism in it. He said that a widow came to him who had $100 which she wished to invest in a war savings certificate. She asked this gentleman, who was a friend of hers, what the Government would do with her $100. Well, he said, Colonel So-and-So will get $12 of it, Major So-and-So gets $8, Captain So-and-So a further amount—he gave a list of the names. He found that without going outside a radius of about five miles, the old lady's entire $100 would be taken up in allowances to officers who, to all appearances, were not doing any work; they were attending to their ordinary business every day. If that be the case, my hon. friend has a chance to effect a great economy in that direction.

The Kingston Whig charges that two officers in Kingston—their names, if I remember correctly, were Brown and Wilson—are being retired to make way for political friends of the Government. Will the minister be prepared to give us a statement tomorrow with regard to this? I think the suggestion is reasonable that we pass one or two items and leave the rest. We will pass the first two items.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The officers of the Canadian Defence Force are also employed for the purpose of recruiting in the Canadian Expeditionary Force, and have done a good service. Some men who enlisted in the Canadian Defence Force have gone over to the Canadian Expeditionary Force. These officers are being gradually let out. After to-morrow none of them will be getting pay.

Mr. GRAHAM: This gentleman was probably right, then.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Sometimes there is an impression that because a man in uniform does not work with his hands, he is not doing anything. As to the officers at Kingston, I saw that item in the paper. There is absolutely no politics in the matter at all; the article is incorrect in more ways than one. A number of officers throughout the country are being let out now. Both officers to whom my hon. friend refers are employees of the Inland Revenue Department and have been drawing their full salaries from that department with military pay since the early days of the war. The services of quite a few officers in different parts of the country are not needed now as much as they have been hitherto in the work of recruiting. We are trying to economize, and at the same time we are trying to act fairly to those men. They have done what the country has asked them to do, and if those whose profession was not that of soldier before the war began can secure employment now—they have better opportunity of doing that at the present time than they would be likely to have when demobilization is taking place after peace is declared—it is just as well for them to take that into consideration.

Mr. GRAHAM: These officers in Kingston are not going to be replaced by other officers to do the same work?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: It is a matter of reducing the staff; we are doing it all over the country.

Mr. MACDONALD: Will the minister let me know to-morrow whether the contracts for certain supplies for the Langara and Braemar Military Hospitals in British Columbia, tenders for which closed on June 6, have been awarded?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: That comes under the Military Hospitals Commission, of which Sir James Lougheed is the chairman.

Mr. MACDONALD: If it has relation to a military hospital attached to some unit, it will come under the Department of Militia.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I shall be very glad to look it up, in any case.

TORONTO, HAMILTON AND BUFFALO RAILWAY COMPANY.

THIRD READING OF BILL RESCINDED.

Mr. T. J. STEWART (Hamilton): Mr. Speaker, with the leave of the House, I beg to move·

That the Order of the House for the third reading and passing of Bill No. 39, respecting the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway Company, adopted this day, be rescinded, and the said Bill replaced on the Order Paper amongst Private Bills for further consideration in Committee of the Whole at the next sitting of the House.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Sir Edward Kemp, the House adjourned at 11.53 p.m.

Tuesday, July 31, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

REPORT PRESENTED.

Annual Report of the Department of Public Printing and Stationery, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1916.

FORBIDDEN CIRCULATION IN CANADA.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In my absence yesterday the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) made allusion to a book called "The Fiddlers," which he has mentioned on two or three occasions. I did expect that some statement would have been made before this date and I so intimated to my hon. friend. It was thought desirable, however, to obtain pretty definite information with regard to one or two statements in the book in so far as they concern the Canadian Expeditionary Force. That is in progress. We are anticipating a report from Surgeon-General Fotheringham, who has had experience both on this side and the other side, and we have also asked for certain information to be sent here from Great Britain. I shall try to see that there is no unreasonable delay in the matter.

THE WILLIAM DAVIES COMPANY.

MR. SPEAKER RULES OUT OF ORDER LETTER COMMENTING ON SPEECH OF AN HONOURABLE MEMBER.

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have been asked by Sir Joseph Flavelle to read a letter apropos of a statement made by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte) yesterday, a statement whose accuracy my hon. friend may remember I challenged. The letter is as follows:

And Sir George Foster having read the letter.

Mr. SPEAKER: The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) has read a letter from Sir Joseph Flavelle referring to certain statements made in this House by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte). When the minister started to read the letter, I was of opinion that it was questionable whether, in accordance with the rule he could do so. I sent for a copy of Bourinot, and by the time I had been able to place my finger upon the rule in question, the letter had been read. The rule is:

> Nor is it in order to read articles in newspapers, letters or other communications, whether printed or written, emanating from persons outside of the House, and referring to, or commenting on, or denying anything said by a member, or expressing any opinion reflecting on proceedings within the House.

It is evident, therefore, that the hon. minister was not in order in reading the letter. Under the circumstances, the letter ought to be regarded as not having been read, and should be expunged from Hansard.

Mr. KYTE: Withdraw.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Peccavi; I acknowledge the corn. But, Mr. Speaker, you will not attribute it to my desire to break the rules of the House. I should have known the rule very well; I am sure that I would have recalled it if I had thought for a moment. The letter was put in my hand just as I came to my desk, and I read it. I hope, however, that the constitution will still survive, even though it has been so badly punctured in this respect. I am extremely sorry to have offended against the rules of the House.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I doubt whether the letter comes within the rule, because it confirmed the statement of the member for Richmond.

Mr. SPEAKER: The rule refers to letters "referring to or commenting on or denying anything said by a member."

In accordance with the direction of Mr. Speaker the letter is not printed.

PRIVILEGE—MR. MACDONALD.

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. Yesterday afternoon the hon. the senior member for Queens, P.E.I. (Mr. A. A. McLean), said:

> The member for Pictou a day or two ago expressed the view that it was not necessary to have the gauge of the P.E.I. Railway widened; he thought that the matter should be left over until after the conclusion of the war.

I desire to say I have not made any such statement as the hon. member attributed to me.

SYDNEY, N.S., INDUSTRIAL SITES.

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. G. W. KYTE (Richmond, N.S.): Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the Minister of Finance to the following telegram, which I received yesterday from Sydney:

> Have information that Sydney Post proposes advertising scheme calling for four issues of forty thousand advertising local advantages as sites for industries that Americans are supposed to be looking for. Price per page $320. Solicitor pulling off scheme here assures advertisers that Finance Minister guarantees that Government will help the good work by giving dollar for every dollar collected. Understand that Halifax Herald and St. John Standard also in scheme. Find out if this is so.

I would ask the Finance Minister if he knows of any such scheme as it is said in this telegram has received his support.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I never heard of any such scheme until my hon. friend read this telegram, and I know nothing whatever about it.

SCIENTIFIC AND INDUSTRIAL RESEARCH.

THIRD READING OF BILL.

On the motion of Sir George Foster for the third reading of Bill No. 83, relating to the Honorary Advisory Council for Scientific and Industrial Research.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I wish to repeat what I said yesterday when I expressed doubt as to the wisdom of constituting the board at this time and with its present personnel. I do not think this country can expect any practical or useful results from a commission constituted as this is. It is true that the services of most of the members are rendered gratis to the country, but some are being paid, and I wish to say that those who are being paid are not, in my judgment, competent to carry on the work which is to be assigned to them under this Bill. I trust that the Minister of Commerce will reconsider his decision. This is a very important work which the Government has in mind. Most valuable work may be done for the country by a commission of this kind if its membership is composed of men who will devote their entire time and energy to the work, and if they are men of competency and energy. I do not wish to make personal reference to any members of this board. I said yesterday that you could not hope for any results from a board composed of representatives from the large universities, who can only come here three or four times a year, and give a very transitory consideration to these matters. I think the head of the board should be a young man with administrative and executive experience. Any good that could possibly be hoped for from the commission will be lost if the work is left in the hands in which it is proposed to leave it.

Mr. H. BOULAY (Rimouski) (translation): Mr. Speaker, I wish to add a few words to what has been said by my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Maclean) in connection with this Bill No. 83. It seems to me that the expenditure resulting from this war—which we are called upon to meet—is so heavy that we should refrain from appointing further commissions of practically no use, for the time being at any rate. I am unaware of the reasons that may have caused the introducing of this Bill, but we are going through such a crisis that it seems to me to be altogether untimely to impose new burdens upon the people of this country, especially when we already have a rather costly commission—I mean the Conservation Commission—which, strictly speaking, might attend to this work, and I wonder what that commission will have to look after when this new measure is put into force. If there is one thing that may well be put off until peace has been concluded, I think it is this Honorary Advisory Council for Scientific and Industrial Research. It seems to me, moreover, that instead of striving hard to impose new obligations upon this country, the Government should bend all their energies to the task of lightening the burdens now lying heavy upon our population.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The hon. member from Halifax (Mr. Maclean) has simply repeated what he said yesterday, and what I answered yesterday, as I thought, fairly well. If he sought to create the impression that these gentlemen were being paid for their services I can assure him that only the administrative chairman is paid. The others give their services free. The amount that can be done, taken year in and year out, is a matter of opinion, and will best be proved by actual results. My hon. friend starts off with the assumption they can only meet two or three times a year; they are to meet once a month. He says that they can only give an hour or two at each meeting, or something of that kind. I think that each meeting they have already held has continued for three or four days. That is a record of work quite different from the suggestion made by my hon. friend. I am between two fires. My hon. friend to my right is against this Bill because it creates a new charge in war time, while the hon. gentleman from Halifax is against the Bill because it does not create charge enough.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY: The hon. gentleman from Rimouski (Mr. Boulay) advanced another very cogent argument, when he said the work which it is proposed that this Commission shall do can be done by the Conservation Commission, which already exists.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not think it could be done by that Commission.

Mr. MURPHY: Did I understand the hon. minister to say that all these gentlemen gave their services free?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Except the chairman. I stated yesterday and to-day that the only member of the Commission who was paid anything was the administrative chairman. All the rest give their services free.

Mr. MURPHY: What does the chairman do?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If the hon. member had been here yesterday he would probably have known.

Mr. MURPHY: I was here.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If the hon. gentleman will read the report of my remarks, he will see what the work of the committee is.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the third time.

SUPPLY.

PARCELS TO PRISONERS OF WAR IN GERMANY.

On motion of Sir Thomas White for Committee of Supply:

Mr. J. G. TURRIFF (Assiniboia): Before the Speaker leaves the Chair I wish to bring up a matter which is of very considerable importance to the people of Canada, in connection with preventing the sending of parcels to the Canadian soldiers who are now prisoners of war in Germany. I gave notice to the Minister of Militia that I would bring up the matter to-day. As hon. gentlemen are well aware, prior to last Christmas Canadians who had relatives who are prisoners in Germany were allowed to send parcels of food, clothing and comforts of all kinds. Suddenly, about last Christmas, a change was made, and our people were prevented from sending parcels to their relatives who unfortunately were prisoners in Germany, unless they were officers, there being no change made in connection with the sending of parcels to officers. That is the ground of my complaint. In this democratic country, where one brother may be an officer and a prisoner in one city in Germany, and another brother, a private, may be prisoner in another German city, the relatives can send parcels to the officer, who does not need parcels to the same extent that the private does, but they are not allowed to send anything to the private. To my mind, that is a most unfair and unreasonable discrimination. I presume this policy is dictated by the War Office in England, and if so, it seems to me that the Department of Militia should not assent to such an arrangement. One of the reasons given why parcels should not be sent to private soldier prisoners is that contraband goods were being sent. When we consider that there are some three hundered officers prisoners in Germany, if persons wanted to send contraband goods they could send them to those officers. There is no question that if anything contraband, or any information were being sent to a private, that information would never get to him because it would be taken by the German military authorities as soon as the parcel arrived in Germany. But what is to prevent the German authorities from taking the contraband goods or the information enclosed in a parcel addressed to a Canadian officer, who happens to be a prisoner in Germany? To my mind it is a most unfair and unreasonable law that makes fish of one and flesh of another. The Canadian officers who are prisoners are not in the same need of parcels from home, for the simple reason that, in a military country like Germany, the officers who are prisoners are treated very much better than the privates who are prisoners, no matter what their nationality or from what country they may come. There is a great deal of feeling throughout the country in regard to this matter. When the change was made, the whole matter of dealing with parcels to soldiers was handed over to the Red Cross authorities in London, England. While a great many people working in connection with the Red Cross are doing good work, yet, judging from the results that have attended the efforts of the Red Cross in handling the parcels for Canadian prisoners in Germany, I must say that their work in this respect has been anything but satisfactory. That is not to be wondered at. The branch of the Red Cross that is attending to this matter in London is in charge of persons who are giving their services voluntarily; who can come and go just as they please; nobody is there to see that the work is done thoroughly. As a matter of fact, the work has not been done thoroughly, with the result that our Canadian soldiers for months after the change was made were left practically without a satisfactory parcel service. In many cases the parcels sent to them by relatives in Canada were sent back. In cases where money was sent to the Red Cross branch in London for the purpose of supplying parcels, very inferior parcels reached our Canadian soldiers. I have a great deal of evidence here from different persons throughout the country—parents, brothers and sisters of these unfortunate Canadians who are prisoners in Germany—complaining that they have difficulty in sending parcels to their relatives overseas, and that the parcels sent by the Red Cross authorities are not satisfactory and are irregularly sent. I do not know just what change can be made to remedy this matter, but I bring it to the attention of the Government, and particularly to the attention of the Minister of Militia, in the hope that some further effort will be made to see that the authorities across the water change this regulation and go back to the old system. No more harm can be done by a change than is done under the present arrangement, under which anybody who wishes to do so may send parcels to the officers who are now prisoners in Germany.

I do not know that I ought to take up the time of the House in reading the complaints which I have here from people in Canada in connection with the suffering of these men at the front. There are letters and postcards here from men at the front complaining of the manner in which this change in the regulations has affected them. Conditions may be somewhat better now, but at the beginning of the year many of our Canadian soldiers who are prisoners in Germany were more or less on the verge of starvation, and they were kept in health largely by the parcels of food that they got from Canada. That supply was suddenly cut off, and the parcels which they received did not amount to very much. It was proposed that the unfortunate Canadian prisoners of war in Germany should assign a further amount of their pay to the Red Cross in London in order that they might get more food. Imagine a soldier who has been fighting for Canada and who has been taken prisoner being asked to subscribe out of his pittance of $1.10 a day to the Red Cross Fund in order that food may be sent to him in Germany, while at the same time the authorities refuse to allow his parents and friends in Canada to send him the necessary food and clothing to afford him some degree of comfort!

I bring this matter to the attention of the minister, knowing that tens of thousands of people throughout Canada are interested in it. A large number of people have sent me information on this subject, letters and postcards. I sincerely hope that the Minister of Militia will make a change in the regulations. This matter is of too much importance to our boys who are prisoners in Germany to be allowed to remain as it is; something ought to be done, and done quickly.

Hon. Sir EDWARD KEMP (Minister of Militia): No one will question the importance of the subject which the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) has brought to the attention of the House, namely, the matter of the food supplies, clothing, etc., contained in parcels for Canadian prisoners of war interned in Germany.

The member for Assiniboia referred, I take it, to a condition which may have existed not recently, but some months ago, or early in this year. On April 24 last I put on Hansard the regulations which were made effective at that time. Since then further regulations have been made, and I will read to the House a statement which I have gathered from different sources concerning the whole subject. No one who is intimately acquainted with the magnificent work which the Canadian Red Cross Society has been doing for our prisoners in Germany can find any reason for criticism. The Canadian Red Cross Society through its London agency is responsible for keeping our soldiers who are prisoners in Germany supplied with food and clothing. Through the generosity of the Canadian public, they have ample funds thus far for doing that work, which they are carrying on in a systematic way.

My hon. friend refers to certain privileges being extended to officers which are not extended to the men. That may have been the case to some extent in the past, but conditions are now remedied. I will supplement the statements which were made in the House on April 24 last in respect to this matter by reading a memorandum which I have had prepared.

I have gathered the information from different sources, and I have thought it wise to have it embodied in a statement so as to cover all the points. This is the statement:

Re despatch of parcels from Canada to British and Allied prisoners of war. Before November, 1916, the system in force did not impose any restrictions on parcels being sent to prisoners of war by any individual or organization. Each parcel, of course, had to be examined by the Censor before it was despatched from England. This involved an enormous amount of labour and frequently injured the contents of the parcel. Under this system it was found also that while the amount of comforts in the form of food sent to Germany was more than sufficient in the aggregate for all the known British prisoners of war, it was very unevenly distributed. Some prisoners were being sent an inadequate supply, while other prisoners got more than they could consume. To remedy these conditions a scheme was brought into effect by the British authorities on December 1, 1916, to apply to all British prisoners of war, Naval, Military, and civilian, except officers.

The new scheme was as follows:—

1. No parcel was to be sent to a prisoner of war unless it had been examined or packed by the Central Prisoners of War Committee, or by an organization authorized by that committee in accordance with the regulations issued by the British Government.

2. Every prisoner to be sent parcels through one and only one authorized organization, or "packing association."

3. Adequate supplies but not excessive quantities of food to be sent through the authorized organizations to every prisoner. As it is difficult to censor bread, cakes, and tinned foods without spoiling them, no person other than the authorized organization to be permitted to send such articles to prisoners. Wholesale gifts of foodstuffs or money to purchase food might be sent to authorized organizations for prisoners of war.

4. Parcels despatched by an authorized organization to be distinguished by a special label which would be regarded as a guarantee on the part of the organization that the parcel does not contravene the regulations. Any parcels bearing this label would not ordinarily be opened by the censors, and it was hoped that enemy censors would find it unneccessary to delay such parcels for the purpose of censorship.

This scheme was included in the regulations governing communication with prisoners of war interned abroad which were issued by the General Post Office, London, in December, 1916. On January 9, 1917, Mr. Walter Long, Secretary of State for the Colonies, addressed a despatch to the Governor General, asking for co-operation by the Canadian Government in this scheme stating that the objects were to ensure censorship, and to prevent waste and overlapping, and suggesting that the Canadian Red Cross Society, which have an office in London be named as the authorized organization or "packing association" for Canada. Sir George Perley, the Acting High Commissioner for Canada, also cabled to the Prime Minister stating that the Director of the Central Prisoners of War Committee advised that no more parcels containing foodstuffs, tinned goods or clothing should be sent from Canada, but that instead remittances of money should be sent to the Canadian Red Cross Society in London for the purpose of purchasing such supplies and sending them to prisoners. It was pointed out by Sir George Perley that war conditions preemtorily imposed such action, and that it was only by adopting this procedure that it would be possible to get parcels satisfactorily through to prisoners with any regularity and equality of distribution. Sir George Perley strongly advised complying with the request of the British Authorities and stated that Australia was taking similar action.

In view of the above, regulations were issued in Canada by the Postmaster General dated January 29, which were based on those formulated by the British Authorities. These regulations were laid on the Table of the House of Commons by the Minister of Militia on April 24, 1917, and were printed in Hansard for that date.

Regarding the work of the Canadian Red Cross Society the following statement has been made to the Minister of Militia by Colonel Noel Marshall, President of the Society, (July 10, 1917):—

The Canadian Red Cross Society is sending by mail to each prisoner of war three parcels each fortnight. Each parcel contains food to the value of ten shillings and weighs not more than ten pounds. We have also been sending thirteen pounds of bread each fortnight, but this has been in the last month reduced to eight and one half pounds owing to shortage of flour. These parcels of food are in addition to tobacco and cigarettes sent fortnightly. A "capture parcel" is first sent upon the receipt of a soldier's name as a prisoner of war and the other parcels follow. The "capture parcel" contains overcoat, jacket, trousers, cap, pair of boots, two shirts, two pairs of socks, canvas shoes, two suits underwear, cardigan, gloves, kit bag, three handkerchiefs and two towels. The above outfit, overcoat excepted, is repeated every six months. Every prisoner of war is sent parcels as above stated regardless of adoption by friends. The Canadian Red Cross Society undertook the above duties at the request of the War Office and Sir George Perley during months of February and March, 1917. Serious interruptions in delivery have at times taken place owing to various causes for which the Society was not in any way responsible. Late reports are that parcels, which are all being sent by mail, are being satisfactorily delivered. Neither the Government nor the Canadian Red Cross Society should be held responsible for non-delivery. We do ship the articles, but cannot guarantee delivery in an enemy's country.

No changes have been made in the regulations since the date of issue except in certain minor details with reference to prisoners of war interned in Switzerland, (see Post Office Department circular, July 3, 1917).

An important change will, however, shortly come into effect regarding parcels for officer prisoners. Sir George Perley, on July 11, cabled that the Imperial Government have decided to make new regulations, which will come into force on the 1st of August to provide that parcels for officer prisoners shall come under the same rules as parcels for prisoners of other ranks. These new regulations have been approved by the Canadian Government. The weight and number of parcels of foodstuffs to be sent fortnightly will hereafter be the same for officers as for other ranks, and will be similarly forwarded by the Canadian Red Cross Society, but the contents of officers' parcels will be selected with special regard for their requirements. In addition, officers may be sent not more than two extra parcels of foodstuffs per month up to a total gross weight of 22 pounds, if their friends so desire and provide the necessary funds to the Canadian Red Cross Society. These new regulations will not extend to officers interned in neutral countries, regarding whom the regulations are unchanged.

I do not think I need take up the time of the House in reading the "Circular to Postmasters" of the 3rd of July, 1917. It ought to be printed in Hansard. As it consists of a page and a half, with the consent of the House, I will hand it with this statement to Hansard.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I wish it to be read.

Sir EDWARD KEMP (Reading):

Circular to Postmasters.

Communication with prisoners of war interned in Switzerland.

The Postmaster is informed that the regulations governing the communication with prisoners of war interned abroad which were contained in departmental circular of January 29, 1917, and which were published in February, 1917, supplement to the Canada Official Postal Guide, are now modified to comply with the new regulations introduced by the Swiss authorities restricting in part the privilege of free postage and exemption from customs duty hitherto accorded to parcels addressed to prisoners of war and civilians interned in Switzerland.

1. Parcels, except those containing beverages, for prisoners of war and interned needy civilians will be exempted from postal and customs charges only if they do not exceed 1 lb. in weight or if, while exceeding 1 lb. but not exceeding 11 lb., they contain nothing but articles for the personal use of the addressee, such as clothing, bed-linen, articles necessary for the care of the body, etc., but parcels containing food, and articles such as scent, scented soap, etc., can only be sent free of charge if they do not exceed 1 lb. in weight. Parcels containing beverages are without exception liable to the ordinary postal and customs charges.

2. Exemption from postal and customs charges will not in future be accorded to any parcel addressed to an interned civilian who is capable of supporting himself.

3. In future, therefore, only parcels for prisoners of war and needy civilians which weigh not more than 1 lb. and parcels over 1 lb. but not over 11 lb. in weight which contain only articles necessary for the personal use of the addressee (not including food, beverages, etc.) will be accepted free of postage and will be delivered in Switzerland free of customs duty. All other parcels (which must not exceed 11 lb. in weight) will be accepted only on payment of the ordinary postage and under the ordinary regulations governing the transmission of parcels to Switzerland, and for these parcels the senders must prepare customs declaration and despatch notes.

4. The foregoing regulations do not affect the existing regulations under which parcels for prisoners of war, other than officers, must not contain food, clothing, or any other article prohibited from despatch, and must be addressed to the care of an appropriate association. (N.B. Such parcels intended for Canadian prisoners of war are to be addressed c/o Prisoners of War Department, Canadian Red Cross Society, London, England.)

The foregoing restrictions do not affect parcels for prisoners of war interned in any other country except Switzerland.

There may have been irregularities, but as pointed out by the president of the Canadian Red Cross Society, Mr. Noel Marshall, any irregularities there may have been have been entirely beyond the power of the Red Cross Society through its London agent to prevent. Experience has shown the system to which I have referred to be the most practical one and in the best interests of the prisoners themselves. There must always be some difficulty about guaranteeing absolutely that parcels will reach the prisoners, but according to the statement I have just read, the general feeling is that the parcels which are put up according to the regulations are pretty sure of reaching the prisoners in Germany.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL: I notice that a statement was made in the British House of Commons the other day in regard to a new arrangement that was being made between England and Germany for the exchange of prisoners of war and interned civilians, Under this arrangement some are to be sent to Switzerland, some to Holland, and others are to be exchanged. It is practically on the same lines as the agreement already in existence between Germany and France. Will Canada be included in this arrangement, and have any Canadian prisoners been exchanged up to the present time? I do not want to mention the case of one hon. member of this House in particular, because his name has been mentioned so often, but I should like the minister to make a statement in regard to this new arrangement, as I am sure it would be of interest to the public.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I saw the article to which my hon. friend refers, and I am getting further information on the subject. I have no reason to doubt that the arrangement will include Canadian soldiers. As soon as I have received further information, I shall communicate it to my hon. friend.

Mr. MARCIL: Have any Canadian prisoners been exchanged since the war began?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Some Canadian prisoners of war have reached Canada from Germany, and I will find out the exact number and let my hon. friend know later.

Mr. MARCIL: The minister might have a statement prepared on that subject.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Yes.

Mr. TURRIFF: Do I understand from the minister that the Canadian prisoner of war in Germany will not be asked to contribute out of his pay for the sending of these parcels?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I overlooked that point. I do not think that the report can be correct, as I never heard of a Canadian soldier being asked to subscribe money for that purpose. I should like to repeat that the funds that have been placed at the disposal of the Red Cross Society through the generosity of the Canadian public are ample for carrying out the programme to which I have referred, and the Canadian prisoners of war are receiving the amount of food and clothing mentioned in the memorandum This is all being done through voluntary subscriptions by the Canadian public.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I should like to say in that connection that during the first year of the war, Sir George Perley received instructions to provide anything that might be necessary for the comfort and sustenance of Canadians interned in Germany. I am not sure whether there were any Canadian prisoners of war there at that time, but naturally the instructions would apply equally to them. I am bound to say that I never heard, until my hon. friend mentioned it to-day, that Canadian prisoners in Germany had been asked to assign any portion of their pay. I should hope that that report will not prove to be well founded, or that it may have reference only to some isolated case. I entirely agree that there should be no such practice.

With regard to the Canadian Red Cross Society in London, I have had opportunity on two occasions, once in 1915 and again this year, of inspecting the system in London, and I think that any hon. gentleman of this House who could see the work they are carrying out would agree that it is being performed with a great deal of thoroughness. The work is divided up into different departments, and it is thoroughly systematized. I do not know as to the method of inspection of the different departments. This year I had no opportunity for visiting the society's offices and seeing the work that was being carried on until the day I left England, and for that reason I was obliged to go very early in the morning. I found the ladies in every department at work at that early hour, and I am quite confident that the splendid spirit which animates them all would prevent any laxness or lack of thoroughness such as has been suggested. They are very proud of their success in carrying on their work; they are devoted to duty, and are very much interested in the results they are accomplishing. I really do think that the thanks of the people of this country and of the men for whom these ladies are labouring so zealously are due to them for the good work they are carrying on and which is being carried on with great thoroughness, and with most perfect devotion to duty.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I should like to emphasize the importance of some such society as the Canadian Red Cross being in charge of this work. If parcels were allowed to be sent promiscuously, all sorts of things would be sent, and the German censor would be more suspicious than if the parcels came through one organization which could be depended upon not to send anything which from the German standpoint would be of a questionable nature.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY.

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Rainville in the Chair..

Department of Militia and Defence—contingencies, $60,000.

Mr. MACDONALD: It was understood at the time of the passing of this vote that we would discuss the medical treatment of the men overseas. I desire to call the attention of the committee to the matter disclosed by the documents and reports of Dr. Bruce so far to hand, because we have not yet had a final report from him.

On September 20, 1916, Dr. Bruce, of Toronto, was deputed by the then Minister of Militia to make inquiry into the medical treatment of the boys overseas, and as to what improvement could be made in that treatment. The way in which our wounded boys may have been treated is a matter of the greatest importance and solicitude to every one in this country who has friends at the front. And Dr. Bruce's report must be regarded with the very greatest concern. The following are the facts he found:

1. Many soldiers are arriving in England from Canada medically unfit, who should never have been enlisted.

2. The system of disposing of casualties from the front to Imperial hospitals in England, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland is extremely unsatisfactory.

3. The present method of having Canadian hospitals scattered over a large area is very objectionable.

4. There is unnecessary detention in hospitals. There has been no medical inspection by the Canadian Medical Service of Canadian soldiers in Imperial hospitals, and there has been no efficient medical inspection of Canadian hospitals, in consequence of which Canadian soldiers are retained in hospitals in Great Britain, many of whom should have been returned to duty, and others should have been returned to Canada, where they could have been more economically and efficiently treated. The lack of system permits of the aimless moving of patients from hospital to hospital.

5. The use by the Canadian service of Voluntary Aid Hospitals is very undesirable, as they are inefficient, expensive, and unsatisfactory.

6. The administration of the group of 57 Voluntary Aid Hospitals under Shorncliffe Military Hospital by the Canadian Medical Service is unsatisfactory and expensive.

7. The present method of operating, jointly with the Red Cross, certain hospitals built and equipped by them is unsatisfactory. Such dual control is undesirable.

8. Impropriety of detailing Canadian Army Medical corps personnel to Imperial hospitals and still retaining them on Canadian pay-roll.

9. Unsatisfactory situation at Shorncliffe owing to our Canadian A.D.M.S. acting in a similar capacity over a large area for the Imperial authorities.

10. No attempt has been made to restrict surgical operations which produce no increased military efficiency.

11. The installation of an expensive plant at Ramsgate was inadvisable, as a large number of the cases treated there should be sent to Canada for treatment.

12. The establishment at Buxton of a special hospital for the treatment of rheumatics was ill-advised, as the majority of rheumatics will not be fit again for active service, and could be better and more cheaply treated in Canada.

13. The present system of handling Canadian venereal patients is very strongly condemned.

14. The method of handling infectious diseases is most unsatisfactory.

15. Medical boards which regulate the classification of casualties when convalescent have not been adequately provided for.

16. Satisfactory records regarding individual casualties are not available.

17. The exceedingly important question of pensions, which will involve the expenditure of large sums of money by Canada annually, has been neglected by the Canadian Medical Service.

18. Lack of co-ordination in the Canadian Medical Service between Canada, England and the front.

19. The medical personnel is not being used to the best advantage.

20. The policy of the department has been opposed to the use of experienced medical and surgical consulting specialists.

21. Discontent concerning promotions, especially in regard to Regimental Medical Officers serving at the front.

22. The Canadian Army Medical Corps Training School in England has never been properly organized, although of the greatest importance to the Canadian Medical Service.

23. In the operation of the Medical Service sufficient regard has not been paid to economy in management.

This indictment by Dr. Bruce was of a very serious character, and created the greatest possible concern among the people of this country as to the condition of affairs in England; and the unfortunate position in which this inquiry has been permitted to remain up to the present leaves the whole matter of the medical treatment of the overseas troops completely in the air. Without going into too much detail in regard to the matters referred to by Dr. Bruce, let us deal with the question of the soldiers who arrived in England from Canada medically unfit, and who should never have been enlisted. Manifestly the enlisting and passing by medical men of recruits who are not in a position to go on active service involves, in the first place, a tremendous unnecessary expense upon the country, creates conditions under which discipline is interfered with, and altogether disturbs the service and prevents its proper performance by the men who ought to carry it out. When we find this statement, which has not been questioned but which has been confirmed by the later report of Dr. Bruce, we have further food for thought:

4 p.m.

Many hundreds of soldiers obviously medically unfit for service overseas have been sent from Canada to England.

This serious blunder has been more noticeable in Battalions and drafts arriving from Canada in the second year of war, and led to an order (A.D.M.S. Order No. 394) being issued on March 9, 1916, for the medical inspection of all drafts immediately on their arrival in the Shorncliffe area. This medical examination of newly arrived drafts showed that they included from 5 to 15 per cent of unfit men in their ranks—the Canadian Pioneer Draft, arriving June 29th, was found to have 57 unfits out of 254 all ranks.

Dr. Bruce goes on to say:

Fifty per cent of department base duty men, and 56 per cent of discharges from the Army have never been at the front.

Just imagine conditions such as this, men being taken from their homes and sent across the sea to England, and, after they have been discharged and all the expense has been gone to in connection with them, we have the authoritative statement that 56 per cent of them were never at the front at all. Dr. Bruce says:

Of 2,670 soldiers, regarded by the Medical Boards from June 12 to August 22, 1916, as only fit for Permanent Base Duty, 1,340 had never been at the front, while 816 of the total 1,452 discharges from the Army for the period had similarly never got beyond England.

That statement has never been questioned either in the Babtie report or in the statement made by General Jones. General Jones, who was head of the medical service, prepared a report dated September 28, 1916, in answer to the Bruce report, in which he says:

There is no question of doubt that a large number of men have been sent over from Canada who must have been medically unfit when they were enlisted.

This has resulted in an unnecessary burden being thrown upon the medical and other services in England that deal with the weeding out of these men and their disposal.

He goes on to say:

It is strongly recommended that a most rigid medical examination be made in Canada, and that the adopted standards be closely followed.

Then we find the following in the Babtie report, dealing with the fact that so great a percentage of medically unfit men had been sent to England:

This it believed to have been due partly to inexperience on the part of examining medical officers, partly to hurry, partly to carelessness, and lastly, in some instances, to the opinion of the examining medical officer being overridden or ignored by commanding officers. . . . The Board has come to the conclusion that this important matter has not received the attention it deserves, and that the authorities have failed to make adequate representations regarding a condition of affairs that must severely handicap the Canadian Expeditionary Force both as regards organization and training in the United Kingdom, and efficiency in the field.

What occurred was that General Jones made a report, what is called "An Interim Report of Surgeon-General Jones, in reply to the Report on the Canadian Army Medical Service by Colonel Herbert A. Bruce." Then what occurred was that Sir George Perley proceeded to appoint a board to deal with both these reports, a board headed by Sir William Babtie, and the curious thing about this Babtie board was that while Colonel Bruce was asked to go before it to give evidence he was not permitted to remain during the sessions of the board, and although he represented to that board that he had evidence of irregularities of the gravest character that had occurred since he presented his report, the Babtie board would not permit any of that evidence to be given.

If one goes through the Jones' report he will find that out of the fourteen recommendations made by Dr. Herbert Bruce, twelve are absolutely concurred in by Colonel Jones, and yet the Babtie report proceeds to condemn the recommendations made by Colonel Bruce in the first instance. One begins to wonder what was the object of this Babtie report and board, and as to the board's efficiency, and its competency for dealing with these questions. It must be remembered that the report of Colonel Bruce was not a report in which he alone concurred and for which he alone was responsible. The following gentlemen were associated with him in connection with the matter and concurred in every word he uttered in the published report, Colonel Reid, Colonel Wallace Scott, Lieut.-Col. Walter McKeown, Lieut.-Col. Wilson, and Captain Charles Hunter. These men all concurred in the statements and recommendations made by Colonel Bruce, with which the Babtie report found fault. There is some evidence, of a character which cannot be disregarded, tending to show that Sir William Babtie, whose report we in Canada were asked to accept absolutely without reservation as being a complete clearing up of all questions raised by Colonel Bruce, has, as the ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) said the other day, gone through a very strange experience himself where he had responsibility in regard to matters affecting the war. No less a man than Austin Chamberlain, speaking upon the debate on the Mesopotamia report, in the House of Commons in England, declared that there was a most horrible breakdown of the Medical Service in connection with the Mesopotamia campaign—and the man in charge was Sir William Babtie, this gentleman who undertook to declare that, notwithstanding what Colonel Bruce had recommended and what he had found, his report was not to be regarded seriously. Here is what a newspaper report in England said in regard to Sir William Babtie:

Dealing with the medical breakdown, the Commissioners seriously criticise the administration of Surgeon General Sir William Babtie. . . They say: the gravamen of the criticism which we feel bound to pass on Sir William Babtie is that, knowing the Army Medical Service in India to be organized only for frontier warfare, knowing the provision of the field ambulances and hospitals to be deficient, and knowing the medical personnel to be insufficient, he yet made no adequate efforts to improve these defects so as to equip the Mesopotamian expedition in a manner suitable for campaigning in an unhealthy, tropical climate, against an enemy who was in alliance and supported by the foremost exponents of modern warfare.

They go on to deal with the absolute failure, or as Austin Chamberlain said, the horrible breakdown of the whole Medical Service in Mesopotamia, so far as the treatment of the men engaged in that unfortunate campaign is concerned. That is the gentleman whose opinion the people of Canada have been asked to take in contradistinction to that of Colonel Bruce. Colonel Bruce made an answer to the Babtie report some three months ago, yet it has been impossible for us in this House, representing the people of Canad, to find out what Colonel Bruce said in answer to that report. We have asked the Minister of Militia (Sir Edward Kemp) and the Premier (Sir Robert Borden) for that report. We were told two months ago that it had been sent to the Minister of Militia overseas. I have it on the very best authority that the Minister of Militia Overseas, Sir George Perley, made the statement early in this month of July that he never saw the report prepared by Colonel Bruce, which was in the hands of the Minister of Militia. The people of this country and the members of this House want to know exactly why that report has not been brought down and what the real facts are in regard to this matter.

Take another situation which is referred to by Dr. Bruce. We have heard a great deal about the policy of concentration of Canadian soldiers in hospitals, and how it was of Imperial importance that they should not be concentrated. It was said that the men from all over the Empire who have fought together should be allowed to mingle in the hospitals. It seems to me, eliminating anything but the practical organization for dealing with the sick and wounded of our forces, that the money of the Canadian people ought to be applied primarily to looking after the treatment of the Canadian wounded. With that proposition no serious issue can be taken. Dr. Bruce dealt with this question of looking after the Canadians who were on the other side in Canadian hospitals. He says:

> The system of disposition of casualties from the front to Imperial hospitals in England, Wales, Scotland and Ireland is extremely unsatisfactory.

He made the following recommendation in regard to that:

> That there be a concentration of Canadian hospitals and that the use of Voluntary Hospitals for Canadians be discontinued.

That is a very definite recommendation. He goes into details which I need not discuss now, showing the reasons why that should be done. That position is questioned by Sir William Babtie. It is not questioned, strange to say, by General Jones. General Jones explained how it was that he agreed entirely with Colonel Bruce in regard to that question, that he thought that Canadians had better be treated by Canadian nurses and Canadian doctors in Canadian hospitals, and he tells us why it was that his views upon that question was overridden.

The theory has always been in this country that Colonel Bruce had made certain reports and recommendations reflecting on Colonel Jones, particularly in reference to dealing with the Canadian wounded in Canadian hospitals. But a perusal of the report shows that Colonel Jones was not responsible for that. He says, at page 4 of his report:

> The policy of segregating Canadians was changed in February of this year, owing chiefly to the strong hand of the Acting High Commissioner, Sir George Perley, who held that Canadians should mix with the other soldiers of the Empire, in hospital. I was further informed by Sir George Perley that persons in very high positions thought strongly on this matter, and considered that in the interests of the Empire there should be no segregation of Canadians in hospital. My policy of segregation was therefore receded from. This was known to the High Commissioner, and if it was not considered the right thing, then it would appear that I should have been informed, but up to the present I have not been.

