Sir EDWARD KEMP: I am unable to speak with respect to the Military Hospitals Commission. It does not come under the department as far as buildings are concerned but any question regarding the Military Hospitals Commission I will endeavour to have answered when the supplementary estimates are on. Perhaps by that time we shall have somebody here who knows about the affairs of that commission.

Mr. KYTE: The Military Hospitals Commission was appointed by the Government and I assume it reports to the Minister of Militia.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: No, Sir James Lougheed is the chairman of the commission and I have reason to believe that the very voluminous report that was laid on the table of the House a few weeks ago by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) will contain all this information.

Mr. MACDONALD: Was that report printed?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I could not say, but I remember the Prime Minister laying it on the Table.

Mr. MACDONALD: Reports laid on the Table and not printed are no good.

Mr. MURPHY: On the page succeeding the one on which the items under discussion appear I observe that the details are given and among these details I notice an item of $40,000 for Connaught rifle range. I observe further that apparently there was no vote for any purpose in connection with that range last year. Would the minister explain what the money is required for?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: To pay the balance of an old contract.

Mr. MURPHY: To whom?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Bate & McMahon are the contractors.

Mr. MURPHY: Is this an ascertained amount for work done under the original contract, or is it for extra work since the contract was supposed to be completed?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: It is to finish up the work; it is an old contract.

Mr. MURPHY: Is it for work already done?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Yes, that is my information.

Mr. MURPHY: And this amount has been ascertained as being due to the contractors?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Yes.

Mr. MURPHY: Has a certificate been issued to the contractors for the work?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: No certificate has been given yet; it is an outstanding debt.

Mr. MURPHY: It has been ascertained as being due to the contractors?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Yes.

Mr. MURPHY: In connection with the same range I am informed there is a very large quantity of hay grown there, cut and disposed of—some 800 or 900 tons, I am informed. Could the minister say by whom that is disposed of, to whom sold, and to whom the proceeds go?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: There is no hay this year on this rifle range. It is let out by tender as pasturage to the highest bidder.

Mr. MURPHY: I was speaking more particularly of last year when there was hay cut and sold. To whom was it sold and what amount was received?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: It was sold by tender; it was a small sum—about $200.

Mr. MURPHY: My information is that the quantity is very much larger than that —700 or 800 tons of hay.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The figures are not here. I will make a note of it.

Halifax defences, $50,000; Esquimalt defences, $20,000.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Can the hon. minister explain the purposes of these two votes?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: That is the engineer services and works. There is an item for Halifax lumber yard of $60,000. This is for the erection of buildings on the new property purchased for a lumber yard. The present property belongs to the Imperial Government.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It was given to the Railway Department in connection with new railway terminals at Halifax. Upon this land there were some buildings which were occupied for military purposes. I presume this vote is for the purpose of erecting buildings for military purposes elsewhere?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Yes.

Mr. MACLEAN: Where were they to be erected? On the property purchased from Mr. Mitchell?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Yes.

Mr. MACLEAN: Are not the buildings there now quite sufficient?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: They are not suitable. They have to be replaced by better buildings.

Mr. MACLEAN: I have heard it rumoured that the Government purpose buying property next to the Mitchell property, the William Robertson & Son property.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: We have not any information on that particular point.

Mr. KYTE: Are the censors appointed by the Department of Militia and Defence?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Yes.

Mr. KYTE: Can the hon. minister say whether or not returned soldiers have been appointed to the positions of censors in the province of Nova Scotia?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Most of them were appointed at the beginning of the war, and I do not suppose many have been appointed since, but the instructions are that returned soldiers should be appointed, if available.

Mr. KYTE: There were very frequent changes in the censors at Sydney and Glace Bay, and I am interested to know whether or not the policy of appointing returned soldiers to Government positions has been carried out in the Department of Militia.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Yes, I can assure the hon. gentleman that the policy of appointing returned soldiers, whenever it is possible, has been carried out by the Department of Militia and Defence. A statement was laid on the Table in respect of that matter a short time ago. I think all the deparments were asked to furnish a return as to the employment of returned soldiers. The Militia Department furnished a return.

Mr. KYTE: There is a great number of returned soldiers in the county of Cape Breton, particularly in Sydney and Glace Bay. A club was organized a few months ago in Glace Bay for the entertainment of returned soldiers. The membership was probably about one hundred. I noticed in a list of censors employed at Louisburg the names of N. F. Cook, drawing $4.50 a day, aged 29; and W. D. Hayden, $4 a day, age 24. Mr. R. T. McDonald, Chief Censor, 41 years, was in receipt of $7 a day. Mr. Macdonald was formerly a merchant doing business at a place called Reserve Mines, and he had no special qualifications for the position of censor more than any other man with a fairly good education possesses. It seems to me it is rather extraordinary, when the Militia Department and this Government are making such efforts to get men to recruit for overseas service, that we have young men, such as Cook and Hayden, of the age of 29 and 24 respectively, drawing $4.50 and $4 per day, enjoying positions of censors, when there are probably 75 to 100 returned soldiers in the town of Glace Bay, and probably 150 returned soldiers in the constituency of South Cape Breton wandering about the streets without employment. They are unable in many cases to return to the avocations in which they were employed before the war, but many of them, to my knowledge, have sufficient attainments of scholarship to discharge those duties. I understand there is a movement on in Ottawa to release men from the Government service in order that their services may be available for overseas. I would certainly urge that the Minister of Militia and Defence should examine the staff of censors at Louisburg, and eliminate those young men who are vigorous, unmarried in most cases, having no dependents upon them, and enjoying these positions, and that he should appoint returned soldiers, who have given their services to the Empire and who have suffered in that service. When so much effort is being expended by this country to get men for overseas service, it seems to me the question of political patronage ought to be eliminated entirely. It is well known that, from the outbreak of the war up to the present time, party patronage has been rampant. All appointments, not only those of high degree, but those of very lowest degree, have been made entirely according to the exigencies of party patronage. I make a special appeal to the Minister of Militia and Defence to-night, in view of the efforts that are being made to establish a national Government in this country, to do away with political patronage. The idea of a national Government has in its base and origin the elimination of party patronage. I would like to see the Minister of Militia and his colleagues in the Government give some earnest of their intention to form a real national Government to carry on the war apart from the influence of party patronage, by beginning with the censors employed in the town of Louisburg, eliminating from that service the men who have been appointed by virtue of party patronage, and giving the appointments to returned soldiers. It is very well for us to orate at public meetings and national gatherings about what we should do for returned soldiers, but I am bound to say, as far as the constituency I represent is concerned, that the obligation of the Government to returned soldiers seems to end with a pious declaration as to the desirability of giving returned soldiers preference as regards public positions. The censorship in the county of Cape Breton has been a scandal for the last two or three years. There has been wrangling going on, and charges being made of selling those positions, and that appointments were made for consideration given to certain parties who claimed to have control of those appointments.

This afternoon I put a question to the minister wih regard to a gentleman who was very efficient censor on the staff at Louisburg, but whose services have been dispensed with. I asked whether his services had been dispensed with, and if so, for what reason. The answer given was that his services had been dispensed with to promote the efficiency of the service. It is common knowledge in that part of the country that this man's services were dispensed with because he refused to pay over a portion of his salary to the person claiming to control the party patronage and upon whose recommendation the appointment of this censor was made. The fact that I got such an incomplete and unsatisfactory answer to my question justifies the suspicion that this man's services were dispensed with for reasons which the Department did not desire to make public. But that is not the only case. Others in the employ of the Militia Department in the county of Cape Breton hold on their positions by virtue of certain payments they make out of their monthly stipend to the men who recommend their appointment. If we are going to have a National Government, it can only be by the elimination of this system of duress which has been imposed upon applicants for public positions in the past. I do not think the Government can satisfy the people that they are sincerely desirous of bringing about a National administration, during the period of the war, at all events, free from party and from patronage, when such conditions are allowed to exist in Nova Scotia without any attempt at remedying them. No appointment even of the lowest and most insignificant kind—the appointment, for instance, of a man to haul coal to the residents of the censor's staff in the town of Louisburg—can be made unless it has the recommendation of the person in charge of the patronage. Some time ago an officer in charge of a company down there was brought to task because he ordered the laundry to be sent to one laundryman in the town of Glace Bay rather than to another. He was summoned before the high and mighty personage who controls the personage and claims to speak for the Minister of Militia, and asked upon what authority he dared to put that patronage into the hands of a laundryman who was not in political sympathy with the Government at Ottawa. That is getting down about as low as we can get in matters of this kind. Perhaps there would be some excuse for the exercise of this prerogative while the Government was administering the affairs of the country upon a basis of party patronage, notwithstanding that we were in a period of war. But in view of the Government's assurance, and of the assurance of people who have authority to speak for the Government, that they are honestly determined to wipe out party patronage and to form a real National Government, they should give some proof of their sincerity by eliminating party patronage from the Militia Department in respect of such appointments as those to which I have referred.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I am under the impression—I speak subject to correction—that most of the men to whom my hon. friend refers were appointed in the early stages of the war and have now become experienced in the work. As positions become vacant, they ought to be filled by returned soldiers if suitable men can be found to do the work. I may say that up to May 10, 1917, 2,514 returned soldiers had been employed by the Department of Militia and Defence in various parts of the country. Wherever possible, we have tried to put returned soldiers in vacant positions, always giving them the preference, in fact, an order in council was passed to that effect. I am not familiar with the circumstances to which my hon. friend refers, but my own idea is that as soon as positions become vacant they should be filled by returned soldiers. Of course, that is subject to our being able to find men who are capable of doing the work. I suppose the work of censorship requires men of special qualifications; men of sufficient education, who can be thoroughly trusted.

Mr. KYTE: The men who now occupy these positions had no experience when they were appointed. In fact, on account of the character of the appointments, we were of the opinion that no particular qualifications were required. Any sort of business derelict who was of the proper party stripe was picked off the street and given one of these positions, without reference to qualifications. There are scores of returned soldiers in the constituency of South Cape Breton, who, to say the least, have qualifications equal to those of the men who are now on the staff, and whose names were given to me by the minister this afternoon. In view of the fact that there are on the staff young men between the ages of 24 and 29 years, without dependents, who received appointments by reason of political pull, the minister should not wait until vacancies occur; he should create vacancies by dismissing these men and appointing returned soldiers in their places. We require men at the front; let these men be relieved of their duties and let them enlist for overseas service and do their bit as these returned soldiers have done. When they come back they will then be in line for appointment and promotion by this Government.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I suppose the Military Service Bill will reach these men?

Mr. KYTE: I am afraid that the Military Service Bill will not reach some of the men if their services are required at home during the next election.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I would not say that.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister should not overlook the assertion of the member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte) that a man who was performing the duties of censor at the place mentioned was dismissed because he would not give a subscription to the man who had the patronage. The minister may lay down the rule that nobody may serve the country in war time and receive remuneration unless he is recommended by the man who has charge of the patronage, but neither he nor any other minister can justify the action of the person who has charge of the patronage in demanding money from a person who is employed by the Government. The minister would be taking a very peculiar position if he assumed responsibility for action of this kind without investigating the matter.

[Sir Edward Kemp.]

Mr. KYTE: Some time ago there was an agitation among the censors down there for an increase of pay. The ubiquitous patronage dispenser was Johnny-on-the-spot again. He said: for a certain sum of money I will go to Ottawa, and I will see that your salaries are increased. The story is that he came to Ottawa and upon his return he presented a bill for some $350. One of the censors refused to contribute to this amount, and was accordingly dismissed from the service. If the minister would like further information on that subject, I will give him, in confidence, the name of this young man, in order that he may satisfy himself with regard to the matter. The thing has become so scandalous that it has practically killed recruiting in that part of the country. If during the last year recruiting has not been as successful as it has been before, those are some of the reasons. In the face of those conditions, is it to be wondered at that men will not enlist for overseas services when they find that the money voted by Parliament to provide them with the equipment necessary for the positions which they occupy overseas is being frittered away by patronage dispensers, and that practically everything is sold to the man who pays the most for the position he is seeking at the hands of the Government?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I shall be glad if the hon. member will give me the name confidentially. I will treat it in the same way as he gives it to me.

Mr. MACDONALD: As has been frequently stated during the past three or four years, the ministers of this Government have been in the habit of disposing of matters of this kind in a casual way. The idea of trafficking in money for supplies in war time is incredible. I cannot conceive of any one at this time putting up with that kind of thing, and in view of the statement made by a responsible member of Parliament, the minister should immediately institute a thorough investigation into the whole matter and should assume the responsibility of dealing with such a case. It is all very well for hon. members opposite to appropriate all the patronage and place these matters on the lowest possible level, while speaking about idealism and appealing to the highest possible motives; but when a party undertakes to insist upon getting money from a public servant, and when, on his refusal, that man is dismissed, then the depth of infamy is reached, and the minister cannot by any casual method dispose of the matter. He ought to institute a full investigation, and if the statement is correct, the man who dispenses the patronage ought not to be permitted to exercise that power any longer.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The hon. member for Richmond has promised to give me the name confidentially. As soon as he does so I will have an investigation made in regard to the matter, treating the information furnished me by the hon. member as confidential.

Mr. KYTE: Now that the minister is in a penitent mood—I do not mean as regards any misdeeds committed by himself, but as regards misdeeds committed by his predecessors—will he give me a little more frank information in regard to the last question I asked? I asked if the services of a certain censor had been dispensed with, and, if so, for what reason? The answer given is: "To promote the efficiency of the service." That means something or it means nothing. If his services have been dispensed with in order to promote the efficiency of the service, the minister ought to be in a position to tell me frankly in what respect this man's services have been inefficient. I do not ask him to reply in the House so that the matter will be put on record, but I would like if he would show his good faith and determination to deal fairly with these matters in the future by telling me confidentially what the actual reasons for dismissal were, and what he means by this reply. If there is anything to the discredit of this gentleman, I do not want to have it appear on Hansard, because that would not be fair to him, but under all the circumstances, the minister ought to give me privately the information for which I am asking.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Was that question asked to-day?

Mr. KYTE: It was answered to-day.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The matter to which my hon. friend refers is the answer given to the department by the chief censor. I do not know anything about it.

Mr. KYTE: The answer is signed by the deputy minister.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: It was referred to him by the chief censor. That is the chief censor's answer to the deputy minister. The chief censor is a responsible officer. I should be surprised if he would make a reply that was untrue.

Mr. KYTE: I quite appreciate the fact that the minister would not have the correct information at the present time. Probably the chief censor would not feel justified in giving me what he might regard as confidential information, but the minister and I have discussed this matter with the common object of improving the conditions I am complaining of, and I ask if he will get the information from the chief censor and give it to me privately later on.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The hon. member for Richmond, as a responsible member of this House, has made certain statements here. I have told him, as far as one matter is concerned, that I will investigate it. I will also look into this matter; but so far as giving private information is concerned, I shall have to consider what course I shall take after investigation is made.

Mr. KYTE: Is the minister not prepared to give me any fuller information in regard to my question?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I did not say that; I said that I would look into the matter of which the hon. member complains.

Mr. KYTE: I trust I shall not be obliged to change the very good opinion which I had of the minister and which I expressed a few moments ago.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I can guarantee that my hon. friend will have no reason to change his opinion regarding myself.

Mr. KYTE: I trust I shall receive from the minister further proof of his determination to improve the conditions I have mentioned and to deal frankly with any member of this House who has an honest determination to assist him in improving those conditions.

Mr. OLIVER: I desire to bring to the attention of the minister a memorandum transmitted to me by the hon. A. C. Rutherford, Director of National Service for northern Alberta. He encloses a copy of a report made by a gentleman in Edmonton who was appointed by a committee of citizens to make a report. It is in regard to the needs of the families of soldiers who have been either disabled or killed. It appears that there is found to exist a somewhat serious condition amongst those families, either by reason of the inadequacy of the pension or in its terms being inapplicable to the cases. I noticed in a newspaper a few days ago that a poor woman, whose husband had been killed and who has several children, had been brought before a magistrate as being insane, and the decision was that her condition had resulted from lack of nutrition. The case was a very deplorable one and attracted a good deal of attention. I am afraid there are other cases, because this committee has been appointed, and this is a part of its report.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: That is in regard to pensions?

Mr. OLIVER: In regard to the condition of those dependents who would be entitled to pensions. May I take the liberty of reading the part that is material?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Certainly. I have nothing, however, to do with pensions. That matter comes under the direction of the Minister of Finance. The Pension Board is under the Finance Department; but if my hon. friend desires to place anything upon Hansard, I will direct the attention of the Minister of Finance to it.

Mr. OLIVER: As this matter relates very intimately to the question of soldiers. I am sure the minister will take a sympathetic interest.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Certainly.

Mr. OLIVER: The report says in part:

Firstly. I will deal with dependents who have been left with property on which there are unpaid balances or mortgages or other encumbrances. In every instance of cases of this class the correspondence shows quite clearly that the pensions being received are entirely inadequate to enable these people so situated to live, and to take care of the payments that are now and will in due course become due. It would appear, therefore, that we would be failing in our duty to those who have so nobly laid down their lives in the great cause for which our Empire is at war, if we, as a people, did not do all that was in our power to evolve some plan whereby these people could at least be protected against the very probable contingency of losing entirely what equity they possess in these several properties. I would suggest, therefore, that representations in regard to these cases be compiled and forwarded to the Government at Ottawa, together with a recommendation for their attention and assistance in financing, on the easiest terms possible, these people, until such time as they may be able to find an opportunity to dispose of the same in such manner as they will be able to obtain at least the amount of the equity that they possess therein.

Secondly. There are the cases of those who have no property interests, but who are dependent entirely for their subsistence on the moneys received as pensions from the Government. It is gleaned from the correspondence received that some are at present quite content with the present conditions. In the majority of cases, however, it is stated most emphatically that the amount of pension does not permit of the ordinary necessities of life even in the summer time, when, by reason of climatic conditions, less nourishment will suffice, produce is at its cheapest, and there is no need of warm clothing, light or fuel; but all express grave fears as to how they will be able to subsist when winter is here and there is fuel and other necessary comforts to be provided. In one or two instances, I find there are people who come under this class, but who are receiving some assistance, such as, for instance, being allowed to board with friends, and are, therefore, for the time being, comfortably cared for, but in no case of this kind is there assurance that assistance of this nature is likely to continue for any definite period.

In dealing with these cases under review it is evident that the health also has a great deal to do with the manner in which one can exist on the moneys so allowed. Then, again, you must consider the different temperaments of the people, as, while one may be content and happy with one standard of living, the same standard would not—by reason of health or otherwise—suffice for another, nor do I consider it right and proper that any widow or dependent who has made the greatest sacrifice that any human being can make in giving up their loved ones, should be asked to live in a lesser state of bodily and mental comfort than they were, at the time their loved ones enlisted, able to enjoy.

This is, I believe, a matter of sufficient importance to warrant a full, complete and immediate investigation on the part of our Government, and I would suggest, therefore, that you forward to Ottawa your request to that effect.

Thirdly. We were asked to consider the need of some provision being made for the children of soldiers who have by the loss of their father and mother become orphans, and in which case the allowance made by the Government is totally inadequate to clothe, feed, house and educate and in other ways care for them until they are fitted to take their place in the world as wage earners.

There are a few (I understand about 50) at present in this city and district, who come under this classification, and it would only be reasonable to assume that this number would in the near future be very materially increased.

These children should not become the objects of charity, but rather do I consider the Government should make some provision for them, either by paying to people in private homes and willing to undertake the work of rearing these children a sufficient remuneration for this duty—the children to be at all times under Government supervision—or to establish boarding-schools for this purpose.

Fourthly. Cases have been brought to our attention where Canadians have for some reason or other enlisted in the Imperial army, while their dependents have been for some time prior to the war and are still residents of this country. The pensions received from the Imperial Government represent a mere pittance as compared to the cost of living in this country. It would, therefore, appear only right and proper that our Government should make some provision for such cases as these, and any other special case that might from time to time arise.

That is the report made to the Committee of citizens by the gentleman whom they appointed for the purpose. It was transmitted to me by the Director of National Service, and I thought it only proper that it should be drawn to the attention of the House.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Was the whole report read by my honourable friend?

Mr. OLIVER: I read the material portions of it, leaving out the introductory matter.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I know the Minister of Finance has the question of pensions under consideration, and I will draw his attention to this report to-morrow.

Mr. KYTE: In regard to the question of patronage, I desire to call the minister's attention to two or three other instances just to show how small and petty this matter has become in our part of the country. Two or three days after the war started, a few R. C. R. men from Halifax were sent to the Marconi station. They accidently procured the services of a Liberal teamster to carry them and their luggage from the railway station to the Marconi station, a distance of three miles. Within a week the Liberal teamster was informed at the railway station that they could not give him any more goods for the R. C. R. men, as the trucking had been handed over to a Conservative teamster. Shortly after the commencement of the war, about 90 men of the 94th Militia were stationed at the Marconi Towers. Liberal merchants applied to be allowed to tender for supplies, but were refused. Every dollar's worth of supplies that these men required was bought, not by tender, but from Conservative merchants on the recommendation of the dispenser of patronage down there.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: What date was that?

Mr. KYTE: In 1914. The same thing occurred in the construction of barracks for these men. Barracks were to be built at the Marconi station for the accommodation of the 94th. Public tenders were not asked for although the official stationed in Halifax having this work in charge, was asked to have the specifications forwarded to public offices in the county. A local Conservative was given the contract without public tender, and no Liberals could procure work. Men were brought from a distance by teams daily, while just as good workmen living alongside Marconi Towers were actually refused work on account of their politics. One old man, a Liberal in politics, with a sick wife to support, was given the contract to truck coal to the barracks from the town of Louisburg, three miles distant, at a rate of $1.25 per ton. Last November or December, this job was taken from him, and a man about 35 years of age eligible for overseas service was given the contract at a rate of $1.50 per ton.

I say that if there is any doubt in the mind of any hon. gentleman as to why recruiting is falling off, at all events in the province of Nova Scotia, these incidents should furnish the answer. The people are thoroughly disgusted with the manner in which employment in connection with the Militia Department has been secured, and consequently no enthusiasm can be found amongst the men, who realize that the question of winning the war—the question of the service of men in battle line—depends entirely upon the question of patronage and party and political pull. I repeat, if we are going to have a change, if a national government is to be formed it is up to the Minister of Militia and Defence to see to it that the causes for the grievances complained of in that part of the country are completely eradicated.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: My hon. friend said that this incident in connection with the furnishing of supplies for the men stationed at the Marconi Towers occurred in 1914. Now the War Purchasing Commission was not appointed until 1915. Since it commenced operations, I can say from personal knowledge that there has been no patronage in any shape or form in connection with supplies of any kind. I have no knowledge whatever of the incidents to which my hon. friend has referred.

Mr. MACDONALD: When two battalions were being recruited in my county in 1916, the patronage was at the disposal of the person who has confidence of the minister. Naturally I protested to the Minister of Militia of that day—I think it was to my hon. friend himself—that tenders should be called for. The commission had been in operation for some months at that time, and there was some suggestion that quartermasters were supposed to do this and that, but it made no difference.

When it came to a question of the doctors who were to examine the recruits, a carefully prepared list was made of the doctors in the town, and no man was allowed to examine recruits in my county unless he was on the list. There was only one Liberal doctor in that list and he was in an out of the way part of the county where there was no other doctor. My hon. friend should not attempt to create the illusion that patronage is not in vogue, because it is, and it is connected with everything affecting his department. The men who have the patronage are consulted in all things, and every one who has had anything to do with recruiting knows it.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: My hon. friend knowns that the supplies for the troops in every province of the Dominion are purchased on tender. I do not know of the incident to which he refers but sometimes a regiment may be sent to a place suddenly without there having been sufficient time to get the tenders out, and for a week or so supplies may be purchased to feed the troops. There is a regular system of asking for tenders, and tendering, and that is the system which has been in vogue. There can be no possible question about it. The reports of the War Purchasing Commission are published. There are four volumes of them, and they have been placed upon the table of the House.

Headquarters and district staff, $205,500.

Mr. GRAHAM: The hon. minister told me the other night, in reference to two officers at Kingston, that there was a reduction of the staff. I have received information that some one has already been appointed in the place of one of those gentleman. Is my information correct?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: An officer of the Permanent Force has been detailed to fill one of the positions. He is on salary permanently, and there is no extra expense to the Government.

Mr. GRAHAM: Then, the work this other officer was doing must have been necessary?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Yes, the work was necessary.

Mr. GRAHAM: What was the name of the officer who got the appointment?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: He did not get the appointment. He is on the permanent staff.

Mr. GRAHAM: What is his name?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Colonel Maunsell.

Mr. GRAHAM: Where does he come from?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: He was formerly Director of Engineers' Service at headquarters staff in Ottawa. He came from New Brunswick originally. He is an old officer of the permanent staff.

Mr. MACDONALD: In the early part of the session a return was brought down which indicated that in 1911 there had been an increase in the permanent Civil Service in the Militia Department at Ottawa from 101 to 128, and in the temporary employees from 103 to 2,078; that altogether there had been 2,964 temporary Civil Service employees employed by the department since August 1, 1914; that the amount paid for salaries and expenses in the department had increased from $168,812.74 yearly to $1,454,361.14 yearly. I would like to know what portion of that amount was paid out of the regular military vote, and what portion of it was paid out of the war vote.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: All the temporary appointments are paid out of the war vote.

Mr. MACDONALD: What is the purpose of this vote we have before us?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Those are the officers of the headquarters staff; it is not the same thing.

Mr. MACDONALD: On June 18 an order of this House was made for a return giving the number of people employed in connection with the military district of Nova Scotia. This was one of the returns I was very anxious the minister should bring down, but he has not done so. I would like to have his assurance that it will be brought down to-morrow.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I thought it was amongst the returns I brought down.

Mr. MACDONALD: No.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: What is the title of it?

Mr. MACDONALD: On 18th June a question was asked which might have been answered. I complain of the minister's method in dealing with these things. Questions are asked, for instance, as to how many persons are employed at a certain place, and so on, and the minister says: "Stands as order for return." There is no reason why it should be so.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: When I brought these returns down yesterday, I asked the officer who has this matter in charge about them, and he told me that the one in respect to the officers at Halifax was nearly ready. Asking that a question stand for a return is not done with the idea of evading anything; it is because it takes so long to get the information, and the return is more or less voluminous. There is a tremendous amount of work involved, and you cannot get those things from outside places in a very short time.

Mr. MACDONALD: There should be an official in the department who would keep track of the persons employed in each military district. I do not think it is a very difficult question to answer.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The decentralization has affected it. I will bring it down as soon as possible.

Permanent force, $2,300,000.

Mr. MACDONALD: Will the minister be good enough to tell us how many persons are connected with the permanent force of Canada to-day and where they are located?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: There are 29 lieutenant-colonels, 30 majors, 73 captains, 152 lieutenants, 3 nursing sisters, 69 warrant officers, 292 staff sergeants, 296 sergeants, 167 corporals, and 1,745 privates, a total of 2,856.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Where are those men located? What does "Permanent Force" mean now?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: It is the same permanent force. They have been recruited up to strength to take the place of those who have gone overseas.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Where are they?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: They are doing garrison duty and instructional work at Halifax, Montreal, Esquimalt, Toronto, London and Kingston.

Mr. MACDONALD: With regard to the question of the friends of boys who are at the front desiring to get them home and desiring to get word of them, I do not think there is much good in going to the department. Would the minister be good enough to tell us if there is any way in which we can make application so that the matter can be dealt with speedily and effectively? Members of Parliament write to the department and we are told that the matter is not under the control of the department but that somebody overseas must be communicated with. Whom can we speedily apply to in a proper case?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I have no objection if the hon. gentleman will write to the minister. I get hundreds of letters every day regarding these matters. Letters from members of the House receive my personal attention as far as possible. There are rules by which we are guided in respect to the matter. It is very difficult to get any one back from the front. I have a staff who attend to all the requests that are made in a very courteous and efficient way. No matter who makes the request no matter from whom it comes, a reply is sent.

Mr. MACDONALD: I have no complaint to make but I am pointing out that we write to the minister and the minister writes to us that what we ask will be a difficult thing to accomplish. Is there any reason why a member of Parliament should not write to somebody on the other side in regard to a matter of this kind?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: If a letter is sent to the responsible minister, Sir George Perley, London, he will see that it gets every attention and that it reaches the proper official. Or, if a letter is sent through the department there it will receive attention. I fancy that most of these inquiries come to the department.

Mr. MACDONALD: In case of injury or death the friends apply to a member of Parliament and it would be an advantage if the member could communicate direct with somebody overseas without going through the roundabout process of first applying to the department here. Is there anybody that we could cable? A friend of mine had a boy killed, he wrote to me and I wrote to the department. I have no complaint to make of the department beyond the fact that the red tape of communicating with the department and through the department with the other side means a loss of time. Naturally, the friends who have been bereaved, or whose boys have been wounded, would like to have things done more expeditiously. Why should not we as members of Parliament know somebody over there to whom we could cable if necessary, or to whom the friends of the dead or wounded could cable, for some definite information. Because, when a boy is wounded, his friends do not know what his condition is and moments seem like hours, days and years. Could not the minister arrange that we could communicate with somebody over there?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: When matters are sufficiently urgent, and when it is not thought desirable to communicate by ordinary letter, cables are sent making inquiries either through the records branch or the adjutant's branch or direct from my own office through my own private secretary.

11 p.m.

Mr. MACDONALD: A boy is wounded and his parents get the stereotyped advice from the department that so-and-so is wounded. Amongst the multitude of men that we are paying for in connection with this matter, both here and on the other side, is there not somebody whose business it would be to give advice in a particular case where a boy is missing or is wounded and his friends at home are unable to tell what has become of him or where he is? I wish the minister would arrange something of that kind.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I would think that the deputy minister over there, Colonel Walter Gow, would attend to any request of that kind.

Mr. MACDONALD: If the minister would take some steps to have this done it would be a very great convenience.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I will take the matter up and see that an understanding is arrived at that any one cabling shall receive every consideration in that regard.

Royal Military College, $185,000.

Mr. MACDONALD: I am glad to see that the minister has increased the vote for the college this year. I think every Canadian ought to be proud of the splendid work that is being done by the college and of the boys who have gone from the college to the war. There is an extra amount of $25,000 proposed. Would the minister explain how it is proposed to expend this money?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: This is to provide for the extra cost of clothing and supplies largely for the cadets.

Mr. GRAHAM: How many cadets are there?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: There are twenty extra to provide for this year.

Salaries and wages, $250,000.

Mr. MACDONALD: What number of men are employed under this vote?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I have all the names here, covering a good many pages, but it has not been totalled up. Possibly the number would be about 400.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What is meant by "boat crews, Halifax"?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: That is for the water transport, salaries and wages. I have a list of the names here and the wages. There are pilots, a caretaker, chief engineers, assistant engineer, boatmen, store accountant, master lighter, deck hands, stokers and messengers. The total amount is $19,978.75.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is for the services of men in connection with steamers for use for military purpose in the harbour, doing patrol work?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: And carrying provisions and troops to McNab's Island, etc.

Schools of instruction, $150,000.

Mr. MACDONALD: What is this for?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The transportation of officers who have to be gazetted for the Canadian militia previous to appointment to the Expeditionary Force is charged to this vote because they must belong to the Militia Department before joining the Expeditionary Force.

Survey, $40,000.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is this amount likely to be expended this year?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Yes, the survey work is going on all the time. The staff and plant are there. We have a very efficient staff for work.

Transport and freight, $50,000.

Mr. GRAHAM: Am I right in supposing the reduction in that amount is on account of there being no training camp?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Yes, and the work is going on in connection with the militia.

Mr. MACDONALD: Why do you want a vote of $50,000 to transport the active militia? Would that not come out of the war fund?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I have the details here. There are various items for the transport and travelling expenses of the permanent force, attending schools of instruction, and so on.

Mr. MACDONALD: You have no active militia now to transport. It is the Canadian Expeditionary Force that is instructed and not the active militiamen.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: They must be qualified as officers of the active militia before they are made officers of the Canadian Expeditionary Force.

Mr. MACDONALD: I know of a case in which the commanding officer of militia has had his recommendations turned down with regard to boys who wanted to go to the Schools of Instruction. That occurred in connection with my own regiment in my own county, where the major had made recommendations and they were disregarded, and the recommendation of the man who had the patronage, who never took the slightest interest in the militia in his life, and never had anything to do with it, was acted upon. Nobody could be permitted to go, or get his instruction, unless he was recommended by the man who had the patronage in my county. I hope that practice will be stopped. I know it of my own knowledge, or I would not say it. I hope the minister will keep that in view.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: That is something which had not been drawn to my attention, nor to the attention of my colleagues.

Mr. MACDONALD: Competent commanding officers, who have a thorough training in regard to regimental matters, are told that their recommendations must be disregarded and the recommendation of the man who never took any interest in military matters is acted upon.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I am sure that does not prevail through other parts of the country, or anything approaching it.

Training areas and lands for military purposes, $200,000.

Mr. GRAHAM: Is that to buy new land?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: These estimates were made some time ago. It is not at all likely that we shall need the whole of this vote, and there is no intention to spend it all. It is to settle some outstanding claims in connection with Valcartier and Petawawa camps, which are now before the Exchequer Court.

Mr. MACDONALD: What was General Gwatkin's rank prior to his being appointed General Officer Commanding?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: He was an officer in the British army.

Mr. MACDONALD: What corps was he attached to?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: He was Director of Training under General McKenzie.

Mr. MACDONALD: Was he made a General by my hon. friend's predecessor?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I am informed that he was.

Mr. MACDONALD: He was not made a General by any British authority?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I understand that he is not a General in the British army.

Mr. GRAHAM: The 156th Battalion was broken up the day after it got to England, but it was reorganized some weeks afterwards. I rather suspected that the reason for its reorganization was the fact that the Minister of Finance was over there at the time; the battalion partially comes from his county. That battalion was organized in Leeds and Grenville county, and an officer, Lt.-Col. Bedell, was brought back from overseas to take charge. That battalion is now reorganized, but Lt.-Col. Bedell is not with it. It has a new commanding officer, Lt.-Col. Graham, I think, formerly of London. Nearly all the officers who went over with the battalion have been disposed of otherwise. Of course, there is considerable comment with regard to this on the part of persons who assisted in raising that battalion; in fact I myself had something to do with it.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Is the regiment intact?

Mr. GRAHAM: I think so. It is being used as a depot battalion; they draft men from it occasionally. It is attached to the Fifth Division, a portion of which is in England. Could the minister furnish me with information as to why nearly all the officers who went over with this battalion have been attached to other units and new officers placed in charge?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I shall get the history of the whole thing for my hon. friend and send it to him.

Civil Government—Department of Militia and Defence, salaries, including H. M. Garrison at $1,850, $187,700; contingencies, $19,500.

Mr. MACDONALD: Who are the two officers in the First Division, subdivision A?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Mr. Beard, in charge of the Records Branch, and Mr. Lemieux, Superintendent of Stationery and Printing.

Mr. MACDONALD: Where were they before?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Mr. Lemieux is a very old employee of the department; he has seen 27 years service. The material over which he has control amounts in value to $1,500,000; before the war it amounted to only $100,000. He is an excellent official. Mr. Beard has under him about 630 clerks. The Records Office is in the building on the corner of Elgin and Slater streets. I invite any hon. gentleman who would like to see for himself how these records are kept to step in there when the staff is at work. Mr. Beard is an excellent officer; he has been very much overworked since the war began.

Mr. MACDONALD: What is the position held by Major Margeson?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: He is on a Board of Review in the Assigned Pay and Separation Allowance Branch, associated with another officer. The duties of these officers are to investigate claims of an unusual or irregular character, which, in a sense, may not be covered by the different orders in council that have been passed with respect to separation allowance. Both these officers, I believe, are returned soldiers.

Mr. MACDONALD: I would like to have the assurance of the minister that he will bring down that return in reference to Halifax.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I will see that it is brought down.

Mr. MACDONALD: Has the minister had any word from Sir George Perley since this afternoon in regard to the Bruce report? Or has he reconsidered the question and decided to bring it down?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The cable was sent. I have not had any conversation with the Prime Minister since.

Mr. GRAHAM: The minister does not need to send for the information. He has it; it is the Prime Minister who has not the information. As we have put through these estimates so expeditiously, if anything in reference to war expenditure should occur to the minds of any hon. members, I assume that on the supplementary estimates we shall be at liberty to discuss such matters?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Certainly.

Progress reported.

On motion of Sir Edward Kemp, the House adjourned at 11.40 p.m.

Thursday, August 2, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

SPECIAL COMMISSION ON RAILWAYS.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): I beg to lay upon the Table a return to an Order of the House moved for by the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) with regard to correspondence exchanged between the Board of Trade of the city of Quebec and the Prime Minister on the subject of the report of the Special Commission on Railways.

THE CANADIAN RAILWAY SITUATION.

FINANCIAL STATEMENTS OF G. T. P. AND C. N. R. PRESENTED BY THE MINISTER OF FINANCE.

Hon. Sir THOMAS WHITE (Minister of Finance): In connection with the resolutions relating to the Canadian Northern Railway Company and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, of which I gave notice yesterday and which appear in the Votes and Proceedings, I beg to lay on the Table, for the information of the House, the following financial statements:

In the matter of the Canadian Northern Railway system:

Balance sheet, June 30, 1916.

Statement of securities issued and fixed charges, June 30, 1917.

Statement of liabilities, June 15, 1917.

Statement of equipment account.

List of securities for loans.

Gross and net earnings, June 30, 1917.

Comparison of earnings, 1915, 1916 and 1917.

Statement re capital expenditure and betterments, year ending June 30, 1917.

Statement as to mileage.

In the matter of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway system:

Statement showing bonds and other securities authorized, issued and outstanding, and the net proceeds therefrom; also interest payable during the period from July 1, 1917, to June 30, 1918.

Statement showing details of estimated cash requirements for the period from July 1, 1917, to June 30, 1918; the estimated surplus from the operation of the system and the net amount of aid required for the coming year.

I beg to move that these documents be printed, and that, for this purpose, Rule 74 be suspended in relation thereto.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does the minister intend to lay on the Table any correspondence with the Canadian Northern Railway company which has led up to the proposal which he has submitted to the House?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There is no correspondence; the matter has been taken up by personal interview. The documents which I have laid on the table of the House have been given me by the Secretary of the Canadian Northern railway and the Vice-president of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway company respectively.

Mr. GERMAN: Does the minister know whether these statements differ in any material particular from the statements found in the report of the Royal Commission? In that report these matters are gone into very fully.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: These are statements presented by the company and certified by the auditors of the company. Whether they differ in detail, or the extent to which they differ in detail, I am not prepared at this moment to say. They are, however, official statements of the company which I lay before Parliament as such in order that they may be printed for the information of the members.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Yesterday my hon. friend said that the Government had information that the pledgees of certain stock of the company would adopt the suggestion involved in the resolutions. Is my hon. friend prepared to lay that information on the Table?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There are no further written documents than those which I have laid on the Table. I stated to the House a moment ago that these negotiations have been carried on between officials of the two companies and members of the Government. I said yesterday that the owners and pledgees of the stock would, I was confident, be prepared to enter into the agreement referred to in the resolutions.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: All this was verbal?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: All our negotiations have been oral.

Motion agreed to.

FORBIDDEN CIRCULATION IN CANADA.

REPORT OF SURGEON GENERAL FOTHERINGHAM AS TO STATEMENTS IN "THE FIDDLERS."

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I should like to convey to the House the report of Surgeon-General J. T. Fotheringham with regard to a matter which has led to inquiry in the House, that is, the circulation in Canada of a book called "The Fiddlers." Cablegrams have been despatched to Great Britain for further information. No replies have as yet been received, but in the meantime I thought it desirable that the report of Surgeon-General Fotheringham to the Minister of Militia and Defence should be presented to Parliament for the information of hon. members.

Sir Robert Borden read this report:

Memorandum.

Department of Militia and Defence.

Ottawa, 30th July, 1917.

The Honourable the Minister,
Dept. of Militia and Defence.

Reference to Canada and Canadian troops in "The Fiddlers."

Sir,—I have the honour, in reply to your submission to me of pamphlet marginally noted and of certain attached communications, to submit the following for your consideration:

1. The pamphlet is, apparently, meant to attract attention to alleged shortcomings on the part of the British Government in the matter of temperance legislation, and would appear to affect Canada only in so far as Canadian troops are held up therein as horrible examples of the result of certain alleged failures on the part of the British Government.

2. Without being meant as an attack on Canadian authorities or Canadian troops its statements reflect very seriously upon the morals and military efficiency of Canadian troops. It is suggested, please, that if allowed to reach the Canadian public these statements should be accompanied by a full and definite refutation in the public interest.

Harm has already been done by similar irresponsible and exaggerated statements from other sources. Alarm and anxiety have been aroused in some quarters in Canada altogether out of proportion to what the facts of the case would warrant, and such ill results could not fail to follow upon the publication of the pamphlet in question unless it were accompanied by a statement of the truth, which is altogether different from the picture presented in the pamphlet in question.

3. Statements occur in the pamphlet reflecting on the Canadian troops as to (a) alcoholism, (b) venereal disease. These are all grossly exaggerated and overdrawn. The general impression left upon a reader could not fail to be erroneous. The picture is entirely contrary to my own observation and experience during two years of daily contact with all ranks, for six months in England and for eighteen months on our western front.

A.—As Regards Drink:

It is a gross libel on the men and a great unkindness to their relatives at home to set forth isolated examples (which are not now called in question) without stating percentage and numbers of troops involved and showing the real prevalence of the conditions charged.

(a) It is equally unfair to quote as representative of present conditions the state of affairs at the outset of the war, and particularly at Salisbury Plain,—if for no other reason than that the majority of the First Contingent were British born and left but few relatives in Canada.

(b) Positive evidence to the contrary may be quoted as follows:

Major General John Hughes in reporting on the 28th June, 1917, to the Adjutant General, Ottawa, upon the subject of his visits and inspections made during the month of May last in England and France states as follows:

"I asked for the crime sheets of the last month in every camp and was pleased to find that for drunkenness there was less than one case per thousand men per week, and this was not in any one camp alone but the average of all camps in England."

This statement applies for the month of April, 1917.

Major General S. B. Steele, C.B., M.V.O., general officer commanding troops, Shorncliffe, on the 3rd May, 1917, reports as follows to the general officer commanding Canadian overseas military forces, London:

"With an average occupation strength of 20,000 troops, both Imperial and Canadian, the cases of drunkenness work out an average of three per thousand per week. This average has during the past year or more neither increased nor decreased, although at times there have been from 40,000 to 50,000 troops in the Shorncliffe area."

These figures, it will be noted, apply to a period of more than a year.

Col. C. A. Smart, officer commanding Canadians, Shorncliffe, reports on the 1st May, 1917, for the Shorncliffe area as follows:

"Average daily strength, including all hospitals, for the month of April	31,296
Average daily occupation strength for the month of April	19,748
Total number of cases of drunkenness for the month of April	74
Percentage of cases against total strength	.0023
Percentage of cases against occupation strength	.0038"

You will note from the above that the actual percentage of cases for one month is less than one-half of one per cent on the actual occupation strength, and I am sure that you will agree that this is a particularly gratifying state of affairs.

General Steele also informs me that Colonel Burns-Bogg, the town commandant, Folkestone, has expressed to him his admiration for the splendid behaviour of the Canadian troops in this area and he considers that it is not excelled in any other part of Great Britain.

(c) It should be noted that cases of drunkenness, few as they are, are to be charged, not against the camp canteens but against licensed places outside the camp lines and under civil control. These, of course, are placed out of bounds by the military authorities whenever they appear to be the occasion of disorder among the troops. The camp canteens supply only beer and being under strict military control with very severe limitation of the hours of sale are, in my judgment, a safeguard instead of a menace in areas where licensed houses not under military control exist to which the troops may go from camp. I may add that this is the practically unanimous opinion at the front.

(d) The rum ration at the front.

Reference is made in the pamphlet to this topic. It is true that with the best of control unfortunate incidents will occasionally occur due to pilfering from the battalion issue of rum before it reaches the men in the trenches. This is, from my experience at the front, a very rare occurrence. The restrictions surrounding the issue are such that ill effects are practically controlled, and, speaking as A.D.M.S. of a division at the front, it is my conviction that during the six months at least of bad weather it is necessary for the efficiency of the men that rum be available for special issue on occasions considered by commanding officers to justify it. These requests from commanding officers go to brigade headquarters and are by them submitted for approval or otherwise to the A.D.M.S. of the division, upon which approval the supply officer is authorized by divisional headquarters to make the issue. It is not issued to all ranks but to those bodies of men who are in special need. For instance a Divisional Ammunition Column or a supply train are not issued with rum on the same conditions as apply in the case of an infantry or particularly a pioneer battalion who have been all night at work in the rain and mud. In no case is the issue a matter of routine. It should also be stated that the regulations as they now exist are the result of two years' experience and are much more stringent as well as better observed than was the case in the earlier months of the war.

(e) Figures from Britain showing the number of arrests for drunkenness, also number of troops concerned, have been cabled for.

(f) It may be noted as additional general evidence of the good conduct of the Canadian troops in England that on May 29, 1917, Major General G. B. Hughes, General Officer Commanding 5th Division, wrote as follows to Major General Sir Richard Turner, V.C., K.C.M. G., D.S.O., General Officer Commanding Canadian Forces in Britain:

My dear General:—

I am anxious to inform you that this division held a sporting meeting in Godalming on the 24th of May, at which there were present between eight and ten thousand men of the Division, as well as a large number of the people of Godalming.

There was not a single case of drunkenness or disorder of any kind reported either by the military police or the civil police of Godalming, or any of the other villages on that occasion.

Yours faithfully,

(Sgd.) G. B. Hughes."

(g) Insanity.

The pamphlet in question contains on page 45 the following statement:

"A doctor from a Canadian Hospital said a large percentage of their troops had had to be sent back to Canada rendered permanently insane through the action of alcohol. Facts in 'Daily' News, Oct. 31, 1916."

This statement gives one a fair idea of the credibility of the pamphlet as a whole. I can of my own knowledge give it an absolute denial. Only a small number of Canadian troops have been returned insane. The vast majority have recovered or will do so, and alcohol has played a part in only a small number of cases. The Military Hospitals Commission reports on July 31 as follows:—

An analysis of fifty cases at the Ontario Military Hospital at Cobourg dated February 1, 1917, shows that in only two cases does alcohol appear as the apparently dominant factor although there are in all thirteen in which alcoholism figures as an important factor either in precipitating or modifying the condition, in addition to other more predominant abnormal, primary conditions. The total number of cases so far returned to Canada, as shown by the records of the M.H.C is only 222. It will be borne in mind that the total number of recruits enlisted is 406,209 to March 31, 1917.

The following comments are made by the Medical Superintendent of the Military Hospitals Commission:—

"Eleven of these were heavy drinkers, but the condition was directly due to alcohol in only five of the eleven. In the other six of the eleven, the mental condition itself was probably responsible for drinking.

The total roll of returned insane men is not yet complete, insanity, feeble mindedness and specific diseases of the nervous system taken together, but not including epilepsy make up about 2 per cent of all returned invalids. Relatively speaking, of the returned soldiers suffering from nervous or mental disability there are very few cases traceable directly to alcoholism.

Faithfully yours,

(Sgd.) Alfred Thompson."

It may be assumed that less than 300 cases of insanity have been returned so far to Canada since the beginning of the war.

B.—Venereal Disease.

(a) While it is true that no one cause contributes more strongly to venereal disease than indulgence in drink, the statements made with regard to the prevalence of venereal disease in the Canadian troops which are used to bolster up the general charges made against the liquor trade in Great Britain are all characterized by the same gross overstatement and unfair use of figures. For instance, on page 47 a quotation is given from a speech given by Col. Sir Hamar Greenwood in Parliament on April 23, 1917, to the effect that in fourteen months 7,000 Canadians had undergone treatment for venereal disease from one of the three Canadian camps in Britain. This statement appears in another form on another page of the pamphlet as follows: "The Government has given us figures for the army at home last year and they are 43 per 1,000. There are 7,000 cases in one Canadian camp alone." It will be noticed that the length of time, fourteen months, in which the alleged number of cases occur, is omitted, and that no statement is made as to the number of thousands of Canadian troops which had passed through that camp in the course of fourteen months without venereal disease. It is regretted that accurate figures as to the incidence of venereal disease among Candians in Britain and France are not available in Canada, but, speaking generally, they are about the same for Canadian troops in England and France as in Canada. For instance in the month of January, 1917, the percentage due to venereal disease of the total sickness among the troops in Canada was 1.8 which is as high as in England.

(b) The situation in Canada may be stated as follows:—

Total number of recruits C.E.F. to March 31, 1917	406,209
Total cases venereal disease admitted in Canada in same period	10,232
Percentage of venereal disease cases to number of recruits	2.5

That is in every 1,000 recruits enlisted 25 developed venereal disease in nearly three years, or about 8 per annum.

From these figures it is fair to conclude as follows:—

In civil life the 1,000 recruits may be said to represent a population of about 4,000 made up as follows:—

Unmarried men	500
Married men	500
Wives	500
Children, 5 per family	2,500
Total	4 000

A civil population of 4,000, if incidence of venereal disease were the same as for the 1,000 men in the C.E.F. which is taken as the unit, would then have 8 cases of venereal disease in the year, or twenty-five in three years period. There is no doubt that the actual incidence in civil life, particularly in villages, towns or cities is far in excess of these figures, although no figures from civil sources are available, the disease not being registerable under civil authority.

4. It is submitted, please, that the above criticisms on the character of the pamphlet in question are fair and represent the general unreliability of the pamphlet as a whole. If I may be permitted to express an opinion based upon my personal knowledge of the situation among the Canadian troops in France and Britain as regards alcoholism and venereal disease it would be that the circulation of statements such as fill the pamphlet in question, among the people of Canada is most undesirable, and should be prevented by any measures open to the authorities, having regard to the interests both of the troops themselves and of the Canadian public.

I have the honour to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,

(Sdg.) J. T. Fotheringham,

Surgeon-General,

D.M.S. Invalids.

Reference is made in this report to certain information in respect of which inquiry has been made in Great Britain. In addition to that, other messages bearing on the subject have been despatched, to which no reply has yet been received. The replies will be expedited as much as possible, and when they are received a further statement on the subject will be made.

PAPERS PRESENTED.

Copies of orders in council referring to officers reverting to lower rank in order to proceed to the front.—Sir Edward Kemp.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by asterisks).

MR. G. A. DILLON.

* Mr. DELISLE:

1. Is Mr. G. A. Dillon an employee of the Government?
2. If so, since what date has he been employed?
3. What salary does he receive and what are his duties?
4. Did he pass a Civil Service Examination?