On this question of the treatment of Canadians in Canadian hospitals, of our own boys being given the preference with our own doctors and nurses, there is no issue between Colonel Bruce and Colonel Jones. They agree absolutely with one another. But, on the other hand, you have Sir George Perley, who intimated that some very high people officially—such as he probably wanted to be—had some notions on the subject, and notwithstanding the report of responsible Canadian men on the subject, he under took to override their views, and induce Colonel Jones to take the other course. That is shown by the report. In addition to that, let me point out to hon. gentlemen of the committee what occurred when Sir William Babtie held the investigation. He declared that Colonel Bruce and Colonel Jones were both wrong, that the advice of Sir George Perley, who knew nothing of the treatment of wounded soldiers, should be followed, and he over-ruled Colonel Bruce and Colonel Jones. With what result? I wish to refer to the question of the administration of Shorncliffe, the V. A. D. hospital, which our friend, the ex-Minister of Militia, has been condemning so vigorously on the various occasions on which he spoke in this House. In regard to that there is no issue between Colonel Jones and Colonel Bruce, but Sir William Babtie, the hero of the Mesopotamia breakdown, takes another view, and Sir George Perley takes another view, and because they take the other view, therefore the opinion and judgment of these Canadian medical officers of repute is of no value.

Let me give you an illustration. There has obtained, in what is known as the Shorncliffe area, a group of V. A. D. hospitals, which have been costing this country $160,000 a year unnecessarily. Colonel Bruce last November gave directions to close them up as far as Canada was concerned, and hand them over to the Imperial authorities, but that paragon of military knowledge and judgment in regard to matters of war and matters of medical treatment, Sir George Perley comes along and says, "You pay no attention to Colonel Bruce, or his judgment in regard to that matter, run these things as they have been run, keep them going." And it has cost this country from November down to the present time over $100,000, according to General Bruce's statement in regard to this matter, for the purpose of keeping these hospitals going unnecessarily. Does it not strike hon. members, in regard to this matter alone, where you have these facts which are unquestionable, without going into details in reference to all these twenty-three findings which General Bruce has made upon the conditions that exist over there, that it is time this Parliament took some interest in this matter, and made an effort to ascertain what the real facts are in regard to it? Mark you, at the conclusion of all these facts that were found by Colonel Bruce, he makes 14 distinct recommendations as to improvements that should be made, and in 12 of these recommendations, as a perusal of Colonel Jones' report will show, he agrees absolutely with Colonel Jones. In regard to one he says the recommendation is all right, but it might cost too much to put it into effect, and in regard to another he says he does not seriously question it. Then we get Sir William Babtie's report, and he disregards Colonel Bruce and Colonel Jones, and declares that they do not know what they are talking about. That is the man whom this commission appointed by the Imperial Parliament, so unequivocally and solemnly condemned for the breakdown that occurred in Mesopotamia. There is the situation. I am not going into the details of the report, nor into the facts at any greater length. I have instanced these two things, and the evidence is indisputable that there is no manner of doubt that Colonel Bruce's finding and his recommendations were in the interest of the boys who were wounded and brought there for treatment. What the people of this country want to know is why these recommendations have not been carried out? Why was it? Simply because Sir George Perley stands in the way. Sir William Babtie was detached for the moment from his duties at Mesopotamia and elsewhere to conduct this commission. My hon. friend the Minister of Militia received from Colonel Bruce, if I recollect correctly, in the month of April, his answer to the Babtie report, and he has not given it to the Canadian Parliament, or to the Canadian people up to this moment.

I leave it to the reasonable intelligence and fairness of every hon. gentleman in this House, as to why we in Canada, as the representatives of the people whose sons have gone forth, have not received that report of Colonel Bruce, and why we have not an authoritative statement from some quarter as to why his original recommendations were not put into effect. Let me call attention to what occurred. We were told, after we had repeatedly asked the minister to bring down the report, that it was being sent over to Sir George Perley. I make the statement in this House, as coming from a responsible party on the other side, that Sir George Perley stated early this month that he had not seen this report of Colonel Bruce? Why did he not see it? Did my hon. friend the minister send it over, or did he not, or was it lost in transit? Was there only one copy? Were there any copies of it printed when it came to the minister, and if he has a copy of it now will he lay it on the table of the House? Why is it Sir George Perley took that position? Why is it that we in this Parliament have not the full knowledge in regard to it? What right has Sir George Perley to override this Parliament or this Government? He has not conferred on him any plenary or express powers which enable him to disregard this Government and Parliament, although there is standing on the Order Paper a resolution providing for the appointment of an Overseas Minister, and it has been standing there all through the session. If the Government intended to confer special rights and powers upon Sir George Perley, a Bill should have been submitted to Parliament long ago, which would show the authority he had over there. The Government have not moved in the matter. An order in council was passed some time ago by which he was given certain powers, but is Sir George Perley bigger than the Government and the Canadian people that he can keep these reports and not have them sent here? Have we not a right to know whether or not the recommendations of Colonel Bruce are being carried out? Have we not a right to know the contents of this report in which he answers the Babtie report? The fact that the Government have not given us this is evidence of an intention to suppress it, unless we have the full explanation which will enable us to take some other view.

No matter what the conditions are, it is of no use for persons interested to make inquiry of the Militia Department about some poor fellow who, having been at the front ever since 1914, has been wounded two or three times and has gone back to duty. My hon. friend issues a circular, tells us about this and about that, and says that Sir George Perley is the man who will allow this wounded soldier to come back. Some time ago we were told that in cases of this kind the British authorities stood in the way. We are told to-day that the British authorities have nothing whatever to do with the internal economy, the arrangement and the disposition of the Canadian troops on the other side. When our men take up a certain portion of the line, though they are, for fighting purposes, under the control of General Haig or whoever happens to be in charge of that part of the line, in the matter of internal economy they are under the direction of their officers, who are responsible not to the Canadian people or to the Canadian Government, but to Sir George Perley. Unless that gentleman chooses to nod his head, nobody in Canada can get any satisfaction about anything. He has imposed his will in regard to the V. A. D. hospitals, contrary to the view of Colonel Bruce and General Jones. Why did he do so? Will the minister tell us why? Did Sir George Perley know more about the matter than these two specialists, one the medical head of the Militia Department in this country, and the other a specialist selected for the purpose of inquiring into this matter? It is useless to quote the Babtie report, in view of the disclosures made in Mesopotamia, either in regard to the treatment of the medically unfit who go over or in regard to the methods employed in dealing with the boys who return wounded to England. According to the evidence that we have, these wounded soldiers are scattered all over the islands, from the Orkneys to Land's End. Why should that be so? Colonel Sullivan, who had to do with the transportation of these wounded soldiers back to England, says that there is no reason why they should not all be treated in Canadian hospitals. The remedies suggested by the reports of Colonel Bruce and General Jones have not been applied—Sir George Perley stands in the way. He stands in the way of the Canadian people and the Canadian Parliament knowing the answer which Colonel Bruce made to the Baptie report. In view of the destruction of the prestige of Sir William Baptie in connection with the expedition in Mesopotamia, certainly the Canadian people should know what Colonel Bruce had to say in answer to that report.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Hon. gentlemen of the committee will hardly say that the enlistment of upwards of 400,000 men and the organization of medical services in connection with them in Canada and in England would be accomplished without a jar. Having regard to the inexperience of our country in war and the inexperience of our medical men in connection with such matters, it is reasonable to suppose that things would occur which would not have occurred if there had been greater experience.

Reference has been made to the examining by medical officers of our recruits in Canada; it has been suggested that in some cases there was evidence of carelessness. I do not doubt that for a moment. In view of the hurry and of the competition that took place between the battalions, and in view of the inexperience of some of the medical officers, that was bound to occur to some extent. I do not think it is as serious as it has been represented; as time has gone on, regulations regarding the examination have been bettered in the light of the experience that has been gained. In that connection permit me to read to the committee a report, dated July 9, 1917, addressed to me by Colonel J. L. Potter, Director-General of Medical Services in Canada:

Medical Inspection of drafts and units arriving from Canada.

1. A report received from overseas, dated 30th May, gives the following information on the subject marginally noted:—

Units.	Strength.	Unfits.
190th Battalion	392	0
225th Battalion	507	0
200th Battalion	478	0
216th Battalion	87	0
177th Battalion	25	0
256th Battalion	137	0
2nd Reinf.	—	—
5th R.H.C.	54	5
Total	1,680	5

2. Of those pronounced unfit, it is noted two had disabilities which, possibly, did not render them absolutely unfit for some duty in England, viz., flat foot and over riding of little toes.

3. One man was suspected of being tubercular but it is not definitely stated that he is suffering from tuberculosis.

4. One man was reported as being addicted to the use of drugs. It is possible that circumstances were such that, after arrival overseas, he was unable to secure the drug and the disability immediately became apparent.

5. One case was that of a man suffering from stiffened thumb of left hand and debility.

6. In this case it should be noted that, of the numbers involved, viz., 1,680, only five were reported as unfit; two of them at least (one suffering from flat foot and over riding of the little toes) possibly may be of service.

The errors reported in the case of suspicious tuberculosis, drug habit and stiffened thumb of the left hand and debility, are errors which, possibly, may be excused. In any case, the report indicates that the medical examination of the men before they proceeded overseas was carefully carried out.

So that the remarks which the member for Pictou has made with regard to men going overseas who were not properly examined in Canada apply to the earlier, not to the later, stages of the war.

Mr. MACDONALD: What I say applies to 1916, I am anxious to learn from Colonel Bruce's report what the conditions were this year.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Colonel Bruce's report, I take it, does not deal particularly with what has happened within the last year or so.

Mr. MACDONALD: His first report deals with conditions in September, 1916. The report of the Babtie Board deals with conditions in December, 1916.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Various reports have been made by medical men overseas with regard to the question which my hon. friend has discussed here to-day. I sincerely hope that out of all these reports better conditions have arisen. My hon. friend has referred to something that happened in Mesopotamia. That goes to show that the British Government has had trouble, even with their greater experience in military matters, in the medical administration of their forces. It could hardly be expected, therefore, that some such incidents as my hon. friend has referred to should not happen in a country like Canada, where we have enlisted so many men. It is not quite fair for my hon. friend to say that Sir George Perley has overridden this medical man or that medical man or the other medical man.

Mr. MACDONALD: The evidence shows that.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Sir George Perley is endeavouring to carry out to the best of his ability the very responsible duties with which he is charged. I have every confidence that the medical service in England is being well administered at the present time, and with all the difficulties with which it has been confronted, it would be surprising had a better condition of affairs arisen. My hon. friend has referred to many matters connected with these reports. I am not so familiar as he is with the reports. I have not had time to study them on account of the many duties with which I am charged, but out of all the differences of opinion on the part of the doctors, we have arrived at a very satisfactory state of affairs in regard to our medical service in the British Isles. I do not know anything about the reference made by my hon. friend about Sir George Perley overriding Dr. Jones. So far as the question of Sir George Perley's appointment is concerned, I understood my hon. friend to say that he had never been appointed, and he did not quite know what his status was. Sir George Perley was appointed by order in council in October last.

Mr. MACDONALD: I said that.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The hon. member referred to something that was on the Order Paper. The notice on the Order Paper to which my hon. friend refers does not constitute the appointment of Sir George Perley; it constitutes something else altogether. Sir George Perley was appointed; he is a colleague of mine; he does not take instructions from me, but reports direct to the Prime Minister the same as any other colleague of mine does, and he is responsible to the Prime Minister and to the Government of this country. There is no confusion about the matter. My hon. friend has brought up this point many times in this House. It is necessary to have on the spot a minister of the Crown responsible in the way Sir George Perley is responsible for the new condition that has arisen owing to the large number of troops whom we have sent overseas, and to have him report direct to the Prime Minister in respect to these matters.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister said that I was hardly correct in stating that Sir George Perley had overriden Dr. Jones. If my hon. friend will look at Dr. Jones' report, he will see this statement which I did not read before:

> As to the change in policy in February, 1916, in the matter of distribution of Canadians in British hospitals, it is submitted that strong representations had been made to me for some time by prominent Canadians, including the High Commissioner, that in the interests of the Empire, Canadian soldiers should be distributed in English hospitals, where they could fraternize with British soldiers, and soldiers from the other Dominions. And, finally, owing to the very strong position which Sir George Perley took in favour of this, I receded from my former position.

That shows that he did override Dr. Jones. The minister has failed to tell us when we are going to get a copy of the last report of Dr. Bruce.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I wish to refer for a moment to the fact that the Government deserted their own officer, although, so far as any one could see, he appeared to be doing an important duty well. Will the minister explain why the Government abandoned Dr. Bruce? Why did they not permit him to go on with the work they asked him to undertake? We cannot expect a public official to do honest and efficient work if, whenever he gets into trouble and makes a report that is not satisfactory to everybody, the Government is to go back on him and abandon him and appoint some other commission to criticise what he has done and to defeat the work he has been attempting to do. It looks as if this Government was getting into the habit of investigating the investigator. Last night we had a discussion in regard to a similar matter. A man was commissioned to discharge an important duty and apparently he did it well and energetically, and made his report to the Government, but his report was thrown aside by the Government and a new commission was appointed to carry on an investigation for the purpose of befogging the issue and of destroying the report made by an officer of the Government. In the present case, Dr. Bruce was either an honest and capable official or he was not. I think every one in Canada who knows him will say that he was honest and capable, and if he was the Government should have stood by him, and if there was any further investigating to be done it should have been done by Dr. Bruce. As he undertook the work, I can see no reason why he was not continued in his position until a result was arrived at. Dr. Bruce acted very promptly. He was appointed on the 31st day of July, 1916, and he was commissioned to make an inspection of all the Canadian hospitals under the control of and paid for by the Canadian Government. He proceeded to do that work, and he reported on the 20th day of September, six or seven weeks after his appointment. He must have carried on his work with energy, and, so far as we can see, with efficiency. When his report was received what would be the duty of the Government? A man not in military life would say that the first duty of the Government was to institute the reforms suggested by Dr. Bruce in his report, but instead of doing that they appointed Dr. Babtie ,who now turns out to be a discredited person himself on account of his conduct in Mesopotamia, to investigate what Dr. Bruce has already investigated. We have not had any explanation from the minister as to why that step was taken, and it is a mystery to the people of Canada. If Dr. Bruce was an honest and capable man the Government should not have abandoned him. If he was not, of course they should have dismissed him. The Babtie Commission, so far as I understand these reports, does not prove that Dr. Bruce was wrong.

Take, for example, two questions that are dealt with. The first one that I will refer to is the Voluntary Aid Hospitals. My hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) has already spoken of that subject. These hospitals were all right at the inception of the war. They were mostly under the management of patriotic and well-meaning women, who were willing to do something in a volunteer way to help on the war, and when the war started we have no doubt those hospitals rendered valuable aid in looking after the wounded. But after the regular hospitals were organized and there was ample accommodation for the wounded, the use for those Voluntary Aid Hospitals seemed to have disappeared. It will be admitted by the minister that we might as well dispense with them, and Dr. Babtie, in his report, does not show that Dr. Bruce was wrong in that particular.

The second question is the unfit medical men. Dr. Bruce pointed out that there were cases in which men were serving in hospitals who were unfit for that duty, and that soldiers were suffering on that account. Dr. Babtie first makes the statement that that charge is not borne out by the facts. A little later on in his report, however, he admits the truth of Dr. Bruce's statement that there were incompetent doctors in the service, but he says that they were as good as the men in any other branch of the service; that is about the explanation he gives. Dr. Bruce, of course, wanted the very best doctors that could be obtained, and there was no necessity, so far as I can see, for keeping unfit or incompetent doctors in the service at that stage. I was greatly impressed by a letter published in the Toronto Globe recently from Adelaide R. Poole, R.N., who had been a nurse for a year and a half in military hospitals in France and England. I do not know the lady, but I should like to read one paragraph of her letter:

> But the whole thing goes deeper than mere details of rival reports. The offence for which Col. Bruce is being punished is that he, being a doctor, dared to criticise other doctors. He dared, as a man acting in the interests of the public, to do his duty, even although it involved his sinning against medical etiquette, and consequently, no matter whether he be right or wrong, he has, and will have, almost the whole medical profession against him. This is the root of the whole matter, and the short-sighted public, instead of standing by the man who, for their sakes, broke one of the strongest fetishes of our day, join in the cry against him.
> This decision, this disqualification of a man who did his duty as he saw it, will have a far deeper effect than most people realize. Even at the present time, medical etiquette is so strong in military hospitals, that a Colonel, an old and experienced doctor, will hesitate before interfering with the youngest medical officer's treatment of a case, even when he feels in his heart it is mistaken, and will shut his eyes to habits and incompetence, in a way that could happen in no other corps in the army. Thinking people feel there is a danger to the community, even in civil life, in the way one doctor stands by another, no matter how inefficient or unworthy of confidence he be. No one but another member of the profession can say a doctor has made a mistake, or done wrong, no matter how flagrant the case may be. The patient is generally dead, the friends and relatives are ignorant, and the nurse, even when she knows, is trained not to speak. But after this lesson, an efficient, conscientious doctor, when he knows things are wrong in a hospital, knows lives are imperiled or lost by the habits of incompetence of other men, sometimes inferior to him in rank, though he break his heart over it, will keep quiet lest worse befall him—lest he himself be deprived of his chance of being useful. He will do his own work, and shut his eyes to what goes on around him. And he will be wise.

If a man appointed and paid to inspect is punished and dismissed for making a real report on what he finds, instead of patting every one on the back, as is usually the case, what would happen to just an ordinary officer if he dared to speak? If the public stand for it, they deserve what will come to them. But what of the helpless soldiers?

That is written by an experienced nurse who knows what is going on in some of these hospitals. I have no desire to make things seem worse than they are, but I should like some explanation from the minister as to why the department deserted Dr. Bruce when he was attempting to perform a very important public duty.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not think it is correct to say that the department deserted Dr. Bruce. Dr. Bruce made a certain report which aroused a good deal of controversy. The subject was investigated by another board, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sinclair) seems to be under the impression that that board was composed of one British officer, and that Canada was not represented on it at all; at least, if he is not under that impression himself, he conveyed that impression to the committee. The board was composed of Surgeon-General Sir William Babtie, K.C.M.G., C.B., V.C.; Colonel E. C. Ashton, G.O.C., C.T.D., Shorncliffe; Colonel J. T. Fotheringham, C.M.G., A.D.M.S., 2nd Canadian Division, B.E.F.; Colonel A. E. Ross, C.M.G., A.D.M.S., 1st Canadian Division, B.E.F.; Lieutenant-Colonel J. M. Elder, No. 3 Canadian Hospital, Boulogne. I do not believe you could find four names in the medical profession in Canada that would command greater respect than those.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Dr. Bruce was not a member of the second board?

[Mr. Sinclair.]

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No, but I understand he was present and had the opportunity of making representations.

Mr. MACDONALD: He says not. He says he was called to give evidence, but was not permitted to attend the sittings of the board.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I understand he was permitted to make his representations to the board. He may not have been permitted to attend their deliberations, but that is a somewhat different thing from what I stated.

So far as the medical service overseas is concerned, it is under the direction of a gentleman whom I believe to be a very competent officer. I saw something of him and heard a good deal about him when I was there this year. Surgeon-General Foster is a gentleman who has had considerable experience in the Canadian permanent service. He went across the Atlantic early in the war, and has had the advantage of a wide experience over there, and when new arrangements were made nearly a year ago, he was selected for the position which he now holds, namely, head of the Canadian Medical Services overseas. I believe he is discharging his duties efficiently and well, and that the services are being efficiently conducted. Of course, the experience of a person who visits hospitals and sees the patients is not by any means conclusive, but in justice to the management of the Canadian hospitals overseas, and in justice to the management of the British hospitals which I visited—and I visited a great many—I am bound to say this: although I inquired very frequently, indeed of almost every man whom I saw in the hospitals, whether they had any cause for complaint or any suggestion or representation to make, I never heard from first to last in the thirty or forty hospitals I visited in March and April of this year, a single complaint from a Canadian patient, or for that matter, from any patient, and I never saw anything in any one of these hospitals that would call for a critical remark. The men all seemed to be well cared for, comfortable and contented. As far as I could judge everything that could be devised for their care and comfort had been done.

As far as the V.A.D. hospitals are concerned, there are none of these at present under the Canadian system. There are some, however, under the British system and I visited some of these, but I saw nothing to excite criticism or comment on their management. I should be very sorry to believe that the Canadians who have gone overseas and have been wounded in this war or are suffering from illness are not being properly cared for; I believe that they are.

The work of the Canadian Army Medical Corps in the fight at Vimy Ridge has been described to me and it indicated a remarkable degree of efficiency. The arrangements for moving back the wounded and caring for them at once were remarkably thorough, and there was nothing left undone that one could suggest. I remember reading a letter quite recently from a Canadian physician who went overseas about two years ago. Dr. Andrew McPhail, of McGill University. The letter was not written to me, but to a friend who showed it to me. I am sorry I have not it here to read to the committee because it would impress upon the committee the splendid efficiency of the arrangements that were carried out by the Canadian Army Medical Service in that battle. Those arrangements reflect the highest credit upon every one concerned in them. The arrangements were thought out just as carefully, so far as they concerned the care of the wounded, as any of the other operations. When, in the midst of the fight, through sudden change in weather conditions, it became necessary to have 600 or 800 additional blankets brought up immediately, although that call was absolutely unexpected, those blankets were provided within less than one hour. The arrangements from first to last struck me as indicating the highest degree of efficiency in the care of our wounded at the front, as disclosed by what took place during and after that battle. With the profound conviction I have that the Army Medical Service in the Canadian Expeditionary Force is thoroughly efficient, I would deeply regret that the impression should get abroad through this country from anything said in this committee that the reverse is the case. I am convinced that the men who are serving in the Army Medical Service of the Canadian Expeditionary Force are not only men of excellent knowledge and wide experiences, but that they are men animated by the highest devotion to duty. They have not spared themselves in this war. They have gone to the very firing line whenever necessary. There have been many casualties among them. I have seen their ambulances with scores of shrapnel and bullet marks on them. Those men are right out in the very midst of the fighting, whenever it is necessary that they should be there. They do not stay behind. They and the orderlies under them go forward to where the wounded men are lying. I believe these men are doing as good service for Canada and the Empire to-day as any men in the Expeditionary Force, and that too much credit cannot be given to them for the splendid spirit by which they are inspired and the splendid work they have done.

Mr. PARDEE: I fully appreciate the remarks the Prime Minister has made. It is not in the mind of any one here to question the fact that the Army Service Corps is one of the best in the world. We all know they are doing splendid work. As the Premier has said, they are performing the most wonderful service. They take their chances along with the rest of the soldiers. But, if I understand it, the Bruce and the Babtie reports which are now under discussion do not refer in any way to this. The only thing those reports refer to is the treatment of the wounded in the hospitals in England, and the point is, is that right or is it wrong? The Premier says that he should be very sorry to see any doubt cast upon the service in this committee. But when we come to consider the Bruce and the Babtie reports, I ask this committee if it would not be well to set the whole matter before the people, and have the reports placed on the Table so that we may know where we are. It has appeared to me for some weeks, as it must have struck many members of this committee, that there is an air of mystery which should not exist concerning this affair. It should not be so, as a matter of right to the Canadian people, who are entitled to know what is being done so far as their relatives and their wounded are concerned. And the reason why the matter should be cleared up is that if this state of mystery continues it will not help recruiting. As I understand it, Dr. Bruce is one of the most eminent men of his profession, not only on this continent, but probably one of the most eminent to be found anywhere. On account of the alleged existence of certain conditions in England, he was sent to make a report. In one of the paragraphs of his report he says:

5 p.m.

> In view of the unanimity of my confreres who contributed in so important a measure to my report, may I briefly outline their eminent qualifications for the unpleasant but necessary task which they so cheerfully and ably performed.

Then he gives the names: Col. Reid, Col. Wallace Scott, Col. Wilson and Col. Walter McKeown. I do not know any of these men, and I have not the faintest idea who they may be; but, knowing the reputation Dr. Bruce holds in this country, and knowing the class of man he is, I am perfectly satisfied he did not take these men with him for the sake of making a biased report. He took them for the purpose of helping him to do the work he was sent to do. He consulted them, and they brought in a report finding, as my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) has shown, 23 grounds upon which the Canadian hospitals are not being properly administered, and making 23 recommendations as to how these wrongs may be righted. In their report they say: Do these things, in order that conditions may be bettered. Then what happens? Col. Babtie goes over, taking certain eminent medical men with him, and he makes a report in contradistinction to the Bruce report, and says that in certain things Bruce is all wrong, and Babtie is all right. You have it on the Prime Minister's own admission that Col. Babtie is a most eminent medical man. You have not only the admission of the Prime Minister that he is an eminent medical man, but the English Government has said so, because they put him in charge of one of the most difficult medical transport services they had; and, eminent though he was, he so entirely failed that the English Government have practically had to take the matter in hand and censure him. We have the Bruce report, and we have the Babtie report, and in connection with this Babtie report, the man who made it has come to grief through want of real medical knowledge along the lines he took.

Then, Sir, we have the Jones report, and with that I shall not deal. But we have this fact, that Dr. Bruce, in all fairness, considering his reputation, whether as a medical man or as a citizen, having been criticized in the Babtie report, should have had the human right to reply and say wherein he was right and wherein General Babtie was wrong. Again the mystery—why, I know not—but for weeks we have been endeavouring to get that reply from Dr. Bruce so that we might argue the question out and find, at least to our own satisfaction, whether we are right or wrong. As I understand it, this second Bruce report seems to have vanished into thin air. The Minister of Militia says he sent it to the minister overseas. The minister overseas says he never got it.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: What authority has my hon. friend for that statement?

Mr. PARDEE: I have a letter here, written in the early part of this month by a man who had seen the overseas minister and the overseas minister says he never got that report. That, I submit, is fairly good evidence. May I now ask if the minister has a copy of that report, and if he has, whether he will lay it on the table of the House? May I expect an answer?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have already given the answer. As far back as the 31st May I said:

> It is not the intention of the Government to lay it on the Table without first submitting it to the overseas Minister of Militia to whom in the ordinary course it should be presented, as it relates to matters under his immediate jurisdiction. Whether or not the report will afterwards be laid upon the Table, I am not for the moment prepared to say. I speak not of my own knowledge when I refer to the contents of the report, because it is voluminous and I have not had time to read it, but I understand that a portion of it is not responsive to anything in the report of the Commission over which General Babtie presided and that it is not made in respect of any matter upon which Colonel Bruce was asked to report. Whether that is the case I am not now prepared to say, owing to lack of time to make the necessary examination. I am thoroughly of opinion, however, that the report should first be submitted to the Overseas Minister of Militia.

That is what I said on the 31st May, and that is the position to which I still adhere. If the minister of the overseas forces has not received it, I do not understand the reason for that, because the Minister of Militia and Defence forwarded it to him. It is possible that it may have gone down in some vessel sunk by a submarine, but we have no reason to suppose that such is the case. It is a proper suggestion that we should ascertain by cabling whether he has received it, and we shall do that.

Mr. PARDEE: I have never been a member of a Government and so I am not familiar with the procedure of Governments, but I cannot understand, when the second Bruce report came, even although as the Prime Minister has said, it refers to matters that are within the knowledge of the minister overseas, why Sir George Perley should have to revise that report before it was given to the members of this House.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I did not say he should revise it.

Mr. PARDEE: Practically, the Prime Minister agrees with me, because he says that, as the minister overseas has to do with matters that are contained in the report, it ought to be submitted to him. Am I right in that?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I say it should have been submitted to him in the first place.

Mr. PARDEE: Dr. Bruce was appointed by this Government to report on certain things. He was not appointed by the minister overseas, but by order in council here, to report and give his findings. I submit that if he were to give an unbiased report he would go over there to report and without having reference, near or remote, to Sir George Perley, he would come back with that report, and the Government should lay that report upon the table of the House.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not think my hon. friend quite understands the situation. Colonel Bruce was not appointed by order in council. He was appointed by the then Minister of Militia and Defence to make inquiry and report. His report would naturally go to the Minister of Militia and Defence. It would not be sent to the Minister of Public Works or the Minister of the Naval Service; it would be sent to the minister who appointed him. After that report had been made, or about the time it was made, a change took place by which the duties that had up to that time been discharged by the Minister of Militia and Defence were divided, and in the future a portion of those duties were to be discharged by the Minister of Militia and Defence, and a portion of the duties were to be discharged by the minister of the overseas service. The particular matters to which the report related came under the jurisdiction conferred upon the minister of the overseas service, and therefore, for that purpose, he ocupied the position which the Minister of Militia and Defence occupied in the first instance. That is the reason why I say the report should have been presented to Sir George Perley in the first instance. I should like to make this plain further to my hon. friend—we are speaking of this document as a report. It is not a report in the ordinary sense. It is rather the criticisms or observations of Colonel Bruce in respect of the report made by the board of which General Babtie was the president. It was not ask for by any minister or by the Government; but he exercised his right, as he understood it, of making a reply to the conclusions that had been formulated in the report made by the board to which I have just alluded. So that, in the strict, technical sense, it is not a report but rather his reply to or observations upon the report made by that board.

Mr. PARDEE: Along that same line of reasoning, may I submit to the minister that, as it was only comment upon the Babtie report, if it should not be submitted to this House, and if it was not a report proper, why should it be submitted to the Minister of Militia overseas? But the Prime Minister says that it was. As I understand, it is then in this position, that the second Bruce commentary or report, whatever we may desire to call it, was made in answer to the Babtie report, that that commentary upon the Babtie report was sent here, I suppose, to this Government, to the Minister of Militia, or to my right hon. friend.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It did not come to me.

Mr. PARDEE: Then the Minister of Militia no doubt got it. It got to the Government somehow. Then, after it gets to the Government, the Government says that this is of such importance and it is such an integral part of the Babtie and Bruce reports, that, in order that the matter may be kept perfectly straight, and as the minister overseas has to deal with these matters, and as these matters must not be submitted to the House of Commons or laid on the Table in the form of a commentary or report, we must send this to the minister overseas in order that it may have his "O.K."

Am I right up to that point?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I would not say absolutely right. I will explain the position as I understand it. We say it should be sent to the minister overseas, as it related to questions under his jurisdiction and as to which he takes the place of the Minister of Militia. It should go to him in the regular course, but it should go to him for another purpose. I have already pointed out that it was not in response to any request of the Government, or of the Minister of Militia and Defence, or of the minister of the overseas service that it was sent. It contains some matters perhaps relating to the Babtie report, and a good deal of matter, which as I understand, does not relate either to that, or any other report. I am so informed by the Deputy Minister of Militia and Defence, who made a study of it, and made a report upon it to the Government. I say it should go to the minister of the overseas service in order that he might consult his officers in regard to it. It might be necessary to make some explanation or statement. I should suppose the minister of the overseas service would submit that commentary or criticism to Surgeon General Foster, who is at the head of the service over there, and ask him whether any of these criticisms, whatever they may be, are well founded, and if they are well founded what he proposes with regard to them. All that would seem to me to be a very proper and fair way of dealing with it. So, it was really sent to the minister of the overseas service, not to obtain his O.K., but for the two reasons: First, because he is the proper minister to whom it should be addressed, and, second, because the matters to which it relates are under the supervision and direction of himself and his officers, and it ought to be submitted to his officers, if it contains any matter of a serious character, in order that we may learn what they have to say about it.

Mr. PARDEE: I will concede what the Prime Minister has said, for the sake of argument—that it ought to be submitted to the overseas minister, and to Surgeon General Foster, that it might go through the proper channel to be O.K.'d and sent back here. The great point is that it should be here, or we should have a copy. It is now two months since it was sent. I think my request a reasonable one when I ask that the report, commentary, or whatever name the Government might like to give it, be wired for at once, that it be brought back, and placed upon the table of the House.

Of course this question has nothing to do with the treatment of the wounded men in France or Flanders; their initial treatment in those countries is the very best; the Army Medical Service Corps is one of the best in the world. But this deals with the treatment of the wounded in England. We should have the Bruce report with its recommendations, and the Babtie report with its counter recommendations, and the Jones' report, and the final analysis—if it may be taken to be the final analysis—of Colonel Bruce. That report ought to be before us, and if it is not before us, we should find out why it is now in the hands of the minister overseas. We might have a day to discuss it, because I think it is of the utmost consequence. The effects may be very far-reaching. The relatives of those wounded soldiers are interested, and in order that their minds may be set at rest, and in order that recruiting may not have the least set back whatever, the question whether the Babtie report or the Bruce report is right should be settled.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We will telegraph to Sir George Perley and find out whether the document has reached him. We will also telegraph him with respect to his view in regard to laying the document upon the table of the House, with or without any observations which his officers may desire to make with regard to it.

Mr. GRAHAM: The Prime Minister has said that the second report, or commentary, made by Dr. Bruce was not asked for by the Government. It is the unofficial report of an official investigation. If the Government did not ask for it—and the Government does not seem to want it—would there be any impropriety in Dr. Bruce making his reply public himself?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am really not in a position to answer that, because it might relate to matters that it would be undesirable for Colonel Bruce to make public. It might be an advantage to the enemy to know these things; it might be a detriment to the public interest, and I should not like to answer my hon. friend.

Mr. PARDEE: Can the hon. Minister of Militia inform me if he has received a cable from Dr. Bruce within the last few days, in regard to the second report, and the publication of it?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I received a cable from Dr. Bruce about a week or ten days ago, merely saying that he wished to have the report laid on the Table, or to have it made public, or something of that kind.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The question as to the contest between Dr. Bruce and Dr. Babtie is not of very much importance to the people of this country, but I should like to know whether any reforms have been introduced by the department to right the abuses referred to in Dr. Bruce's report. He has spoken of some very vital questions. I have the highest regard for the Canadian Medical Service. I know of a great many men from my own province who volunteered to take part in that service, and I know that many of them are among the pick of the medical men of that province. I am not aware that we sent any incompetent doctors from the province of Nova Scotia, but it appears from Dr. Bruce's report, if we can rely on it, that men have found their way into the service that were unfit for the position. The question is of vital importance. The civilian can choose his own doctor. If any of the hon. gentlemen around me require a doctor they select the best they can find, if they are able to pay for the service; but the soldier has to take what is given him; he is under the direction of a certain doctor who is looking after the ward, and his life is involved in the competence of that doctor. He has no choice, and therefore it is a question of the most vital importance that the Government should not have doctors in the service who are not fit for the duties devolving upon them. This is what Dr. Bruce says in regard to that matter:

> The personnel of the Canadian Army Medical Corps has been greatly hampered by the granting of commissions to medical men whose ability in civil life, and, in some cases, whose well-known habits were such as to reasonably preclude them from being honoured with a commission in the C.A.M.C.
> It has been found on investigation that many of the officers who have been given commissions have been failures as medical men at home, or are over age, or are drug fiends, or addicted to alcoholism, and these officers are not only of little or no use as C.A.M.C. officers, but their presence on an overseas unit is a detriment to the efficiency of that corps.

That is very strong language. If that statement is true, we have men in the service who are drug fiends or who are addicted to alcohol—men who should not be in the service at all. Did the Government take any action with a view to getting rid of these incompetent doctors?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) opened his remarks by stating that none of these doctors, so far as he knew, came from the part of the country which he represents. I can say the same thing with regard to the part of the country that I represent. So far as my knowledge goes, the same remark applies to the whole of Canada, with some few exceptions. No doubt some of these doctors who were addicted to drugs got overseas—I cannot speak definitely on that point. A few doctors, however, were sent back from the front out of the very large number that went over. The very best medical men in the country are overseas. In Toronto there are scarcely enough doctors to do the work required in the ordinary practice of medicine. The very pick of our doctors went overseas; I am confident that no reflection can be made in general upon the medical profession in that regard.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Dr. Bruce does not reflect generally upon the doctors who went overseas; he says that certain doctors have been given commissions who are unfit for the service. The minister has not answered my question, which was: Has the department got rid of these doctors, or are they still in the service? It is not necessary to say that we have good doctors over there; we all know that some of the most eminent medical men in Canada are in the service. But we cannot assume that Dr. Bruce made up this report out of whole cloth; we cannot assume that there is no truth in his statement. Will the minister answer my question as to whether these men are still in the service?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I thought I had made myself perfectly clear; I intended to, at any rate. Courts of inquiry were held in respect to certain doctors, and those doctors who were found incompetent to carry on their work were sent back to Canada.

Mr. SINCLAIR: After Dr. Bruce's report was put in?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: That has nothing to do with Dr. Bruce's report.

Mr. OLIVER: This is a matter of very deep concern to the people of Canada. There have been between 75,000 and 100,000 casualties in our Canadian forces, spread from the Atlantic to the Pacific. There is not a settlement, town or village in Canada in which some member of the community has not suffered casualty at the front. When a discussion such as this is brought forward at this time, it is very unsatisfactory to the people of Canada who are interested to find that, instead of the Government standing up and saying what they have done specifically to cure the conditions set forth in Dr. Bruce's report, the minister makes a general statement that things were not good, but that now they are better; that they are not good in the service of other countries, and that we cannot expect to have them any better in Canada. That, I submit, is not a satisfactory answer, and it is not made any better by the defence of the Prime Minister that the medical service at the front is beyond question. The medical service at the front is not under consideration. Dr. Bruce has not reported on the medical service at the front; a defence of that service brought into a discussion of Dr. Bruce's report is, if it was intentional, made for the purpose of drawing attention from the matter under discussion. The situation is not improved by the known facts of the case as set out in cold type in the reports that have been placed on the Table. After two years of war, the then Minister of Militia, on the evidence gathered by him by personal observation, came to the conclusion that a reorganization or improvement of the medical service in England was necessary or advisable. He selected, for the purpose of making inquiry, and for the purpose of reorganizing that medical service if inquiry should develop that it needed reorganization, one of the most eminent surgeons in Canada. Evidently, whatever other mistakes the then Minister of Militia may have made, he made no mistake in that appointment. The report of Dr. Bruce, dated September 20, is a most complete review of the medical or the hospital situation in the British Isles so far as it concerns the Canadian forces. It is evidently undertaken by a man who has the confidence of experience and reputation. He sets out in good plain English the conditions as he finds them and makes specific recommendations for the improvement of those conditions. Did the Government act on that report? They did not. As soon as the report was made public, there was a noise throughout England, from one end of the country to the other. Bruce's report was discussed in the English papers. What was the trouble with Bruce's report? In some portion of his report he had declared that it was more advisable that Canadian wounded should be cared for in Canadian hospitals by Canadian surgeons and physicians than that they should be scattered indiscriminately throughout the hospitals in the British Islands. Because he reported that, his report was criticised from one end of England to the other. For what reason? On the question of the medical treatment received by the Canadians? Not at all; but on the question whether it was desirable or not to educate them in Imperialism, if you please, by spreading them around amongst their Imperial fellow-soldiers.

Mr. HANNA: Have you any objection to that?

Mr. OLIVER: Dr. Bruce makes this objection to it, that as these are Canadian soldiers and Canada is providing Canadian hospitals and, as has already been said in this House, she has sent over some of the best of her medical men and surgeons who have volunteered into that service for the purpose of doing the best they could for their fellow-citizens who have served the cause in the war, our men should have the benefit of those special services. There could be nothing more reasonable than the contention of Dr. Bruce in regard to that matter, but because it did not suit some of the people of influence in the Old Country, there was a campaign started in the newspapers against Dr. Bruce. It was taken up by the Overseas Minister of Militia; it was supported by the minister on this side of the water, and forthwith Dr. Bruce had to be submitted to the indignity of an investigation by a commission headed by Dr. Babtie, who now, as a consequence of the revelations of what has occurred in Mesopotamia, is a discredited member of the medical and surgical service of the British army. Is that how we are going to get more efficient treatment for our suffering citizens in England? It has been said here that Dr. Bruce is the best surgeon in Canada, and any one who reads his report will see that he certainly is a man who is prepared to back up his opinion with his recommendations; that he is prepared to stand by what he says. Having read his report, I am, as a layman, bound to come to the conclusion that whether there is good medical or surgical knowledge in it or not, there is a great deal of sound common sense. But this man, who represents the best element of, at any rate, one of the highest professions in the Dominion of Canada, who was rendering service only because of patriotic enthusiasm, and who did render good service, was, because he ran foul of the social circle in England, at once put under the indignity of being investigated by another commission, and his work was thrown to one side. I am not concerned with Dr. Bruce; I do not belong to the profession of which he is an honoured member; but I am one of the plain citizens of the Dominion of Canada, and with many thousands of those citizens I have some interest in the hospitals in England, and such treatment does not appeal to me as being fair or right, or in the best interest of Canada's service in the war. This matter was brought up months ago in this House, but there is no answer except the statement made by the Prime Minister to-day, that he does not think it advisable to let the facts be known because it might injure recruiting in Canada. The Prime Minister has injured recruiting in Canada.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Did my hon. friend say that the Prime Minister stated he did not want this done because it might injure recruiting?

Mr. OLIVER: I understood that.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I did not hear him say that.

Mr. OLIVER: He said it would not be wise to have too much said about the facts.

Mr. HANNA: He said it was contrary to the national interest.

Mr. OLIVER: He said it was contrary to the national interest that confidential information contained in the report should be made public.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: It might give information to the enemy.

Mr. OLIVER: We shall have to say this, that so far as the Government are concerned in connection with this report, they certainly have been careful to give information neither to friends nor to enemies. This report, which was published in England as soon as it was made, which was printed in England for public distribution, which was published in the newspapers in England and spread from end to end of the United Kingdom within a day or two after it appeared, has never yet been printed in Canada for the information of the people of this country, and even the English reprint that is here would never have been laid on the table of the House had a demand not been made on the Government for that measure of publicity. Yet, that being the case, when the question is raised again, and Dr. Bruce's reply to the Babtie investigation is asked for by this House, we are told in effect that the Government have this report in their hands and they will make it public or not as they please.

Dr. Bruce is at the present time in the British service. He is not in civilian life. He is in a position in which he may be condemned to the limit and he has not the privilege of reply. The abuse of the power of the Government to prevent Dr. Bruce from making a public statement in justification of his own position cannot have my support. As a member of this House of Commons, this free Parliament of the people of Canada, speaking for the people who are interested in this matter even more than Dr. Bruce or the Government is, I for one demand the publication of Dr. Bruce's statement at the earliest possible date, and if it is not published I will hold the Government as condemned, as not daring to publish the truth, as unwilling to justify or permit to be justified one of the Canadians who have suffered and are suffering in this war, and whose service has been a credit to Canada, as it is to-day admitted to be a benefit to the British military service.

Mr. MACDONALD: In view of the minister's statement that he received a cablegram from Dr. Bruce asking him for the publication of the report, does the minister intend to comply with the request of Dr. Bruce or not? I take it that the minister has a copy of the report in his possession.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: My hon. friend was in the House when the Prime Minister made his very full statement. He stated that he intended to cable Sir George Perley in regard to the matter. I asked him whether he intended to cable himself or whether I should, and he said that he would cable. He stated over and over again that he did not want to lay the report on the Table until he had heard from Sir George Perley. That is what I understood him to say; I do not know whether my hon. friend understood him differently.

Mr. MACDONALD: What the Prime Minister said was this. He read the statement he made on the 31st of May, when we asked him to bring down the report, in which he said he was sending it to Sir George Perley for his examination. Dr. Bruce communicated ten days ago with the Minister of Militia to whom he had sent the report; the report was not sent to Parliament. What answer did my hon. friend make to Dr. Bruce's cable?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I did not reply to it, as it called for no reply.

Mr. MACDONALD: Does the minister say that at no time since the 31st of May has he had any communication with Sir George Perley as to whether he received the report, and what he had to say about it?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The report was sent to Sir George Perley, as stated by the Prime Minister.

Mr. MACDONALD: Did he acknowledge receipt of it?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: He has it in his possession.

Mr. MACDONALD: The facts, then, are these. My hon. friend has a copy of Dr. Bruce's report, and Sir George Perley has a copy, but Sir George Perley has not communicated his views on the report to the minister. Why, therefore, does not the minister lay on the Table the report which he has in his possession?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Because I am not going to override the Prime Minister's wishes. I am subject to the Prime Minister; he is not subject to me. He has stated what he intends to do about it, and I am not going to do anything different.

Mr. MACDONALD: Then there is this confusion between my hon. friend and his leader. His leader stated that he was going to cable Sir George Perley to find out whether he had received the report. My hon. friend says that he knows Sir George Perley has had the report for some time, and has taken no exception to it. There is therefore no reason why the report should not be published. The minister's explanation of the situation is quite different from the Prime Minister's.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: There is no difference so far as I can see.

Mr. GRAHAM: The Prime Minister thought the report might have been sunk.

Mr. MURPHY: My hon. friend the Minister of Militia is in a position at all events to relieve the mind of the Prime Minister as to the fate of the report, because as the hon. member for South Renfrew remarked the Prime Minister expressed some fear that it might have gone down in a ship that had been torpedoed. The Minister of Militia is able to reassure the Prime Minister that that fate did not befall the report but that it is now in the hands of his colleague the Overseas Minister of Militia. The Minister of Militia here has also a copy of it. This discussion as it proceeds becomes increasingly valuable, because almost every other minute it elicits a new admission—an admission which the time of the committee should not have been taken up in eliciting at all. Why all this mystery, all this desire for delay in this connection? Why is it that this committee and this House and this Parliament are treated in this way? As I recall the statement made by the Minister of Militia, who, I must say, is usually very, very frank indeed with the committee and with the House, he stated first of all that he had not received the original report. He was questioned several times about the Bruce report and said that it had not reached him. Then he admitted receiving some mysterious letter from an unnamed place from some one.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I have all the letters in my possession, too.

Mr. MURPHY: He kept up the mystery in that way—

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Who kept up the mystery? I did not.

[Sir Edward Kemp.]

Mr. MURPHY: The mystery was kept up. My hon. friend has been very unfortunate in the mails. Some perverse fate seems to be pursuing him in connection with this supplementary report.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Would my hon. friend be good enough to state plainly what he means. Does he mean to insinuate that I have given information to the House in connection with this matter which was not true?

Mr. MURPHY: I am not making any insinuations, but endeavouring to recall what the minister said. My memory may be at fault in some immaterial particulars. I was merely pointing out that from the inception of this discussion an atmosphere of fog has been thrown around this whole thing which the committee and the members of the Opposition have been unable to penetrate. I was pointing out that the Minister of Militia stated some months ago, when inquiry was made about this report, that it had not reached him, and he repeated that statement over and over again when questioned in the House. Then he admitted that he had received a letter later on, but that it was undated or unsigned or did not contain the sender's address.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: That is absolutely correct.

Mr. MURPHY: And because of that he could not tell us about the report. I am only recalling these things to show what a long process was gone through before we finally nailed down somebody to something about this report. To-day, again, the same performance goes on, and the Overseas Minister of Militia is conveniently brought in at different stages. At one stage it is uncertain whether he received the report. At another, we are told that he has received it. The Prime Minister reads a statement he made in the House two months ago, when he said that he was going to communicate with the Overseas Minister of Militia. Two months have elapsed, and apparently he has not done that yet.

Remember, Dr. Bruce is naturally solicitous about his own reputation and anxious to have the veracity of his statements established. Dr. Bruce, it seems, has cabled the minister asking that the report be laid on the Table. That reminds me that my hon. friend was not just as candid as I gave him credit for a few moments ago, for he made that admission only upon being questioned from this side of the House. He did not volunteer that statement; it was dragged out of him.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I answered the question when it was asked. The information was not dragged out of me; I had quite forgotten about it.

Mr. MURPHY: So the standard set up by my hon. friend the Minister of Militia is this. He, as Minister of Militia, as a servant of the people of this country, does not consider himself under any obligation to place the facts concerning any matter in his department before this committee, unless it should happen that some member on this side of the House has personal knowledge regarding it and asks the minister a question about it. I submit that this is a most improper position for a minister to take. He should give the committee all the information at his disposal, and so save the time of the committee and the time of the House.

What was the position assumed by the Prime Minister? The Prime Minister must have been in possession of the information that is in the possession of the Minister of Militia. The Minister of Militia says that a copy of this report is in the hands of the Overseas Minister of Militia. The Prime Minister gets up and professes not to have any knowledge of that, and intimates as a reason for not having any knowledge of it that the report may have gone down in some ship that was torpedoed. He was going to cable to-day to ascertain what the man sitting in the next chair to him knew, and could have told him if he had only turned in his direction. I submit that that is not treating this committee and this House and this country properly. This is too serious a matter to be trifled with in this way. "Trifled" is the only parliamentary term that I am permitted to apply to it, but I would apply a much stronger term if the rules of the House permitted me to do so.

My hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) has properly drawn the attention of the committee and of the Government to the responsibility of the Government in this matter. That responsibility is so grave, and this is a matter that comes so intimately home to so many people in this country, that I submit to the Minister of Militia that in justice to himself, in justice to the Government of which he is a member, in justice to the committee and to the House of Commons and the people of this country, and quite irrespective of what his leader has said, it is his duty to see that the cable is sent to Sir George Perley this evening and that no more delay takes place.

I submit we should have this matter cleared up by to-morrow at the very latest and that this committee should not sit from day to day passing the estimates of my hon. friend while this air of mystery surrounds such an important question. A cablegram from Sir George Perley will let us know what his position is, and what objection he has, if any, to the production of this report. Candidly I am sick and tired of this fable which is spun from the other side of the House to the effect that this, that, and the other thing cannot be produced because it may give information to the enemy. To use a vernacular expression, that should be about played out. My hon. friend will remember that I made a motion for the production of a mobilization scheme of the Canadian forces which I understand was drawn up in 1913. This was a scheme with which everybody in and around Ottawa was perfectly familiar and which was a matter of common gossip. Instead of being carried out it was ignored, and this Government by reason of ignoring it has lost for the country tens of millions of dollars. I asked for the production of a copy of that mobilization scheme and the minister requested that the matter should not be pressed, that it was undesirable in the public interest that the documents should be produced. This scheme was four years old, yet it was supposed it might give information to the enemy. I recall this only to show my hon. friend the Minister of Militia that he is the victim of a system, and for the sake of his own good reputation and the honour and benefit of the country that system should be got rid of as quickly as possible. He can make a beginning in that direction by seeing that a cable is sent to Sir George Perley this evening, so that we may have a reply by to-morrow at the latest, and may know exactly where we stand with regard to this supplementary report of Dr. Bruce. I may remind my hon. friend that his ex-colleague asked a very pointed question about this matter, and received very little satisfaction. From the question I should infer that the contents of this mysterious report are not, after all, so mysterious or so hard to get at as my right hon. friend the Prime Minister and my hon. friend the Minister of Militia would have this committee believe. I again press upon the minister the absolute necessity, in the public interest as well as in his own interest, of having a cablegram sent to-night.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

TORONTO, HAMILTON AND BUFFALO RAILWAY COMPANY.

The House again in Committee on Bill No. 39, respecting the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway Company.—Mr. T. J. Stewart.

Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Mr. T. J. STEWART: Mr. Chairman, I regret that the other evening an error was made in connection with the striking out of sections 1 and 2, which related to the town of Dundas. The schedule, which contains the agreement between the town of Dundas and the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway company, should have been struck out at the same time, and I now move that the schedule be struck out.

Mr. GRAHAM: The other night some of us questioned the propriety of passing the measure, as no one seemed to know whether or not it was right. But if the Government, the member for Wentworth (Mr. G. C. Wilson), and the chairman of the committee, have all agreed, I suppose it will have to go through.

Mr. T. J. STEWART: I think I am safe in promising the hon. member that he will not be troubled with this Bill any more. It has been agreed between the town of Dundas and the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway company that the clauses be withdrawn. There will be no more controversy.

Motion agreed to.

Bill reported and read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY.

The House resumed in Committee of Supply, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Mr. OLIVER: While greater attention has been paid to that portion of Dr. Bruce's report which deals with the distribution of the Canadian wounded in hospitals in Great Britain, really the most important feature of his report and the one upon which he lays the greatest stress is the condition that results in the landing and maintaining in England of large numbers of men unfit for service at the front. It is with this point that Dr. Bruce deals most fully in his report on that question. He shows there is a condition in England that is detrimental to the efficiency of the military forces of Canada and is seriously burdensome upon the treasury of Canada without any resulting benefit. In fact the result, as circumstances are now, is a double loss, because the men who are not of military value in England would be of industrial value in Canada, and Canada is deprived of their services in industrial life, while we are receiving no benefit from them in military service. That at least is the evidence of Dr. Bruce, Dr. Jones and Dr. Babtie.

It is necessary that the people of Canada should understand to what extent this condition has prevailed and what it means to the people of Canada that it does prevail, and who is responsible for its existence. Some weeks ago the member for Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs) stated from his place in the House that there were 12,900 medically unfit men in service in England, and he recommended, very properly, that these men be brought back to Canada for industrial employment. I have asked for a statement of the number of medically unfit men who have been brought back to Canada.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I am not sure whether those statistics have been given to the House. A great number of statistics have been furnished. All of those statistics which will be available are now available, and if these figures have not been given and if we have them I shall bring them down.

Mr. OLIVER: These figures were not contained in the statement made by the minister on a previous occasion. I have, however, a statement on that point that I shall take the liberty of placing before the House, and that is sufficiently startling. I have here a statement in regard to sixteen battalions going overseas during 1916. They are as follows: The 96th, Saskatchewan; the 111th, London, Ontario; the 113th, Lethbridge, Alberta; the 130th, Perth, Ontario; the 136th, Port Hope, Ontario; the 140th, St. John, New Brunswick; the 145th, St. John, New Brunswick; the 146th, Kingston, Ontario; the 151st, Edmonton, Alberta; the 152nd, Weyburn, Saskatchewan; the 179th, Winnipeg, Manitoba; the 189th, Fraserville, Quebec; the 142nd, London, Ontario; the 160th, Walkerton, Ontario; the 161st, Clinton, Ontario; the 168th, Woodstock, Ontario. Of these battalions, the 96th arrived in England with a strength of 770. Of these 111 were unfit for service, being a percentage of 14.43. The strength of the 111th of London, Ontario, was 635; the number unfit for service was 185, the percentage of unfits being 29.13.

Mr. EDWARDS: Does my hon. friend mean unfit for active military service at the front?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS: Or entirely unfit? Some men are passed as unfit for service in France, or at the front, but are still retained in the reserve battalions. Does my hon. friend mean that these men are relegated back to civil life, out of the service entirely, or has he figured on that?

Mr. OLIVER: I have been asking the minister for these figures. I am giving the figures of the men listed as unfit for service at the front, the men who will never go to France.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Not necessarily. They may not at the moment be fit for service. They may not be ready to be classed in Category A, but they may be fit for service after a while. There are several categories in the table which I presented. It does not follow that all these men are not fit for service ultimately.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not know that they will all be unfit finally, but they were unfit on their arrival in England, and I will give some further facts as to why they were unfit, which will show they will never go to France. This may not apply to all, but it will apply to a large proportion. I want to know what is the policy of the Government in regard to these men who can never go to France. The 113th Battalion, Lethbridge, Alberta, had 879 men, 153 unfit for service, percentage 17.14. The 130th of Perth, Ontario, 554 men, 64 unfit, percentage 11.55. The 136th of Port Hope, Ontario, 472 men—less than 500 when they arrived in England—and of that number 144 were unfit for service, 30.50 per cent. The 140th of St. John, New Brunswick, 822 men, of whom 18 were unfit for service, 2.19 per cent. The 145th of St. John, N.B. 524 men, 82 unfit, 15.66 per cent. The 146th of Kingston, Ontario, arrived in England with 576 men, of whom 72 were unfit for service, 12.2 per cent. The 151st of Edmonton, Alberta, arrived in England with 907 men, 136 unfit for service, 14.99 per cent. The 152nd of Weyburn, Saskatchewan, 742 men, 187 unfit, 25.20 per cent. The 179th of Winnipeg, Manitoba, had 890 men, 116 were unfit, 13.03 per cent. The 189th of Fraserville, Quebec, 561 men, 99 unfit, 17.64 per cent. The 142nd of London, 561 men, 164 unfit, 29 per cent. The 160th of Walkerton, 997 men, 140 unfit, 13 per cent. The 161st of Clinton, Ontario, 740 men, 67 unfit, 9 per cent. The 168th of Woodstock, Ontario, 604 men, 87 unfit, 13 per cent. The average percentage of men unfit for service in this list of sixteen battalions was sixteen. There was sixteen per cent of the men who arrived overseas unfit for service in France.

Mr. EDWARDS: Are those figures official, from the department, or what is the source of that information?

Mr. OLIVER: I am giving these figures on the best information I have.

Mr. EDWARDS: What is the information?

Mr. OLIVER: It would not be of any value to the hon. gentleman to give the source of information. I am giving the House the best information I have on the subject, and it will be for the department to show these figures not correct, if that is the fact.

Mr. EDWARDS: That is hardly reasonable.

Mr. OLIVER: That is the best I can do at the present time, but I am satisfied it will be found the figures are correct.

Mr. STEELE: When were these men declared unfit? Immediately on landing, or some time after?

Mr. OLIVER: I presume as soon after landing as a medical examination is ordinarily held. The statement I have is that the men, on landing in England, were medically unfit for service in France. They were perfectly healthy men and good for civil life, but the point I desire to make is in the case of these sixteen battalions, sixteen per cent of the men sent over to England were of no military value to us, while they would have been of industrial value had they remained at home, and I am anxious to know if the department intends to bring them back, or what is its policy in regard to these men, and how many of them are there?

Mr. EDWARDS: I want to say, on what I believe is good, sound and reliable information, that I do not think the hon. gentleman's figures are correct, in regard to the 146th.

Mr. TAYLOR: Perhaps I can give the explanation. I take it from the numbers of these battalions that they went last fall.

Mr. OLIVER: Some time during 1916.

Mr. TAYLOR: Last fall the authorities in France made a new rule, excluding all over 40 years of age, and all under 20, from service in France during the winter. I think the hon. gentleman will find that these two arbitrary exclusions, applying only to the severe weather of the winter, account for nearly all these unfits of whom he has been reading to the House.

Mr. OLIVER: Whatever reason there was for their unfitness, the point is that these men were enlisted for military service in France. The man who is not in a condition to perform military service in France has no right to be enlisted.

Mr. STEELE: Does my hon. friend take into account the number of men who took sick on the overseas journey and were quarantined upon their arrival? In the 168th Battalion, with which the member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) is quite familiar, a considerable number of men were quarantined immediately upon their arrival in England.

Mr. NESBITT: They were not sent back.

Mr. OLIVER: Sixteen battalions, comprising 11,234 men, arrived in England, and of that number of men 1,825 were medically unfit, an average of 16 per cent.

Mr. TAYLOR: Not medically unfit.

Mr. OLIVER: I mean unfit for service in France. I have here the causes of unfitness in regard to twelve of these battalions. In these twelve battalions 1,367 men were listed as unfit for service in France. The cause of disability were as follows: under age 515, over age, 334.

Mr. EDWARDS: That bears out the statement of my hon. friend (Mr. Taylor).

Mr. OLIVER: To some extent. Of course, those who are over age will never be fit for service; those who are under age will become fit in time.

Mr. TAYLOR: Those who are over age are fit now, because in the summer they take men up to 45, whereas in the severe winter they exclude those who are over 40.

Mr. OLIVER: Does my hon. friend say that they bring back from France in the winter the men who are over 40 years of age?

Mr. TAYLOR: No, they do not send them to France when they are over 40. They send them when the fine weather comes.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What do they do with them when the winter comes round?

[Mr. Oliver.]

Mr. TAYLOR: Unfortunately, very few men last that long. It is a very lucky battalion whose men, sent out in the spring, are still serving the next winter.

Mr. NESBITT: Many of them have been there two years.

Mr. TAYLOR: The casualties, for instance, in the 7th Battalion from British Columbia in the first year of its service were 1,500, the total strength of the battalion being 1,100.

Mr. OLIVER: That is hardly the point. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that my figures were misleading, because men were not allowed to go to France during the winter, because of their being over age, would be allowed to go in the summer. If they went in the summer, what happened to them when the winter came around? My hon. friend says that they would all be killed by that time.

Mr. TAYLOR: A large proportion of them would be invalided, either killed or wounded.

Mr. OLIVER: Suppose they did not happen to be invalided?

Mr. TAYLOR: Those who were not invalided would be kept in France. This age limit of 40 is quite new; it was introduced only last December. When these men were enlisted in Canada, 45 was the age limit, whether for service in France, England or Canada. But the experience in France showed that men of that age were not able to stand the severe weather in the trenches; therefore last December an order was made to send forward to France no more men over 40 during the winter months.

Mr. OLIVER: The only difficulty about my hon. friend's explanation is that the date of the information that I have here is October 27.

Mr. TAYLOR: I hope the hon. gentleman does not want to hold me to a day. I say December, because I was there in December. It is possible that the order was issued shortly before I got there; I know that it was very new when I got there.

Mr. OLIVER: My information is dated October 27, and it relates to those battalions which had been going over some time during the summer. Certainly, there fore, that was previous to the special rule which my hon. friend mentions.

Mr. TAYLOR: An hon. gentleman reminds me that it was early in November that we reached England, not December, as I stated.

Mr. OLIVER: In any case the date of these figures is certainly previous to the rule my hon. friend has mentioned.

Mr. MORPHY: Suppose it was, would these men not be kept a certain length of time in England in order to complete their training? That would run them well into December or January, when they would be singled out in accordance with the method set forth by the member for New Westminster (Mr. Taylor).

Mr. OLIVER: The state of facts that I am placing before the committee existed before the date my hon. friend speaks of as the time of the introduction of this new rule.

Mr. TAYLOR: I think the hon. gentleman is wrong about his dates, because the numbers of the battalions that he refers to indicate that those battalions were in summer camps last summer. My battalion, for instance, was the 131st; it was not unduly delayed in Canada. Most of these numbers are higher than 131.

Mr. OLIVER: I am afraid that the position will have to stand as I have stated it. My information, bearing date the 27th October, relates to the arrival in England of battalions before that date and to the conditions which existed in regard to these battalions at the time they were reported upon. Let me give the figures, then: Of these 1,367 men out of twelve battalions, 515 were under age 334 were over age. There were 200 with flat and defective feet, 63 with defective vision, 27 with varicose veins, 15 with defective legs, 13 were immature, 13 had defective heart, and 187 had miscellaneous defects. As to those who were over age, or who were otherwise permanently physically defective, the department will have to answer to the people of Canada for having taken them over to England when they did not intend to use them in France. They must answer also for keeping them in England instead of returning them to industrial employment in Canada. That is the point I wish to make, and that is why I have asked the Government so frequently for the figures in regard to this matter, which is a very serious one. Very few people in Canada thought that, as the member for Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs) stated, there were 12,900 of these men in England who could not be of military value to our country. If there were 12,900 there at that time I want to know how many have already been returned to Canada, because I can hardly imagine that the department has not from time to time returned some of these men to this country. A burden has been placed upon the resources of Canada by putting these men in military service for which they were not fitted, and the industries of Canada have been hampered by reason of these men being taken out of industrial life. That is not management of which this country has any right to be proud, or upon which the Government can plume itself as having taken reasonable measures to win the war.

Mr. MORPHY: The hon. gentleman, I assume, will admit that all these men were medically examined before they left Canada by competent medical practitioners.

Mr. OLIVER: Oh, no. I have the Babtie report on that point. I have already placed it before the House, but seeing that my hon. friend raises the question, I may as well let him know what Dr. Babtie has to say about it. Dr. Babtie says:

> The Board is satisfied that there have been large numbers of men passed who ought not to have been passed by the medical officer; but it was perhaps inevitable under the circumstances of raising the Canadian Expeditionary Force that examinations could not be conducted with all the care necessary. This it believes to have been due partly to inexperience on the part of the examining medical officer, partly to hurry, partly to carelessness, and lastly, in some instances, to the opinion of an examining medical officer being overridden or ignored by commanding officers.

This report is dated 22nd December, 1916. Dr. Babtie goes on to say:

> These defects in recruiting continue to exist despite medical examinations by recruiting medical officers, by battalion medical officers of adjoining units and before sailing for the United Kingdom.

Mr. MORPHY: Does the hon. gentleman suggest any way in which the Government could have done better than they did in appointing reputable medical men throughout the whole country for the purpose of examining soldiers?

Mr. OLIVER: The conclusion of the Babtie commission is that they did not.

Mr. MORPHY: What is your conclusion?

Mr. OLIVER: This is what Dr. Babtie says.

Mr. MORPHY: My hon. friend should not say that. He did not read that.

Mr. OLIVER: The medical examiner who is careless in his report is surely not a reputable examiner.

Mr. MORPHY: The best medical man might sometimes be careless.

Mr. OLIVER: He cannot maintain his reputation on actions of carelessness.

Mr. MORPHY: The Government cannot supervise each man's work.

Mr. OLIVER: But Dr. Babtie uses the expression that this condition is partly due to inexperience.

Mr. MORPHY: Inexperience in examinations for purposes of war.

Mr. OLIVER: That is to say, the Government are appointing inexperienced examiners.

Mr. HANNA: At the beginning of the war there was no medical officer experienced in examining troops for overseas.

Mr. EDWARDS: How much experience had Dr. Bruce along that line?

Mr. OLIVER: This is not Dr. Bruce's opinion. I am giving Dr. Babtie's opinion; but Dr. Babtie, Dr. Bruce and Dr. Jones all agree specifically that this condition has existed in Canada; that it exists without excuse, and that it is a great and unjustifiable burden upon the people of Canada and militates against the military efficiency of our forces overseas. That is the position.

Mr. MORPHY: Can the hon. member give me the figures for the 110th Battalion?

Mr. OLIVER: I have not the figures for the 110th Battalion; I have the figures for the 111th.

Mr. MORPHY: Where is the 111th Battalion from?

Mr. OLIVER: London, Ontario.

Mr. MORPHY: I do not think the information the hon. member has is accurate.

Mr. OLIVER: Either the information that I hold in my hands is correct, or it is incorrect. The Militia Department have the information that I profess to be giving to the House, and they can verify it or contradict it at their convenience. As a matter of fact, there is no doubt that the information is correct.

Mr. STANFIELD: Last fall orders were given that before any troops should proceed overseas, the medical officer of the battalion had to pass on every man that that man was medically fit for overseas. I know of four battalions. After they arrived in England, they had a great deal of sickness—spinal meningitis, measles and so on. Each week the medical officer of the battalion had to send in a report of the number of men who were fit, and all those men who were quarantined were put down as unfit to go to France. Perhaps that may account for some of the large figures the hon. member has given.

Mr. OLIVER: I have given details of the classes and none of them is in that class. They would be a different class altogether. These are the men who are permanently unfit; that is, they are men who should not have been enlisted and who should not have been passed after they were enlisted.

Mr. STANFIELD: How did they get past the board?

Mr. OLIVER: That is due to the inexperience of the board. If Dr. Babtie, Dr. Jones and Dr. Bruce do not agree upon anything else, they all agree upon that. It is not my argument or contention; I am giving the very best authority available on the subject. There is no doubt about the facts, and the facts are deplorable. As the matter has not been brought up, I think I can find in Dr. Bruce's report, a list—

Mr. EDWARDS: The hon. member said that several hundreds of those were turned down for being under age. He would not call such men permanently unfit.

Mr. OLIVER: I probably did not use the correct term. What I should have said was that they were men who should not have been enlisted, because they were not fit for service in France. I wish to read a short list of disabilities given by Dr. Bruce. He gives his name, number, battalion, where enlisted, and everything about each man. Here is a man who has had phlebitis from 1912. He is unable to march and he is over age. The next man is over age, has poor physique and has myalgia. Another has myalgia, weakness of the legs and is unable to march. Another has deafness, debility, poor general physique. Another is over age and has debility. Another is over age and suffers from leconplatis. Another has left ear deaf, eyesight defective and is unable to march. Another has varicocele, suffers from senility, is too old for a soldier.

Mr. EDWARDS: Does varicocele make a man permanently unfit?

Mr. OLIVER: He has varicocele, senility, too old. Another man has deformed legs. The disabilities of others are: dyspnœa, defective feet, index finger missing; middle finger, left hand deformed, varicocele; deformed left hand, unable to flex fingers, unable to march; age, varicose veins; over age, rheumatism; age and debility; heavy weight, 215 pounds, with poor feet, unable to march; age and general physical condition; flat feet and fits; bad feet, sluggish mentality; age and debility; myalgia, subject to spells of dizziness; age and debility; chronic bronchitis, over age; age, general physical condition; mentally unfit; hernia, one leg one and one-half inches shorter than the other; varicocele interferes with marching, refuses operation; age and debility; large bunion, age; age and debility; age and debility; weak back; involuntary urination, dyspnœa; age and teeth; deafness and over age; height 4 feet 9 inches, weight 112 pounds, spinal caries; atrophied left arm, no development since nine years; amputated thumb of each hand; glass eye, 1 tooth upper jaw, 17 lower jaw, over age; severe varicocele, asthma, dyspnœa; aortic regurgitation; deafness both ears.

I am not a medical man, but I think the medical men who are in the House will agree that there could not have been efficient medical examinations, or the men who are in these conditions could not and would not have been enlisted.

So the case is absolutely proven that the Department of Militia in raising these battalions did not employ, as they should have done competent and reliable medical officers. As a result the country has been saddled with an enormous cost, and the efficiency of our troops at the front has been correspondingly reduced, while the industrial condition of the country has been placed at a disadvantage.

Mr. STEELE: These men my hon. friend has referred to were members of pioneer battalions.

Mr. OLIVER: I think my hon. friend is wrong, but I do not see that it makes any difference. Some of these men were of the 52nd, 40th, 44th, 2nd and 1st Pioneer Battalions. If they were not fit for service at the front, it does not matter what kind of a battalion they were enlisted in; we had no business to enlist them, and the Government is responsible for enlisting and having kept them.

Mr. STEELE: My hon. friend will notice that on page 95 of the Report it says:

> I am enclosing herewith a nominal roll of a few cases which have passed through this office, and would call your special attention to the enclosed roll of one unit, namely, the 2nd Pioneer Battalion, from which some thirty-eight or forty men alone were discharged under A.F.B. 204 as useless from physical defects.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not catch the purpose of my hon. friend in drawing attention to the fact that these are pioneer battalions. If so many very, very bad cases were found in one battalion, surely it is proven beyond all argument that the medical officer examining for that battalion was certainly not efficient. One occasional case may get by, but with a list like that, there is no question that the examining officer did not do his duty.

Mr. STEELE: The medical examination for a pioneer battalion is not so strict as for other battalions.

Mr. OLIVER: These men were not accepted when they got to England, but were culled out, and very properly so. I wish to draw attention to another matter in this connection. Of the sixteen battalions in the list I have here which were sent over to England, one was a little over 500 strong, and five were under 600 strong. None of them were at full strength. As a matter of fact, we sent sixteen battalion establishments across the water when we only had men enough, after the culls were taken out, for eight battalions; that is, we sent over a double supply of officers for the number of men we sent over.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: What authority has my hon. friend for saying that we sent over a full quota of officers in battalions that were not at full strength?

Mr. OLIVER: Does my hon. friend say that he did not?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I am asking my hon. friend a question.

Mr. OLIVER: My full belief is that he did send over a full quota of officers in each case.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Only in proportion to the number of the rank and file.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend is Minister of Militia, and knows what he has done and what he has not done.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: That is absolutely right.

Mr. OLIVER: I have some personal acquaintance with one of these battalions.

I see that it is under strength, and I know that it went over with a full quota of officers. I do not know why that battalion should be treated differently from any other battalion.

Mr. EDWARDS: Which battalion was it?

Mr. OLIVER: The 151st. I will admit tnat it is the nearest to full strength of any battalion in the list, with 907 men. A battalion, I think, is something over 1,100 men.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: It is 1,035, including officers.

Mr. OLIVER: I have no reason to suppose that this battalion was treated differently from any other battalion, or to think that when the full allowance of officers went over with that battalion, a full allowance of officers did not go over with the other battalions.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Not at all.

Mr. OLIVER: I suppose my hon. friend will admit that a lieutenant-colonel went over with each battalion?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Very likely.

Mr. OLIVER: The principal officer went over, and those next in command, I suppose? The position is this: We sent over men enough for eight or nine battalions, and we sent over officers out of proportion to the number of men. That will have to be admitted, because we sent over 16 lieutenant-colonels when we only had men enough for eight or nine battalions. We knew before those battalions sailed from Canada that there was no position on the other side of the water for some of these colonels, but yet we sent them over and I am afraid we are keeping them over there. Now that is a condition for which there is certainly no excuse, and it does not tend to efficiency or satisfaction. When we were discussing this matter in the House before, some hon. gentlemen said: "If reinforcements are wanted in France, you must take the men and leave the officers." Very true, but we have a military organization and a military administration in Canada, and when we deliberately authorize the raising of battalions over and above our possibilities, we are responsible for having given that authorization, and responsible for the consequences of it; and when we were sending these battalions over under strength, if we had dealt honestly and fairly with these battalion officers we should have said to them before they went over: "You have not raised a full battalion, and therefore you cannot go to England." It would have been a more decent thing to do to stop them on this side of the water, rather than to send the battalions over with a full quota of officers, and then turn the officers adrift or keep them on the paylist without duties to perform. Such a condition of affairs could only result as it has resulted, in spreading dissatisfaction with military service throughout the country. In the first year of the war we had a large measure of military enthusiasm, which would have responded to the full to any reasonable call that might have been made upon it, but the administration of our military forces has been such that the enthusiasm has been killed, and then the Government comes to us and says: "The patriotism of our people has declined and we must now resort to compulsory military service." The position is absolutely unfair; it is unjust; it is an attempt by the Government of the day to protect the mismanagement of our military forces by discrediting the patriotism of our people.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The question my hon. friend referred to in the latter part of his remarks is one which has been discussed on more than one occasion during this session of the House. There were quite a number of battalions sent over which were not up to full strength. The number of officers sent with those regiments was in proportion to the number of the rank and file, and the commanding officer was left to choose the officers he should take with him. The commanding officer knew before he left Canada that he was going over in command of a battalion and that he would not likely be able to go to the front, but that he would be returned to Canada. His officers also knew this. The junior officers had the privilege, of course, of reverting to a lower rank. The situation was not one for which the Government was responsible. Recruiting dropped off and those battalions could not be filled up, and there did not seem to be any prospect of them being filled up, so it was thought better to send them over as they were. In view of all that has been said on this point, I do not think it necessary to go any further with it, beyond stating that the situation was well understood. The officers in command of those partly completed battalions knew all the circumstances before they went over. At the same time, I have always contended it would not have been fair to those officers to have robbed them of even their commands by preventing them from taking their battalions overseas as they stood. Some of those officers performed very good service when they reached the other side; others have come back to Canada, and some have gone back into civil life.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: How many such officers have returned to Canada, say in the last year?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I could not give the exact figure, but the number was fairly large. Every day there are men reverting to civil life, because there is nothing further for them to do. I have letters from many of them stating they are perfectly satisfied. They have done all they could, and it was not their fault that they could not get to the front, or that they could not recruit their battalions to full strength. This is a situation which has come about quite naturally and for which no one is to blame. Every one did the best he could to get those battalions up to strength.

My hon. friend has also referred to a number of battalions for which he has statistics. I do not know where those returns came from, and I do not know on what they are based, or who is responsible for them. However, taking the returns as he gives them to the House, I understand thirteen per cent of the whole number were thought to be unfit for service when they reached England.

Mr. OLIVER: Sixteen per cent.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: If my hon. friend had said twenty-five per cent were unfit for service at the front I would have felt it was a very good showing indeed. Those men arrived after the hardships of a sea voyage; many of them in a condition very different from their condition when they sailed. Besides that, as my hon. friend has pointed out, a large proportion of them were under age. Now, what does "under age" mean? Under the voluntary system men have been taken from 18 to 45 years of age. Within the last two years, I think, it has been decided that no man shall go to the front unless he is at least 19 years of age. So those men who enlisted here in good faith at 18 years of age and went across would not be able to go to France until they were 19. Men of 45 were unable to get to the front, because they could not stand the climate. These two reasons account for the majority of those who were not fit to go to France at once. Apart from that, our men are not fit to go into the trenches immediately they reach England, because they have to receive considerable intensive training and preparation before they are fit for the firing line. As has already been pointed out, they are divided into categories, A, B, C, D and E. There are five classifications under category A; there are three classifications under category B, and there are three classifications under category C. All those men were made use of. If a man in England, although not fit for the trenches, is capable of performing some other duty, it is just as difficult to arrange to get him home as it is to get a man out of the trenches. There are all sorts of duties to be performed on lines of communication, clerical duties, base duties, preparing camp, and so on. I need not weary the House with a summary of the strength of all the units of the C. E. F. in England on the 14th of May, 1917. This statement was laid on the table during the time the Military Service Bill was under consideration. There were 126,241 men in England at that time; 26,359 of those men were in category A1, fit for the trenches. The others were undergoing training and were in different categories, preparing for the higher category. In order to understand how these men are qualified, and what is done with them in England, I should have to weary the committee with facts and figures, and I do not wish to do it to-night. This material has already been placed on Hansard. It is a long document, showing the subdivision in each category, and why the men are not fit for the trenches immediately they arrive in England. I have the document before me, and I could have copies of it prepared and furnished to any member of the committee who may desire the information. These men were enlisted in Canada in good faith. Of course, there were some cases of men slipping through the doctors' hands, as was explained this afternoon, without having passed a proper medical examination. My hon. friend referred to the men with flat feet. There has been more attention paid to that of late. It is pretended those men cannot march as well as the others, but, in every other way they are just as fit for the trenches. The examination in this regard has been made more rigid lately. I read to the House this afternoon a statement showing that out of about 1,600 troops reaching England lately there were only five who were unfit for service, and I gave the reasons why those five were unfit. The statistics which my hon. friend read to the House were in reference to a pioneer battalion. Medical examination for a pioneer battalion or a forestry battalion is altogether different from what it is for infantry, artillery or cavalry.