Mr. DOHERTY:

1. Yes.
2. January 4, 1912.

3. Salary, $3,200. His duties are to purchase supplies for all the Canadian penitentiaries. Major Dillon is also acting as supply officer for the internment operations and receives for his services as such, under an order in council, the pay attached to the rank of captain in the Canadian militia.

4. As an officer of the Outside Service, he is not subject to examination by the Civil Service Commission.

THE BOAT WILFRID C.

Mr. COPP:

1. Has the boat Wilfrid C. been purchased by the Government?
2. If so, from whom was said boat purchased, when was said purchase made, and what was paid?
3. If said purchase has been made, what use is to be made of said boat by the Government?
4. Has the Government purchased provisions for said boat?
5. If so, from whom were said provisions purchased, and of what do they consist?

Mr. HAZEN:

Yes.

The Shepody Navigation Company, Limited, 21st July, 1917; $7,000.

Used in connection with the naval defence of Halifax harbour.

It will probably be necessary to purchase a small quantity of provisions for the use of the crew of this vessel on the voyage from Moncton to Halifax. As the vessel was only purchased a few days ago, sufficient time has not elapsed for a report on the subject to be received in the department. Any such transactions will be of small value, however, as the victualling will be done through the usual channels once the ship reaches Halifax.

MENTIONED IN DESPATCHES.

Mr. WALLACE:

1. How many officers have been "Mentioned in Despatches" who have not left Canada?
2. What are the names of such officers?
3. By whom were such officers recommended?
4. Is the term, "Mentioned in Despatches", used exclusively for valour on the field of battle, or is it also used for those performing office work or other duties in Canada?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1. None.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. Answered by No. 1.
4. The term " Mentioned in Despatches " is reserved for service in the field.

J. P. JAFFRAY.

Mr. PROULX:

1. What position is filled by one J. P. Jaffray, former editor of the Galt Reporter, in the Department of the Interior?

[Mr. Doherty.]

2. Where is he stationed and what are his duties?
3. Is the Government aware as to whether or not this man is engaged in writing political articles as well as performing his other duties?
4. If not, will the Government make an inquiry?

Mr. ROCHE:

1. Canadian Government immigration agent.

2. Philadelphia, Pa., U.S.A. Encouraging immigration to Canada of farmers, farm labourers and female domestic servants and examining ocean port arrivals at Philadelphia destined to Canada.

3. No information on this point.

4. Yes.

CANADIAN ARMY BOOTS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. M. GERMAN: I desire to call the attention of the Government to an extract from the London Times of June 24th, published in the Winnipeg Evening Tribune of Friday last, as I think it is in the public interest for me to do so. The extract reads:

Remarkable allegations of the waste of public money were made at the Stratford Police Court yesterday, when a dealer named Samuel Schneiderman, of Broadway, Barking, was summoned for being in possession of thirteen pairs of Canadian military boots.

On June 5, Sergeant Mitchell of the Canadian military police, went to defendant's premises and saw a number of boots bearing the stamp of the Canadian military authorities, but not the condemnation stamp. The police were called in, and defendant said he bought them with others from a Mr. Jacobs, Sandy Row, London. Mr. Jacobs was seen. He said he had sold boots to defendant, and they were part of large quantities bought from Government auctioneers.

For the defence, Jacobs yesterday said he bought thousands of pairs of boots through Bacon's auctioneers to the Government. Those produced were part of consignments obtained in this way. He paid sometimes as little as 7d. a pair for boots, sometimes as much as 2s. Those produced he bought at 1s. 4d.

The Chairman: No wonder the expenditure of the country goes up.

The Bench dismissed the case, but stated that, in view of the evidence it was a matter that the authorities should go into.

Now the matter has been brought to their attention, will the Government have this glaring case of extravagance investigated?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: A despatch somewhat similar to this was sent out to Canada and published in the Canadian press early in June. When I saw it, I cabled to the proper officials in London to ascertain the facts. The reply I received was that these were worn-out boots that were of no use for military purposes.

Mr. GERMAN: They were not marked as condemned boots?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: They were condemned boots. They had been discarded as not fit for the soldiers to wear any longer. The condemned mark may not have been on them.

WOMEN MUNITION WORKERS IN TORONTO.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. GEORGE W. KYTE (Richmond): I desire to call the attention of the Minister of Labour to the following article which appeared in the Toronto Daily Star of July 27th:

"They are killing us off as fast as they are killing the men in the trenches", declared the spokeswoman of a deputation of women munition workers who came into The Star Office yerterday morning. "We are working six days a week from seven till seven and on Sundays from seven till four, and now they want us to work fourteen hours a day by coming back three nights a week to work two extra hours. We just have half an hour for lunch and half an hour for supper."

There were seven of them and they had just been dismissed from a munition factory in which they had most of them been working for over a year, because they refused to work on the fourteen-hour shift. Two wore the six months' munition workers' badge, and one wore the munition workers' good service medal as well. Two had husbands at the front and one had lost a brother in the trenches, while three other brothers were on active service.

Skin Off Hands.

" Look at our hands" cried one black-eyed maiden, thrusting out hands blackened with oil and machinery and from which the skin had peeled in big patches. They were all saturated with oil, and told of removing oil-soaked garments at night to replace them in the morning because they had no time for laundry work.

"One of the girls was too sick to come with us", they said, "She has been working five nights night work and is just dying on her feet. The oil has got into her system."

"We refused to work the fourteen hours yesterday, and when we went in this morning we were told we could go. We are going to see the Mayor about it."

The deputation then went up to the Mayor's office, but he was not in and they were referred to the Imperial Munitions Board. Sir Joseph Flavelle was in Ottawa, and Mrs. Fenton, Supervisor of Female Labour in munitions factories, was out of town. Mr. Mark Irish, to whom the deputation was then referred, had not time to-day to make public the result of the interview.

One Dropped Dead.

"There was one of us dropped dead on the street car the other day", said one of the deputation, "Though they put it down to heart trouble. And I know another who was so tired and dizzy that when she was going home from work she fell off the car and died later. And another the same way that walked right in front of a car and was so badly hurt that she is disfigured for life. I tell you we can't stand it."

I would like to ask the minister if his attention has been called to the conditions of women workers in munition factories in Toronto as described in this article, and if steps have been taken to ameliorate these conditions.

Hon. T. W. CROTHERS (Minister of Labour): I have no information as to any such conditions as those read by my hon. friend. I may add I do not believe they exist. It will have been noticed by hon. members that the statements are very general in character. If my hon. friend will get some particulars, and the names of employers in Toronto who are said to have treated their employees as set forth in what my hon. friend has read, I would be very glad to inquire into the matter.

Mr. KYTE: Was the Minister of Labour aware before to-day of the publication of this article?

Mr. CROTHERS: No, I was not.

Mr. KYTE: Does the minister think it is the duty to institute some inquiry without waiting for me to make a charge?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The subject is not now open for debate.

COAL SUPPLY IN THE MARITIME PROVINCES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. WILLIAM PUGSLEY (St. John): I would like to ask the Government in regard to the transportation of coal to the Maritime Provinces, which is a matter of very grave importance. I have in mind more particularly the port of St. John, where there is very serious anxiety with regard to the anthracite coal supply for the coming winter. As my right hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce knows, anthracite coal is brought from the United States. I may tell him it is only worth about $6 per ton in New York, whereas the price in St. John is about $15 per ton. It is alleged this high price is due to the great cost of transportation. Within the last few days the announcement was made that the Government has offered to place certain steamers at the disposal of, I presume, the municipal authorities or those engaged in the coal trade, for the purpose of transporting coal from the mines to the city of St. John. The question is of such great importance that I think a definite statement should be made, and I would ask my right hon. friend, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, if he will inform the House as to what arrangements, if any, have been made; what steamers have been placed at the disposal of the authorities; and what are the rates of freight?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: As my hon. friend knows a Fuel Controller has been appointed and he has been at work on the coal problem for the last three weeks or more. He has been given Dominion-wide authority and scope, and has been making, and is continuing to make, all the proper inquiries with reference, first, to the possibility of obtaining the supply of coal that is necessary. I am speaking of anthracite coal at the moment, but his authority also extends to soft or bituminous coal. He is making inquiry as to the quantity which will probably be produced in Canada for home consumption, and, consequently, as to the quantity which will be required in order that normal and legitimate demands may be met. He has visited Washington, and other points in the United States, has been in communication with the responsible authorities there, and is assured, as I know, of co-operation in so far as they are concerned. He has appointed an agent in the United States to act under him, whose duty it is to report upon the supplies of coal, at what points those supplies are available, the prices at which they can be obtained, and as to transportation facilities from the points of production to the Canadian border. At the present time this gentleman is visiting the important centres in Canada with the Food Controller, and having conferences with municipal authorities and coal suppliers. He is gathering all possible information with regard to the quantities required, and the methods of transport.

Other steps are being taken in Canada to provide for the transport of coal brought in from the United States, after it reaches the border, and to provide for its distribution in Canada. To that end the Fuel Controller is in conference with the chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners, and with the different railway companies. I understand arrangements have been made looking toward the timely and efficient distribution of the coal after it reaches the border. So much with reference to the general situation.

The anthracite situation in Halifax and St. John is, as my hon. friend has said, somewhat different, because it is practically impossible to bring coal in there by rail, and the ordinary way hitherto has been by boat. At the present time facilities for water carriage are very scarce, and very difficult to obtain. It is true that the disparity of cost as regards St. John and Halifax is I think mainly due, not so much to different prices at the points of production, although in obtaining coal from independent companies in New York there is a difference in the prices paid as compared with prices at the point of production where the coal is taken up by the railway companies.

The matter of freight comes in there. Rates are very high. Schooners and small vessels which take lumber from St. John and which hold themselves open to bring back freight, have their own rates of charges and they are, I understand, very high. How to obtain the necessary transport is a difficult question. The fuel controller has appointed an aide in St. John and another in Halifax. The gentleman in St. John is Mr. Frink and he with committees, is working upon the problem there. I am not aware that the Government have any steamers that can be placed at the disposal of parties in St. John and Halifax for the carriage of this coal. I would be inclined to think that they have not. It is also difficult for the Government to obtain vessels for that purpose. In the main, the transport will have to be arranged, I think, by the parties interested in obtaining coal, aided as far as they possibly can be, by the fuel controller and such agents as he is working in co-operation with. I have not seen the fuel controller for the last two or three days. but I have given my hon. friend such information as I obtained at my last interview with him.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I thank my right hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce for the information which he has given to the House but there is just one point in regard to it that I would like to refer to. I would like if he had conferred with the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen), who is not now in his place, because the statement has been made positively in the newspapers in St. John that the Government, through the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, has arranged for vessels. It has possibly not come to the attention of my right hon. friend. It will be a great disappointment to the people of St. John to read the remarks of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I hope that he will be able, after seeing the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, to give some more encouraging information as to the Government providing steamers for the transportation of coal.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I will take the matter up with the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and if there is any additional information I will give it to the House.

Mr. MURPHY: The minister announced that the Fuel Controller had secured an assistant in the United States but he did not mention who he was?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Mr. McCue. He has been retained by the Fuel Controller on the recommendation of the committee in Washington—the head committee in the United States which has the question of the coal supply in its charge. He was looking for the very best available man he could get and this is the man who has been recommended to him and whom he has employed.

MARKING OF PACKAGES CONTAINING HUMAN FOOD AND OTHER COMMODITIES.

House in committee to consider the following proposed resolution, Mr. W. H. Bennett in the Chair.

That it is expedient to provide that packages containing human food or other commodities should be marked with the name and address of the fillers, the weight, measure or quantity of their contents, and the dates of packing; but not including packages for export, articles weighed or measured at the time of sale in the presence of the purchaser, or fresh fruit and vegetables; that penalties should be provided for violations of these provisions, and that such provisions should come into force on the first day of January, 1918.—Sir George Foster.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What is covered by the words "other commodities"?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: All goods offered for sale. The resolution, I think, explains itself. I do not know that any further explanation can add to it. Of course, the details will appear when we come to consider the Bill itself. Under present methods, which obtain very largely, commodities are contained in packages or containers with the supposed weight in some cases marked and in other cases not marked. The old system of weighing out everything to the customer from large receptacles has become less and less the custom. There is a very wide call that all shoppers should be protected as far as possible by having marked on packages the names of the responsible makers and the weights. This is necessary for several reasons, first as a guarantee of the quality of the goods, but particularly for the carrying out of the Act itself. The man who makes the goods is responsible for the marking of them and they carry his brand and name. In the second place the quantity and weight should be marked upon the package so that the buyer can be certain as to just exactly what it contains.

Mr. NESBITT: The net weight of the contents or the gross weight?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The gross weight, I think.

Mr. NESBITT: It should be the net weight.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am not certain as to that. I will have to look at the Bill, but that will all come out in the discussion of the Bill.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Would it include such articles as cement in bags or barrels?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: All packages containing human food or other commodities.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The difficulty I see about using the words "human food" first and then saying "other commodities" is that the definition which would be given to the words "other commodities" would be that they would mean commodities of a like character to "human food." If it is intended to embrace commodities such as cement, fertilizers and a thousand and one things, why not, instead of using the words "human food" say that all packages containing any commodities shall be marked with the name, etc.? When you use the words "human food" and then say "other commodities" these latter words would be difficult to interpret as being general in their application. A court would say that it was intended to be limited to commodities of a similar character to human food. These words are obviously words of limitation. Why put in any specific description first because the words "other commodities" will be interpreted as applying to commodities of a like character to those specified previously?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The idea was especially to emphasise the importance of human food.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister may remember the question that arose in Ottawa within the last few weeks when the city complained that the weight of cement in bags was light. I do not see why this legislation should not apply to cement.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It applies to all.

Mr. PUGSLEY: But the minister, by using the words "human food," is rendering it very doubtful whether the section would apply. Any lawyer would tell him that.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I should think the words would carry that meaning.

Mr. GRAHAM: In the case of farmers who supply small quantities of butter to private customers each week, will it be necessary to have the name of the maker and the weight of the package stamped on each package?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes, if they dispose of it in the original container. It is impossible to pass any measure without causing some inconvenience to some people, but the lesser inconvenience must be submitted to in the general interest. The farmer must have his oiled paper in any case, and it will cost him very little to have the name and weight stamped on it when he purchases it.

Mr. NESBITT: The phrase "articles weighed or measured at the time of sale" would probably cover that. In any case, it would not be a serious matter to have the weight and the name stamped on? Why are exports excluded from the operation of the Bill?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Any one who has talked with manufacturers knows that there are many articles purchased for foreign markets which the purchaser desires to have marked and put up in a way which will suit the market to which they are to be exported rather than the home market.

Mr. NESBITT: I have never been able to see why people manufacturing for export should not manufacture on an honest basis, the same as any one else. I would impress on the minister that the weights should be net weights. Otherwise there will be deception as to packages.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Net weights are called for.

Mr. THORNTON: I see grave difficulties in the operation of a Bill of this kind. For instance, there are many articles which remain on the dealers' shelves in packages, such as evaporated fruit. The law provides that these shall contain only a certain amount of moisture. Evaporation takes place while they are on the retailer's shelves, and it may be that at the time of sale, through this natural evaporation, there is not the same net weight as there was at the time the package was weighed.

Mr. NICKLE: This matter of the weight of packages containing human food received my attention when I was a member of the legislature of Ontario. My attention was directed more particularly to the weight of bread. At the time the matter was brought to the attention of the legislature, there was no regulation establishing a standard weight for a loaf of bread. The province finally passed a law determining the weight of a standard loaf. Prior to that, the bakers could add to or take from a loaf of bread as they desired, and they varied the weight according to the price of flour, generally to the disadvantage of the consumer. During the discussion it was very forcibly brought to the attention of the committee, and later of the House, that the weight of a loaf of bread varied radically within a period of 24 hours after it left the oven; and if my memory serves me, there is a provision in the Ontario statute that the weight must be that standard weight within a certain period after the bread is baked. I do not know whether such a provision could be made with regard to commodities such as evaporated apples, but I think the minister should consider that aspect of the case, because if the measure is taken to apply to bread there will be difficulties in enforcing the law. We are all agreed on the general principle of the measure. I do not suppose there is a member who would not agree that the purchaser should get what he thinks he is getting as the net weight of the commodity within the package.

I may say that I endeavoured, when the matter was before the Ontario Legislature, to get before the House legislation along the lines suggested by the minister, but I found myself stopped, as the question was raised as to whether or not jurisdiction was vested in the Ontario Legislature. At that time my attention was directed to the fact that manufacturers of commodities that were put up in packages could keep a fixed price by varying the weight of the content in the package, and that the consumer had practically no protection at all. With the exception of the difficulty to which I have referred, I am heartily in accord with the measure proposed, and I trust that in the preparation of the legislation some scheme may be devised that will obviate the difficulties to which I have directed attention.

Mr. MARCIL: I must congratulate the Minister of Trade and Commerce upon this proposed legislation. He should not, however, limit its provisions merely to food.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is not so limited. It takes in every commodity.

Mr. MARCIL: I have heard numerous complaints that purchasers, when they buy a package, do not know what amount it contains. This applies to many different varieties of food, as well as to soaps and things of that kind. Sometimes the packages are found to be half empty, and the purchaser does not know whether the package was intended to be that way or whether the quantity has been reduced because of an increase in the price. Any action towards securing full value for the consumer's money should be welcomed, because nothing is more unfair than to have to pay for what you do not get. In Quebec we have had a constant grievance with regard to potatoes. When you want to buy a ninety-pound bag of potatoes at a reduced price you would sometimes find the bag to contain only eighty pounds—and so on. Any legislation that the minister can enforce to remedy such grievances as these will, I am sure, meet with the unanimous support of this House, especially at a time like this, when the problem of the cost of living is such a pressing one. I, for one, will support any step that the minister takes in that direction.

Mr. VERVILLE: Will this apply to other things than food in packages—to vegetables, or things of that kind?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It does not apply to fruit or vegetables.

Mr. VERVILLE: The people are being robbed, more in the matter of vegetables and eggs than in regard to anything else that I know of. The grocer often sells his small eggs at the regular price and charges five cents a dozen more for the larger ones.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is in Montreal.

Mr. VERVILLE: I think I can point to similar instances in my hon. friend's city. Toronto is not behind in that respect. It is desirable that all these things should be sold by the pound.

Mr. MARCIL: It is so in the United States and France.

Mr. VERVILLE: I agree with the member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) that bags of potatoes containing eighty pounds are often sold for ninety-pound bags. As a matter of fact, a man selling potatoes will often say to the purchaser: I cannot sell by the pound; I am selling by the bag. The consumer, then, has to buy by the bag, and sometimes he finds that the weight is short. Turnips and many other articles of the kind are sold by the pound, to the satisfaction of the grocer or merchant. I call special attention to the matter of eggs, because if the minister will get a little information from some of his officers, he will find that the people are robbed more in regard to eggs than in regard to anything else.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am disposed to accept the principle involved in this resolution, to a reasonable extent. I think, however, that the Bill founded upon the resolution will lead to all kinds of trouble. I do not think that simply because in some instances grocers are dishonest, we should resort to extreme legislation. My experience is not so unfortunate as that of some hon. gentlemen who have spoken. Every retailer that I have had to deal with has been honest.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Was somebody else buying for you?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I buy a great deal by telephone, and I have not had any reason to complain. I am surprised that hon. gentlemen have been treated as they suggest. My suggestion is that they change their grocer; they might get over the difficulty by dealing with somebody else. In the city from which I come there has been, so far as I know, every disposition to deal fairly with the buying public. Under this Bill, the grocer or merchant with whom you are dealing by telephone has to put his name and the quantity upon every package of goods that he sends out. If you order by telephone ten yards of cotton, for instance, it is put in a package and the merchant has to mark upon the package the number of yards of cotton contained therein. The same applies to any article of dress; he must put the number of yards on the package. It is provided that the merchant must designate the weight, measure or quantity of any article which is included in a package which is ordered either by letter or by telephone. Surely the minister does not want to impose such a bother upon the retail dry goods dealer or the retail grocer. If I choose to go to the store myself and make the purchase or have someone go on my behalf, compliance with these provisions will not be necessary, but if I order by telephone the merchant with whom I deal must comply with the law in every particular. If it is desirable that such a provision should apply to potatoes, butter, bread, meat, those commodities should be specifically named. But do not make this provision so broad that it will apply to every small article one may order by telephone, because that would put the retail dealer to a large amount of trouble which it is not at all necesary to impose upon him.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend has furnished a good example of raising trouble without being exact about the terms of the resolution. It would be intolerable if every time one sent by telephone for a yard of cotton or for an ounce of allspice, the goods had to be done up in a package and labelled and marked. This applies to goods that are sold in containers, in the original or unopened packages.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is not limited to that.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The resolution is the basis upon which the Bill is founded. The Bill does not go to the extent that my hon. friend has suggested.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Did the minister not say to the member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) that the provisions of this proposed measure would apply to a pound of butter which had been ordered from a grocer by telephone? The minister said that it would not be very much bother to have the name and quantity stamped upon such a package.

He now suggests that this provision is to be limited to the original package or container. A resolution is supposed to inform the committee of what the Bill is founded upon it will contain, and as this matter refers to Trade and Commerce, the Bill must be founded on the resolution. Therefore when we look at the resolution, we have a right to assume that it is what the Bill is going to be, and certainly the resolution is broad enough to cover the cases I have suggested. I am glad the minister realizes that it would be intolerable to have legislation of the character I have described. If he intends in the Bill to limit the extent of the resolution, and admits that he has made a mistake in the language he has used in the resolution, the matter of course, assumes an entirely different aspect.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not think there is any mistake in the matter. A Bill cannot go beyond the resolution upon which it is founded, but I do not think the converse is true, that a Bill must go to the full extent of the resolution. You have to have a broad enough foundation on which to build your house, but it does not follow that you must build to the utmost capacity of the ground that you buy for your house.

[Mr. Pugsley.]

Mr. WEBSTER: This resolution will have a tendency to affect butter, cheese, and meat being placed in cold storage. Suppose butter that shows a percentage of 18 per cent water is branded to-day when it leaves the factory, as weighing fifty-six pounds per package, after it has been in cold storage for thirty days, it will shrink from one to one and one-half pounds per package, according to the temperature to which it is exposed. When that butter comes out of cold storage, it still has the fifty-six pound brand upon the package. How are you going to arrive at the proper weight? Dressed hogs shrink upwards of three pounds in a low temperature, so what object would there be in having a hog branded with its weight when it went into cold storage? Take the cheese industry. I think it is a proper provision that each month's make of each factory should have the brand of that month on the cheese, and not on the box. It is an easy matter to remove the brand from the package, but it is a hard matter to remove it from the cheese. If that cheese is placed in cold storage and remains there for thirty or sixty days, it will shrink according to the temperature to which it is exposed. If the package is branded with the original weight of the cheese, the buyer will be misled; he will not receive what the package states it contains. Therefore, the package would have to be weighed the second time. In case of articles subjected to shrinkage, there would be no advantage whatever in having the weight branded on the package.

Mr. GRAHAM: If that cheese were sold with the weight——

Mr. WEBSTER: Box weight.

Mr. GRAHAM: —box weight stamped on it when it was put into cold storage, a man selling it at that weight would be liable to a heavy penalty.

Mr. WEBSTER: The package when it came out of cold storage would not contain the weight branded on it.

Mr. GRAHAM: The seller would be perfectly innocent as the package contained the weight branded on it when it went into cold storage, but if it did not contain that weight when he sold it, he would be liable to a heavy penalty. The dairy trade of Canada is one of our most important industries, and while we must protect the public in every way, we must not unduly hamper the producers. The provision that this legislation will not apply to packages for export is a wise one, notwithstanding what my hon. friend from North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) says, because the minister has explained that there are very many difficulties in the way of branding for export, in which trade you have to meet the consumer in the way in which he wants to be met rather than the way in which you might want to meet him. A number of boxes of cheese might be originally intended for export, but one of them might be taken out, and if the package was not branded, the law would be violated. The minister should have some provision by which the innocent producer will not be liable to a penalty.

Mr. CURRIE: So far as the consumers of this country are concerned, this resolution is one of the best that has appeared this session before this Parliament, and I am much surprised at hon. members opposite endeavouring to raise fancied objections to this measure which is founded upon a broad principle, namely, that when a man buys something, the name of the seller and the weight, measure or quantity of the contents of the package should be shown on it. A small amendment to either the resolution or the Bill would meet all the objections raised.

We all know that the poor people are being robbed out of thousands of dollars every day on account of dishonest weighing. We provide that scales must be used, and we pay large sums of money to provide for officials to constantly test these scales; but in nine cases out of ten, when a housewife goes into a grocery or butcher shop to buy something, instead of being sold an article by weight, as she is entitled to, it is sold to her by price, and there are shops in this country where the overage is divided between the proprietor and the clerks. For instance, a housewife goes into a shop to buy a piece of steak. She asks the price. She is told that the price is forty cents a pound. She says that she wants about half a pound. The man cuts the steak, throws it on the scales and makes a lightning calculation whereby he defrauds her of two or three cents, stating that it is thirty cents' worth. The housewife goes away thinking she has thirty cents worth, whereas she has only twenty-seven cents worth according to the price quoted.

Mr. GRAHAM: This resolution would not affect that.

Mr. CURRIE: It will affect that. There should be a provision that the package containing food or other commodities should have the contents marked on it and have attached to it the name and address of the fillers, the weight, measure or quantity, and so forth. When a butcher sells a piece of meat, he should be compelled to make out a bill and wrap it up in the package, and that bill should contain the exact weight of the meat. The same is true in the case of cheese. The matter will then be a question between the actual consumer and the seller. The question is not so much one of the weight of butter or cheese that goes into cold storage. Every one knows that the ultimate consumer is supposed to get the weight of cheese he pays for. There is a certain shrinkage allowed on cheese put into cold storage. Legislation of this kind is required to put a stop to the rascally practice that has grown up throughout this country of selling by price. Suppose a housewife goes into a store and asks for some oatmeal. The clerk says: Here is a 25-cent package. She buys it. The package is done up nicely, but as a matter of fact, the housewife gets only about 15 cents' worth of oatmeal. Canned goods and packages done up and parcelled should have on them not only the English weights and measures, but at the same time the metric weights and measures. After having had experience with the metric system, I feel satisfied that, as our coinage is on a decimal system, if the people got into the habit of using the metric weights and measures, along with our dollars and cents, they would continue using them. Under the present system, it is difficult for a woman of ordinary intelligence to calculate rapidly what she is getting.

As it is now, it takes the ordinary man or woman quite a little time to calculate how much twelve and a half ounces of butter, for instance, at 38 cents a pound would cost. This difficulty will be largely avoided if we adopt the metric system, which is in force in every country of the world except the United States, Canada and Great Britain. Objections against the system are futile. The system has been forced into use in almost every country in the world, and this country is consequently at a great disadvantage in selling canned fruit and things of that kind, because the weight is not printed according to the metric system. I think if this resolution were amended to compel the seller to mention the weight as well as the price on the label, it would save a great deal of trouble and be of great advantage. All the grocers in this country are not as honest as those with whom my hon. friend from St. John deals. But a grocer or anybody else who knows him would know it would be useless to try and cheat him.

Mr. MARCIL: When buying maple syrup in Montreal I could never find out the quantity contained in the different-sized tins. Some tins would be sold for $1.25, and others for $1.50 or $1.75. One can would contain the imperial gallon, and another the old-time gallon, and you could never tell just what you were getting. This legislation is on the line of what we have already done in the case of maple sugar and maple syrup, where it is imperative on the producer to sell the exact quantity he advertises. It was an old trick of these manufacturers to put the word "strawberry" or the name of some other fruit in large letters on the label, followed by the word "jam" in such small characters that it was almost impossible to see it except on a close examination, and the buyer would consequently be getting strawberry jam when he thought he was buying strawberry preserves. The manufacturers could put up any compound under the word "jam," and the people were often deceived in this way. I quite agree with the hon. member for St. John and the minister that we cannot expect a grocer to put a label on every ounce or pound of goods he sells, but the tin or closed package on the shelf should bear the name of the maker, the date of manufacture, and the quantity, so that the people would not be deceived in what they were buying.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This Bill is not intended to cure everything, and besides, the resolution is not the Bill; this is only a partial Bill. I think we might pass the resolution, as I am satisfied the House is in favour of the principle involved. When we get down to particulars, the Bill will of course be open to amendments, and possibly to enlargements.

Resolution reported, read the first and second time, and concurred in.

Sir George Foster thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 120, founded on the resolution.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

WAR TAX UPON INCOMES.

SECOND READING OF THE BILL AND CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Minister of Finance): moved the second reading of Bill No. 117, to authorize the levying of a War Tax upon certain incomes.

[Mr. Currie.]

Mr. GRAHAM: The presentation of this Bill for second reading to-day comes as somewhat of a surprise to us on this side of the House, as last night the Minister of Militia told us that the business for to-day would be the Bills on the Order Paper, and after that, the naval estimates. According to the usual interpretation, that would mean more or less unimportant Bills. I think, however, the House is unanimously in favour of the principle of this Bill, and I do not think there will be any objection to giving it a second reading and going into committee. After making certain progress the minister might allow the Bill to stay in committee until we have had an opportunity of digesting the information he will place before us. I do not suppose that he wishes to press the Bill through committee to-day.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am glad to adopt the suggestion of my hon. friend. We can give the Bill a second reading and discuss it in committee clause by clause in a general way, making as much progress as we can. It may be that we can use the rest of the day in going over the measure. It was not my expectation that the Bill would be reported to-day.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

On section 1—short title:

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is there any necessity for retaining the word "war" in the title?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: When considering the short title of this Bill, I had in mind the suggestion my hon. friend made in connection with the Business Profits Tax. He will recall that he suggested that the word "war" should be inserted before the word "tax," and I adopted the suggestion.

Mr. NESBITT: The minister said the other day that he expected this taxation would be more permanent than the business profits tax.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The reason I raised the point was that in my opinion this income tax will remain in force much longer than the war will continue. The short title rather implies that the taxation is for a limited period, but there is this to be said in favour of it It is an intimation that the tax will be subject to revision after the war.

On section 2, subsection (a)—Board:

Mr. LEMIEUX: Where will you get the referees? Will they be permanent officials?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We will take that up, I think, when we come to section 12. You will observe section 12 provides that the Governor in Council may appoint a board or boards of referees, and may prescribe the territory or district within which they shall exercise jurisdiction. It would be open to the Government to appoint such boards as may be necessary. I think it would be a mistake to appoint permanent boards, because it might happen that there would be no work for a board to do.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Might I suggest that for such delicate functions as will be fulfilled by those referees it should be understood, and, in fact, enacted, that the boards would be non-partisan.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Of course, my hon. friend knows I would not appoint a partisan board.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Perhaps I would trust my hon. friend, but there are some others I would not trust. I hope the Minister of Finance will take my suggestion seriously, because I am in earnest. This is a tax which will affect every one in the country, of every political persuasion, therefore, we have the right to exact from the Government that this board of referees, which will have to delve into private affairs, should be a non-partisan board. I say this without any idea of finding fault with the past or present appointments of the minister.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In connection with the business profits tax, I may say that I never inquired and do not know as to the politics of the officers administering that Act. I am satisfied there are both Conservatives and Liberals employed. On the whole, it is a good staff. I have not heard any complaint whatever as to political partisanship playing any part in the appointments.

Mr. MARCIL: Would this board be composed of judges, or ordinary business men, or Government officials?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It might be a county judge. It might be composed of lawyers of standing, or business men. The aim would be to get men of good practical judgment, and of such standing as to command confidence.

Mr. MARCIL: They might be called upon frequently to interpret the meaning of "income." For years past the Ontario boards have been called upon to define what "income" is.

Subsection agreed to.

On section 2, subsection (d)—Person:

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Should not "partnership" be included there?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We do not assess a partnership as such. We assess the individual partners, therefore I think it is unnecessary to insert the word "partnership" in this subsection.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: This, of course, also includes a wife who has an income in her own name?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes. "Person" means any individual.

Mr. GRAHAM: Including women?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Including women.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The husband is liable, and the wife is also liable?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: A case might arise where the tax would be imposed twice. For instance, take the case of a marriage settlement paid under the terms of the settlement out of the income of a husband. The husband might be taxed for it, and it might be of such an amount when received by the wife that she would be liable to taxation also for the same thing.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: If a man pays $10,000 a year under a marriage settlement to a trustee, that would be part of his income, and he would pay tax on it. When it is paid by the trustee to the wife, she would be in receipt of an income of $10,000 a year, and she would be liable to taxation. It might be argued that the tax would be imposed twice.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It would certainly not be so held, because while the husband might have an income, this amount paid under the marriage settlement would be among his liabilities. I think it would be held that the husband would be liable to taxation on his net income, that is to say his income less the amount he was obliged to pay to his wife.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: In any event, the investment would be in the name of the trustee?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If the husband set aside securities in trust, clearly he would divest himself of those securities, and the interest would be interest derived by the trustee, not by the husband.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It is often arranged in marriage settlements that the amount to be paid shall be considered as alimony. In such a case would the alimony be assessable?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If the wife had an income under a marriage settlement in excess of the exemption provided for by this Act, whether it is called alimony or not, it is the intention that she should be assessed.

Mr. GERMAN: The clause says:

"Person" means any individual or person and any syndicate, trust, association, or other body, and any body corporate, and the heirs, executors, administrators, curators, and assigns or other legal representatives of such person, according to the law of that part of Canada to which the context extends.

What does "individual" mean? Section 2 says:

"Person" means any individual or person and any syndicate etc.

But what does individual mean? Under the law an individual is to be taxed, but a person is not to be taxed. Section 4 recites that an individual is to be taxed and then you interpret "person" as meaning any person or syndicate. Why do you so interpret the word "person?"

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think the point of my hon. friend is well taken, and when we come to section 4 we will change the term "individual" to "person." That will make the intention clear. I think it would be so considered, but in order to make it uniform, and especially as we have used the word "person" in the interpretation clause, it would be better to change the word "individual" in section 4 to "person."

Mr. GERMAN: The interpretation clause says that:

It is clear that an incorporated company is to be taxed and that "person" means an incorporated company?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes.

Mr. GERMAN: An incorporated company is to be assessed and then the persons deriving incomes from that incorporated company are also to be assessed. There would be certain to be a double assessment, one of the incorporated company and one of the individuals who derive their incomes from the incorporated company.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend will observe when we get a little farther on with the Bill that while the company is assessed on its income its shareholders are also assessed upon their incomes, but there is an allowance made to the shareholder of the normal tax when the normal tax has been paid by the company upon the dividend which he receives. We have adopted there the principle followed in the United States legislation. Speaking for myself and from a long experience in connection with taxation, and especially the taxation of incomes, I have always thought it was a mistake to assume that there is double taxation when a company is assessed and when its shareholders are also assessed. My hon. friend knows that a corporation in law is different from any or all of its shareholders. It is a legal entity carrying on business in competition with individuals and partnerships Therefore, it has never appealed to me very strongly that a corporation should not be assessed and that its shareholders should not be likewise assessed. But while I believe that the time will come when, in dealing with legislation of this kind, a corporation will be assessed in respect to its income and its individual shareholders will be asessed in respect to their incomes, we have not probably progressed to the point yet where we could give that doctrine the effect which I think it should have. But we defer to the generally prevalent view in connection with income taxation of this kind to the extent that, while we assess a corporation upon its income to the extent of the normal tax, when we come to assess the shareholders in respect to their incomes, including the dividends which they receive from the corporation so assessed, we make an allowance equal to the normal tax which the corporation has paid upon the dividends derived by the shareholders

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Let us understand exactly the position we are in with respect to this matter. The object of the Act, as explained by the Minister of Finance is to tax corporations. There are hundreds and thousands of corporations.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Undoubtedly.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Take, for example, a tramway company in any city; it is to be taxed so much upon its income and so much will be deducted from the amount which it has to pay to its shareholders. The tax will be paid by the company upon its income and therefore it will take away so much from what it has to give to its shareholders. If I understand the principle of the Bill a corporation is a "person" and must be taxed?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is right.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Then we will come to the effect upon the shareholders later on?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Later on.

Mr. GRAHAM: Might I give another case that may, and probably will, arise? It will make a difference in the amount of the tax whether the combined income of a man and his wife be taxed or whether the income of each be separately taxed. The combined incomes may be subject to the super tax. Separately neither of the two incomes may be liable to the super tax. Where there is a legal or proper division of incomes, as there are in many families, each should be taxed separately. That principle is right, I think.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes, I think so.

Mr. GRAHAM: I would ask the minister to consider a suggestion to discourage the separation of incomes which are now one in order to evade the payment of the tax. A husband might have an income of $8,000, and the income might be separated so that the husband and wife would each have an income of $4,000. If taxed separately they would not be subject to the super tax, while the income of the husband alone would be subject to the super tax. Legitimate incomes, where the husband and wife have their incomes separately, ought to be taxed separately and not combined, but to prevent any attempt to evade taxation which might possibly be made, I would suggest to the minister that he have something in his mind as a preventive of what might otherwise occur.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The only way that occurs to me to meet that situation would be to allow only one exemption, namely, $3,000, in respect of the joint incomes of husband and wife living together. It seems to me that that would meet the case. I hesitate to do that because they are both liable to assessment, and under the Bill they are both entitled to the exemption. My own view is that, just as men will not divest themselves of their property to escape the succession duty tax, it is not probable that men would on a large scale divest themselves of securities to provide a separate income for their wives in order to avoid this taxation. They might do so, but I think it extremely improbable. I shall be glad to consider the matter further, and if, in the opinion of the committee or a substantial proportion thereof, it would appear desirable that we should allow only one exemption in respect to the joint incomes of husband and wife living together, I shall be glad to amend the Bill.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: You give an exemption to everybody who has an income?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is what we have done.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I agree with that.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: A concrete instance was brought to my attention on the way down to Ottawa last week. I met a gentleman on the train, a married man, who said that he had an income but not up to the mark of $3,000. His wife also had an income not up to $3,000. Neither would be liable to the income tax, but he said that he was quite willing that the two incomes should be combined and that they should pay the income tax.

As I understand, the object in giving the exemption of $3,000 is to enable a man to maintain a wife and family, and for no other purpose. If that purpose is served by an income of $3,000, I do not see why the two should have an income of $6,000 without being taxed.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: I do not agree with that proposition, nor do I see its equity and justice. If my law partner and I each make $5,000 should our income be combined to make a sum of $10,000 to come under the supertax?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: You have two households.

Mr. WILSON: A good wife is earning a certain amount of money by keeping house for her husband, and the husband is working at his occupation, whatever it may be. Why should we add the earnings of the wife to those of the husband to tax a lump sum? In the province of Quebec, under our civil code, sometimes the husband must support the whole household and sometimes the wife, according to the marriage settlement.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: My hon. friend has missed the whole object of the Act, which is to give a man sufficient to live on; in the case of the individual, that is put at $2,000 a year, and, in the case of a man who maintains a household, at $3,000 a year.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: The husband may have an income of $3,000 and the wife an income of $3,000. They may be separate as to property by the marriage contract. There are three, four, or five children, each having an income of $1,000; or let us say it is a real French-Canadian family and they have a round baker's dozen. Would my hon. friend suggest that the incomes of the husband, wife and children should be taken as one sum for the purposes of taxation?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: If, on account of the larger families in Quebec, $3,000 is not enough to support a household, let us change the amount; but if we start on the basis of $3,000 being sufficient to maintain a household, there is no good reason why one household should have $6,000 income exempted.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The two incomes are so clearly separate entities, according to our regime of separation under the civil law, that if the property which produces the income has come to the husband or to the wife from the father or mother, if the one who inherits that property dies without issue, that property does not go to the surviving consort, but reverts to the father, mother, brothers, or sisters, according to our law of succession. So they are absolutely different things.

Reverting to the body corporate, my hon. friend said that an incorporated company would be taxed as to its revenue and that the shareholders would also be taxed as to their dividends. My hon. friend says it is not fair that the same party should be taxed on both sides, because the company is the shareholder, and the shareholder, in the aggregate, is the company. How will you proceed to adjust that? Supposing a company has 5,000 shareholders and pays on its income, and the shareholders pay on their income; my hon. friend says he will keep in mind what has been paid by the company. How will it be decided how much the shareholder will have to pay?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: As that subject is specifically dealt with in section 4, possibly my hon. friend will wait until we reach that section before discussing it.

In the meantime, I might say to my hon. friend that a corporation is liable on its income only to the normal tax, and that the shareholders who will have to make returns of their income to the department will, when they are making such returns, be permitted to deduct the normal tax in respect of dividends derived from companies subject to this taxation. As to that portion of their income subject to the supertax, they will pay, because the corporation is liable only to the extent of the normal tax.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is very satisfactory so far. But I would suggest that the clause which provides whether the tax shall apply to corporations or not shall also be allowed to stand, so that the two matters may be considered together.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am quite willing to let it stand. I may point out, however that we are now dealing with the interpretation section.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I would suggest that subsection (d) of section 2 stand.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Very well.

Mr. GRAHAM: I had no idea of interfering where there was a legitimate separation of property between husband and wife. I think that each should be treated as a separate individual when each has a separate income.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: As in the Act?

Mr. GRAHAM: As in the Act. But I was suggesting the advisability of preventing the separation of incomes hereafter in order to escape taxation. The minister referred to the Succession Duties Act and that is just what I had in mind. In Ontario, not a few men in business have formed joint stock companies and distributed their property in order to get rid of succession duties. I had such cases in mind when I suggested that accounts should not be separated for the purpose of escaping the supertax. Where there is a proper separation of accounts between husband and wife, each income should be treated separately. I cannot see how anything else could be done, bearing in mind the different conditions that may exist as to the income of each.

Mr NICKLE: From my point of view, I see eye to eye with the member for North Gray (Mr. Middlebro). If I understand the exemption in this Act of $3,000 to married men, it is on the principle of the recognition of the home as an entity. If that is so, it seems to me that the total exemption in regard to the home should be not more than $3,000, and I am not now discussing the wisdom of the amount at the present moment. If the husband and wife are going to be entitled to an exemption of $3,000 each—I speak purely from the point of view of my own province—any lawyer with the least skill could so handle vested funds as, to a very great extent, deprive this Act of its usefulness. The Finance Minister instanced as a parallel the Succession Duties Act, but I do not think that the comparison is on all fours. To avoid the Succession Duties Act in Ontario, a man has to deprive himself of the corpus of the fund. But to avoid this Act, if the Act is to continue as drawn, all a man would have to do is draw an assignment effective for the term of one year in relation to any stock, mortgage, or security and have the interest on that fund made payable to his wife.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: That would amount to fraud.

Mr. NICKLE: No, it would not be fraud at all. The Act is drawn so that each married person shall be entitled to an exemption of $3,000. All a man with an income of $5,700 would have to do would be to transfer by assignment $2,800 of his income to his wife. That family would then be exempt entirely as to income

Mr. McCRANEY: If that course were pursued, the money which was transferred to the wife would be held in trust by her for the husband. I do not see that it becomes any less the income of the husband simply because, without consideration, it is handed over to the wife in that way.

Mr. NICKLE: If it were transferred to the wife and vested in her as a trust, I quite agree. But if the assignment were made as a gift to her as separate estate, free from any control on the part of the husband, under our Ontario law, which my hon. friend knows as well as I do, it would be vested in her as separate estate, the property of the wife. The law in Ontario makes a wife absolutely independent of her husband as to her separate estate, and the assignment of income to the wife would surely make that her sole property and certainly render it free from income tax.

Mr. McCRANEY: I do not think the question of separate estate comes in at all. Suppose a portion of the husband's income were given to me instead of to the wife; I would hold it in trust for the person who made the assignment. It would still be the income of the person making such assignment without consideration.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The principle of this Bill is that any person who has an income is liable to taxation. Any person liable to the income tax has a right to exemption. A person having an income of $10,000 is liable to the tax subject to a certain exemption. It is illogical to say that any person who is liable to the tax is not liable also to the right of exemption.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: In the case of income received by both husband and wife, the wife is given $3,000 exemption because she is a member of and maintains the household. The husband is given also an exemption of $3,000, because he maintains the same household. The effect of this legislation would be to allow $6,000 for the maintenance of one household in some cases and $3,000 for the maintenance of one household in other cases. That seems to be very unfair.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Apparently the first principle is that every person is liable to taxation according to the extent of his income. If he is a married man and his income does not exceed $3,000, he is not liable to taxation. If it exceeds that amount, then he becomes liable.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: Every person is liable to taxation because he has an income. If a man is married, we increase the exemption from $2,000 to $3,000, because he is married and has a household to keep up. The affect of this legislation is to make the wife practically as much liable as the husband, because she is given $3,000 to keep up the same household as the husband.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: May I suggest that we reserve this discussion until we come to the exemption clauses? In the meantime, we can all consider the question and deal with it as we may deem proper.

Mr. KNOWLES: As I am somewhat doubtful whether I shall be here when we reach those clauses, I would like to say a word in regard to the question of double exemption. The principle of this provision is that certain people with separate incomes are entitled to separate exemptions. That is a highly technical question. While we must not presume fraud on the part of our citizens, at the same time, in regard to the collection of money and taxes, we must anticipate that there will be certain possible debtors who may by fraud or quasi fraud endeavour to evade payment, and I am afraid there will be numerous cases in which the husband and wife will connive to evade this tax. For instance, take a merchant who owns his store. He does not care whether that store is in his own name or in his wife's name. He can readily transfer it to his wife and pay her large sums, say for rent, just to make her the recipient of a separate income. There are many other ways in which people who desire to evade this tax can do so, and we need not shut our eyes to the fact that there are many who will endeavour to evade this tax. The principle of this Bill apparently being that the people who are able to pay should be compelled to pay, the incomes of husband and wife, whether the wife's income is the result of a marriage settlement or of inheritance or anything else, should be considered as one for the purposes of taxation.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: Is any minimum age fixed for the word " person?"

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It will embrace minors as well as others if they have the income.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Would the minister give one or two explanations in regard to exemptions? Paragraph (a) gives the following exemptions:

> The value of property acquired by gift, bequest, devise, or descent.

Does that mean that it is to pay no income?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It means this. Supposing my hon. friend should this year inherit a piece of property worth $100,000. His income would not be increased by that amount. It does not mean that any revenue derived from that property would not be part of my hon. friend's income, but the property acquired by him would not be treated as income.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will the exemption as to contributions to the Patriotic Fund apply to provinces where there is a direct taxation for that fund, and where they have done away with the voluntary system? That is the case in New Brunswick.

Mr. HAZEN: Would not that work out in this way? When my hon. friend and I are making up our statements of income liable to assessment under this Act, would we not have a right to deduct from our income the amount we paid in civic taxation? In our civic taxation is included the sum of money necessary for the purpose of carrying on the work of the Patriotic Fund in our province.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. PUGSLEY: The words used are "must be subscribed."

Mr. HAZEN: You are right; the word "subscribed" would be hardly broad enough to cover that.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We can amend that. I think it is perfectly clear that if a taxpayer is entitled to deduct from the gross amount of his income the amount which he subscribes directly and pays to the Patriotic Fund, and is liable for taxation upon the balance only, it would be proper if he pays by way of taxation to that fund, that is to say, contributes indirectly, to allow him similarly to deduct the amount so paid from the amount of his total income so that he would be assessable only upon the balance.

Mr. HAZEN: I would suggest the use of the word "pay" instead of "subscribe."

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think that would meet the case. I want to make it perfectly clear that by this legislation it is not provided that a man may deduct from the amount of his taxation the amount he contributes to the Patriotic and Canadian Red Cross Funds. The wording of subsection (e) of section 3 is:

> Amounts subscribed and paid by the taxpayer during the year to the Patriotic and Canadian Red Cross Fund and other patriotic and war funds approved by the minister.

That is a deduction form the total amount of a person's income. If a man's income is $10,000 a year and he subscribes and pays $1,000 to the Canadian Patriotic Fund, then he would be entitled to deduct that and say that his income for the purpose of taxation is $9,000, but he is not entitled to say: My tax under this measure is $400 or $500, and because I have paid $400 or $500 to the Patriotic Fund, I am not entitled to pay anything more.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Does not the word "suspected" in subclause (f) smack a little of terrorism? It says:

> (f) "Taxpayer" means any person paying, liable to pay, or suspected by the minister to be liable to pay, any tax imposed by this Act.

I object to the word "suspected." Why not say "deemed"?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The word also grated upon my delicate susceptibilities as to the use of language, but it is a word that is used in the Business Profits War Tax Act, and there does not seem to be any other word that would precisely take its place.

Mr. NESBITT: "Presumed"?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I thought of the word "deemed" or something like "thought by the minister to be liable."

Mr. PUGSLEY: "Supposed"?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think that is the best word of all. "Deemed" is a very strong word, as in reality it means "doomed."

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I think "liable" would be quite sufficient. If the minister said that a man was liable, the question would then come up whether he was or not.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I will consider the suggestions, and we shall probably change the wording.

Section stands.