9 p.m.

These men do not undergo the same medical examination, but they are able, for the most part, to perform the duties for which they enlisted. The occurrence of these things in the early days of the war is no reflection upon the great bulk of the medical men. They were generally civilian doctors, unaccustomed to military regulations, and, of course, we were all new to the game. But the regulations have been strengthened and made more exacting, and, after we had a certain amount of experience, the results were very satisfactory.

Mr. MACDONALD: This whole question would be very much more clear if the Government had been in a position to tell us whether they proposed to act upon the Babtie report or the Bruce report or the Jones report. They take the position of discrediting the Bruce report; they apparently do not intend to pay any attention to it and have taken the ground that Dr. Babtie's report completely answered everything contained in the Bruce report, and that there was nothing to be done. It will be remembered that in the Mesopotamia matter Dr. Carter, a medical man who stood in exactly the same position to Dr. Babtie as Dr. Bruce stands in regard to Dr. Babtie in the Canadian matter, was honoured by the British Government on account of having done very worthy service. The Government do not propose to have anything to do with Dr. Bruce's report. Let us look at some of the cases that are mentioned by Dr. Wilson, whose report is incorporated in that of Dr. Bruce: Lt.-Col. Wilson tells us of a man who went over there, Private Empson, who is 72 years of age? Is there any way under heaven by which a medical man, unless he was a political heeler, as they have been in many places, would pass men of 72 years of age? Then it is to be found at the same page of the report, page 97, that Private Alwright was taken out of a tuberculosis sanatorium previous to embarkation. On what principle would there be any justification for taking a man out of a tuberculosis sanatorium and sending him across to fight?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Who did it?

Mr. MACDONALD: It will be found at page 97 of the report of Dr. Wilson. Private C. H. Baird was blind in the left eye and seven-eighths blind in the other eye, so that he was fifteen-sixteenths blind. Under what possible organization could such men as these be permitted to go to the other side on any service whatever? On page 94 we find the case of a young man, 16 years of age, who weighed 80 pounds. He had infantile paralysis, which left him with weak and undeveloped muscles in the right hip and thigh. He was passed by a doctor in Pembroke, and again examined at Quebec and passed by another doctor. He has done no military duty since he went over.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Was he in a pioneer or an infantry battalion?

Mr. MACDONALD: He was in the 224th.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: A pioneer battalion.

Mr. MACDONALD: That makes no difference. What is the use of sending men 72 years of age, and blind, and men out of tuberculosis sanatoria, and with weak and undeveloped muscles? Then we find the cases of Private Dickson, 67 years of age; Private Jarvis, 52 years of age; Private Macdonald, 52 years of age, and Private Lockie, 52 years of age. These men were of no use over there. These statements are made upon the authority of men who, in regard to this medical service, so far as Canada is concerned, were doing exactly what Dr. Carter did with reference to Mesopotamia. The minister does not say he is doing anything in regard to all these reports about men who should never have gone and who have cost this country hundreds of thousands of dollars. On the contrary, the position of the Government is to discredit Dr. Bruce and his inquiry. The Prime Minister told us he would not bring down Dr. Bruce's report; he wanted to send it over to Sir George Perley because possibly there might be something in it which Sir George might want to answer. He sent it over some months ago, and Sir George Perley has it. The Minister of Militia has a copy of it, but will not show it to the House or to the country, and the consequence will be, if the Government maintain that position, that the session will close and the country will not have that report. That is apparently what the Government intend to do. The Government have no right to get any estimates through this House when they refuse to produce that report. It is contrary to every principle of constitutional privilege and parliamentary practice that, in regard to such a vital question as this the Government should ask Supply without giving necessary information, or should put forward such a flimsy excuse as they have done. What is there about Sir George Perley, who is he anyway, that he should be the one man upon whose bidding the Parliament of Canada should wait for two months in order to find out whether he has something to say in regard to this matter? Is he any greater man than Dr. Babtie or Dr. Jones, both of whom made their answers in proper time? The first report of Dr. Bruce was made to the Minister of Militia here and was submitted to Parliament in due course. So was the report of Dr. Jones. So was the Babtie report. And when Dr. Bruce deals with these important matters which we have been discussing and the remedying of which is in the interest of the prosecution of the war and of the country, he sends the report to the minister here, but it is not submitted to Parliament, and the excuse of the Prime Minister is: I wanted to send it to Sir George Perley, and I did so, and he has got it; we cannot tell whether we are going to bring it down or not. Is Sir George Perley greater than this Parliament or than the Canadian people? He has grown very big since he left this country. He did not seem to be possessed of such wonderful qualities when he was in Parliament with the rest of us. When did he become such a great military genius, and when was he endowed with such superlative qualities that Parliament must wait upon his pleasure? The position of the Government, in view of the facts given to the House and the country by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), in venturing to ask for Supply without giving that report, is one of the greatest pieces of effrontery we have ever had in this Parliament. The Government evidently do not intend to bring down the report and the session will probably close, and no report will be brought down.

Mr. GERMAN: It seems to me, following the line of discussion of the hon. gentleman from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), and my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), that there is some very distinct and strong reason why the Government refuses to lay on the table of the House the second report of Dr. Bruce. The hon. Minister of Militia knows what that report contains. I do not know what it contains as a matter of positive knowledge, but I have some inkling of its contents. It probably contains a condemnation of Sir George Perley, by reason of his interference in regard to Dr. Bruce's report. I think it also condemns this Government very severely for the very thing the hon. gentleman from Edmonton has brought to the notice of this House to-night, namely the examination of the men before they left Canada. Hundreds of thousands of dollars have been lost to Canada, and the pension list has been enormously swollen by reason of the very inaccurate, unwise and careless examination of recruits before they left this country for England. I quite agree with the statement of the hon. gentleman from Pictou that the Minister of Militia should not be allowed any Supply until that report is laid on the Table and given to the public of Canada. Dr. Bruce was an official of the Government. He was asked by the Minister of Militia to make a report, which he made. After that report was made, a second investigating committee was appointed in England to criticise that report, and they did criticize it, and Dr. Bruce has given his reply to that criticism. That reply, whatever it is, the people of Canada are entitled to have, and we should know its contents before money is voted for the carrying on of the affairs of the Militia Department. I feel just as strongly as the hon. gentleman from Pictou that the report must be given to the people of Canada before Supply is voted further for the militia services.

Mr. H. BOULAY (Rimouski) (translation): Mr. Chairman, during the transportation of the troops through the province of Quebec, especially by the Intercolonial, during the years 1915 and 1916, the soldiers who were being conveyed in the passenger trains have behaved in a manner not only obnoxious, but sometimes most scandalous. I do not remember whether I wrote to the Militia Department about it, but, at any rate, I did report the case to the railway department in Moncton, and as member for the county, taking up the defence of the citizens of my county, I have felt obliged to do it, for matters had become almost unbearable. I don't know where those chaps were coming from, for they seemed very little civilized, but all I do know is that they did not speak French, and they must have come from the western provinces; that instead of conforming to the usages of civilized people, they behaved ruthlessly, neither more nor less. I will now read to the House a letter which I felt compelled to write to the general manager of the railway in Moncton, under date of August 21, 1916:

Sayabec, August 21, 1916.

J. K. McNeillie, Esq.,
Supt. Gen. C.G.R.,
Moncton, N.B.

Dear Sir,—

I write to inform you that every time I travel on the trains, since the soldiers are being transported, the passengers on our regular trains are constantly insulted by those individuals who sing, yell, smoke, drink, vomit, and turn upside down everything in first and second class cars, to such an extent, that it is a disgrace for the administration to tolerate such things.

We hear a great many people swearing against the Conservative Government, for tolerating such conduct, and I think it is your duty to have this condition of things remedied at once. The employees are powerless.

We must prevent those individuals embarking on regular trains, or otherwise have a special car on each train, and further more have one or two policemen on train to keep them in good order. This state of things cannot be tolerated any longer, because it is prejudicial to the railroad which will lose passenger traffic, and also to our political prospects.

Those individuals insult men and children, and lay down in the alleys of the cars, and it is a dangerous matter to disturb them. I saw the porter on the car, at Valcartier, insulted, last night, in the most brutal manner, and I feel that those poor employees are not sufficiently protected against those brutes. A small number behave themselves properly, but the large number should not have access to those passenger cars.

Believe me, dear sir,

Yours faithfully,

H. Boulay.

It took about three weeks to get an answer to this letter, and finally the following reply, which was not very satisfactory, was received. I do not know which minister the manager refers to in his letter, whether it is the Minister of Militia or the Minister of Railways.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: What is the date of the letter?

Mr. BOULAY: September 8, 1916. It reads as follows:

Moncton, N.B., 8th September, 1916.

H. Boulay, Esq., M.P.,
Sayabec, Que.

Dear Sir,—

Referring to your letter of the 21st ultimo, matters of this kind must be referred to the minister so that I regret I can take no action.

Yours truly,

J. K. McNeillie.

I do not think it was proper for the Department of Militia to allow those men to travel on railroad trains in that condition, without having officers to look after them. For the last two years it has been a real disgrace, and, as a representative of a large county in the province of Quebec, through which those men are supposed to travel, I should not like those scenes to be repeated this year, and I urge strongly upon the Department of Militia or the Department of Railways—I do not know which has charge of such matters—to look after these men, and see that officers are put in charge of them, or that they be not allowed to travel on passenger trains. People complained several times to the superintendent, and they have complained to the general manager at Moncton, and I suppose they received a reply similar to this letter.

Mr. EDWARDS: Does the hon. member think they should be put on cattle trains?

Mr. BOULAY: They should be put on proper trains for soldiers, or, if put on passenger trains, there should be somebody to look after them.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Were these men from Valcartier camp?

Mr. BOULAY: I do not know where they were coming from, because they could not talk French.

Mr. STEELE: Were they all brutes?

Mr. BOULAY: They were acting like brutes.

Mr. STEELE: I am very much surprised to hear a member of this House call the men who are going to the front to fight for us brutes.

Mr. BOULAY: From the way they were conducting themselves, no one could say anything else of them. I do not say they were all behaving that way; there were many real gentlemen among them, but too many of them could not behave themselves.

Mr. EDWARDS: How did the conduct of those soldiers to whom my hon. friend refers compare with the conduct of the Laval students, at the Montreal meeting, for instance?

Mr. BOULAY: We never have the Laval students on these trains; I cannot say how they would behave.

(Translation): Mr. Chairman, I beg the House to allow me to add a few words as to the organization of the battalions. There is some complaint that the province of Quebec did not enlist as largely as she ought to have done. I will point out that several reasons have prevented our soldiers from enlisting in larger numbers, and among these reasons I may mention as one of the most important the breaking up of our battalions after they had gone across. I will cite as an example the case of the 189th of Rimouski and Temiscouata. This regiment had been recruited by competent officers and under the formal promise that these officers would lead them on the battlefield. I do not know what were the reasons, but as soon as the battalion had reached England its officers were put aside and replaced by people who were perfect strangers to the soldiers of the 189th. The latter wrote home, informing their folks of what had happened, and I am convinced that the disorganization of that battalion did largely contribute to prevent any further enlistment. I am prepared to assert this fact, for I have personally heard a large number of young men repeat that they would not enlist to submit to the fate of their comrades who had left with the 189th.

Now, I would like to have from the hon. Minister of Militia a declaration whether the regulations of the department permit the inflicting of punishments such as those which are reported to have been meted out to the Canadian soldiers in England. It is reported, for instance, that soldiers have been forced to remain with their arms crossed for ten or twelve consecutive hours; another punishment which was inflicted, according to reports, is forcing men to run during the same length of time, with five minutes' rest at intervals of fifteen or twenty minutes, and a 75-pound load on their shoulders. If military regulations contain such punishments nowadays, it seems to me that is a downright shame. I understand that such penalties can have been inflicted a hundred years ago; but in our present state of civilization, men who are going to risk their lives on the battlefields should not be given such punishment. I would ask the hon. minister to tell me if such is actually the case; these reports circulate in my district, and, I repeat it, they are of such a nature as to prevent many well-disposed young men from enlisting.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: My hon. friend refers to the punishment of soldiers in England for committing certain offences. The punishment meted out to any soldier from Canada would be the same as the punishment meted out to any soldier who enlisted in Great Britain. I do not know all the circumstances to which my hon. friend refers; there has been no complaint with regard to severe punishment of our soldiers while in England or in France. There have been punishments, but there have been no complaints. I cannot pass any judgment upon the matter to which my hon. friend refers unless I have the particulars before me, or have an investigation made. My hon. friend refers also to the breaking up of the 189th Battalion. That was a very good battalion, indeed, but what happened to it happened to battalions from all over Canada. You cannot keep a battalion intact very long. As was explained in the House to-night, some men drop off for various reasons and are not fit to go to France. The moment the men go to France the wastage is very great and a unit has to be consolidated with reinforcements from other battalions. In the early stages of the war, when we saw a battalion going out of Canada we always felt that there was a battalion that was going right across the water to England and to France as a unit. We did not understand then as well as we do now the exigencies of war and the wastage which takes place in the battle line. Owing to these conditions, battalions from all over Canada have had to be broken up; no condition existed with regard to the 189th that did not exist with regard to all other battalions.

Mr. BOULAY (translation): Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words about the medical examination of our soldiers. I heard, a few minutes ago, some hon. members on the other side of the House criticising the Government for not having subjected our soldiers to a minute medical examination before sending them over to England, and I really believe that there has been some laxity in that regard. I will mention one case in order to show what were the shortcomings in this connection. Soldiers who had enlisted in the 150th, the 178th, and the 233rd, and who were being sent eastwards, met with a serious railroad accident, their train leaving the track; some of them were killed outright and many others wounded. Some of these men, thirty-seven of them in all, were carried over to Partridge island, near Halifax, where they were examined three weeks after their landing and finally sent back home. I do not understand the reason of that trip in which the lives of these people were greatly exposed. These soldiers were all of them French Canadians, and all of them told me they would have preferred being sent across the ocean, where they would have been given the necessary care and could have later done their duty as well as the other soldiers forming part of the regiment. If, on the other hand, these men were not fit to go and fight, it seems to me they should have been spared the hardships of such a long voyage, and the country would also have been saved the amount of their pay, of their allowances, and the other costs thereby incurred. I do hope that, as far as this is concerned, the Government have taken such measures that similar hardships may not in future be inflicted anew.

I will now give another reason for which the French Canadians have not enlisted in large numbers. Some time last winter the Government authorized the enlistment of some fifty thousand soldiers in order to form what they called a Home Guard. The officers of the 189th of Rimouski offered their services towards recruiting a battalion; the colonel went to a great deal of trouble, going to Quebec and even coming here, in Ottawa, to consult the authorities, but they never could obtain authority to raise that regiment. What are the reasons for the Government's refusal of this offer? I do not know of any, but it is not the less true that it has been rejected, and I can assure this House that the levy of such a battalion would have been an easy thing. Moreover, I know men who have tendered their services and who were refused; among the latter I may mention one, Mr. Bailey, who did all he possibly could to enlist in an engineering corps; he was referred now and then to the Quebec authorities, but on every occasion he was refused.

It seems to me that with a little willingness a place could be found somewhere for those men who are anxious to enlist, and in this special case that man has always been rejected, although he did apply to almost every military authority in the country. Invariably, in his case, the reply was the same: Enlist as a soldier.

Still another reason which I want to point out to the House is that soldiers were always asked for the infantry and never for the artillery service. I have not heard of any artillery regiment recruited among the French Canadians of the province of Quebec, although there cannot be, to my knowledge, any paramount reason for opposing that line of recruiting. Quebec might have had her share as well as the other provinces. I know very little in military art, but I am informed that the work of the soldier engaged in the artillery is far more agreeable than that of the infantryman. Therefore, if only the hardest labour is reserved for the province of Quebec, none need be surprised if the recruiting campaign in this province has not given the expected results; such reports were spread among the people, and they created everywhere a bad impression.

I may also point out that a certain party was authorized to do recruiting in Rimouski county; an honest man, I have no doubt, and perfectly qualified. I am alluding to the late manager of the Matane railway. It seems to me that if a French Canadian had been appointed the choice would have been preferable; that man hardly speaks French, although he may understand some of it. It seems to me that we have in the county of Rimouski-Matane many officers who could have filled the bill just as well as Mr. Lyons. Since I have the opportunity, I will take the liberty to tell the hon. Minister of Militia that he might have most profitably consulted the members of the different counties as to the choice of the recruiting officers, but it has not been thought appropriate to do so. Some time ago I put a question on the Orders of the Day to know who were the men who had conducted the recruiting campaign in the Rimouski-Matane county. I was informed that Colonel Chauveau, of Quebec, was directing that campaign. As he is a perfect stranger in the counties of Rimouski-Matane and of Temiscouata, he cannot have raised much enthusiasm among our people. I therefore repeat that far better results would have been obtained had they consulted the county representative before choosing the recruiting officers. The member is likely to know his people, and he would have laid aside all party politics; he could thus have rallied all the willing young men, both Conservatives and Liberals, and the immediate results would have been far more satisfactory. Among those recruiting officers there is one whose dismissal I was forced to ask. It was a most difficult matter, for I had to write three different letters to the Militia Department before I could obtain his discharge. It is an actual scandal to see a recruiting officer promenading along the railway lines without attending to his duties in any way.

I have also met another officer in Matane who had not enough insults to cast, not only against the Conservative Government, but even against the Government leaders. It was a real shame to hear such talk from the lips of a military man, who seemed to take advantage of the occasion, when he was in my presence, with a score of guests sitting at the same table, in a public hotel, to direct all manner of insults at the Government. I denounced that man as well, but instead of taking my word for it—I believe it should have carried some weight—they requested me to forward affidavits. I contend, Mr. Chairman, that the member for any county should be listened to when he complains of the conduct of a military man, and that instructions to that effect should be given to the commanding officer in every district.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: My hon. friend is under the impression that no batteries of artillery were authorized in Quebec: three in the Montreal district and two in the Quebec district. Out of those five only were raised. None was able to be raised in the district of Quebec. I think that I omitted to refer to one point raised by my hon. friend from Rimouski in regard to the misconduct of soldiers travelling on trains. I assume that the cases to which he refers are isolated ones.

Mr. BOULAY: No. This happened every time I was on the train, and it also happened when I was not.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I am surprised my hon. friend did not report the matter. He may have reported it before I was Minister of Militia, because he says that this occurred in September, 1916. His proper course, as a member of Parliament, would have been to report it to the Minister of Militia of that day. It is an improper thing for a soldier to conduct himself in any place in any other way than as a gentleman, and when soldiers do that sort of thing they are liable to be reprimanded by their superior officers, and they should be reprimanded. But I do not agree with the contention that soldiers should not travel on regular passenger trains. Our soldiers are citizens of Canada; they are on the same level as we are, and there is no reason for supposing that they will not conduct themselves in a proper manner. I have travelled on trains with soldiers in every part of this country, and I have never seen a soldier on a train conducting himself in any other way than that becoming a gentleman and soldier wearing the King's uniform.

Mr. BOULAY: I do not know if they were conducting themselves in the way I have described intentionally in the province of Quebec, but if the minister asks for a report from every conductor who has taken soldiers on passenger trains, either the limited or the express, he will see that what I say is not exaggerated. We waited because we were always expecting that this abuse would cease. The trainmen reported the occurrence every time to their head officials, but they could never get satisfaction. It was only when we got sick of the whole matter that I decided to report it myself and I thought it was to the railway officials that I should report because they were closer to us than is the Minister of Militia.

Mr. McCRANEY: I would like to ask the minister as to the age limits of soldiers enlisting. Am I right in saying that 18 is the minimum and 41 the maximum age?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The age limits in Canada are from 18 to 45 under voluntary recruiting.

Mr. McCRANEY: When a recruit offers to enlist does he have to make an affidavit as to his age?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: He signs an attestation paper and swears to it.

Mr. McCRANEY: I think it is a notorious fact that in the army there are many men under 18 or over 45. Do all these men sign an attestation paper?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Yes.

Mr. McCRANEY: And are there no cases in which ambitious recruiting officers have winked at the attestation papers which were obviously signed by men outside the age limits? The reason I am calling the minister's attention to this matter is that one hears and reads of so many cases of this kind. I have here an item which appeared in the press in Montreal only a day or so ago:

> Pte..... said to be the youngest soldier who went to the front with any of the Canadian contingents, and probably one of the youngest soldiers of the Empire to go into the trenches, who has been missing since last Fall, is now listed as presumed to be dead. Pte..... was only fourteen years of age. When he went to enlist, he gave his age as eighteen and was quickly accepted. He apparently fell in the battle of the Somme in which his battalion, a French Canadian regiment, was engaged. He has a brother in the army, who has been wounded.

I cannot understand how a boy of 14 could be accepted by a recruiting officer, even though he signed an attestation paper and swore to his age, without that recruiting officer being guilty of assisting in a perjury. I could understand it if the boy were 17 or so, but this kind of thing has been going on to such an extent that I cannot but believe that there has been connivance on the part of the recruiting officers.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: When did he join the forces?

Mr. McCRANEY: I have only this newspaper item which I shall be glad to give to my hon. friend. I do not propose to introduce this young man's name here. Another instance was brought to my attention when a father came to see me in March last. His son had enlisted in a battalion on the 12th of March this year. The boy was born on the 7th of March 1902, and was consequently only a few days over fifteen. I have not seen the boy myself, but I understand from the father that he is quite a boy, with no appearance of eighteen. However, he was taken on, and his father came to see me about it. I drew up a declaration by the father setting out the proper age of the boy, and sent it to the officer commanding at Regina. Subsequently, I procured a certificate of birth from the register general of Ontario, which confirmed the information which the father had given me. The commanding officer wrote me in reply:

> Sir,—I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 22nd March on the above marginally noted subject.
>
> This boy swore that he was born on the 1st March 1899. Now he could hardly be ignorant of his age to the extent of three years, and the country has been put to some expense, and I would like to be perfectly satisfied that this boy is under age before granting his discharge. If this boy's father proves he is only fifteen years of age, he also proves that the boy committed perjury.
> Awaiting your further information on this subject, etc.

I understand that the boy signed some paper, but he did not fully appreciate what he was doing. He certainly did not understand that he was swearing to something that was not true. He belongs to a good family, and I am quite certain that if he had believed he was doing anything more than was usually connived at by recruiting officers he would not have put himself in the position of being branded for the rest of his life as a perjurer, as this commanding officer attempts to do. When he wrote like that, I felt that this was not a subject for me to discuss with him, but to bring to the minister's attention. When a commanding officer puts it up to a father that his son, barely over 15 years of age is guilty of perjury because the father asks for his discharge, he forgets that his own recruiting officer must have been guilty of connivance. I felt that the commanding officer was guilty of a most improper action in endeavouring to be an accessary to the perjury which was already committed. Perhaps the minister can tell us the extent to which the recruiting of men over age and under age has gone on, and perhaps give us figures as to the number of men who have been rejected because they were under age.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The first case that my hon. friend referred to occurred at Valcartier, I think in the first contingent that went overseas. Perhaps, there was a little more laxity in connection with that expedition than with later contingents. With regard to the enlistment of men under age, some may have known what they were doing and others may not, but the practice the department has invariably pursued has been to release any boy under age, upon application from his parents. This also applies to the enlistment of boys under age who have gone to England. When it is made clear that they are under age, they are returned to Canada, although under the law, after being enlisted for three months, we could hold them. It is difficult to know just where to place the blame. I have known of boys under age getting in under false pretenses, if you choose to call it that, and it would never be known that they were under age until they were about to be sent overseas, and then it might be found out and they would be discharged. Or a boy under age might enlist during the winter and his age not become known until the next summer. I have no doubt that in some cases the parents have acted in collusion. In other cases boys have enlisted in spite of their parents. Some of these boys are quite as big at fifteen or sixteen as boys of eighteen, and very often boys of eighteen look under sixteen, but everybody knows that that is the case. Where large numbers of men are enlisting, and when there is great anxiety to get men into the ranks, possibly as great care is not taken as should be taken. Particularly does this apply to the early days of the war, with the unfortunate result that the country is put to some expense. I do not know whether we can go so far as to charge with perjury every boy under age who enlists, because I believe that many of them do not fully appreciate what they are signing. But, as I said, the invariable practice of the department has been to let these boys out when their age has been proved.

Mr. McCRANEY: I am not objecting to the fact that boys under eighteen have enlisted. This Parliament has given its own judgment on the question, because in the Bill providing for conscription we have made the minimum age 20 years. As the minister says, there are many boys under 18 who are physically better fit than many others over that age. I do not object at all to those boys who have the enthusiasm and the physical ability joining the ranks, but what I do object to is the attempt on the part of the commanding officer to brand a man as a perjurer for the rest of his life because he has signed an attestation declaring that he is of a certain age, when probably he was in ignorance of the full force of what he was doing.

I would like to ask the minister a question on a subject which has been discussed on more than one occasion. In doing so, I do not wish any reference I may make to it to be understood as casting reflections upon either members of this House or others who have gone overseas. I have been told that there are many officers in the Old Country who are simply hanging about, who decline to be reduced from the ranks to which they were originally appointed, yet they will not go to the front, and they will not come home. This has been a source of complaint and irritation to the young men who have been induced to go over, and who find that those who have been in charge of them are unwilling to expose their lives to the dangers which the privates are called upon to face. I think the country would like information as to the extent to which superior officers have not taken a lower rank in order to get to the front. I hope it is not to a very considerable extent. Perhaps the minister can tell us the number of colonels, say, who have gone from England into France with lower rank, and what lower rank they have taken? I trust it will be understood I do not make these remarks in any spirit of criticism, or with the idea that the men are not doing their duty.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I thought I had a letter in my possession from which I should like to quote an extract. I do not find it at the moment, however. This letter came to me with respect to a colonel who reverted to major. He was a man of very high standing, and he said he was very happy to be able to do it. As a matter of fact, a good many officers have reverted to lower rank. A great many lieutenants, for instance, have reverted to the rank of sergeant. My hon. friend is not quite right in saying that they will not go to France, and that they will not come back home. A number of the officers in England would be very glad to go to France if an opportunity offered.

Mr. GERMAN: Are those officers under pay in London?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Some of them are under pay.

Mr. GERMAN: Why should they be?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: They are coming back to Canada all the time, and many of them are reverting to private life.

Mr. GERMAN: What have they done beyond going to London and staying there?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: My hon. friend knows what they have done. They have raised regiments and battalions in this country. Some of them have not been able to raise full battalions, but they did the best they could. They did all the country asked them to do. When they reached England their regiments were broken up because of military necessity, and their men were drafted to fill up other regiments and to fill gaps at the front. Those officers are in a difficult position. They are not cowards at all. There are just as good men who have never had the privilege of going to the trenches to fight as there are in the trenches. The difficulty is our system has resulted in surplus officers, who are reverting to civil life as fast as possible. It is not their fault that they did not succeed in getting to the trenches, and I would not want the impression to go abroad that these men have done anything else but their whole duty in trying to get to the front.

Mr. McCRANEY: To what rank would the colonels and majors usually revert?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I suppose a colonel would revert to the rank of major, if he reverted, and I presume a major would revert to the rank of captain.

Mr. McCRANEY: I met a young man who had been through the battle of Vimy Ridge, and I understood from him that Colonel Norman Laing, who recruited the 65th from Saskatoon, waited in England for a good many months and finally reverted to the rank of lieutenant. He 10 p.m. went to France and took part in the battle of Vimy Ridge.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: He deserved a great deal of credit for that.

Mr. McCRANEY: And I understood that he was the only colonel who had reverted to the rank of lieutenant and had gone across. Perhaps the minister could give us some information on that point.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I have not any information on the point at the moment. I am very sorry.

Mr. McCRANEY: I am very pleased to have an opportunity of mentioning Colonel Norman Laing's name in this connection. He is a personal friend of mine and it is altogether to his credit that he took the action that he did.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: Can the minister give us some information about Mr. Olivar Asselin? I understand he enlisted as a major in Montreal. If it is not a secret, I would like to know whether he has reverted to a lower rank, and where he is now?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: He is still a major.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: Is he at the front?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: He has been in the hospital for the last month or so.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: Wounded?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: No, he is ill.

Mr. NESBITT: I took up the case the other day of a young man who is under age, but who is in England with a signal corps. His father had a very serious accident and the mother wants the boy home. I think the deputy minister wrote to me that he had written to England. If it is possible to do anything to expedite the matter I should be glad, as the people are now in their haying and anxious to get the boy home.

Mr. EDWARDS: In regard to the matter of the reversion of officers to lower ranks in order to get to the front, when I first heard of this practice I thought it was a hardship; but on consideration I can see that it is in many cases only fair and is decidedly in the interest of the men in the trenches. A man may have been connected with the militia for years, going out for twelve days annually for drill and rising to the rank of major or colonel. He raises a regiment and goes overseas with it. It may be better that such a man, who has had no actual experience of modern warfare, should be asked to revert to the rank of lieutenant or captain, as otherwise he might be placed in command of men who had been in the trenches for a year or a year and a half and had fought their way up to, say, the rank of captain. Certainly the men in the trenches would be much safer under the command of the experienced fighter. But, while saying this, I believe that in such cases the allowance paid to the officer's family should not be reduced to those of the rank to which he reverts.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: That is the regulation.

Mr. EDWARDS: I did not know that.

Mr. KNOWLES: I think we have discussed the men long enough; I wish to discuss a sweeter and lovelier class, the officers' wives. I have had an opportunity of meeting quite a number of them, and there is a feeling among them that there is some favouritism by which certain officers' wives have been allowed to go overseas since the order in council was passed forbidding them to go. If what I am told is not well founded, I shall be pleased, as it will make these ladies' hearts rest easier to know that other officers' wives are not getting privileges, which they are denied. These ladies have not many friends on the Government side and they think the reason I cannot get them permission to go by passport is that I have no influence with the minister. They would all be willing to send me their photograph, first to be shown to the minister and afterwards to be used on the passport if the photograph touches the minister's heart in the preliminary canter, and I am sure he could not resist the photographs. Is there anything in the report that some officers' wives have been allowed to go, or are only nurses allowed to go?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The passports come under the Under Secretary of State for External Affairs. The rules and regulations are laid down by the British Government, and we have acted upon them. Duly qualified nurses are allowed to go over and there are extreme cases where others have gone. A lady came to my office to enlist my sympathy in respect to getting overseas, but the Under Secretary of State turned her down and she did not go. I do not think there is any question of influence about the matter, and I do not know of any favouritism. The rules are very stringent, and there are many women over there now who would be better in Canada; and it is not desirable that any women should go to England unless the circumstances are very serious indeed.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister will acquit me of any thought of accusing him of favouritism, but evidently, from what the minister says, there are cases which the Government, through the Secretary of State's Department, recognizes as exceptional. The minister knows enough about ladies to know that every lady thinks her case is exceptional. If not he has a great deal to learn. There is a danger, if the minister is not able to assure me that the rule is never broken, that these ladies will think that I am unable to get them the dispensation which somebody has secured for these other ladies. What would the minister call exceptional circumstances? If a lady's extreme passion is to be by the side of her husband, would that be considered an exceptional circumstance? Or would it be so considered if she had an idea that the husband's charms may be lavished on some other woman and she ought to get over there—or what would he call exceptional circumstances? I ask the question very seriously.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I know of one case where a lady went over to get married, the idea being that it was desirable that as many ladies should be married in war times as possible, provided the matches were suitable ones. These people had been engaged for about two years or more. It was a bona fide case, and the lady was given a passport to go over. Has my hon. friend anybody in mind who wants to get married?

Mr. GRAHAM: I have a case.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is a very common predicament. I think the Government will find they are adding to the problems of the war very much if they take on themselves to decide what marriages are desirable and what are not. But if the minister has the personal gift and is able to constitute himself a successful match-maker, we are fortunate indeed in having such a minister. But still I do not quite understand the situation. The minister might tell us what he considers exceptional circumstances. I am not going to tell the affairs of the ladies with whom I have the honour of an acquaintance, but they have far stronger reasons than those given by the minister. The minister's case is a very ordinary one, for it is very common for a girl to want to marry an officer after he leaves for England, and I should think exceptional cases would be very frequent. Perhaps the minister would give me the information. This is really a matter associated with the war, and therefore under the Militia Department. Under what circumstances would wives be permitted to go to their husbands?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: They often go over when their husbands have nothing to do with military affairs.

Mr. GRAHAM: The minister has given me something I have been waiting for for some time, the exceptional case. A case came under my notice such as he described, where the passports had been given. An officer engaged to a young lady on this side of the water anticipated getting married in a month or two, but was called to go across. When he got to England he found he was likely to remain some time, and cabled for the young lady to come over, but I was unable to obtain a passport. The circumstances were such as outlined by the minister. I could give all the necessary requirements to make this an exceptional case, if there is such a thing, but what I was interested in was the answer given to the hon. gentleman from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) as to the pension and pay of the officers. I imagine a number of officers would be more inclined to revert if they thought their pay, and the amount given to their families, would not revert at the same time. A number of officers in England can get to the front by reverting. They are not unwilling to revert, as I understand it, but it will leave their families and themselves in a very bad predicament, owing to the reduced pay which they and their families will receive. I know several cases of that kind. I had a letter this week from a young man who left his family and went over, and has been there for some time, and he said he would not mind reverting at all, but would not like to see his family on the road, and he is not a man who would take anything from the Patriotic Fund—he does not feel like doing that. In 1914, when this matter was being discussed, I put the question to the Prime Minister, perhaps in a little different form. I asked him the question: if a man goes overseas as a captain or major, and over there takes a lower rank, would his pay be for the lower rank, and would the pension to his family be according to the lower rank? The Prime Minister gave me an affirmative answer in both cases. That was his opinion at that time. If there are different regulations since, I think it would be in the public interest that we should all know about them. Suppose a man is a captain in England and can only get to the front by reverting to a lieutenancy. What pay will he get if he reverts, and what amount will his family get? Will the pay remain that of a captain, or will it be reduced to that of a lieutenant?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The pay will be the pay of the rank to which he reverts, but the separation allowance, in the case of a married man, will be the same as if he had not reverted, and the pension would be the same—according to the higher rank. If he reverted from captain to lieutenant, he would get lieutenant's pay, but, if he is a married man, the separation allowance would be that of a captain, and his pension would be that of a captain.

Mr. GRAHAM: The difference to his family would be the difference in the assigned pay, practically, because he would not be able to assign as much of his pay to his family under the lower rank as he would under the higher.

Mr. OLIVER: I would like to know if the position is still as it was some months ago in regard to non-commissioned officers who are members of battalions which have been broken up and sent over to France. Some time ago the condition was this: non-commissioned officers were all compelled to revert to the rank of privates, and lost their pay as non-commissioned officers, and their opportunity for pensions. I would like to know if that is still the position?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The situation in regard to that is the same as the situation in regard to the question raised by my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham). The pay is that of the lower rank, and the separation and pension that of the higher rank.

Mr. OLIVER: How long is it since this latter arrangement was given effect to?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: About six months ago.

Mr. OLIVER: In the case I refer to, these men reverted more than six months ago, but I got the information from them less than six months ago. Would that new condition be retroactive?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Yes, it would be retroactive.

Mr. OLIVER: The instance I mentioned here was that of a battalion sergeant-major, who, when he went to the front, took the rank of private, and took the private's pay, when he thought he was getting a continuation of the sergeant-major's regimental pay. When he was wounded, and came back and was boarded to be sent back to Canada, he found out that, instead of having money coming to him, he was in debt. Would that retroactive pay be of any benefit to this man?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I am afraid the sergeant-major misunderstood the regulations in that case.

Mr. OLIVER: I understand the minister to say that the non-commissioned officer who now reverts on going to France receives the pay of his former rank?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Receives the pay of the rank to which he reverts.

Mr. OLIVER: He was a battalion sergeant-major, and became a private, and he understood his pay as battalion sergeant-major was continued. He had been drawing his battalion sergeant-major pay after he was wounded, but when he was settled up with, to be sent back to Canada, he found, instead of being a comfortable sum of money ahead, he was actually in debt to the department. Will the new regulation be retroactive to the benefit of that man?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The regulation would give him the pay of a private. Unfortunately he had been drawing the higher pay, and when the books were balanced he found himself in debt. That was the unfortunate situation. Nevertheless, when a man reverts he gets the pay of the rank to which he reverts. The separation allowance and pension, however, are of the higher rank from which he has reverted.

Mr. OLIVER: He will get the pension of a battalion sergeant-major?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: Although he was in the position of a private when he was wounded?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Yes. And the separation allowance, if he is a married man, would be of the higher rank.

Mr. OLIVER: He was not a married man, but he had a dependent mother at the time.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The separation allowance could have gone to the dependent mother at the pay fo the higher rank, if the father was not living.

Mr. OLIVER: Why is it necessary that the non-commissioned officer should become a private upon going to France? His position is different from that of the commissioned officer, especially of the battalion commissioned officer. The battalion commissioned officer loses his rank because he is not in command of a sufficient number of men to warrant his retaining it. But the non-commissioned officer goes with the draft of the battalion to which he belongs; he goes with the men with whom he was associated as non-commissioned officer. I am at a loss to know why, under normal conditions, a non-commissioned officer should be degraded to the position of private when he goes to France.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Of course, he is not forced to do it. There is only one sergeant-major in a battalion.

Mr. OLIVER: I was not speaking of a battalion sergeant-major; I was speaking of the ordinary sergeant or corporal.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: They are not forced to revert in rank. Sometimes they want to go with friends or comrades in certain units and they prefer to revert in rank rather than wait. That is the only explanation I can make.

Mr. OLIVER: Why should they have to revert? When a platoon is going to France, why should not the non-commissioned officers who accompany that platoon retain their rank?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: There may be a surplus of certain grades of non-commissioned officers. Moreover, these men may be anxious to get to the front as soon as possible, and their anxiety is such that they are willing to go as privates rather than wait until some other opportunity occurs. They are not forced to revert in rank.

Mr. OLIVER: I understand that they are compelled to go; that it is not a matter of option with them. The non-commissioned officer is not in the position of an officer; he must go if he is sent. That is to say, the rank that he has attained and the pay that he has been receiving are taken from him without good reason. In a case like that I think it would be fair to adopt the suggestion that the member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) made in connection with commissioned officers: that the pay and allowances of the non-commissioned officer who, for reasons over which he has no control, is compelled to serve as a private, should be continued.

Mr. TAYLOR: I should like to put in a word again in support of the member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver). I am sorry to have to say to the minister that he is not quite informed about what they do with non-commissioned officers in England. The non-commissioned officer when he goes to England is treated very harshly indeed. As the hon. member for Edmonton says, he has no option at all; he automatically becomes a private.