On section 3—Income:

Mr. COCKSHUTT: How is one's income to be computed? I venture to say that there are very few people in this country who know exactly what their income is. They may be desirous of having the proper amount entered, but there are so many factors that have to be taken into consideration in connection with the origin and net result of a man's income. Suppose, for instance, a man has $75,000 invested in real estate, and that $50,000 of that amount is invested in a paying enterprise which allows him to take care of his municipal taxes, fire insurance, depreciation, and the general upkeep of his property. The other $25,000 may be bringing in nothing, but the taxes have still to be paid and the necessary repairs made. Is any allowance made for what may be called "depreciation of capital" in a real estate investment? Everybody knows that when property is vacant it rapidly deteriorates. Vacant property is a very rapid income destroyer. I have had a good deal of experience in that line, and I know that a man's income can be eaten into very rapidly by unproductive property. I venture to say that anybody who owns very much real estate has some unproductive property that is not only not bringing him in any income, but is actually eating into the income he receives from other sources. I have a good deal of that kind myself at the present time, as I have no doubt a good many men in this House have. Has the minister taken that into consideration, and is any allowance to be made for this depreciation of capital? In other words, if a man has a certain amount of income from one source, and some other investment in property has depreciated in value and eaten into his income, is that taken into account in calculating the amount of income that will be liable to taxation? I do not know whether I have made myself clear, but I have heard that the minister is a man of property himself—

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I used to be before I came to Ottawa.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: If so, he has probably some property that is decreasing his income instead of adding to it.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is not the kind of fellow he is.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I am not, of course, wishing to escape paying what I should legitimately pay, but if the minister should ask me what my income was in any one year, though I keep books and endeavour to make an entry of everything, I should have the very greatest difficulty in telling him what my income was, and that being so, how will a man who keeps no books and makes no entries ascertain his income? Take, for instance, the farmer; he probably keeps his wife and family out of the products of his farm. He does not begin to estimate his expenditure until he goes outside of his family expenses, which are provided for by the farm. I only instance this as one case, because it occurs in many other callings. A merchant often helps himself to the goods in his own store, not counting this as really part of his income. Those are a few of the difficulties which present themselves in estimating an income. I would also like the minister to tell me whether any regard is to be paid to the depreciation which may occur in a man's property. For instance, he might be worth $100,000 this year, and when he makes his returns at the end of the year he may find his property is only worth $90,000. He has lost $10,000 on his investment. Will he be allowed to deduct that $10,000 from his $15,000 income, or will he be assessed on the whole $15,000, and be obliged to look after the depreciation himself?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Many difficult questions arise in connection with income taxation. I think it would be a very dangerous admission to make that the estimate made by a taxpayer that his property has depreciated to the extent of, say, $5,000 or $10,000 would be sufficient to justify that $5,000 or $10,000 being deducted from his income. It would be proper for the man who has productive properties to take into account the rentals received, and to pay the taxation and the repairs actually made in connection with those properties. The balance might fairly be considered his net income. My hon. friend raises the question as to whether there should be an allowance for depreciation. I do not think it possible to get an income taxation down to a mathematical nicety such as is suggested where the amount of annual depreciation would be allowed, because it would be almost impossible to estimate such depreciation, and as against that there would have to be set off the possible appreciation of that property, because, real estate does appreciate. In the administration of an income tax you must get down to a sound, but rough-and-ready basis—a basis of good sense. How much did the man derive from his real estate investments? How much did he actually pay out for taxes and repairs? The balance is his income. I do not believe he should be allowed to deduct the depreciation of his property, because the fact that it might have appreciated in value has also to be taken into consideration. I do not think we can get it down to a basis where you can set off the depreciation the tax-payer thinks he might fairly be entitled to deduct in respect to property, even property which may be vacant.

Mr. NESBITT: Might I suggest that the depreciation would show in the returns?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes. The depreciation would appear in the returns, and I think the onus would be very strongly on the taxpayer to show beyond peradventure that such depreciation had taken place. I do not like to admit the principle that depreciation should be allowed. Take another case—which might come within the instances my hon. friend has brought to the attention of the House—a man has an income of, say, $10,000; he is carrying a piece of unproductive real estate in the West, upon which he has to pay taxes. I do not think he should be allowed to deduct the taxes he pays in respect of that property. His income is the return he derives from his profession or calling. If he is carrying a piece of real estate for purposes of speculation, he should carry it himself. I draw the distinction between that case and the case of a man who is deriving income from properties which are productive. His income is the rentals he receives from such properties, but he is entitled to take into account what he pays in the way of taxes, and repairs actually made.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I thoroughly agree with the minister. I do not see how you can introduce any such principle into the Bill that would meet the case mentioned by my hon. friend (Mr. Cockshutt). A private individual might as well urge that his physical strength is depreciating from year to year, and that his earning capacity is growing less, and therefore he should have some allowance made for physical depreciation.

Mr. GRAHAM: I would not admit that.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Take the case the minister has just cited. Say a man is resident in Toronto, and is in receipt of an income of $25,000 a year, and say he has unproductive property in the West which requires a disbursement on his part of $5,000 a year for taxes. In estimating his income, surely that $5,000 would not be taken into account?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not follow my hon. friend.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I understood the minister to say that the fact a man was paying an annual tax bill of $5,000 upon unproductive property in the West would not be taken into consideration in calculating his income?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My view is he should not be allowed to deduct it.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Why not?

Mr. NESBITT: I think he should be allowed to deduct it.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My view is he should not be allowed to deduct it because his income is $25,000 and he is speculating in the West—

Mr. PUGSLEY: Suppose this unproductive property was in Toronto, instead of in the West?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The reason I mentioned the West was because my hon. friend referred to it.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Suppose a professional man has an income of $25,000 a year, and he owns an unproductive property in the city of Ottawa, the taxation on which is $5,000; surely, he would only be liable upon an income of $20,000.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If part of his income was from productive property, then he should be allowed to deduct taxes and repairs. My hon. friend put forward the case of a man holding unproductive property in the West, upon which he was paying taxes. These are very difficult questions to deal with, but I do not think he should be exempt from this income tax to the extent of what he pays for taxes on unproductive property held for speculation. Let me cite a case in regard to which I have had a good deal of experience. Take the income taxation of the city of Ottawa, or the city of Toronto—the assessor goes to a bank, say, and asks for the names of the officials of the bank and their salaries, and he assesses from $5,000 down, if the salaries are such. Those in receipt of the incomes, may use them in different ways. Some may spend their incomes foolishly, others may invest in property, others may be carrying investments at a loss, others may pay taxes upon their homes, but the assessment is upon the amount of income received as salary.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Net income.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The income received as salary. That is the way all assessments are made in this province. A man is not asked what he does with his income, he is not asked whether he invests part of it in mining stocks, or whether he pays taxes upon property with which he is speculating, or whether he pays margins upon stocks. He is simply assessed upon his income. Every man in the city of Ottawa is liable to assessment on the amount of income he receives. If he is a minister he pays income tax upon his $7,000 or whatever it may be; if he is an official he pays also. Once you introduce the principle that a man in receipt of a salary of $25,000 can deduct the taxation which he is paying upon property which may be appreciating very much faster than the amount of the annual taxation, you are introducing a very dangerous principle into taxation. I do not believe that that principle is included in any taxation in this Dominion. The point is: How much does a man make? If he is a lawyer, how much does he make after paying out all expenses in connection with his profession?

Mr. C. A. WILSON: All his office expenses?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: All his office expenses. Then I would say that after deducting the outgo from what he has received the balance is the income of that individual and he should be assessed upon it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Supposing his entire busines was the owning and managing of real estate?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend has raised a point which is absolutely different from that which we are now considering. We are considering now the case of an individual who derives his income from his profession or calling and who has to pay taxes upon some property which he has been carrying for the purpose of speculation or not—it does not make any difference.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Take myself, for example. The only property I own practically is real estate. I might have three or four houses which were bringing me a very good income and I might have other places which were vacant and on which I had to pay insurance, water rates and taxes. Would not the net income from all these different properties combined be that on which I would have to pay the tax?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I would say "yes," that my hon. friend would take all the incomes from these productive properties, and that he would pay the taxes on this other unproductive property deducting with respect to it, and the balance would be his income.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Suppose I had property in Ontario or in the West?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Unproductive?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Unproductive.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I would say that if my hon. friend was carrying some unproductive property with the idea of making money on its appreciation he should not be allowed to deduct it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Suppose a man were carrying it because he could not sell it and had to pay the taxes?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In a taxation measure of this kind, while that and every other principle should be discussed you will never be able to determine with mathematical exactness—the courts usually have to determine that—as to what should be allowed. It would be very dangerous to lay down the principle that if a man has an income of $25,000 and he is carrying unproductive property throughout this country, not being a man who is making his income from the holding and administration of real estate, he should be allowed to deduct the charges on this property from his income.

If you adopt that view, you are introducing a very dangerous principle and one which should not be allowed.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend is making a distinction between say a professional man who goes into an occasional real estate deal and a man whose calling is real estate.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: A landlord who has a number of houses.

Mr. LEMIEUX: If a man who buys real estate and has to pay a large part of his income in municipal and other taxes, the amount which he so pays would be deducted from his income. That is what I gather from the remark of my hon. friend. But a professional man, say a lawyer, who has bought some real estate, even if the real estate is not a revenue producer, has to pay the taxes and he cannot deduct that from his income?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I would say not.

Mr. LEMIEUX: If my hon. friend takes that view some individuals will be robbing themselves.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not at all agree with my hon. friend. If a man is carrying unproductive property and is paying taxes upon it I do not know why he should assume that he is losing money by doing so. I think we must assume the contrary, namely, that the annual increment on the property is equal to the taxation which he is paying out. I think it would be a very unsound principle to lay down that a man should deduct from the income which he makes from his trade, profession, or calling, the amount which he may pay out in taxes upon property in which he is speculating.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I do not wish to embarrass the minister in any way in coming to a conclusion. I can quite see that if the Minister's statement was followed out to its logical conclusion and finality a man might be paying on an income when he really did not have an income at all but rather an outgo. There are such men.

The minister must know, as I certainly know, that there are men who are known as property poor. Such a one may not be a speculator. Investment in real estate is considered to be a legitimate enterprise. If it is not I am sorry I am in the business. But, I have been the owner of real estate for many years believing that it was a sound investment and I have been in that way trying to build up the community of which I am a part. The minister in reply to the hon. member (Mr. A. K. Maclean) said that if a man had an income of $25,000 and $5,000 of it was going to carry a dead horse in the West, or anywhere else,—not necessarily in the West because we have lots of them in the East—this $5,000 should not be deducted. Well, reverse it. Suppose a man has an income of $5,000 and he has $25,000 to pay out, where is he going to be? He will be paying on the $5,000 but he will be $20,000 worse off than he was at the beginning. I know many men who would be very glad of the opportunity of unloading their real estate but who are carrying it and who are what is known as property poor. They have property that is unproductive and they are trying to meet the losses on that property out of the revenue derived from property that is productive. That has been the case in many towns and cities in Ontario. It is impossible for anybody in the renting business to build a house at the present high prices of labour and raw material and make a return of six per cent on his investment unless he is a remarkably capable man. It is the exception rather than the rule that a man has a six per cent return on his investment in real estate. I think the minister should take this into his serious consideration because there are many men who went into real estate not as a speculation but as a legitimate investment. All our trust companies are in real estate as a legitimate field of investment. If the principle which the minister has enunciated is carried out to its logical conclusion a man's income will go into one pocket and go out of the other twice as fast, until his capital is entirely consumed. A man with an income of $5,000 or $10,000 may have an outgo of $15,000 or $20,000. The minister should make an allowance for certain conditions, before the final balance is struck he should distinguish between productive real estate, and vacant and unproductive property.

In other words, the net results of his property operations for that year should be the amount he derived from his real estate. I cannot see it in any other way, and I am not saying this with a view to depreciating the amount that the minister should get, but simply to arrive at a basis whereby we may calculate what is just and fair and right to a man who has made his investment, believing it to be straightforward and honest.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If we admit the principle that we must take into consideration depreciation in real property and securities, and in addition to that the taxation that a man may pay out upon unproductive property which he holds, we shall go a long way to defeat the purpose of this Bill.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I would not take the depreciation without also taking the appreciation; I would take the two together.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend says he would not take the depreciation without taking the appreciation. We all know how difficult it is to determine the value of a piece of property at any time, and how arbitrators differ. How is the department to determine what the annual appreciation has been in a piece of property upon which a man has paid out taxes? I think there is a clear distinction between the case of a landlord with a row of houses from which he derives his income, his principal business being the administration of his property in those houses, his income being the revenue he derives from them, and his outgoings the taxation and repairs upon those properties for which he has paid during the year, and his income, for the purposes of this Act, being the difference between the two; and the case of a man who, in his calling, derives a net income of $25,000, and who uses that $25,000 either in speculation or in legitimate investment. For the purposes of this taxation measure, we ought to ascertain a man's income in his calling, and having determined that, assess him on that amount under this Act. Take my own case: I own some property in Canada which is non-productive, and upon which I pay, say, $1,200 or $1,500 in taxes. I say that I should be assessed on my income derived as a minister and any other income I may have, and that I should not be allowed to deduct the amount I paid in taxes on that unproductive property.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Suppose that, instead of being an individual, it was a real estate company?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is different.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It owns land with buildings on it in one block, and in the next block land which is not bringing in any income. If it is a company the minister will allow its revenues to be put on one side and its total taxation on the other. Why should the individual be treated more harshly than the company?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The corporation is in that business. It could not legitimately own the property unless it was in that business. A real estate agent should be assessed on any income he derives in respect of his business. A man owning property, deriving income from that property, should be assessed on his income in respect of that business. But the banker, who has an income of $25,000 from the bank, should, in my opinion, be assessed upon the $25,000, no matter what he does with the money.

Sir HERBERT AMES: Say that there is a block of houses that are rented regularly. If that is owned by a joint stock company you take the total rentals from the houses and deduct the total expenditure in connection with the properties, and, we will say, you have $1,000 to the good. You are taxed as a company only on the $1,000. But supposing that I, an individual, wishing to live on investments, erect a block of buildings and that the gross income is $5,000, and that the gross outgo is $4,000, so that the net value to me is $1,000, shall I be taxed on the $5,000?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: You will be taxed on the $1,000 because you are deriving part of your income from these properties.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If all in one row, but suppose there are two separate blocks in the same town.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The same principle would apply. The danger in allowing deductions for taxation upon non-productive property is that it is impossible to ascertain how much that property has appreciated in the year, and the man may be speculating with it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That would apply to the row of houses too.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes, and it would be open to the court to say how much it had appreciated or depreciated, but for the purpose of practically administering an Act such as this, you could not hold an inquiry as to how much each piece of property had depreciated. I should say that the onus would be on the taxpayer to show affirmatively and beyond doubt that there had been a loss in connection with that property.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Every man who has been dealing in real estate of late can tell my hon. friend that there has been a loss. To-day I know individuals who are paying two, three, and four thousand dollars in Montreal for municipal taxes, and if they cannot deduct that from their income for the purposes of this Act you ruin them.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In the municipal taxation is there an exemption?

Mr. LEMIEUX: There is no municipal income tax. If a man cannot deduct from his net income the amount which he has had to pay in taxes on his land, that is, if he has to pay income tax on the whole of his income, thousands of individuals will be ruined.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. LEMIEUX: In view of the discussion which took place before six o'clock, I think that the minister ought to explain what he understands by net income.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I have a very clear view as to what would be included in income as defined by this Bill. I have always found, and I think the courts have found, that it is better to take a word in its plain, commonsense meaning. If a man is employed as an official, let us say, in a bank, and receives a salary of $5,000, his net income for the purposes of this Act will be $5,000, because he earns that sum from his occupation. The question has been raised: supposing that man, in addition to having a salary of $5,000, derives $1,000 more by way of rental from some houses which he owns. Let us assume that he has to pay out in connection with this house $300 for taxes, repairs, and other outgo. He derives from that particular investment $700 net; therefore, if he has no other investments outside from which he derives income, his net income for the purposes of this Act is $5,700, made up of $5,000, which he earns from the bank, and $700, the net income from the productive property which he owns. Let us take the further case which was under consideration before six o'clock. Assume that an official drawing a salary of $5,000 owns some unproductive property—let us say, some vacant land, and that he pays, in order to retain that land, $1,500 or $2,000. My own opinion is that his income, notwithstanding the fact that he pays out that amount in respect of the unproductive property which he holds, is $5,000, the income which he derives from his calling. To show my hon. friend the fairness of the view which I put forward, let us compare the two cases. Two men, let us say, are employed by the Bank of Montreal, and each draws a salary of $10,000. One of these men has no outside property at all; he spends the entire $10,000 upon himself and his family. Clearly he is assessable for $10,000, which is his income. The other man spends only $1,500 or $2,000 upon himself and his family—he may have a smaller family—and with the balance of the money speculates in stocks or pays taxes upon property which he holds and which gives him no return. Would anybody seriously argue that the first man should be taxed upon $10,000, and that the other man should not be taxed at all, or should be taxed only upon $2,000 or $3,000? Get it down to a commonsense basis. What is the man's income from his trade, profession or calling? If he is an official, what is the amount of his income?—if he is a lawyer, how much does he make out of his office after paying the necessary outgoings? We are not concerned with what he does with the money after he gets it; we are concerned with the amount of his net income. If he spends it on his family; if he wastes it; if he speculates in stocks with it, or if he buys lands for investment and pays taxes upon them, —we have nothing to do with that. But if he has some landed property outside from which, after paying the necessary outgoings in respect to that property, he derives additional income, we add to the salary which he gets in his official position the net amount which he receives from that investment, and the two together will make his assessable income.

Mr. LEMIEUX: In the case of a married man, $3,000 of the income is exempt; therefore the man with the $10,000 income is assessed for only $7,000.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I was not referring to the exemptions in my illustration.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Suppose a man has a net income of $5,000 and, on account of unproductive property which he holds, he is obliged, by the law, to pay municipal taxes to the extent of $2,000. Of his income $3,000 is exempt. Do you assess him upon $5,000, or upon $3,000. In any case, he has to pay the municipal taxes. Will he have to borrow in order to pay the federal taxation?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: This measure does not and cannot provide how a man will find the money to pay his income tax. In the case mentioned, the income of the party is $5,000. If he is married, he is entitled to $3,000 exemption; therefore, he will be taxed upon $2,000 and will be liable to pay $80. As to how he will get that money, I am not in a position to say, but he will be liable for it under this Act. I do not see how it could be otherwise, unless we reduce the Act to a nullity.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: Suppose a lawyer collects in fees $5,000 in a year, and the expenses of running his office are $3,000, his net revenue for purposes of taxation will be $2,000?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: In section 3 it is provided:

> Income . . . shall include the interest, dividends or profits directly or indirectly received from money at interest upon any security or without security, or from stocks, or from any other investment.

That is quite intelligible, but I want an explanation upon what follows:

> And, whether such gains or profits are divided or distributed or not.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My right hon. friend has touched upon a very important provision of this measure, and he asks a very proper question. We have been desirous of assessing, not only the amount which a man may choose to take out from his business, but also his share of the profits which are actually earned by the partnership during the year. A partnership might earn $100,000, and if it was assessed as a partnerships, the assessment would be upon $100,000 less the exemptions. But the partners might say: There is an income tax and we will not take $50,000 apiece—if that was the share to which they were each entitled;—we will take only $5,000 apiece, and will pay income tax only upon that $5,000. That would not be fair. My right hon. friend would have to pay upon his income because it is definite and ascertainable; but if a partner were entitled to one-half of the partnership profits, and if he took only part of his profits out of the business and that were counted as his income, he would escape taxation on part of what he had really earned in the partnership. My right hon. friend does not agree with me in that? I think he is wrong if he does not agree with me in that. If we are going to assess an individual who is in business upon his profits in that business, then we should assess a partnership, or a joint stock company upon its profits in its business. But we assess the partners individually upon their incomes, and therefore it is necessary to assess them not only upon the profits that are actually distributed, but upon the profits to which they are entitled. There is one point in this connection to which my right hon. friend has drawn attention. Following the words which he has quoted, we have these words:

> The share of any gains or profits made by any syndicate, trust, association, corporation or other body, or any partnership, to which a taxpayer would be entitled if such profits or gain were divided or distributed.

I am not clear at present as to whether these words should be allowed to remain in the Bill or not. The intention was that we should assess shareholders in respect not only of the dividends which they actually receive, but also of their share in the earnings of the company though not actually distributed amongst them. The idea was to prevent the company from paying a small dividend and piling up large reserves which it could at any time distribute to its shareholders. But there is in the Bill a provision further on. Subsection 4 of the same section provides that:

> For the purpose of the supertax only, the income of a taxpayer shall include the share to which he would be entitled of the undivided or undisturbed gains and profits made by any syndicate, trust, association, corporation or other body, or any partnership, if such gains and profits were divided or distributed, unless the minister is of opinion that the accumulation of such undivided and undistributed gains and profits is not made for the purpose of evading the tax, and is not in excess of what is reasonably required for the purposes of the business.

There are some privately-owned companies which might defeat the purpose of this Act by paying a small dividend and accumulating profits instead of distributing them amongst their shareholders. This subsection is to prevent such an evasion of the tax. As I say, I am not at the moment clear whether in subsection 1 of section 3 the words "the share of any gains or profits made by any syndicate, trust, association, corporation or other body, or any partnership, to which a taxpayer would be entitled if such profits or gain were divided or distributed," should be left in the Bill. I shall give the matter further consideration and shall express my opinion to the House later on. If I decide they should come out, I shall move an amendment. I can see a possible hardship in that shareholders who are not seeking to evade any liability under this measure and who receive, let us say, a dividend of 10 per cent, would find themselves, under the express terms of this measure, assessable for, say 12 or 15 per cent because the company earned at that rate.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I present my views to my hon. friend as I understand this Bill. The principle of the measure is that every entity should be taxed—a corporation, a partnership; and then besides that, the partners or the shareholders who receive their share of the profits. Every business ascertains its profits for the year. Then it considers its liabilities, the contingent possibilities in the way of losses or the need for improvements. After having provided for these things, it distributes to its shareholders or to its partners the excess profits. My hon. friend taxes first the profits of the company, and then he taxes what is left in the entity, that is to say, in the partnership or association. Then he taxes also what comes to the shareholders or the partners. I raise no objection. But the measure may work a very severe hardship to a corporation. Suppose a corporation has earned $100,000 of profits during the year and distributed $50,000 to its shareholders and retains $50,000 to provide for contingent liabilities, or necessities, or losses. The minister takes the power to assess the corporation in respect of what may be its intention in so acting. Every association, whether it be a partnership or a corporation, works for individuals. If it keeps its profits in its coffers, it is to that extent acting to the detriment of the partners or shareholders, but for the benefit of the partnership, and in that way for the ultimate benefit of the partners or shareholders. Therefore, if it keeps that amount back in good faith for the interest of the company, I think that should be taken into consideration. If on the other hand this action is taken to evade taxation and to cheat the revenue, that is a different matter. It seems that in this measure no distinction is made between an honest intention and a fraudulent intention. We presume that the intention on the part of the taxpayer would be to have the Bill honestly enforced. This should be taken into consideration.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think no difficulty is likely to arise in the case presented by my right hon. friend. Take such a case as he mentions—that of a company earning profits of $100,000.

It is proper for that company to deduct from its gross revenue enough to make allowance for bad and doubtful debts and for any contingent liabilities—I am not speaking of some liability of a fanciful nature that might be expected in the remote future.

When these items are deducted from the gross revenue the result is the net profits. Having done that—and it is open to a company to do that, and companies do it, because it is sound from an accounting standpoint—if the company has still a net income of $100,000, even although it distributes only $50,000 to its shareholders, it should pay the normal tax of 4 per cent upon the whole $100,000. That is its net income, just as my hon. friend's net income is the amount which he derives as an individual.

My right hon. friend, I think, is a little mistaken, possibly, as to how we assess partnerships. We do not assess a partnership as an entity; the assessment is not against the partnership, but against the individual partners. We assess a joint stock company upon its net earnings, according to the proper definition of that term, making them pay the normal rate of 4 per cent. In the case of the shareholders of that company, who pay upon income partly made up from the dividends received from the company, under a provision which we shall reach later on in the Act, an allowance is made to the extent of the dividends which were taxable which they have received from the company. The provision to which I specially draw attention is to prevent privately-owned companies—companies with a few shareholders, family concerns—from paying out small dividends and accumulating an immense reserve which could be distributed at a later date.

Mr. GRAHAM: A close corporation.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes. In the United States it was found that there was a great evasion of the tax, and some of our provisions have been modelled on their measures in the drafting of which they have had a good many years' experience.

Sir HERBERT AMES: Let me cite a case in connection with undistributed profits which would work a very real hardship. The figures I shall give are not exact, but it is a case of which I have personal knowledge. We are going to tax the revenues of 1917. Now I know of a firm that ran behind $100,000 in the year 1915. In the year 1916 it came out about even, and in the year 1917 it made $100,000. They always carried forward from year to year a certain amount of profit and loss out of which the dividends are paid. Now in the third year, although $100,000 had been made, in view of the fact that nothing had been made in the previous year, and $100,000 lost the year before, no dividends were paid. The three years were taken as one, and the business has practically stood still. I think the firm did a wise thing in paying no dividends. If you are going to tax this undistributed $100,000 which they made in the third year, you are going to do an injury, because you are asking them to pay on profits that were never made.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That would be a case in which the discretion of the minister could be exercised, as provided in the subsection. It is only where the intent is to defeat the Act that these undistributed profits will be subject to the supertax.

Mr. NESBITT: There is a style of company that I am sure the minister thoroughly understands, and which I think he had in his mind when speaking a few moments ago. The section says:

> The share of any gains or profits made by any syndicate, trust, association, corporation or other body, or any partnership, to which a taxpayer would be entitled if such profits or gain were divided.

That means the individual shareholder. Now there are many companies in Canada at the present time that are working largely on borrowed capital, and if they are borrowing money from the bank, the bank will not allow them to distribute their profits in the form of dividends, because those profits are needed in the business. You are taxing them four per cent. Now, it is not the fault of the shareholders that these profits were not distributed—they, of course, would like very much to have them distributed—but as a matter of fact it might ruin the business if the profits were distributed. I would like the minister to take that into serious consideration, because he knows that a great many joint stock companies are in that identical position, and he knows further that since the war started, on account of the enormous advance in the cost of raw material, the money they have been able to borrow from the bank does not go nearly so far as it did before the war. Consequently, the firms require more money and the banks will not allow the profits to be distributed in the way of dividends. To punish the shareholder as he would be punished here is, in my judgment, rather harsh treatment.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think my hon. friend is right. I had considered this matter a little before coming to the committee, and I am now prepared to move that, beginning on line 7 of page 2, the following words be struck out:

> The share of any gains or profits made by any syndicate, trust, association, corporation or other body, or any partnership, to which a taxpayer would be entitled if such profits or gain were divided or distributed.

I also beg to move that after the word "also" in line 11, there be inserted the words "the annual."

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I was wondering whether the minister intended these words to cover the case of insurance companies,—or is there a special provision for that purpose in the Bill? An insurance company, for instance, whether mutual or otherwise, is in receipt of a large income in the shape of premiums. It is true that such premium income cannot be regarded as income in the ordinary sense of the term, and it would be unfair to the policyholders so to construe it.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Subsection (f) of section 5 says that among the incomes that shall not be liable to taxation are:

> (f) The incomes of mutual corporations not having a capital represented by shares, no part of the income of which inures to the profit of any member thereof.

Would that cover the case my hon. friend has in mind?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I wished to say a word or two about undistributed profits. There must be some provision in the Bill for taxing undistributed profits in some way or other.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There is.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I was going to give the minister the benefit of a suggestion contained in a proposed amendment to the United States Income Tax Act. I have merely a summary of it here, but probably the minister has seen it. By this amendment it is proposed to:

> impose a tax in addition to the income tax, of 15 per cent upon the amount remaining undistributed 60 days after the end of each calendar or fiscal year of the total net income received during the year, including dividends. The tax, however, does not apply to:
> (1) That portion of the undistributed profits used for the establishment or maintenance of reserves required by law, or
> (2) That portion of the undistributed profits of railroads used, with the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission, or if not subject to the jurisdiction of the Commission, with the approval of the state or local authorities having jurisdiction over such expenditure, for extensions, renewals, or betterments, or
> (3) An amount of undistributed profits equal to 20 per cent of such net income of corporations directly engaged in the production or distribution of commodities or in banking, so long as it is employed in the business.

This might afford some suggestion by which we could provide for a direct statutory provision in taxing undistributed profits.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: By subsection 4 provision is made for the application of a supertax to undistributed gains or profits provided that the minister is of the opinion that the accumulation of such undivided and undistributed gains and profits is made for the purpose of evading the tax. In what my learned friend has read there is an attempt to make it statutory, which is a pretty difficult thing to do. Here it is left as a matter of discretion. My own view is there is not likely to be an attempt at abuse, except in the case of a close corporation, and in such a case I think wise discretion would have to be exercised to see that the corporation paid the proper share of taxation.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: You want to take sufficient power to have that discretion?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is there.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is it wide enough?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Oh, yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX: If the minister will permit me, I would like to repeat a question I put this afternoon, in connection with, first, a corporate body, and, second, a shareholder. My hon. friend said there will be an adjustment after a while, and that what the corporate body paid to the exchequer would be deducted from what the shareholder will have to pay. How are you going to adjust it? Supposing a company has five thousand, six thousand, or perhaps ten thousand shareholders, each receiving more or less dividends, and therefore paying more or less to the exchequer, how are you going to adjust it as between the individual shareholder, the company, and the exchequer? There are companies which at the beginning of the war ceased paying any dividends. Those dividends are cumulative. Suppose this year or next year they make enough profits to pay the cumulative dividends to each shareholder, as representing the unpaid dividends since the beginning of the war, will you assess the whole of the cumulative dividends, which are really the earnings of the years before this Bill comes into force, or will you deduct what should appertain to the years when no dividends were paid?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In regard to my hon. friend's first question, if he will look at subsection 2 of section 4, he will see that corporations and joint stock companies, no matter how created or organized, shall pay the normal tax upon income exceeding $3,000. That is quite clear. Every corporation will be assessed by the department in respect of its net income at the normal rate of four per cent.

Clause (f) of subsection (1) of section 3 provides that for the purpose of the normal tax, the income embraced in a personal return shall be credited with the amount received as dividends upon the stock or from the net earnings of any company or other person which is taxable upon its income under this Act. Having assessed all the companies, when we get a return from a shareholder, he will be entitled to credit of the amount paid by the corporation upon dividends he received which are embraced in this return.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will he do that himself, or will the department do it?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: He will make a return showing how his income is made up. Say, part of his income was derived from shares in a company which has paid the normal tax upon its income. In that case he would be credited with the amount which was so paid. The department would scrutinize his return, and in preparing his assessment would make the necessary allowance. Subsection 4 of section 7 provides that all corporations, associations, and syndicates shall make a return of all dividends and bonuses paid to shareholders and members. That would help the department in making the necessary adjustments.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Would it not be better to have the companies deduct the tax of the individual shareholders?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No, they pay their own in full, then we make the allowance in the case of the individual shareholders. It is different from what it is in England.

Mr. NESBITT: It is just the opposite.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes. Answering my hon. friend's second question; if he asks the question from a strictly legal point of view, I should say that a shareholder receiving accumulated dividends would be liable to taxation on those dividends as part of his income.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Then, it is retroactive?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If they were cumulative for a period of two or three years, my view would be that in the administration of the Act it would be fair to make the assessment of the dividends for one year, that is if it was a preferred dividend. I shall consider the matter, because I do not like to have anything left to the discretion of the minister. I think, legally speaking, if a shareholder, gets cumulative dividends for three or four years in one payment in a year, it is part of his income for the year. But, my hon. friend suggests there may be a certain injustice in that, and there may be something in his suggestion. I will consider it.

Mr. GRAHAM: A difficulty might be that in all matters of assessment the assessment of one year is taken, in a measure, as the basis for the next year. No matter what the return may be the officer in charge will simply look it over and see that a man received, say, $800 in dividends last year from a certain company, and this year he only acknowledges $150.

There are, as the hon. gentleman has said, companies that have paid no dividends for several years, but within the last year they have been catching up on the arrears of dividends. There will be some injustice in charging what was really, or what should have been, their income for two or three years back as the income for this year. The minister said he would take it into consideration. I think it is worth thinking over.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I doubt if you could deal with that expressly by statute.

Mr. LEMIEUX: When you speak of dividends you should speak of coupons which represent a fixed amount. A certain big hotel company issued coupon bonds, but a few months after the war broke out that company ceased to honour its coupons. It is expected that in a year or two the company will be in a position to pay the coupons. In that case I do not see any reason why you should not make an allowance for the coupons which were due, but unpaid, before this Bill came into operation.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am afraid we could not do that. In the back years they did not receive their interest in a particular year, but they do receive their interest after that and they will have to pay on that.

Mr. NESBITT: Does the minister propose allowing a corporation to deduct bond interest before assessing the profits at the end of the year?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Without doubt, interest upon bonds is a fixed charge and net profits are only ascertained after deducting interest upon underlying charges, all interest payments, operating expenses and overhead—in other words, the net profits, according to a properly drawn balance sheet.

Mr. NESBITT: I realize that it is impossible to be perfectly fair to everybody, but a corporation having no bonds and having stock will be in a very much worse position than a corporation that just carries bonds.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I saw that argument advanced in one of the newspapers, but I submit it is not sound. The corporation that has a share capital pays upon its net earnings and its shareholders, upon receiving their dividends, are credited with the tax that is paid by the corporation. Take the case of a company which has a large bonded indebtedness. The holders of those bonds, not the company, are assessable under this Income Tax Bill for the incomes which they receive. The holder of the bonds pays upon the earnings of the company which are used to pay its bonded interest.

Mr. NESBITT: My hon. friend is quite right as to the individual shareholder or bondholder, but he is not right as to the corporation, as the corporation with stock is paying the four per cent on the whole profit whereas the corporation with bonds outstanding has that four per cent deducted.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I understand that the corporation in the one case would pay a considerable sum, let us say, and in the other case it would not. But if you take that corporation with only a nominal share capital and distributing all its net profits to its bondholders, its bondholders are the virtual proprietors of the company. I do not mean to say that they are legally the proprietors but they are virtually the proprietors of the company because they hold its bonds and they get, by way of interest, all of its earnings or practically all of its earnings. Now take the case of the company that has no bonded indebtedness but has a large share capital and pays out dividends to its shareholders. The shareholders there are virtually the proprietors of the company, not legally, but virtually the proprietors of the company as the bondholders in the former case are virtually the proprietors of that company. That is to say, they take all of its earnings. The net result is about the same because the bondholders are assessable as individuals in respect to the bond interest which they derive. It is true that the other company is assessed upon its net earnings, but the shareholders in their assessment are allowed to credit the amount which the company paid in respect of the dividends which form part of their income. Therefore the bondholders in the one case and the shareholders in the other are virtually the proprietors of the two companies and they are both taxed and are taxed upon about the same basis.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Did I understand my hon. friend correctly to say that the Bill does not apply to partnerships?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am not quite sure as to the sense in which my right hon. friend puts the question.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Do you tax a partnership?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We do not tax a partnership as such. Let us say that A and B are partners carrying on a business. We do not make an assessment against A and B for income which they jointly derive, but we make an assessment against A as to his interest in the income which he derived and his share of the undistributed profits, and against B similarly; and in that way we assess the partners.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I would call my hon. friend's attention to paragraph (d) of section 2:

"Person" means any individual or person and any syndicate, trust, association, etc.

The use of the word "association" would seem to include a partnership.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If my right hon. friend will look at page 4—

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Yes, I understand that. I asked my hon. friend if partnerships are taxed, and he says that partnerships are not taxed but that partners are taxed. Then, I call his attention to paragraph (a) of section 2. I would imagine that a partnership would be included in an "association."

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I should differ from my hon. friend. The word "association" in its broad meaning might be taken to embrace partnership but I think an association is different from a partnership. Even if the word "association" should embrace partnership, if my right hon. friend will look at page 4, section 4, subsection 3, he will see that it says:

Any persons carrying on business in partnership shall be liable for the income tax only in their individual capacity.

[Sir Thomas White.]

That would exclude partnerships.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I would like to call my hon. friend's attention to paragraph (b) of subsection 1 of section 3:

The proceeds of life insurance policies paid upon the death of the person insured, or payments made or credited to the insured on life insurance endowment or annuity contracts upon the maturity of the term mentioned in the contract or upon the surrender of the contract.

I am informed that there is an Ontario statute which provides that the proceeds of an insurance policy made in favour of a man's wife is not liable to any taxation. Will that be liable to taxation under this?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend is referring to paragraph (b) of subsection 1 of section 3. That is one of the exemptions.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I did not observe that. I notice among the exemptions:

Such reasonable allowance as may be allowed by the minister for depreciation, or for any expenditure of a capital nature for renewals, or for the development of a business.

That I understand.

And the minister, when determining the income from mining and from oil and gas wells, shall make an allowance for the exhaustion of the mines and wells.

There are other businesses in which something akin to exhaustion may take place. Take real estate. A man may buy three or four acres and derive income from their sale, but as the sales take place that source of income becomes exhausted; part of the income is a return of capital.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Undoubtedly there is a return of capital in such a case, and even if no provision existed in the statute, we should properly make an allowance in respect to the exhaustion of mines and oil wells. In a real estate transaction such as my hon. friend mentioned, a certain amount of the return would be regarded as return of capital and a certain amount as profit. We would deal only with the profit.

Mr. PUGSLEY: From the minister's statement to my hon. friend for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) it might be inferred that the proceeds of an insurance policy paid to a widow would be exempt. Did he not mean that it would not come in as part of the income for that year, but that later it would be subject to taxation as part of her capital? It becomes capital or principal upon the income from which this statute operates.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: True, later.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Again referring to the Ontario statute, would my hon. friend (Mr. Middlebro) say if it entirely exempts from taxation the life insurance collected by a widow?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: I think my hon. friend is confounding its exemption from seizure for the debts of the husband with exemption from taxation.

Mr. LOGGIE: Referring to subsection 4 of section 3, and dealing with the supertax only, it is not uncommon to find companies in business for many years but never declaring any dividend. They may make some profit, but they never have money to pay dividends. They are borrowers from the bank and all the profits that are available go to pay indebtedness, yet the books may show substantial profits. Or these profits may be locked up in investment that are not liquid, and cannot easily be converted into money.

Subsection 4 of section 3 provides that surplus profit, undivided, may be assessable for the supertax if the minister says so. I would point out that when the profits of one year are distributed and left in the business, then the following year the net results of the business, having the benefit of the money so left in it, will be greater than if these profits had been distributed. The increased profits are, of course, subject to the normal tax each year. That is something that the minister ought to take into consideration. I wish to draw the attention of the minister to another matter in connection with the net income of private individuals. A man who conducts, say, a dry-goods business is known as a business man. A private individual earning a salary and receiving, besides his salary, rents from houses that he owns, so that his net income is $3,000 or $4,000, would be considered, I assume, as a business man, and his transactions would be treated in the same manner as those of any business firm?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Before this section is carried, the suggestion of the member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt)) ought to be considered. The minister has said that he will treat a man's income from his business, position or profession independently of his income from any property, for instance, that he may own.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Not quite that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It comes pretty near that. The minister has said that if a man receives a salary from his occupation of $10,000, has real estate from which he receives an income and has certain other real estate which is a burden to him and upon which he is obliged to pay various amounts by way of taxes and repairs, these amounts that he pays out will not be taken into consideration when the amount upon which he is to be assessed is being determined. In a case of that kind the man will be obliged to pay taxes upon the total income which he receives from one particular source. It ought to be made clear that that is not the intention of the law. Take the case of a company which, while not engaged in buying or selling, is engaged in the ownership and management of real estate. It owns a dozen different pieces of property; from some of that property it receives a good income, but in respect of other portions of it there is a loss. The company makes up its statement for the year, including in its statement all the property which it owns. It places on the revenue side its total receipts and on the debit side its total disbursements in respect to the entire property, and the balance is the income of that company for the year. Why should it be different in the case of the individual? If the law is to be administered differently in respect to the individual, the individual must convert his real estate holdings into the holdings of a joint stock company. It is a very easy thing to do that; but why should it be necessary? If a man wishes to hold his property, why should he be compelled to put it into a company in order to get the benefit of the exemptions which, it is admitted, exist in respect to a company? In the case of a man who owns a number of pieces of property which bring in an income and also other pieces of property the carrying of which inflicts a loss upon him, the income upon which taxation should be levied should be his net income from his entire holdings. I cannot for the life of me see why the minister should adopt any other course. In accordance with all the principles of fair play, he ought to amend the Bill so as to make it clear that the net income upon which taxation will be levied is the net income which a man gets in the fair and reasonable carrying on of his business and the fair and reasonable administration and management of the property that he owns.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am sorry that the member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) was not in the Chamber a little after eight o'clock when I dealt with this matter at some length, and, I think, to the satisfaction of the committee. I am surprised that a gentleman of my hon. friend's fine legal mind cannot see the clear distinction which exists between the case of a man who has an income of $5,000 and a further income of $1,000 from productive property outside, and the case of a man who has an income of $5,000 which he spends in paying taxes upon investments outside, or in stock speculations or otherwise.

The illustration which I use is this: Take the case of two officials of the Bank of Montreal and let us assume that they are each getting a salary of $10,000. One of them spends the money upon himself and his family. The other man owns $100,000 worth of unproductive real estate upon which he has to pay taxes. Does my hon. friend mean to suggest that we should tax the one man to the full extent of the $10,000 and that the other man should go scot-free because he happens to pay away $7,000, let us say, in taxes upon unproductive property which he holds? The people of this country would not stand for that for a moment. The true principle of the Bill and of every income-tax measure is to consider what is a man's income from, his trade, profession, or calling? If he is an official of a bank and draws $10,000 a year as such official, that, in the plain, ordinary sense of the term is his income, no matter what he does with it. If, in addition to that, he has five houses, which bring him in $2,000 a year gross, and he has to pay out of that $500 for taxes and other outgoings, he has a net income from those houses of $1,500, and his income in the plain, every-day, ordinary sense of term "income," is the $10,000, plus the $1,500 net which he receives from his investment. It would be absolutely impossible to administer a business tax if, having ascertained the net income derived by a man from his trade, profession, or calling, the department had to follow him through all his investments. My hon. friend's proposition goes as far as this. Supposing a man has an income of $10,000 from his official position as a bank manager, and let us say he engages in unfortunate speculation and loses it all; my hon. friend says that that man is not liable for income tax. I say that he is liable for income tax. The question is—what is the man's income from his trade, profession, or calling? It is $10,000. Then we need not care what he does with it, whether he spends it luxuriously, whether he loses it in stock speculation, or whether he uses it to pay taxes on $100,000 worth of property which he owns. My hon. friend, who is a good lawyer, knows that any court would uphold the contention put forward by me to-night, that the correct interpretation of the word "income" is a man's income from his trade, profession, or calling, no matter what he does with that income after he gets it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend would be perfectly right if the income tax provided for by this Bill was limited to a man's income from his trade, profession or calling, but the measure is not so limited.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We were speaking about that aspect of it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend cannot pick out one clause of the Bill—

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Of course he can.

Mr. PUGSLEY: —and deal with that alone, and have this legislation construed as if this was the only clause in the section. The section provides that the term "income" shall mean:

> The annual profit or gain or gratuity, whether ascertained as being fees or emoluments, or as wages, salary, or other fixed amount, or unascertained as being fees or emoluments, or as being profits from a trade or commercial or financial or other business or calling, directly or indirectly received by a person from any office or employment, or from any profession or calling, or from any trade, manufacture or business, as the case may be.

It would be all right if it stopped there; but it does not stop there; it goes on to say:

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Quite so—from any other investment.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Which means and includes an investment in real estate.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: True.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Therefore if you are to determine what a man's net income is, you have a right to take not only what he receives annually from his business, but what he receives from the investments which he has bona fide made with his money, and, if he is unfortunate enough to incur a loss from some of those investments, surely all that should be taken into consideration, and the man's net income should be taxed.

If my hon. friend were limiting his Bill to income from a man's trade, profession or calling, that would be a different thing; but he taxes his whole income, no matter from what source it is derived, whether from his profession, trade or business, or from the investments which he has made. The minister not only seeks—as he says he is going to have this Bill administered—to collect taxes from the full income which a man receives from his business, trade or employment, but he further says that, in construing this Bill, he will insist that if a man receives from his investment in certain real estate an income, he will be assessed upon that income even although in respect to some other investments in the same class of property he is sustaining a loss and compelled to bear a burden. That is pushing the matter to the very verge of the grossest possible injustice. I cannot understand why the minister should refuse to have the matter made plain. All I suggest is that the law shall be a reasonable one; that the man shall be obliged to pay a tax upon his net income. I do not mean to say that if he chooses to risk his money in wild speculation, any loss he might incur in that way should be deducted. All I mean is that where a man is engaged in real estate—

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Engaged in real estate?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Not engaged in buying and selling real estate, but owning real estate, investing his money in real estate—if from some of his property he gets a good income, and with other portions of that property he is unfortunate and it brings in no income and he has to bear a large burden in respect to the taxes, all I ask is that his whole income from his different properties shall be considered, and it shall be upon the net income that he shall bear the burden imposed by this Bill. To have the law different is going to bring ruin to many people in this country who are unable to bear such a heavy tax, especially under the circumstances which prevail at this time. In the city of Montreal there are friends of mine with whose circumstances I am familiar, who have put their money into real estate. From some of their property they are receiving a good income. Other portions of their property in regard to which they exercised the same judgment or thought they were doing so, into which they bona fide put their money, are non-productive, and they are bearing heavy burdens, paying out heavy taxes. All I say is that the incomings and outgoings in respect to those different properties should be considered together, and upon the net income the taxation should fall.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not mean to say that, if a man had a row of houses from which he received rents, and if there were some vacancies in those houses during the year, he would not be allowed to deduct, from the total income which he received from the row of houses, the taxes which he would pay in respect of the vacant houses as well as of those not vacant.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Suppose there are two rows of houses in different parts of the city, or suppose the rows are in different towns. Why should there be any difference?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There is no difference if there are two rows of houses. Let us take two rows of houses and say that a man derives from those $5,000 a year and that some of them during the year are vacant and others are occupied, but that they are two rows of houses from which he has been in the habit of deriving an income. Nobody would contend that he should not be allowed to deduct the taxes from the income which he would receive in respect of those two rows of houses. Let us go back to my former example. Two men have each a salary of $10,000. One man has a family to keep and spends the entire $10,000 upon himself and his family in their maintenance and education. The other man has a considerable quantity of real estate, and he has to pay out $4,000 or $5,000 of his income on taxes. We must not assume that that money is lost. He is paying it out to protect his own property; and the first man that I have mentioned would have every reason to complain if we assessed him upon the full $10,000 and explained to him as a reason why we did not assess his neighbour who drew precisely the same salary as he did, that he held a good deal of real estate and took a considerable amount of that income to pay taxes upon that real estate. I think the first man would have a real grievance. He would say: His income is the same as mine; I spent mine in keeping my family, and educating my children, and he spent his in paying taxes upon some unproductive real estate which may give him an excellent return in years to come. I do not believe we should go back of the man's income.

Mr. LEMIEUX: But, supposing the second man had investments in rows of houses.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: He would have an income from them.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Supposing he receives no income from them? Some of them may be vacant. You will deduct that from his annual income, I suppose?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: You mean deduct it from the $10,000?

Mr. LEMIEUX: The minister makes a difference between the man who has an investment in real estate and the man who has an investment in houses. What is the difference?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There is no difference, in principle. What I have stated is entirely consistent. If a man has an income of $10,000, and diminishes that income by losses he makes on real estate, or by amounts paid for taxes, or otherwise, what is the difference between that and the man who has an income of $10,000 and loses $5,000 in a stock speculation? He might say, "I have lost $5,000 in stocks, therefore I want you to assess me at $5,000, instead of $10,000." We should say, "No, your income was $10,000; you speculated in stocks, which is not the ordinary course of your business at all, and you lost this money; that does not affect your income, which is $10,000." If you laid down the principle that you would allow a man to deduct losses made in business in which he is not engaged, such as stock speculation, or real estate speculation, you might just as well never pass the Act, because it would be evaded in numberless ways. The true principle of the matter is, what is a man's income? Every one knows what you mean. If you ask a man on the street "What is so-and-so's income?" nobody will misunderstand you. You will be told it is the amount he gets from his employer, if he is employed. If, on the other hand, his income is derived from stocks, bonds or securities, everybody understands it is what he receives in the way of interest and dividends upon those securities. It is a commonsense matter. My hon. friend quoted section 3, to show that not only was individual income included—that is to say the individual income of a man from his trade, profession or calling—but also his income from investments. We all know what that means. It means his income from investments after he pays any necessary outgoings in connection with those investments, whether it is house property or not, plus the income he receives in his trade, profession or calling. It is not for us to inquire what he does with his income after he gets it. We are not interested in knowing whether he loses it in a stock speculation, or spends it foolishly. If you have to follow what a man does with his income, and allow it to be urged that he lost it in a stock speculation, or in a real estate speculation, or spent it foolishly, you might just as well never pass the Act.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I must say I think the minister is rather confusing a fixed income or a salary with the proposition I brought out, and which I think has been well re-stated by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley). I made no mention whatever of a salary. If a man is getting $10,000 income from his calling, not in the way of salary, but from his investments in real estate—

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Is he a real estate dealer?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: No, he is not a real estate dealer.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Is that his principal business?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: It is his principal source of support. He has received it perhaps after struggling for years and investing his money, or he may have had it bequeathed to him.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Or, he might have his real estate managed by a real estate agent. It may not be his business at all.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I have a piece of property which has been in the family for three generations. It has come down to me as an inheritance and I would hesitate to part with it. I am not what you would call a real estate dealer, but I have my investments largely in real estate, and as a business man I have made my returns for years to the city of Brantford as to my income. I should be very sorry indeed to think I was deceiving them, but I have taken a course which I am bound to say is the course I would take if the Finance Minister asked me to tell him what my income was—I would do my best to tell him my net income, deducting all expenditures in the way of taxes, repairs, insurance and everything of that kind, which every man who owns property knows he has to make.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There is no objection to that.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: But, according to the minister, there is an objection to it. He instances the case of a man who loses part of his salary in speculating and real estate. When I make my returns to the Brantford assessors, I deduct the repairs, taxes, insurance, and everything. On the other side, I put the rent received, and the difference is my income. I think that is the fair way of doing it, and it was with a view to getting the matter settled and enabling a man to make a proper return to the department that I raised the question. I am, in a small way, a trustee for some real estate, and I know this method of making returns has been found equitable and satisfactory by the courts. If it is proper for a trustee, it ought to be proper for an individual. There is another point I wish to mention. If the Finance Minister tells a man he has an income of $25,000, and the man himself says "My income is only $15,000" it is up to the Minister of Finance to show him where the $25,000 is. If a man only has an income of $15,000, and it is sought to assess him on an income of $25,000, I think he has a very reasonable grievance against the Government. I am not saying this with a view to paring down at all, because I am quite satisfied and willing to pay anything I may be called upon to pay under this Act; but, as a man who has to make a report, I do not want to be subject to a $10,000 fine for making a false report. It appears to me the minister would be acting wisely if he were to consider the proposition made by the hon. member for St. John. I think it was a fair statement, and covers the point in perhaps a better way than I did this afternoon. I was not dealing at all with the matter of salary or with anything but an income from real estate, which income is the difference between the revenue and the outgo or expenditure. It seems to me that is equitable and right. I cannot see it in any other way.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We are talking about entirely different things. Before six o'clock my hon. friend raised the question as to depreciation of real estate. After eight o'clock we were discussing the question raised by my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), whether a man with a salary of $10,000 should be allowed to deduct from it the taxes which he might pay in respect of some unproductive property which he held. If a man's income is derived from real estate his calling, so to speak, is that of a landowner, although, of course, he is not a professional man in that sense. He has to take his unproductive houses and estimate the net return, as my hon. friend has suggested. The proposition I am laying down is that a man with an official salary of $10,000 should not deduct from it the $1,000 or $2,000 that he may have to pay in taxes on unproductive property. I am in the position where I shall have to pay in this respect just like other people. I have to pay taxes on unproductive property, and I certainly do not intend to deduct the taxes from my income. I think that is how the boards will construe the Act. That is the way they have construed the income tax legislation of the United States.

Mr. GRAHAM: There are two kinds of property. One is real estate. Suppose a man is not interested in real estate, productive or unproductive, but in some other kind of property—securities, for instance. Suppose the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) had two securities, one of which paid him a regular dividend. All at once the dividend stops. Would he be entitled to deduct from his income the interest he had to pay on the money in that non-productive security?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I do not think that is a parallel case.

Mr. GRAHAM: Nearly; it is a different kind of property that is all.

Mr. COCKHUTT: If, instead of it being a dividend producer, the dividend ceased and a call was made upon him to pay in more capital—that is the point which I raised. Instead of bringing in income, he is called upon to make good an outgo. The company says: "You have subscribed for so much stock, and to save it you must now subscribe for so much more." If the company said that, that would be a parallel case. The ceasing of the dividend is not sufficient. Taxes, insurance, repairs, all have to go on. If I have a caretaker, he has to be there, and snow shovelling and watering the street have all got to be done as though the property was occupied.

Mr. GRAHAM: I will go as far as my hon. friend has suggested. Suppose that a call was made, do you think he would be entitled to deduct the amount of that call from his income? I say no. Go just as far as you like. That is capital expenditure; it is not income. Suppose I invest $10,000 in stock and half of it becomes unproductive. A call is made, and I have to pay in that call. I have made an investment that I thought was going to pay, but it did not. My hon. friend has invested $10,000 in real estate that he thought was going to pay, but it did not. We are, therefore, both in the same position, the only difference being that one is real estate and the other securities. Should we allow our loss in either case to be deducted from our income for the purposes of this taxation?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: That is not a parallel case as I understand it.

Mr. GRAHAM: I carried it as far as my hon. friend wanted me to.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: The hon. member carried it to an illogical conclusion. If the call was made because the company had encountered a loss, as frequently occurs, I say that he did not increase his capital by reason of the call having been made. He has really made a loss. He is being called upon to make up a call. Take a fire insurance company, for instance. They have been paying dividends every year as my hon. friend knows. Suddenly they have a disastrous year and the dividends cease. The fires have been so great that instead of having a dividend on his stock, all the premiums have been exhausted and the company has lost a portion of its capital. In order to keep the security good, a call is made to put it where it was. If the hon. gentleman figured out that that was income, I think he would soon find that he was living on air, and that the income was a myth. There is no income about that. It is a loan that has to be made. Surely if an income exists, the man that has it ought to know. If he is trying to evade the law, fine him. But if he says, "My income is $15,000, as I can show you by the net results in the bank at the end of the year." I would take that as prima facie evidence that that was his income.

Mr. McCREA: Suppose that a man has two properties that he is carrying on his books at a certain value. One of them he sells for possibly twice what he is carrying it at. Would that be considered as income for that year? The other property he sells at a loss. How would the minister treat that? If one is counted as profit, the other should be counted as loss. As I understand the minister, capital will have nothing to do with profits. If a man has a property and sells it at a profit of 20 or 50 or even a hundred per cent, that will not be taxed. If he sells his property at a loss, do I understand that he will not be allowed to deduct that amount?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think I agree with my hon. friend. It would not be fair to count as income in any given year the profit which one might make on the sale of real estate which a man had held for a number of years, for that would not be annual gain, and I do not think it would be possible to apportion a certain amount of it in respect of the year in question. The same argument would apply to the other property. A great number of the questions that have been raised here are of theoretical importance, but not likely to become a practical issue in the administration of the Act. In connection with the Business Profits War tax we had many cases where properties were sold at a profit after being held for a number of years. But in the working out of the Act it was recognized that that was not gain for that particular year, and no difficulty was experienced.

Mr. McCREA: That is as I understood it.

Mr. VERVILLE: Suppose I am paying $1,000 interest on a property mortgage? Would I be allowed to deduct that amount from my income? If I am taxed on that $1,000, and the man who receives it counts it as part of his income and is also taxed on it, that would be double taxation?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In the case my hon. friend suggests, where he is paying $1,000 interest upon a mortgage upon some property which he holds, he would be entitled to deduct from the revenue which he derived from that property the interest which he paid on the mortgage. On the other hand, the mortgagee would derive from my hon. friend the thousand dollars which would be a part of his income. If the income be $3,000 more, he will be liable, under the provisions of this Bill, less $3,000 exemption.

Mr. VERVILLE: I brought that up because there are quite a lot of workmen having small properties and very heavy mortgages upon them. They were afraid they would be taxed for the amount of the mortgages, but according to the explanation they will not be.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Take the case of a man who buys some stock and makes only a partial payment and the stock is hypothecated with the bank. Let us say that I buy 500 shares of Ottawa Electric, and that I pay for 100 shares, the bank carrying the stock, how should I be assessed in that case?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That case came under my observation many times years ago when I was connected with assessment work. This Bill will work out in this way: My hon. friend, we will say, is entitled to $1,000 on those shares, out of which he has to pay $600 to the bank for carrying them. The balance of $400 would be the net earnings which my hon. friend would derive from the investment.

Mr. McCREA: The minister's explanation with reference to the question I asked does not seem to be satisfactory, and I do not think the Bill makes it quite clear.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think the words "net gain or profit" covers that.

Mr. McCREA: A person holding a property might sell it for $15,000 or $2,000 more than he was carrying it at, and that might be interpreted as profit. I think the Bill does not explain that, and I think the minister should make it clear, so that there will be no question about it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is the word "net" in the Bill?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Section 3, subsection 1, says that:

> For the purposes of this Act "income" means the annual profit or gain.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Perhaps my hon. friend will insert the word "net" there?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not like to insert the word "net," because I do not know whether it has been interpreted. I know that in the province of Ontario there are decisions that income for the purposes of taxation means net income.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Why not put it in?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I will consider it, but I do not like to insert a word without having counsel look up the cases to see that it is apt. Lawyers will appreciate that. Income, to me, means net income in the case which my hon. friend has mentioned.

Mr. LEMIEUX: There is a distinction between net and gross income or net and gross gain, which is well understood. It is not gross gain or income but net income or gain, and I do not see why it cannot be so worded. I would like to ask another question. I was asked this evening by a gentleman if a subscription made this year to the Patriotic Fund or to the Red Cross Fund would be deducted in accordance with the explanation given by my hon. friend.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes, this Bill applies to incomes for the calendar year. Therefore, any contribution made during this calendar year may be deducted from the income.

Sir HERBERT AMES: While we are on this subject, I would like to say I am rather sorry that my hon. friend the Finance Minister is not willing, for the year 1917, to consider any amount that has been subscribed and actually paid to the Patriotic Fund, or the Red Cross Fund, as having been contributed towards the support of the war and therefore having been paid as a tax. As I understand, he is only willing to go so far as to provide that whatever contribution has been made to the Patriotic Fund shall be exempted from the amount to be assessed for income tax. If a man has an income of $10,000 and he gives $1,000 to the Patriotic Fund, instead of having $3,000 exemption he has a $4,000 exemption, and it only means that he has a $40 concession made to him. That is all he gets really for his patriotic effort in giving $1,000, or one-tenth of his income, to the Patriotic Fund. I would like to have seen the whole $1,000 credited for the year 1917 as having been paid into the war fund. I wish the minister would take that into consideration for the year 1917 only, inasmuch as his income tax covers that year and inasmuch as during that year very many large contributions will be paid. For the year 1918 he can adopt the other method if he so desires.

There is another feature of this measure that I would like to speak of. The minister spoke about exempting from the operation of this Bill moneys that were contributed by taxation to patriotic funds. I just want to point out that, while it may be reasonably easy to exempt from taxation moneys that are voluntarily subscribed and paid, because these are usually given in round figures and easily obtainable, it is going to be a very difficult matter indeed to give credit to tax-payers for the amounts that they are paying into the Patriotic Fund through taxation. In New Brunswick, $500,000 is being raised for the Patriotic Fund entirely by levying a tax. It works out to about one mill on the dollar. A man with a $10,000 property will pay $10 to the Patriotic Fund in that way. Supposing that man has an income of $6,000, $3,000 of which is exempted, his tax, at four per cent on $3,000 will be $120. Are you going to say to him: We will not tax you on that $3,000, but we will tax you on $2,990 because you have given $10 through taxation to the Patriotic Fund; therefore, your tax will amount to $119.60? That is a deduction of 40 cents. I do not think it would be worth while to do all the figuring that would be necessary for such a very small reduction. In the case of a man with $1,000 property there will be a four-cent reduction instead of a forty-cent one. Every city, town and county in New Brunswick is raising money by taxation; practically every city, town and county in Nova Scotia is making a contribution by taxation; Quebec province is contributing $1,000,000 raised by taxation; Montreal, Sherbrooke and other places are making contributions raised by taxation; practically every county council in Ontario is raising money by taxation, at the rate of one, two, or three mills on the dollar; Toronto, Peterborough, St. Thomas, London and many other cities and towns are raising sums by taxation; and throughout Canada three-eighths of the money that is being raised is being raised by taxation. If you are going to figure that all down to the tiniest sums in the case of individual contributors, you are going to have such an amount of book-keeping that it will hardly be worth while.

So I would not ask any recognition of moneys paid into the Patriotic Fund on a man's regular tax bill. But where a man voluntarily contributes a generous amount I should like to see that reckoned as money contributed directly to the war, and to see the whole amount deducted from what he would pay as income tax. Even if that is not done in 1917, certainly in 1918 he should not be taxed for income on the amount he generously subscribed to the Patriotic, the Red Cross and other funds.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I have had many representations that patriotic contributions would suffer very much if the contributors were not given credit for their contributions upon the tax and not upon the assessment. I shall read a passage from a letter which I received to-day from a gentleman in Toronto, once a minister of the Crown:

> In my way of thinking, the only way to prevent such funds as the Patriotic suffering from heavy reduction is to let contributors, under the supervision of the department, deduct from the income tax the amounts they give to these funds.

In other words, he suggests that, instead of considering these contributions in calculating the assessment, they ought to be applied in reduction of the tax after it is fixed. If the tax results in a substantial diminution in the contributions to the fund we shall create a burden which the state must take up, and it may be a very sound conclusion to reach that the deduction be made upon the tax and not upon the assessment.

[Sir Herbert Ames.]

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I have endeavoured to bear in mind that if the tax is too heavy it may seriously affect contributions to the Patriotic and Red Cross Funds, which have been so generously supported by the people of Canada. But if we allow contributors to these funds to deduct their contributions from the amount of taxation to which they are liable under this measure, will that not be tantamount to our paying their subscriptions? There might be cases in which subscribers have subscribed, and will subscribe, more than the amount of their taxes, but it would seem to me that if we took their subscriptions as cash in payment of the taxes under this measure, the Government would simply be paying their contribution and assuming the burden of the fund to that extent. My hope was and is that this income tax, while undoubtedly heavy, is not unduly heavy, having regard to war conditions, and that the well-to-do people of this country who have done so well with the Patriotic and Red Cross Funds will still continue their subscriptions. I have believed it desirable not only that the Patriotic Funds and Red Cross should be sustained, but that these contributions should be continued in the interests of the donors themselves, because when a man gives to the Patriotic Fund or any other worthy object, he really benefits himself as well as the object to which he is contributing. In connection with the Patriotic Fund these contributions have made for patriotic spirit which has meant a great deal in connection with the prosecution of this war.

I assure the committee that it is from no lack or desire to be generous, in so far as the Government can be generous in this matter, that we have drafted the Bill so as to allow the contributions from the income rather than from the amount of taxes payable in respect of the income. I think it best to leave the Bill in its present form. We have been asked to make exceptions to the extent that a man contributes to religious and other philanthropic purposes. I did consider all these matters very earnestly when we were fixing the rates, particularly of the supertax. I was exceedingly anxious that the taxation should not be so severe as to dampen the patriotic enthusiasm of the people of Canada which has resulted in such splendid contributions to the Patriotic and Red Cross Funds.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: I understood the member for Montreal, St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) to say that moneys voluntarily paid into patriotic funds would be deducted from the amount assessable for income tax, but that amounts paid into such funds by way of municipal or provincial taxation would not be so deducted. If that is the case, it is most unfair. In Manitoba we have a very large tax, especially for the Patriotic Fund, amounting to about $8 upon each quarter-section of land. If the amount that a man pays into the Patriotic Fund in the ordinary course is deducted from his income assessable under this Act, surely the amounts collected from him by the municipality for the Patriotic Fund should be similarly deducted.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think that paragraph (e) should be changed by striking out the words "subscribed and," so that it would read "amounts paid by the taxpayer during the year to the Patriotic and Canadian Red Cross Funds." I desire to press the view that people who contribute to these patriotic funds under a system of taxation authorized by the provincial legislatures should receive the same treatment as those who pay in a province where there is not such legislation. In New Brunswick the amount raised is, I think, about $500,000, which is a very generous contribution. Some gentlemen in the city of St. John have asked that their taxes for the Patriotic Fund should be very largely increased beyond what they would be liable for under the law. Their request has been complied with, and the amounts which they pay are very generous. They will feel that they are discriminated against if consideration is given to those who contributed voluntarily, while no consideration is given to the people of those provinces which have passed a law providing that all people shall pay according to their means. The member for Montreal, St. Antoine, says that it would involve a good deal of bookkeeping to take into consideration the taxes paid under provincial legislation, because in many cases the amounts are comparatively small. Well, it would lead to no more bookkeeping than the making of a record of all those who contributed voluntarily, because the voluntary contributions are not all large. In New Brunswick the amount of the tax for the Patriotic Fund is endorsed upon every tax Bill; it appears separately in the assessor's books and in the books of the collector in each municipality. If any taxpayer desired to have exemption in respect to such payments to patriotic funds, he could make out his statement just as the man who contributes voluntarily makes out his statement in order to secure exemption.

Sir HERBERT AMES: How would you divide up the million dollars that is given by Quebec in such a way that each taxpayer would have a fair share?

Mr. PUGSLEY: That, of course, is an indirect contribution.

Sir HERBERT AMES: Not at all; it is raised by taxation.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is a contribution by the municipality. I suppose bonds were issued for the purpose of making the contribution.

Sir HERBERT AMES: They did that in many cases in New Brunswick.

Mr. PUGSLEY: In New Brunswick there is a direct tax upon every owner of real estate in the province. As soon as the law was passed there, voluntary contributions largely ceased, because it was considered that the amount raised by taxation should take the place of voluntary contributions.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I should dislike very much there being any feeling that discrimination existed. Some citizens subscribe directly; others concur in legislation taxing themselves and others for the purposes of the Patriotic Fund. Probably each taxpayer will indicate in his return the amount for which he has been taxed for patriotic funds. The view of my hon. friend would be met if we struck out the words " subscribed and " in paragraph (e). I would move that these words be struck out. It is hardly likely that we shall get the administration of the Act down to the mathematical nicety of a few dollars. However, we will do the best we can with it; this amendment is to avoid the appearance of discrimination.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The striking out of those words meets the case.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is the nature of the special war tax imposed in Ontario? I understand that this tax was imposed for war purposes, to assist the various funds which are incidental to the cause in Ontario.

Mr. NICKLE: It was put into a separate fund, as I understand the matter, and administered from time to time for various objects in connection with the war—Red Cross, Sailors' Relief, purchasing machine guns, Patriotic Fund and several others.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am very glad for the explanation given by my hon. friend. I may expect, as a taxpayer in Ontario, that the Minister of Finance will deduct this war tax which I have paid, in addition to my other subscriptions to the Patriotic Fund. Subsection (e) says:

"Amounts subscribed and paid by the taxpayer during the year to the Patriotic and Canadian Red Cross Funds and other patriotic and war funds approved by the minister.

This war tax should come under this subsection.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The amount is almost negligible in the case of an individual. For instance, one mill on $10,000 would be $10.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am under the impression that in my Bill the tax amounted to something like $49.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is because my hon. friend is so wealthy.

Mr. LEMIEUX: No, I have an ordinary property here, and it is on that property I am taxed. The tax is not an insignificant one. At all events, it seems to me that under this subsection the taxpayer should be permitted to make a deduction in that respect.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The amount is so very little in the case of an individual. One mill on $10,000 would be $10, so that if this war tax was permitted to be deducted from an income of $10,000, a man would be allowed to deduct, from the taxes paid under this Bill, forty cents, because the tax is only four per cent on the income.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: I am rather of the opinion that the amount of exemption allowed in connection with contributions to the Canadian Patriotic Fund is not sufficient. On the 22nd of June, the Minister of Finance spoke in this House as follows:

The hon. member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) said the other day that $40,000,000 had been raised or pledged in connection with those funds. Let us not overlook that; but unfortunately, in every community, there are one or two or three or more men who are rich and who are close and who have not contributed to those funds, and the people of this country feel that they should be made to contribute. If I can make them contribute, I will do so. I am not sure that it would not be well, in connection with an income tax, if we bring one down, to provide that a man should be exempted to the extent that he has contributed to the Patriotic and the Red Cross Funds, because, if you impose too severe taxation, you will tend to stop—I do not say you will stop—the voluntary flow of funds for those great purposes, and it is not only the money that is valuable, but the good will.

From that I rather concluded that we were going to be allowed to deduct patriotic contributions not from the income, but from the tax upon the income. That was the fair inference from what was said.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Would not the Government then be paying the contribution?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: I would not go as far as that, because I think that is too large a deduction, but that money that has been contributed to the Patriotic Fund is money that is necessary, and if we do not contribute to the Patriotic Fund, the Government will have to come to the rescue of that Fund. This Bill, however, does not sufficiently penalize the man who has not been contributing to the Patriotic Fund, because the man who has contributed is allowed a deduction of only four per cent on his contribution. That means that the man who has not contributed is penalized only to the extent of four per cent. The suggestion of the hon. member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) is a good one, that is, that those who have actually been paying contributions before the Bill was introduced, should be allowed to deduct the amount of their contributions from the tax because if you do not do that, as the tax in respect of this Bill will be on the income for the year 1917—although paid in 1918—you will have this condition of affairs, that they will be paying a tax in respect of this year and they will also have been paying into the Patriotic Fund during the same time, and they are getting practically no relief in respect of that contribution because they are getting an exemption of only four per cent of their contribution.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I shall be very glad to take the matter into consideration, but if we enact in this measure that contributions to the Patriotic and Red Cross Funds shall be deducted from income taxation, then many would prefer to give to those funds to giving to the Government. The tax will then not come in to the Government, but will go to the two funds. We are desirous that the funds should be maintained, but I would like this measure to be such that the well-to-do citizens of the country would pay the Government the amount of tax levied by it, and, at the same time, continue or even increase their contributions to the Patriotic and Red Cross Funds. The effect of giving exemption from taxation to the amount of the contribution means that the Government pays the contribution. Therefore, if a contributor gave to the Patriotic or the Red Cross Fund only the amount that he would be liable for taxation under this measure, he pays to those funds only what he is obliged to pay to the Government and the merit of his voluntary contribution is largely gone.

Sir HERBERT AMES: The hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) and I wish it clearly understood that it is only in regard to 1917 that we are pleading, the point being this, that we have had campaigns in practically every city throughout the Dominion of Canada, and we have secured a large number of subscriptions that are being paid in on a monthly basis. Practically all those subscriptions will be paid in by January, February, or, at the very latest, by March of next year. This income tax is retroactive in that it is on what a man's income was in 1917. All those men who are now giving generously to the Patriotic Fund are giving without any expectation of having an income tax placed upon them this year. They have a self-imposed income tax for the Patriotic Fund. In addition to that you are going to place upon them another income tax. All that we are pleading for is that the money which is subscribed and paid in 1917 by the comparatively small portion of our population who have an income of over $3,000, and who therefore come under this tax, may be regarded as having been paid to the Government. Three-eighths of all the money we get comes from taxation; probably as much more comes from small subscribers, and perhaps one-quarter of all we get comes from the large subscribers who have incomes of $3,000 and upwards, and who will therefore be hit by this tax.

Where a man with an income of $10,000 has deliberately settled down and said: "I will give one-tenth of my income to the Patriotic Fund," when you ask him to give three or four hundred dollars more by way of income tax in that same year you are making his burden pretty heavy. Furthermore, it must be remembered that there are in every community a certain number of extremely stingy men, who have not given a dollar to anything since the war began, who have dulled the edge of every campaign committee we have had, who have been the obstacle in every attempt we have made to raise money. Other people would say: "There is Jones, with a big income; he has not given a red cent for war purposes; if he won't give, why should we give?" We have met with that over and over again. We have frequently found two or three men in a community with big incomes who had contributed absolutely nothing, and I would like to have these men feel that they could not escape the 1917 tax by being stingy. I think it would have a helpful influence throughout the community if Parliament showed that we appreciate the patriotism and generosity of the men who have been subscribing so liberally. It would not take very much out of the minister's revenue this year. I do not say it should go beyond 1917, but it would be a recognition for that year of the generosity of these men. We shall have to make our plans for 1918 having in view the fact that this income tax has been imposed. People will subscribe then with their eyes open. They will say: "I know that I have to pay $500 income tax, and I therefore cannot give you as much for the Patriotic Fund as I did last year; I will only give you $250 this year." But for the year 1917, on which these people are pledged and have sent in their cards, making an engagement that cannot be broken, we want to feel that they are to some extent protected.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I shall be very glad to take into consideration the observations which have been made. I think they are well worthy of careful consideration.

Mr. LOGGIE: The minister will not forget that the provincial taxation spoken of is spread over a number of years, I think twenty years in the case of New Brunswick, and even if you deduct the taxes paid it would not amount to much. When this taxation was levied there was no thought of this special taxation being imposed, and perhaps that is worth considering.

Mr. McCREA: I think it is very desirable to exempt everybody if possible; but nobody knows the financial affairs of this country better than the Minister of Finance, and they are in such shape that he has had to resort to this measure of taxation. Later on, I believe he will have to resort to still more serious methods. I think it would be a mistake to modify in any way the taxation he is now imposing, on patriotic or any other grounds. The trouble has been that in the past the minister and the Government have been lacking in the courage they should have had. They should have imposed taxes before now so that the people of this country would be carrying a more substantial part of the burden to-day. If more severe methods of taxation had been resorted to it would be a great deal easier for the Minister of Finance to-day to raise funds in New York or elsewhere. I am not fond of taxation myself; I like my money as much as anybody, but I realize that we have to put our hands down in our pockets and pay the fiddler. We are performing pretty fast music just now, and the money is needed. I repeat that it would be a mistake to modify the taxation proposals because in my judgment the time is pretty near at hand when far more severe methods of taxation will have to be resorted to, and we might just as well face the music in the matter of money as in the matter of men. There is a great cry just now for the conscription of men, so let us consider means of paying these men.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: I do not quite understand clause (c). This evening the hon. member for Brantford claimed that depreciation in value of his property should be deducted from his income. Subsection (c) seems to cover that point. It says that you may have exemption from income for:

> Such reasonable allowance as may be allowed by the Minister for depreciation, or for any expenditure of a capital nature for renewals, or for the development of a business.

That seems to cover the point. I am opposed to the principle of allowing depreciation to be deducted from income.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: This refers to depreciation in connection with a business enterprise.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: It does not say so; that is my objection.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think it does. The whole section relates, and is intended to relate, to a business.

Mr. PUGSLEY: May I be permitted to call the minister's attention to the use of the word "net" in different parts of section 3—a fact which I think he ought to take into consideration in determining whether he will insert the word "net" before the word "profit" in line 2 of subsection 1. The minister said that he does not like the word "net," but he is using it in line 38 of page 2 in the phrase "the net earnings," and again on the next page in line 9, where he speaks of the "net profit or gain." Although the minister does not like the word "net" he has thought it reasonable to use it in those two cases, and he knows that it is a rule of construction that if in an Act a word is used referring to one subject and is omitted in reference to another subject, the court will draw certain inferences from that omission on the principle of "inclusio unius est silentio alterius." The minister, I know, will agree with me that it is very important to take that into consideration in considering the whole section. The court might hold that in simply using the word "annual profit or gain" in one case and "net profit or gain" in another, Parliament intended where the word "net" had been left out, that the gain or profit would be the gross gain or profit. I throw that out for the consideration of the minister.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I shall be glad to take it into consideration, but it seems to me that profit or gain means net profit.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Then why use the word "net" in the two other cases?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is unwise to use two words where one will serve the purpose.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why use it then?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Net earnings as applied to a company is a common and ordinary expression. It has a well defined and well understood meaning, and is used by accountants in making up their statements.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why do you use the words "net profit?"

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not believe the word "net" adds anything to the word "profit." I would rather strike out the word "net" in section 2. "Profit" is profit. I do not think you gain anything by saying "net profit." "Net earnings" is, of course, different.

Subsection agreed to.

On subsection 2, section 3—Holding Companies:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What is the meaning of this? Can my hon. friend give a concrete case?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If a company owns all the stock of another company, there is no reason why it should not take the product of that second company at any price that may be agreed upon irrespective of whether it is a fair market price or not, because the first-named company owns all the shares of the second. There might be an international case in which a company in the United States would own all the shares of a company in Canada. The Canadian company might be doing a highly profitable business if it was carrying on its affairs in the usual course, but by reason of a contract which it might have with the United States company to sell its product at a very low rate, it might show no profits at all. I may say this section is the same as the one in the Business Profits War Tax Act, inserted for the purpose of making such companies contribute reasonably under that measure of taxation.

Subsection agreed to.

On subsection 3, of section 3—Non-residents:

Sir HERBERT AMES: May I ask the minister what will happen in a case like this. I know a gentleman in Montreal who is manager of a large business concern. He is an American citizen, and still holds, technically speaking, his residence in the United States. He is taxed on his income in the United States, but he draws his income as a salary in Canada. Will he be taxed a second time in Canada, and therefore have to pay two income taxes?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I should say the Government which should give way would be the Government of the United States. This gentleman is domiciled in Canada and is drawing his salary in Canada. There is no reason why he should not pay the income tax. If he is subject to an income tax in the United States, that is a matter he should take up with the United States Government. I cannot see how we could distinguish his case from the case of any one else drawing a salary in Canada.

Mr. LOGGIE: Does this subsection include a corporation?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes.

Mr. LOGGIE: Does a corporation doing busines in Canada, whose head office is in the United States, have to make up a statement of the revenue from its Canadian business?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes.

On section 5—Incomes not liable to tax; paragraph (j):

The military and naval pay of persons who have been on active service overseas during the present war in any of the military or naval forces of His Majesty or of His Majesty's Allies.

Mr. GRAHAM: I presume that, as a matter of fact, comparatively few incomes of men at the front will be taxable any way?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Some. Their pay is exempt.

Mr. GRAHAM: I know that the pay they receive as members of the military forces is exempt but their entire incomes are not exempt. Has the Government considered the question of exempting the entire incomes, up to a certain amount, of men who are serving at the front?

Sir HERBERT AMES: They will be exempt to the extent of $3,000 besides by this Bill.

Mr. GRAHAM: I imagine they will be exempt up to $3,000. But suppose a man's income is $5,000, would it be unreasonable that, in consideration of the fact that he is serving at the front, he should be exempt to that extent? I have not thought of the matter very much. It was suggested to me to-day. I am not sure of the effect it would have on the finances but the minister might think it over and it might be worthy of consideration.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think it worthy of consideration. As a matter of fact there is no exemption we could give that would be more than these men deserve, but when we exempt the military and naval pay of those who have been on active service overseas we practically exempt them all from the income tax levied because there is a $3,000 exemption besides.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is for married men.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes, and $2,000 for single. My own view is that there will be no taxation for those who are at the front.

Sir HERBERT AMES: What is the argument in favour of paragraph (h)?:

The incomes of such insurance, mortgage and loan associations operated entirely for the benefit of farmers as are approved by the minister.

Supposing a co-operative, mortgage or loan association was conducted for the benefit of people who were not farmers? In the cities there are co-operative building societies.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Paragraph (f) exempts them:

The incomes of mutual corporations not having a capital represented by shares, no part of the income of which inures to the profit of any member thereof.

If a company is not operated for the gain of the shareholders it will be exempt.

Mr. McCREA: It appears to me that men who are at the front should not only have their pay exempt but also any other income they may have. A man who has given up his business, left his property and gone to the front to defend the country should not be taxed on any income whether it be his military pay or any other.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think the present provision meets the situation reasonably well. There may be some who have gone overseas, or will have gone, who would not want to be exempt altogether from the provisions of this income tax. I think they would be satisfied to be exempt to the extent of their military and naval pay.

Mr. McCREA: I mean the men who have actually gone to the front, not the honorary or titled men who are floating around at home or in London, drawing pay and doing nothing.

RAILWAY MAIL CLERKS.

REQUEST FOR INCREASE OF SALARY.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. P. MOLLOY (Provencher): I would call the attention of the Government to this telegram which I received yesterday:

Winnipeg, Man., 1st Aug., 1917.

J. P. Molloy, M.P.,
Ottawa, Ont.

On behalf of the Manitoba Railway Mail Clerks' Association, we beg to draw to your attention the fact that we are almost the only public or private servants that have not had a salary increase to meet the higher cost of living. Post Office Bill 147 of 1914 was thrown out by the Senate owing to contentious clauses having nothing to do with our increase. Other departments received this increase. A recent deputation to the department begged that this Bill be reintroduced and made retroactive. Your influence would be highly appreciated.

Respectfully,
(Sgd.) R. A. Borland,
President.

Is it the intention of the Government to grant an increase at the present session?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The hon. gentleman's observations will be commended to the consideration of the Minister of Finance and the acting Postmaster General.

[Mr. McCrea.]

WAR TAX UPON INCOMES.

CONSIDERATION OF THE BILL IN COMMITTEE.

The House in committee on Bill No. 117, to authorize the levying of a war tax upon certain incomes—Sir Thomas White—Mr. W. H. Bennett in the Chair.

On section 4—Income tax:

Mr. MARCIL: In regard to paragraph (a), is any distinction to be made between a married man who has simply his wife and himself to support and a married man who has his wife and three, four, five, six, ten or a dozen children dependent upon him?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There is no distinction made having regard to the number of family. So far as I know, there is no legislation in Canada based upon such a distinction. I think in France and in England there is a distinction, but there is this difference between our legislation and theirs, that the amount of exemption with us is $3,000. In framing the Bill, as I stated when it was introduced, we had regard to the cost of living and to the reasonable requirements of an ordinary family, and we fixed upon $3,000 as a fair exemption. It does not seem to me possible, although it appeals to one's sympathies, to make a distinction based upon the number of members of a family or of dependents.

It would be unfair to base the distinction solely on the number of the members of a family, because there are many citizens who have not only children to take care of, but other dependents as well. One man, for example, may have a wife and six children to take care of, and another man may have a wife and two children, and four or five others depending upon him. It seems to me it would be impracticable to hold an inquiry, because a question of fact would be involved as to whether or not a citizen had dependents to take care of. One can easily see how the tax could be evaded, and how embarrassing questions would arise. The essential feature of this measure, so far as regards my hon. friend's question, is that there is an exemption of $3,000, which is higher than the exemption granted in the United States legislation now before Congress, and very much higher than the exemption at present in England.

Mr. MARCIL: I have no objection to the explanation given by the minister. I do not know exactly how conditions are in England, but conditions in Canada are very different from what they are in France. The French senate not long ago introduced a measure, which I think has become law, granting aid to the parents of a family of three or four children, for the purpose of encouraging the rearing of children. Under this measure the married man who has no children at all is placed on the same footing with the father of seven or eight or a dozen children, and families of that size are very often seen in Quebec. I think it is unjust to treat them both alike, and I hope the minister will see his way clear to granting exemption in the case of unusually large families. My hon. friend has mentioned the ordinary family. Now the ordinary family is a very uncertain quantity. In the province of Quebec three or four children would be considered a very small family. I trust that the minister will find it possible to make an exception in the case of men with, say, half a dozen children to provide for.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not think my hon. friend need be unduly anxious because it is not probable, although there are no doubt exceptions, that the father of a large family will have an income of $3,000 or more. Usually the large family and the comparatively small income go together. I had the case that my hon. friend has mentioned in mind when framing this measure, and I am quite satisfied that 90 per cent, if not more, of the families he has in mind will not be affected by this taxation at all. It seemed to me impracticable to distinguish between families having regard solely to the number of children, because it is within my own personal knowledge, as I think it is within that of every member of this House, that there are many citizens who have not only their own family to take care of, but also the family of a brother or a sister, or perhaps they have to look after an aged father or mother. I have received many letters since this legislation has been introduced from unmarried men protesting against the discrimination against them on the ground that they had to take care of many dependents, and they gave particulars in their letters. In one case a man had to look after his sister and two or three children. In another, a young man had not married because he had to look after an aged mother and some invalid sisters, and a brother or two who were not doing very well. I think if we adopt the principle of a fair exemption of $3,000, we need not be anxious about the size of the family or the number of dependents. I do not see how it would be possible for the department to make the necessary inquiries to ascertain how many dependents a man had.

Mr. VERVILLE: I think an exception should be made in the case of large famlies. The minister is exempting single men up to $2,000. Personally, I think that is too high an exemption for a great many single young men in this country. I have always thought that half that amount would be plenty for a single young man. As the minister says, in some cases these men have many dependents, but it is obviously unfair to place a married man with no children on the same footing with the father of six, seven or a dozen children. I know it is not the minister's intention to penalize the parents of large families, and I think this measure affords the best possible opportunity for recognizing the importance of large families. No doubt there are some single young men who have as many depending on them as the father of a family, but I think the minister would find it a pretty big contract to find out the exact number of dependents a man had. I suppose sworn statements would be required. If I remember right, if a man makes a false statement about his income, his whole estate goes to the Crown when he dies.

Under the law of Wisconsin—there is no federal law in the United States on this subject—the parents are not allowed to send a boy to work until he is 14, or a girl until she is 16 years old. In view of the fact that the importance of children is thus recognized by the different states, I do not see why we should not make some recognition of them here. I am not speaking for myself, because I have no children, and whatever I have to pay I shall pay cheerfully. But I think it is absolutely unfair to put the man with no children on the same footing as the father of a big family, with the children to feed and clothe and send to school, and so forth. I hope the minister will see his way clear to allowing a certain exemption for each child under the age of 14. It may be said that married men with an income of $3,000 are pretty well off and will be sending their children to college, but that is not always the case. Another man may have to send his children to work. I again appeal to the minister to do justice to the parents of large families, and I claim that now is the time for the state to recognize the importance of rearing children.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am somewhat inclined to support the suggestions of the two hon.

gentlemen who have just spoken. The Minister of Finance has been preaching production all through the country. Now here is a chance for him to crystalize this encouragement into legislation in a businesslike way. The object of the exemption is to enable a man to support his family in comfort, before he is taxed. I regret that we cannot find many examples of large families in the province of Ontario. In Ontario, when you find a large family, it is extraordinary, whereas in the province of Quebec, when they have a small family it is extraordinary. It does not seem reasonable that a man without any children dependent upon him should be exempt to the extent of $3,000 income, and that another man in similar circumstances but with perhaps ten children to support should only have the same exemption. As a matter of fact, the man with the large family will probably not have anything left for taxation. The minister says all these details will involve an enormous amount of work.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I was speaking of dependents.

Mr. GRAHAM: Would it be an extremely difficult thing to keep this record? As the hon. member (Mr. Verville) has said, the returns will be made under oath, and the individual will have to swear that he is married, or unmarried, and in one more line he could add whether he has one child, or five children. This could be done if it were considered that it would complicate matters too much to have the children designated individually. Take an Ontario family as a fair example. I think if they average three children they are doing fairly well, and let us say that in any family where the number of children exceeds three there shall be a certain amount of exemption per child over and above that number. I believe I could work out a scheme for the minister by which this could be arranged without any difficulty.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: What about dependents?

Mr. GRAHAM: I have convinced the minister so far as the children are concerned. As to the dependents, I suppose my hon. friend refers particularly to single men?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: To married men as well.

Mr. GRAHAM: The first dependents a married man has are his children. If he is only exempt to the amount of $3,000, and if he has ten children, he has nothing to give to dependents, with the cost of living as it is at present.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Take a case where there are three children and seven dependents.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend will have to agree with me that the children must come first. We have some striking examples of unmarried men in this House. I am not in favour of encouraging a man to laxity in that regard, because I believe a man should get married, if possible, when he reaches a certain age. Of course, with some of them, it is not their fault. However, the fact remains that throughout the country there are thousands of men who are unmarried because they have dependents, and they have to keep, perhaps, a more expensive household than the man who is married, but has not any family. I urge upon the minister the advisability of considering making a distinction between an unmarried man without dependents and an unmarried man with dependents; let the latter show that he has dependents before you give him any better treatment than the man without dependents. If this was a war measure, to be wiped off our statute books in two or three years, we might take a general outlook and no one would be very seriously injured, but I take it for granted that the principle of an income tax having been once established in the Dominion, it is here to stay. That being so, we should start out on an equitable basis, and we should remember that in any form of taxation no matter how equitable you try to make it, you will find some injustice. I presume in this clause the minister will have to change the word "men" to "persons," because there are many spinsters who have taxable incomes, and who should pay upon them.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Graham) that in clause (a) of subsection 1, for the word "men" there should be substituted the word "persons," and I therefore beg to move:

That the word "men" in line 27 of clause (a) of subsection 1 of section 4 be struck out and that the word "persons" be substituted therefor; and that after the word "and" in line 27 there be inserted the words "widows or".

The subsection will then read as follows:

(a) Four per centum upon all income exceeding $2,000 in the case of unmarried persons and widows or widowers without dependent children, and exceeding $3,000 in the case of all other persons.

Mr. MARCIL: The minister might add to that " except in the case of fathers and mothers with more than say, three, four, or five children.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I will take those representations under consideration. At the present moment I see certain difficulties in the way of carrying it out. You could add so much to the cost of administration of the Act in the way of the expense of making inquiry as to the number of dependents that it would take a very large toll from the proceeds. If you make a distinction of $1,000 in exemptions between the case of a man who has dependents and a man who has not, it will be found that ninety-nine per cent of the people of Canada will have dependents—in the returns. They will allege that they have dependents, and will prove it to their own satisfaction, and it will be impossible to disprove it. The only effect will be that you will increase your exemption by $1,000. The suggestions made are very important, and have been put forward fairly.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am afraid my hon. friend sees a lion in the path when there is not any. A few months ago he saw a whole herd of lions in the path on account of the expense of collection, but they have all disappeared with the exception of this one little cub. The regulations under which our soldiers go to the front provide for separation allowance to a dependent. Assigned pay is also given to a dependent. A mother or sister dependent on the soldier occupies the same position as if she were the wife, or a child. The information is given, and made good, by the soldier, and it does not seem to have caused any great trouble. I am inclined to think if the minister will consider the matter calmly—and he will have Sunday to think it over—if he is sympathetically impressed he can work out a scheme which would not be very expensive or impracticable, and which would start us on the right road with this income tax, which will be a permanent institution in Canada.

Mr. KNOWLES: I do not see why there should be any confusion between a man who has dependents and one who has not. If for any reason it is not practicable to grant a greater exemption to a man who has dependents, then unfortunately he must suffer, but what has that to do with the merits of the case of a man who has dependents, as contrasted with a man who has no children. If it is right that a single man should have a less exemption than a married man because the living expenses are less, then it is as clear as the chimney on the housetop that on the same principle a married man and his wife who have no children have less expense than a married man with a wife and children. That principle is not in the slightest way affected by introducing the question of some clerical difficulty in regard to the matter of getting at the condition of affairs, namely, that a man may have dependents who do not happen to be his children. There is no comparison between the position of the man and his wife with no child and the man and his wife with children. There is no comparison with regard to the household expense. The woman is free; she can go out whenever she wants to, or she can work and earn money, or she can look after her own household and save a lot of disbursements. I believe that a husband and wife with children should have a greater exemption than the husband and wife who have no children.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not agree that the question of dependents can be dismissed from consideration. Take the case of a man who has a wife, two children and no dependents. Then, take the case of a man who has a wife and no children, but who also has a mother eighty years of age and an invalid sister. Does my hon. friend suggest that the latter should not be entitled to the exemption extended to the former? The man cannot turn his aged mother out of doors and he cannot allow his sister to starve. We cannot consider this question solely on the ground of children; we must take into consideration the question of a man's dependents if we want to deal fairly with every one. I have received several letters since this measure was brought down, which impressed me very much, stating that it was unfair to discriminate against unmarried men. These men, instanced their own cases, some with three, some with four, some with five dependents, whom they could not in honour, or with any regard for filial duty, turn out of doors. When we consider the question of children, we must also consider the question of dependents, and if we consider the question of dependents that would necessitate an inquiry, and, in my view, the effect would be that in nearly all cases some dependents would be put forward and the amount of the exemption would have to be increased. There is hardly a family in Canada that could not put forward some dependents. I do not mean to say that in all cases they would sustain their claim under a legal inquiry, but for all practical purposes they would claim exemption on the ground of having dependents. You would have to deal with the claims of the man who had two children and one dependent and with that of the man who had one child and two dependents and it would give you a great dealt of trouble in the administration of the Act. I am quite willing to take this matter into consideration because the views with regard to it have been put forward very fairly and are entitled to weight. But, I think that when we made an exemption of $3,000 we avoided cases of hardship, even in cases of comparatively large families. With regard to those families in the province of Quebec who have been spoken of, where there are ten or twelve members, you also have to remember that there is the exemption of $3,000. There is another feature that must be borne in mind in connection with this exemption, and it is that incomes in this country may be subject to three sets of taxes. First, you have the federal tax which is about double, up to $6,000, the average municipal tax; second the provincial tax and, third, the municipal tax. If the provinces and municipalities do their duty in the matter of the administration of assessments covering income, the citizens of this country will be fairly heavily taxed. First, there is the municipal tax averaging two or three per cent; second, there is the provincial tax which may be one, two or three per cent, and on top of that there is this tax of four per cent. Do not let us jump to the conclusion that the citizens of this country will go untaxed because there are three sets of taxes which will constitute a very fair charge upon their incomes.

Mr. ROBB: Listening to the objections of the Minister of Finance the question occurred to me whether he had looked into the income tax law of the state of Massachusetts which was passed last year. There is perhaps no state on this continent where education is so free as in the state of Massachusetts; yet, in passing their income tax Bill, the state of Massachusetts recognized that a man bringing up a young family was entitled to a certain exemption. I have not the Act before me but my recollection is that provision is made for an exemption for the parent of a family bringing up three or four children of school age. It would seem to me that the minister might very well take into consideration children of the school age and make a certain exemption for a man with a family whose children are yet at school.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: Assuming that $3,000 is the proper exemption for a married man with a family and a household to keep, my chief objection is that the unmarried man has too much exemption. Take the case of an unmarried man who is living in a hotel. He is entitled to an exemption of $2,000. He gets married and he and his wife live in the same hotel and it costs him twice as much before. Yet, in that case, he only gets an exemption of $3,000. If he takes up a house and has a family he will have more than double the expense that he had before and as his family increases his expenses will increase. I do think that the unmarried man is being shown an undue preference assuming that $3,000 is the proper amount for exemption of the married man. I would certainly think that we should reduce the exemption of the unmarried man to $1,500 to put him on a fair and equitable basis with the married man. The man who can go around unmarried with $162 a month coming in, who is not required to contribute anything to this war is, in my opinion, escaping too lightly. I quite realize the soundness of the argument of the Minister of Finance that there are some cases in which a married man has dependents but it is the exception rather than the rule and we are legislating for the rule and not for the exception. There may in some cases be an injustice but I venture to say that for every unmarried man who has dependents there are twenty-five or thirty who have not, and, as I say, we must legislate for the rule and not for the exception. For that reason, it would be dealing more justly with the married man with a large family if we cut down the exemption of the unmarried man. In that way you will get at the unmarried man, you are giving to the married man a certain measure of justice and on the whole the tax collected will be more. I move that the amount of the exemption to unmarried men be cut from $2,000 to $1,500.

Mr. NICKLE: The Minister of Finance might very well pay heed to what the last speaker has said in reference to the allowance to the unmarried man of $2,000 being too great because there is no man in this House who can speak with greater authority as to the responsibilities of the unmarried man than the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro). He was for several years in that class.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: He has changed his mind since.

Mr. NICKLE: Therefore, he knows well of what he speaks. It may be that I approach this question from a different standpoint from that of the other members of this House. It may be surprising to some members on this side, that, as a Conservative, I am thoroughly enthusiastic over this measure being introduced in this House, because I have always felt that the indirect method of taxation, in a country such as Canada, had this unfortunate effect, that it made the people blind to the fact that it was their money that was being expended, and that a good many things were got away with in times past that never would have been permitted if the people had realized that they were to be directly called upon to meet the expenditures that had been made.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Hear, hear.

Mr. NICKLE: And I think there is another side to the question. When you raise your entire revenue by taxation by customs charges, there is no question whatever that the man who has a small income, the expenditure of the entire amount being necessary to meet his living expenses, is more heavily taxed than the man who has more than he actually needs to live——

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. NICKLE—because the man who spends every dollar he earns to live pays taxes on every dollar he spends, whereas the man who has sufficient to put away a surplus for a rainy day escapes paying taxes on the surplus that he saves. Certainly that is unfair to the man who earns a small income; and in a country like Canada, most men earn small incomes. One Finance Minister wittily said that the function of a Finance Minister was "to gather the most feathers with the least squawking," and I am afraid that principle has possibly influenced the Finance Minister in drafting this Bill. I approach the subject possibly more from the point of view of an evangelist than from a business man and tax collector. I believe that every man in this country should have some of the burden of this war thrust upon him, if I may use the word "thrust." To vary the phraseology slightly, I believe that every man who can should bear some of the burden of this war, and I think the exemption of $3,000 to the married man and $2,000 to the unmarried man is too large. I come from a small community, a city that has somewhere in the neighbourhood of 25,000 people. The great majority of the married men there do not earn $3,000 a year; the great majority of the unmarried men do not earn $2,000. When I was home last week I was told there were objectors to the exemptions because they wanted to pay a part of this tax, and felt they should. I was not surprised either, because the city from which I come sent many men to the war. The people there are enthusiastically in favour of conscription, and what they say to me is: If you are in favour of conscription, if you think that every man should go to the front who can go, then, to be consistent, you should support a lessening of the exemption, because those who cannot go and ought for national reasons to remain at home, should bear their share of the burden. I think they were right in saying this. For that reason I urge upon the Finance Minister that he lower the exemption in the case of married men to $2,000, and in the case of unmarried men to $1,000.

I direct the attention of the Minister of Finance to another aspect, and I am particularly immune from criticism because I have not within my riding a single farmer; I live within a purely urban district. The people in the cities who are earning from $1,200 to $2,000 a year are beginning to feel that the burden of taxation in this war is not fairly distributed. They have no way of increasing their revenue. I am speaking of people with fixed salaries or wages, not of the class who can increase their earnings owing to the increased demand for labour, the university Fellow, the university professor, the school teacher, the bookkeeper who earns $1,500, and that class of man. He says: The increased cost of living since the war began is taking anywhere from 40 per cent to 100 per cent more from me than before the war; the reason I am called on to pay more now than before is that the cost of the commodities that I have to buy for the maintenance of my family is determined by the export price, and I am in competition in my buying with the world; the result is that I am—and I am not objecting to it, I recognize it as necessary because I believe that the exigencies of the case demand it—not as well off as I was. But why do you not put some tax on the farmer, who is getting many of the good things out of the war, but is getting off practically scot free; he buys but little, and therefore he is taxed slightly; the increased price of the products of his farm is bringing him a much greater return, and in this Income Tax Bill as it is drawn, the farmer is getting off scot free, because it is the income that the man has earned that is taxed, and in the case of the farmer there will be no tax at all because he takes his living out of what he grows. I should like to direct this matter to the attention of the Minister of Finance. I realize that this Parliament has always been singularly sympathetic towards the farmer, but I think the time has about come when we should see to it that those who are getting great advantage from the war on the principle that I enunciated a few minutes before should contribute something towards its maintenance, that those who are able best to pay should be willing to pay.

I wish to direct attention to one or two points in this same section 4. I cannot see the logic of giving the married man an advantage over the unmarried man of only $40, no matter how big the income on which the tax is paid. I do not know how carefully the gentlemen of the House have studied section 4, but it is based on the principle that the married man gets off, if I may use the expression, with a start of $1,000; that is, he saves $40 on the initial taxation. But it makes no difference whether the tax is paid on an income of $3,000 or of $100,000, the married man has an advantage of only $40. That, I say, is thoroughly illogical, and is not as it should be. Surely if you have two men, each enjoying an income of $40,000, one an unmarried man, the other a married man with all the responsibilities that are entailed by domestic life, it is unreasonable to say that the unmarried man should pay only $40 more income tax than the married man.

I quite agree with what has been said by the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham). I quite realize that this is our first attempt in income tax legislation, and I realize that, as the days go on, there will be many amendments to this Act. I am impressed with the fact that the income tax, once established in Canada, will continue in force for a long time, and so it has to be drawn along scientific lines in order that the burden may be made to rest on those best able to pay, that is, that it shall be a tax on the ability to pay. While it may not come this year, for, perhaps, it is too late to consider it this session, the time is not far remote when the question of dependency and family responsibility will have to be considered, because the people will insist that the burden shall be borne equitably by all.

[Mr. Nickle.]

I am startled by the proposition that a man with an income of $10,000 is to be allowed to keep $9,640. The other day the Minister of Finance showed what the taxes would be. I want to approach it from the point of view of the income, and to show you how much the man is allowed to keep under this Tax Bill. The amounts retained by married men with different incomes are:

Total income.	Amount not taken.
5,000	4,920
7,000	6,820
10,000	9,640
12,000	11,460
15,000	14,190
20,000	18,740
30,000	27,540
50,000	44,740
75,000	64,990
100,000	85,240
150,000	120,740
200,000	156,240

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. NICKLE: You may say that in a war like this you cannot equalize sacrifice. But you can do one thing. You can try to apportion the burden. I admit you cannot equalize sacrifice. The wife who lets the husband go, or the parent who lets the children go, if the husband or sons do not come back, makes a greater sacrifice than any man who remains at home can make by monetary subscription or impost. But at a time like this, to tax the man with an income of $12,000 only $540, when you say to another man: "You must go to the trenches because your place is not important in the country," is in my judgment not apportioning the burden in a fair degree. I may be wrong, but that is my opinion. I think the opinion of the people of the country on this Bill will be that the large incomes escape too lightly, and I would bring this to the attention of the Minister of Finance at this time, so that if possible, before this Bill passes, he may see his way to increase somewhat the amount of taxes on these men. I do not want to use the word "somewhat," but I would say to increase radically the taxes on the large incomes. It is quite possible it may make many who have given refuse to give further, but I think it would have the effect of making some give who have never given, and if those men give, then the advantage to the State will be great, because previously some have escaped, but under this Act, if it had been framed as

I suggest, all would have to contribute to the burden the State is called upon to pay. I desire to direct the attention of the Minister of Finance to a remark made in the House the other day, as follows:

> The House is aware that liability to the Business Profits War Tax of 1916 and the amendment thereto of this year comes to an end on December 31 this year, and it is not the intention to renew that measure.