Originally the non-commissioned officers went to England as acting non-commissioned officers, and if they were found to be qualified and to be fit in every way to hold their rank, they were confirmed in that rank in England. But because there was a surplus of non-commissioned officers, a large number having accumulated in England, they made the harsh rule that in future no non-commissioned ranks should be confirmed in England, and that upon their arrival in England these non-commissioned officers should become privates, no matter what their qualifications were. When the minister remembers that the qualifications of a sergeant are the same as those of a lieutenant, that the examinations are identical and that the certificate is obtained in Canada largely through the enterprise and at the expense of the non-commissioned officer, he will realize that a very great injustice is done to these men and that when they go over they should not be obliged merely to take a chance upon their getting their rank back again. When I was told that these non-commissioned officers could go across to France as privates and that, if they were eligible for promotion, they could very easily get that promotion in the field, I inquired whether any steps were taken to ensure that that promotion should come to them in the field; whether, for instance, any lists of qualified non-commissioned officers were sent over to France. The answer came from headquarters in London, through the department here, that no such lists were sent over; that it was left entirely to chance whether the qualifications of these men were ever recognized.

I want to mention another instance which has occurred in connection with the reverting in rank of non-commissioned officers. We are told that if they are killed, the pensions paid to their widows are continued at the rate for non-commissioned officers. It is quite true that there is an order in council directing that their pensions shall so continue. But we have in Canada a Pensions Board which, so far as my experience with it is concerned is not much troubled about orders in council. It seems to act upon the principle that the widow of a non-commissioned officer gets only what she can prove she is entitled to get, and if she has no friends, lives a long way from here or is not in a position to put up proof, she gets the very lowest amount that the Pensions Board can give her, which is the pension of the wife of a private soldier. I have a case of that kind before the Pensions Board now. As commanding officer of a deceased sergeant, I have submitted to the board all the proof possible and have referred them to headquarters here for absolute proof. The board, however, have declined to recognize the widow's claim because the Record Office in London persists in telling her that this man died as a private. It is quite true that he died as a private, but he had before him the guarantee of this Government under order in council that if he died as a private his widow would be pensioned as the widow of a sergeant. I cannot make the Pensions Board recognize this fact. They simply keep travelling around in a circle, like the old Circumlocution Office, and they come back after a series of letters to the assertion that the Record Office says that the man died as a private and that his widow is to get the pension of a private's widow. I have deferred taking this matter up in the House because there is a resolution on the Order Paper dealing with the Pensions Board, and I thought that the proper time to take up a matter of this kind was upon the consideration of that resolution. But in case that resolution is never reached, I should like to call the minister's attention to the necessity for seeing not only that when non-commissioned officers get to England they get some advantage for the qualifications they secured here, but that the Pensions Board shall be made to recognize the contract of this Government with the soldiers and their widows.

Sir EDWAR DKEMP: An order in council in respect to a matter of that kind has to be obeyed by the Pensions Board.

Mr. TAYLOR: But they do not obey it.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I understand the member for New Westminster (Mr. Taylor) to say that the difficulties thrown in the way make it impossible to grant the pension as he suggested; at least, he has a case of that kind in mind.

I will ask my deputy to draw the attention of the Pension Board to this matter again to see what their answer is to the arguments put forward here by my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) and my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. Taylor).

Mr. OLIVER: In this connection, it was drawn to my attention by the men with whom I conversed that the non-commissioned officers at the base in England, who remained there in comfort and safety, retained rank and pay, while the non-commissioned officer who went to the front and risked his life and did the fighting, went as a private. That is neither fair nor reasonable, and I hope the minister will take some means of adjusting the matter so that a man will not be penalized because of the service he renders.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I shall be glad to take up that matter also.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: When an officer reverts to a lower rank, is there any one to tell him what his pay is going to be at the time of reversion? A few days ago I brought to the notice of the department a case somewhat in line with what the hon. member for Edmonton has said. It seemed to me to be a case of very great hardship. When one of our best young men from the Six Nations tribe, who had served with distinction for the past two years and won the Military Cross and several other honours on the field, got home a short time ago, he was informed that he had been overpaid during the three years of his reversion of rank in England to the extent of about $317, and his pay and his wife's separation allowance were stopped until the $317 was made up. I wrote the department stating that this seemed to be an extreme case of hardship. I think steps have been taken to adjust the matter, but a case of that kind should not occur. I am not blaming the minister at all, because I believe such cases occur on the other side. But when an officer reverts in rank to a lower grade, there should be some one to tell him at the time what his pay is going to be. It is not right to send a man in a bill for money spent during three years, and I hope that will not occur in many cases. I have had to deal with other cases of hardship in regard to pensions. This is perhaps not the proper time to bring up such questions, but the Government should be more liberal in the matters of pensions, especially to the lower ranks.

It does not seem to be right to ask a widow to swear that an only son was her sole support, and to provide that unless she does so she cannot get anything. I had a case of that kind a few days ago. A widow had lost her only son. She had taken some bank work and because she was doing this work, it was proposed that she should receive no allowance whatever, although her only son had been killed at the front and her husband had been dead for some years. Whoever is in authority in those matters should be a little more liberal. When an officer reverts to a lower grade, as many have done in order to get to the front, he should have a distinct understanding when he leaves for the front on what basis he is to be paid and what separation allowance his wife and family are to receive. The minister probably knows the name of the man whose case I have mentioned. I have mentioned it to him on a previous occasion.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: These unfortunate questions of overpayment occur now and again. I think this man's name was Smith, but the matter is being adjusted. The Minister of Finance is the responsible minister in regard to pensions. That question does not come up under these estimates.

Mr. MACDONALD: Will the minister tell us whether the Minister of Finance intends going on with his resolution in regard to pensions? It has stood on the Order Paper for a long time. It was understood at the time it was put on the Order Paper that the matter was to be referred to a special committee, as was done last year. As we are nearing the end of the session, it is desirable that the matter should be brought up at once, because in all parts of the country questions are being brought up in regard to inequalities of pensions.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The Minister of Finance was in the House a few moments ago. If my hon. friend or some other hon. member will ask him when he comes in again, he will probably be able to give an answer to the question.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I understand that when I was out of the chamber a little while ago, there was some discussion about soldiers under the age of eighteen years serving in the ranks. I have had two cases drawn to my attention in the last few days. I have sent them forward to the deputy minister and he has been kind enough to say that he will forward them to the authorities on the other side. One of those cases was a boy whose date of birth is the 3rd day of June, 1901, so that he would be sixteen years old on the 3rd day of June this year. This boy, I am told by his parents who live in my constituency, is in France at the present time. His brother was killed in France some time in May. This boy is very young and his parents are anxious about him. His father was away from home at the time the boy enlisted, otherwise, I do not think he would have been permitted to enlist. The other case is from the same district. The young fellow was born on the 15th of November, 1900, so that he would be about sixteen years and eight months old. I understand this young fellow is in Witley camp, Surrey, England. I can give the names and numbers of these soldiers, but it is not necessary that I should do so. What is the policy of the department in regard to these boys? Is it possible to order this boy in France back under the circumstances? If so, that ought to be done because he is altogether too young for active service. The other boy who is in England is not quite in the same position, because he is a little older, but in both cases their parents are applying to have them returned. Is it possible to have that done?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: We had this question up while my hon. friend was out of the chamber. It has been the policy to discharge all the young men under age. As soon as our attention is directed to a case, we get the birth certificate or other proper evidence of birth. It is difficult to know on whom to place the blame. Sometimes the fault is the boy's; sometimes it is the parents'. We refer to England demands for discharge of boys who are under age. My hon. friend refers to one boy in France. I do not suppose that the parents made an application to have the boy taken out of the ranks while he was in Canada. They sometimes delay making application.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I understand that they wrote some letters about him to the department when he was at Aldershot, but nothing was done, and then they wrote me.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: If my hon. friend will forward the data to my deputy, or to the department, and will enclose a birth certificate—there is very little difficulty, as a rule, in getting that—we will have it forwarded overseas.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I want to call the minister's attention to a condition prevailing at Halifax, and which, perhaps, is not to be found anywhere else in Canada. There, since the beginning of the war, two local regiments have been doing duty at the forts. I am not sure whether the full strength of the regiments are so engaged, but I think that is probable. As I understand it, these men do not receive the separation allowance.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: They are a part of the garrison at Halifax, are they not?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I suppose so.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Did they not take the place of the permanent force who went overseas?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think so, but, of course, the garrison duties have been greatly increased since then. These regiments are engaged at McNab's Island, York Redoubt, and such points as that. To all intents and purposes, they are in the same position as if they were serving overseas, as they have to give up their work and are unable to live at home. I think these men should be granted the separation allowance.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The married men get 45 cents a day subsistence allowance.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Many of these men have represented to me that they should receive the separation allowance.

Mr. EDWARDS: Do their families live at Halifax?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: They would, but the men are unable to live at home, and are unable to carry on their ordinary business. I would like the minister to give this matter some consideration, because I think a great deal can be said in favour of these men being paid the usual separation allowance, and I certainly think they should receive it.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The subsistence allowance for married men amounts to $13.50 a month. The separation allowance is $20 a month.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I was not aware that the subsistence allowance was so large. At all events, I submit that these men are entitled to the full separation allowance. The case of such men is rather different from that of the forces doing duty almost anywhere else in Canada. They are constantly on duty; they have to give up their ordinary work, and, furthermore, they cannot escape this duty, because they are called out. I really do think that they are entitled to the ordinary separation allowance.

Mr. EDWARDS: I confess I have never been able to understand why this distinction is made between the subsistence allowance and the separation allowance. I am not a military man, and there are many things in the military line that I do not understand. There may be a good reason for this distinction, but it seems to me that a married man who is separated from his family, even if he is only doing garrison duty at Halifax or some other part of the country, should receive the $20 separation allowance instead of the 45 cents a day subsistence.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The regulations in regard to this matter have been in force since the war began. I think hon. gentlemen will agree that there is some difference between the man who enlists for service in the city of Halifax, where he is in touch with his family, and to some extent, perhaps, with his ordinary business, and where he has a guiding hand over his family affairs, and the man who goes into the trenches and undertakes all the hazards of warfare as it is carried on in France and Belgium to-day. I might point out that the 45 cents a day subsistence allowance is what the permanent force were getting whose place these men took.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: But they were volunteers. In the case I am referring to, the two local regiments were called out, and they could not avoid doing duty; that distinction should be taken into consideration. They were called out, I suppose, under the authority of the Militia Council or some other body. I trust the minister will promise me to give the matter some consideration.

I wish to call the minister's attention to another matter, and perhaps I can best illustrate by giving the facts of one case. A Canadian soldier went overseas as an officer, and for some reason was courtmartialed and degraded. Later on he joined a British regiment as a private. The department continued to pay the separation allowance to his wife, who was residing in Halifax, without knowledge of his having left the Canadian service, and in this way some $300 or more was paid to her. Subsequently the department's attention was called to the fact, I think by myself, that this man had ceased to be a member of the Canadian force. Regularly since then the wife of this man receives a notice from some branch of the Militia Department requesting her to refund the amount that was improperly paid to her. The amounts were undoubtedly received and used by her in good faith. There are no doubt a great many cases of this kind; I have heard some of my fellow-members speak of them, and I would like to know what the policy of the department is in regard to such claims. In most cases it will be found utterly impossible to collect them. It seems to me that it means a great deal of labour on the part of some officials of the department to be sending out these notices regularly, without much hope of accomplishing anything. If bona fides can be established, if it can be shown that there was no fraud, I think the Government might as well abandon their claims on these women and wipe the accounts off the slate altogether.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: There have been quite a number of cases where men are far away from their homes and their families, and they are discharged, or something happens to them, and the wife or the one to whom the separation allowance is assigned, draws it; but, they are not all innocent. When they endorse the cheques, they have to certify that the husband is still serving in the forces. This is printed in good plain English on the backs of the cheques, and they read it at the time of endorsation. No doubt there are cases of hardship, but it is very difficult for me to make a statement here that the Government would be permitted to forgive all claims of that kind, because if I did so it would be unfair and unjust, for the reason that most of those claims arise in respect of people who know what they are doing when they endorse the cheques.

Mr. OLIVER: Do I understand the minister to say he will be able to give the House the figures as to the unfit men who were in England, and those who have been returned to Canada?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: I am speaking of those who were unfit when they enlisted, not those who became unfit after enlistment, such as the list I gave the House to-night.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I cannot see how you could trace out a thing of that kind. How can you get a statement showing that the men who might have been returned from Great Britain were medically unfit when they enlisted? I can assure my hon. friend from Edmonton that I have, since I have been minister, exerted myself to give any information desired by the committee or the House and I shall continue to do so, but in regard to this particular point I do not see how it is possible to get the information. If I thought the information could be obtained I would certainly undertake to obtain it, and bring it down to-morrow; but, as I say, I cannot see how it can be done.

Mr. OLIVER: Of course, it is not for me to say how it can be done. At the same time, I should imagine the medical records would be complete.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I will look into it to-morrow morning, and if the hon. member for Edmonton will draw my attention to it again I will give him a further statement. If the information can be obtained he shall have it.

Mr. OLIVER: In view of the statements in the Bruce, the Babtie and the Jones reports, this is the most important statement the Government can place before Parliament with reference to the cost of the war and the efficiency of the work done. We are informed that there have been enlisted and gone overseas, or are enlisted for overseas service in Canada about 340,000 or 350,000 men. Those are our effective enlistments. I believe we have 130,000 men in France. We have had in the neighbourhood of 100,000 casualties, of which I suppose it would not be unreasonable to say that possibly twenty-five per cent would not be permanent, which would leave about 75,000 as permanently disabled. In other words we have 130,000 men in France,

75,000 permanent casualties,

11 p.m. making 205,000 effective men accounted for out of 340,000 or 350,000 enlisted. There are still 135,000 men to be taken into consideration. How many of those 135,000 are available for service in France? Because, we must remember we are not fighting this war in Canada nor in England. We are fighting it in France, and it is only the man who is able to fight in France who is of military value to the Dominion of Canada. Either those 135,000 men are not of military value to Canada, and should not be on the pay list—

Sir EDWARD KEMP: They are all being made use of in England or in France.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not think the minister is absolutely accurate when he says they are all being made use of. I understand from these reports that there is an effort to keep them in employment as an excuse for their being on the paylist. That is not what we should be trying to do. We are trying to put men on the fighting line in France to keep them there, and to support them there. If we have 135,000 men who have not been on the fighting line we want to know whether they are fit to go or not, and whether they are a force we can rely on to reach the front ultimately. The reports of those commissions certainly throw very grave doubt on the efficiency of an unknown proportion of that 135,000 men. We need those men. So far as we know they are industrially efficient. If they are not fit for France they are fit for Canada, and they should be either in France or in Canada, or perhaps in England simply on the way to France. I urge upon the minister that the question I have asked him is a most important question to the people of Canada, as fixing their position in this war, and as to what they have done and what they are able to do. In the past we have deluded ourselves by speaking of the number of men enlisted, when, as a matter of fact, of those nominally enlisted 75,000 were not in service or were found to be unfit after enlistment, and left the service. We were not doing ourselves or our cause any good by claiming an enlistment of 418,000, when we really had an effective enlistment of a little less than 350,000. We were not doing ourselves any good by claiming an enlistment of 350,000 in, as a matter of fact, a considerable proportion of that number is not fit for the firing line, which is the only place we need soldiers. Any place else a great deal of the work can be done by stenographers or people who are militarily unfit; but we do not want to have to make a pretense of having raised an army of 350,000 men if any such proportion of them as these reports indicate are unfit for the firing line. Let us get down to business and know what we have done, what we can do, and admit that we have not done what we have not done.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: Like the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) I should like to ascertain how many unfit men were permitted to enlist. The statement of the minister is absolutely true, that neither he nor any other man can give the number of men who were unfit when they enlisted; that is absolutely out of the question. In southern Manitoba when the battalions were being enlisted in small towns—and by this means eight or ten battalions were raised that would not otherwise have been raised—the men were examined by the local doctors. It is true that these doctors were inexperienced in that kind of work, but I believe they did the work honestly, and I can use no better word. The men from Manitoba were gathered at Camp Hughes and there they began their training. The camp had not been running for two months before a board of three members of the Army Medical Service visited it. The men were stripped, and I believe honestly examined to the very best of the ability of this board, who were as efficient as any three men who could be found. Some men were discharged. These doctors who discarded these men could not say whether they were unfit when they enlisted. As a medical man, I am prepared to make the declaration, and I challenge contradiction, that it would be impossible for the board to affirm that many of those men were unfit when they enlisted. The battalions went on drilling, and in the fall, before being transported overseas, they were again inspected by a medical board and still more men were discarded. They went overseas, and before being transported to France were again examined and more men discarded. It would be impossible for the Minister of Militia or any other man to say how many of them were unfit when they enlisted.

Mr. OLIVER: The minister has brought down a full statement of the discharges of men in Canada. There should be no serious difficulty in giving an equally full statement about the discharges in England before the troops go to France.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: I understood the hon. member to ask the minister to give the number of men who were unfit when they were enlisted. That is impossible.

Mr. OLIVER: The minister has given the number of men who were unfit when they enlisted but who were discharged in Canada. I was endeavouring to secure a detailed statement of those who were discharged for like causes after their arrival in England.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I think the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Schaffner) is quite right. These battalions have gone before boards more than once. They were weeded out and weeded out until they were almost disheartened. Then in England more of them were set aside as not fit to go to France. My hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) is under the impression that quite a number of these men might be returned to Canada for industrial employment. There are very few men who are not doing some military duty in England that would have to be done by a man who was fit for the trenches if they were not doing it. We cannot get those men back. I have had relatives ask for the return of men who are doing police duty, but they will not let them come back. They are as necessary for that work as they would be for work in the trenches. There is no such surplus of rank and file in England as my hon. friend thinks. There is no surplus at all. If men went over in the earlier stages of the war who were unfit for service, they would have been returned long ago unless they were usefully employed.

Mr. OLIVER: I have given the count as it has been given to me of the number of men we have. We should have 135,000 men available for the firing line. We are told we have no such number. I forget what the number is, but we are supposed to have something like fifteen or twenty thousand men in England fit for the firing line. What is the condition of the rest? If they are not fit for the firing line, why are they there?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: They are being prepared for the firing line. They get far more intensive training in England than in this country. Training has undergone an evolution since the war began. They are giving more intensive training now, and preparing men for category A, working up all the time.

Mr. OLIVER: What proportion of the 135,000 men does the hon minister think are fit for the firing line, or will become fit?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Out of the 126,241 there were 7,981 officers, 26,359 in Category A1, fit for the firing line.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Which means what?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Perfectly fit for France. There were 26,927 in A2 almost ready for France. There were 5,147 in A3, the next class. Then we come to A4, 383 under 18 years of age, and 3,086 over 18. I do not know what that means. Then we come to Category B, which has three classes. Category B is the class training men to get into Category A. I have before me the exact particulars, in a very long and complicated document, explaining how this 126,241 gradually, as far as possible, get into Category A. Of that number there was a large number in hospitals. I think this table appears in the Prime Minister's speech on the Military Service Bill, and will be found in Hansard.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am constantly in receipt of requests from the parents of soldiers overseas, asking if their sons could not obtain leave of absence. In most cases they are men who have been wounded, or who have been on duty overseas almost since the beginning of the war, and who, for apparently very strong reasons, would be entitled to a leave of absence. I suppose every member of the House receives some similar request, and it is impossible to trouble the department each time with each particular case, and I would like to have from the minister, if possible, some declaration of departmental policy in respect to this matter. In many cases my correspondent will refer to the fact that in his or her locality there is some officer, or man who has returned from overseas on leave of absence, and naturally they think his case was not so deserving as their own. Upon that, of course, there may be a great difference of opinion, but there is a feeling on the part of interested persons that there is some partiality shown in giving leave of absence to certain officers and privates. I am sure I need not elaborate the idea, because the department probably have similar cases before it more than once every day. It may be impossible to make a statement of policy upon a matter of this kind, because cases may differ very much, but I should like to know the ground upon which leave of absence is secured on behalf of any person overseas.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The applications are more numerous every day, I think. There are various reasons given for asking that relatives be returned to Canada. The question is a very difficult one to handle. My hon. friend will understand that occasionally a very sincere and affectionate father or mother will charge favouritism in certain circumstances. There is no such thing as favouritism in the matter.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: By whom is it determined?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: By the necessities of the troops in France. A man who has had sick leave is frequently returned to Canada to convalesce, and if his recovery can go on as well in Canada as in England, or elsewhere, he is allowed to come out. A board can examine him in Canada, to find out whether or not he is fit to go back to the front, and if he is not fit his leave can be extended on the recommendation of the Military Medical Board. There are requests made to us on account of the father or mother being ill, or one or the other having died, or some financial trouble. In an army of three or four hundred thousand men there are tragedies happening every day—every hour of the day—in respect of their relatives who are behind them. In a city of three hundred thousand people there are many accidents happening every day, and many pathetic incidents. All these things are reflected on the department, to a certain extent, in the prosecution of the war. The requests are very numerous, and we answer all of them, whether verbal or written. These requests are usually written, and it is desirable they should be in writing, so that they may be investigated, but where a man is medically fit for his duties as a soldier just at the present time, it is very, very difficult to get any leave of absence. Sometimes the relatives of soldiers in Canada make application to have their sons returned to Canada when the sons do not want to be treated in this way, and it is very embarassing for the man to be told he has been granted leave. He does not like to leave his comrades. He is singled out as a man who wants to get away and obtain some preference over the others. It is a difficult matter to handle. On the 1st of February, 1917, I issued a circular which at that time and at the present time covers nearly all the different forms of requisitions that are made for the return of soldiers from the front. There are ten in all.

It shows the procedure which ought to be taken in each case; I will send a copy of it over to my hon. friend. They are used every day in the department.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Who is the ultimate judge of the matter? The commanding officer of the battalion in which the applicant is enlisted?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The proper way to proceed is for the applicant himself to make application through his commanding officer at the front; then the case is rested on a solid foundation. But unless there are excellent reasons why it should be granted, the leave of absence is not granted to a man who is physically fit for his duties in France or in England. I do not know of any cases in which such requests have been granted, unless it has been in the case of men under medical treatment who can pass through their period of convalescence here as well as they can in England. Many persons who have occasion to receive applications of the kind to which my hon. friend refers ask the Militia Department to furnish them with copies of this circular in order that they may be able to answer the many questions that they get in respect to the return of soldiers.

Mr. MACDONALD: I know several cases of men who enlisted for overseas service, were passed by the local doctor, but, when the battalion came to go overseas, were directed by the Medical Board to remain at home because they were not medically fit to go across. In some cases these men were drafted into home defence battalions. I have in mind several coal miners who were perfectly willing to go across, but who were compelled under these conditions to remain in Halifax in a home defence unit. They have no interest or heart in their work, and they want to get back home. I have also in mind the case of a coal miner who enlisted in some unit which is now at Camp Borden, but who was declared medically unfit on account of heart disease. He has been retained in the service, but of course he has lost all interest in his work and is anxious to get back to his mine.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Is he doing home guard duty?

[Sir Edward Kemp.]

Mr. MACDONALD: He enlisted in some unit which had to be sent to Camp Borden for training; evidently it was not an infantry unit. There does not seem to be much use in keeping men who have volunteered for overseas service but who have ultimately been found to be medically unfit. If the man to whom I refer particularly would be more useful in some occupation connected with the industrial life of the country, he ought to be allowed to go.

I have a question to ask with regard to separation allowances. A young man, the only support of his sister, volunteered to go overseas, and was assured by the recruiting officer that in the event of his going his sister would get separation allowance. A similar statement was made with regard to the Patriotic Fund—about which there is no misunderstanding in our province, because the local authorities deal with it. The young man went away and left his sister on the farm, but she got no separation allowance; she simply got the assigned pay. It seems to me that separation allowance ought to be extended to cover the case of a man who leaves behind a dependent—mother, father or sister, as the case may be. I have in mind also the case of an officer who went overseas. He had married a very respectable lady. I do not know what could have gone wrong, but he refused to authorize her to receive the assigned pay. She has a family. Is any parental authority exercised by the department to cover cases where men who go to the front do not provide for those whom they leave behind? One more question: Is the recruiting throughout the country being maintained, and will it be maintained in its present state?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: There is no regulation in respect to the granting of separation allowance to a sister.

Mr. MACDONALD: Why should it not apply to a dependent?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: We should open a very wide door if we made a provision of that kind. This, however, is a question which is before the special Pension Committee. When a man's separation allowance is assigned to the party whom he wishes to get it, the assigned pay also goes to that party. A man cannot withhold the assigned pay.

Mr. MACDONALD: Suppose he will not assign the pay?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: There is no regulation applying to officers in cases of that kind. Does my hon. friend know a particular case where an officer refused both separation allowance and assigned pay?

Mr. MACDONALD: He has said nothing about either. He refuses the assigned pay.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: He has to sign a card with regard to the separation allowance. There is no way of getting after an officer who does as my hon. friend has mentioned. As to the recruiting, it is going on as usual; everything is being done to get recruits, the same as hitherto. However, the work is being confined almost entirely to the regimental recruiting offices. The officers who have hitherto recruited and who have been specially paid are being absorbed again into civil life as fast as possible.

Mr. MACDONALD: I see by the paper that Mr. Knight who is connected with the War Veterans' Association was speaking in Hamilton the other night and made very grave complaints against the Government in regard to the treatment of returned soldiers. He made some comparisons between Canada and Australia in that particular. What are the special requests from returned soldiers which the Government have not granted?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I thought the Government had granted everything in reason that they had asked. What has my hon. friend in mind that the returned soldiers have complained of? Many difficulties in respect to returned soldiers are being overcome from time to time.

Mr. GRAHAM: Mr. Knight was speaking at the Win the War meeting at Hamilton.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: How many recruits have been obtained in the month of July?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I have not yet received the returns for July.

Mr. MACDONALD: This is the report of Mr. Knight's speech:

> He criticised the Government in no uncertain tone. The fabric of the present Government was never designed to meet and deal with the present great crisis, he said. Inefficient men were given positions that they should never have received. 'The Government is rotten with patronage', declared Mr. Knight, with heat. 'We have not got the best men representing us in the House.' No honest effort has been made by the Government to look after its returned soldiers, declared Mr. Knight. It seemed the policy of the Government to give the returned man the lowest sum he would accept and get rid of him as quickly as possible. He contrasted this state of affairs with the method pursued in Australia, where, he said, the returned soldiers were being looked after and provided for much better than in Canada.

I am not familiar with the facts, but I want to know what Mr. Knight has been asking the minister to do that he has not done.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I am much surprised at the remarks by my hon. friend. The War Veterans' Associations from all parts of Canada met in this Chamber about three or four weeks ago and everything that they had to say, they said, and the most of the requests they made were reasonable and could be complied with. This Mr. Knight at that time ventilated his grievances and they were not very numerous. I do not understand the grievances to which he refers.

Mr. OLIVER: With respect to this matter of reversion of rank on going to France, is there an order in council on the subject or other information that could be laid on the table of the House that would indicate under what conditions an officer reverts to lower rank on going to France the first or the second time?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I will lay the order in council on the Table to-morrow.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I would suggest that the committee rise. We have been sitting a long time, and I have no doubt the minister, as well as any other hon. member, would like the committee to rise. It is true we have taken up nearly two days without passing an item, but that is a very significant matter. The minister will realize that military affairs are uppermost in the mind of Parliament and of the country, and there are a great number of matters to be discussed which are perhaps not necessarily relevant to the items before the committee. It matters very little whether an item is passed to-day or not.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: There is surely no objection to passing one or two items before we rise.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Perhaps there is no objection to doing so, but that will not expedite matters.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: If we passed one or two items, we would feel that we had done something.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is reasonable. A minister, when he is in Supply, wants, when he goes home, to be able to say: I have made some progress. As the hon.

member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) has suggested, all the expenditures for war, which are enormous, are really relevant to the discussion on these estimates. They do not refer to the items under discussion, but the understanding was that all these matters could be discussed, and that understanding is being carried out.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Yes.

Progress reported.

On the motion of Sir Edward Kemp, the House adjourned at 11.45 p.m.

PRIVILEGE.

STATEMENT BY SIR WILFRID LAURIER IN REPLY TO SIR CLIFFORD SIFTON.

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. The House is aware that I very seldom notice any attack made upon me outside of this House, in the press or otherwise, but I find a report of a speech by Sir Clifford Sifton, delivered two days ago, which I cannot allow to pass unnoticed. Sir Clifford Sifton is reported in the Globe of yesterday as having addressed the Canadian Club at Winnipeg, and as saying, among other things:

> Sir Clifford did not think that the people of Canada had any call to find fault with Laurier on the war until the day that the conscription policy was announced in Parliament. Sir Wilfrid now said that he was unable to endorse fully the policy of conscription. His attitude was taken because he believed that it was his duty to the province of Quebec. In other words, Laurier abrogated his title to leadership. The plain, unavoidable and inevitable fact was that if Sir Wilfrid Laurier were to win this election Canada would go out of the war.

I have to say in reference to this, Sir, that from anything which I have ever said in this House or out of it, Sir Clifford Sifton could not draw the inference that any attitude which I have ever taken was in deference to the province of Quebec. Neither on this occasion, nor any occasion in my public life, did I ever take an attitude in deference to one province alone. The policies which I have opposed were not opposed from the point of view of one province, but from the point of view of Liberal principles and with respect to all the provinces of Canada and irrespective of race or creed. This is my position to-day. I have stated before, and I repeat, that my attitude to-day, on the 1st of August, 1917, towards the war is the same as it was on the 19th August, 1914. I am in this war to the end, but I am in this war not upon compulsion, but upon the voluntary principle of enlistment.

COAL PRODUCTION IN WESTERN MINES.

Hon. T. W. CROTHERS (Minister of Labour): Hon. members will be pleased to hear the message which I have received from the Director of Coal Operations in western Canada. The telegram reads:

> Calgary, Alberta, July 28, 1917: Hon. T. W. Crothers, Minister of Labour, Ottawa. Daily production district eighteen, seventeen thousand five hundred tons coal and seven hundred and fifty tons coke. Output gradually increasing. Seventy-seven matters under dispute between the operators and miners finally adjusted to-day; will forward report next week.
> W. H. Armstrong,
> Director Coal Operations.

Mr. OLIVER: Has the Minister of Labour any information as to the price being paid by consumers of coal in the West at the present time as compared with the price before the strike?

Mr. CROTHERS: I have no information on that point.

Mr. OLIVER: Would the minister be good enough to make inquiry in regard to that matter, because I have seen it stated that there is a difference of fifty cents a ton against the consumer.

Mr. CROTHERS: I might say that under the order appointing Mr. Armstrong director of coal operations, the price to be charged for coal is subject to his approval.

PRIVILEGE.

STATEMENT BY MR. KYTE AS TO THE WILLIAM DAVIES COMPANY.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. G. W. KYTE (Richmond): I rise to a question of privilege. On Monday afternoon, discussing the O'Connor report, I used the following language:

I recognize that a member of this House, speaking on any public question, does so with a full responsibility, that anything he says may, by reason of his being a member of Parliament, be clothed with greater weight and effect than it otherwise might be. I shall, therefore, not go into details except to say that there is a general rumour—I do not know how well authenticated; if it is not true I will be the first to withdraw it—but the statement is made that facilities for the carrying of bacon from the William Davies Company from Canada to England are afforded largely by the ships which are carrying munitions across to Great Britain.

Then followed this dialogue between the Minister of Trade and Commerce and myself:

Sir George Foster: Has my hon. friend any authority for that except rumour?

Mr. Kyte: I have stated my authority, and I shall be the first to withdraw it if it is not true.

Sir George Foster: Would it not be better that the statement should not have been made if you did not know it was true?

Mr. Kyte: I think there is rather too much of an inclination to pussyfoot with regard to matters in which the big interests are concerned.

Sir George Foster: Better to pussyfoot than to insinuate untruths, which are very damaging when put forth by a member of Parliament. If my hon. friend meant anything by his insinuation, it was that, in some wrongful way, the British Admiralty connived at the carrying of William Davies Company stuff and discriminated against others. I do not believe there is a word of truth in it.

Mr. Kyte: What I have said I have said.

Sir George Foster: I know you have.

Mr. Kyte: And I have stated that if it is not true the William Davies Company have ample opportunity to deny it, and I shall be the first to accept their denial.

A statement was issued by Sir Joseph Flavelle in the form of a letter addressed to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It is in the following language:

My dear Sir George Foster:

The member for Richmond, N.S., (Mr. G. W. Kyte) is reported in the morning papers as stating that "facilities for the carrying of bacon from the William Davies Co. to England were afforded largely by ships carrying munitions across to Great Britain during the past year," the inference apparently being that I secured some preferred relation for the William Davies Co. for the movement of bacon products to Great Britain.

It should be an adequate reply to state that the William Davies Co. have been under contract with the imperial authorities to ship a given quantity of bacon each week—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I hope that the hon. member does not intend to read a letter which has already been excluded from Hansard. If he wishes to rise to a question of privilege it is competent for him to refer to the substance of the letter, but not to read it.

Mr. KYTE: I think the House would prefer that I should give the ipsissima verba of the letter. A statement appears in the Montreal Gazette this morning which places me in a rather unfavourable light, and on a question of privilege I submit that I am entitled to read this letter as affecting the case. I would like Your Honour's permission to read the letter rather than to give my rendering of its meaning.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think it incompetent for the hon. member to read the letter; I have already given a ruling on that point. He may give the substance of it.

Mr. KYTE: I understood that Your Honour's ruling was that a member of this House could not bring in a letter written by a private citizen unless upon a question of privilege. A statement has been made contradicting the statement which I made, and on a question of privilege I should like to read it. The letter continues:

—the price for which has been fixed by the imperial authorities in Great Britain.

For such contract bacon the minister of shipping in Great Britain arranges for transportation and instructs the director of overseas transport in Canada to provide space for it. As the movement of this bacon overseas is wholly under the control of the minister of shipping in Great Britain no action is taken by any officer of the William Davies Co. to secure space for such shipments.

For the bacon which is forwarded on consignment to Great Britain the company secures ocean space in the ordinary manner. I am advised that there have been weeks at a time when space for consignment bacon was unprocurable and that there have been other periods when the freight was so extreme that the company did not take the space. In any case the company's position was the same as that of any shipper seeking to secure ocean accommodation from the various shipping companies.

I address this letter to you because I observe that in the proceedings of the house you asked the member for Richmond for his authority for this statement.

Yours faithfully,

J. W. Flavelle.

Inasmuch as this statement of Sir Joseph Flavelle is not a denial of the allegation made by me, I have nothing to withdraw.

THE CANADIAN RAILWAY SITUATION.

STATEMENT BY SIR THOMAS WHITE, MINISTER OF FINANCE.

On the motion of Sir Thomas White for Committee of Supply.

Hon. Sir THOMAS WHITE (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I avail myself of this motion to make a statement to the House respecting certain financial proposals which the Government will lay before Parliament with regard to the Canadian Northern Railway Company and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway company. On account of the prevailing atmospheric conditions, I shall employ all possible brevity consistent with adequate presentation of this most important subject.

The financial position of the Canadian Northern Railway company and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway company is such as to demand imperatively further assistance from the Government if these railway systems are to continue to serve the public as solvent, going concerns. Last year, in connection with the loans of $15,000,000 and $8,000,000 respectively which we made to the Canadian Northern Railway company and to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway company, I announced on behalf of the Government that a commission would be appointed for the purpose of fully investigating railway and transportation conditions in Canada, with a view to finding a permanent solution of the problem connected therewith, and which were continually being brought to the attention of the Government. I stated at that time that it was possible and even probable that the permanent solution of the railway situation might involve the Dominion taking over one or more of the existing systems, or that there might be involved the larger issue of the nationalization of all the railways of Canada.

Before announcing the policy which the Government purposes to lay before Parliament, I desire to refer briefly to the report of the commissioners which was tabled some weeks ago and with which, I have no doubt, most of the members of the House are familiar. In pasing, I may say that the personnel of the commission was Mr. A. H. Smith, president of the New York Central system, chairman; Sir Henry Drayton, chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners of Canada, and Mr. Acworth, a distinguished financial and railway expert of London, England.

As the House is aware, there was a difference of opinion expressed by the commissioners; that is to say, there were two reports, one by Sir Henry Drayton and Mr. Acworth, and one by Mr. Smith, the chairman of the commission. In the opening of the report occurs this significant sentence, which represents the views of all the members of the commission:

> We have taken the situation as it is and find ourselves in agreement as to the necessity for constructive aid to bring the railways through the present crisis. We differ however as to the extent and method of Government aid desirable and to the increase and character of Government liability and interest now and for the future.

This is the key-note of both reports—a constructive policy aided by the Government—not a policy of destruction resulting in receiverships with the attendant consequences of disintegration of the systems, serious interference with the public service rendered by these corporations and grave detriment to the credit of the Dominion and the provinces, whose guarantees are inextricably involved in the finances of these railway systems.

Both reports absolutely sustain the position so far taken by the Government in aiding these railways and preventing receiverships with the inevitable liquidation which would ensue. Let me read in this connection, as to the desirability of avoiding receiverships, from the report of Sir Henry Drayton and Mr. Acworth:

> If the two companies went into the hands of receivers we cannot doubt that investors outside of Canada would believe, however erroneously, that the Dominion Government had treated them badly and that the result would be serious injury to the credit of the Canadian Government and indeed of all Canadian enterprises. And this result is one that putting it on pecuniary grounds alone the Canadian people should in their own interest spend a good deal of money to avoid. We, therefore, consider that Canada should assume the responsibility of seeing that the interest on these securities should be met. This responsibility is in our opinion unavoidable. But we recognize that it is serious. It will involve considerable financial aid for some years. How many we will not estimate as it depends in the main on the rate at which Canada develops.

That is the opinion of Sir Henry Drayton and Mr. Acworth as to the desirability, the necessity even, from the standpoint of the Dominion's credit, of avoiding receiverships and liquidation of these two railway systems. In this connection, Mr. A. H. Smith says:

I see no alternative but the Government shall continue, with discrimination and resort to all available safeguards, and under a policy of proper regulation and co-operation of effort, to aid the necessitous railroads of the Dominion until such time, which I hope and believe will not be far distant, when these will become self-supporting and the problem will be solved.

That is the opinion of the chairman of the commission. As I have stated, the gist of these two reports, both majority and minority, is a constructive policy preserving the systems as solvent, going concerns to the end that they may render the maximum of public service in the all-important fields of transportation, and that the credit of Canada, its provinces, and its business enterprises may be protected and maintained in the investment markets of the world.

The recommendations of Sir Henry Drayton and Mr. Acworth are that the three railways, the Canadian Northern, the Grand Trunk, and the Grand Trunk Pacific be transferred by Act of Parliament to an independent Board of Trustees, to be incorporated as a company. The commissioners point out that although this board will be organized as a company, it would in effect be a public authority. The recommendations which they make and which I desire to place upon Hansard are as follows:

1. That a Board of Trustees be constituted by Act of Parliament and incorporated as "The Dominion Railway Company."

2. That the ownership of the Canadian Northern, Grand Trunk and Grand Trunk Pacific railways be vested in this company.

3. That the Government assume responsibility to the company for the interest on the existing securities of these undertakings.