I do not know whether the intention is by implication to say that the Act we now have under consideration is to take the place of the Business Profits Tax, but I think it would be very objectionable if those making profits out of this war were to be relieved of the burden substantially great cast upon them by the Profits Tax. A man may be making just as large a profit if he makes a small percentage on a tremendous turnover that has resulted from a very excessive trade, owing to this war, as if he made a large percentage on a normal turnover on some business in which he was enabled to make a profit owing to the scarcity of the article. A man is a profiteer who has taken advantage of the exigencies of the State to unduly increase his income, and I trust the Minister of Finance will keep this in view in any legislation that he may have in contemplation, or the annulling of any legislation that may have existed in regard to war profit taxes.

4 p.m.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Three questions have been taken up so far, all of which are important. With regard to the unmarried man and widows, or widowers without children, I think we might reasonably meet the suggestion of the hon. gentleman from North Grey, and make the amount $1,500 instead of $2,000. I would be prepared to move, in order to meet what I deem to be the view of the committee, that the words "two thousand" at the end of line 26 and the beginning of line 27, be struck out and that the words "fifteen hundred" be substituted therefor. While I still think it is a fact that many unmarried men have dependents upon them, and in fact have not married because they have such dependents, still, possibly, having regard to the average condition of the unmarried men, that change would not be objectionable. I do not know that there is any such discrimination in other Canadian legislation. There is a discrimination to the extent of a thousand dollars in the legislation of the United States against the unmarried man. So far as I know there is nothing of the kind in this country.

Mr. GRAHAM: There is in the provinces. I think, unless the statute has been changed, there was a greater exemption for married men given by municipalities than for single men.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: However, the matter is not of great importance, and if this is deemed reasonable I would move that the words "two thousand dollars" be made "fifteen hundred dollars." With regard to children, there is undoubtedly also the fact as to dependents, but I think that if $3,000 could be regarded as a fair exemption in the case of the average man, if we put aside the question of dependents—because that would really necessitate an inquiry as I stated—it might be reasonable to provide that the exemption should be increased somewhat in case of those who have a family, say, of six children. I do not know whether that would meet the views of the committee or not, but we might discuss it later. If the committee think it would reasonably meet the situation to give an exemption of $4,000 in the case of those who have six children or more, I think I would be prepared to consider that phase of it, and have an amendment drafted accordingly. I do not think we can deal so well with the case of dependents, because the principle is undoubtedly there. They have to be taken care of just like children. It might be fair to provide that if a man has six children his exemption should be $4,000 instead of $3,000.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: You might reduce the rate.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I would very much rather reduce the exemption and keep the rate. The hon. gentleman from Kingston has referred to two or three other important matters. One is as to whether or not the rate is high enough, especially upon the larger incomes. In such experience as I have had with taxation—and it has been considerable—there is only one tax that I know of that is popular, and that is the tax that is on the other fellow. I have received hundreds of letters suggesting various forms of taxation since I have been minister, and in very few cases indeed has a suggestion been made of a mode of taxation which would immediately affect the writer. We are considering a serious measure of taxation at a serious time. I indicated when the measure was introduced that I had been guided by certain considerations which were regarded of importance in framing these provisions. In the first place—and I desire to emphasize this now—I have regard to the fact that people of this country have contributed, and are contributing very materially indeed from their incomes, to support the Patriotic and Red Cross and other war funds. That had very considerable weight with me in fixing the rates which we have adoped in this measure. I think this country has raised $40,000,000, by voluntary contributions from the citizens.

Sir HERBERT AMES: Nearer $50,000,000.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend from St. Antoine says "nearer $50,000,000." That has been raised in three years by voluntary contribution on the part of the people of this country. When you are considering taxing a man with an income of $5,000 or $10,000, the question is not solely one of how much you can take out of that man; you must consider what that man is doing, or, at least, what most men of that class are doing with regard to those funds. I am perfectly satisfied that if we impose too severe a taxation upon men with substantial incomes, we shall at once, I will not say dry up, but very materially diminish the amount of voluntary contribution which will be made to the Canadian Patriotic, Red Cross, and other such funds. Whether the conclusion reached was sound or not, I submit that in considering a measure of income taxation, it would not be proper for us to disregard what the people of this country are doing with regard to those funds. If a severe income tax would dry up their bounty and stop the flow of contributions to the Patriotic and Red Cross Funds, then we should hesitate before imposing such a degree of taxation.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Some allowance is made for those payments.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes, but the allowance is comparatively small. My hon. friend knows the principle upon which we have gone in making those allowances. As I pointed out last evening, if we say that we will allow a man from his taxation the amount which he pays to the Patriotic and Red Cross Funds, then there is no bounty, no voluntary giving on his part at all, because the Dominion Government simply furnishes him with the money to pay his contribution. I pointed out last night, and I emphasize again to-day, that not only is it good that those funds should be maintained, but it is very much in the interest of the prosecution of this war that men should continue to give to those funds. It is a mistake to assume that if a man gives to a fund, that man is in some way damaged or injured by his giving. It has often been pointed out that A gives to the Patriotic Fund; that B does not, and the conclusion is drawn that A is injured as compared with B. On the contrary, A is benefited as compared with B. B is damaged by reason of the fact that he does not give, and A is benefited by reason of the fact that he does give. The more that a man gives, the better man he is; the more it makes for his character, and the more it will make for his interest in this war. As I stated when this Bill was introduced, I reached the conclusion that if we imposed unduly severe taxation, we would dry up the source of funds of the Patriotic, Red Cross and other funds, and I believe that is so.

There is another feature that I want to point out, and I do not believe it can be lost sight of. Unless for grave reasons of national necessity, this income tax should not be higher than the income tax imposed by the United States Federal Government. Why? Because if it is materially higher, you will find that men will decline to come into this country and contribute to its upbuilding by their energy, enterprise and capital, because this tax is a tax not only upon personal earnings, but upon the earnings of individuals, firms and companies engaged in business. Therefore, if we have a substantially higher tax than exists in the United States, we shall undoubtedly lose. We may gain more in immediate taxation, but we shall lose without doubt in ultimate results. In framing our taxation, we did not compare it with the existing income tax legislation in the United States, because there is before Congress now legislation increasing that income taxation, but we framed it having regard to the proposed increased taxation on income now before Congress. This is a comparative statement of the taxation of income in Canada and in the United States under the legislation now before Congress on persons other than unmarried men and widowers without children:

Amount of Income.	Taxation in the United States.	Taxation in Canada.
$ 4,000	$ 40	$ 40
7,000	180	180
10,000	355	360
20,000	1,180	1,260
50,000	4,780	5,260
75,000	8,880	10,010
100,000	14,180	14,760
200,000	42,180	43,760

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Within the last few days the Finance Committee of the American Senate have been considering a proposal to increase the tax on income from $20,000 upwards to such an extent that it will give them an increase in revenue of $230,000,000.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: They may be considering an increase now, but the figures given were the figures before me when I was framing this income taxation measure. This income taxation measure is not a finality. If it is found necessary to increase it, it may be increased, but the committee should bear in mind the two points I have mentioned: First, by the effect of severe taxation upon the Patriotic, Red Cross and other war funds—and that is what weighed with me very heavily—and, secondly, the question of income taxation in the United States.

Mr. ROBB: I would understand from the minister's argument that he concludes that the greater part of the contributions to the Patriotic and Red Cross Funds have been given by people who have revenues of over $3,000.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I would not say that, because I do not know, offhand, whether that is so or not, but I know that many a man with an income of $10,000 has given $500 or $1,000 to the Patriotic Fund, and the question I have in mind is this: if you tax him to the extent of $1,000 or $1,500, will he continue to give to the same extent to the Patriotic Fund? My opinion is that he will not be likely to. Many such a man certainly will not.

I have not the slightest doubt that if we increase this tax to a certain point of severity we shall dry up the contributions to the Patriotic and Red Cross Funds, which mean so much to the dependents of our soldiers overseas. That would simply mean that the Dominion Government would have to take over the Patriotic and Red Cross Funds. If we came to that point, I would be the first to say, I shall increase the rates of income taxation under this measure.

Mr. ROBB: Does not the minister think that, perhaps unintentionally, his argument is a little unfair to the thousands of people throughout Canada who are drawing less than $2,000, but are contributing generously to the Patriotic and Red Cross funds?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am not reflecting on them in any way at all. They would continue to contribute, because they are not liable to this tax. I was speaking of those who would be affected by this tax, or by a severer one, and of their probable action in connection with the Patriotic and Red Cross funds?

Mr. MARCIL: If a man has invested in Dominion war loans and has derived a certain revenue therefrom, is that revenue exempt?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: All war loan issues are exempt from Dominion taxation.

Mr. MARCIL: If he invested in one of our domestic war loans, would that be treated the same as a contribution to the Patriotic Fund, and the revenue derived therefrom be exempt?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Those issues of Dominion bonds which have been made in Canada for the purposes of the war, and were issued income-tax free are income-tax free there is no question about that.

Mr. MARCIL: The man who is wise enough to invest in Canadian war loans will escape taxation.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The man who invests in Canadian war loans will not pay on income derived from that investment, but it must be borne in mind that these things adjust themselves. The imposition of this income tax should have the effect of improving the market for Dominion war bonds, which would mean that the rate of interest which they will yield will be less and less. My hon. friend might ask if it is fair that the holder should be exempt. My answer is this: It is open to an ordinary holder to invest money at 6 or 7 per cent on mortgage. If he takes the income-tax free Dominion bonds he will get a yield of a little over 5 per cent only. So the matter adjusts itself; substantially it is as broad as it is long.

I now come to the other point with regard to the Business Profits War Tax, and I am glad the hon. member for Kingston brought that up because it has been adverted to, and the situation has been entirely misunderstood. It has been stated that this income tax is to take the place of the Business Profits War Tax Act. It is intended to do nothing of the kind.

This income tax legislation does not refer to the Business Profits War Tax at all, except to this extent: If an individual or a firm or a company has to pay the tax imposed by the Business Profits War Tax Act, and if that is greater than the amount for which that individual or firm or company would be liable under this income taxation measure, then the individual or firm or company pays the greater tax, and does not pay the income taxation.

Mr. KYTE: That is for this year only.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I will come to that in a moment. I say that that is the only reference in this income taxation measure to the Business Profits War Tax Act. Let us consider what the Business Profits War Tax Act is. It was introduced in 1916, and at that time it was stated, and it so appears in the measure itself, that liability to taxation under section 3 of that Act, which is the operative clause, would terminate on December 31, 1917. It was so stated at the time that measure was intrcduced; my remarks on February 1, 1916, were:

> The duration of the measure will be limited to August 3, 1917.

Afterwards, in committee, that was changed to December 31, 1917. So that before this income tax measure was introduced at all, it was well understood in this House that the Business Profits War Tax terminates, so far as its operative provisions are concerned, on December 31, 1917.

Now, when the matter was under discussion this year there were pretty strong protests from some hon. gentlemen opposite against continuing the tax. For instance, my hon. friend from Pictou, who I am sorry is not in his place to-day, said:

> When we point out to him that he is taxing industry, and to that extent checking the demand for labour as well as checking production of articles so essential to the country's welfare, that he is preventing capital from doing all that it might do for the development of the country, and ask why he does not tax accumulated wealth, he gives statements which, I submit, are not adequate reasons for the course he is pursuing.

Again, on May 3, 1917, the same gentleman said:

> He should have gone to other sources this year because the taxation which is paid by the business people of this country is so extraordinary and unusual that it is bound to create an onerous condition of such a character as will impair and interfere with industries. That is the criticism I make in regard to the policy, but not in regard to the principle of the Business Profits Tax itself.

Further on my hon. friend said:

> But my hon. friend's proposals do not come under that proposition, and the exactions he is taking will slacken the industry, impair the prospect of capital investment, and dampen the patriotic enthusiasm of the party who is being taxed.

What I am trying to establish is that it was fully understood before this income taxation measure was brought down, that the Business Profits War Tax Act, was a limited measure. My hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) on page 1529 of Hansard, said:

> I hardly think my hon. friend is quite fair in this proposed legislation. I do not want to do my hon. friend any injustice. When he brought down last year the legislation that he is now amending he said that the legislation would be operative during a period of three years. Any one reading his speech would come to the absolute conclusion that that was a fixture for three years. My hon. friend now goes back on what we understood him to mean last year and is now putting an extra burden of taxation on the same shoulders on which he put it last year, after stating, as every one thought, that, that was the end of that system of taxation.

There are many other extracts that I could place on Hansard substantiating that position, but I do not think it will be seriously controverted, because in the measure itself it is provided that, so far as the operative section is concerned, it terminates on December 31, 1917.

Let us see what the position is. I pointed out to the House that this measure was introduced in 1916, and was retroactive in effect. It applied to profits made in 1915, although such profits had in many cases been distributed to shareholders or invested in plant. What is the position of the Business Profits War Tax Act today? It is this: the individuals, firms and companies who are liable under that tax paid out of their profits of 1916, because the tax was retroactive, the amount to which they were liable in respect of 1915, and they pay this year, 1917, upon their profits of 1916. Next year, 1918, they will pay a heavy taxation —I think the heaviest in the world—against their profits of 1917. There are firms in Canada which will pay next year $800,000, $1,000,000, and $1,500,000 in respect of their profits on this year's business.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: They are lucky to be able to do it.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I agree with my right hon. friend. They are fortunate to be able to do it, and that is what I told them when they complained. The point I make is that this was a three-year measure, retroactive for one year, and that is the feature which is lost sight of. They paid in 1917, and they will pay in 1918, the heaviest business tax in the world. That holds the situation until 1918, so far as concerns those who are making abnormal profits out of the war. This income tax provides that if by chance there should be any firms—and I believe there will be very few indeed—whose taxation under the business profits war tax payable next year, in respect of their earnings this year, will be equal to or less than the taxation which they would pay under this measure, they may deduct it. That is all it means. The idea is simply they are not to pay the heavy business profits war tax and this income tax as well. I do not believe any one will say there is anything unfair about that.

Mr. PARDEE: Do they deduct the amount of the income tax under this Bill from their original business war tax, and pay the business war tax in full?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No, it is the other way around. Supposing my hon. friend was fortunate enough to be taxable next year, 1918, to the extent of $100,000 under the Business Profits War Tax Act amendment of this year, and supposing if that Act were not in existence he would be liable under this legislation to pay $50,000, he would pay the $100,000. He pays the larger tax. The business tax in England is not nearly as severe as this, because it has relation to the average profits before the war, which were much higher than seven per cent in most cases. For the year 1918, there is not a Government in the world that will levy a more severe business profits tax than the Government of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. MARCIL: Is not that largely because the profits are greater in Canada than elsewhere.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No, I do not think so. It is because of the progressive tax. It is one-quarter up to fifteen per cent; one-half between fifteen per cent and twenty per cent, and three-quarters over twenty per cent. There are companies in this country which will earn $2,000,000 and they will pay the Government out of that $1,100,000 or $1,200,000. There was a case brought to my attention not long ago where a company makes $1,500,000, and it will pay us $900,000 in tax.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is all right.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am not complaining at all. I take the same view as my hon. friend. He and I have the distinction of being poor, or comparatively poor—probably I had better speak for myself. I said to the party in question. " Well, it is true that I am taking $900,000 from you, but do not forget I am leaving you $600,000." We are coming towards the end of this war. I do not know how soon it will be. I do not think my opinion or the opinion of anybody on the point is of much value, but we are necessarily coming towards the end of the war with each year.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Next year.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: With the end of the war there will come a time in this country when business will be confronted with the trying period of dislocation, in which capital will be required, in which extensions will have to be made in order to increase the productivity of plants and business enterprises. It has been our view that so far as the average business firm is concerned, a tax of this character is not a good tax in peace time. That has been said in this House, not only by myself, but by many members, when the Business Profits Tax has been under discussion. When I refer to the welfare of business in the period succeeding the war—a period of dislocation, of unsettlement, when working capital will be required and when banking accounts should be kept strong—I speak also of the welfare of the labour community, because the welfare of the business community and the welfare of the labour community are tied up together. Upon the welfare of the one depends the welfare of the other, and we must have regard to both in our measures of taxation. Our first duty is the prosecution of the war. We have attended to that duty, and I emphasize the point, because in 1918 there will be collected upon the profits of 1917 the highest business tax in the world. My hon. friend (Mr. Graham), in his objection to my amendment to the Budget this year, in regard to the Business Profits War Tax Act, said:

> Not a few industries engaged in the manufacture of munitions and other commodities influenced by the war assert that after the war there will be a very critical period of readjustment. Some of them fear that during that period of readjustment they will be able to do nothing more than pay running expenses. The most conservative of these have been preparing for that period by placing to one side each year a reasonable reserve, feeling that when their present large business ceases —as we hope it will very shortly—they will find themselves, under the new system of taxation, in a serious financial plight. They tell me that during the two or three years succeeding the war these reserves will be used up in their effort to readjust themselves to new conditions and to prepare for a staple business in the future. Some of them, I understand, think that the action of the Government in taking such a large proportion of the amount they now have on hand will cause them to come to a condition of practical bankruptcy during the period of readjustment. I feel confident that the minister, far from having that in mind, would like to protect our industries against this result. To my mind this is the most serious aspect of the matter; the figures that have been presented to me by some concerns lead me to believe that there is a good deal in the contention.

In the opinion of my right hon. friend's lieutenant—the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham)—there is to be a period of readjustment, having regard to which this tax is so heavy that it will bring many firms in Canada to the verge of bankruptcy.

This Parliament will be in session in 1918. If this war goes on more and more money will be needed. The business of the country is the prosecution of the war and to find money with which to prosecute the war. We have done it up to date, and we are going to continue to do it. We have taken the largest portion of profits of any country in the world. I have been criticised, in this House and outside of it, as I believe no Finance Minister has ever been for imposing such heavy taxation. Nevertheless, this Government stands for the principle that, if abnormal profits due to the war are made by business, there must be abnormal taxation in order that the Government may take a substantial share of those profits. The situation is secure until the end of 1918. My own view is with respect to existing legislation that there are some defects in it. The question of allowance for extension of plant and the question of the amount of bank indebtedness present themselves. But I desire to say just this, that having as our guiding principle that this war must be carried on to a successful conclusion to the utmost of our power, and that the man at the front must be backed by the dollar at home, this Government can be depended upon at the next session of Parliament (if this war still continues and the financial demands upon us are increased) to take the step the moment it appears necessary that there should be abnormal taxation upon abnormal profits derived from the war.

I am glad that my hon. friend from Kingston has given me an opportunity of dealing with this matter. I just want to leave the thought with the House that the situation is held securely until the end of 1918. In 1918 we will know absolutely what the profits of concerns are in this country and what the outlook is both from the standpoint of war and the standpoint of business. In the light of those conditions we can take such action as may be necessary having regard to the public interest and our supreme duty to carry on this war.

I want to say a word or two with regard to the question of large profits. Take a balance sheet which shows that a concern makes, we will say, $1,000,000. The man who is not acquainted with a balance sheet thinks that that means that this firm has made $1,000,000 in cash. How are these profits carried? They may be in stocks of goods bought at the top of the market, at the high prices prevailing in war time, in raw material bought at higher prices than have ever prevailed before; they may be represented by extensions of plant which have been made during the year, and instead of the firm or company having $1,000,000 in cash, or they may owe the bank $100,000 or $200,000 at the end of the year. It has a bearing upon the amount of actual cash it is proper to take out of these firms by means of the Business Profits War Tax.

Sir WILFRIED LAURIER: The balance sheet will show that?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The balance sheet will show that but the statement goes out to the country that a company has made $1,000,000 and an uninformed man might reach the conclusion that they made $1,000,000 in cash, whereas it may have gone into extension of plant, or stocks of goods which will depreciate next week or before they are sold, or into raw material which, when worked up into finished product, shows a loss. Thus, in dealing with the question of how much cash a company or a business has, you must have regard to the situation that prevails in that way. The situation is that the taxation power of the Government is not exhausted and it will be exercised at the proper time, having regard to the conditions that then prevail and to the necessities with which we are then confronted arising out of the war.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Under the conditions which my hon. friend has just stated, a balance sheet showing $1,000,000 of profits, one part of which has gone into extension of plant, another into goods on the shelf and another into raw material, is my hon. friend to tax the business in accordance with the principle laid down in section 3 of the Bill in the following words:

And shall include the interest, dividends or profits directly or indirectly received from money at interest upon any security or without security, or from stocks, or from any other investment, and, whether such gains or profits are divided or distributed or not.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There is no doubt that under this income tax measure, if a company such as my right hon. friend has in mind—let us say a commercial compa y —shows by its balance sheet that it has made a net profit of $100,000, even although that net profit is represented in goods, which will be taken according to the inventoried value, the tax will apply to the $100,000.

Mr. KYTE: I take it that this income tax Bill has been brought in by my hon. friend (Sir Thomas White) in obedience to the general demand that has been made throughout Canada, since the Bill providing for compulsory service of men was introduced into Parliament, for an equally drastic and universal conscription of wealth. It was pointed out from time to time that the term "conscription of wealth" was extremely misleading and did not actually convey the idea that was in the minds of the persons who desired that the wealth-producing portion of this country should contribute more largely towards the supplying of money to carry on the war than it had done heretofore. During every session of Parliament since the war broke out the suggestion has been made on this side of the House that the Finance Minister ought to introduce a system of taxation for the purpose of augmenting our revenue, but as frequently as it was argued and demanded from this side of the House that this step should be taken, the Minister of Finance argued that it could not be done. He proved to the satisfaction of his supporters that an income tax law ought not to be introduced as a part of the revenue-producing legislation of this country. But new light has come to the Minister of Finance, and in the language of the maiden who, vowing that she'd ne'er consent, consented, the Minister of Finance, after vowing that he could not introduce an income tax Bill, introduced it.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Is my hon. friend quoting from Don Juan?

Mr. KYTE: He has made a point of the fact that the Business Profits War Tax is still in force in this country and that it will continue until 1918. But I would like to make it perfectly clear that the business profits war tax ceases on the 31st December, 1917, and that any tax payable in 1918 with respect to business profits will be paid upon profits earned during the present year. As regards individual companies, liability for this Business Profits War Tax will cease at that date in 1917 which corresponds with the accounting period of each particular company. Take the Ogilvie Flour Mills Company, whose period of accounting is the 31st August, the present month. They are liable in respect to the business profits war tax upon their income up to the 31st August. The tax will be payable in 1918, but they will not be levied upon with respect to any profits earned subsequent to the last day of the present month. Am I correct in respect to that?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: They will not unless they are taxed subsequently. As I said, the Government adheres to the principle of abnormal taxation of abnormal profits. I said that in 1918, that matter could be dealt with if there were abnormal profits. This is where my hon. friend is wrong, that while what he stated is legally correct, the Ogilvie Company paid in 1916 upon their profits of 1915; they paid in 1917 upon their profits of 1916; and they will pay in 1918 upon their profits of 1917. My hon. friend overlooked the fact that this Act has been in effect only two years, but there is a three years' term, and those companies, most of them I believe, are in that position, that they paid out their profits in 1915, and had to find, out of their profits in 1916, the tax which was imposed and which was retroactive. Similarly, in 1917, they paid out of their profits for 1917 their tax for 1916, and they will pay out of their profits for 1918 their tax for 1917.

Mr. KYTE: That only means that the excess war tax applies to the earnings of companies for 1915, 1916, and 1917, up to the end of the accounting period of each individual company. The Finance Minister has said that next session we shall consider whether or not there are abnormal profits earned, and if so we shall deal with them. But this is the language of the Finance Minister the day he introduced his Income Tax Bill:

> The House is aware that liability to the Business Profits War Tax Act of 1916 and the amendment thereto of this year comes to an end on December 31 this year, and it is not the intention to renew that measure.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No, not to renew that measure.

Mr. KYTE: Then that is the end of the measure so far as it is applicable at the present time, according to the statement of the Minister of Finance.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Of this particular measure.

Mr. KYTE: Parliament meets next year, and we may do things that we have not in mind at present.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Supposing I had not said that, would the Act have come to an end by its terms or not?

Mr. KYTE: It would, and we are dealing with conditions as they are at present. We have no legislation upon the statute book to-day which provides for the levying of a war profits tax upon any concern in this country upon earnings after the 31st December of this year. This income tax has been introduced in consequence of an agitation throughout the country for the conscription of wealth. The Compulsory Military Service Bill, which passed this House some weeks ago, provides for the enlistment of 100,000 men during this year. The Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) in piloting that Bill through the committee, said it was quite probable that at the next session of Parliament the Act would have to be amended to provide for the enlistment of another 100,000 men if the war were still going on. I think it is rather an unfortunate and disappointing circumstance that, while we shall have upon the statute book a Compulsory Military Service Act providing for compulsory military service of 100,000 men this year, and, in the language of the Solicitor General, of possibly 100,000 men next year, the Finance Minister, instead of making provision for continuing the excess profits tax as respects the manufacturers, is making no such provision, and that taxation will lapse at the end of the present year.

There is a vast difference in the scope of taxation under these two measures. The operations of the two Acts have been placed side by side by the newspaper press. It is pointed out that, for instance, a company with a capital of $100,000, upon which it earns 10 per cent, giving it an income of $10,000, would pay, under the excess profits tax, 25 per cent on the amount over $3,000, or $750, into the Treasury; under this Income tax it would pay 4 per cent upon $7,000, or $280. A company earning 100 per cent on a capital of $100,000, under the excess profits war tax would pay $64,500, and under the Income Tax, $3,880.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Assuming that the business profits taxation applies to 1917; and assuming that the income tax proposals apply also to 1917, which of those taxes would the firm in question pay in 1918?

[Sir Thomas White,]

Mr. KYTE: It would pay upon its earnings of 1917 the business war profits tax.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The larger one.

Mr. KYTE: But it will pay nothing in 1918 in respect of the excess profits, as the law is at present.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend is not able to say it will not, because abnormal profits will be taxed abnormally.

Mr. KYTE: I can only take the language of the minister, who said it was not intended to continue the Act after 1917. It is quite true that if one of these corporations had a limited number of shareholders, each shareholder drawing profits from that company, would pay upon his income the 4 per cent provided for in the present Bill. But where there is a large number of shareholders, and the dividends are distributed among that large number, each of them having an exemption of $3,000 if he should be married and $2,000 if he should be unmarried, these exemptions would probably dissipate the total income derived by shareholders from that company, and no further taxation would be collected in respect of it. For convenience of reference, I shall place in tabular form the amounts contributed by companies each having a capital of $100,000, according to the percentage earned, under the excess profits tax and under the income tax.

Tax Paid By Company With $100,000 Capital.

Earning, Per Cent.	Under Business Profits Tax.	Under Income Tax.
10	$ 750	$ 280
15	2,000	480
20	4,500	680
25	8,250	880
30	12,000	1,080
50	27,000	1,880
100	64,500	3,880
200	139,500	7,880

These figures will illustrate how the manufacturing concerns making large profits are relieved of the great burden of taxation by the provisions of the Bill that we are now considering. Some reference has been made to the Ogilvie Flour Mills company. According to the earnings of 1916, upon a total capitalization of $5,622,486, the war profits taxes for 1916 amounted to $280,8886. The war profits tax for 1917, assuming the company's earnings to be the same as in 1916, would amount to $547,478.

But under the income tax, in respect of its earnings for 1918, it will only pay $60,-564. I may say that in 1916 the Ogilvie Flour Mills company earned 27 per cent, three times as much as the largest dividend ever earned by the company in its history. Another company, which is not unknown to members of this House, the William Davies company paid, during the year ending 1916, excess profits tax $223,063. For the year ending March 27, 1917, if its earnings amount to the same it will pay $1,380,000. But under the income tax, if its earnings in 1918 are equal to their earnings of 1917, it will pay only $55,200. Take the Steel company of Canada, its net profits in 1916 amounted to $3,728,494. Under the present law it contributed, by way of excessive profits tax, $308,240. Under the income tax in respect of its earnings in 1918, it will only pay $149,016. The net profits of the Nova Scotia Steel company, for 1916 were $2,104,478, excess profits tax, $237,252. But the income tax, payable in respect of its earnings for 1918, will only amount to $84,056.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Which tax will it pay?

Mr. KYTE: In respect to its earnings for 1917, it will pay the excess profits war tax.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: How much in respect of its income for 1917, the same year?

Mr. KYTE: It will pay nothing with respect to its income in 1917.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Nova Scotia Steel company will pay in 1918 the larger tax my hon. friend mentions.

Mr. KYTE: It will pay in respect of its earnings for 1917.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: To what income is the hon. gentleman referring? The income in 1917 or not?

Mr. KYTE: 1918.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: But this Bill relates to 1917.

Mr. KYTE: I stated that in respect of its earnings for 1918, assuming they are the same as for 1917, instead of paying $237,252, it will pay $84,056.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: On the assumption that there was no other legislation.

Mr. KYTE: I am taking the language of the Minister of Finance, and I am justified in doing so. The Ogilvie Flour Mills company, net profits, 1916, $1,336,040. Its war tax was $280,885. In 1918, in respect of its earnings for that year, under the income tax, its taxation will be reduced to $53,440. Take the Canada Foundry, net profit, 1916, $653,852; war tax, $222,368. Under the income tax that will be reduced to $26,152. The Steel Company of Canada earned $3,728,494. It has distributed $814,741, a dividend of less than one-fourth of its earnings. This large company has not distributed, as is well known, all its earnings. Large proportions of earnings have been put to one purpose or another, all of

5 p.m. which goes to increase the value of its plant and stock, so that when it comes to distribute its earnings amongst the shareholders, it is done, I have no doubt, with a view to reducing its taxation as much as possible. Under the new income tax the balance of $2,900,000 would have been exempted entirely from taxation. The Canada Foundries distributed $249,600. The income tax on that would amount to $11,984. The corporation will pay $26,152, or a total of $38,136, compared to $222,368 paid under the war profits tax. The Ford Motor Car company, with a capitalization of $5,909,000, had profits in 1916 of $3,202,678, equal to 54·2 per cent. Under the old war tax profits tax, 1916, it paid $697,323. Under the present war tax it will pay $1,782,095, whereas under the income tax, which we are now considering, that taxation will be reduced to $127,987. The Canada Explosives capital employed $9,377,000; profits in 1916 were $3,094,410, equal to 33 per cent. The excess profits tax in 1916 were, $609,537. For 1917 the war tax would be $1,337,631. Under the present Bill the income tax will reduce the amount to $123,656. The Northern Aluminum Company, capital employed $3,860,000; profits, 1916, were $1,636,640, equal to 42.4 per cent. War tax, 1916, $341,679. War Tax, 1917, $822,332, but that taxation under the present Bill will be reduced to $65,565. The Nova Scotia Steel Company, capital employed $7,687,387; profits, 1916 were $1,487,125, equal to 19.34 per cent. Business profits tax, 1916, $237,752. Business Profits Tax, 1917, $30,754. The income tax for that company will be $59,365. The Canada Forgings, capital employed $1,455,526; profits, 1916, were $991,359, equal to 68.11 per cent. War tax, 1916, $222,368. War tax, 1917, $590,689. The income tax will be $39,534. Steel Company of Canada, capital employed $13,963,000; profits, 1916, were $2,210,343, equal to 15.83 per cent. War profits taxation, 1916, $308,240. War profits tax, 1917, $337,055. Income tax will be

This income tax will scarcely fulfil the expectations of the people of this country as regards the obligation of this Government to compensate as much as possible for the men who are going to the front and giving their lives in the service of the Empire, by making the wealth of this country contribute to the operations of the war. There are engaged in business in Canada concerns that, since 1915, have made profits as high as 800 per cent. There is no reason which the average man can see why such a change has come over the policy of this Government in such a short period of time. It is argued that the business profits war tax has a tendency to prevent capital from coming into this country, and that view is shared by a large number of business men, but when you consider that the burden of taxation in respect of excess profits is felt only after the earnings of those concerns exceed 20 per cent, it ought not to be a serious deterrent to the introduction of capital. Previous to the outbreak of war very few companies in Canada were earning more than 20 per cent, but since then the profits of many firms have increased so enormously that they can be calculated by the hundred per cent. There is, therefore, to the ordinary person no sufficient reason given for the Minister of Finance thus changing the basis of taxation.

The hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle), in the excellent speech he addressed to the committee this afternoon, stated that he believed there were in this country certain interests that were not paying their full share of the financial burdens of the war, taking into account the sacrifice made by those who go to the front and lose their lives. In that category he included the farmers. He said that as the farmer bought but little, he was not suffering so much on account of the increased cost of the commodities of life as the man who was not a producer of food. The farmer is relatively quite as large a purchaser as any other class of persons in this country. In the West where mixed farming is not engaged in to any great extent, the farmer has to buy everything except his wheat and one or two other articles which he produces. In eastern Canada, although our farmers are largely engaged in dairying and mixed farming, there are still many articles of consumption which they have to purchase. While it is true the farmer in eastern Canada produces his own butter and, at certain seasons of the year, his own meat and vegetables, he does not manufacture such requirements of himself and his family as clothing, boots and shoes, sugar, tea, cotton, hardware, building supplies, all of which have increased in cost enormously since the war broke out. Therefore, the hon. member for Kingston did not speak with that reflection with which he usually speaks when he stated that the farmers were not paying their full share of taxation in respect of the increased cost of living which is being experienced in Canada on account of the war.

So far as the contributions by the people of Nova Scotia to the Patriotic Fund are concerned, at least half of the money subscribed is contributed by municipal taxation which falls equally upon all the taxpayers of that province, quite irrespective of individual contributions. Therefore, when the Minister of Finance states that under this income taxation measure he is relieving the taxpayer of that portion which he contributes in the form of a Patriotic Fund contribution, it is after all not so much a reduction as would appear on the surface, because the great majority of the people who contribute to the Patriotic Fund would not be included in this income taxation legislation, but would enjoy the exemption which is mentioned.

Mr. PARDEE: I wish to emphasize the opinion expressed by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr Nickle) in regard to the inequality of taxation upon the classes which this Bill affects. We must realize that when we conscript men, we conscript their all, and if we are to conscript wealth—or, not to use that term with which so much fault is found—if we are to bring in an income tax, we must bring in an income tax which really does what it is intended to do, namely, make those pay who can pay. Although it costs much more to live in Canada to-day than it formerly did, we must realize that the well-to-do man is getting far more money than he ever had before, and that those men who are getting more money on account of the war are getting it without very much greater exertion. If that be the fact, then they ought to be able to pay more, and they ought be made to pay more. When one considers that after this tax is deducted, a man with an income of $7,000 still retains $6,820, a man with an income of $10,000 retains $9,640, a man with $20,000 retains $18,740, a man with $30,000 retains $27,540, a man with $75,000 retains $64,990, a man with $100,000 retains $85,240, and a man with $200,000 retains $156,240, surely no one will say that the sums that I have mentioned that are left to those men are not plenty, and more than enough, to keep them in affluent circumstances, no matter what their position may be. If we are really honestly intending to conscript wealth, or to take the well-to-do man's money in lieu of his blood, we should leave him with only enough to keep him in ordinary circumstances, and, even although we shall thus be depriving him of many luxuries, it is right that he should suffer at least some of the hardships that the man at the front is suffering in order to protect that wealth.

The Minister of Finance says: If you impose very severe taxation you will dry up the flow of contributions to the Patriotic and Red Cross Funds; or, in other words, if you touch the big man with the big income you stop the source of your Patriotic and Red Cross Fund subscriptions. No one knows so much about such subscriptions as the hon. member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames), and this is what he said last night when this matter was being discussed. He did not argue that the big man was paying those subscriptions. He said:

> All that we are pleading for is that the money which is subscribed and paid in 1917 by the comparatively small portion of our population who have an income of over $3,000, and who therefore come under this tax, may be regarded as having been paid to the Government. Three-eighths of all the money we get comes from taxation; probably as much more comes from small subscribers, and perhaps one-quarter of all we get comes from the large subscribers who have incomes of $3,000 and upwards, and who will therefore be hit by this tax.

So the hon. member for St. Antoine apparently does not take the same view as the Minister of Finance.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I did not say all.

Mr. PARDEE: I quite agree, but I think the minister will agree that he left the impression on the House, and intended to leave it, that the big contributor would not contribute to the Patriotic Fund if he was taxed any more severely under this measure; that was the logical inference from the minister's statement this afternoon. I repeat again—and I cannot repeat it too often or too vehemently—that in view of the figures set out in this Bill there is to my mind no conscription of wealth at all in this country; this is not a real income tax. The Finance Minister says: "We have the most heavily taxed country in the world." That may be, but if we are the most heavily taxed country in the world there is no reason why we should not be the most heavily taxed country in the world, because no country stands to lose more through this war than Canada. If we are to keep our men at the front, if money has to be raised to purchase the necessary supplies, where do the rich men get off, and where do the people of this country get off? Why should a man with an income of $75,000, which is an enormous income, be allowed to keep $64,990 in his pocket, after paying this tax? I am bound to say that to me that does not savour of conscription in the slightest degree. It imposes no hardship whatever on that man, except that when he comes to tot up his bank book at the end of the year, he has not got quite so much as he had, but still has more than any man has a right to have.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not believe there are many men in Canada who have an income of $75,000. My hon. friend is overlooking the fact that most incomes of that amount will be incomes of companies. A business that a man might engage in as an individual or as a partner might yield that amount, but it would be in competition with joint stock companies having a similar amount of income. It is not like the income of an individual.

Mr. PARDEE: I will take my hon. friend's own statement. He says that most of them will be joint stock companies.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Most of them would, but there are other firms in competition with joint stock companies.

Mr. PARDEE: Why should not the joint stock companies pay?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: They do pay.

Mr. PARDEE: Only the amount stated here.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In the case of a joint stock company there are many shareholders.

Mr. PARDEE: I quite understand that. What the minister says is that this tax shall be deducted from the profits, and then the rest shall be distributed as dividends. But that is not very much. You are leaving a tremendous balance there yet. What I cannot understand is why people with such an enormous income—I do not care whether they are firms of joint stock companies or anything else—should be left with such an enormous profit, when to-day we are sending men to be killed to save those very profits. You cannot get away from that argument. The people of this country are demanding to-day that the men who have made enormous profits out of the war should pay. Why should they not pay for this war? Why should they not pay for the men who go to the front? To my mind it is the one unanswerable reason why almost all that they have got should be taken in order that what they have left may be saved.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: They are fighting to save capital as well as income, are they not?

Mr. PARDEE: You are only taking their income. Their capital is so enormous that they are able to earn these enormous salaries, or dividends, whichever you like to call them. The minister has told us that the business profits war tax, or at least the proceeds of it, go on until the year 1918. From the figures we have examined we know that the business profits war tax would yield to this country vastly more than the sums that will be yielded under this income tax measure; there is no doubt about that. It is true that a very heavy tax might keep people out of this country, but at the same time the money that we need has to be raised from some source, and we might just as well be honest with ourselves now as later on. Taxation has to come if we are to stay where we are. There is no man of business acumen in the country to-day who looks facts in the face who does not say to himself: Taxes have to come because of the position we are taking in this war. So we might just as well make an early start and avoid a further piling up of the national debt. One hand practically washes the other, and it might just as well be done in this way as in any other.

[Mr. Pardee.]

In conclusion, I repeat that I do not think this tax is sufficient. I think it should be increased, and increased materially. I think that on an income of $20,000 to $30,000 the tax should be 15 instead of 8 per cent; on $30,000 to $50,000 it should be 20 instead of 10 per cent; on $50,000 to $100,000 it should be 25 instead of 15 per cent; on $100,000 to $150,000 it should be 30 instead of 25 per cent; on $150,000 to $250,000 it should be 35 instead of 25 per cent; on $300,000 to $450,000 it should be 40 instead of 25 per cent; on $700,000 to $1,000,000 it should be from at least 50 to 70 per cent instead of 25 per cent; on $1,000,000 to $2,000,000 it should be 75 instead of 25 per cent. I want to repeat that the corporations, firms, and others, are having their all protected. In order that they might be further protected, this Government has asked that there should be conscription of men. If you take the last reserves, as this House has voted, for the conscription of men, for the conscription of blood, and for the sacrifice of life, you have the right to make those who are protected pay, and they should pay to the last shilling.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend has an advantage which is always enjoyed by an opposition. I am quite satisfied if I had brought down a measure embodying the percentages my hon. friend has suggested as representing his views, he would rise in his place and double them. It must not be lost sight of that the men who will pay taxation under this measure on incomes of $3,000 and upwards, also have their sons at the front. It is quite easy to speak of the people of the country who have incomes of $3,000, $4,000, $5,000 or $10,000, but so far as my observation goes that class has been and is represented in the field just as much as any other class in this community. I think we must not assume the country is divided into two camps, one of which consists of those who will not be subject to this tax, but who have their sons at the front, and the other those who are subject to the tax, and who have no sons at the front. My own belief is that all classes in this country, the labouring classes, the artisans, the merchants, and the professional classes, are represented practically pro rata in the field. There has been an equal patriotism, and I think we should bear that in mind. It seems to me we must not reflect needlessly upon those who have been successful through their exertions, and who enjoy no undue profits from the war, but who are carrying on their professions as they did before the war, in many cases with diminished incomes. We must not reflect upon their patriotism because of the fact that they are subject to this income tax, nor need we reach the conclusion that because there are men in the field, some of them being their sons, we must over-severely tax them upon income.

This measure is a stiff income tax. Even the normal tax is double the municipal taxation prevailing in this country. It is more than double the prevailing income tax in the United States. It is not a mild taxation. It is a heavy supertax, much heavier than the United States taxation. We must not reach the conclusion that it is mild as an income tax measure, because this is not the case by any means. I do not mean to say it may not be more severe, or that we may not have to increase it, but having regard to the present situation it is a fair measure, in its graduated scale, imposing a greater burden upon those who are enjoying a larger income. Taxation has many aspects. Personally, I do not believe it should be imposed for the purpose of punishing any citizen because he happens to have an income. That is not a sound principle. A Government must be sagacious in imposing taxation, else it will defeat its object. Place too heavy a tax upon liquid wealth—that is to say bank credits—and they disappear. Place too heavy a tax upon income, and you do not collect your tax, because people will not come into the country, and in many cases investments will be placed elsewhere. There is much more in taxation than the consideration of how much a man's income is, and how much he can possibly live upon, with a view to taking the balance away from him. It would injure this country greatly, and it would impair our power of raising money for the purposes of this war, and injure the prosperity we are enjoying, if our income tax measure was too heavy. I do not mean to say this is an ideal measure at all, but it is a pretty good start. Any Minister of Finance, myself included, could add to it as the necessity might arise. At the same time, it meets the situation as it is to-day. You cannot compare the sacrifice which is made by the man who goes to the front and offers his life for his country with the sacrifice made by writing a cheque, however large it may be.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: To me it is almost a sacrilege to talk of equalizing the sacrifice made when a man sends his son to the trenches in the one case, and when a man is called upon to pay a tax bill, no matter how large, in the other. The cases cannot be compared, because they are essentially and fundamentally different. One touches human life. It is a spiritual sacrifice.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: No man makes that comparison.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am not accusing my right hon. friend of making it. The expression "equality of sacrifice" cannot be used, because it is not a true expression. There is nothing to equal the sacrifice made by the men who have gone to the front, and the sacrifice made by their parents, and their wives, in sending them.

I think it is advisable to adopt the suggestion made by the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro), and make the exemption $1,500 in the case of unmarried persons and widows or widowers without dependent chilren, so that the section would read:

(a) four per centum upon all income exceeding fifteen hundred dollars in the case of unmarried persons and widows and widowers without dependent children, and exceeding three thousand dollars in the case of all other persons.

I have given careful consideration to the suggestions offered in regard to grading the tax according to the number in family. The difficulties I see and have seen in connection with that are such that I am against any amendment of the measure in that particular.

Mr. VERVILLE: Is the exemption of $1,500 for single persons?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes, unmarried persons.

Mr. VERVILLE: If a single man has dependents, he is on exactly the same footing as a single man who has no dependents?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes, he is.

Mr. VERVILLE: Does my hon. friend believe that is fair? As far as the $1,500 exemption is concerned, I claim that $1,000 is far more than any man can spend on himself alone, but the man with dependents really has a family to support. The single man who has dependents is in the same category as the man with no dependents; that is, both have an exemption of $1,500. When I asked the minister about the single man's exemption he spoke of his dependents, a mother or a sister, and, perhaps, others. We are not looking after them at all now, if I understand the Act aright.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think there is a little misunderstanding here. I thought that "without dependents" would govern the case, but the wording here is "without dependent children." I think we can put in there "unmarried persons without dependent relatives."

Mr. McKENZIE: Why not say "dependents" and leave out "relatives?"

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am afraid that they would all have dependents.

Mr. McKENZIE: They may have dependents who are not relatives.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I move that it read: "unmarried persons without dependent relatives." I am perfectly satisfied that if we do not cover it in some way there will be no tax collected at all.

Mr. McKENZIE: A man might have his stepmother to support. His stepmother would be no relative, but she would be a very legitimate dependent. I think the word "dependents" alone would be better than "dependent relatives."

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I would suggest to my hon. friend that he might let the section stand and think it over. There will always be difficulty in connection with a matter of this kind. You must have a rule, absolute, and, it may be, arbitrary. No matter how you place this taxation it will weigh upon some persons more than others. You cannot avoid that. The statement was made a moment ago that you should consider the case of a bachelor with dependents. It may happen that a man who has no wife, a bachelor, will have dependents. It may happen, also, that a bachelor will have no dependents and still further that a married man will have dependents. Besides his wife and children, he may have poor relatives to look after. But you have to apply a rule of some kind, and when you have applied that rule you must take the consequences. I would suggest to my hon. friend that he allow the question to stand over for further consideration later on.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: All right.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I would like to call my hon. friend's attention to the drafting of the Bill. Section 4, paragraph (a), reads:

> Four per centum upon all income exceeding two thousand dollars in the case of unmarried men and widowers without dependent children, and exceeding three thousand dollars in the case of all other persons.

That is intelligible. But, when you come to paragraph (b), which is the first provision in regard to the supertax, you find the following:

> Two per centum upon the amount by which the income exceeds six thousand dollars and does not exceed ten thousand dollars.

There is a gap between $3,000 and $6,000.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The four per cent, normal tax, applies to that.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: You collect two per cent upon all incomes exceeding $6,000 and less than $10,000. But between $3,000 and $6,000 there is no provision for collecting the tax.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is perfectly clear. In the first place four per cent is collected upon all incomes exceeding $3,000. That is the starting point. If a man has an income of $100,000 the way you start to determine how much he is to pay is this: You substract $3,000 from $100,000, that leaves $97,000 and of that you take four per cent.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The normal tax runs all the way up?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: All the way up to $100,000. Take the concrete case of a man with an income of $7,000. In the first place he is entitled to be taxed at the rate of four per cent upon all his income in excess of $3,000. Four per cent upon $4,000 is $160. Then, as the income exceeds $6,000 by $1,000, there is two per cent additional upon that $1,000 which is $20. Add $20 to $160 and you have $180 as his tax.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It is not aptly expressed but it is all right.

Mr. BUCHANAN: I may not have an opportunity of speaking on this measure again and I would like to enter a very strong objection to the lightness of the burden imposed upon the heavier incomes. This tax has a very close relation to the conscription measure, in my estimation. We must do our best to induce men to go under conscription to fight in Europe, we must put them in as good humour as possible and to put them in good humour we must impose a moderate tax on the wealth of this country. We cannot impose any taxation that will measure up to the sacrifice the man makes who goes to France and gives up his life or who receives wounds that probably main him for the balance of his life. We should do our utmost to tax the people who are left at home and make them realize that they are sacrificing something. This taxation, in my judgment, does not bring a sacrifice to any person. It should be of a character which will be a real sacrifice. The man with $100,000 is not making any sacrifice. I would like to have $100,000 and contribute the percentage that is asked on such an income under this measure. I would be very glad to do it. I feel that the people with the smaller incomes are paying far more proportionately than the people with the larger incomes. The Finance Minister should aim to tax the heavier incomes until the people with those incomes realize that there is a war and that they must make a real sacrifice—something that will hurt. The President of the Patriotic Fund had a slogan—give until it hurts.

Let the Finance Minister adopt the same principle in connection with his income tax. He says it will have to be altered when the war is over. Then, while the war is on, make the income tax something that will hurt the wealthy people of this country, and, after the war, the taxation can be altered.

I also feel very strongly that the excess profit tax should be continued, that the industries that are making large profits, especially those engaged in the manufacture of munitions or of other goods used in connection with the war, should pay heavily during the progress of the war. We need the revenue, but we also need to impress upon the men whom we are going to force to fight for us that we are making the people who are staying at home and making money out of the war bear the real burden of its cost.

Mention has been made of the Canadian Patriotic Fund. I may be wrong, but I have believed in the voluntary system. I have always been able to go out and appeal for the Patriotic Fund on the ground that men were going to fight voluntarily and that the people at home should contribute voluntarily. I have been able to make the people in my neighbourhood see it in that light. But I am satisfied that in the next campaign for the Patriotic Fund the introduction of conscription will interfere with the raising of money by voluntary means, and I believe that the Government will eventually, if not immediately, have to raise by taxation all the money that has heretofore been raised voluntarily through the Patriotic Fund. I believe that is the only fair method, too. It may be possible that within the next year the Finance Minister may have to devote some of the proceeds of this tax to the carrying of the work now carried on by the Patriotic Fund. I do not mean to say that I would make the Patriotic Fund a Government undertaking; I am quite satisfied to have it operated as at present, that is, that the expenditure should be handled through the Canadian Patriotic Fund. But I should think that the money should be raised by taxation, and it may have to be raised through income taxation. For that reason we should keep in mind the necessity of making this tax as heavy as possible, at least during the war. I feel very strongly on this question because I do not want to see any men remain at home and make more money than will keep them comfortably while other men are going away to bear the hardships of war, and possibly lose their lives. I want to see the sacrifice as nearly as possible equal throughout the length and breadth of the country, and it cannot be an equal sacrifice until our taxation makes the people who stay at home feel that there is a war, and that they are doing something to help the men who have gone over to fight for us in Europe.

Mr. MARCIL: Has the minister decided that the married man who has only himself and his wife to keep shall be in the same position in relation to this tax as the man with half a dozen children?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I have reached the conclusion that it is not possible to discriminate in this taxation, having regard to the number of children in the family. In justification of that, there is an exemption of $3,000, which I think is ample. I agree with the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) that in a measure of this kind there are bound to be anomalies, and we must draw the line somewhere, decide upon a scale, and then allow the anomalies, such as they are, to exist. Otherwise you would be making so many exceptions that the measure would be unworkable.

Mr. MARCIL: I am sorry the minister has taken that stand, because it is placing Canada in a position different from that of any country in Europe. The nations of Europe are trying to increase their population. France, which, according to Lloyd George, in an interview of two days ago, is bearing the burden of the fight against Germany, pays a premium on families of three and four children in order to increase the population. Lloyd George says that to-day, without France, the war would be at an end, that, great as is the sacrifice of Great Britain, it is nothing to that of France; that the spirit of the French people is the mystery of the present war. In France they encourage large families; here we do nothing. We declare by this legislation that the mere fact that the man is married, although he has no children, places him on the same footing as the man who may be called upon to rear half a dozen or a dozen children. The minister should reconsider that point. I make this appeal in the best interests of the country. Canada wants a native population in preference to a foreign population, and I think that, all things considered, we should make the married man or the married woman who assumes the responsibility of bringing up children—and we all know what a burden that is these days, with the high cost of living—is entitled to the first consideration of the state, not only for himself or herself, but for the sake of the children.

Mr. PROULX: The Minister of Finance said this afternoon that he intended to reduce the exemption for unmarried men to $1,500. Did he consider the dependents whom the unmarried may have to support?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No.

Mr. PROULX: I think it would be more just to reduce the exemption to $1,000 to an unmarried man without dependents, $1,500 for an unmarried man with one dependent, and $2,000 for an unmarried man with two or more dependents. An unmarried man may have his mother or young brothers and sisters to support, and may be in the same position, in regard to the burden on his financial means, as a married man with children. In France the tax is graded on the principle of the number of dependents a man has to support, either children, or parents, or brothers, or sisters.

WAR TAX UPON INCOMES.

CONSIDERATION OF BILL IN COMMITTEE.

The House again in committee on Bill No. 117, to authorize the levying of a war tax upon certain incomes—Sir Thomas White—Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

On section 4—Income tax:

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I wish to join with those hon. members who have taken the position that subsection 1 of section 4 does not impose a sufficiently heavy rate of taxation. It has been urged as a justification for the imposition of an income tax that we are enacting a military service measure. It is said that because we are possibly to have conscription of men, we should, therefore, have conscription of wealth. That in itself is a pretty good ground for increased taxation, and I do not dispute that view as presented by hon. gentlemen this afternoon, but rather do I affirm it. There is a further reason for augmenting our revenues, and upon that ground alone this Bill is justified. We are spending in this country from $850,000 to $900,000 a day for war purposes. That will amount to something over $300,000,000 a year. The Minister of Finance informed us a few days ago that for the quarter ending June 30 of this year there was a surplus of about $37,000,000 which might be applied to war expenditures. If the balance of the fiscal year produces a similar result financially, there will be, from current revenue, a surplus of about $140,000,000 to apply to war expenditures. Our necessity in this country for a large revenue will be as great next year as this year. It will be almost as pressing five years hence as it is to-day. Therefore the maximum revenue from the present time on for a number of years will be the greatest amount that we can possibly exact from our people without doing injustice to any class. We should not model our rates of taxation under this legislation on the income tax legislation of the United States. They have barely entered the war. It is true that in their first year they contemplate an expenditure of about $11,000,000,000, and they have already increased the rates in their Income Tax Act. I anticipate that next year there will be a further increase and possibly the following year a still further increase. When comparing the two countries we must remember that in most of the states of the Union many forms of direct taxation that we have not in this country are imposed by the Federal Government and state legislatures. With few exceptions, I think direct provincial and municipal taxation in this country is very light, and, therefore, the example of the United States is not an infallible guide for us in the circumstances prevailing in this country. We must not allow our national debt to accumulate any more than we can prevent, lest we have national disaster in the future and find ourselves in a position of inability to meet the interest upon our national debt and at the same time carry on the public services of the country.

It, therefore, matters little how this legislation compares with the Income Tax Act of the United States, or with that of England. The question is rather: what is the utmost we can secure by taxation from the people of this country to meet our great financial necessities and augment our current revenues so as to keep down as low as possible our rapidly growing national debt? I think, therefore, the rates proposed under this measure are not sufficiently high, and I join very heartily in the statements made this afternoon by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) on the other side of the House, the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte) and other hon. gentlemen on this side. I cannot add anything to what they said this afternoon. The matter was put clearly and strongly by them. I have nothing further to say in reference to incomes under $5,000, nor as to the exemptions. When the resolution was introduced I stated that I thought, perhaps, $2,000 was too high an exemption in the case of unmarried men. What I really thought was that the amount should be reduced, but I thought possibly the rate was a little high and might be made lower than 4 per cent for incomes taxable below $2,000 in amount. There are in Canada a great number of unmarried men liable to taxation, and even if the amount of taxation is small, still the aggregate might be very large without any great burden being imposed upon them. I have, however, nothing further to say about that.

The tax on incomes of $10,000 and upwards might very well be increased. While that may impose a burden on many who will have to pay the tax, still that burden must be imposed upon some one in order to meet partially our war obligations. Business conditions in this country to-day are exceptionally good; they are better than the normal. It shall be much easier to secure a substantial amount this year, and possibly next year, than four or five years from now, and it is important that in the days of our plenty as much as possible be taken from our people to keep the Federal treasury in a healthy condition.

In the case of an income of $10,000 unmarried men and widowers without dependents are obliged to pay a tax of $400. If that were doubled to $800, do you think, Sir, that any taxpayer would object? Would it mean a very substantial additional burden on those liable to taxation under this Act? I do not think so. In the case of an income of $15,000, they have to pay $850. I do not think anybody would seriously object to paying a tax of $1,700 in such circumstances. A man with an income of $50,000 has to pay a tax of $5,300. I do not think there could be any valid objection if that were raised to $10,000. In the case of an income of $75,000, it is proposed to make the tax $10,000. If it were raised to $20,000 I do not think any legitimate protest would be made. It is true that in this country there are a very few people in receipt of such a large income, but there are undoubtedly some, and I think they would be content to pay a very much higher rate of taxation than is proposed by the minister. But whether they like it or not, I think they should be made to pay. I think that the rate of taxation might very well be doubled at least, on incomes of $12,000 up, if not from $10,000 up, and in many cases I think they might be trebled.

The minister would have us remember that very generous contributions have been made by the Canadian public to the Patriotic Fund, and that if we entrench too far upon incomes it will result in curtailing voluntary contributions to the Patriotic Fund. I submit that that is rather a weak principle upon which to base a taxation scheme. I agree with the remarks made by the hon. member for Lethbridge this afternoon, when he suggested that hereafter the Patriotic Fund had better be sustained directly from the federal treasury. I think that from now on appeals to the public to sustain the Patriotic Fund will not meet with the response which they have met with in the past. I think it is only fair and reasonable to expect some diminution in interest on the part of the public. It is true that a great section of the public will contribute to this fund to the extent of their ability, but I really believe there will be serious impairment of the fund in the future if we are to rely solely upon voluntary contributions. It is worthy, I think, of serious consideration whether or not some special tax should be imposed directly upon the people to sustain the Patriotic Fund, and to be collected by the provincial governments. It might be better still if the provinces were to take this matter up and make an annual assessment on the citizens of the province, equal to the amount collected on an average during the last three years, and pay the money over to the fund. Some room, however, should be left for those who wish to contribute voluntarily to the fund. I repeat, I do not think that payments to the Patriotic Fund should be considered when establishing a taxation scheme of this nature.

Before closing, I just wish to say a few words in reference to the business profits tax. There has apparently been some confusion in the minds of hon. gentlemen in reference to the position of the Business Profits Tax Act after the end of this year, and I should like to feel that I understood this matter thoroughly. As I understand it, the excess profits business tax is in force for the years 1916, 1917 and 1918—and I want the minister to correct me if I am wrong—but the taxes levied come from profits of the previous year; that is, from the profits of 1915, 1916 and 1917.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend says that the taxes are paid out of the earnings of 1915, 1916 and 1917. I say, no. Although the taxation is in respect of those earnings, it was not possible that the tax should be paid out of the earnings of 1915, because the taxation was not imposed until 1916, and most companies and firms had distributed their earnings as dividends or invested them in plant or material. In the result, by reason of this taxation being retroactive, the taxes in respect of 1915 were paid in most cases from the earnings of 1916, and the taxes in respect of 1916 from the earnings of 1917, and the taxes for 1917 will be paid from the earnings of 1918, or from the accumulated earnings of this year.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I understood the minister correctly; that is what I intended to say. For all practical purposes, the Business Profits Tax Act is in force in the years 1916, 1917 and 1918.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Practically.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is true that the taxes payable in each of these years is from profits of the preceding year, but for the purposes of the revenues of the country, the Business Profits Tax Act is in force in the years 1916, 1917 and 1918. Now the minister stated the other day that the Business Profits Tax Act expires at the end of this year, and that he does not propose renewing it, although for all practical purposes, as a revenue producing Act, it is still in force in 1918. The last amendment to that Act imposed quite an onerous tax upon business, and may have had the effect of seriously hampering the extension of business in this country. I fear that business interests in the country will consider the minister's statement that he does not propose to renew that Act as equivalent to saying that he does not propose again to impose any tax of any nature upon business profits beyond the provisions of the Income Tax Bill. There was a great deal of objection to the last amendment to the Business Profits Tax Act, for the reason that when the minister introduced the Business Profits Tax Act he was understood to say that it would remain in force for three years, and that statement was taken as tantamount to a declaration that there would be no increase or modification of that tax.

I think it would be unfortunate to have the statement go abroad now that the principle of the Business Profits War Tax Act in part at least is not to be renewed without that statement being accompanied by a declaration that possibly, and probably, some substitute therefore will be imposed. If in 1918 a Bill is introduced imposing taxation upon business profits, it will meet with a great deal of opposition, and the statement now made to the effect that the Act would not be renewed will be construed as a promise that there would be no further taxation of that nature. I think that would be a very substantial objection to the statement made by the minister for some equivalent of the business profits tax after 1918. I am of the opinion that it would be better to provide in subsection 2 of section 4, so that business people will know in the future what excess business profits tax is likely to be. It would not me operative in 1917 or 1918, except as against companies with a capitalization of less than $50,000. I ask the Minister of Finance to take this into consideration, and I submit it would be better to spend a little time now working out some scheme of the nature of the Business Profits War Tax Act as against business profits, and make it a part of this Act. Surely some taxation is in contemplation further than income tax of corporations. That is not at all substantial.

I want to say a word in regard to subsection 2 of section 4 which imposes a tax of four per cent on corporations and joint stock companies on incomes exceeding $3,000. In the United States this particular tax has been increased, or at least a Bill has been introduced in Congress to increase it from four per cent to six per cent. I would like to suggest that this particular tax should be higher, and it should be graduated. As a matter of fact, a great number of small corporations in this country are making more money in proportion to invested capital than many of the larger corporations. There are exceptions, and of course the largest incomes are being earned by a few of the big industrial corporations. At the same time, there are scores of small corporations which are earning very large incomes and I think they might well be taxed more than four per cent on incomes in excess of $3,000. When the incomes reach $10,000, $15,000, $25,000 or more, the rate should be accordingly increased. I would like to call the minister's attention to the fact that there is no provision in this subsection in regard to taxing undistributed profits. Is there a general clause covering that later on?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: A corporation is liable to taxation upon its profits, whether distributed or undistributed. There is a clause, which we considered for a while last night, to the effect that undistributed profits which were in the opinion of the minister being held for the purpose of evading the tax would be subject to the supertax.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I wish to repeat my opinion that the rate of corporation income tax should be increased very substantially in the larger incomes and it would be well to fix a special rate of taxation upon undistributed earnings. It is very difficult to tell when a corporation refuses to distribute its profits in order to evade the tax. It would be almost impossible, I would think, to determine this.

Mr. MEDERIC MARTIN: I do not want to take much part in this discussion, but I would like to know if the minister will consider the insertion of a clause in the Bill preventing big concerns which hold a great deal of property for increasing the rents on their tenants. Because if that is not done the poor people will pay the tax in the long run. There are some concerns in Montreal which have a great many tenants, and they have started already to notify those tenants that they will increase the rents. I suppose my hon. friend does not wish to see the poor people pay all the tax, so I think it would be a good thing to put a clause in the Bill to the effect that property owners will be prohibited from increasing their rentals with a view to reimbursing themselves for what they are called upon to pay under this Act. There are many large property-holders in Montreal receiving $100,000 a year and more in rent, if they increase their rents by five per cent it will simply mean that the poor people will pay the tax. Of course, it is always the poor who pay these taxes.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We cannot exempt landlords who derive substantial rentals from their properties. The presumption is that they are now getting all the rentals they can. If a man derives a net income of $10,000 or $20,000 a year from a property he owns, I do not see how we can exempt him from taxation any more than we could exempt my hon. friend from taxation on his income as mayor of Montreal.

Mr. MEDERIC MARTIN: That is not what I mean. My point is, I would like to see a clause in the Bill prohibiting those people from raising their rents in order to reimburse themselves for the amount they have to pay as taxes under this Act. They are simply trying to get the tax back from the poor people.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I would refer my hon. friend to the Quebec Government, because this is a matter of property and civil rights arising in the province of Quebec. I do not think it comes under the jurisdiction of the Federal Government. My hon. friend might take the question up with the Quebec Legislature. We have no power to intervene.

Mr. MEDERIC MARTIN: Certainly this Government has the power, to interfere if those large property holders increase the rents without good and sufficient reason. If they do increase the rents, it will be simply for the purpose of making the poor people pay the tax. In any event, I would ask my hon. friend to take the matter into consideration, and consult the Minister of Justice with a view to determining whether some such prohibition could be included in the Bill. They are starting in Montreal to tell their tenants that they will increase the rents. If they do so the tax will be paid by the poor people.

Mr. MURPHY: May I inquire from my hon. friend from Montreal, St. Mary's, (Mr. Martin) if he knows of cases of this kind having arisen?

Mr. MARTIN: Certainly, some of the big concerns have given notice about it since they have heard of the law.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Written notice?

Mr. MARTIN: Certainly.

Mr. McKENZIE: Following the remarks of my hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Nickle), my hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Kyte) and my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Maclean), I wish to state that the proposal of the Minister of Finance to allow the Business Profits War Tax Act to expire does not strike me as a fair proposition to the people of this country. I have no doubt that the idea of Parliament and the minister in fixing the end of the Business Profits War Tax Act for the 31st December 1917, was that the war would then be over. This was a measure intended especially for war conditions, and for getting money for the war, and when the grave and serious necessity would end, this Act would come to an end with it. I have a distinct recollection that when the first and second Bills were introduced by the minister, it was explained by him that they would continue for the same period as the war. Nothing could be clearer than the language in which the minister says that this Act should come to an end on the last day of December of this year. As reported at page 3915 of Hansard, July 25, 1917, the Finance Minister said:

> My hon. friend from Wright very properly asked as to whether those who are paying a very heavy business profits taxation are subject to this income measure. The House is aware that liability to the Business Profits War Tax Act of 1916 and the amendment thereto of this year comes to an end on December 31 this year, and it is not the intention to renew that measure.

Nothing could be clearer than that. The minister speaks not only for himself but for the Government, and as a minister representing and speaking for the Crown, he makes the clear cut declaration that on the last day of December this Act comes to an end and there is no intention of reviving it. That is very well understood. There may be some difference of opinion upon some things, and some language may be open to a great variety of constructions, but here is the proposition of the minister, put in clear-cut, plain language that is unmistakable.

There is one embarrassing situation which may arise in connection with this and which has been pointed out by my hon. friend from Halifax. If it turns out that the Minister of Finance should be compelled by conditions, over which he will have no control, to extend the lifetime of this Act, and if, between now and, say, January or February, 1918, large investments are made in this country, if people come in and open new establishments and invest large amounts of capital on the faith of this statement that on and after the last day of December, 1917, the business profits war tax will be at an end and shall no longer be law, and if the minister and the Government, some time in the year 1918, find it necessary to re-enact this legislation, they will be confronted with the protest, and properly so, of the people who came into this country and invested their capital, or of people in this country who invested capital upon the strength of the declaration of the Minister of Finance. I would like to know what kind of an answer the minister will have for them. He made the promise solemnly and clearly, and, no doubt, deliberately, that in 1918 and afterwards there should be no business profits war tax collected. I think the Government will find it exceedingly difficult to make an answer to people of this kind, and I think the minister will be obliged to leave them out, even although he believed to be true what he said, because people in this country, and particularly people from outside countries who may come in here, would have reason to have absolute and implicit confidence in the words of the minister. The statement, therefore, was rather premature, although, perhaps, deliberate, and one which he will, perhaps, find exceedingly awkward before the end of the war, or before the end of the great necessity for gathering large sums of money for war purposes.

We hear a great deal about "quitters." "Quitters and slackers" are regarded as very undesirable citizens, but it would seem to me that as far as getting money is concerned the minister is showing some of the signs of a "quitter" when he says he is going to allow these profiteers to go untaxed. I do not use the word "profiteers" offensively, because if a man works hard, puts his energy, brain and brawn into his business and makes a profit, I should not use the word "profiteering" or "profiteer" with regard to him in a disrespectful sense. But you must go for the money where it is, and these are the people who have it, and they are the people who, in a mild way, we are going after. The minister should not quit until the occasion which he has for going after them ends and there will be no further use for pursuing the course which he has been following for the last three years in order to get this money.

The minister should be particularly careful about getting into any entanglement with these great concerns, or, as they are often called here, these combines, trusts and mergers. The minister knows that he has the reputation, whether he deserves it or not, of being the head of these concerns, that he is here as their patron saint, that he is here particularly representing them. That may, or may not be so, but you remember the old proverb about giving a dog a bad name. The minister has a reputation as well in some other quarters. We heard about him from the hon. member for Victoria, Ontario (Sir Sam Hughes), who had been the brother, compatriot, friend and adviser of the minister for five and a half years.

We found him reading mysterious letters in the House the other day—mysterious to me—that he had received from a man high up in the councils of the Tory party, and who will be still higher up, according to Sir Sam Hughes—I do not know who this great man is, but I have no doubt the minister does. He read a mysterious letter from that man, in which he talked about a man who was ready for recantation back into the hold of the rock from which he was hewn not many years ago. These considerations all go to show that a minister suspected of being mixed up with great concerns, which, of course, is an honour in some respects, is not trusted by the poor people, because they do not want to get into competition with those great powers.

The minister has introduced this income tax for the purpose of conscripting wealth, of going after the great bodies of wealth lying around in this country untouched by any legislation hitherto enacted. He was going to meet the great cry in the country that if we were going to conscript the manhood of the country we should also conscript the wealth. We were told by the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) that that cry of the people was at last going to be met, and that an Act was going to be introduced into this House that would accomplish what the people were looking for. But what has happened? No doubt a complaint came to the minister and to the Government from these wealthy concerns the minister is supposed to represent here saying: have you not gone far enough? Surely you have taken enough from us, can you not leave us alone? But the minister says to them: I have a trick for you worth a dozen of any stories you may hear of that kind. I am going to impose an income tax upon you, which will please the people who are appealing for a conscription of wealth, but I am going to let you out on the other end. I am going to remove this other tax, and instead of paying over $100 in the future you will not have to pay more than $25 or $20. While the ordinary man will think I am after you, I shall drop this other law and tax and you will not have to pay more than a half or a quarter of your present taxes. The figures placed on Hansard this afternoon by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte) show that that is what will happen. When the business profits tax lapses we will have no weapon to go after the manufacturers except the Bill now before the committee. That is not what the people are looking for. They desire a continuation of the War Profits Act along with this income tax. The wealth of the country should be made to contribute its fair share towards the expense of the war. I submit to the minister that it is not yet too late to correct the mistake that has been made, and that he should provide for the continuance of the war profits tax. I submit that, instead of dropping the War Profits Tax Act, which bears heavily on some people who are well able to bear the burden, taxation might be dropped which bears heavily on the poor people and affects the everyday life of the wage-earner whose income is small, barely enough to meet his daily necessities. The additional duty of seven and one-half per cent which the minister has placed on all commodities, should be the first tax to be reduced or removed.

I do not see why, under present conditions the minister mentions the year 1918 in connection with the War Profits Act. It is true that in that year he may collect a debt which inures during 1917. I do not see why the minister talks about this Act being in force for 1918, as it will be in force only in reference to the collection of these taxes for 1917, as I have said.

The observations which I have made will make it plain to the common people that this Act cannot take the place of the business profits tax as a money-getting piece of machinery, and that both Acts should be continued in force until the end of the war.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think I am in a position now to deal with some matters that were suggested for my consideration before six o'clock. An amendment was suggested whereby the exemption of $2,000 in the case of unmarried persons, and widows or widowers without dependent children, was reduced to $1,500. The question was raised as to whether we would extend any consideration in the case of dependents or dependents' relatives. I have reached the conclusion that the reason I gave before six o'clock, in dealing with the subject generally, why we should not make any allowance of that kind, is a proper one. The result, therefore, is that, so far as the Government is concerned, the exemption in the case of an unmarried person, and widows or widowers without dependent children, shall be $1,500, and in the case of all other persons $3,000. I think it better that the amount should be defined, and if there are anomalies they will have to remain.

Mr. VERVILLE: Then a single man who has a family to support will have to pay the same tax as one who has not a family.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There is no allowance for dependents. I am satisfied that if there is an allowance for dependents it would defeat the exemption altogether.

Mr. VERVILLE: Then is it fair to reduce it? It would be very fair to reduce it to $1,500 or less perhaps, for those who have no dependents at all, living all alone, but is it fair to reduce it, when you are going to put the single men with dependents in such a condition that they are worse off than they were before?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not wish to be discourteous to my hon. friend, but I have announced the conclusion I have reached on the subject, namely that in the case of unmarried persons or widows or widowers without dependent children the exemption shall be $1,500. In the case of all others it will be $3,000.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I am sorry to see that the reduction has been made, but if that is the conclusion of the Government, that is the end of it.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Section 4 now reads: "Unmarried persons and widows or widowers without dependent children." I have an amendment to insert immediately after subsection 3 of section 4, which will be subsection 3 (a). It will be recalled that last evening the hon. gentleman from Halifax raised the question as to the husband assigning a part of his income to his wife for the purpose of evading the tax, which would be possible by reason of the double exemption, the exemption to the wife, and the exemption to the husband. I think it well that both wife and husband should be assessed in respect of their assessable income, and should be entitled to the exemption of $3,000 each, but in order to prevent evasion of the tax, I desire to move that the following be inserted as subsection 3 (a)after subsection 3, of section 4:

A person who, after the first day of August, 1917, has reduced his income by the transfer or assignment of any real or personal, movable or immovable property to such person's wife or husband, as the case may be, or to any member of the family of such person shall, nevertheless, be liable to be taxed as if such transfer or assignment had not been made, unless the minister is satisfied that such transfer or assignment was not made for the purpose of evading the taxes imposed under this Act, or any part thereof.

The effect of that will be that bona fide transfers, some of which might occur, will of course not be affected, but if the circumstances are such that the transfer is made for the purpose of evading the tax, in order that the benefit may be had of the double exemption, this subsection will meet the case. I understand the view of my hon. friend rather to be that the two exemptions should be allowed.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not want to go back to what we were discussing, in regard to making an additional allowance for each child in the family, but I want to tell the minister that, in the United States Bill now before Congress, they make provision for $100 for each child under eighteen years of age.

Mr. MARCIL: I am sorry the hon. minister has not taken my view of this matter. This provision practically means that if you are married you might as well raise dogs as children. No advantage is given to those who have children. Many people in this country raise dogs instead of raising children. You can see them every day of the year. It is an unfortunate state of affairs, and I am not the first to say it. The man who is married without children is placed on the same footing as if he had a dozen children.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I want to say that I think my hon. friend's observations are very unjust. There is an exemption of $3,000. No married person has to pay a cent of tax unless the income is $3,000 or more, and I have known some very large families raised on a fraction of $3,000, and most of the large families in this country are those of people who have no such income. I do not believe any hardship will result from this measure at all. The legislation referred to which is being enacted in the United States is easily differentiated, because there the exemption is less than $3,000. It is $1,000 less than our exemption. I think the section is all right in its present form.

Mr. KNOWLES: In regard to the assistance we get from the legislation in the United States, they do not give the double exemption to husband and wife, do they?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: They do not.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister seems to follow their legislation with some confidence in one instance, and does not follow it in another.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In this case I do not say that I have followed it, but the hon. leader of the Opposition agrees with what has been done.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I wish the hon. gentleman would pay me that compliment more often.

Mr. KNOWLES: The fact that the hon. leader of the Opposition agrees with it has nothing to do with the matter. I can do my own little thinking, and I do not think it is the kind of answer to give a grown-up man. I trust the minister will have a better answer.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I did not desire to be discourteous to my hon. friend. I just made the observation. There is a good deal to be said on both sides, and I think the Act as it stands, with exemptions to each, is probably fair. The law of the several provinces recognizes the right of property in the wife as an individual, and it seems to me she should be entitled to exemption.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 5—Incomes not liable to tax:

Mr. MURPHY: Have you passed section 5?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Section 5 was passed last night.

Mr. MURPHY: Is the minister satisfied that under paragraph (g) of section 5 a club or association, with the ingenuity, for instance, of a racing association, could not bring itself within that exemption? If the minister has given the matter thought, I would ask him for an answer. If he has not, I would commend the matter to him.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think the word "non-profitable" would exclude such associations. It is not the intention to exempt a racing association that is operated for gain.

Mr. MURPHY: Racing associations would not admit they are operating for gain.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The question is one of fact. If any gain were made, they would clearly be liable under this measure. The object of this exemption is obvious on the face of it.

Mr. VERVILLE: I was not here when section 5 was passed. I see the first exemption is "the income of the Governor General of Canada." Is His Excellency not to be taxed on his income in Canada?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No.

Mr. VERVILLE: I am sorry.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I may say, so that there may be no misunderstanding, that this is the Government's Bill. His Excellency has nothing whatever to do with the arrangement of this Bill, nor has he been consulted in any way about it.

Mr. MARCIL: His Excellency is exempt anyway. The fact that he is an Imperial officer would exempt him.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think the exemption is a very proper one.

On section 6—Payment of tax at source:

Mr. MURPHY: I assume the minister will have to make a change here to correspond with the one he made in section 4.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I was just about to do that. I beg to move:

That after the word "unmarried" in line 23 there be inserted in place of the word "men" the words "persons or widows", and that in line 22, instead of the words "two thousand" there be inserted the words "fifteen hundred".

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MICHAUD: In several municipalities in New Brunswick widows are to a certain extent exempted from taxation on their incomes or upon property owned by them when the assessment is made upon their property. Has that fact been taken into consideration by the minister?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not know that I quite understand my hon. friend. If a widow has children, she is entitled to an exemption of $3,000; if she has no children, she is entitled to an exemption of $1,500.

Mr. MICHAUD: She is not exempted then by reason of the fact that she is a widow?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Not by the fact solely that she is a widow.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Would the minister briefly state the purpose of this section and how and when it could be utilized? Could you use it for instance in the case of brokers on an exchange?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: This section covers a class of trustees in whom securities are vested in trust to pay over the income. It is to ensure that the Government will get the tax from that source. We look to the trustees. Of course, if he pays it on behalf of the beneficiary, the beneficiary is made the allowance. This is taxation at its source.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is there anything in the Bill to cover estates? There are in this country large estates where money is accumulating, perhaps by reason of the children not being of age.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: A trustee, having property vested in him and having an income in respect of it, is liable to pay. If he pays, in respect of the share of income which the beneficiary receives, the beneficiary receives credit for that payment; but if, under the conditions of the trust under which he is acting, he gets income which he accumulates for those who may come into being, say a generation from now, he is liable as a person in respect of that income, so that the estate is taxed.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is the case of a "trustee" estate, but there are many estates which are not "trustee" estates. Suppose a man makes a will and he appoints an ordinary executor.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I was considering him as a trustee.

Mr. McKENZIE: If the minister considers him as a trustee possibly the Bill covers that case.

Section as amended agreed to.

[Mr. Michaud.]

On section 7—Annual returns to minister of total income:

Mr. MICHAUD: Are special forms to be sent to the taxpayers?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There are certain forms in the schedule, but we have power given under a later provision of the Bill to call for such information as we require from the taxpayer, and the mode of administration will be just as under the business profits-tax, to send the necessary forms to citizens and to have them filled in and returned to the department.

Last night the hon. member for Rouville took exception to the word "suspected" in line 9, on page 6. It is a rather obnoxious word, although it has an apt meaning. Out of deference to my hon. friend's objection, I beg to move that the word "suspected," in subsection 2 of section 7, be struck out and the word "believed" substituted therefor.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 8—Additional information.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Subsection 2 gives the minister power to require "the production, or the production on oath." Why this difference? Is it not sufficient to have simply the words "the production?"

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think it is well that we should have the power to compel the production of these documents on oath, but, of course, the power should be exercised wisely. Suppose that you are not satisfied with the statement a citizen has made. It is an extreme case, but it is well that power should exist to make him make the statement under oath.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—Penalty.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: By the preceding section the minister may compel a man to produce letters, accounts, etc., on oath. Subsection 2 of section 9 says that "any person making a false statement" shall be liable on summary conviction to a certain penalty. Now, if a man makes a false statement under oath he is guilty of perjury, and he ought to have the benefit of a jury, and not be tried simply by a magistrate.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think he would be liable to both. If a man commits perjury he would be liable under the Criminal Code. The provision in subsection 2 of section 9 for a penalty on summary conviction is in addition to the penalties of the Criminal Code.

Mr. MICHAUD: Under subsection 2 he would be liable to 6 months' imprisonment, and he could still be brought before a high court.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: A man should not be subject to two trials and two penalties. It should be either the one or the other. It is all right to provide for a penalty on summary conviction, but if a man makes a false statement under oath he ought to be tried by jury.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think it is very desirable that power should exist to ask for a sworn statement.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Possibly.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If he made a false statement in the returns he would be liable to the penalties provided here, and I think he could be proceeded against for perjury.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The lawyers will have to disentangle it.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not think any particular harm will be done by retaining this provision.

Mr. ROBB: I call the minister's attention to what seems to me to be a hardship. In line 26 of page 6 it is provided that:

> Such returns shall be delivered to the minister on or before the twenty-eighth day of February in each year, without any notice or demand being made therefor.

Then section 9 provides for a penalty of $100 for each day during which the default continues. Now firms or individuals may unknowingly default.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Legislation of this kind always runs this way. There is confidence that the Government will not exercise the powers given here oppressively, in the case of a citizen defaulting unknowingly. It is necessary that the onus be put on the citizen of making the returns. But in the practical working out of the Act, just as in the Business Profits Tax Act, the various officials throughout the country will send the forms out and keep in touch with the recipients until the returns are made. I think I can assure my hon. friend that no such injustice as he imagines may result will be done to citizens.

Mr. MICHAUD: The word "shall' is imperative, and looks very severe indeed.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: As my hon. friend knows, it is a penalty not exceeding $10,000. There is always discretion within the limits fixed. It might be a fine of $10 or $50.

Mr. MARCIL: Ignorance of the law is no excuse, but how is an ordinary citizen, who does not read our deliberations and who does not get the statutes, to know that he must make his returns before February 28th?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We will contrive to let him know. We will get the organization, and secure information as to the citizens thought to be liable, give them the forms, and have these forms filled in. I admit it is a big task.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What organization has my hon. friend in mind?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: At the present time we have the business profits war tax organization. We have a Commissioner of Taxation, an assistant commissioner, and a staff in the Finance Department. Then we have representatives in every province from Nova Scotia to British Columbia. That organization can be extended by the addition of other officials. We have the province of Ontario divided into districts, with, I think, four men in charge. They have stenographers and such other assistants as are necessary. The whole Dominion is covered, and by the expansion of that staff the business profits taxation assessment could be made, and this taxation as well.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: There is a good deal of force in what was stated by my hon. friend from Huntingdon (Mr. Robb). Men in the country may forget they are assessable. Will your officers look after the assessment rolls in every municipality, and search out the parties who are likely to be assessable?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We shall be obliged to do it. We would not expect to administer this tax upon the unsolicited returns of the public. It would not be possible to do it. The country will have to be covered. It will have to be ascertained, so far as it can be, who are properly liable to assessment, and those persons will be notified, just as the assessment department here notified taxpayers. It will take some time to get the system under way, and the organization will be more or less imperfect for a while. It took three or four years to get the United States organization working properly.

Mr. ROBB: Does not the minister think it would be better to impose a smaller penalty, and collect it as a tax? Give the people proper notice, and if they fail to comply with it put on a small tax, and collect it. One hundred dollars a day might be more than the tax would amount to. The penalty might be greater than the tax. Under the Massachusetts law the penalty is five dollars for each day a person is in default. That looks like a reasonable figure, and it might be collected.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am quite satisfied from my experience in office that nobody will be harmed through the infliction of penalties. I think it is desirable that there should be legislation in regard to penalties, so that citizens may be compelled to make the returns called for. I do not think it is necessary to reduce the penalty. I am quite sure no hardship will result. It is a sanction to the Act.

Mr. ROBB: If the fine is not paid, what will happen? Will a distress warrant issue, or how will the amount be collected?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There is provision later on for collection. It is a debt owing to the Crown, and is covered by section 20, which says:

> The taxes and all interest and costs assessed or imposed under the provisions of this Act shall be recoverable as a debt due to His Majesty from the person on whom it is assessed or imposed.

Section agreed to.

On section 10—Assessment:

Mr. ROBB: Does the minister not think it would be fairer if the tax were payable within thirty days from receipt of the notice, instead of thirty days from mailing of the notice?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That brings up a difficult question. You can prove when a notice is mailed, but it is hard to prove when it is received.

Mr. MICHAUD: The notice would be sent by registered mail.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is hard to know, from the department's standpoint, when it is received. Of course, a citizen will be allowed a certain leeway.

Mr. ROBB: There might be instances where men would be travelling and would not receive their notices.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I can assure my hon. friend that there will not be any harsh exercise of the powers given under the Act.

Section agreed to.

On section 12—Board of Referees:

Mr. McKENZIE: What is the duty of these referees?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Section 13 defines them.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: How many of these boards will you have and will they be distributed over the country?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That would depend on the number of appeals. From our experience of the Business Profits War Tax Act I should say that it would not be necessary to appoint permanent boards but if there should be a number of appeals in, say, Nova Scotia, we would appoint a board of referees consisting of one, two or three members for the purpose of hearing and determining appeals. There may be very few appeals and there would be no use in appointing a permanent board in each province because that would involve considerable expense. We might appoint a county judge, or some lawyer of standing, or a business man, as the case might be, have a court of revision held and have the appeals disposed of in a summary fashion.

Mr. ROBB: What remuneration is provided for these referees?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There is no remuneration fixed in the Act. It would be a matter of arrangement like the appointment of a commission under the Inquiries Act. I am told by the parliamentary counsel that it is not necessary to insert in the Act the amount of remuneration. It would only hamper us in the administration of the Act to do so. I should say that the usual fee of $20, $25 or $30 a day for a lawyer or county judge acting as a referee would be paid, but I should not like to be confined to that. At all events, we have not any large amount in view if that is in the mind of my hon. friend from Huntingdon (Mr. Robb).

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The only advantage of having local referees would be that the appeal would be brought to the domicile of the taxpayer; otherwise it would be better to send it to the court at once.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Precisely.

On section 13—Court of Revision:

Mr. McKENZIE: Does the minister propose to provide any machinery by which parties will have notice of their rights under this Act? People generally will never see this Act. When a man gets notice of his assessment he should at the same time get notice that he is entitled to appeal because otherwise he would not know anything about it. There should be forms sent out by the minister which should contain notice that the party assessed is entitled to appeal.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Surely. My hon. friend is aware that on an ordinary assessment slip sent out there is at the foot, or on the back, or in some conspicuous place, a notice that parties desiring to appeal must make a return within a certain time. If my hon. friend will look at the schedule, he will see that a form is provided, of a very simple character, on which a man is entitled to give notice of appeal against the assessment on the ground that he has been wrongfully assessed. There is nothing technical about it.

Section agreed to.

On section 15—Hearing and decision by board:

Mr. ROBB: Does paragraph one of this section mean that the board has only the right to increase assessments?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The board shall determine the matter. The matter will be the matter of the appeal. The taxpayer will be appealing on the ground that he is wrongfully assessed and it will be for the court to reduce or confirm the assessment. Then the power is given, if the court thinks it is a proper case, to raise the assessment. It is the same power that is exercised by the ordinary court of revision in regard to the assessment of real property.

Mr. ROBB: Should it not read: "May increase or decrease the assessment"?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I submit that the section as it appears is necessary for this reason: The appeal will be on the ground that the assessment is too high or that the assessment should not have been made. In determining the matter, it is clear that the board may reduce the assessment or hold that the party is not liable for it. The appeal will not be on the ground that the assessment should be increased. Therefore we think it necessary to provide that the court shall increase the assessment.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I think we should not use such power as that. The minister has power to increase the assessment himself. The poor taxpayer, who thinks he has been assessed too heavily, appeals to the board and the board should simply have the power to determine whether he has been assessed too heavily or not. It should not go beyond that. If he is not taxed sufficiently, it is for the minister to look after that and not for the board.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is extraordinary how often I find myself in agreement with my right hon. friend but I do not on this occasion. This is to be the law. If a party comes before the court and it appears that a mistake has been made, that he has not been assessed enough, he submits himself to the jurisdiction of the court and if the court says that his assessment shall be increased, it will only be because he is liable for an increased amount.

It is by no means an unusual provision, in fact I think there is a similar provision in many Assessment Acts. It is very seldom exercised, but I think it should be there because the purpose of the court is to see that a proper assessment is made. No hardship can result to the man in question, because the assessment depends upon his return, and if the court should find that he is assessable for more than the amount for which he has been assessed, it only means that he has not made a proper return. So, while in minor matters I usually agree with my hon. friend, I do not find myself agreeing with him to-night.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I have been brought up under a system, that of the civil code, under which the court cannot go beyond the prayer of the suitor. I think that is a very sound principle.

Mr. McKENZIE: I agree that if the assessment is not regarded as sufficient the department should have the right to appeal, that either party should have that right. I find no provision for the Crown to appeal. The man who is appealing is the party assessed. He comes before the court prepared to sustain his petition, but how is he to meet the case of an increased assessment sprung upon him there?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend has been a judge, and I have no doubt a very just judge. What hardship would likely arise if my hon. friend, sitting as a court of revision, should find that the man had not made a proper return and was assessable on a larger income than he had stated, either inadvertently or otherwise? That power is vested in the court, it will be observed.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I wish to call attention to section 8, which empowers the minister to ask for more information. The ratepayer has made his return to the minister, and the minister may ask for more information. But here you are saying that the court shall have power to say to the man: You are not assessed fully. I say that is not what should be contemplated by the law. The appeal should be made and the prayer should be heard and decided only upon the complaint of the taxpayer that he is taxed too heavily.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I cannot appreciate the point of view of my right honourable friend. If, in the course of the suitor's evidence, it transpires, under the questioning of the court, that his income, instead of being $5,000, is $20,000, the court says: Not only have you no cause for complaint, but it is clear that under this measure you should be assessed for $20,000. It is most unlikely that any injustice would result from placing this power in the hands of the court.

Mr. McKENZIE: I do not agree with my hon. friend's practice. If, for instance, an appeal is made against an assessment of $20,000, then the issue is whether $20,000 is the right amount. The position of the department in the court will be to sustain that $20,000 is right. The issue will not permit the minister to show that the assessment should be $30,000 instead of $20,000.

That issue will not allow him to do that. He can sustain what he was done, and the other man's position is to controvert that. But in supporting his assessment of $20,000 he will not be permitted to get an assessment of $30,000. That is a clear cut issue that will be before the court, and the court must stand by the issue.

Mr. DAVIDSON: In Nova Scotia we have an Act on the statute book for many years which has worked successfully, and just exactly the same powers are given to an Assessment Appeal court in that Act as are proposed under this Act. The Assessment Appeal court has the power to increase the assessment, even though the appeal be made to have the assessment decreased. Having acted in the capacity of a member of the Appeal Court, I find it works very well, because the ratepayer who thinks he is aggrieved must exercise his judgment before taking an appeal. These appeals are made in a frivolous manner sometimes, but if the person who feels himself aggrieved knows there is not only a chance of his assessment being decreased, but a possibility of it being increased, he exercises more care. That provision prevents frivolous appeals. It has worked out very well in Nova Scotia, and I think in nearly all the provinces that have a similar Act.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am quite familiar with the provision in the Act to which the hon. gentleman from Annapolis refers. That provision has been in our Act for many years, but I do not know of any cases where it was acted upon but one, and that was last winter, in the case of some milling concern in the neighbourhood of where my hon. friend lives, and there was the greatest possible row about it. They undertook, of their own motion, according to the language of our Act, to increase the assessment, without dealing with it under proper notice of appeal, and giving notice to the other side. It came up before our Supreme Court, and such men as Mr. Justice Harris decided it was absolutely wrong to use such powers in that way. Mr. Justice Ritchie agreed with him, and it was a divided court, but two such men as Mr. Justice Ritchie and Mr. Justice Harris said such power should never be used, that ample notice should be given to any litigant of any application to have his taxes increased, and the court should not act of its own motion, although the provision happened to be in the Act. I think the hon. gentleman from Annapolis will find that was the only time, in the history of Nova Scotia, that it was acted upon without proper notice being given to the other side that it was the intention to increase or decrease, as the case may be.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I think the hon. gentleman is in error with reference to that. He alludes to the case of the municipality of Annapolis versus the Davidson Lumber Company. In that case, when the Assessment Appeal Court raised the assessment, it was on the appeal of a ratepayer, and not upon the appeal of the owner of the property. There are very, very many cases in the county of Annapolis, and in other parts of the province, which have come under my observation where the assessment court raised the assessment, although the appellant had asked for a decrease.

Section agreed to.

On section 2, subsection (f)—Definition taxpayer.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My right hon. friend asked that this section be allowed to stand. I think we might pass it now. I desire to amend this section by changing the word "suspected" to the word "believed."

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. McKENZIE: Section 15 provides for costs. I suppose as a rule the men who will be litigating here will be so wealthy that costs will not bother them very much, but some litigants will not be wealthy, and the question of costs will be important to them. I find that the minister in section 15 adopts as the scale of fees the tariff of fees in force in the Exchequer Court of Canada. If a man who has only a small amount at stake—the amount may not be very large, but it may be important to him —is thinking about appealing, and he knows there may be a counsel fee of $200 taxed against him, he may not feel that he is in a position to appeal. The scale of fees in the Exchequer Court is the highest in any court of Canada, and I do not quite see why this question of costs should not be left entirely in the discretion of the board which could fix a lump sum that would be commensurate with the proceedings. If the board has to say: You are entitled to costs, then they have no discretion but to allow the scale of fees prescribed by the Exchequer Court. This court of appeal should be a simple court, not restricted by any close or hard rules of practice. A lawyer should not be necessary. People should be able to go before this board without any formality, just as they do before the Railway Board. If the Exchequer Court fees prevail, and an appellant is up against a taxing master who will under this scale of fees tax the cost at $300 or $400, when the matter at stake is very much less than that, a man who may have a grievance will be afraid of risking the possibility of being mulcted to that extent.

Mr. MICHAUD: I agree with my hon. friend. I know from experience that costs are taxed fairly high in the Exchequer Court, and under this measure a man should be given an opportunity of appearing before an appeal board without having to pay too heavy costs.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The suggestion is a very good one. The court should be one in which the fees are reasonable, especially as the appeal will be against the Crown. I beg to move that section 15 be reconsidered.

Motion agreed to.

On section 15—Hearing and decision by board:

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I beg to move:

That the last sentence of subsection 2, be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

The costs shall be as may be prescribed by the Board.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Why not say: "The tariff of fees"?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Very well. Make it read: "The tariff of fees shall be as prescribed by the board."

Mr. BUREAU: If the board does not order any costs, there will be no costs.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The costs will be absolutely in the discretion of the board.

Mr. BUREAU: A man may succeed in his appeal and the board may, in rendering judgment, not assess the costs, and he will have to pay his own costs.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Board is a judicial body and the costs are in the discretion of the board, but the discretion should be a reasonable one and, I have no doubt, would be. I do not see how we could divest the board of discretion as to costs.

Mr. BUREAU: Then there will be no tariff; the fees are discretionary.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The costs are discretionary.

Mr. BUREAU: As the subsection stands, the costs are as in the Exchequer Court. There you have a fixed tariff. Under this amendment you may have any tariff.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It has been pointed out that the Exchequer Court fees are higher than the ordinary court fees.

Mr. BUREAU: No, lower.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: They are lower than the ordinary court fees in Quebec, but not lower than the ordinary court fees in Nova Scotia. The costs might be fixed by the board, and probably they would have regard to the tariff in force in the several provinces, because we shall appoint a board to deal with Nova Scotia appeals and one to deal with Quebec appeals. On the whole I think the amendment makes the matter fairly satisfactory.

Bill reported, amendments read the first and second time and concurred in.

On motion of Sir Thomas White, the House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

COAL SUPPLY IN THE MARITIME PROVINCES.

COAL TRANSPORTS FOR HALIFAX AND ST. JOHN.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. WILLIAM PUGSLEY (St. John): Can the Minister of Trade and Commerce give the House any definite information in regard to the statement made in the press of St. John that the Government, through the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, had made arrangements for securing steamers for the purpose of transporting coal from the United States to the port of St. John, and whether the vessels will be at the disposal of the local authorities, or will be run by the Government themselves?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I can add this to the information I gave my hon. friend the other day. The Government has intervened in the matter to the extent of arranging for the necessary transport for supplying hard coal to the cities of Halifax and St. John and the districts supplied therefrom. The difficulty at present appears to be the finding of suitable accommodation for these vessels, which are of large size, and have to be unloaded quickly to avoid unnecessary expense. This matter is being looked into by the authorities of Halifax and St. John, and it is hoped that they will be able to arrange for the docking and unloading of these vessels. If so, they will be at their disposal at reasonable rates for carrying the coal that is required to supply these two cities and the surrounding districts.

INSURANCE ACT AMENDMENT.

CONTINUED CONSIDERATION OF THE BILL IN COMMITTEE.

House again in committee on Bill No. 53, respecting insurance.—Mr. Steele in the Chair.

On section 59—Investment of company's funds:

Mr. PUGSLEY: The only change in the securities, I understand, is what is shown in italics on the preceding page.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is correct.

On section 60—Deposits outside Canada:

Mr. MARCIL: May I ask the minister if this Bill applies to the so-called friendly or mutual benefit associations?

[Sir Thomas White.]

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There is a later section covering them.

On section 63—Investment by companies other than life companies:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What is the change?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Hitherto this provision only applied to life insurance, now it applies to all insurance.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Might I ask why the last three lines of subsection 3 have been struck out? They provide that an amount at least equal to two-thirds of the total liabilities of a company in Canada shall consist of investments in or loans upon Canadian securities. I think it is very desirable that insurance companies, which derive their assets from the masses, should make their investments largely in Canadian securities, instead of in foreign securities, and I think there should be some good reason to show for striking out this provision.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That point was carefully considered, and it was feared that the retention of the provision might lead to retaliatory legislation on the part of some of the States in which Canadian companies are doing business. I think it is a fact that most Canadian companies doing business almost solely in Canada invest their funds in Canadian securities, but there are Canadian companies doing a large business in many States of the Union, and it was thought inexpedient, for the reason I have mentioned, to retain that provision. I admit it might seem upon its face as if what my hon. friend says is reasonable.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not see how it would lead to retaliation, because this section only applies to Canadian companies.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: But they might be doing business in the United States also.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The section does not apply to foreign companies doing business in Canada, therefore, the retention of this provision should not lead to retaliation. I do not see how the fact that Parliament requires a Canadian company to make an investment in Canadian securities proportionate to its liabilities in Canada would cause any retaliation against Canadian companies in respect of business they might be doing in the United States. If our legislation affected foreign companies in Canada, the case might be different, but we are only dealing with Canadian companies. I think there is every reason in favour of retaining this provision.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I confess it looks like a reasonable provision, but the arguments put forward in the Banking and Commerce Committee were very strong, and were considered very carefully, and it was thought the retention of the provision might lead to retaliation, which would result to the detriment of Canadian fire insurance companies doing business outside of Canada. My hon. friend asks how it would invite retaliation.

Canadian companies may lodge Canadian securities in the United States with the superintendents of insurance in the states in which they are doing business. It was contended that a state legislature may say: As your legislation requires you to invest an amount equal to two-thirds of your liabilities in Canadian securities, we shall require you to invest a certain amount in our securities. What about our insurance companies? They might resent legislation requiring them to make investments in foreign securities equal to two-thirds of their foreign liabilities."

Mr. PUGSLEY: It says "liabilities in Canada."

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I follow my hon. friend perfectly, and yet one meets this contention of those who are practically engaged in the business and who appear to have a well-founded apprehension that retaliation might result. It appears to be the case that legislation affecting insurance companies is pretty carefully followed by the different administrations, and retaliation is likely to occur if there appears to be any discrimination against the securities of the foreign countries in which our companies are doing business.

Section agreed to.

On section 65—Investments, how taken:

Mr. PUGSLEY: I suppose there is some general penalty clause?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Instead of having the penalty clauses in this Act, there is a Bill, standing in the name of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) and which has passed the Banking and Commerce Committee to which it was referred, dealing with the matter under the criminal jurisdiction of Parliament.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That would not appear to cover a case like this. Suppose section 65 is violated, what is the penalty for it?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is enacted by section 187.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is all right; there are penalties.

On section 68—Appraisement of real estate by direction of superintendent:

Mr. MURPHY: What is the change in this section?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Merely a change in phraseology, the substitution of "British or foreign company" for "company incorporated elsewhere than in Canada."

On section 69—Penalties and forfeitures:

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The sections which have been omitted, sections 71, 72 and 73, are now covered by the Bill to which I have referred and which is an amendment to the Criminal Code. I am advised by the Department of Justice that in order to give clear jurisdiction it is desirable that instead of dealing with the penalties in this Act they should be dealt with under the criminal jurisdiction of Canada. Then, there is no doubt as to the jurisdiction.

Section agreed to.