4. That the Intercolonial (including the Prince Edward Island) and National Transcontinental railways be also handed over by the Government to the company.

5. That the whole of these railways, the Canadian Northern, the Grand Trunk, the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Intercolonial, and the National Transcontinental be operated by the company as one united system.

These two commissioners recommend that the board shall consist of five trustees. With the idea of having this absolutely free from political interference, it is recommended that it should be non-political, permanent, and self-perpetuating. They recommend that this Board of Trustees should be incorporated as "the Dominion Railway Company" with a capital of $50,000, all the shares of which should belong to the Dominion of Canada, and that the system, embracing, as I have stated, the Intercolonial, National Transcontinental, Canadian Northern, Grand Trunk and Grand Trunk Pacific, should all be subject as to their rates to the general authority of the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada. In order that this may be accomplished, namely, that the Dominion Railway company should have control of all the systems which I have mentioned, the two commissioners recommend that the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway company, that is to say $40,000,000 of the capital stock of that company at present held by His Majesty, and the $60,000,000 of the capital stock of that company held by private owners or pledgees; the stock of the Grand Trunk Pacific company, the ordinary, the preference, and the guaranteed stock of the Grand Trunk Railway company; the physical properties of the Intercolonial railway, and of the Transcontinental railway between Moncton and Winnipeg, should all be transferred by Act of Parliament to this Dominion Railway company, all the shares of which are recommended to be held by the Dominion of Canada.

The report goes on to deal with the question of what remuneration should be allowed to the private owners of the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway company, and the owners of the stocks which I have mentioned of the Grand Trunk Railway company. They recommend in this connection that there should be an arbitration between the trustees who would administer the Dominion Railway company and the Canadian Northern Railway company private shareholders, to decide what proportion of the Canadian Northern Railway company's stock should remain the property of the present private owners, and what proportion of the earnings of the Dominion Railway company may fairly be regarded as attributable to the Canadian Northeri Railway lines. Their suggestion, therefore, is that a certain amount of the stock at present, owned by the private shareholders of the Canadian Northern Railway company should be allowed to remain outstanding, and that there should be paid to holders of that portion an amount of the earnings of the Dominion Railway company which, under the determination of a board of arbitrators, would be adjudicated as their fair proportion of the earnings.

With regard to the Grand Trunk Railway Company shareholders, the two commissioners point out that the dividends which have been paid to the stockholders have averaged about $3,600,000 a year for the last ten years. They recommend that the Government should deal with the Grand Trunk Railway company through its board of directors, rather than with the individual shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway company, with a view to fixing upon a sum which the Dominion Railway Company might fairly pay to the Grand Trunk Railway company, to be distributed to its shareholders as dividends upon their shares. The report enlarges upon the liability which the Grand Trunk Railway company of Canada has assumed in connection with its guarantees upon the bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway company. According to their statement, there is in that connection a contingent liability of about $5,000,000 per annum. They express the opinion that the Grand Trunk Railway company of Canada should not be relieved from their liability in connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific. They also express the opinion that in determining the amount which might fairly be allowed to the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway company the fact of this contingent liability should be taken into consideration. In a word, they say that the Dominion Railway company might fairly allow the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway company of Canada a substantial percentage of the $3,600,000, which represents the average annual dividend paid over a period of the last ten years.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is upon all kinds of securities?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: On common stock, first, second and third preferred, and on guaranteed stock, but not on bonds or debenture stock, because those represent liabilities. The commissioners recommend that after a precise figure has been agreed upon between the directors of the Grand Trunk Railway company and the Government of Canada or the Dominion Railway Company trustees, the directors should prepare a scheme of equitable proportion between the different classes, and procure the assent and legal authority necessary for bringing the scheme into force.

As to financing by the Dominion Railway company, the commissioners express the opinion that as the Dominion Railway company would have not only the Grand Trunk, the Grand Trunk Pacific, and the Canadian Northern company, but also the unencumbered properties of the Intercolonial and the National Transcontinental railways, they would be able to issue securities and, in large degree at least, carry on their own financing. I may say that at the time this report was made the outlook financially was not as critical as it is at the present time. The commissioners seem to assume that the Board of Trustees would be able, without great difficulty, to float securities in the United States. My own view is that, on account of the entry of the United States into the war and the prevailing financial conditions there, it by no means follows that the task of the Board of Trustees of the Dominion Railway Company in floating the securities would be an easy one at the present time. According to the recommendations of the commissioners which I have placed upon Hansard, the Canadian Government would assume towards the company practically the position of guarantor of existing liabilities.

The two commissioners recommend that in order to force, if necessary, the private owners of the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway company and the owners of the ordinary, first, second and third, and guaranteed stock of the Grand Trunk Railway company to accept the recommendations made by the commissioners, the Government should, if necessary, take out orders for receivership with a view to having the Board of Trustees who are to administer the Dominion Railway company appointed receivers; in which event, in the opinion of the commissioners, the shareholders in question would be willing to agree to their recommendations and accept, in the case of the Canadian Northern Railway Company shareholders, the proportion of stock and the proportion of earnings provided for in the report, and in the case of the Grand Trunk shareholders, the reduced amount under the $3,600,000 per annum which these shareholders have been receiving annually on an average during the past ten years. So much for the report of Sir Henry Drayton and Mr. Acworth.

I now come—and I shall be as brief as possible—to the report of Mr. A. H. Smith, who is a practical railway expert, and the president of the New York Central Railway System. Mr. Smith recommends a settlement between the Government and the Grand Trunk Railway company. He says:

> The railway cannot carry out its part of the contract, and should be relieved of further embarrassment.

He is speaking with regard to the engagements of the Grand Trunk Railway company in connection wih the securities of the Grand Trunk Pacific. He would relieve the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway company of the obligation to lease the National Transcontinental. He would require the Grand Trunk Railway to lease the Grand Trunk Pacific to a board of trustees at a rental equal to the annual fixed charges Mr. Smith's proposition is practically this: The Grand Trunk is embarrassed and unable to fulfil its obligations to the public of Canada by reason of its contingent liabilities in respect of the bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific. There is also responsibility in connection with the leasing of the National Transcontinental. He says that in his opinion it is in the public interest that the Grand Trunk should be relieved of that responsibility.

Mr. GRAHAM: Of both responsibilities.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Of both responsibilities. Putting it as simply as I can, Mr. Smith's recommendations are these—confine the Canadian Northern to the West altogether. Make the Canadian Northern take a lease of the Grand Trunk Pacific, because the two systems are in a sense complementary the one to the other. Let the rental reserved in such lease be equal to the net annual fixed charges of the Grand Trunk Pacific. Confine the Grand Trunk to the East. Let the Grand Trunk take a lease of the Canadian Northern system from North Bay eastward. That leaves the "bridge lines," the Canadian Northern line from North Bay to Winnipeg, the Transcontinental line from North Bay to Winnipeg. These are the lean portions, running through territory where there is very little traffic. He says, let the Government assume those lines, vest them in a board of trustees and lease them, upon such terms as may be proper, to the Grand Trunk or the Canadian Northern. In other words, let the Government bear a share, at least, of the burden of maintaining those "bridge lines." With regard to the railways of Canada, the conclusion reached by Mr. Smith in his summing up is as follows:

> Let the Canadian Pacific alone; let the Grand Trunk operate the eastern lines now held by that company and the Canadian Northern; let the Canadian Northern operate the western lines now held by that company and the Grand Trunk Pacific system; let the Government operate the connections or procure their operation by private companies; all of which should be done under arrangements that are equitable.

Continuing, Mr. Smith makes the following observations:

> There is extensive duplication of lines in the West. The unsuccessful Grand Trunk Pacific lines are found among the successful Canadian Northern lines. Public policy demands the unification of these lines, for great economies could thereby be accomplished. There is extensive duplication in the East; the new Canadian Northern lines among the older lines of the Grand Trunk proper. Great economies in proposed investment and operating expenses await the joint working of those properties.

Then he makes the observation which I have already cited, as to leasing the bridge lines.

Mr. GRAHAM: Those would be the lines between North Bay and Winnipeg?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The lines between North Bay and Winnipeg. I hope the House will pardon me if in a matter of such extreme importance I seem to be taking a little more time than would ordinarily be justified. Mr. Smith's precise words are:

> The Government may well afford to take them over and maintain them as necessary parts of the public investment in the country's development. . . . It may be necessary in working out this plan to grant some additional and temporary aid to the Canadian Northern, and it will be necessary to effect some compromise with the Grand Trunk Railway Company which will enable this company to continue.

We have called in the experts, and they have differed. There are, however, certain points of agreement in their reports which I propose to mention to the House. The reports, both minority and majority, are clear that the Canadian Pacific Railway system is thoroughly sound and should not be interfered with. Both reports agree as to the serious financial position of the Canadian Northern Railway company and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway company. I have pointed out that the report of Sir Henry Drayton and Mr. W. M. Acworth dwell with emphasis upon the heavy contingent liability which the Grand Trunk Railway company has assumed in connection with its guarantees of the bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway company. All agree that no assistance is necessary for and no interference is desirable with the Canadian Pacific Railway company. They agree that the Canadian Northern Railway company and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway company should be saved from liquidation. They put forward the respective constructive recommendations in connection with those two systems as I have indicated to the House. In the differing views of these experts and confronted as we are with this all-important and most difficult and perplexing railway problem, what is the solution which the Government has to propose to this House? I will preface what I have to say by the observation that the great desideratum is efficient transportation service to the public of Canada. If the railway companies are financially crippled, if they are plunged into liquidation and dislocated by receiverships and liquidation proceedings, not only do the railway companies suffer but the public suffers by reason of the ensuing detriment to the public service; and if ever there was a time in Canada when most efficient railway service to the country was needed, it is the present.

If these roads are crippled, if they are financially unable to meet their liabilities, if they are unable to make needed betterments and purchase rolling stock, then the grain, and other agricultural commodities, and the manufactured products of Canada cannot go forward to their destinations and the whole trade of Canada, in every part of the country is immediately affected.

I need not say the Government has given this question its most serious—I may say, its most profound—consideration. We realize the importance of transportation to this country. We realize the financial conditions with which this country, and indeed the whole world, are to-day confronted. It appears to us that in meeting the situation there should be, as recommended by the commissioners, a forward, constructive policy that will appeal to the people of this country. It seems to me that the continuance from year to year of the large financial assistance which we have been granting to these companies is against public opinion and public policy while the ownership of these roads remains in private hands. The true policy would seem to be that which will ensure not only the best public service but a substantial degree of public ownership in order that the benefit of the large financial assistance granted from the public exchequer during the critical period of the development of these roads shall enure to the benefit of the public when the enterprises reach a period of fruition. If the public does the financing, the public should enjoy the ultimate reward.

While saying that, we must not at this time—at this most critical juncture of this war—overlook our credit. There are those in Canada who lightly suggest taking over the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Grand Trunk, the Canadian Northern and the Canadian Pacific and administering all these systems under the principle of public ownership. I need not say to this House that 4 p.m. that is not a financial responsibility which should be lightly undertaken at any time let alone at a time like this entering, as we are, the fourth year of the most expensive war in the history of the world. I am not overlooking the fact that the earnings of these companies would largely take care of the interest upon the securities but the very fact that the Government would take over all the railway systems under a general scheme of naturalization would at this time, in my opinion, be a serious matter, to put the matter moderately, to the credit of the Dominion and to our prospects for future financing. Notwithstanding this we believe that, having regard to the financial condition of these roads, the time is opportune and that we should not neglect the opportunity of taking a courageous step forward towards the end which I have indicated.

What is the position of the Canadian Northern and of the Grand Trunk Pacific to-day, because these are the two roads which are more immediately under our consideration? The finances of the Canadian Pacific are all that you might desire. The finances of the Grand Trunk railway are entirely satisfactory with the exception only of their contingent liability which is a very heavy one in respect to the securities of the Grand Trunk Pacific which they have guaranteed. The position of the Canadian Northern to-day is this: The company has a certain amount of net earnings. Its revenues are such that, after paying all fixed charges, it has a surplus. On that statement one might ask: Why should the Canadian Northern require any aid from the Government of Canada? The answer is very simple. Any railway system requires continually to make expenditures of a capital nature, not only on needed extensions—and I believe very few of these are being made at the present time—but on betterments, and requires to expend vast sums in the purchase of rolling stock in order that the public may be served and that the business may be carried on profitably. The essence of the situation, in so far as the Canadian Northern is concerned, is that, although the company makes net earnings, any surplus cash it has on that account it requires to pay for betterments and rolling stock. The result is that the company is short of cash for the purpose of paying interest upon its underlying securities. If the cash is used for betterments and for the purchase of rolling stock, it is obvious that it is not available for the payment of the underlying interest charges. Put it the other way. If it is used for the payment of underlying interest charges, the necessary betterments to the road cannot be made nor can rolling stock be purchased. It is not possible for the company, as it would be if the war was not on, to issue further securities for the purpose of paying for these betterments and acquiring rolling stock? That is what a company does in peace times when conditions are such that it can float its securities, but the prolongation of the war has made it impossible for the Canadian Northern to float any additional securities, to issue any further debenture stock, and consequently it has to take its earnings to pay for betterments and the purchase of rolling stock and to meet the instalment payments on account of principal maturing on rolling stock. It is therefore unable to pay its underlying interest charges.

In addition to this, the company has had to do a great deal of short date financing. There is outstanding, secured, for the most part by Dominion or provincial guaranteed bonds or debentures, short term loans floated in New York or London. The amount of that ordinary, short-term liability is about $100,000,000, extending over a period of two years or more. It is not possible for the company, by the issue of permanent securities, to fund that debt. Therefore, it is obliged from time to time to renew these short-term securities, and to carry on as best it may from year to year. The company have, in the past, come to the Government and asked us, as they did last year, to make them a loan of a sufficient amount to take care of the underlying interest charges and to meet the maturing instalments of principal upon rolling stock.

The Grand Trunk Pacific has no branches to speak of, and no feeders, and the revenue is not quite sufficient to meet its operating expenses. That is to say, there is no surplus available for the payment of underlying interest charges, and the position of the Grand Trunk Pacific is that, if they are to continue as a solvent going concern and serve the public, they must have a sufficient amount advanced to them by the Government, or by the Grand Trunk Railway company—and that is not practically possible for the Grand Trunk railway—to meet, first, the deficit upon operating account, and, secondly, their underlying interest charges. The amount which is required in the case of the Grand Trunk Pacific to meet fixed charges and to meet the deficit upon operating account, and for needed betterments, and for necessary purposes of rolling stock, is about $7,500,000 for the coming year. In the circumstances, and bearing in mind, as I have stated, that our policy is to be a constructive one, we have the following proposals to lay before Parliament. We do not think we should grant further aid to the Canadian Northern Railway company while it is privately owned and controlled.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In connection with that company, it is to be remembered that when we gave the subsidy in 1913, and a guarantee of $45,000,000 in 1914, we provided that the Government of Canada should become the owners of a certain portion of the capital stock of the company. The capital stock which was so acquired amounted to 400,000 shares, of the par value of $40,000,000, out of the issued stock of $100,000,000. These 400,000 shares, which represent a par value of $40,000,000, now stand in the name of the Minister of Finance, in trust for His Majesty, and are owned absolutely by the Government on behalf of the people of Canada. There are, therefore, $60,000,000 of par value of the stock, representing 600,000 shares, in the hands of private owners and pledgees, because the greater part of the stock is pledged. We propose, Mr. Speaker, to acquire the whole of this $60,000,000 of stock for the people of Canada. With the $40,000,000 par value of stock which we now have, we shall be the absolute owners of the Canadian Northern Railway system. Whatever money we expend in payment of fixed charges, for betterments or for rolling stock, will enure to the direct and sole benefit of the people of Canada. We think it desirable, in the interests of efficiency of management, and for the purpose of financing, that the system should continue to be administered as a corporate entity. Therefore, we propose, as I have stated, to acquire all the outstanding stock.

Mr. GRAHAM: Does that mean all the subsidiary companies, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, including those in Nova Scotia?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I was going to deal with that a little later, but I will anticipate to some extent, to say this: the Canadian Northern Railway system, as my hon. friend knows, consists of many constituent and subsidiary companies, railway companies, express companies, transfer companies, elevator companies and steamship and telegraph companies. The $100,000,000 capital stock of the Canadian Northern absolutely controls all those subsidiary and constituent companies which my hon. friend has mentioned, so that what the Government will obtain by acquiring the ownership of $60,000,000 stock of the Canadian Northern Railway company, which is the portion of the company not now in our hands, but in private hands, will be the control of the entire Canadian Northern Railway system from Halifax to Vancouver.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Then, with regard to the Grand Trunk Pacific, I shall elaborate a little more fully later on in my remarks; but with regard to that company the situation is complicated by the fact that the Grand Trunk Railway company is, as I have stated to the House, largely involved by its guarantee of the Grand Trunk Pacific securities. It is, therefore, not possible for us, even if we were disposed to do so, at this time to deal with the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company in the same manner that we propose to deal with the Canadian Northern Railway company, because a long negotiation would be necessary with the Grand Trunk Railway company, in order that the public interests might be safeguarded before the Grand Trunk was relieved from any or all of its liabilities in connection with the matters which I have mentioned. Our policy with regard to the Grand Trunk Pacific for the time being is this: we propose to make a demand loan, repayable at six per cent, secured by a mortgage to the amount of $7,500,000. I shall present to the House an estimate for that purpose in the supplementary estimates which are soon to be brought down. We shall take the power to constitute the Board of Directors of the Grand Trunk Pacific as we see fit. Personally I would look forward to the Government some day acquiring the Grand Trunk Pacific system, because with the Canadian Northern Railway system belonging to the Government, as we propose, the two systems could usefully co-operate in the West, to the facilitation of economical administration and better service to the public. That would involve, as I have stated, negotiation with the Grand Trunk Railway company, which would take time to consummate. It is not our intention to release the Grand Trunk Railway company from their obligations in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway company. If in the future an arrangement could be made with the Grand Trunk Railway company which would absolutely safeguard the public interest, it would, in my view, be proper for us to consider taking over also, as part of the Government-owned railways of Canada, the Grand Trunk Pacific. That, however, is a matter that we are not able to deal with at this time. I make the suggestion and lay some emphasis upon it for the reason that, having acquired, as we shall, the Canadian Northern Railway system, it would be advisable to have in connection with that system any lines that are naturally complementary to it. However, for the present all that we propose is to make a demand loan to the Grand Trunk Pacific of $7,500,000, with interest at six per cent, secured by mortgage, to be availed of for the purpose of paying interest upon underlying securities, and of making necessary expenditure for betterment, rolling stock and any deficit on operation.

Mr. GRAHAM: What will the mortgage cover?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The mortgage will cover all the undertaking, giving that word its widest meaning in law, of the Grand Trunk Pacific, including, of course, the stock which the Grand Trunk Pacific holds of the Grand Trunk Pacific branch lines. It will be precisely the same kind of mortgage as that which was executed last year to secure the loan of $8,000,000 which we made to the Grand Trunk Pacific for purposes similar to those which I have mentioned.

Mr. MACDONALD: Where will that mortgage rank in comparison with the other securities?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It ranks next after all existing securities.

Mr. GERMAN: Are the existing securities not fully equal to the value of the property?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Offhand, I should say yes. Although I do not desire to argue the matter here—we can argue it later in committee—one must take into consideration the fact that the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway company serves a large settlement in the West, and even at the cost of a certain loss of interest per year, I think it is necessary that it should be continued as a going concern. I do not believe that the public of this country, especially the public of the West, desire that this road shall be thrown into receivership. I started out with the proposal, which is confirmed by the reports of all the commissioners, that it is inadvisable at this time —or, in fact, at any time— that these transportation systems which have been built by the issue of securities guaranteed by the Dominion and by the provinces and which have served the purpose of opening up to settlement vast areas in the Canadian West to the public generally throughout Canada, should be allowed to go into receivership and liquidation. However, we can discuss that matter a little later. I am quite sure that the Grand Trunk Railway company is desirous of doing anything it can to assist at this time. I believe that is true also with regard to the Canadian Northern and every other railway company in Canada. These people are all desirous of doing what they can at this time to the end that the best possible transportation service shall be rendered to the people of Canada, and that our products, agricultural and industrial, shall move forward as rapidly as possible to the markets of the world—because with that question is immediately involved the whole question of our finance and our commercial well-being.

The commissioners, Sir Henry Drayton and Mr. Acworth, referred to the fact that the Grand Trunk Railway company was paying its dividends and that it should make more expenditures for betterment, terminals, extensions and rolling stock. One remark might, I think, be made there without in any way controverting the findings of those commissioners in their most carefully thought out report. The Grand Trunk Railway company have been very successful in their financing in the London market. They have put out an immense amount of securities, some £73,000,000, or from $350,000,000 to $360,000,000 worth of securities, the proceeds of which have been spent in Canada, at a remarkably low rate of interest. A financial man will appreciate the fact that the payment of dividends upon stock, if such dividends are earned, is of material assistance in selling bonds. That is to say, if stock dividends are wholly discontinued, investors are not so likely to purchase bonds, because they draw the conclusion that the road is not in good case financially. However, that is by the way.

[Sir Thomas White.]

Our proposals, therefore, are to acquire $60,000,000 of stock that is privately owned in the Canadian Northern Railway system.

Mr. GERMAN: What does the minister propose to pay for that stock?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is a very proper question, but if my hon. friend will have a little patience I shall come to that in a moment. Of this $60,000,000 of par value stock of the Canadian Northern Railway company, about five-sixths is available for transfer in the near future. It is held by private owners and by pledgees. The balance of it is held in outside hands, a considerable part of it, I believe, in Great Britain. The member for Welland (Mr. German) has stated what price we are going to pay for that stock. We propose to acquire the stock, as I have stated, for the public of Canada. How do we propose to pay for it? We propose to have the value of that stock determined by arbitration in the method recommended in the Drayton-Acworth report. In that report it was recommended that in order to determine the amount of stock in the Canadian Northern Railway company which should be opportioned to the private shareholders of the Canadian Northern Railway system, a Board of Arbitrators should be constituted, one arbitrator to be named by the Dominion Government, one by the owners or pledgees of the stock and the other to be chosen by these two. In case of non-agreement as to the third arbitrator, the report recommended he should be named by the senior judge of the Exchequer Court. We propose to follow that method as to the valuation of the $60,000,000 par value of shares of the Canadian Northern railway which we shall acquire. We propose, in the event of the arbitrators not being unanimous as to the value, that there shall lie an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada, both as to law and as to facts.

It appears to us that no fairer method could be devised of determining the reasonable value of the 600,000 shares of the Canadian Northern Railway Company stock, which we are acquiring.

Mr. PARDEE: Will the minister be able to acquire all the stock? Suppose he is not able to do so?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am glad my hon. friend raised that point, because I overlooked it. Five-sixths of the 600,000 shares can be acquired in the near future.

Mr. MACDONALD: By voluntary sale on the part of the parties who hold the stock, not by appropriation?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The value of the 600,000 shares is to be determined by arbitration, subject, as I have intimated, to an appeal to the Supreme Court. The resolution which I shall present to the House will provide that when five-sixths of the shares are vested in the Minister of Finance, under an agreement to be entered into between the owners and pledgees and the Governor in Council, the Governor in Council may declare that the whole of the shares are vested in His Majesty, and that the other owners and pledgees shall be entitled to receive their pro rata and proportionate share of the amount determined by the arbitration as the fair value of the 600,000 shares.

Mr. MACDONALD: Supposing that the holders of five-sixths of the shares say: We will not enter into an agreement; will the Government take power to expropriate those shares?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We know, as a matter of fact, that the pledgees and owners will transfer their shares upon the terms which I have mentioned. My hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) has asked me what this Canadian Northern railway system embraces, and I should like in that connection to say something as to the advantages of the purchase of the Canadian Northern.

Mr. MACDONALD: Before the minister goes on to that, is it intended that immediate possession of the road is to be obtained, or is the whole matter to stand until title is obtained after arbitration?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We are preserving the corporate entity of the Canadian Northern Railway company. When we get the stock, we are absolute masters of the Board of the Canadian Northern Railway company and of its entire administration, and the board, as we constitute it, will be the Board of the Canadian Northern Railway company carried on for its shareholders, who will then be the people of Canada. In other words, the private ownership of the shares is entirely eliminated.

I am now going to speak of the advantages of the purchase of the Canadian Northern railway system. We shall, by this transaction, acquire 9,513 miles of the Canadian Northern railway system, with branches in all provinces of Canada except New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, and including 6,000 miles of branches in western Canada. That system has entry to every important city and centre in the Dominion of Canada. We shall have all the adjuncts of the road, including telegraph companies, express companies, steamship companies and elevator companies. The Canadian Northern owns, amongst other assets, the Lake Superior terminals, with five elevators, at Port Arthur, with a capacity of 10,000,000 bushels. It owns a steamship line with six ships on the Great Lakes. It owns the Canadian Northern Telegraph company, and within the last few years the Canadian Northern Telegraph company has acquired the Great Northwestern Telegraph company, the stock of which is vested in the Canadian Northern Railway company, the two systems having some 1,500 offices throughout the Dominion of Canada. The Great Northwestern Telegraph company, which operates the Canadian Northern Telegraph Company, has connections with the Western Union Telegraph company of the United States, and connects with its cable service across the Atlantic.

As I have said, we shall own all the underlying companies, some thirty of them, the capital stock of which is vested in the parent company. These include the Halifax and Southwestern, the Canadian Northern Quebec, the Canadian Northern Ontario, the Canadian Northern Saskatchewan, the Canadian Northern Alberta, and the Canadian Northern Pacific. What more has the Dominion of importance in connection with this question of the acquisition of the Canadian Northern railway system? It has the Intercolonial, which has now access over a leased line to Montreal. When the bridge is built across the St. Lawrence, the Intercolonial will have access over the Canadian Northern Quebec to the terminals of the Canadian Northern in Montreal. The ownership and control of the terminals of the Canadian Northern in Montreal, and, indeed, in all parts of Canada, of the Canadian Northern railway system, are vested in the Canadian Northern Railway company, and they will now be under the control and ownership of the Dominion.

Mr. MURPHY: Does that include the Mount Royal Tunnel and Terminal company?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Mount Royal Tunnel and Terminal company is owned by the Canadian Northern, the stock of which is now acquired, and therefore in that way we own that company.

This opens up a great vista to the imagination of the members of this House and the people of this country, because it means that the people of Canada will own, not only a highway from Halifax to Vancouver, but a great transcontinental railway system in its grades, curvatures and connection second to none.

Mr. ROSS: A short time ago the minister said that the Canadian Northern had control of all these subsidiary companies. Does the Canadian Northern hold all the stock of these subsidiary companies, or only part of it?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There may be one or two in which a small amount of stock is outstanding, but in nearly all the cases of the thirty and more companies which are embraced in the Canadian Northern Railway system, and which my hon. friend will find in the Act of 1914 under which we guaranteed $45,000,000 of securities of the Canadian Northern Railway system, the Canadian Northern owns all the stock, so that through the ownership of the Canadian Northern, we acquire ownership and control of these subsidiary and constituent companies.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What about the tramways controlled by the Canadian Northern?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not know to what my hon. friend refers. If he will look at the Act of 1914, he will see the constituent and subsidiary companies embraced in the Canadian Northern Railway system. When we are in committee, I shall have looked into this matter more fully and shall be glad to give my hon. friend more information. We are acquiring the ownership of the Canadian Northern Railway system, as at present constituted.

We have the Intercolonial, but the Intercolonial has not had connections with the West. The Intercolonial will now have connection with Ontario and with Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia. In addition to that we have the National Transcontinental from Moncton to Winnipeg. It seems to me that it will be of great value, in connection with the operation of the National Transcontinental from Winnipeg to Quebec and to the Maritime Provinces, that we are acquiring the Canadian Northern Railway system, especially in the West and can operate it in co-operation with the National Transcontinental system.

Mr. MARCIL: Will the Intercolonial be linked up by the Quebec bridge, or will connection be made at Montreal?

[Sir Thomas White.]

Sir THOMAS WHITE: After the completion of the Quebec bridge, the Intercolonial could come over the Quebec system to Montreal. I do not say that it will give up its present line at all, but there will be access in that way.

There is one other feature to which I would draw attention—as I must ask the pardon of the House if I have trespassed unduly upon its time and patience. We are confronted to-day with a very serious transportation question in the Dominion of Canada. Financial conditions are naturally critical in all the markets of the world. These railway companies—and I am not speaking now of the Canadian Pacific company or of the Grand Trunk Railway company proper—but these other roads have been unable to sell their securities, are unable now to sell their securities, and the result is that necessary betterments have not been made; some extensions in the West, for instance, that should have been made have not been made; necessary rolling stock has not been acquired, or at all events on the scale on which it should have been acquired, and it has been the financial situation which has largely brought that about. These proposals which I am laying before Parliament will assist the credit of the Canadian Northern, no longer privately owned, but owned by the people of Canada. They will enable us to renew its loans, to carry it along, to acquire the necessary rolling stock,—for ourselves now, and will enable us to continue the Grand Trunk Pacific as a going concern, enable it to avoid default, enable it to make the necessary betterments and to purchase indispensable rolling stock. In other words, the proposals which we now lay before Parliament, will, I am confident, improve the entire railway situation in Canada, and greatly enure to the benefit of the people of this country.

Mr. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman has not stated who are to compose the directorate of the Canadian Northern.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The position is this. The Dominion Government will own the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway company. Owning that, it will absolutely control the board of directors and its personnel, and when the Dominion Government acquires control of that stock, it will be for the Dominion Government to say who shall be the directors of the Canadian Northern Railway company; that will be the legal position without any doubt. In the appointment of the board of directors and the general administration of the Canadian Northern Railway system we shall, of course, have to consider what is in the interests of the public. Speaking offhand, I should say this. There are on the staff of the Canadian Northern some exceedingly capable officials—men like Mr. McLeod, Mr. Hanna and Mr. Mitchell, the operating heads of the several departments. My own view is that the Government would be wise to retain as far as possible the services of these men in connection with the administration of the system.

Mr. GRAHAM: Sir William Mackenzie too?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend has raised the question of Sir William Mackenzie. Let me say this: I believe that Sir William Mackenzie and Sir Donald Mann will co-operate with the Government in every way possible to facilitate and carry out this transaction, and will be prepared at any time to vacate their seats on the board at the request of the Government of Canada. As to the board, we shall have to get in the stock first and complete the transaction, and then it will be open to the Government to determine what is the best course, having regard to the public interest, to pursue with regard to the board of directors and the general administration of the Canadian Northern Railway company.

Mr. MACDONALD: Is the Government going to accept the recommendation contained in the majority report, that this board be an independent body entirely free from political and any other influence?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We have not taken that step. As I stated, the commissioners differ in their views as to the policy to be followed. I feel personally, having regard to financial conditions, that it is not practical or expedient for the Dominion Government to take over the Grand Trunk, the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern at the present time, or to take the further step that has been suggested by some, of taking over also the Canadian Pacific railway. But my hon. friend will observe that we have taken one step forward, and a very signal and important step towards the operation of the railway systems of Canada for the public benefit. I believe that this policy which I have had the honour to announce to the House to-day will mark a new era in the history of transportation in Canada, affirming as it does, the principle that if the people are called upon to finance the railways of Canada, the people shall derive the ultimate resultant benefits.

Mr. NESBITT: Will the administration of the Canadian Northern be placed under the Governor in Council?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If my hon. friend will realize the legal position I think it will be perfectly clear to him that the administration of the line will not be under the Governor in Council. It is true that the Governor in Council, through the ownership of the stock, will have the power to elect the board, but we propose that the operation of the Canadian Northern Railway system shall be through its boards of directors. The administration of this system will therefore be under the boards, and not immediately under the minister, as the Intercolonial is under the Minister of Railways. In other words, we shall not have the actual physical property in this system, but we shall have control of the stock in its entirety, and we shall name the boards, and the boards will in turn, through their executive officers, administer the system.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My hon. friend did not say whether the Government intended to follow the commissioners' recommendation that the boards be self-constituted

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Dominion Railway Company Board, could hardly be self-constituted because it would have to be constituted in the first place by some authority, but after it was constituted the vacancies arising would be filled by the remaining members; in other words, it would be a complete sovereignty in itself—self-perpetuating. It would be outside the control of the Government and outside the control of Parliament—although I am not quite sure as to the latter statement because Parliament, I suppose, has power over anything under its jurisdiction. No it would not be free of Parliament.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It could not be free of Parliament, of course, but according to the report of the majority it would be free from Parliament to the extent that their acts could not be undone except by Parliament.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It would be independent, subject to change by Parliament. There is no doubt about that. But, we have not determined to carry out the recommendations of Messrs. Drayton and Acworth in their entirety, for the reasons I have given. At the same time we have made a great step forward towards acquiring a beneficial interest in Canadian railways for the people of Canada.

I beg to give notice of the following resolution which I shall move in Committee of the Whole to-morrow:

Resolved, that it is expedient to provide:

1. That His Majesty may acquire on such terms and conditions satisfactory to the Governor in Council as may be set out in the agreement to be made with the owners and pledgees of not less than five-sixths thereof, and for a price to be determined as hereinafter provided, the six hundred thousand shares of capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company, (par value sixty million dollars), not now held by the Minister of Finance in trust for His Majesty.

2. That the Governor in Council shall appoint one arbitrator, the said owners and pledgees shall appoint another, and the two so appointed shall appoint a third, or failing agreement as to such appointment, the third arbitrator shall be appointed by the Senior Judge of the Exchequer Court.

3. The said arbitrators shall determine the value of the said six hundred thousand shares as of the date of the said agreement and the said arbitrators shall proceed in a summary way and may apply their own judgment in determining such value and may receive with respect thereto, such reports and statements authenticated in such way as they may decide and such evidence as they may deem necessary or helpful, examine witnesses under oath and hear the parties by counsel or representatives and that the unanimous determination of the arbitrators shall be final, but should the determination not be unanimous an appeal from such determination shall lie to the Supreme Court of Canada on behalf of the Governor in Council, or of the owners or pledgees, upon any question of law or fact, such appeal to be made within thirty days from the rendering of the determination.

4. That the amount of the value so determined shall be paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, or otherwise secured in accordance with the terms of the said agreement.

5. That upon the making of said agreement, at least five-sixths of the said six hundred thousand shares shall be transferred to the Minister of Finance in trust for His Majesty, and if there be any of said six hundred thousand shares not transferred as aforesaid, the Governor in Council may declare said shares to be the property of the Minister of Finance in trust for His Majesty, and the same shall thereupon become the property of His Majesty and shall be paid for pro rata with the shares so transferred.

6. That so soon as said five-sixths of said shares has been transferred as aforesaid, the Governor in Council may assist the Canadian Northern Railway company, or any company included in the Canadian Northern Railway system, in paying and settling any indebtedness of such company or postponing the payment thereof on such terms as may be agreed upon, and for such purposes may make advances out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, may guarantee payment in whole or in part, and may give the obligations or securities of the Government in connection therewith.

7. That the Canadian Northern Railway company, and each company included in the Canadian Northern Railway system, shall from time to time do such acts and things, make and issue such agreements, obligations and securities in connection with the payment or settlement or postponement of payment of the said claims as the Minister of Finance may require.

8. That the necessary qualification shares for directors may be transferred to or allowed to remain in their names by the Minister of Finance on such conditions as he may determine.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (South Renfew): The Minister of Finance has dealt with the problem which, next to the war, is, perhaps, the greatest problem with which Parliament has to deal. The question of how successfully this scheme will work out will depend largely upon its operation, and we have not the details of this operation before us. In general, I might say that the programme outlined by the minister this afternoon, if carried out independently of any attempt at political patronage or political management, will give the people of Canada a full opportunity to try out government ownership on a large scale. At the moment, I can scarcely see just how the minister proposes to operate this new system and divest it of all political interference. Government ownership, and particularly government operation, is surrounded with difficulties with which I have had reason to be familiar, and to my mind the only way government ownership can be made successful is by placing its operation in the hands of a board which will not have to be continually giving a detailed account of what it is doing to every member of Parliament. This larger scheme is not like the Intercolonial. If this resolution passes the scheme will be operated by the people of Canada on a large scale, in competition with the Canadian Pacific railway, the best-managed transportation system in the world. Unlike the Intercolonial, the roads dealt with in this new scheme were not built as a bond of Confederation; on the contrary, the scheme must be operated as a straight business concern. In order that this may be accomplished, I submit to the minister that, in working out the details of government ownership on a large scale in Canada, we must begin right by divesting it of all political environment; in no other way will government ownership be given a fair trial.

I am at present just as strongly of the opinion as I have ever been that the productiveness of Canada in the years ahead of us will make of practical use all the railway facilities we have. When the era of financial stress came upon those railway projects, it was not peculiar to them, but was common to every business in the Dominion. Shortly before the war all business concerns and all undertakings were in the same condition, and capitalists the world over told them they must take in sail and begin to economize. Following that came the war, and it was almost impossible for projects—those of any ordinary nature at least—to secure financial assistance. As the months and years have gone by, this condition has become more stringent, and we find that enterprises which might have been successful under ordinary conditions are not successful.

In our western country, instead of hundreds of thousands of new settlers coming in to cultivate the soil and to make traffic for these roads east and west, we are now looking about to see how many men we can take out of all Canada for the preservation of the Empire. Our business conditions have been changed and the railways are in the same position as many other concerns —with this difference, that many others have been saved by the war, while the railways have been injured to the extent that, on account of the war, we are now called upon to finance them.

Let me take up the question of liquidation. My hon. friend has stated that it would be injurious to the credit of Canada if the railways were allowed to go into liquidation. I am approaching this question from the viewpoint of war conditions rather than from that of ordinary conditions. I acknowledge that at least seventy-five per cent of the railway companies in the United States have gone through receivers' hands at different times. But I realize that there is this difference, that these lines in the main were not state-aided, and the credit of the country was not so much at stake with them as was the credit of private enterprise. But we in Canada, both federally and provincially, have become co-partners to a very large degree with those enterprises by guarantees of bonds as well as giving aid, and we are not in the same position as are the people of the United States, where many railway companies go into the receivers' hands. If the conditions were the same, and if there were no war, I might be inclined to allow some of these lines to go into the receivers' hands and have what you might call a clean-up. But I hesitate to take that view at the present time for the reasons I have stated. On the maintenance of the credit of Canada depends our ability to do our share in the war, and, looking at it from that viewpoint, personally I am inclined to go a long way towards preventing liquidation.

Let me take the Canadian Pacific railway first. The Canadian Pacific railway is, perhaps, the greatest transportation system in the world, taking into consideration all its ramifications. At the present time, no matter what my views on Government ownership, I think it would be a mistake for Canada to assume the responsibility of taking over a road that is an absolute success in every particular. Not that it would not be a good thing for Canada, perhaps, but we are undertaking a large obligation in what we are doing in addition to what the war is costing. It is possible that Government ownership will not be the success that we would hope it to be financially speaking, and under these conditions I think it would be a mistake, at the present time at least, to interfere with that great transportation system, the Canadian Pacific.