On section 74—Assessment Company failing to make attested returns:

Mr. PUGSLEY: This section, No. 74, becomes 70?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: They will be renumbered.

On section 75—Contracts prior to 20th July, 1885:

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Steele): Section 75 is struck out.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Section 75 is transferred to page 4 of the Bill which was dealt with the first day we took up the Bill. It was transferred by the Banking and Commerce Committee and it is now included in section 3, (a2). It was thought it should be dealt with among the exemptions, the wording being:

> To any contract entered into, or any certificate of membership or policy of insurance issued, before the 20th day of July, 1885, by any assessment life insurance company.

It is only a change of position in the Act. On Section 77,—Disposal of unauthorized investments; liability of directors for unauthorized investments:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The director who, within a certain time, protests against an unauthorized investment, relieves himself of any liability?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: A director who is present at a board meeting at which it is determined to make an unauthorized investment and who opposes that investment should not be held jointly liable with the directors who favour the investment. This case of the director who is over-ruled, came before the committee, and in order to meet this difficulty this proviso has been inserted. I think that the publication in a newspaper of the protest as here provided would be very rare, but it would be very effectual in preventing improper investments. Investments have been made, rarely I am glad to say, which were quite unauthorized by the Act and which have entailed heavy losses. I would move to amend the proviso by substituting for the word "made" the word "authorized." That would make it refer to the meeting at which such investment was "authorized"—an investment would not be "made" at the meeting.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Suppose all the directors protest against it?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Then they would not authorize it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why not? The investment is authorized. One director protests, and the other follows his example. I think that they should cease to be directors. A man ought not to be allowed to continue to be a member of the board and to exonerate himself from liability by making publication in a newspaper, where the investment is made contrary to the provisions of this statute. There ought to be some more stringent provision than that.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Does my hon. friend seriously contend that, if a board authorized an investment and then protested against it, the court would relieve them of joint responsibility under this provision?

Mr. PUGSLEY: If the statute says so.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Would not the court look through the form to the intent and ascertain who, as a matter of fact, did protest in the proper sense of the term, and who, as a matter of fact, put forward sham protests in order to protect themselves under this Act? In the Companies Act there is an almost identical provision, section 162, relating to the payment of dividends when a company is insolvent. That has been in the Companies Act for many years and I believe is a useful safeguard against the payment of dividends when a company is insolvent. The practical effect of this provision would be to make boards of directors exceedingly careful with regard to the investments they make.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is very important that some provision should be made. I have known two or three cases where very considerable losses occurred. Let me illustrate what might occur under this provision. There might be two wealthy men on a board of directors, both of whom would be absent from a meeting. They might desire to make investments in certain securities on which they looked with favour. Three directors, of little or no means, in the absence of the other two, might pass a resolution authorizing the investment. Those who were absent would publish a protest in the newspapers.

But they still remain directors, the illegal investments still remain, and the wealthy directors who would be able to respond are freed from liability. After three or four years, or longer, the company gets into difficulties. It may be discovered that its difficulties have arisen very largely, if not wholly, through the illegal investments which have been made. The wealthy directors, who are the only ones able to respond in damages to the stockholders or policyholders, are freed from liability because they have published a protest; yet they are still allowed to remain members of the board. It seems to me they should be compelled to take some effectual means to have the securities disposed of and the funds restored to the company. They should not be allowed to escape liability merely by publishing a protest, they still remaining directors, and the illegal investment still allowed to continue.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think that case is a very fanciful one, and not likely to occur in practical experience. In such a case, in which there would be collusion, the absent directors would be liable. But the real safeguard is publicity, which is the best safeguard in matters of this kind. An illegal investment is made; months afterwards, on an inspection it comes to the attention of the department that there is depreciation and loss, and a certain amount of damage is done. This section will have the effect, so far as honest directors are concerned, of making them notify the Superintendent of Insurance, or publish this protest. If the Inspector of Insurance were made aware at once of the unlawful investment, there would be no loss, or very little loss, in most cases, because action would be taken at once to make them return the security to those who sold it, if it were a fraudulent transaction. I think it is a valuable safeguard in connection with the investments of these companies.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes, it is a safeguard, but it would be extremely more valuable if it were left as it stood in the original Bill. The Banking and Commerce Committee have emasculated the salutory provisions of the section to such an extent that they might be rendered nugatory. One of the difficulties with insurance companies, as with all companies, is that many directors do not give personal attention to the affairs of the company, and under this proviso they are only liable if, after they become aware of the illegal investment, they give notice. Investments might be made by the acting directors, by the small executive committee which companies often have, and the directors, really capable of responding in damages to the policyholders, might have no personal knowledge of the matter. It seems to me there would be no great hardship in leaving the section just as the minister had it in the original Bill.

Mr. MURPHY: As I gathered the sense of this amendment while the Chairman was reading it, I understand there are two conditions to be complied with before a director can relieve himself of liability for an investment of which he disapproves, and which may have been authorized at a meeting at which he was present, or not present. One of these is that he shall have his protest entered on the minutes, and the other is that he shall later publish that protest. There is a similar provision in a section in the Companies' Act, on which the proposed amendment is based. I did not hear the language.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is the same language.

Mr. MURPHY: What are the words?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The words are: "and is able to do so." The section is taken from the Companies' Act.

Mr. MURPHY: I am familiar with the section in the Companies' Act.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The committee felt—and one can quite understand the feeling—that a protesting director who desires to do his duty, but is overruled by his fellow-members of the board, should have some means of protecting himself against liability on a loss which might be very heavy. On the whole, I think it is a wise proviso.

Mr. MURPHY: The minutes are usually in the custody of the secretary, and it is not always easy for a director to have access to them as would be necessary if he is to protect himself.

Mr. PUGSLEY: There are directors in these companies, residing in the various sections of the country, and upon the reputation and high standing of these directors the policyholders are induced to accept policies in the companies. Suppose the directors choose—as directors often do—to allow two or three of their number to carry on the business of the company, and that those so carrying on the business make illegal investments through which the company sustains loss. Suppose that the company gets into litigation, and it is found that the assets are largely dissipated through this illegal investment, the directors should not be allowed to plead that they did not know of these illegal investments being made. The directors ought to know of the investments of the company; they ought to know whether the money of the shareholders is being invested in duly authorized securities or not. It seems to me that if the minister insists upon the amendment, it ought to be provided that an absent director should within thirty days after the investment has been authorized, publish his protest. He should not be allowed to escape liability—by saying, perhaps after a lapse of years, that he was not at the meeting, did not know of the investments which were being made, and had not the slightest idea they were illegal. This law will enable him to escape.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not think so.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes, it will.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No.

Mr. PUGSLEY: When the case comes before the court, he can say: I was not present when that investment was authorized; I did not know anything about it, and it was only when a suit was brought by the policyholder that I learned that this illegal investment had been made. It seems to me that thirty days would be long enough for an absent director to find out whether an illegal investment has been made or not. It is his duty to do so. He holds himself out to the shareholders and policyholders as taking an active interest in the management of the company and he should within thirty days, or say within three months, publish his protest. That would make it obligatory upon every director to keep himself in touch with the investments which are being made from time to time. I would allow reasonable time, because a director might be absent from the country; but he ought not to be allowed, after a lapse of many months or of years, to come before the court. as he is permitted to do under this proviso, and say he had no personal knowledge, and the investment therefore ought to be excused.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think my hon. friend has misunderstood the effect of the subsection and the proviso. I need not tell my hon. friend, who is a lawyer, that there would be liability on the part of any director for negligence; that is to say, if this proviso did not exist at all, the general law of negligence would apply to the director he has spoken of. It would be for the court to determine whether, having regard to his duties and to all the circumstances of the case, the director was negligent in his duty towards the shareholders of the company. The subsection says:

> The superintendent may request any company to dispose of and realize any of its investments not authorized by this Act, and the company shall within sixty days after receiving such request absolutely dispose of and realize the said investments, and if the amount realized therefrom falls below the amount paid by the company for the said investments, the directors of the company shall be jointly and severally liable for the payment to the company of the amount of the deficiency.

That is the law in the case of the superintendent taking the action mentioned. In order to protect a director who was present at the time the investment was authorized, and, though honestly desirous of doing his duty, was overruled by his fellow-directors, a proviso is inserted enabling him to escape from the liability imposed by the subsection. I do not think that the insertion of the proviso in any way relieves a director from his liability under the general law relating to negligence.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What is the use of it, then?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It makes a specific instead of a general provision.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It helps the directors.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It helps an honest director; that is what the proviso is intended to do.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: But it injures an innocent policy-holder. If a loss occurs to the company by reason of an illegal application of funds, the loss falls upon the policy-holders. Somebody has to suffer for it; either the innocent policy-holder, or the innocent director.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If a director neglects his duty, he is liable under the general law of negligence. But this is a case in which an honest director attends a meeting at which an illegal investment is authorized. His objection to the investment is overruled by his fellow directors, and, desiring to put himself right and avoid liability, he publishes his protest and has it entered upon the minutes of the meeting. If my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) were a director of a company and was overruled by some fellow directors, who had not as high a sense of 4 p.m. duty as he had, with regard to an investment upon which a loss was made, I do not think he should be held liable, provided he did everything possible to give notice of the improper transaction. That is the purpose of this proviso. The general law of negligence still applies. As I say, the precedent for this is found in the Companies Act.

Mr. MARCIL: Is the publication of this protest intended to serve as notice to the shareholders of the company?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It would have that effect.

Mr. MARCIL: In the province of Quebec a man could publish a notice of that kind in an obscure paper and the great bulk of the people interested in the company would never see it. Thousands of English people in Quebec never read French papers, and vice versa. The common law of that province ought to be followed; publication of such notice should be at least in at least one paper in either language.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If the protest were published in any paper of Canada against the action of directors of an insurance company, the rivals of that company would at once fasten upon it; it would become public property very soon.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I think it would be better if, under such circumstances, the director should at once notify the Superintendent of Insurance.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I had that same idea in my mind when the matter was under consideration. There is a great deal of wisdom in that suggestion. I beg to move that all the words after the word "thereafter" he struck out, and that the following words be inserted in lieu thereof:

"gives notice of his protest by registered letter to the superintendent."

Mr. PUGSLEY: This is the way a case of the kind referred to would work out: an illegal investment would be made by the manager. After the lapse of some months, the Superintendent of Insurance, during the course of an inspection, would discover the illegal investment. The thoroughly respectable directors who were merely figureheads on the directorate of the company, having learned that the Superintendent of Insurance had discovered the illegal investment, would proceed immediately to absolve themselves from liability under the Act by giving notice as set forth in the proviso, or by notifying the Superintendent of Insurance. That is like locking the barn door after the horse is stolen.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: They are liable for negligence.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Not at all. I do not think it is negligence not to attend meetings.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Not necessarily so.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not think it is even prima facie evidence. I think, therefore, the result would be as I have just stated. Under this proviso the shareholders or policyholders who have been transgressed against are freed from all liability. I think that is the way it would work out.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend knows that it is not possible to provide legislation covering all phases of fraud, but if this provision was not in the Act, in a case such as my hon. friend has mentioned, it would be a question whether or not, according to the law of negligence, the directors were liable. We are not changing that, but are providing for the cases—and there have been many of them—in which the board of directors make an unauthorized investment and one of them objects to it but is overruled. We are giving him an opportunity of notifying the Superintendent of Insurance, so that prompt action may be taken. I think the proviso has been improved by the suggestion of my right hon. friend.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It expressly provides the means by which the director may exonerate himself from liability. Does not my hon. friend think that there ought to be a clause to the effect that nothing in the proviso shall be held to relieve the directors from liability for negligence?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: This would only apply to the specific case. I do not think the director would be relieved from the general law.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It would relieve him from any presumption of negligence by reason of his not attending the meetings and having some oversight over the investments. A court would say that Parliament had made an express provision pointing out the means a director may take to relieve himself from liability. I think we ought not to take away the ordinary remedies which might exist against a director for negligence in not properly attending to the investments of the company.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I follow my hon. friend's argument, but I would point out that the corresponding provision in the Companies Act has stood and has not affected, so far as I am aware, the question of general liability for negligence on the part of a director. I would suggest that we pass this section, and in the meantime I will think over my hon. friend's suggestion. I might add that in deference to my hon. friend's request I consulted further with the Deputy Minister of Justice on the point of our declaring by this Act a foreign company to be a Canadian company after it has taken out a license, and the Deputy Minister of Justice is of the opinion that we should not change the language of the Act by inserting the words "for the purposes of this Act" which my hon. friend suggested.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 82—Form of Act of incorporation:

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not see any schedule to this Act.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The schedule has not yet been printed, but I am going to ask the committee to add the schedule as printed. If my hon. friend has an amended copy of the Act he will see by section 188 that the schedule to the Insurance Act of 1910 is enacted by reference, which is not a very desirable way of doing it. After the schedule is printed, we could have it inserted before we pass the Bill.

Section agreed to.

On section 95—Form of Policy to be approved:

Mr. PUGSLEY: This requires that a copy of every policy shall be mailed to the superintendent.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That part is not new, but part of the section is. It is in order that the Dominion may exercise this authority, as a condition of the license. The point is that in the case of a provincially-incorporated company, question might arise unless this provision was inserted.

Section agreed to.

On section 98—Companies having capital stock:

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is it the intention that section 98 should be limited to life insurance companies, or is it to apply to fire insurance companies as well?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think this part applies only to life insurance companies.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What becomes of section 108?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That was a section inserted in 1910 to meet a particular case which has since disappeared, so the section is no longer necessary. It was not general in its application.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not like the idea of putting through a Bill with the sections wrongly numbered. It is very apt to lead to mistakes.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: This is a very important matter, but it will probably meet my hon. friend's views if the Bill is reprinted before the third reading, and allowed to stand for a while. I have spoken of it many times to the Superintendent of Insurance, and he has given his closest attention to it. It will be properly numbered before the third reading.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) suggests that before taking the Bill out of committee we should have it reprinted, then it can be formally adopted.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes, that will be done. I may say I did not expect to get the Bill out of committee to-day. I intended asking that one or two sections should be allowed to stand.

On section 135—Assets, minimum amount of:

Sir THOMAS WHITE: This is a change with the object of strengthening the fire insurance companies. Formerly they were required to keep only a fair margin; now there is a 15 per cent excess required. I understand there is no objection on the part of the companies to that.

Section agreed to.

[Mr. Pugsley.]

On section 142a—Hail surplus fund:

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There is a change in this section. For the word "said," in line 2, page 63, there are substituted the words "net hail."

Section agreed to.

On part 5—Provisions applicable to companies hereafter incorporated by Parliament.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I would suggest that in the numbering of the subsections of the Bill a number should be placed before the first paragraph of each section. When that is not done it is very awkward in making citations. I brought the matter up in the Railway Committee, and the solicitors have made the changes in the Railway Bill. There should be uniformity.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I entirely agree. I could never understand why the first subsection was not numbered. The Superintendent of Insurance assures me that the Bill is being set up numbered in that way.

On section 184a—Expenses of organization, to what limited:

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have noticed that some companies charge up their organization expenses as an asset. I could never understand why that should be done. They are in no sense an asset. The money has been expended in procuring the charter and getting subscriptions for stock. It seems to me to be entirely a fictitious asset and ought not to be so charged.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The practice of the Department is to disallow it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Quite right.

On section 184b, subsection 8—If license not obtained, shareholders control payments:

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Subsection 8, which deals with balance of moneys to be returned to subscribers, is an important provision, which follows largely the language of a similar provision in the Bank Act. The object is to protect the shareholders during the period of organization. Some rather shocking cases have been brought to our attention, in which promoters have obtained fairly large sums from shareholders and have dissipated them in connection with the promotion of the company.

Section agreed to.

On section 188—Schedule to Insurance Act, 1910, enacted as schedule to this Act:

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I move that this section be struck out and that the Bill be amended by adding the schedule, without reading it. This is on the understanding, of course, that before the Bill leaves committee it will be reprinted, including the schedule.

Motion agreed to.

On section 189—Repeal of inconsistent Acts; exceptions:

Sir THOMAS WHITE: An amendment is required to this section. I move that after the words: "The Canadian Order of the Woodmen of the World," on line 16, the following be added: "The Royal Guardians, the Grand Lodge of the Loyal Order of Moose in the Dominion of Canada; La Société des Artisans, Canadiens Français, Alliance Nationale." Those companies have special charters, containing certain provisions that are very inconsistent with the provisions of this Bill, and they all combine life and accident insurance. It is not desired to cut down their powers; therefore it is necessary, as this is a general Act, that they should be specially named. I think that finishes the Bill except 142b, which we reserved.

Mr. MARCIL: Are those all the friendly societies incorporated by Dominion charter, or are there others?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: These are all friendly societies incorporated by the Dominion of Canada, and licensed.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: I suggest it be left to the law clerk to decide whether the schedule should come before the last clause or after. I should think it should come after.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think the hon. gentleman is right. I move that the schedule be added after section 189.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY.

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Steele in the Chair.

Public Works—Chargeable to income—Public buildings, Nova Scotia — Halifax, customs house—improvements, $3,000.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is this to cover contingent expenses?

Mr. ROGERS: It is to complete the stonework.

Stellarton, public buildings (revote of $4,000 lapsed)—including cost of site with interest at 5 per cent thereon, $5,500.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Why is interest added? It is rather difficult to obtain interest from the Government upon anything.

Mr. ROGERS: That was added by direction of the Exchequer Court.

New Brunswick—St. John, new post office, $5,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Has this building been entirely paid for?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes. This amount is to provide for pavement and for fixing up around the lot.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Has application recently been made to the department for the placing of lights in front of the building?

Mr. ROGERS: The matter has not come to my notice, neither has it been brought to the deputy's attention. It may be in the department; we will look it up.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I saw a statement in regard to the matter in a news-
5 p.m. paper some time ago. If the minister could see his way clear to grant the request, it would be a great public convenience.

Mr. ROGERS: I will see if there is any report on it.

Montreal General Post Office—Remodelling old building, $20,000.

Mr. MARCIL: Is this work about completed?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, practically completed. This is for the heating apparatus.

Mr. MARCIL: Has postal station "A" been completed?

Mr. ROGERS: It is now in use.

Mr. MARCIL: Is that on St. Catherine West?

Mr. ROGERS: On St. James street, I think.

Quebec Post Office, enlargement and alterations, $80,000.

Mr. MARCIL: Is the work at the Quebec post office about completed?

Mr. ROGERS: We expect that it will be completed this year. This vote is supposed to complete it.

Cardinal, Ontario—Public building, $4,000.

Mr. ROBB: Is this a new building?

Mr. ROGERS: This building is for a post office. It is suitable and can be had at a small price.

Kingston Royal Military College—Covered drill hall, $8,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does the minister's department retain control of drill halls and armouries after they have been built, or are they handed over to the Militia Department?

Mr. ROGERS: They are handed over to the Militia Department, and are under their entire control.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The reason I ask is this. The magnificent armoury which was constructed at St. John and which was intended to be used for the troops, has been converted into a hospital, I am told. It is certainly not adapted to that purpose, and it certainly is diverting the building from the purpose for which it was constructed, even though it is only for a time. I think it is unfortunate that a hospital could not have been got somewhere else, or other arrangements made. I have heard that there is quite a strong feeling amongst the citizens of St. John that a great mistake has been made in this respect. I thought the minister might know something about it, but if the matter is entirely in the hands of the Militia Department, information, of course, can be sought from the Minister of Militia.

Mr. ROGERS: It is entirely under his control.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister can see that the building is not at all suitable for a hospital.

Ottawa departmental buildings—Building and macerating plant for Currency Branch of Finance Department, $22,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Would the minister explain what a macerating plant is, and the process?

Mr. ROGERS: It is used for the purpose of destroying old bills that have been withdrawn from circulation.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I should have thought they could have been burned in a furnace.

Mr. ROGERS: The Finance Department wanted this plant, as it is the modern way of destroying old bills. The bills are ground into pulp, and the pulp is sold.

Saskatchewan—Sutherland — Water supply for Forest Nursery Station, $8,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is this near Saskatoon?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes. This vote of $8,000 is required for laying a six-inch water service pipe from the town system at Sutherland to the Nursery Station. The charge to the department for consumption would be by meter at 11 cents per 100 cubic feet, as follows: Estimated cost of laying water service pipe inclusive of materials and labour, $6,784.87; contingencies and superintendence, say, $1,215.13; total, $8,000. Approximate distances: From town's main to boundary of Forest Nursery Station, 2,950 feet; from boundary of Forestry Station to pressure tanks, 3,110 feet; total, 6,060 feet. The water supply for the Saskatoon Nursery Station is asked for by the Department of the Interior, April 28, 1915, and August 30, 1916, and recommended by Mr. N. M. Ross, Chief of Tree Planting Division.

Flags for Dominion public buildings, $5,000.

Mr. KYTE: Are these flags to be provided for public buildings all over Canada?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. KYTE: I am very pleased to see this vote. While I am not much of a flagwaver myself, I have always thought, and am quite sure, that a more judicious supply of bunting on the public buildings of this country would meet with the approval of the great majority, if not all of the people. Whenever I visit the United States I am always struck with the great contrast between that country and our own, and the great frequency with which one sees the United States flag flying. This has been particularly noticeable since the United States have joined the Allies in this war. There is now even a greater display of flags than ever before. The occasion for flying the Union Jack in this country is quite as great as that for flying the Stars and Stripes in the United States. I am very much pleased to think that in future the contrast between this country and the United States will not be as noticeable as it has been in the past.

Mr. ROGERS: We share the idea of flying the flag from every public building in Canada every day in the year. This amount is in the estimates in order that we may have an additional supply, because, by reason of the fact that we adopted that course some time ago, it is necessary that we should have more flags. I am glad my hon. friend approves of our action in flying the flags everywhere.

Mr. McKENZIE: In contradistinction to my hon. friend from Richmond, we are such flag-fliers in my town that the flag we have on our public building is pretty well worn out. I hope the deputy minister has made some report in regard to the matter. We had a very good flag, but it has been flying every day. The minister will understand that particularly in winter when a flag is left out and the rain falls upon it and freezes, and this is followed by a heavy wind, the flag is destroyed very quickly. I was sorry to see that for some months past the flag on our post office has been much dilapidated and worn out. It should be replaced by a new one.

Mr. ROGERS: Of course, it is the duty of the caretaker to bring the matter of this kind to our attention. We will take it up, and see that a new flag is supplied.

Dominion public buildings, generally, $30,000.

Mr. DEVLIN: Before the items are passed I would like to ask the minister if any part of the war profits tax goes to pay for those buildings, improvements, and so on.

Mr. ROGERS: All the taxes go into the consolidated revenues fund, and we get our money from that fund.

Mr. DEVLIN: Then, what we understand as war taxes are not devoted exclusively towards the carrying on of the war and the winning of the war?

Mr. ROGERS: The war tax is levied for the purpose of carrying on the war. We have the Customs tax, the Inland Revenue tax, etc., from which it has always been the practice to pay the items in the different departments of the Government. The war tax is a special tax for the carrying on of the war.

Mr. DEVLIN: Is it the intention of the Government to set aside the tax directly levied for war purposes towards carrying on the war? Take the income tax, for instance, which we are about to collect—will that income tax also go to pay for the repairs to public buildings, repairs to wharves, the building of post offices, etc., or will it be devoted entirely to war purposes?

Mr. ROGERS: I am not quite clear as to the form adopted by the Finance Department in regard to the manner in which they earmark the income tax or any other particular tax in the payment of the moneys necessary for works, or necessary for the war. If my hon. friend will renew his question when the Finance Minister is here, no doubt he will be very glad to explain.

Mr. DEVLIN: I do not want to quibble over this item, but I would like to place myself on record as being one of those who would like to see all items relating to the war tax, whether by way of stamp tax, income tax or otherwise, devoted entirely to the purpose of carrying on the war. According to the minister's statement a large portion of that money might be devoted to the construction of buildings, which might not be absolutely necessary and might not contribute in any way towards the winning of the war. Then, again, it might be devoted to other general purposes which have nothing to do with the winning of the war. If the people of Canada are to be taxed, and believe they are being taxed for the purpose of winning the war, I would like to say, as emphatically as I can, that every cent of that tax should be set aside for war purposes exclusively.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There is no advantage by earmarking special funds. My hon. friend is no doubt aware that from the ordinary revenues of the Dominion, that is to say, the revenues derived from customs duties, excise duties, and other miscellaneous sources, we have more than sufficient to pay the ordinary expenditure of the Dominion including all the ordinary expenditure upon public works and all the capital expenditure of the Dominion as well, and we have in addition a surplus devoted to the payment of capital on our war expenditures, so that my hon. friend need not be anxious as far as the special taxation is concerned, because it and more is devoted to the purposes of the war.

Mr. MARCIL: Will the minister tell us if it will be possible to find out what has been collected since the declaration of war, under the special taxes imposed in the post office, in the inland revenue, in the customs, and generally in the so-called war taxation?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It has been placed upon Hansard two or three times during the present session. If my hon. friend is interested he will be able to find it without difficulty.

Ottawa public buildings—Telephone service, $47,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I notice there is an increase of $5,000 in this item, and I think the minister should give some explanation in regard to it. I should suppose there would not be as many telephones in this building as there were in the Parliament Buildings which were destroyed by fire. The amount, $47,000, seems to be very large indeed for telephone service in connection with the public buildings in Ottawa. Could not a great saving be made in the case of telephones? I should suppose it would be possible to instal a central switchboard so that the officers in the different buildings would be served in that way, and that this would mean a very large reduction in the cost of the service.

Mr. ROGERS: The increase is due to the increase in the number of employees, largely in the Militia Department, for example. We had many, many hundreds more during last year in the Militia Department than before. Then we have the pension board, the assigned pay office and various other branches, all of which make a demand at once for telephones. We have switchboards in the Militia Department and the Printing Bureau. Outside of the Militia Department and the Printing Bureau I do not know that a switchboard would be desirable. The increase of $5,000 is not very large in view of the increase in the Militia Department and in the other services that we have to supply. We have to provide telephones for the Food Controller, the National Service Board, the Fuel Controller and various offices of that kind.

Mr. KYTE: What company supplies the telephone service?

Mr. ROGERS: The Bell Telephone Company.

Mr. KYTE: Is there a special rate of rental agreed upon between the Government and the company, or do you pay the ordinary rate?

Mr. ROGERS: We have a special rate.

Mr. KYTE: What is it?

Mr. ROGERS: Thirty-five dollars.

Mr. KYTE: That would mean almost two hundred extra telephones this year over last year. That would supply a very large number of additional offices.

Mr. ROGERS: This item is to take care of any possible increase for the coming year.

Mr. DEVLIN: Is there any special building in the city used as a garage for the militia automobiles, or are they distributed in different garages throughout the city?

[Mr. Pugsley.]

Mr. ROGERS: I would not be able to answer that question.

Mr. PUGSLEY: From what I hear, they are so much on the street that they would not need a garage. They are rolling about the streets all the time.

Mr. ROGERS: That shows that they are necessary or they would not have them.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The telephone charge strikes me as very high taking one telephone with another. There must be over 2,000 telephones. While in certain of the offices there might be a charge of $35, I would suppose that for the great majority of the offices a very much smaller charge would be made. I know it is customary on the part of telephone companies to charge more for offices than residences. The reason for that, I suppose, is that there are more calls for offices than is the case with residences. But that would not apply to the offices of hundreds of clerks in the different departments in Ottawa. Thirty-five dollars strikes me as being a pretty high charge on the average for all these different instruments. However, that is a matter for the officials of the department to look into. An expenditure of $47,000 would strike the public as a pretty heavy charge for telephone service for a year. The increase of $5,000 is very large. As my hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Kyte) points out, while there is an increase in the number of employees, they would not all have the telephone service. I think some effort ought to be made to get some reduction in the charge for telephones.

Mr. ROGERS: The item does seem rather large but I find on looking at the record that we have 1,014 phones altogether, 800 odd of which are office phones and only 100 odd house phones.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That would be considerably over $45 for each phone.

Mr. ROGERS: Probably all of that amount has not been expended—I do not know,—but that is the number of phones that we have on the departmental record. Of these 817 are in offices and 190 in houses.

Mr. PUGSLEY: As the total last year amounted to $47,000, the minister will see that it will amount to an average of $47 a phone, which is very high indeed, some $12 apiece greater than what the minister said was the amount which was paid. There must be some error in that because the minister surely does not pay $47 a phone?

Mr. ROGERS: No. Last year our vote was only $42,000 and we did not spend all of it. We have increased it this year by $5,000 by reason of the increased number of buildings which are necessary to house the increased staff, especially of the Militia Department, and probably that amount will be short. The deputy put in the extra $5,000 with the object of taking care of the requirements during the coming year.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The total vote of $42,000 was not expended last year?

Mr. ROGERS: Less than $42,000 was spent last year.

Mr. MARCIL: How many buildings are occupied for governmental purposes here?

Mr. ROGERS: I am afraid I have not the number of buildings but we will look it up before we rise.

Mr. MARCIL: The number is very large?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Dominion public buildings—Rents, $700,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: This is a very big item. Will the minister tell us how much is paid for the rents of the buildings in Ottawa and how much throughout the Dominion?

Mr. ROGERS: This amount is required for buildings leased for the various departments in all parts of the Dominion including all phones, municipal rates, etc., the whole in accordance with an estimate submitted by the chief architect. The approximate amount required for rent of buildings—and the charge for phones is included in the rents for buildings outside of Ottawa under our form of book-keeping—is as follows: in Nova Scotia, $13,000; in New Brunswick, $511; in Prince Edward Island, $176; in Quebec, $37,000. In Ottawa we pay $452,000.

Mr PUGSLEY: Could the minister furnish a statement showing the different buildings rented in Ottawa and the rental paid for each building, and the same information for each city in Canada.

Mr. ROGERS: I have such a statement here, but it is very long. It is very complete and gives the rents in all cities. Perhaps it could be inserted in Hansard.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That will be quite satisfactory.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Does the statement show that in some cases part of the building is rented to one firm and part to another?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The rentals paid in Ottawa strike me as very large, indeed, $452,000. Thus, in addition to the buildings owned by the Government, including the buildings expropriated in the neighbourhood of Vitoria street, many of which are available for occupation by the Government, nearly half a million dollars is being paid. The minister has been going some since he came into office. There has been an extraordinary increase since the change of Government. When I was minister I was criticised very severely by hon. gentlemen opposite, who seemed to take a real, lively interest in the affairs of the country. The hon. member for Souris (Mr. Schaffner) used to be concerned over the rents which were being paid out.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: Just as much now.

Mr. PUGSLEY: He does not appear to be, now. He remains silent now when he has before him figures double and treble, in many cases, what they were then. I used to think I was modest and economical, but hon. gentlemen opposite did not think so. I should suppose they would be appalled at the tremendous figures which these rents have reached to-day. The Government ordinarily could borrow money easily at four and one-half per cent. This rental paid in Ottawa represents the interest, at four and one-half per cent, on $10,000,000, and that, too, in times of stress, when greatest economy should be exercised. Would the minister also give a statement of the rents paid in Ottawa in the year 1910, the year before the great disaster? Then the minister might later explain the reasons for the very great increase. For the rental of the two upper stories in one building in Ottawa, $43,000 is paid. That is for the use of one department only. The portion of the building suitable for commercial purposes is used for those purposes, and the two upper stories are used by one department, the Marine and Fisheries Department, and this enormous rental of $43,000 is being paid. If that is a fair sample of the liberality and even generosity of the minister in dealing with the owners of buildings, we can well understand how the amount runs up to nearly half a million a year. It may be that the greatest economy has been exercised, but it is hard to believe that that is the case. I have been particularly impressed with the fact that the rental recived for the two upper stories to which I have referred ought to yield a pretty handsome interest on the total cost of the building, not only on the part used by the department but also on what is used for the carrying on of a very large commercial business. I refer to the Rea building, to which a story was added some time ago. The two upper stories, the additional story and the one below it, were rented to the Government for $43,000.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I have been informed that the Government was paying $2,000 per year rental for the building on Argyle avenue occupied as a restaurant.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It would not be worth much more than that.

Mr. ROGERS: The owner pays the taxes. Our rentals are all figured out by the officers of the department, and we pay on the basis of six per cent of the actual cost of the building. A very careful examination was made of the Rea building, and we are paying only six per cent on the actual cost of that portion of the building we use. My hon. friend was in error when he said we only used two stories and that we had one department. We use three stories and there are departments, Marine and Fisheries and the Naval Department.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Both under the one minister.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes. The rental has been figured on the basis of the cost, and we consider it a fair way to figure it. The rentals are very moderate and reasonable. It is true, there has been a necessity for a large increase in the number of buildings rented in the past few years, by reason of the number of employees, and I may say we have requests almost every week for increased accommodation. The staff has complained very bitterly in some cases that they had not room provided under the law, and we do not come within the Factory Act, which provides so many feet for each person. The Militia Department is only allowing 17 feet to each employee, and the Factory Act provides for 30 feet. Therefore, there is a special demand at the present time for increased space for the Militia Department, to correct that condition. Hon. gentlemen can see the difficulties we are up against. When there is necessity to rent a building, to rent it at the lowest possible amount, which we ourselves have figured on the basis of 6 per cent of the actual cost. That is calculated by the deputy and architect in every case.

[Mr. Pugsley.]

Mr. SCHAFFNER: It occurred to me that perhaps those buildings on Wellington street were not used to the extent to which they could be used. We may be paying too high a rent for individual buildings, but I think any medical man looking over a great many buildings would feel sure that there were too many people in certain rooms. The minister refers to that point, and it is very noticeable. The buildings have not the floor space required for the people employed in them. What I particularly wanted to know was whether the Government was utilizing the buildings on Wellington street. It seems to me, from casual observation, that they are not using the buildings as much as they could.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is, the buildings expropriated by the Government?

Mr. MICHAUD: I understand the Government is going to discharge about 1,700 civil servants. That will give ample space and will prevent overcrowding just now.

Mr. ROGERS: That will help some. I understand that we are utilizing every one of the buildings on Wellington street which is suitable for use. We sometimes have difficulty in getting various branches of the department to go into individual buildings of that kind, because they cannot all have the accomodation together, but we are utilizing the buildings so far as we possibly can.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Might I ask where the National Service Board have their offices?

Mr. ROGERS: The Canada Life Building.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What rent is paid for the premises occupied by that board?

Mr. ROGERS: I have not that information, but will get it.

Dominion public buildings—Salaries of caretakers, engineers, firemen, etc., $550,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why is there an increase of $65,000 in this item?

Mr. ROGERS: That is owing to the increase in the number of caretakers and the increase in salaries that we have been obliged to make at the present time, due to the high cost of living. With the additional buildings rented we have additional expenses.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is there a general increase in the salary of caretakers?

Mr. ROGERS: We are proposing 10 per cent increase, but it has not been made yet.

Mr. McKENZIE: That will apply to public buildings?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes:

Water, $50,000.

Mr. KYTE: There is an increase of $3,000 in this item. I suppose that is due to the fact that prohibition is in force in Ottawa.

Mr. ROGERS: I might say that this item represents water all over the Dominion, so that it is due to the fact that we have prohibition in so many parts of Canada as well as Ottawa.

Progress reported.

On motion of Hon. Rogers, the House adjourned at 6 p.m.

Monday, August 6, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

REPORT.

Extract of an order in council with reference to the scale of subsistence allowance to officers and men in the Naval Service, also an extract with reference to the scale of allowance in lieu of lodging, provisions, fuel and light for officers and men in the Naval Service.—Hon. Mr. Hazen.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by asterisks.)

EMPLOYMENT OF G. O. AIKEN.

Mr. GRAHAM:

1. Is G. O. Aiken in the employ of the Government in Kingston?
2. If so, what are his duties and his salary?
3. When was he retired from the position of guard, and why?
4. What was the date of his new appointment?
5. Who previously performed the duties of the position to which Mr. Aiken has now been appointed?
6. Why was not a returned soldier given this position?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Stand.

Mr. GRAHAM: Might I suggest that this question has been standing for quite a while. It is an inquiry of the Government, and my own view is that no member of the Government has taken any interest in it. I would like to have the question answered.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I will try to get an answer for my hon. friend.

WILLIAM DAVIES CO., LTD.

Mr. ROSS:

1. In regard to Commissioners appointed to investigate the William Davies Company, has the Price Waterhouse Company, of which Mr. Brodie, one of the Commissioners, is a member, ever been employed, or is it now employed by the William Davies Company, or other Flavelle affiliations?
2. Has Mr. Jeffrey Clarkson, now on the said Commission, or the firm to which he belongs, ever been similarly employed?

Mr. CROTHERS: 1 and 2. No.

CANADIAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCE, RECRUITS AND CASUALTIES.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. What was the total number of recruits enlisted in the Canadian Expeditionary Forces during the month of July, 1917?
2. What was the total number of casualties in the Canadian Expeditionary Forces during the month of July, 1917?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1. 4,257.
2. 3,637.

IMMIGRANTS LANDING AT RIMOUSKI.

Mr. LANCTOT:

1. How many immigrants have landed at Rimouski during the years 1911, 1912, 1913, 1914, 1915 and 1916?
2. What are the names of said immigrants and their respective destinations?

Mr. ROCHE: 1 and 2. Rimouski is not a regular port of landing for immigrants. Occasionally steamship passengers destined to the Maritime Provinces desire for their own convenience to leave the vessel at Rimouski instead of continuing the journey to Quebec where the regular examination and debarkation takes place. Such persons are examined either by the agent at Rimouski or by Quebec officials who meet some of the vessels at Rimouski for the purpose of conducting the examination of passengers on the trip between that point and Quebec. No separate record is kept of persons leaving the vessel at Rimouski, and for statistical and other purposes they are reported as having landed at Quebec. Number and names asked for are therefore not available.

HECTOR CARON.

Mr. LANCTOT:

1. Is Hector Caron employed by the Government at Rimouski?
2. If so, what is his occupation and salary?

Mr. ROCHE:

1. Yes.

2. Immigration agent and immigration inspector. Salary $50 per month.

THOROUGHBRED ANIMALS.

Mr. DELISLE:

1. Has the Department of Agriculture placed at the disposal of the county of Chicoutimi certain thoroughbred animals to be distributed among the farmers?
2. If so, how many animals, and for how long a time?
3. Who made the request to the department for the said animals?

Mr. BURRELL:

1. Yes.

2. 84. These are loaned really by the year subject to extension or recall.

3. These pure-bred sires were applied for by various associations of farmers formed according to the regulations which govern the loaning of these sires.

ASSISTANT FUEL CONTROLLER.

Mr. LANCTOT:

1. Has an assistant fuel controller been appointed?
2. If so, what is his name, place of residence and previous occupation?
3. What is his salary?
4. What was his salary previous to this appointment?
5. What are his special qualifications which induced the Government to appoint him?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I suppose this question may be answered by the appointment which was made by the fuel controller of an assistant chiefly for work in the United States, to which I referred on Friday or Saturday last. If the question refers to that, and this gentleman is the only assistant who has been appointed, the answer is:

1. Yes.

2. His residence was in the United States. He was a high official in a coal and railway company, in Pittsburgh, I think.

3. His salary is at the rate of $25,000 a year.

4. I do not know his salary previous to his present appointment.

5. His special qualifications are that he has an intimate knowledge not only of coal and its supply, but of railroad transport in respect to coal, particularly to the border. He was appointed on the recommendation of Mr. Peabody, chairman of the United States committee which has the coal problem under its supervision. He was recommended as being the very best available man Mr. Peabody could think of.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What is his name?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Mr. McCue.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: An American citizen?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

[Mr. Roche.]

ENLISTMENTS IN CANADIAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Sir EDWARD KEMP (Minister of Militia and Defence): The junior member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) asked me for certain information with regard to the number of enlistments as of June 30, 1917. The request was made on August 1, page 4280 of Hansard. The hon. gentleman may also be referred to a statement I made in respect of enlistments as of May 31, 1917, on pages 3206 and 3207 of Hansard for July 6. The following statement will show the figures:

Canadian Expeditionary Force.

Reported enlistments to 30th June, 1917	424,456
Overseas to same date	329,943 of whom 142,779 in France; 756 elsewhere than in France; 124,399 in England (of whom 23,265 in hospitals and convalescent camps as of 31st May); 31,955 killed, died, missing, and prisoners; 3,944 en route from Canada, and about 26,000 discharged or returned for discharge after wounds, etc.
In Canada	18,475
Discharged, etc., in Canada	76,038

NOTICES OF MOTION FOR PRODUCTION OF PAPERS.

Mr. LANCTOT:

For a copy of all documents, correspondence, letters, telegrams and reports concerning the dismissal or the resignation of Dr. Alfred Bouillon, of Matane, as medical officer of the harbour of Rimouski.

LETTERS READ BY SIR WILFRID LAURIER IN CONNECTION WITH THE JUSTICE LANDRY COMMISSION IN NEW BRUNSWICK.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Hazen (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) that the House go into Committee of Supply:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: A few days ago my hon. friend from the city of St. John (Mr. Pugsley) rose on a question of privilege, intending to deny certain statements made in this House, which he held to be unfounded in fact and deemed injurious to his honour as a citizen of Canada and a member of this House. My hon. friend did not only deny the words of which he complained, but he proceeded to read certain letters which had been long dormant in the archives of the provincial government at Fredericton, and which more than confirmed the denial he had made before the House. He was, however, stopped in this, on an obejction of the Prime Minister. It was held that on a question of privilege my hon. friend the member for St. John was particularly restricted to a denial, and could not go beyond it.

You, Sir, ruled that the point was well taken and I have no fault to find with your ruling. Technically, I think it could not be impugned. You, Sir, held at the same time that the letters might be brought before the House in some other form or at some other time if my hon. friend from St. John deemed it advisable for his own sake to call attention to the matter.

The question has taken on a broader character than was at first indicated or than the simple question of privilege which was raised by my hon. friend. As I shall show the question involves not only the honour, the dignity and character of my hon. friend from St. John, but it involves also certain principles which apply to the Government of the nation and which it is well to settle, if possible, here and now. The question to which I want to refer arose out of the discussion which took place in this House on the 6th June last, when my right hon. friend the Prime Minister informed the House that the hon. the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) had complained to him that the report made by Justice Galt, to which I need not refer now, was not an impartial report and that he had asked for a further investigation. He apprised the House that the Government had thought well to appoint another commission to review the report of Judge Galt which was to be composed of two members of the judiciary, the chief justice of New Brunswick, Sir Ezekiel McLeod, and a retired judge of the province of Quebec, Mr. Justice Tellier. I interjected in the debate that in my judgment, if this matter was to be reopened, the investigation should take place not through a Royal Commission composed of judges, or through a Royal Commission at all, but before a committee appointed by this House. In the course of the observations which I then made I referred to the attack which was made by the Minister of Public Works upon the character of Mr. Justice Galt. In reply to me the Prime Minister used these words:

> My right hon. friend challenges the action we have taken and challenges the reflections which have been made upon Mr. Justice Galt in the letter written to me from the Minister of Public Works. I should like to remind him that on a certain occasion one of his colleagues who sits beside him used infinitely stronger language, if my memory is correct, with regard to Mr. Justice Landry of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick, and he did so without any reproof from my right hon. friend. I am perfectly willing to contrast the action which we have taken in this matter with that which my right hon. friend took on that occasion. Findings had been made by a commission of which Mr. Justice Landry was a member. Those findings reflected seriously upon a member of my right hon. friend's Government. The matter was brought to the attention of Parliament, and it was urged by a motion in this House that such finding should be disregarded.

The memory of the Prime Minister was altogether at fault when he stated that the report to which he referred of Mr. Justice Landry had been brought to the attention of the House and that my hon. friend (Mr. Pugsley) had urged that it be altogether disregarded. The report was brought to the attention of the House but it was brought not upon a motion to disregard it, but, on the contrary, it was brought upon a motion which was moved at the time by the hon. member for West Elgin, now the Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers), to affirm the report and make it the basis of a motion of censure against my hon. friend from St. John who was at that time my colleague in the Government as Minister of Public Works. On the 5th May, 1909, the present Minister of Labour who was then, as now, the member for West Elgin, made a motion in this House but before doing so he recited that a commission had been appointed by the Government of New Brunswick to investigate the application of certain railway subsidies by the Government of New Brunswick at the time that my hon. friend the present member for St. John was a member of that Government, and he concluded:

> The unanimous findings of the commission consisting of the Hon. Mr. Justice Landry and Messrs. F. MacDougall and A. I. Teed, appointed by the government of the province of New Brunswick by order in council dated June 5, 1908, and the authorized reports of the proceedings of the legislature of the said province during the session of 1908 set forth serious matters touching the public acts and conduct of Hon. Wm. Pugsley, formerly a member of the government of said province and now Minister of Public Works;
> That persons occupying high offices of state as constitutional advisers of His Excellency ought to be free from just reproach and from reasonable suspicion in respect of their public character and reputation;
> That to this end the said findings in so far as they impugn acts or conduct of the said Hon. William Pugsley deserve the serious consideration of this House and demand such action thereupon as may be necessary to enforce worthy and proper standards of public duty.

I should observe here that in proposing this motion of censure against a member of the then Government, the present hon. member for St. John, the hon. member for West Elgin relied altogether upon the proposition that a Royal Commission is a court of law and that the report of such a commission is the equivalent of a judgment. He refused altogether to consider the evidence upon which the report was founded and when challenged with the statement that the report was not in accordance with the evidence, he repeatedly stated that he did not care for the evidence, that he founded his accusation upon the report. Again and again he took the position that the report of a Royal Commission is equivalent to the judgment of a court of law.

It is important here and at all times, and perhaps more at this time than at any other, that we should exactly understand what is the effect of a Royal Commission, its purport and its object. We have only to refer to the statute, which is familiar to everybody in this House, to satisfy ourselves upon that point. The Government is required to institute a Royal Commission for the purpose of obtaining information, for the purpose of looking into some question of public concern, to find out the facts in connection with it and to report the result to the Crown. A commissioner may simply hold an investigation and place the report before the Crown without expressing any opinion of his own, or he may, if he thinks fit, express an opinion of his own, as he generally does. But it was impossible to maintain for one minute, and no one would do so in this House under existing circumstances, that the report of a Royal Commission is equivalent to a judgment of a court of law. We have not only to look at the statute but at the practice. The Crown appoints a commissioner to investigate certain matters, the commissioner reports to the Crown, and the Crown presents the report to Parliament, where it may become the subject of discussion by Parliament. It is a matter of elementary knowledge on the part of everybody that the decisions of a court of law are not to be reviewed by Parliament.

The judges are absolutely independent. Their decisions may be right or their decisions may be wrong, but they are the supreme arbiters appointed by the State to settle disputes between subject and subject, between man and man, and under no circumstances are they to be taken as amenable to Parliament; whereas, on the contrary, the reports of commissions are essentially to be reviewed by Parliament. The report of a commissioner, as is stated by all authorities on the matter, is a useful form of information for the Government and for the public generally, but the opinion which is given by the commissioner is not binding. It is simply an opinion, respectable by the character of the man who expresses it, but it has no value except what value it can find from the truth and the correctness of the report which it places before the public. The present Minister of Labour and then the member for West Elgin (Mr. Crothers), when he made this motion, relied altogether on the report, refused to discuss the evidence, refused absolutely to go back of the report, and when it was objected to him that the report was not according to the evidence, he took the ground that it was of no concern to him that the judgment was equivalent to the judgment of a court. This is what he said on the occasion to which I refer, as reported at page 5655 of the Hansard of 1909:

> Mr. Pugsley: I wish to correct the statement of my hon. friend, I was not the managing director of the company.
> Mr. Crothers: I am simply making my observations based upon the judgment of this court.
> Mr. Pugsley: My hon. friend must pardon me. I say that there is nothing whatever in the evidence which would justify a statement of that kind, and the statement is absolutely untrue.
> Mr. Crothers: I am not here for the purpose of discussing the evidence in this case.
> Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.
> Mr. Crothers: Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to discuss the evidence in the case.
> Mr. Pugsley: I am not surprised at that.
> Mr. Crothers: I am here standing on the judgment of a court.
> Mr. Pugsley: If my hon. friend can find anything in the evidence which will justify some of the statements in the report, I shall be greatly obliged if he will refer to them.
> Mr. Crothers: As I said a moment ago, I am not here for the purpose of discussing the evidence in this case. I am standing on the judgment of a court and while that judgment stands we have a right to assume that it is a righteous judgment.

I repeat that the case which was presented to the House in 1909 was certainly a very weak one when the hon. Minister of Labour in asking that censure be passed upon a member of the Government, upon a man who had been for more than 30 years in public life, a prominent citizen of Canada, basing this demand on certain alleged evidence, and making himself responsible for the charge, stated in so many words that he would have nothing to do with the evidence, would not look at it, said that he relied simply on the judgment. Well, I think, for my part, and I believe everybody will agree with me, that the case must have been a very weak one, when any man, standing on the floor of this House to impugn the character of a fellow-member, will not at least refer to the evidence on which he bases his charge. It is quite true, as was said the other day by the Prime Minister, (Sir Robert Borden), that the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) on that occasion impugned the report of Mr. Justice Landry and his fellow Commissioners; he challenged it in many particulars and in so many words he showed discrepancies between the report presented by the Commissioners and the evidence. Again and again the hon. member for St. John challenged the hon. member who made himself responsible for the charge to bring forward the evidence of the charge which he made, but upon every point he was met by a refusal to produce the evidence. It now appears that there was a reason why the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Crothers), would not, on that occasion, go into the evidence, but relied upon the report. Let me repeat that the judgments of a Court are not to be reviewed by Parliament. It does not follow, and we cannot expect, that the judges never make mistakes. Judges are fallible like all other men. But judges are generally selected from amongst a class of men trained in the law, trained to take evidence, and whose character gives a suggestion of security that their judgment will be impartial, the judgment of trained men, and will be generally correct. Although we are all prepared to admit that the judges of the land generally give satisfaction, yet no one can pretend that they are infallible. They may make errors like everybody else; but if they make errors we must take them as they are, and Parliament has no right to pass upon them. But I repeat that no one will say that this Parliament can treat in the same the way the report of a commissioner, even if that commissioner be a judge. When he sits upon a commission he does not sit as a court of law; he is there simply as Mr. Justice So-and so, and his opinions gain what value they may have from his character and what value there is in the report and the opinions which he expresses will be in accordance with the support which is given to them by the evidence. In this case, I repeat, my hon. friend the Minister of Labour, then a simple member of the House sitting for West Elgin, would not look at the evidence. I say that we can now understand why he would not go into the evidence. A report was made some time ago to the Legislature of New Brunswick, in reply to an address moved by a member of that House in the following terms:

That a humble address be presented to His Honour the Lieutenant Governor, praying that he cause to be laid upon the Table of the House copies of all correspondence between the Premier or any other member of the Provincial Government in the year 1908 and any person or persons relating to the appointment of Commissioners to investigate matters connected with the Central Railway Company and the New Brunswick Coal and Railway Company; and also copies of any correspondence between the Premier or any other member of the Provincial Government and any person or persons relating to the report of such Commissioners.