Now let me take the Grand Trunk railway. The Grand Trunk, I believe, ought to lie very close to the hearts of the Canadian people, sentimentally. It is the pioneer of all these railways. It was with us in Canada in pre-Confederation times. It went about securing large investments in the old land to be made in this country. If any of the lines be entitled to consideration at the hands of the Canadian people for pioneer work, for the opening up of this older part of Canada, that line is the Grand Trunk. I have no brief for the Grand Trunk, but I am pointing out that in the discussion of the various railway problems we must not forget that the old Grand Trunk brought millions of money into this country and secured comparatively small aid when this was not much of a country. Its system in eastern Canada, as well as in the United States, I think, to state my own view, was hardly treated fairly by the Drayton-Acworth report. I have read that report carefully. I know some of the difficulties surrounding these railway problems, and I am inclined to believe that the report is harsh to the old Grand Trunk with regard to its conception, growth, operation and difficulties at the present time. It may be because I have lived nearly all my life on the line of the Grand Trunk that I feel that way. But I have read that report over carefully, and I say again that I am inclined to think that it deals harshly with the old Grand Trunk in some of its statements concerning the operation of the road. The Grand Trunk has assumed large obligations in connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific and also some obligation in connection with the operation of the National Transcontinental. Owing to the conditions which have arisen, over which to a large extent the railway itself had no control, it finds itself to-day in a straitened position owing to the guaranteeing of the bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific. That is a matter for adjustment, I suppose, later on when the Government bring that matter before the House.

Now, I take up the Canadian Northern railway. The Canadian Northern has the best gathering system in western Canada without any doubt. It has 6,000 miles of roads in that area. Its branches, although very cheaply built in the beginning, penetrate perhaps the best part of our great western country. I was not in sympathy with building the line through to the Pacific coast at the time it was constructed but I am inclined to take the situation as it presents itself to-day without harking back to what has been. Its line from Winnipeg to Fort William is in good condition, or was, when I travelled over it not very long since. In the East it has quite a large number of disconnected lines. I call them disconnected because they are such lines as that running from Halifax to Yarmouth —the Halifax and South Western. There are some pieces of line here and there throughout Ontario. The question will arise: If the Government takes over the 600,000 shares of stock and becomes the owner of the Canadian Northern mainly, with the control of all its ramifications, how much money is it going to cost for betterments and for the completion of the works now in hand by the company? The Government becoming the owners of the Canadian Northern stock, of course, cannot allow the Montreal tunnel to go unfinished. It will have to assume the obligation, I presume, in connection with the completion of the works at Vancouver. And in thousands of ways it will have to assume liabilities that are not included in the main issue of 600,000 shares but that will have to be met.

The Government, becoming the proprietor of the Canadian Northern system, will have to assume its liabilities, and, it being Government-owned, the Finance Minister will discover that what the people will accept from the Canadian Northern they will not accept from the Government, either in the way of operation, or extension of lines, or completion of work now under construction. So that in this problem before us we are not enabled, even if we knew the price the arbitrators would place on the stock, to say what liability the Government is undertaking on behalf of the people of Canada, until we know what they will have to spend in the immediate future for the completion of work now on hand by the Canadian Northern. In addition to that, there is a great scarcity of rolling stock on all the railways on both sides of the international boundary, Government railways included; and the Government, immediately it assumes possession of the road, will have to begin the purchase of rolling stock, motive power and other incidentals, of which the Canadian Northern is now somewhat short.

As to details, I should not like to commit myself at the present time, concerning the management, particularly because, after all, the success of this whole undertaking, so far as the people of Canada are concerned, will depend on the management. The amount of money that may be required to take over this system is not such a great thing to the people of Canada. It is not of supreme moment, although of great interest, to the people, how much money will be required to get the rolling stock, motive power and all the betterments; but it will be of supreme moment to the people how this Government system is to be operated. I might intimate, in passing, that the Government in securing control of the stock of the Canadian Northern, could not well be criticised by us on this side of the House, if the details are right, because we proposed that course three years ago, when the Government last gave aid to this line. I am a little inclined to congratulate myself on another point made by the Minister of Finance, which I fear hon. gentlemen opposite did not think much of at the time: that is the provision made when giving guarantee to the eastern lines of the Canadian Northern for connnection between it and the Intercolonial at the city of Montreal. That now will be an important factor in the linking of the Intercolonial with the western system.

Let me call attention to the other road. The Grand Trunk Pacific and the Transcontinental combination were never intended to be what they are now. Their present condition is not indicative of the original idea. The Grand Trunk Pacific today is a local road between Winnipeg and Prince Rupert, without any connection, without any outlet of its own at either end. Owing to the conditions existing, the Grand Trunk Pacific was not enabled to put a steamship line from Prince Rupert to the Orient, and, as a consequence, the through traffic from the Orient, which was expected to come by that short route over Canadian territory from the Pacific to the Atlantic, has not been realized. Just what arrangement the Government will make in that connection remains to be seen, but until the Grand Trunk Pacific or the Government provides steamship facilities between Prince Rupert and the Orient, that line will be nothing more than a local line. If, in aiding the Grand Trunk Pacific with the view probably of taking it over later, there is any expectation of it being a self-sustaining line, it can only be made so by giving it a steamship connection and providing it with a through traffic. I am ready to concede—and this I brought to the attention of the late Mr. Hays several times—that the Grand Trunk Pacific was not provided with a sufficient number of feeders in the western country. Others were in ahead of it; I will not discuss how or why, but the Grand Trunk Pacific has not the feeders it ought to have in that country. In looking to the future, in addition to a steamship connection, provision will have to be made, either through the company or by the Government with the company, for the construction of many more feeders. Take the Transcontinental railway—that much discussed line. The minister kept away from it, and so will I, because the weather is warm and we might start a discussion which would not end till the election was over. But I want to call the attention of the people of Ontario and Quebec to the fact that the National Transcontinental line from Quebec through Northern Ontario runs through a magnificent stretch of country for a great many miles, and although, at the present time, it is largely non-productive, and a link in a chain of transportation which does not now pay, I believe that in the years to come the Transcontinental will have a local traffic that will vie with the local traffic of any of the roads in the older parts of Canada. When the Ontario Government, at the head of which at that time was the late Sir George Ross, proposed building a road into New Ontario from Toronto, a great many people, irrespective of their political leanings, thought it was a wildcat scheme and would never pay; but the result has been that, in the construction of that road, the greatest mineral deposits in the world were brought to light, and Canada has received the benefit during the last few years. That new country through which the Transcontinental runs, both in Quebec and Ontario, will, I believe, in the years to come, produce a traffic, and the production along that road will more than pay for the operating expenses and carrying charges. But we are just in a condition now when everything seems to be working against development and expansion, and in these matters we will trust to the future with an optimism which I believe we in Canada have not lost, and will proceed with the development of our country slowly now, but prepared for a larger development when the clouds of war have rolled away. If we were to apply the same acid test to the Intercolonial as has been applied to some of the other roads, we should find the Intercolonial asking for help all the time. I do not refer particularly to present conditions, although I think they may not be as good as they used to be. The Intercolonial was constructed as a bond of Confederation and pledge between the East and the West—but it has not paid interest. If it had been the Canadian Northern, Grand Trunk Pacific or Grand Trunk, it would be in the same position to-day as these lines, and would have been coming to Parliament asking for money to pay interest on capital. Although it does not appear so, every year we in Canada are paying interest on the construction of the Intercolonial, and rightly so. I am just pointing out that some railways are not, under the stress of the present time, able to meet certain demands, and the Intercolonial would be in the same position if we applied the same acid test to it as we apply to these other lines. If the Intercolonial had had to borrow the money, or if this Government had borrowed it, giving the Intercolonial as security, the Government would have had to come to the rescue and pay the interest, as guarantor of the bonds.

The Finance Minister, a few moments ago, referred to some criticism directed against the Grand Trunk Railway company because of its paying dividends while it required betterment and rolling stock. In one respect that criticism is unfair. I believe that the Interstate Commerce Commission of the United States acts under a statute, the provisions of which would not permit a railway company to expend earnings upon capital betterments rather than pay interest to its shareholders. One man has described a betterment, or a proper capital expenditure, as a nail driven in a place where there never was a nail before; as something added to the efficiency of the road; something that was not in that property before. The providing of betterment does not mean ordinary upkeep, which is paid for out of revenue. As I say, I believe the Interstate Commerce Commission would compel a railway to divide its expenditure in that way. So that paying the dividends instead of applying the amount to capital expenditure was not an improper act on the part of the Grand Trunk Railway company; it was an act sanctioned by law.

As to the whole proposal of my hon. friend, I am merely running over the general situation without pausing to go into details. It will be a relief to the Parliament of Canada if we work out a scheme, non-political, absolutely on business lines, which will mean that we shall not be asked every session or two to contribute aid to certain railways. But I want to point out to the Government: do not be too sure that Government ownership will be a panacea for all complaints concerning service. A few years ago I had occasion to look into the question of rates on the state railways in Germany, in France, and in Australia—I did not visit Australia, but I had an investigation made. I discovered that there were better things for the people than government monopoly. The managers of government railways, or of government concerns, if they have a monopoly, are just like other managers. After all, competition is the best way of regulating accommodation and service. There are a thousand ways in which a railway company can comply with the orders of the Board of Railway Commissioners and still not meet the detailed requirements of the public. Travelling through the West a few months ago, I endeavoured to find out what service the railways were giving the people in that section of the country. The railways, I assume, were all acting in compliance with the orders of the Board of Railway Commissioners, but they were not all giving the same service in detail. One line was referred to by the majority of people with whom I spoke as a line that was giving absolute satisfaction, so far as that was possible. They pointed out that this railway company invariably sends a man to the meetings which they call for the purpose of discussing railway problems, while the other railways do not. No violation of the orders of the Board of Railway Commissioners is involved in that, but the competition of the other roads induces this company to send a man to these meetings in order to see that the wants of the people are provided for. The Finance Minister said that in the future it would, perhaps, be wise to amalgamate the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern in order that there might be complete co-operation in certain territories. That may be right; it may be necessary; but there would be no proof or assurance that the people in the districts concerned would have the best service. As I have said, a bit of competition is the best way to get efficient service in detail.

When the Finance Minister brings his resolution before the House and is prepared to give us the details as to how the Canadian Northern Railway system is to be operated, I shall feel more at liberty to discuss the matter than I do at present. But, from what has been said, it could be inferred that the Government may not operate this road at all. The Government could secure this system and transfer its operation to another railway company. That is to say, so far as the proposals presented to the House to-day are concerned, the Government could secure ownership and control of the Canadian Northern Railway System and could then lease the road to the Canadian Pacific Railway company or to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway company for operation. I am confident that, when we deal with the matter further in Committee, the Finance Minister, the Prime Minister or the Minister of Railways will be able to give us the details as to how the Government propose to operate this railway. Afer all, the success of this proposal will depend largely upon the manner in which the system is operated.

Mr. GLASS: My hon. friend would not say that it would be a good policy to acquire the road and then rent it to another railway company?

Mr. GRAHAM: The hon. gentleman himself would not, would he?

Mr. GLASS: Decidedly not.

Mr. GRAHAM: I think we agree on that.

Mr. W. M. GERMAN (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I cannot allow this occasion to pass without expressing my positive disapproval of the proposal of the Government. The Minister of Finance stated that in certain respects the majority and minority reports of the Royal Commission appointed by the Government were in agreement. He said that they agreed in the recommendation that no receivership should be appointed for these roads, and in order to avoid that condition he takes over the Canadian Northern system. But the Government is doing one thing which the Commissioners were absolutely unanimous in condemning. The majority and the minority reports condemned in express, emphatic and sensible terms the taking over of this system by the Government and its operation as a Government enterprise similar to the operation of the Intercolonial railway. That is the position which the Government has adopted with regard to the Canadian Northern system. Although I am not in full accord with the majority report made by the Commission, I believe that the Government should have gone much further in following out the recommendations contained in that majority report.

Instead of taking over the Canadian Northern Railway system by itself, the Government should have worked out a scheme of amalgamation of all the roads mentioned in that report, namely, the Grand Trunk, the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Canadian Northern, the Intercolonial and the National Transcontinental. I agree with the statement in the report that the Canadian Pacific Railway company should have been left out and should be left out of the scheme at the present time. But outside of that, and I believe it will be shown when the details of this proposition are discussed in committee—the only justifiable scheme to adopt and the only scheme that will give satisfaction to the people of Canada will be one that will amalgamate the Grand Trunk, the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Canadian Northern, the Intercolonial and the National Transcontinental. Then we could devise a scheme whereby all those systems should be worked absolutely free and independent of Government control.

We have seen what Government control means on the Intercolonial. Every man in Canada will agree with me in the assertion that so far as our experience goes in the working of the Intercolonial railway, Government control has not been a success. I am not opposed to Government ownership, but I am diametrically opposed to Government control, that is, to the operations being absolutely and exclusively under Government supervision, and I believe the people of Canada will be opposed to it. But there can be no difficulty in having Government ownership under control which will be non-partisan, non-political and for the best interest of the country. Many details in connection with this will have to be discussed at great length, and I will endeavour to place my views further on record when the matter comes before us in committee. For the present I content myself with stating that the Government is adopting the one course which has been unanimously condemned by the three members of that Royal Commission.

Rt. Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend (Mr. German) promises that we shall hear from him later at greater length on this subject. I would assure my hon. friend that he has an entirely erroneous impression as to what the Government does propose. It is not proposed that the Canadian Northern railway system shall be operated under direct Government control as the Intercolonial is operated. It is proposed that this road shall continue to be operated by the corporation in which it will still be vested, notwithstanding the fact that the Government will have acquired the whole of the stock. The corporation will be there just the same as before. The road will be in the ownership of that corporation just the same as before, but the people of this country will own all the stock in that corporation.

I agree entirely with what the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) and the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German) have said as to the necessity of working out some system by which the road, the stock of which we purpose acquiring for the people of this country, shall be operated without partisan interference. I do not say without political interference, if you use the word "political" in its highest sense, because the Parliament of Canada in that sense must always control any great undertaking, the virtual ownership of which is vested in the people of Canada; but so far as party or partisan interference is concerned, those hon. gentlemen have not expressed themselves too strongly to suit my views, and I entirely agree with them in that regard. We are to have a new Parliament elected in this country in the early future. It may be, it doubtless will be, the duty of that Parliament to consider the best means by which the true policy, as to which I agree with my hon. friends, shall be worked out; but in the meantime, all we propose is that the road should be operated by the corporation in which the road is vested at present, and we do not in the least intend that the road shall be taken over and operated by a department of the Government as the Intercolonial is operated at the present time.

My hon. friend from South Renfrew takes an optimistic view of the situation, and I agree with him in that regard. He says that the products of Canada will require all our railway facilities. That may be very true. The view which has impressed itself upon me in that regard is that we have not too much railway mileage in Canada, but I doubt very much whether that railway mileage is precisely in the place where it ought to be. I am rather under the impression that we have too many transcontinental lines and not enough branch lines, especially in the western part of this country. If we had all the railway mileage better distributed, I do not think we would have any too much, but the difficulty is that we have three transcontinental lines, and one of them has not the feeders or branches which, amongst other things, are essential for its profitable and efficient operation. I agree entirely with the hon. member for South Renfrew that the Grand Trunk Pacific, for example has not had a fair opportunity in its operation. The outbreak of war and other conditions have prevented that project from being carried out precisely in the way in which it was anticipated, and naturally that road has not had the opportunities which it otherwise would have had.

So far as both the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Pacific are concerned, th Government would have been very glad if the position could have been sustained, so that a new Parliament might deal with the situation that has arisen. But under the circumstances that was not practicable, and the Government had to take some effective action or the roads must go into receivership and liquidation. We all agree that this would be unfortunate and might be disastrous under present conditions. By reason of the necessity of negotiations, probably prolonged, with the Grand Trunk Railway company, we have decided to sustain the situation in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific very much as we did last year. I hope hon. gentlemen, in considering that aspect of the question, will realize the intimate connection which was intended between the Grand Trunk Railway system in the East and the Grand Trunk Pacific in the West. I hope also they will agree that that connection must not be wholly eliminated. Although the original project may not be capable of being carried out in its entirety, nevertheless, by some suitable arrangements between the Grand Trunk railway and the Grand Trunk Pacific railway, if the latter road should pass into the ownership of the people of this country, as seems almost inevitable, the connection between those two systems should be maintained, and the interest of the people of Canada will, I think, lie in that direction. But all this cannot be carried out in a moment, especially it cannot be carried out by a Government which has resting upon its shoulders every day heavy responsibilities in connection with the war and the necessity of giving a very considerable portion of time to parliamentary duties. Therefore, so far as that part of the matter was concerned, we thought it wise and prudent in the public interest that we should content ourselves with sustaining the situation in order that it might be taken up when there is more opportunity for the close study, careful consideration and prolonged negotiation which will be necessary. But, so far as the Canadian Northern is concerned, the only reasonable solution of the difficulty was to vest the whole stock in the people of this country, and to carry on the operation pending the summoning of the new Parliament, by corporate management, without bringing it under the direct control of a department of the Government. There was a unique opportunity for accomplishing that purpose, so far as the Canadian Northern railway is concerned; that is to say, more than five-sixths of the out-standing stock was vested in owners or pledgees who were immediately available, and with whom we could consider the situation.

With respect to the liabilities of the Canadian Northern Railway, to which my hon. friend from South Renfrew has made allusion, it is perfectly true that the acquisition of the entire stock, which virtually vests the ownership of the entire Canadian Northern railway system in the people of this country, imposes on us the obligation of looking after the liabilities. But that will be taken into account when the value of the stock comes to be determined by the board of arbitrators, or, in the last resort, by the Supreme Court of Canada. It is equally true that works now under construction by the Canadian Northern railway, so far as they may be essential for the efficient operation of the road, must be carried on to completion. The fact that money will have to be provided for that purpose will also have to be taken into account when the value of the stock comes to be determined.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: About how much money is required to complete the undertakings of the Canadian Northern railway?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I really could not say offhand, but it is very proper that such information should be given, and I shall direct the attention of the Minister of Finance to my hon. friend's inquiry.

Mr. OLIVER: Where does the money go that is paid on account of the stock?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It will go to the pledgees and owners of the stock.

Mr. OLIVER: It will not in any degree be available for betterments?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No. My hon. friend from South Renfrew has alluded to the necessity of rolling stock, and I quite agree with him. I think the Canadian Northern will require a great deal of rolling stock, but I think my hon. friend will also agree that no more profitable investment of the public revenue of this country could be made than in the provision of rolling stock for that purpose. The Canadian Pacific railway, I believe, has per mile of road a very much greater equipment of motive power and rolling stock than any other railway in Canada, and it should be the duty of the Government to see that the rolling stock of the Canadian Northern railway is brought measurably up to that very high standard. It will be possible, I think, for some co-operation to take place between the Intercolonial, the Transcontinental, the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern in respect of rolling stock. I should observe also—and I think my hon. friend from South Renfrew will agree with this—that the very numerous branches and feeders that have been constructed in connection with the Canadian Northern in Western Canada can be brought into some measurable service for the Grand Trunk Pacific. I am advised that this can very readily be accomplished, and if so it points in a direction along which the country may have to proceed later on; that is, some kind of co-operative management of all the railways of Canada. It is really necessary for the railway companies of Canada and the Government to get together, as soon as an opportunity can be found, to ascertain whether there cannot be an effective co-operative management of this great railway mileage of Canada, which aggregates pretty well up to 40,000 miles. I am not speaking at the moment of putting compulsion on the railway companies, but after the war is over we shall have very important problems to deal with, and, perhaps, none of them will be more important than the problem of transportation, the problem of seeing to it that the net earnings of the railways in Canada shall be sufficient, if possible, to meet the fixed charges. I have discussed this subject somewhat with people who are in a position to speak much more authoritatively about it than I can, and I am convinced that it is not beyond the bounds of possibility and practicability that there shall be in this country some such co-operative management as that to which I have alluded. The remarkable economies which would result from it are beyond question. I will not dwell upon that point. Documents which I have had the opportunity of examining lead me to the conclusion that such a proposal is practicable and that the saving would be great. Let me illustrate. Suppose it could be made clear that through such co-operative management from $90,000,000 to $100,000,000 of new construction by a great railway system in this country would become unnecessary.

Mr. GRAHAM: Double-tracking, for instance.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes. The answer that one usually receives in respect of such suggestions is that any such scheme is impracticable, because the company over whose lines another company has running rights, always operates the road to its own advantage, and the company possessing running rights does not get a fair chance. I am not at all convinced that this answer, which is continually put forward, is absolutely final or conclusive. Persons with whom I have discussed the subject, and who should know what they are talking about, are rather inclined to agree with me in that respect. Railway facilities already existing ought to be used to their full extent before any great corporation should be permitted to spend from $90,000,000 to $100,000,000 or any other considerable sum in new construction which practically duplicates that already existing. Who is to pay interest on the cost of unnecessary new construction? The public of this country, and no one else. And, therefore, if we can avoid such expenditure by using to their full extent the railway facilities already existing, we help to solve one of the difficult problems which will lie before our people in the immediate future. So I think that it may be necessary for the new Parliament, when it is summoned, to give careful consideration to this question along the line which I have suggested, and I venture to believe that very great advantage will accrue to the people of this country if some such proposal can be successfully worked out.

My hon. friend (Mr. Graham) spoke of the National Transcontinental railroad as running through a very fine district in Northern Ontario and Northern Quebec. I had the privilege of going over that road for the first time in December last, on my way from Quebec to the Pacific coast, and I entirely agree with what the hon. gentleman has said as to a considerable extent of that country which is eminently suited for settlement. If I remember correctly, according to the statements of those who are familiar with the country, this district is said to comprise an area of 25,000 or 30,000 miles at least, and I hope we may live to see a prosperous population settled there and assisting in its development.

I do not know that I can add anything further to the discussion at the moment. We realize that the proposals which the Government has put forward, and which according to our judgment are wise and sufficient to meet the situation that has developed, must be carefully and attentively considered by the committee of the House to which they will be referred, and we shall be prepared, so far as possible, to afford full information on all matters which may be relevant to the discussion that will then take place.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): I do not rise for the purpose of expressing any definite or positive opinion on the proposal made by the Minister of Finance this afternoon, for the simple reason that it is largely indefinite in character. The proposal is in regard to a subject which has engaged for a long time the attention of hon. gentlemen who have been interested in the welfare of the country, and which has now been considered by a special commission appointed by the Government to make an inquiry and report which commission is divided in its findings. Under such circumstances it is difficult to arrive in a moment at a definite conclusion just whether such a proposition as has been indicated to-day is or is not in the interests of the country. So far as one can gather from the Minister of Finance, it is proposed to advance to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway company, the money necessary to pay their bond interest for this year, upon the same basis as last year. There does not appear to be any new condition attached to that proposal and there does not seem to be anything that calls for special comment. With regard to the other branch of the subject—the acquisition of the capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railway company—the minister has in many respects run counter to the report and the recommendations of the commission headed by Sir Henry Drayton. As I understand it, the Government proposes to purchase the capital stock of the Canadian Northern railway which it does not now own, and enter into an agreement with the holders of five-sixths of that remaining stock by which title will be acquired; the value to be paid for the stock to be fixed by arbitrators who are to be appointed in the manner indicated by the minister. In thereby taking over the other one-sixth, compulsorily if necessary, the Government will obtain the entire stock of the Canadian Northern railway and become owners of that enterprise. The minister, however, did not tell us—and this is a matter in regard to which I ask information—what is the total bonded indebtedness of the Canadian Northern. The purchase of five-sixths of the remaining stock of the Canadian Northern is a comparatively simple proposition compared with the amount of liabilities which the Government and the people of Canada will have to assume as a result of that equity. It is like buying an equity of redemption in a very large and expensive property against which there is a large mortgage. The question as to whether the bargain is or is not a good one will depend upon the size of the mortgage. So far as I can gather from looking at the report, I would estimate that the amount of the mortgage, or bonded indebtedness of the Canadian Northern railway to-day is in the vicinity of $400,000,000, which means that on that ground alone the Canadian people will be assuming an adition of $400,000,000 to their debt. Besides that, we must take into consideration the amount of outstanding indebtedness not secured by bonds or mortgage securities upon those various railways which are included in the Canadian Northern system—indebtedness to banks—of which we have heard something in previous years; indebtedness in regard to unpaid accounts; indebtedness to contractors; indebtedness to other people who have business with the concern; indebtedness upon equipment bonds or temporary securities of that kind, and so on.

Before we can come to any conclusion in regard to this matter, the House should know we are not buying a pig in a poke, and just how much the people of Canada will become liable for if they purchase this stock. If we can have any conception of the liabilities from the information given us in past years, I would estimate in regard to the items I have mentioned that the liability the Canadian people will assume on that ground alone would be in the vicinity of $500,000,000.

Then comes the question in regard to which we would want very clear information, as to the basis upon which the value of this outstanding stock is to be determined by the arbitrators. Is it to be upon the present value of the enterprise or upon its prospective value? Every one who has had anything to do with the determination of arbitrators' values knows that the basis upon which values are arrived at may vary very considerably, depending upon the point of view from which the arbitrators are asked to regard the matter. I am in accord with my hon. friend from South Renfrew in my admiration of the possibilities of the Canadian Northern, particularly in the western country. I think it covers a portion of the West which is bound to give to Canada tremendous returns in future years. That being so, if the value of this outstanding stock is to be based upon the prospective value of the road, the arbitrators may give any amount imaginable and entirely beyond estimation at this time. Apart from the amount the arbitrators may allow for the present and prospective value of the stock, which is nothing more nor less than the equity in the property, Canada agrees by this proposition to assume a new indebtedness of $500,000,000.

I am one of those who do not regard it as a situation which would be of necessity a calamity if one of our enterprises, railway or otherwise, should pass into the hands of a receiver. Hon. gentlemen have always had held up to them the idea that for a concern to be in the hands of a receiver means that some awful calamity is going to happen. Every one who has studied the situation in regard to receiverships applied to railway and other enterprises in the United States knows that you have the best guarantee possible for the prudent and wise operation of a concern, when a receiver is in charge of it. Not only in connection with railway enterprises, but in connection with industrial enterprises in every part of the commercial world, it has long been recognized that a receivership is often resorted to for the purpose of extricating a concern from a situation into which it has fallen through bad management or for some other reason.

I am not here to say that a receivership is the course which should be adopted. Upon that point I should like some information. For the moment I am entirely open-minded upon the question as to whether or not, having regard to the tremendous obligations which Canada has assumed, and must assume, in connection with the war, and remembering that already, according to the statement of the Minister of Finance, the debt of Canada is $1,250,000,000, which is more than the whole net debt of the United States was before the war, an addition to this debt, at one swoop, of $500,000,000, is a proposition that demands from this House the most serious consideration that it has ever given to any matter that has come before it and in regard to which we should have the fullest possible information in order that we in this House and the people generally should know just the extent of the liability we are assuming. In the good days before the war the assumption of liabilities was a thing that the Canadian people undertook with the lightest possible heart, but day by day we are beginning to realize having, in common with all countries of the world, assumed tremendous liabilities, that we in this new land, as the Finance Minister has frequently said, must avoid the creation of a condition under which taxation would become so great that it would be a menace to immigration.

Mr. NICKLE: As a matter of fact and of law, has not Canada practically undertaken these obligations already by guaranteeing, provincially and federally, the bonds of the Canadian Northern railway?

Mr. MACDONALD: Not necessarily.

Mr. NICKLE: Why not?

Mr. MACDONALD: There are dispositions which might be made of this railway to other parties. If a friendly receiver were appointed and if an arrangement were made for sale under the direction of the court the matter might possibly be cleaned up. As a lawyer, I would not accede to my hon. friend's proposition that because the country has advanced money to an enterprise, therefore, we are bound to go on and take it over and work it.

Mr. NICKLE: Of course, that is not an answer to my question at all.

Mr. MACDONALD: What does my hon. friend want?

Mr. NICKLE: My question was this: Has not Canada practically assumed an obligation equal to that which my hon. friend mentioned by the provincial and Dominion guarantees of the bonds of the Canadian Northern?

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend means that because we have given guarantees we have assumed the obligation?

Mr. NICKLE: That is my point.

Mr. MACDONALD: That is a question that is well worthy of consideration but that does not mean that it is only possible to deal with the subject in one way. My hon. friend from South Renfrew suggested a possible action to be taken by this Government as a result of getting the ownership of the property. The Finance Minister was exceedingly lacking in any information as to what would be the policy of this Government in regard to the operation of this enterprise. My hon. friend (Mr. Nickle) says that because you have a mortgage on a man's property you must finance him for all time to come. That is the logic of my hon. friend's proposition. But, that does not work out in business matters, whether you are dealing with a question of $100,000,000 or $200,000,000 or one of only $5,000. If you guarantee a man for $5,000, my hon. friend's proposition is that you must assume that liability for all time.

Mr. NICKLE: My proposition is this: If A gives a mortgage on his farm to B, and C endorses a promissory note as collateral security for the payment of that mortgage, C thereby undertakes the obligation under that mortgage.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend, I am sure, will agree with this proposition: that because a person has given aid to another person or enterprise, that does not mean that he is obligated for all time to finance that person or enterprise?

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MACDONALD: On such an important matter as the one under discussion, I am sure the House will agree with me when I say that I regret that the minister this afternoon did not give us greater detail. He dealt with the proposition generally. We were told that the Government propose to take over 60 per cent of the stock of the Canadian Northern, which represented the stock held outside of that held by the Government at this time, and to pay for that stock by an arbitration which, so far as the personnel of the arbitrators was concerned, should be held in accordance with the recommendations contained in the report of Sir Henry Drayton. I find on looking at that report that, if you take it literally, there is nothing really to arbitrate, because we have the fact—which the minister did not mention this afternoon—that upon this railway, which it is said we are going to purchase by getting 60 per cent of the stock at an arbitrary value, there is a bonded indebtedness of $400,000,000, and the report of Sir Henry Drayton states that the total cost of the Canadian Northern was only $370,000,000. On page 43 of the report, in the statement giving the result of the findings of the commission, Sir Henry Drayton says:

> We find then $370,000,000 to be the maximum possible cost of the Canadian Northern system as at present existing. In other words, as indeed is frankly admitted by Canadian Northern witnesses, the Canadian Northern shares represent no cash investment.

Further on he says:

> We conclude, therefore, that the shareholders of the company have no equity either on the ground of cash put in, or on the ground of physical reproduction cost, or on the ground of the saleable value of their property as a going concern.

The result is that Sir Henry Drayton has found that this 60 per cent of the shares of this company, in the words which I have quoted, have no value whatever, and yet we are agreeing to enter into an arbitration with the gentlemen who own that stock—and give them the right to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada from the finding of the arbitrators—to ascertain whether they are to be paid something. I suggested before recess that before this matter is discussed again the Government should tell us the basis upon which this value is to be arbitrated. Is it upon the present or upon the prospective value of this stock? Or are there to be any conditions laid down, so that the arbitrators will have before them some basis to go on, in the face of the express findings of Sir Henry Drayton that the stock itself has no value whatever? Having purchased the stock at the arbitrated value, the Canadian people, according to the proposition as I understand it, render themselves liable for interest upon the bonds amounting to $400,000,000—in other words this $400,000,000 of bonds is added to the debt of the country. In addition to that—taking the figures given last year, and counting in round numbers, there are debts amounting to $100,000,000 to be paid by the company, and which the people of Canada will have to pay. In addition to that, according to the report of Sir Henry Drayton, it requires $70,000,000 to provide for the necessary additions and betterments, in order to make the Canadian Northern a workable proposition. According to values which may be given by arbitrators, once it is assumed they can go on and give a valuation based upon prospective value in the future, $100,000,000 is not too big an amount to fix as that which may be awarded as the value of the stock to be taken over by the Government. But let us put it at only $50,000,000. The result is that the debt of Canada, as a result of this proposal made in war time, with the existing debt of $1,250,000,000, is to be increased by $620,000,000. That is to say, the debt of Canada, without any further war expenditure, will amount to $1,870,000,000, involving in interest charges, say at 4 per cent, of something like $24,000,000 or $25,000,000 added to the burden of the country. The proceeds of the income tax will be completely swept away, and there will be, in addition, a burden on the people of at least $5,000,000. These are the figures as they appear to me. I am taking the ordinary proposition, based upon the fact that when a person buys a property which is mortgaged, he becomes liable for the debt. If my figures are incorrect, I shall be glad if the hon. gentleman, when he obtains the exact figures, will correct me. My hon. friend said that it was a matter of great importance that the Intercolonial was to be able to have western connection with the Canadian Northern. He apparently forgot that the Intercolonial, by reason of the Transcontinental, already has communication with the West, and that there are now in operation trains which are advertised as Government trains, by which people can go directly on a Government railway from anywhere in the East as far as Winnipeg. That phase of the question seems a little superfluous in view of the existing condition. As to this whole matter, I reserve my judgment until we obtain fuller data which the minister should have given to-day.

On one portion of the subject my hon. friend was singularly lacking in the information which he gave us. We were told that the Government were going to take over the Canadian Northern railway. Who is going to operate it? Nobody knows, from the explanation of my hon. friend. Certainly it is not the Government, because the right hon. Prime Minister, speaking later, said that this railway was not to be operated by the Minister of Railways or by the Government as such. So that we are not to have government ownership in the proper sense of the term, neither are we to have, apparently, the method of operation which has been recommended by Sir Henry Drayton in his report, namely, the creation of a holding company to be composed entirely of independent men of broad experience to deal with the question entirely apart from politics and from patronage—and patronage, as every one knows who has given the matter any consideration—is a menace to anything like Government operation of government utilities. If it is not to be a government-operated road, nor a road operated on the basis recommended by Sir Henry Drayton, how is it to be operated? The Government has three directors on the Canadian Northern by virtue of the legislation of last year, and the only difference, so far as I can gather, between the proposition of my hon. friend this afternoon, and the system adopted in the past is that, instead of three, we are to have seven or nine directors, as the case may be—according to the number of directors of the Canadian Northern—who will be appointed by the Government; and it was intimated that the gentlemen who were already connected with the Canadian Northern in an official capacity, and who were good men, would be retained, and their services would be available. That is a very indefinite proposition. We in Canada all know what is contained in the proposition of government ownership of government railways, or the government operation of any utility, but certainly this is not government operation. Are we to have a body made up of the type of director that we have been putting on the Canadian Northern and on the Grand Trunk Pacific in the past, who are really not railway operators, but whose doings are controlled entirely by the men who are the motive forces in the enterprise, and who know about the operation?

Is that what it is to be? Certainly this is not Government operation; certainly it is not operation by an independent body whose actions shall be free from politics or patronage. According to the data which the minister has submitted, the control which is to be exercised over this railway, in connection with which the debt of Canada is to be increased some $620,000,000, is such as to involve no responsibility to the people of Canada as a whole.

The proposal which my hon. friend laid before the House this afternoon, involving such a tremendous charge upon the Canadian people at this juncture, requires the fullest possible consideration. I shall not detain the House by discussing the Grand Trunk Pacific, because in respect to that company the proposal made by the Government is one simply of marking time; of taking no step so far as the interests of that company are concerned. But the proposal with regard to the Canadian Northern is a very drastic and important one, and I am sure that the House and the country will await with considerable interest the fuller information which the Government will have to give us before they can ask the House to accept the proposal they have submitted.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, the subject before the House bears more directly upon the prairie West than upon any other part of the country. Of the railroads of Canada that have been mentioned by the Minister of Finance the Intercolonial, the Grand Trunk, and the Canadian Pacific give, I suppose, nine-tenths of the railway service of eastern Canada. The Canadian Northern gives only a small part of the railway service of eastern Canada, and the Grand Trunk Pacific does not touch it at all. The proposals of the Finance Minister relate to the Grand Trunk Pacific and to the Canadian Northern. Therefore, the interests of the prairie West and of the West generally in his proposals is more direct than is that of any other part of the Dominion, and that affords a reason for considering the subject from a different angle.

I desire to take exception to the attitude, both of the commission appointed by the Government and of the Government itself, towards what they are pleased to call the railway problem of Canada. To the western country the railway problem is the problem of securing railway facilities necessary to the development of the country. But when you come east of the Great Lakes, the railway problem seems to be of an entirely different character. It resolves into simply a question of finance, without consideration of that side of the financial question which grows out of the development of the country by railway construction and the affording of railway facilities.

It is assumed in eastern Canada that because these two railway enterprises, the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern, are unable to meet their obligations, they were ill-conceived and are a burden upon the country rather than an aid to its development and progress. That is not the view that prevails west of the Lakes, and with all due respect I submit that it is not the correct view. We have had experience in the western country of railway accommodation at the hands of a single railway enterprise. Our experience was this: although that enterprise was in the same efficient hands that it is to-day, the argument was made that because that one railway company and its lines then existing were adequate for the traffic of the country as it then was, there was no warrant for further railway construction and still less fo the introduction of competitive railway enterprise. It was a fact that for many years when the Canadian West was served by the Canadian Pacific railway, that country did not progress, nor did eastern Canada progress.

The progress of eastern Canada depends on the progress of western Canada, and the progress of western Canada depends, in larger measure than upon any other factor, upon railway facilities under conditions of competitive service. There had to be other railways, or the country could not have become populated; it could not have become productive. Other enterprises than those already in existence had to be originated; other men and other inspiration had to be secured, or we would not have had or could not have had the western progress that resulted from the extension of competitive railway facilities, and we could not have had the expansion of trade, industry, and wealth in eastern Canada that followed that western expansion. The Canadian Pacific railway was built across Canada at a time when there was not sufficient traffic for that railway. But it was good business to build it then, because if the railway waited for the traffic there never would be any traffic, and there never would be any railway.

The development of the continent of North America has followed railway enterprise. Railway enterprise has gone ahead of requirements; that is how our country has developed. The Canadian Pacific railway was an outstanding and startling instance of railway construction in advance of actual requirements. It was many years after the Canadian Pacific railway was constructed before the business caught up to the facilities; the Canadian Pacific railway was a struggling enterprise during those years, dependent in large measure on Government assistance in one form or another. In time the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern enterprises were begun and carried through largely on Government assistance.

Either of those railroads had more traffic to start on than the Canadian Pacific had when it was constructed across the continent, and each one has greater possibilities of traffic than the main line of the Canadian Pacific has had at any time in its existence. There is just as much necessity for the Grand Trunk Pacific and for the Canadian Northern in the development of the western country as there was for the construction of the Canadian Pacific in the first place, and there is just as much reason to believe that in due time the development of the country will catch up with the railway facilities thus furnished and make those enterprises just as successful in every way as the Canadian Pacific has been,—subject, of course, to the greater values in the way of lands that the Canadian Pacific has received at the hands of the Government. It was an unfortunate fact that just as those two railroads were being completed as transcontinental enterprises, the war broke out. The effect of the war was to prevent individual enterprise from going into occupation of the new country made available and accessible by railway facilities, so that the growth of traffic that undoubtedly would have followed the construction of those roads, had the war not occurred, did not take place, simply because the war was on. There is no other enterprise in Canada that has been so hard hit by reason of war conditions as these two railroad enterprises. That was not the fault of the inception of the roads, nor of the management of the roads, nor of the country through which the roads run. Their failure to make greater progress than they have made is due to conditions that were not under their control nor under the control of any one else, and those enterprises should not be condemned by public opinion in this country because of that fact. As a western man, I protest against the point of view taken persistently by the Government of the day, as well as by the commission which they appointed, that because those railroads have not been profitable enterprises from the moment of their completion therefore they were ill-conceived and should not be considered to be legitimate enterprises and should not be supported in the conduct of their business.

It is true that, having been completed, they are not paying their way; and not paying their way, they, of course, are in the same position as any one else who incurs an obligation and is unable to meet that obligation when it becomes due. They become subject to forfeiture, that is, they are subject to be thrown into the hands of a receiver to-morrow. The only question is one of policy—whether that course would be in the interest of the country or not. I am perfectly satisfied to see those companies go into the hands of a receiver to-morrow. But if that course were taken, there is no question that when they came out of the hands of the receiver they would come out as part and parcel of the Canadian Pacific Railway system. I have nothing but praise and commendation for the Canadian Pacific railway, for its management, for the results flowing from its operations; but I, with other pioneers of the West, have had experience of a condition under which we depended upon a single railway company for our railway facilities, and that condition was not satisfactory; it did not tend to the upbuilding of the country, and in my humble judgment, it was in a large measure the cause of the stagnation from which the West suffered for many years. That condition was not relieved until the element not only of railway development but of railway competition entered into that country. Therefore we have to consider whether we desire to maintain those two railway companies as going concerns for the sake of preserving the element of railway competition throughout that country.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: Is my hon. friend arguing that there should be three transcontinental railways in this country?

Mr. OLIVER: I believe there is to-day more room for three transcontinental railroads in Canada than there was for one in 1886 when the Canadian Pacific railway was finished. The Canadian West and British Columbia are the reason for the transcontinental railways. It certainly is a fact that there are more than three times as many people, there is more than three times as much production and wealth between the Great Lakes and the Pacific to-day than in 1886. If my hon. friend says that the country has already been developed, I can only tell him that the Prairie West, as he knows, has not been developed beyond say, fifteen or, at the most, twenty per cent. What we have to-day to offer in business for our railroad companies is not more than one-fifth of the business that we ultimately shall have to offer when that country is fully developed. There is a greater future before the three railroad companies to-day than there was in sight before the one railroad company when its transcontinental line was completed.

I was speaking of the desirability of maintaining railway competition in the western country by supporting, so far as is reasonable, the three railway companies as separate institutions. If those railway companies were being operated extravagantly or incompetently, if the money that they earned was being wasted, then certainly they should not be continued, they should not be supported, they should be called to account, and some other arrangement should be made. But so far as I am aware, there is no suggestion that either the Grand Trunk Pacific or the Canadian Northern are being operated otherwise than efficiently, honestly and economically— efficiently, beyond any comparison with, we shall say, the operation of our Government railway system, and beyond any question, more economically than our Government railway system. If there is any criticism to be made of those companies in regard to efficiency, honesty or economy of operation, I have not yet heard it. That being the case, and the railroads being in the hands of companies that are operating honestly, efficiently and economically, it seems to me that there is a good case for the Government to come forward and give such assistance as is necessary in order to keep them up as going concerns. The Government has on previous occasions come to the assistance of these companies. On this particular occasion, they come to the assistance of the Grand Trunk Pacific with a six per cent demand loan of $7,500,00 They estimate that this is sufficient to carry the company in its operations for another year, and hope that development will occur later on that will enable the company to carry itself. My impression is that this is a desirable form of aid to the railway. It is businesslike, it is a clear-cut proposition; we know exactly what we have to do. We know where the money is going and what use will be made of it, and it seems to me that if we are to give the railroads assistance at all, this is the best form in which to give it. Let me make this suggestion, however. I think the Government would have been well advised if in past years they had adopted an attitude of support, instead of an attitude of antagonism, towards these railroads, an attitude which tended to discourage these enterprises and to discourage the men who were concerned in them. It is more than possible that had the Government of the day preserved a proper attitude towards these railroad companies, had they recognized them in their capacity as builders of the country, as concerns that were entitled to the support of the people of Canada within reasonable degree, these railroads would not have needed to come to Parliament for the amount of aid they are receiving at the present time.

Now, I desire to speak of the aid to the Canadian Northern railway. I am very much at a loss to understand why the Canadian Northern is being dealt with in this way, as compared with the Grand Trunk Pacific. I am at a loss in following the general outline placed before the House this afternoon by the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister, and I am still more at a loss when the details of the subject are considered. In the case of the Grand Trunk Pacific, we know what our aid is going to cost us. In the granting of that aid we have the assurance of that honesty, efficiency and economy which has been shown in the management of the road up to the present time. But when we deal with the Canadian Northern, we first of all forego the advantage that we have in regard to the Grand Trunk Pacific—because we are taking control of the Canadian Northern; we are going to manage the road ourselves; we are going to have a transcontinental road from Halifax to Vancouver under our management and control Well, Mr. Speaker, judging by the results of our management of the Intercolonial and of the Transcontinental, I can only look at such a proposal as a calamity to the people of Canada, both in the matter of their finances and in the matter of the service that will be given to the public by the railroad. The proposed action of the Government adds nothing to the railway facilities of Canada. There are just as many miles of railway in Canada to-day as there will be after this action is taken; and when the Government ask us to accept their management as better than that of the railway company, as more satisfactory to the people, as giving a better service generally, I can only say that they are asking us to accept something for the support of which there is not one bit of evidence. We cannot expect the results from that railway under Government management that we have had under the management by the company.

The Finance Minister explains that we are to be the owners of the road and that this will be an advantage to us. But how do we become the owners of the road? By purchasing $60,000,000 of capital stock. The minister does not tell us how much we are going to pay for this stock, but says there is going to be an arbitration, and that we will pay whatever the arbitrators say we must pay. Now we have the evidence of the Drayton Commission that the stock is not worth anything, and if we are going to buy stock on the market, having appointed the Drayton Commission and having their evidence, surely that furnishes a sufficient basis upon which the minister could announce to the House what the ownership of this railroad is going to cost the country in hard cash. But he does not tell us that; he carefully avoids even a suggestion as to that. It comes down, then, to this. In order that this country shall assume the operation of 9,000 miles of railway—and this Government has never shown the ability to operate 2,000 miles of railway efficiently, economically or satisfactorily—we are to pay in cash an unknown amount, which, however, may be in the neighbourhood of $60,000,000. That is the proposition he has laid before the House. If he has something more definite to give us, he certainly should have given it to us. Why are we arbitrating on the value of $60,000,000 of Canadian Northern stock when we have the best possible evidence to prove that the stock is not worth one cent? Why are we arbitrating on a subject like this? Is it to get control of the road? We own $40,000,000 of that stock today, and if we paid even at par for $11,000,000 more we would control the road. The country is being led by the Minister of Finance into a position where we may have to pay dollar for dollar for $60,000,000 of stock, when the most that we need is $11,000,000 to give us just as complete control of the road as would the purchase of $60,000,000 of stock.

Now I ask why are we not informed in regard to that question? For my part I am compelled to take issue with the proposal of the minister on that ground, and say it is improper, and uncalled for—that there is no warrant or possible justification for it. In regard to the control of the road, I want to know by what process of reasoning it is assumed that our control of the Canadian Northern railway will give us better service than we are getting now, with a less rate to pay for it. Are we getting better service on the Intercolonial or the Transcontinental and are we getting it at a less rate? Is there anything in the management of our Government railroads to warrant us in believing that we can manage the 9,000 miles of the Canadian Northern as well as it is being managed to-day? To state the case is to show how absurd it is. There is no warrant for such a suggestion. We are being asked to take over the Canadian Northern railroad, and pay for the taking over of it, in order that the country may be saddled with the obligations of the company, in regard to which obligations my hon. friend did not enlighten us. Following the remarks of my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), I say this is not a proposal that should be brought before Parliament, or placed before the Canadian people, at this time. It is by all odds the most outrageous proposition that has ever emanated from the Government—and that is a large order. We must assume all the obligations of the Canadian Northern railroad; we must meet those obligations and we must discharge them. We must also assume obligations to the people of the country to continue the service of the Canadian Northern is now giving. Why should this be done? My hon. friend told us that the Canadian Northern was earning its fixed charges and something over. Surely the Canadian Northern is not in such a position that a further reasonable loan, as is made to the Grand Trunk Pacific, would not enable it to carry on. Surely we should be better off to pay in cash what would enable the Canadian Northern to continue business rather than that we should take the responsibility for everything it owes, and pay anywhere from $10,000,000 to $60,000,000 for the privilege of doing so, and then give the country an inefficient railway service, whereas we have had a measurably efficient railway service in the past.

Mr. CURRIE: Does the hon. member claim that efficient service was given by the Canadian Northern? It is not so many weeks since hon. members on the opposite side of the House were complaining because grain had been standing all winter. That is not efficient service. For instance, in the Goose Lake district, they had not a single car out all fall or spring.

Mr. OLIVER: That was the same condition as prevailed on the Canadian Pacific.

Mr. CURRIE: Can the hon. gentleman name a place on the Canadian Pacific where that was the case?

Mr. OLIVER: Sure.

Mr. CURRIE: It is not in accordance with the custom of the road.

Mr. OLIVER: I was told by a gentleman who is quite as reliable as my hon. friend that he had 17,000 bushels of oats lying in his field at Namaka, on the Canadian Pacific, within a few miles of Calgary, and he could not get it moved.

Mr. CURRIE: But that does not bear out the statement of my hon. friend. The Canadian Northern has not been giving efficient service. All last winter and the early part of this spring the order paper was full of complaints in regard to this service. Now that the railroad is being taken over, my hon. friend says they are giving a grand service.

Mr. OLIVER: There was no more complaint on that score in regard to the Canadian Northern than there was in regard to the Canadian Pacific. It was a matter of arrangement between the railways and the Government, by which, for some reason or other, the railways were allowed to put an embargo on the hauling of the grain. The railways were permitted to ignore the Common Carriers' Act, and this embargo was put on by all the companies.

In placing upon this country a direct financial obligation, as stated by my hon. friend from Pictou, running up to half a billion dollars, at this time and under present circumstances, the Government is not doing a service to the country, which, to quote my hon. friend's favourite expression, will enable us to win the war.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Does my hon. friend seriously suggest that we are taking up a direct liability of $500,000,000?

Mr. OLIVER: Yes.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is entirely incorrect. The corporate entity of the Canadian Northern railway and of all the companies in the system is being preserved, and we are going to operate through the Canadian Northern Railway company. It is not even an indirect liability. It is the liability of those companies, and the Government will own the $100,000,000 of stock besides the stock it owns to-day. The statement that we are adding $500,000,000 to the national debt of Canada is absolutely and entirely incorrect.

Mr. OLIVER: The Government will be the owner of the property.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Of the stock.

Mr. MACDONALD: What difference does that make? It is an absolute quibble.

[Mr. Currie.]

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It makes all the difference in the world. If my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) is the owner of a large holding of Canadian Pacific stock, for instance, could it be said that he is liable personally, if his stock is paid up as this stock will be, for all the debts of the Canadian Pacific Railway company? It is absurd.

Mr. OLIVER: What I tell my hon. friend is that the Government owns the stock of the Canadian Northern.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is a stockholder.

Mr. OLIVER: It owns the railroad. It has taken over the stock, so that it will be liable for the debts of the Canadian Northern. Did not my hon. friend tell the House this afternoon that one result of the taking over of this stock would be to establish the credit of the Canadian Northern? How would it establish the credit of the Canadian Northern, if the Government was not responsible?

Mr. CURRIE: If the Canadian Northern had a first-class credit, such as the Canadian Pacific or the New York Central, and it wanted to raise $50,000,000 for equipment, for instance, it would not need to come to this House for the money. The reason the Canadian Northern is here looking for money is just because its credit is impaired, and it will come here year after year when it has no money.

Mr. OLIVER: Unless the Government manages the business of the Canadian Northern infinitely better than it has so far managed that of the Intercolonial or the Transcontinental, instead of the Canadian Northern earning interest on its capital cost and something on operating expense, it will not be earning any interest whatever on its capital cost. It is a fact that since the Intercolonial was built it has never earned a dollar on its capital cost, under government management. The Transcontinental will not earn a dollar under government management. It is a calamity to the country that such conditions should be forced upon it.

Mr. GLASS: My hon. friend will admit that the same conditions prevailed during the regime of the former Administration between 1896 and 1911?

Mr. OLIVER: Certainly?

Mr. GLASS: With reference to the Intercolonial?

Mr. OLIVER: Certainly.

Mr. CURRIE: Why did the hon. gentleman and his colleagues launch into such an extensive programme of railway building as they did in the West if new railways are not a paying proposition?

Mr. OLIVER: I do not know that it would be profitable for myself and my hon. friend to argue out that point. At the beginning of my remarks I gave the reasons why the late Government entered upon that policy, that railway enterprise, and I showed that this country had benefited enormously as a result of it. But the late Government did not enter upon a policy of government ownership of the Transcontinental railway from Winnipeg to Quebec. This Government saw fit, for the petty political purpose of discrediting their predecessors, to discredit that enterprise, and as a result it has to date been a failure. But that was not the fault of the project, nor it it the fault of their projects that at the present time the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern are not paying their way. It is a fact that when we own the railway we have the assets as well as the liabilities, but we have to provide for the liabilities. If we own the railway that is an offset against the liability. That is true, but the liabilities are our liabilities, and we have to see that they are provided for or else we lose the asset. I say, with all deference to the Minister of Finance and his ability—and also to his parliamentary under-secretary (Mr. Currie) —that the minister is not improving the financial position of Canada in the markets of the world by the transaction that he is putting before us to-night. It is a most unfortunate thing from every point of view that this country should be subjected to such a hold-up at this particular time for money to pay for something that has no value. For what reason this is being done neither I nor any other man can tell outside of the circle of the Government. We can guess, but we do not know. When, in addition to that, we are asked to assume responsibility for the management of 9,000 miles of railway, with the obligations that go with it, I say that this Government is doing the country its greatest disservice.

Mr. GLASS: I want to ask my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) a question. He made the remark that there was no equity, no value, in the stock of the railway. Does not my hon. friend think that the equity in the road is worth what any outside railway or corporation would be willing to pay for it? It does not matter what its liabilities may be, it does not matter what the condition of the road may be, the equity in the road is what anybody else is willing to pay for it. My hon. friend says that $60,000,000 will be awarded as the result of the arbitration. My hon. friend, I am sure, does not believe that any such thing would be possible in the Exchequer Court which would be the court to make any such award. Notwithstanding that the road has all these liabilities, my hon. friend has admitted that it has future possibilities equal to those of the Canadian Pacific which now stands out as the greatest railway success in the world. With its feeders, and with the country it will serve, all admit that there are tremendous future possibilities for that railway. Under these circumstances there must be some equity. If the road has been economically constructed and managed, if the moneys that have been spent have not been wasted, the value must be there. Supposing that the Canadian Pacific were willing to give $5,000,000 or $10,000,000 and to take over the road, then that is what the road would be worth.

Mr. OLIVER: It is admitted that this company is in default, and under the present circumstances if those to whom it owes money close in upon it the road is forfeited, there is nothing coming to the owners and the stock is not worth anything. While in the future it may be worth something, it is not worth anything to-day, and it is only to-day we are dealing with.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton): I do not profess to be a railway man, Mr. Speaker, but I represent people who are tax-payers and who pay some of the revenue and indebtedness of the country. As such representative I do not think I should allow this discussion to go by without recording very briefly my views on the proposal that the hon. the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) has presented to-day. I did not think that the minister was sufficiently candid with the Canadian people with respect to the proposition that he is putting before them. I listened to every word that the minister said. I have been watching this proposition since he introduced legislation last year for the purpose of appointing the commission whose report we heard read in part to-day. When that resolution was proposed I said to the minister that, if he wanted my opinion, it was against the public ownership of railways. I did not expect my opinion to have any weight with the minister at that time. But. I am still of the same opinion, that the public ownership of, railways generally speaking, is not a good thing for this country. I say that more particularly with respect to a developing country such as the Northwest is. In an old, well-settled country, such as that between Montreal and Toronto, where a section of the Grand Trunk railway is being operated, and where no development is necessary so far as spreading the branches of the railway are concerned, I would not be opposed to the principle of Government railway management. But when you go to places like the West, where it is necessary to branch out, spread the operation of the railway and use it as a colonizing road, I submit that there the Government sphere of activity should end. There, it is admitted, it will fail, because what may be a success as a private enterprise, under the control of individuals such as Mackenzie and Mann—who, with any faults they may have had, have done more to develop this country and the Northwest than any other two men in Canada—may not be a success under Government management. I submit, therefore, that Government ownership, to use a slang term, will fall down on a colonization project, and it should not be attempted.

If the people of the West will trust themselves as far as the spreading out of the branches of any government-owned railway is concerned to Government ownership they will find it will be a failure. I am basing this on my own dearly-bought experience in the part of the country from which I come. We have government railways and government-operated railways in Nova Scotia for nearly fifty years, and our experience during that time is that we have one straight line of railway, extended, at different periods, from Truro to Sydney, without a single branch to outer parts of the country, and these parts are starving and dying for want of proper development, because the Government, whether Liberal or Conservative, would never give the necessary railway facilities.

As to the kind of bargain the minister tells us we are making, he has given us a glowing picture of what the country was getting for the money we are to expend. We are getting 9,000 miles of railway. We are getting express companies, telegraph companies, and all kinds of utilities that the mind of man could conceive of, and one would think that we were getting something that had real cash value in it. But right at the end of that statement that we are getting such an enormous amount of property, it is admitted that the company which has the real title to the property, both legal and equitable, cannot raise one dollar on it. The adoption of the minister's proposition means that the country acquires property that is so loaded with indebtedness and stress of liability that its owners, although an enterprising concern, could not raise fifty cents on it, because it is already pledged to its full value, and if it went under the hammer to-morrow, it would not bring enough money to pay the claims that are now standing against it, for which the company is absolutely and legally liable. The minister should make that plain to the people of this country. If they are going to spend money for the purpose of getting hold of certain property, they should be told that it is already mortgaged so heavily that they are really getting nothing at all, and that, if they pay off the mortgage, it will take every dollar the property is worth, and more. What better position are we in than the man who buys a second mortgage or a third mortgage? If a man takes a third mortgage on property, or an assignment of a third mortgage, if that third mortgage is to be any good, is he not making himself liable to pay off the mortgages ahead of him? Everybody understands that. We are told that we are taking over something that may represent $60,000,000 of stock. We are taking it over, I suppose, because it is worth something;—if it is worth nothing, why are we bothering with it? I would not suppose, Mr. Speaker, that the stock of a company that is on the verge of going into the receiver's hands is a very inviting proposition on the market. We are told that we must come to the rescue of this company, otherwise it must go into the receiver's hands, and just as it is on the verge of going into the receiver's hands, unless it receives assistance, we are told that we must spend something like $60,000,000 to buy its stock. I submit, Sir, that that is a poor proposition, and one which, under present conditions, should not be presented to the Canadian people. We have enough obligations to meet at the present juncture, and the end of our great liabilities is not in sight. We must bear cheerfully all our war obligations, and, if it can be avoided at all, I do not think any further obligations should be cast upon the people of this country, until we are relieved to some extent of the great responsibility which the war conditions place upon us. The minister tells us we have to buy this stock, worth nothing of course, and possibly pay $60,000,000 for it, in order to get control of the voting power of the company.

I do not think that is necessary. If this company is in need of money it comes to Parliament, as a suppliant, asking for consideration. I do not want to deal harshly with any company that is obliged to come to this House for proper assistance, but when they are in the hands of the Government and of Parliament, and such conditions can be attached to assistance given as will give us control of the management of the concern, I think we need not bother with this stock. I think it was two years ago that the $45,000,000 guarantee was given. Legislation was introduced into this House at that time and conditions were embodied in that legislation that gave the Government power to appoint a certain number of directors on the Board of Management of that company. If they are going to get more money now—and I suppose that is what they are after—why take this roundabout and cumbersome way, with this difficult-to-understand proposition that is being put to us? The point, we are told, is that we get control. Why take that mysterious, intricate and difficult way of getting control, when the Act of Parliament, which will give them the loan, can provide, as a condition precedent to the granting of the money, that we must have a sufficient number of men on the board to absolutely control the management? Doing this, we shall not be encumbered with this useless stock, which is no good. If any security is required let us get another mortgage. Some day the property may be worth enough money, and the road may be sufficiently prosperous to pay back every dollar of this money. I submit that we should do with the Canadian Northern on this occasion as we did when we gave them aid some years ago, and as we are doing with the Grand Trunk Pacific—give them some aid, and take a form of security for it, and not go through the form of pretending to own the property of the company when we do not own it at all. It will go on just as it did before. It will be Mackenzie and Mann property, or the Canadian Northern; in all its operations it will be just as it was, and we shall simply have this useless stock. Why bother with them, and why have the reputation of being in this concern for the purpose of paying off the liabilities, when it is not necessary to do that? Let us give them the amount of money which is necessary to carry them along. If they need it they must have it, just the same as the other companies, and let us have the same relation to the one company as to the other. I do not want the people of Canada to suppose for one moment, as they might suppose if they accepted the speech of the hon. minister without further consideration, that they are getting a splendid bargain, and are obtaining a magnificent property, practically free from any encumbrance, and that henceforth everything will be in our hands.

This country should not at any time burden itself with a colonization railway or with any railway the development of which requires to be carried on as the Mackenzie and Mann roads must be carried on if they are to be successfully operated. The operation of these railways will be better carried on by the concerns that have been interested in them from the beginning and have brought them to whatever degree of success they have attained. I am opposed to Government-owned railways under these conditions. I would feel, Sir, that I was not doing justice to myself or to the people whom I represent if I did not register this protest before you leave the Chair.

Mr. G. W. KYTE (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I had not the advantage of hearing the Finance Minister (Sir Thomas White) make his statement to the House this afternoon, but I gathered from such of the debate as I had the privilege of hearing that the Government's proposal is to take over the whole of the Mackenzie and Mann railway system. After supplying additional funds to put the road on a proper financial basis, the Government practically takes it over and will operate it as part of the Government system of railways, in connection with the Intercolonial. This is a gigantic development of a problem which has been before this House more or less frequently during the past ten or twelve years. Resolutions have been moved in this House from time to time setting forth the desirability of the Government taking over certain branch railways in eastern Nova Scotia, consolidating them with the Intercolonial Railway system, and thus securing to the communities served by these branch railways better railway facilities and cheaper transportation rates. I had the privilege on more than one occasion of arguing that it was the bounden duty of the Government, having regard to the interests of the communities served by these branch railways, to deal with this question. Prior to the defeat of the late Government, provision was made for the construction of certain branch railways in Nova Scotia and the acquisition of a branch railway that is operated in the constituency which I represent. The sum of $1,000,000 was placed in the estimates in the session of 1911 for the construction of a railway from the city of Halifax to the settlement of Musquodoboit, in the county represented by the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden). An equal sum was placed in the estimates for the construction of a railway from Sunnybrae, in the county of Pictou, to the town of Guysborough, on the southern shore of Nova Scotia. After the present Government came into office, they struck out the appropriation for the construction of the railway from Sunnybrae to Guysborough, but they preserved the item of $1,000,000 for the construction of the road from the city of Halifax to Musquodoboit. Since that time this latter railway has been completed and is in operation; but the branch railway from Sunnybrae to Guysborough has not been dealt with. Neither has any action been taken looking to the acquisition of the Cape Breton railway, which operates from Point Tupper to the town of St. Peters.

The reasons urged by the present Minister of Railways against the further development of railway accommodation in Nova Scotia is scarcity of money. When the present Government came into office they found an overflowing treasury. The late Finance Minister enjoyed surplus after surplus for many years, and the advantage of his methods of financing was reflected in the large sum of money which was found in the treasury when the present Finance Minister took office. Notwithstanding that they had an overflowing treasury in 1912 and 1913, the Government argued against the further development of railways in the Maritime Provinces upon the ground that the financial obligations which they were under did not permit them to enter upon that further development. After a period of the leanest years that have been experienced in the history of the Dominion, when obligations unheard of and unthought of in the past have been incurred for the purpose of carrying on our part in the war, this Government, apparently without very much hesitation, undertakes to appropriate a vast sum of money for the purpose of acquiring the Canadian Northern railway and its branch lines throughout Canada. If this Government intend going into the acquisition of railways on such a vast scale as is contemplated by the statement made by the Finance Minister this afternoon, I would ask him to make a job of it. Let us once and for all complete the operation of purchasing railways throughout Canada, and, in addition to acquiring the Canadian Northern system extending from the Pacific to the Atlantic, provide for the construction of the railway from Sunnybrae to the town of Guysborough and for the acquisition of the railway from Point Tupper to St. Peter's and its extension to the city of Sydney. Then our whole system of railways will be completed. Taking into account the enormous sums of money which the Government has provided for the financing of the Canadian Northern railway system and the enormous amount which the Finance Minister must provide for the further financing of that system, I am sure that I am not asking too much when I ask him to make a small appropriation for the further construction of the roads that I have mentioned and the acquisition of the smaller railway which operates in my constituency. Then, as I have said, the whole railway system of Canada will be dealt with and properly systematized.

The Canadian Northern Railway company have an interest in a railway operated in the county of Inverness, known as the Inverness railway, running from Port Hawkesbury to the town of Inverness. It is operated in connection with a coal mine owned by Mackenzie and Mann. Is that railway to be taken over as part of the Canadian Northern system?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am not positive whether the Inverness railway is embraced in the Canadian Northern system or not. If my hon. friend will look up the Act of 1914, he will see whether the stock of that road is embraced in the Canadian Northern system. I am sorry that I cannot answer my hon. friend, but I have not especially turned my mind to the subject.

Mr. KYTE: I can understand that the minister would not have his mind charged with that. Another railway, however, which is owned and operated as part of the Canadian Northern, is the Halifax and Southwestern.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is included.

Mr. KYTE: After the legislation contemplated by the Finance Minister is put through, nearly all the branch lines in Nova Scotia will become part of the Government system. I would again ask the minister finally to dispose of this question and to consider whether he can include in his proposals the acquisition of the Inverness and Richmond railway, operated in the county of Inverness, and of the Cape Breton railway, operated in the county of Richmond, with a view to consolidating the branch railway lines in Nova Scotia and giving the people in those communities the advantage of a government-owned and operated railway, for which they have been asking so persistently for many years and upon which depends the progress of these communities.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Rouville): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great attention this afternoon to the statement made to the House by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) and also to the various speeches which were delivered on this subject. I wish to register my own personal protest against this proposed legislation—subject, however, to the explanations which may come when the Bill reaches the committee stage.

The people of this country will be appalled to-morrow when they learn of the transaction this Government intends to make. In the present financial condition of the country, when we are passing through the most serious crisis this country has ever known, the Government is not justified in bringing this legislation before the House. The Canadian Northern Railway system has nothing to complain of on the part of this Parliament and of the Canadian people at large. No railway system has been so liberally treated as the Canadian Northern Railway system, and we could well afford to wait before burdening the country with millions upon millions of money that we shall be called upon to pay in order to complete this transaction. I do not question that transportation will be required after the war as it was required during and before the war. But, when the Government are imposing the taxation which is being imposed upon the people of this country, when we have in the field nearly 400,000 men, and when we have to borrow at the exorbitant rate at which we are at the present time borrowing in the American market, we must call a halt. I take issue with the Government and I say that this is not a proper time, nor is this a proper occasion to over-burden the country with this new heavy obligation.

The whole proposal of the Government can be summed up in one sentence: The Government relieve Mackenzie and Mann from their railway liabilities, but they leave to Mackenzie and Mann the control of the railway. I am under the impression that the scheme, so much talked about of late, of a union Government is not altogether separate from the proposition before us to-day. It has been stated in this House by hon. members who usually support the Government—by the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. R. Bennett) by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle)—that the influence of this Canadian Northern railway is far from being a healthy influence. I quite understand why the owners of that system are so anxious to have a union of all parties in order to pass all their schemes before Parliament, and they would be most happy indeed if all opposition should be wiped out from this House. If there is one reason why there should be an Opposition, it is the recurrent presence of the agents of the Canadian Northern in the lobbies of this Parliament. It is stated in the press of this morning that out of the $100,000,000 that we are borrowing from Uncle Sam on the New York market, possibly $20,000,000 must be deducted to pay the interest due on the 1st of August to to pay the interest due on the 1st of August of this year.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The hon. member correctly states a press report of this morning, I think, in the Citizen. No more incorrect statement could by any possibility be made. The $20,000,000 obligation which matured to-day in New York is principal, not interest, and the money had been provided and was lying to the credit of the Dominion Government in the Bank of Montreal in New York before this loan was put on.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That does not alter the fact that every now and then the Minister of Finance, with the responsibility that rests upon him as the treasurer of the country, will have to meet in the not distant future very heavy liabilities, and he should reflect twice before burdening the people of this country with this new scheme of the Canadian Northern. I do not see how the Minister of Finance can sleep nowadays with the huge responsibility that rests upon his shoulders. How can he be serene and yet be playing with millions and hundreds of millions of dollars? Our national debt has reached enormous proportions, unthought of some years ago. Does he realize where we are going to land with the present war situation? In the midst of our financial perplexities he practically says to the Parliament of Canada: We shall acquire $60,000,000 worth of stock of the Canadian Northern railway system; the road will be ours from the Atlantic to the Pacific, but we do not know as yet what liabilities we are going to have loaded upon us. Sir, my hon. friend is living in a fool's paradise, and such transactions as this are apt to bring us to the verge of bankruptcy. I do not believe that the minister will carry this transaction through, because I notice this afternoon that, contrary to all expectations, his friends on the other side of the House were not so cheerful as they usually were when such transactions were brought up before. If it does go through, however, he will bitterly regret it, because I believe the people of the country will not stand for it. It will be interesting to read to-morrow the telegrams and letters that he will receive from all parts of Canada. The Canadian people are sick and tired of the perpetual raids that are being made on the treasury of the country by this omnivorous Canadian Northern railway system. I bear no ill will towards that system, but we are at war and our war liabilities should not be lost sight of. Sir, I am glad of one thing; it is that my native province is of all provinces not involved in the affairs of the Canadian Northern railway. I refer to Quebec.

Mr. OLIVER: Let me remind the hon. member that the Quebec and Saguenay railway is located in his province.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I cannot believe that with this Greek gift of the Canadian Northern the Minister of Finance will have, shall I say, the brass—the audacity—

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The temerity.

Mr. LEMIEUX: —the temerity, to add a new Quebec and Saguenay raid, after the judgment which has been rendered by Sir Walter Cassels in the Exchequer Court.

I cannot believe it. Has my hon. friend lost all sense of proportion? Does he believe that at this time, when we are spending in round figures at the rate of $800,000 a day, the country is in a position to acrequire the Canadian Northern Railway system, and also to implement the Quebec and Saguenay legislation that was introduced in the dying days of last session, and which made my honest and hon. friend from Kingston so sick? I appeal to the patriotism of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. Surely the taxpayers of this country have enough to carry during the present war, without placing on their shoulders this further heavy load.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. Lemieux.]

SUPPLY.

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Militia and Defence—Grants to associations and bands, $50,000.

Mr. MACDONALD: I should like to ask a question in regard to the first item "Allowances, Active Militia Corps." I have in mind a case where the officers of a regiment made arrangements with the officials of the department for the purchase of kilts. The officers gave their notes for the purpose of raising the money, expecting to be refunded, out of the advances that are made for this purpose from year to year. I refer to the 78th Regiment. I was wondering whether any of these allowances have been paid.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Since the war began, the department has not set aside any funds for this purpose. After the war is over, the question will have to be considered.

Mr. MACDONALD: Then why take this vote?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: This is for command pay, drill instruction, care of arms, allowances to corps of the militia, etc. The amount asked for last year was $100,000, but as many rural corps are practically non-existent now, we have reduced the vote to $80,000 this year. Whatever clothing is used by the militia is paid for out of the War Appropriation Fund.

Mr. MACDONALD: There is no vote then, out of which the men could be refunded?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: We have had no such vote in the estimates this year or last.

Mr. MACDONALD: What is proposed to be done under the heading "Engineer Services and Works"?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: This has reference to work done by engineers fitting up camps and all that sort of thing.

Mr. MACDONALD: These camps are only held for the purpose of training overseas forces?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Yes. That comes out of this vote.

Mr. KYTE: Is the work at Camp Borden being done under the supervision of the Department of Militia and Defence?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Any work in connection with the housing of the overseas forces there comes under my department. The Imperial Government, however, has spent a very large sum of money at Camp Borden on the Flying Corps. The buildings at Camp Borden belong to the Imperial Government, but they are on the property of the Dominion Government.

Mr. KYTE: That work is being done under the Munitions Board?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Yes.

Mr. MURPHY: Would the minister be good enough to explain the apparent decrease of $33,000 from the vote taken for this purpose last year?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The Dominion Rifle Association have not drawn their grant for the last two years, and that accounts for $20,000.

Mr. MACDONALD: Referring to the vote for bands, every one must have noticed that as the war has progressed there has been practically no music available in connection with military matters. We all know the effect music has, and it occurred to me that some of the returned soldiers, even though engaged in other employment, might be encouraged to form bands in connection with the old militia regiments. It is a bad thing for a country that music should die out altogether. While I am very glad that the bagpipes music—the music of the Scotch Highlanders to whom I belong—has become more appreciated every day since the war began, still it might receive more encouragement. I do not know how the vote will be expended, because I think a very large percentage of the regimental bands have gone overseas. Certainly that is true of the East, and it is impossible to-day to find music for any purpose, even in connection with the return of the boys from the front. Can the minister tell me how this vote will be expended, and whether some effort could not be made along the lines I suggest?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Of this amount $14,500 is paid to the active militia in allowances, and it is paid upon the authorization of the officers commanding the different units. There is no intention to curtail the expenditure in connection with the bands. I quite agree with my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) that it would be a very undesirable thing to do. While I am not so closely connected with the Highlanders as he is, my ancestors having come from the country that lies just south of Scotland, yet when I see a pipers' band I always feel it is very inspiring. A great deal has been done for recruiting by the pipers' bands, and we have met with considerable success through them in the United States.

Mr. MACDONALD: Could not the minister ask his officials who have to do with the expenditure of this vote to see whether something could not be devised in the way of special encouragement? There are only $14,000 paid to regimental bands. All the regimental bands in the East have gone. They are the boys who went without any difficulty or question. It would be money well invested, and the returns would amply justify the expenditure if the Militia Department could see its way to foster a greater interest in music. At the present time, outside of the larger cities where they have permanent musicians, you will not hear music anywhere. I went through the country during the past winter, and this absence of music was commented upon in almost every place I visited.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: It is no doubt accounted for, as stated by my hon. friend, by the fact that a great many of the bands went overseas, and the instruments are now on the other side. The question of the return of those instruments came before me a short time ago, and I may say that everything will be done to see that they are returned to the proper units. When the old bands come back, I hope we shall have a return to former conditions.

Mr. MURPHY: The minister stated that the item under discussion covered $20,000 a year for the Dominion Rifle Association, which had not been claimed for two years, I understand. It is almost certain it will not be claimed this year, because there will not be any need for it. I would suggest that the vote should be reduced by that amount.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The item of $20,000 is not included in this vote. It was included in the vote of $83,000 for 1916-17. We are only asking $50,000 this year.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I would like to ask the minister if the hospitals which are being constructed in Canada under the supervision of the Hospitals Commission have the approval of the Department of Militia. Has the department direct control of the undertakings, and are they subject to the approval of the department, or is the matter in the hands of the Hospitals Commission, and have they the power to determine how much shall be expended in the erection of hospitals? I may say I have in mind one of the hospitals in Halifax.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The Department of Militia and Defence has spent some money on hospitals in Halifax. Money is being spent also by the Military Hospitals Commission. This money is appropriated out of the War Vote to the Hospitals Commission for the purpose of building hospitals, and the Hospitals Commission controls that branch of the service.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Has the Department of Militia anything to do with it?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Not with respect to the buildings.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I would like to say, with respect to the erection of a building at Halifax, that there appears to me to have been an unnecessary expenditure. It matters little whether the Department of Militia is directly responsible or not, because the Government is responsible for the policy of the commission. In that case the Government of Nova Scotia desired the Hospitals Commission to pay part of the cost of the construction of an addition to the Victoria General Hospital, which is a government institution, and undertook to contribute to the extent of $25,000 or $30,000 themselves. For some reason or other the Hospitals Commission declined to consider this proposal. I submit they were guilty of a great error of judgment in not accepting the offer of the Nova Scotia Government. It is true that eventually the property would revert to the province, but the hospital was to be available to the commission as long as necessary for the welfare of the soldiers. There was the further advantage in accepting the offer of the Nova Scotia Government that the medical staff at present engaged in the hospital would have been available for attendance upon the disabled soldiers who might be in the hospital.

The medical staff of the Victoria General Hospital is the largest in Halifax and the leading surgeons and physicians are members of it. Unfortunately, the medical staff selected by the Department of Militia in connection with the forces is not composed of the leaders of their profession. It would mean much to the inmates of the hospital—I mean the soldiers—to have been attended by the leaders of the medical profession, and this would have cost the country nothing. The Hospitals Commission were informed by the Government that the services of the medical staff would be available for such a purpose. I think the attention of the minister should be directed to this matter. I am sorry that I have not with me the correspondence which took place between the Government and the Commission. I cannot but express the opinion that it is extremely unfortunate that the offer made by the Government was not accepted; its acceptance would have been a benefit to Canada and to the men who are obliged to be inmates of this hospital.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: My hon. friend's question does not come under the Militia Department at all. I will draw the attention of the Military Hospitals Commission to what he has said, as recorded in Hansard, and will endeavour to have an answer for him, to be available when the supplementary estimates of the department are brought up. I may say that there will be supplementary estimates. This small number of estimates will end at No. 97. We are at No. 87 now. If we can get through with these this evening we can possibly defer further discussion of any of these matters until the supplementary estimates are before the committee, when I hope to be able to answer by hon. friend about the Victoria hospital staff being at the disposal of the Commission.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I want to ask another favour of the minister. I will not expect a reply now, but if he or his deputy would write me a letter at some time it would be quite acceptable. This question has been before the House on more than one occasion. It is as to the exact disposition of our troops at the present time and the number of effective enlistments since the beginning of the war. I would like a statement showing: The total number of enlistments, the total number of effective enlistments, the number killed, the number who served overseas but have since returned to Canada, the number at present in England; the number in France; the number in Canada who have not yet gone overseas; and lastly the number in hospital in England. I understand that there was a Canadian wastage of 80,000 or 83,000 of men enlisted and who were obliged to drop out from one cause or another. If I had the figures covering these several items in detail I think it would give me the information I desire.

10 p.m.

Mr. KYTE: Has a military hospital been established in Sydney by the Hospitals Commission?