The report which was brought down by the Government in obedience to this order of the Legislature is composed of three letters which bear directly upon this subject. The first of the letters, not in order of the report, is dated May 21, 1908, and is addressed to the Hon. J. D. Hazen, K.C., M.P., Attorney General, Fredericton, by Mr. Fowler, then member for Kings and Albert, in this House, and now a senator.

House of Commons, Ottawa, May 21, 1908.

My dear Hazen:

Yours to hand. I am sorry Trites has declined and I cannot understand why since I spoke to him and had his consent before I mentioned his name to you. There is a very good man, Fred C. Harris by name, who is manager of the Cape Tormentine Railway. There is also Capt. Geo. A. Coonan, of Harvey, A. Co., who built a portion of the Albert Southern Railway, and J. S. Armstrong, C. E., of Rothesay, so you can take your choice. I suggested to the surveyor-general that A. I. Teed, of St. Stephen, might be a good man if Mr. Thorne or W. S. Fisher would not act.

I presume this refers to acting in the capacity of commissioner for the investigation.

I still think that you should have a junior counsel to assist Powell in this matter and the small additional expense should not stand in the way as this is a very important thing for us. I believe we can put the genial Wm. out of business if this matter is properly handled.

There was the animus—"we can put the genial Wm. out of business." The letter proceeds:

Mr. Borden was much pleased to hear that the boys in New Brunswick were so strongly with us on the Aylesworth Bill.

Sincerely yours,

George W. Fowler.

Then there is another letter from Mr. H. A. Powell, who was employed as counsel in the case, which went to show that, as suggested in the letter, if the matter were properly handled, they could put "the genial William out of business." The letter reads:

Powell and Harrison, barristers, solicitors, notaries, etc.,

Hon. J. D. Hazen, Attorney-General, Fredericton, N.B.

St. John, N.B., March 31, 1909.

Dear Hazen:—As I 'phoned you last evening, the report of the commissioners was sent forward by express. The Act authorizing the investigation directed the report to be addressed to the Provincial Secretary to be by him laid before the Governor. This language we interpreted literally and the report is directed to the Provincial Secretary and he can lay it before the Governor, which I presume will be done at once. After that I suppose it will be laid on the table of the House. The Times has printed a number of copies, I do not know how many, which they will forward to you in a day or two.

You will notice in the report there are some corrections made in writing and the errata are gathered into a fly leaf and will be bound with the report. I regret very much that this errata had to be made. Mr. McDougall was very strongly of the opinion that I should have as little as possible to do with the final making up of the report, inasmuch as the charge might be made that I and not the Commissioners got up the report. I spent all day Monday with them in Moncton. At that time the report had not been completely drafted and a good deal of the proof had not been read. It was arranged between us that Mr. McDougall would send me down the proof and I would revise it and make all necessary corrections. On Saturday Judge Landry rang me up and arranged that I would go up on Monday morning to finally revise their work. On Sunday, however, Mr. McDougall rang me up and told me that he and Judge Landry had finally revised it themselves and the report was all printed, and consequently not to come up.

On Monday morning Judge Landry rang me up again wanting to know why I had not gone up. Monday night the Commissioners all gathered at St. John with the report completely printed. There are a few things that I would like very much to have had different from what they are. In the first place, I urged on them the great undesirability, in view of you pushing your claim against the Dominion Government for increased subsidy, of minifying the cost of the fifteen mile section and branches as is done on pages fifty-six and fifty-seven of the report, and I drew up myself a statement which could not be used against your contention, but the Commissioners determined to insert the statements on pages fifty-four, fifty-five and fifty-six.

The reference to the Intercolonial on page fifty-five struck me as affording scope to Pugsley and the newspapers to attack the Commissioners on the absurdity of the comparison between the fifteen mile section and the Intercolonial so I had them insert the words "As was intimated." They had an error of fact in respect to the bridges on the fifteen mile section which I had them correct. Another error was the reference to the provincial engineer having made the estimate; it was the company's engineer.

Another matter which I am sorry has gone in as it did inasmuch as it will give the Opposition press an opportunity to make an attack on the commissioners is the statement at the bottom of page 18 and top of page 19 to the effect that it appears conclusively from the evidence that the whole $250,000 par value of the 3 per cent bonds had been guaranteed and delivered to the company up to August 6, 1903. The only evidence to that effect was an impression Mr. Shadbolt had that the whole $250,000 of 3 per cent bonds which were delivered to him at that time had the provincial guarantee on them. Mr. Shadbolt may have been right in his impression, but the statement is not consistent with the Order in Council with reference to guaranteeing the bonds. In the following two paragraphs the reference to the guaranteeing of the whole $450,000 bonds is somewhat misty. The criticism in this connection should be directed solely to the $250,000 of bonds which were guaranteed for the construction of the fifteen-mile section.

I drafted the portion of the report referring to the guaranteeing of the bonds, but Judge Landry himself changed it in the respects I have mentioned. Fortunately—

And this is why I understand the hon. gentleman from West Elgin (Mr. Crothers) was so chary about touching the evidence:

Fortunately the fellows on the other side will know nothing about the matter, and if the statement is challenged the reporter has Mr. Shadbolt's evidence much stronger than he gave it. Furthermore, I think the judge is right in the statement he makes and it is literally true although the whole $250,000 of the bonds had not then been made use of by the company. Since there is evidence to support the finding I suppose their finding will be accepted.

I suppose both you and Mr. Fleming will go into the matter of the report quite thoroughly when the discussion of it comes up in the House. If there is any matter that you want light thrown upon, or if you want to know the particular source of any information used in the statements, let me know and I will give it to you. It might be a good thing for me to run through the report and mark in the margin the sources of information. Although I would like to have seen several things put more forcibly than they have been and the responsibility for the misappropriation shown to rest more on Pugsley's shoulders, I think you will find that the report is pretty strong.

Yours very truly,

(Signed) H. A. Powell.

Then there is another letter from my hon. friend, the then member for North Toronto, now Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), which reads as follows:

House of Commons,
Ottawa, April 14, 1909.

Dear Mr. Hazen:—

I telegraphed you this morning re the Comm. Reports and trust you have sent me a number. As to copy of evidence I put that in in case you have it printed which probably you have not. It is, I suppose, voluminous.

Why I did so was for this reason. Pugsley so far as now appears will try to bluff the matter out of the House here as not pertaining to Federal affairs. He will say that the report is not based on evidence and that he will, after getting a copy of the evidence, issue a statement showing this to be so. That will be his defence. We propose to get after him here before he gets a copy of the evidence, but if by any possibility he does get it then we need the evidence to meet him here.

I presume the evidence will not be available in printed form for some time. If he gets a copy I hope you will see that several copies are made at the same time and that we get one or two here.

I have not seen full report but what I have seen is pretty straight goods.

Yours very truly,

(Sgd.) G. E. Foster.

Now, Sir, this is the case to which my hon. friend, the member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) wants to call the attention of the House. In 1909 it was sought to censure an hon. member—and a motion was made to that effect—upon a report which is in contradiction in many points of the evidence; upon a report taken by itself independent of the evidence. I lay this as the foundation. I am sure nobody will contradict the statement that any report of a commission without the evidence is simply the opinion of a man, and has no foundation whatever upon which can be based any ground at all for a motion of censure. Nobody in this House, I am sure, will contend that an hon. member is liable to censure upon the report of a commission, no matter who the commissioner is, unless evidence accompanies the report to justify it. It would be monstrous; it would be unfair; it would be unjust, to condemn a man simply upon the opinion of a fellowman without the production of evidence to substantiate that opinion. The opinion may be right or it may be wrong, but whether it is right or wrong, the Parliament of Canada, when it is asked to pronounce upon a matter of this kind, has the right to have the evidence before it so that every member may come to a conclusion whether the report is or is not justified. The correspondence which I have read to you, Sir, has proved conclusively that this matter was placed before the House before the evidence was brought out, so that there should be an ex parte verdict upon the opinion of the commission, not upon the evidence itself. Luckily, the truth has come out at last, and the member for St. John city, upon the evidence that has now been presented, is fully vindicated out of the mouth of his own adversaries.

SUPPLY.

ANNUAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF THE NAVAL SERVICE.

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Steele in the Chair.

Naval Service—to provide for the maintenance and upkeep of ships, Naval College, dockyards at Halifax and Esquimalt and Royal Naval Canadian Volunteer Reserve, $1,000,000.

Hon. J. D. HAZEN (Minister of Naval Service): It has been my custom, Mr. Chairman, when taking up the estimates of the Naval Department that relate particularly to naval affairs, to make a statement covering the operations of the department during the twelve months ended March 31 of the last fiscal year. It is desirable, I think, that I should follow that custom on the present occasion.

ACTIVITIES OF THE NAVAL SERVICE DEPARTMENT.

During the last session I gave a summary of the operations of the Naval Service Department from the commencement of the war. That statement will be found on page 3002 of Hansard for the session of 1916. While it is unnecessary again to submit the information already given in that report, I desire to bring it up to the end of the fiscal year 1916-17.

Headquarters.

During the last year the work of the department continued to increase and expand. Some idea of the increase in the amount of work at headquarters may be had from the following statements:

Letters and telegrams received:
January, 1916	5,079
March, 1917	8,464
Increase	3,389

Mr. MARCIL: Were these letters of congratulation or of complaint? What was the nature of them?

Mr. HAZEN: They were letters in connection with the business of the Naval Department.

Mr. NESBITT: Why did the minister not give the figures for the same months in each year?

Mr. HAZEN: I gave the figures for the last month before the end of the fiscal year ended March 31, 1917, to show the tremendous increase that has taken place since my last statement was made.

On August 1, 1914, the total personnel of the headquarters staff amounted to 127 persons. On March 31, 1917, the total personnel amounted to 256 persons.

Naval Staff Office.

The work of the Naval Staff Office may be divided into two main portions: (1) Naval Intelligence; (2) Transport Service.

Naval Intelligence.—With regard to (1), in order to deal with the work there is a staff on duty day and night without intermission. It is their duty to handle the telegraphic correspondence of the department, the greater portion of which is in code or cipher.

This branch also collects and distributes naval intelligence from its officers, the Admiralty and other Imperial officers. It is responsible that all merchant vessels receive their proper orders on leaving Canadian ports with regard to their route and instructions for avoiding enemy submarines and other vessels. All matters, so far as they appertain to naval policy, regarding prohibited exports, detention of ships, supply of bunkers to merchant vessels, censorship of cables, press and wireless telegraph messages, arming of merchant vessels, suspected persons and kindred matters, are dealt with by the branch. It is responsible also for the distribution of all confidential books and documents, of which there are a great number, to Canadian naval officers. This branch is also responsible for all matters connected with the defence of Canadian coasts.

Transport Service.—With regard to (2), the Naval Staff Office is closely associated with the Acting Director of Overseas Transport, whose activities will be reported upon in another section.

This branch is responsible for the movements of all transports, carrying either troops or munitions; for the provision of any necessary escorts at sea, and that the Imperial authorities receive detailed information by telegraph of the cargoes of all transports before they arrive in England. The Admiralty and War Office are then able to make the necessary arrangements for handling the cargoes on arrival.

H.M.C. Ships and Establishments.

The general administration of H.M.C. Ships and Establishments has been continued on the same lines as during the previous year.

The Rainbow has been maintained in full commission, as have also the Shearwater (submarine depot ship) and the submarine flotilla.

The Niobe has been utilized as a depot and receiving ship, and a large number of men has passed through her in addition to the number required to be kept on board as her complement and as drafts for patrol vessels, etc. The crews of the latter are accommodated in her from time to time, as are also Imperial ratings on passage. All Canadian naval ratings on the east coast are borne on her books.

Naval Dockyards.—With respect to the naval dockyards, the establishments at both Halifax and Esquimalt has been worked to the full cutput, a considerable amount of overtime having been put in. The nature of the work done has been practically all repairs.

Halifax is being used as the base for vessels of the North Atlantic fleet, which has lately been strengthened. The dockyard is being used for carrying out repairs to these vessels and keeping them in going order.

At Esquimalt yard, work has been carried out on Imperial vessels as well as those of the Canadian service.

The floating dock at Prince Rupert has been completed, but it has not been operated for the use of the mercantile marine. It has proved very useful in connection with the repairing of men-of-war of the Royal Navy.

Wages.—The total amount of money paid per month in wages for the two yards is approximately 300 per cent more than that customary to be paid for the same period prior to the war.

Repairs.—In addition to the repairs to the vessels of the fighting fleet, the dockyards are carrying out the large number of small items of repair needed to the various vessels now employed for auxiliary purposes for patrol and other defensive work of the coasts. Having regard to the facilities available, this work has been carried out satisfactorily. Considerable overtime has been necessary in order to expedite the completion of the repairs.

Subsidiary work in the nature of repairs and refits of the various vessels belonging to the different branches of the Naval Service has been undertaken during the year, and repairs of vessels of other departments of the Government have also been effected. Repairs to buildings and plant incidental to the upkeep of the establishment, in accordance with conditions of transfer, have also been completed.

Royal Naval College.—The largest entry of cadets, since the original entry, was made after a competitive examination in May, 1916. The training of the cadets is continuing satisfactorily, and excellent reports are received concerning former cadets who are now serving in Imperial ships as midshipmen and sub-lieutenants.

Officers Lent.—Nearly fifty Canadian officers, the majority graduated from the college, are serving in vessels of the Royal Navy, mostly in the Grand Fleet.

Casualties.—One Canadian officer was killed in His Majesty's Ship Indefatigable when that ship was sunk in the battle of Jutland. Six men were lost from His Majesty's Canadian Ship Grilse when that vessel met with extremely rough weather on the 12th December, 1916.

Naval Hospital, Halifax.—The building formerly used as Admiralty House, Halifax (the residence of the Commander in Chief, North American and West Indian Station) is being converted into a naval hospital for the use of both the Canadian Naval Service and of Imperial naval ranks and ratings.

Patrols.—The patrol and other subsidiary services have been maintained and expanded as requisite.

Personnel.—The personnel has been expanded to meet all requirements up to the present.

Recruiting for British Admiralty.

Royal Naval Air Service.—The selection and entry of officers for the Royal Naval Air Service has continued. Up to the present three hundred and eighty-two officers have been entered and sent to England. Since the 20th July, 1916, candidates have not been required to obtain their Aero Club certificates before proceeding overseas. Several Canadians entered in the Royal Naval Air Service have been decorated for good war service.

Royal Naval Volunteer Reserve, Auxiliary Motor Boat Patrol Section.—In addition to the Royal Naval Air Service, recruiting has also been carried on for the Royal Naval Volunteer Reserve (Auxiliary Motor Boat Patrol Section). With the assistance of the Naval Service Department, a Recruiting Committee sent out from the Admiralty entered nearly three hundred sub-lieutenants and over one hundred men for duty as chief motor mechanics and motor mechanics in this branch of the Imperial Service.

Royal Naval Canadian Volunteer Reserve, (Overseas Division).—The Dominion Government offered to place at the disposal of the Admiralty a number of men belonging to the Royal Naval Canadian Volunteer Reserve, which offer was accepted by the Imperial authorities. An Overseas Division of the Royal Naval Canadian Volunteer Reserve was established and recruiting therefor commenced.

The same rates of pay and separation allowance in force for equivalent ratings in the Canadian Navy are paid to the Overseas Division of the Royal Naval Canadian Volunteer Reserve. The pay actually paid while serving in Imperial ships is the same as that of men of the same rating in the Royal Navy, the balance being either paid to their dependents by monthly allotments, or placed to the men's credit and retained until their discharge or return to Canada.

A provincial recruiting committee was appointed in each province, under whom a secretary was appointed. Sub-committees were established at the principal centres, the members of which were responsible to the head committee, while the head committee were responsible to the department. The members of these different committees throughout Canada gave their service gratuitously, and they spared no effort to advance the work of recruiting. From the fall of 1916 to the end of the fiscal year 1,331 men were enlisted in the Royal Naval Canadian Volunteer Reserve (Overseas Division), of whom 1,188 have been sent overseas.

4 p.m.

I wish to take this occasion to express, on behalf of the Naval Service Department, great appreciation for the valuable work done by the members of the recruiting committees.

Radiotelegraph Branch.

The policy of the Government to develop and maintain, under Government control, the radiotelegraph service of the Dominion has been continued during the past year.

As reported last year in my statement to the House, all the amateur stations were closed down at the commencement of the war; these stations have not yet been allowed to re-open.

The radiotelegraph service is playing an important part in carrying on the war, particularly in providing means of communication with such vessels of war as may be operating in the vicinity of Canadian waters. As already stated, Canadian stations located on both the Atlantic and Pacific coasts occupy positions well adapted to such communication, and by reserving certain of the stations solely for naval work, adequate radio facilities for such purposes have been provided.

At present there are 156 coast, land and ship stations in Canada; 67 of these are Government land and ship stations; 76 are commercial ship stations and the remaining 13 are commercial land, coast and instructional stations.

The personnel employed in radiotelegraphy in the Dominion is 404, of whom 137 are in the Government employ.

Of the 43 coast stations 42 are owned by the Government. Those located on the west coast and Hudson bay are operated directly by the Department of the Naval Service. Those situated on the Great Lakes and east coast with certain exceptions, are operated by the Marconi Wireless Telegraph Company, Limited, under contract. Since the outbreak of the war certain stations on the east coast have been taken over and operated directly by the department exclusively for naval purposes.

As regards construction, the department has maintained the different stations under its charge in an efficient and up-to-date condition, so that the Canadian service compares favourably with that maintained elsewhere.

The enforcement of the Radiotelegraph Act has been carried out by the responsible officers of the department in an efficient manner. That section of the Act calling for compulsory equipment of wireless apparatus on certain steamers has been well observed by the shipowners, and no attempts to evade the requirements of the law have been reported.

During the year 141 radiotelegraph operators were examined for certificates of proficiency in radiotelegraphy, of whom 87 were successful. To date there have been 176 certificates of proficiency issued by the department.

The regular work of the stations has been carried out so far as permissible under war conditions, and a surprising increase in both the number of messages handled and revenue collected is shown. The west coast stations operated directly by the department handled 1,741,420 words, as against 1,103,395 last year, and the total revenue accruing was $18,201, as against $7,394.50 last year, an increase of 146 per cent; this is the largest revenue credited to the west coast in the history of the service.

In conclusion, I may say that the operation of the radiotelegraph service has, during the past year, continued to prove the wisdom of the Government's policy of government ownership and control, and the expenditures made on its account are being fully justified.

Stores Branch.

During the year ending March 31, 1917, the activities of the Stores Branch have been maintained and extended as the requirements of the service demanded.

As in the past, the requirements of the following services have been filled in addition to the Naval Service proper (Imperial and Canadian), viz.—Hydrographic Surveys, Tidal and Current Surveys, Radiotelegraph Service, Fishery Protection Service, Life Saving Service, Fishery Patrol Service, Fish Breeding Service, and other fishery services.

Notwithstanding that considerable difficulty has been experienced in obtaining supplies, more especially metals and textiles, the requisite reserves have been maintained at both dockyards, and in certain instances, very materially increased. A further agreement with the Admiralty to supply Imperial ships in the Pacific with clothing and victualling stores has necessitated a considerable addition to the stock previously carried. The recruiting of the Royal Naval Canadian Volunteer Reserve for service overseas in the Royal Navy and for the Canadian Patrol Service has also necessitated the maintenance of further reserves of clothing supplies.

Purchases aggregating in value to $3,884,760 have been made. The following is a summary of the values of the various classes of supplies purchased:

Provisions	$ 407,220
Clothing	893,471
Medical stores	8,262
Naval stores, not including fuel	723,286
Fuel	1,658,706
Ordnance and ammunition	53,815
Stationery and printing	140,000
Total	$3,884,760

These purchases have been made by Headquarters, Halifax dockyard, Esquimalt dockyard, and the various ships and establishments, as follows:

Headquarters	$1,636,544
Halifax dockyard	125,374
Esquimalt dockyard	195,675
Fuel purchased on direct charge at Halifax	1,004,190
Fuel purchased on direct charge at Esquimalt	74,452
Ships and establishments	848,525

Included in the purchases made by Ships and Establishments are the following amounts, for which contracts are arranged by headquarters, viz.:

Provisions	$150,786
	$757,346

The amount, $757,346, does not include purchases of fresh provisions by Imperial ships, nor fuel for certain Admiralty and other transports, which is not purchased through the dockyards.

Considerable purchases have been made on account of the Imperial Government, and, in a lesser degree, on behalf of allied governments.

Contracts have been made for the charter of thirteen vessels of varying dimensions. The charter of ten others expired during the year, and were not renewed. The total expenditure involved was $294,266.85.

The facilities for issuing supplies of all descriptions to the various services have been fully maintained. The total issues made from Halifax dockyard were $592,926, and from Esquimalt dockyard, $411,270. In addition to the service rendered to ships and establishments of this department and other Canadian Government departments, material assistance has been afforded to Imperial ships calling at Canadian dockyards. Issues to Imperial ships from Halifax dockyard amounted to $254,309, and from Esquimalt dockyard to $183,624. In a lesser degree, similar assistance has been afforded to ships of allied governments.

The Imperial authorities continue to avail themselves of our facilities at both dockyards to keep large reserves of special stores for His Majesty's ships in the Atlantic and Pacific. These are accounted for and in every way cared for in the same manner as Canadian stores. Particular care has to be given to ordnance stores and ammunition, for which special facilities are provided.

The value of the stores in stock at the beginning of the year was $409,618 at Halifax, and $351,611. at Esquimalt. The value of the stores in stock at the end of the year was $628,006 at Halifax, and $477,989 at Esquimalt.

Supplies of coal have been well maintained on both coasts for Imperial and Canadian ships. The total receipts at Halifax amounted to 78,575 tons, and at Esquimalt to 31,711 tons. The issues at Halifax were 77,733 tons, and at Esquimalt 29,626 tons. In addition, the following were handled on direct charge to the ships: At Halifax, 138,509 tons, and at Esquimalt, 16,545 tons. The following fuel oil was purchased at Esquimalt and Halifax: 107,000 gallons.

Transportation.

During 1916-17 the work in connection with transportation has greatly increased. The director of overseas transport has general control of the traffic inland, by rail or otherwise, its reception and storage at points of shipment, the allocation of the cargoes to the different ships, and the storage on board. The Department of the Naval Service is responsible for the movements of these ships, the supply of sufficient tonnage to meet transportation demands, and the routing of same, as well as the responsibility of keeping the Admiralty informed on all questions of transport.

Through co-operation between the director of overseas transport and the Naval Service Department, the transportation problems have been, to a large extent, overcome, and a high degree of efficiency has been maintained. All expenses in connection with this service are defrayed by the department on behalf of the Imperial Government, on presentation of duly certified invoices.

Contracts have been made for the supply of bunker coal as necessary. Two hundred and thirty thousand tons have been purchased from Canadian firms for transports during the past year. Arrangements have also been made as necessary for repairing, and fitting ships for special purposes, and for the supply of such provisions, stores, and gear as are required while the ships are in Canadian ports.

The average export movement for the year ended 31st March, 1917, amounted to more than 200,000 tons per month, or roughly, eight fully loaded freight trains of material per day. The monthly total now exceeds 360,000 tons, and the sailings average two per diem. The Overseas Transport Organization has worked with the greatest regularity and despatch. Practically no delays have been experienced throughout the period of the review. The movement has been rendered possible only by the ready co-operation of all transportation companies with the staff of the service, in all matters. During the financial year of 1916-17, a total of 386 sailings, comprising 2,429,829 tons cleared from Canadian ports. These figures show a large increase over 1915-16 in which year 198 sailings comprising 970,911 tons cleared, an increase amounting to 206 sailings, comprising 1,458,918 tons. The following is a table of disbursements on account of overseas transport service:

April 1, 1916, to March 31, 1917.
Bunker coal	$1,195,000
Stevedoring ships accounts, etc.	2,697,000
Repairs, fittings, and alterations	215,000
Total	$4,107,000

The thanks of the department are due to the Canadian Pacific Railway company, for the service of a number of experienced transportation officers, as well as for their ready co-operation at all times. To the efforts of the director of Overseas transport and his staff are largely due the success of the whole service. To the success of this service is undoubtedly due the increasing magnitude of the orders now being placed for the products of the mines, forests, fields, and factories of Canada by the Imperial and allied governments.

Fisheries Protection Service.

The vessels of the Protection Service have, during the past year, carried out the duties of guarding the fishing grounds along the east and west coasts and in the Great Lakes, and enforcing the fishery laws. Particularly valuable work was done by these vessels in watching the United States fishing vessels operating outside the three mile limit.

The Fisheries Protection Service vessels were also utilized under the Naval Service in connection with mine-sweeping and patrol duties.

Life Saving Service.

The Life Saving stations were kept in an efficient condition throughout the season of navigation. Owing to the increased use of motor-boats by the fishermen along the coasts the demands upon the Life Saving stations for assistance have been gradually reduced, in many instances one boat being able to render assistance to another without aid from the Life Saving crew.

Tidal and Current Survey.—This survey has been successfully carried on in new areas along the coasts and rivers of Canada. A large portion of the navigable waters have now been covered by the survey and navigation has been greatly facilitated as a result thereof. The information obtained is published annually in Tide Tables and pamphlets.

Hydrographic Survey.—Work has been carried out on the east coast at Halifax harbour and at the mouth of the St. Lawrence; in the Great Lakes along the shores of Lake Superior and in Kingston harbour on the west coast, in the vicinity of Queen Charlotte Islands and in the different navigable passes. A number of new charts of the areas surveyed have been prepared and will be published shortly. The activities of this branch of the service have during the past three years, been greatly reduced owing to the enlistment of a number of the permanent staff for active service overseas.

Accountant's Branch.—The total expenditure of the Naval Service Department during the fiscal year 1916-17 was $16,416,839.36. Out of this amount $4,242,489.99 were expended from the regular appropriation and $4,761,991.96 out of the war appropriation; $7,412,357.41 were expended on account of the Imperial Government, which amount is recoverable.

That in brief measure, is an account of the activities during the year of the Department of Naval Service. There are a great many details which would be interesting but which it would not be proper to make public at the present time. The work of the department, due in very large measure, I feel satisfied, to the active efforts and energies of the deputy minister, the Director of Naval Service and the other heads of departments, has proceeded most satisfactorily. This work has very greatly increased as was shown by the increase which has occurred among the clerks of the lower classes employed in the department. The work will likely increase during the coming year if the war continues. Our work in connection with dockyards and the ships of the Allies coming and going has been of the most satisfactory character. There has been little or no trouble in dealing with them and little or no irritation has been caused in any respect. The different items will come before the committee, and I will be very glad to furnish such information as I can to hon. members.

Mr. MARCIL: The minister only mentioned one ship, the Niobe. What has become of the other?

Mr. HAZEN: The Rainbow is still in British Columbia.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What about the Niobe? I have seen a report that the Government contemplated breaking up the Niobe and sending her to the scrap heap.

Mr. HAZEN: No.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I saw something of that kind in the newspapers, but I do not always believe what I see there. I would have been shocked if that had been the intention of the Government, although I have seen worse things done by this Government. Where is the Niobe?

Mr. HAZEN: We are making the only use of the Niobe that is possible. It was not possible to use the Niobe for active service. We are using her as a depot ship in Halifax harbour. Naval people are constantly coming and going from the West Indies and other places, and we use the Niobe for what you might call a naval barracks. She is also used as a training ship. But it is impossible to use her for any defensive purpose at the present time.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The Niobe was purchased for the purpose of being used as a training ship.

Mr. HAZEN: At the outbreak of the war and for a short time afterward we used the Niobe for certain patrol purposes on the Atlantic coast. The patrol has been carried on by the ships of His Majesty's navy and the Niobe has for some time not been in a position for service in that respect.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The Rainbow, I understand, is being used for the protection of the fisheries on the Pacific?

Mr. HAZEN: It has been used all along on the Pacific.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How many sailors have you on board?

Mr. HAZEN: The Rainbow carries about 270 men.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Are they all Canadians?

Mr. HAZEN: I do not think so. I would think that a good many would be Britishers. A great many are men who have been in His Majesty's navy.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: How many boats have we engaged in the protection of the fisheries on the Pacific ocean?

Mr. HAZEN: We have three fishery protection vessels on the Pacific coast. Two, of the type that is employed in the protection of the Irish fisheries, were built at Dublin four or five years ago. The other is an older boat and has been in the service a longer time. In addition to that we charter another vessel called the Lillooet.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What about the Naval College? How many students are there?

Mr. HAZEN: The college has had its best year in its history. At present I think there are between 30 and 40 students, practically all we can now accommodate. These come from all parts of the country. There is one from Dawson City, but most of them are from the interior, from Ontario, and a number from Montreal and other points in Quebec. The college is doing well, making good progress, and were it not that the Minister of Finance is urging us to keep down our expenses, I would have asked for a considerable appropriation for the erection of a more suitable building. The old hospital in the Naval Yard, which is now used as the main college building, has become inadequate for the purpose. A new building must be provided, and when that is done, if we continue to have a Naval College, as I hope we shall, the building should be entirely adequate. Those who have gone through the college and entered the Navy have had splendid records. Even if a student does not enter the Navy, the training and education which he receives at the Naval College are of great value to him in civil life, just as the course at the Royal Military College equips a young man for other callings than military life. I am satisfied that, from the development of the last few years, especially the last two years, the college will become one of the most important public institutions in Canada.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What is the nature of the education? Does the student, in addition to instruction in astronomy, geography, mathematics, etc., receive any practical naval instruction?

Mr. HAZEN: Of course, all of the instruction looks towards service in the Navy. During their course at the college the young man receives minor practice on small ships. If he decided to enter the Navy, he spends two and a half years on one of His Majesty's ships.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: How many years is the college course?

Mr. HAZEN: Three years.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What success has attended the recruiting for the British Navy under Sir Rupert Guinness.

Mr. HAZEN: It is almost a mistake to say that the recruiting was under him. He came here with a letter addressed to me by Mr. Balfour, who was then First Lord of the Admiralty, and he had authorization from the Admiralty, with our approval to enlist men from Canada for the navy. But his authorization was to enlist them at the rate of pay of the Royal Navy, which is, I think, 36 cents a day. It would have been impossible to enlist men in Canada on those terms. That was explained to him. We communicated with the Admiralty and told them that we were willing to receive and enlist men for the navy, paying them the same rate as is paid in the Canadian navy, which is practically the same as the rate of pay to the troops for overseas service, and that we were willing to place those men at their disposal. We feared that this might not be acceptable to the Admiralty owing to the objection to having men on the same ship under such different rates of pay, but, on consideration, the Admiralty saw no objection. So we arranged to recruit the men with the assistance of Sir Rupert Guinness. We organized recruiting boards and great service was rendered by some gentlemen, for instance Mr. Æmelius Jarvis, of Toronto. We turned the Montreal commissioner's office into a recruiting office under the direction of Mr. Ross and the officials of the department, including the assistant secretary, Mr. Fennell, who were most active. In this way we succeeded in enlisting 1,600 men. We found that a great many men who would have preferred service in the navy if the Admiralty had asked us for recruits early in the war, at the time when we suggested such recruiting to them, but when the British Government said that they preferred that we should confine our attention to recruiting for the land forces, had already enlisted in the army and had gone overseas. But we enlisted 1,600 men, who were sent overseas, and who, I have no doubt, have been of very considerable help. Sir Rupert Guinness and his wife, who is a talented speaker, were of great assistance. They addressed recruiting meetings and Canadian Clubs in different parts of the country.

Mr. GRAHAM: The minister has given us a sketch of the work of his department. I presume that most of that work will be paid for out of the War appropriation.

Mr. HAZEN: I said we had spent about $17,000,000. About $4,000,000 in all was paid out of our appropriation for the ordinary work of the department.

Mr. GRAHAM: For the year?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes. Another $4,000,000 to be charged up to the War Measures Act and to the War Appropriation, and the balance of the money spent for supplies and purposes of the Imperial navy, and of certain of the Allied navy, because at times Italian and French ships come to our ports, and we have to furnish supplies. That money all comes back to us, but the moneys we have spent ourselves would amount to $9,000,000, of which one-half would be payable out of the appropriation made by Parliament. The other half would come under the War Measures Act.

Mr. GRAHAM: Would the minister be at liberty to tell us what progress Mr. Norcross is making in connection with his shipbuilding for the British Government?

[Mr Hazen.]

Mr. HAZEN: We have been following that work with a very great deal of care. Mr. Norcross, I am glad to say, volunteered his services and rendered us very valuable assistance. We had not enough officials in the department to undertake it, and we had to accept the services of volunteers. This work is progressing satisfactorily, but not so rapidly as we hoped. There is difficulty about getting boilers and engines, which has caused delay. However, a number of vessels have been launched, and we hope to have a number of them in patrol service in such places as the British Government desires to place them. The British Government asked our department to undertake that work, and we are doing it, greatly assisted by Mr. Norcross and certain other gentlemen. The work is being performed in certain places in Canada. In Quebec the work is being done by George Davies, in Montreal by the Canadian Vickers, in Toronto by Norcross and Polson. At Collingwood and Port Arthur, and different points in Canada, work is being done. On the whole, I think it is going ahead satisfactorily, but there are delays in obtaining material, and it has not proceeded as quickly as we hoped it would at the time the orders were placed.

Mr. GRAHAM: We have sent over a number of young men who are active in the motor-boat patrol service. From along the St. Lawrence several young men have gone, and my information is that they are in the motor-boat patrol, although some of them did not go over for that purpose. It is interesting to know that the education they received as a matter of pleasure on the rivers and waters of Canada has proved of such great benefit to them and to the Empire at the present time. Has the minister any information he can give us about the number of young men who are in that service and what they are doing?

Mr. HAZEN: Nearly 300 young men entered as sub-lieutenants, and over a hundred young men for duty as chief motor mechanics and motor mechanics in this branch of the Imperial service. It is known as the Auxiliary Motor Boat Patrol System. We have practically sent over about four hundred young men for that purpose.

Naval service—To provide for the maintenance and upkeep of ships, naval college, dockyards at Halifax and Esquimalt and Royal Naval Canadian Volunteer Reserve, $1,000,000.

Mr. PARDEE: What vessels does the minister consider naval vessels?

Mr. HAZEN: All vessels practically engaged in naval service. For instance all vessels that are engaged in the patrol service all around our coast, watching to see that no naval base is established, and on the lookout for any submarine that might appear.

Mr. PARDEE: How many of them are there?

Mr. HAZEN: Something like thirteen or fifteen, I think.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Of the larger types?

Mr. HAZEN: I will get the list.

Mr. KYTE: But there is a larger number of motor boats employed, is there not?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes, but they are hardly regarded as naval vessels. There are a number at Sydney and Halifax used in connection with the vessels at those ports.

Mr. MARCIL: Has anything been seen of the enemy in Canadian waters since the war broke out?

Mr HAZEN: It is pretty hard to answer. In the early days of the war there was scarcely a day we did not receive a report of submarines being seen. All shipping was stopped on the St. Lawrence. No ships were allowed to go out of Quebec.

This was done because the statement came from lighthouse keepers that several submarines had been seen in the lower part of the Gulf. We used to hear reports, too, of submarines being seen around the Island of Cape Breton; the member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte) no doubt remembers the report that was sent in about their having been seen in the Bras d'Or lakes. They were reported also as being off the coast of Maine. At one time the reports were backed by such evidence that the Naval Department of the United States sent ships down there and were in communication with us in regard to the matter. In nearly all these cases, however, investigation proved that the reports were unfounded. My own belief is that enemy submarines have not been near our coast. We have received even this year reports of that kind that seemed to be well verified, but on investigation we came to the conclusion that it could not have been submarines that were seen.

Mr. GRAHAM: New York harbour was closed for part of one day.

Mr. HAZEN: Yes. We have thought that there would be more possibility of enemy ships operating further to the south if they were on this side of the Atlantic at all. Of course, the submarines can do much more effective work by remaining near the other side, near their bases, in the path of vessels crossing to the British Isles. Most probably it would only be for spectacular purposes that they would make a trip over to this side. We are taking every step that we can take in order to combat this danger. I do not think it is possible, having regard to the means of protection that are being adopted, for a submarine base to be established anywhere along the coasts of Newfoundland or the Maritime Provinces, or in the Straits of Belle Isle. At one time there was a general theory that a submarine base might be established along the Straits of Belle Isle, and that district was quite carefully watched. Up to the present, however, we have had no evidence to lead to the conclusion that any submarine base has ever been established on this side of the Atlantic in Canadian territory.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How many submarines and destroyers have been built at Vickers?

Mr. HAZEN: I do not think it is desirable that that information should be given.

Mr. LEMIEUX: There has been no difficulty between the British Admiralty and this country since the war began in respect of naval matters?

Mr. HAZEN: No, the arrangements have been very satisfactory. Everything in connection with dockyards, stores and all such matters has gone very smoothly indeed.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend, who has spoken so favourably about the Royal Canadian Navy, will, I assume, do nothing to repeal the Naval Act?

Mr. HAZEN: The hon. gentleman must not ask me to pledge myself; it is very dangerous to make a promise in these times.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: At all times.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend says that everything is smooth as between the Canadian Naval Department and the British Admiralty. We are building ships for the British Government; we are employing many men; the patrol of our sea coast is under the direction of the Canadian Naval Department. My hon. friend has excellent officers; he has naval cadets; his naval college is working in perfect order. Besides, my hon. friend has been able to recruit for the British Admiralty during the year. On the whole, in this respect, my hon. friend is possibly the least objectionable of all the ministers. We are very fortunate indeed in having our Royal Canadian Navy, not only for election time, but for all times.

Mr. MARCIL: The member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) might have added that, as a fortunate and happy conclusion of the anti-naval campaign, the present Government has elevated to the Senate Mr. L'Esperance, the late member for Montmagny, who had given notice in the House of a resolution to repeal the law creating the Canadian Navy. He was impelled, however, to withdraw the notice of this resolution. Subsequently he was made Chairman of the Quebec Harbour Board, and, as a faithful reward for his services, he has been raised to the Senate and has voted for conscription. This gentleman was roundly denounced in 1911.

Mr. KYTE: Is there any objection to stating how many motor boats are leased in Nova Scotia, their sizes, the names of the parties from whom they are leased, and the rate of pay?

Mr. HAZEN: That information ought not, perhaps be given publicly, but I will send my hon. friend the list if he wants the information for himself.

Fisheries Protection Service—To provide for the repairs and maintenance of fisheries protection steamers, $375,000.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I am not surprised that there is no increase in this vote. I would imagine that the protection of the fisheries is almost a sinecure now. There is no poaching in Canadian waters.

Mr. HAZEN: Oh, yes; we have to watch our waters all the time. Only the other day an American vessel was seized within the three mile limit on the Nova Scotia coast. A few weeks before that, another one had been seized. A large fishing fleet is off the Nova Scotia coast now, and we have to watch the vessels as a cat watches a mouse to prevent their coming within the three mile limit. We have not, however, spent the money voted last year. We are asking for the same amount this year as last. Last year the gross amount spent was $299,000. A portion of the gross expenditure was transferred to the War Appropriation vote, which left the net expenditure at $145,000. I doubt if we shall spend more than half of the amount we are asking for this year.

Mr. NESBITT: Why was part transferred to the War Appropriation vote?

Mr. HAZEN: Because after these boats had finished with the patrol service they were used in connection with the Naval Service.

Mr. NESBITT: On the Atlantic coast?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I quite realize that we must keep a watch in our territorial waters, because if our cruisers were not there the American fishing vessels might indulge in poaching. I am happy to believe—indeed, I have reason to believe—that relations between Canada and the United States are very much more friendly to-day than some years ago, when we had very serious trouble over the fisheries question. In view of this, I think the expenditure on the fisheries protection service, especially on the Pacific coast, might be very much reduced. Pelagic sealing has been abolished, and I should think that we have not much to fear from American poachers in our northern Pacific waters, although farther south, in the vicinity of the San Juan straits, a closer watch no doubt has to be kept. Perhaps my hon. friend will tell us just what the conditions are.

Mr. HAZEN: I do not think the fisheries protection fleet ever had anything to do with the protection of the sealing. As my right hon. friend says, pelagic sealing is now a thing of the past, and there is no expenditure necessary for that purpose. In a very short time we expect to receive a very considerable sum of money under the terms of the treaty that was made. We received $200,000 in advance, when the killing of seals was prohibited for a period of five years, contrary to the opinion of our scientific men, who thought that step undesirable. In a very short time we shall be getting 15 per cent of the hides from America, 10 per cent from Japan, and 15 per cent from Russia.

Although excellent relations exist between Canada and the United States at the present time, that does not prevent individual American fishermen from coming within the three-mile limit and taking our fish if they think they can get away in safety. It is just as necessary to keep a close watch to-day as when our relations were not so good as at present. The right hon. gentleman referred to the protection service on the Pacific. We have to keep a watch upon the northern Pacific waters where there is a great deal of poaching by American fishing vessels. A large American fleet goes up to the North every year for the purpose of catching halibut, which are caught nearly altogether outside of territorial waters.

5 p.m.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What is the base of that fleet?

Mr. HAZEN: Ketchican, in Alaska. Farther south, near the international boundary, a watch has also to be kept. I would again point out that the fact of our good relations with the United States at the present time does not to any extent reduce the expense of our fisheries protection service, because there is just the same temptation now as formerly for an American citizen to get the best fishing he can wherever he can get it, and if he is allowed to come within the three-mile limit, he will do so.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Of course, we must not be careless, even though the relations between the two countries have improved. But in my remarks I had reference to the time when the United States claimed the privilege which is now denied to them under the treaty. I should have thought that the service could be maintained at very much less expense to-day, when the American authorities no longer countenance poaching by their vessels as they did formerly.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Would the minister say what action was taken in regard to the proposed regulations?

Mr. HAZEN: My hon. friend refers to the treaty that was entered into. The treaty provided that each country should appoint a commissioner, and that the commissioners should prepare regulations for the control of the fisheries in waters contiguous to the international boundary. The Congress of the United States never passed the legislation that was necessary to make that treaty effective, and that the Government of which my hon. friend was a member appointed Professor Prince, and that the United States Government appointed Prof. Starr Jordan. Those gentlemen made the regulations, and they were published. The Parliament of Canada at once, under the terms of the treaty, passed the necessary legislation in good faith to make them effective, but the United States Congress refused to pass such legislation on their part. I had a talk with the present President, Mr. Wilson, about it, and came to the conclusion that nothing could be done. Special interests in the United States prevented Congress from doing what they undertook to do under the treaty.

Mr. MARCIL: Does the minister find that the returns from the Atlantic fisheries this year are satisfactory?

Mr. HAZEN: Fishing was not good in the early part of the season. It is improving, and on the whole I think it is better than it was last year. In regard to the sardine fishery, which is an important industry in my province, the catch was light in the early part of the season, but the prices were very high. The fishermen never received such prices before. The salmon fishery has been very good in many parts, but in other sections it was not so good. I think on the whole we shall have a very satisfactory return.

Mr. MARCIL: What about the cod fishery.

Mr. HAZEN: It is good.

Mr. MARCIL: Are there as many fishermen employed as in other years?

Mr. HAZEN: I have not the figures for this year yet.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The statement has been published in the papers that Mr. Hanna, Food Controller, had succeeded in arranging for the transportation of fresh fish from the Atlantic coast to inland points. I know the department had an arrangement with the Intercolonial some years ago with the same object in view, and I would like to ask if there is anything new in what Mr. Hanna has done in this regard.

Mr. HAZEN: So far as I can learn, the railways are extending to Toronto the service which previously only came as far as Montreal.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Can my hon. friend give any details of that service? For instance, how many cars are in the service?

Mr. HAZEN: I think I gave that information when my fishery estimates were before the House.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is there a daily service?

Mr. HAZEN: There is one express car service a week, and there is a regular refrigerator car service, by freight, on the other days.

Mr. NESBITT: What boat, if any, is protecting the fisheries in Lake Erie?

Mr. HAZEN: The Vigilant.

Mr. KYTE: Might I ask if the list the minister handed me contains the names of all motor boats employed by the Government in Nova Scotia waters?

Mr. HAZEN: The purchasing agent tells me that the list contains all the names. Of course, these are motor boats. In addition, steamers and tugs are employed.

Mr. KYTE: I understand some of those motor boats were purchased by the Government. From the sums stated here as having been paid—$1,900, $900, $6,000—I should presume they were purchases. I see some of them are set down as being chartered at $275 a month.

Mr. HAZEN: I think the return states which were purchases and which were not.

Mr. KYTE: No, it does not.

Mr. HAZEN: My hon. friend will see, the return does convey that information. For instance, if he will look at the head of the page he will see "price per month," then, down below, he will see lump sums, such as "$1,900," "$900." Those lump sums are purchases outright.

Mr. KYTE: Has the minister a list of the steamers and tugboats in the service of the department?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes. I will have it sent to my hon friend.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Some little time ago, I referred to a scheme which was favourably considered by the minister in connection with the sardine fisheries in the counties adjacent to Charlotte. The idea was to give to Canadian buyers of sardines a preference over other buyers. My hon. friend stated that the object was to encourage the establishment of canning interests in Charlotte county promoted by the late Sir William Van Horne. After the decision had been arrived at to impose a condition upon the license that they should give a preference to the Canadian buyers, the resolution of the department was rescinded, and, to use the expression of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) the rescinding "synchronized" with the coming on of the provincial election. Owing to the agitation, I think, decision was suspended, and it never became operative afterwards. I am sorry my hon. friend who represents the county of Charlotte (Mr. Hartt) is not in his place, because I should like to give him an opportunity of explaining a letter which he wrote in this connection, which I propose reading. He wrote the Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries approving of this proposed policy, but suggesting that the change when made should be printed in the regulations so as not to attract the attention of the fishermen. My hon. friend did not remember any such letter, but afterwards he was good enough to send me a copy of it. I do not wish to do my hon. friend from Charlotte any injustice and I think it only right that the letter should be placed on Hansard so that the fishermen of Charlotte county may have an opportunity of judging as to the action of the hon. member in that respect, and the hon. member may also have an opportunity of explaining his action, if he desires so to do.

Mr. HAZEN: Did not the hon. member for Charlotte suggest that this be printed in the license so that the fishermen should know it?

Mr. PUGSLEY: If that were so, it would have been a most admirable desire on the part of the hon. member for Charlotte, but his suggestion was that it should be printed in the license so as not to attract the attention of the fishermen. It is a curious letter. Let me read it:

House of Commons, March 2nd, 1912.

A. Johnston, Esq.,

Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries,

Dear Sir,—Your letter of February 29th re the proposed change in the wording of "Weir Licenses" received.

I approve of giving buyers for the Canadian sardine factories the second but similar privileges as the buyers of bait.

This will not injure the Canadian fishermen, but will make the supply to Canadian factories more certain. I think new licenses should be printed including this provision, and as licenses are not in the hands of fishermen yet, there must be time to make the change, and licenses that are in the hands of fishery inspectors I hope can be recalled and the new form sent out.

Please let me know if this can be done. I know the fishermen will pay less attention to the change if done in this way.

Yours truly,

T. A. Hartt.

What does that mean?

Mr. HAZEN: Does it mean that this being printed in the license, and the fishermen seeing it there will recognize it as being correct, whereas, if it is not in the license, they will imagine something is being done which is improper and against their interests, and will suspect it is desired to keep them in the dark about it? That is what Mr. Hartt tells me he meant by it—that he wanted the greatest publicity given to it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes, but the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hartt) has stated that it should be printed in the license, and he says:

I know the fishermen will pay less attention to the change, if done in this way.

If it is printed in the license they will pay less attention to the change.

Mr. HAZEN: The hon. gentleman is attaching to the word "attention" a different meaning from what the hon. member (Mr. Hartt) intended. What he meant to convey was that if this is printed in the license the fisherman will see it at once when he gets his license, he will know what the conditions are, and therefore it will give him less trouble, annoyance or worry than if this is not done later on when his attention is called to it in some other way. The word "attention" is being used in one sense by the hon. member for Charlotte and in another by my hon. friend (Mr. Pugsley).

Mr. PUGSLEY: What other word would convey what was meant?

Mr. HAZEN: Perhaps he meant to say "disturbed" or something of that sort. I think I would have phrased it differently.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Would be "disturbed" less?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Well I think that is about what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hartt) meant. He meant that if it was printed in the license the fisherman would not realize that it had been done and there would be less dissatisfaction among them. It would not attract their attention. But the word "attention" is an ordinary English word the meaning of which is very well understood.

Mr. HAZEN: I think it is a most extraordinary thing to argue that the writer of the letter meant that it would not attract their attention so much if it was right there in the license where they could see it. Surely it was the very thing that would attract their attention.

Mr. PUGSLEY: But if it were interlined the fishermen would see that the minister meant imposing upon them the obligation to give Sir William Van Horne's canning industry the first right to buy. In other words, the policy which my right hon. friend determined upon at the request of Sir William Van Horne was that the fishermen would proceed with their catch first to the American buyers and if the Americans offered $4 per hogshead, Sir William Van Horne's company would say that they would give $4 and then the fishermen would be obliged to sell to Sir William Van Horne's company. In a few years the result would be that the American buyers would be driven out of the market completely and the fishermen would be at the mercy of Sir William Van Horne's company.

Mr. NESBITT: Would they be obliged to sell?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes, obliged to sell to the Van Horne Company at whatever price the American buyer would offer. Right up to time the fish are actually taken off, the Van Horne company had to have the first right, just as it was also provided with respect to bait. Such a condition was to remain in full force until the fish were taken from the weir and unloaded from the licensees' boats to the boats of the buyer. So that the fishermen were placed absolutely at the mercy of Sir William van Horne's company. The fishermen were greatly opposed to it. The hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Hartt) saw, as a sensible man, that it would be opposed by the fishermen. He was so anxious to encourage the establishment of Sir William van Horne's canning industry that he favoured the change, and he requested the deputy minister to see that the license was changed, and that the change should be actually printed in the license and not interlined as he believed it would attract less attention from the fishermen. He says:

I think new licenses should be printed including this provision, and as licenses are not in the hands of the fishermen yet, there must be time to make the change, and licenses that are in the hands of fishery inspectors, I hope, can be recalled and the new forms sent out. Please let me know if this can be done. I know the fishermen will pay less attention to the change, if done in this way.

I would say that what the hon. member for Charlotte had in mind was that if this restriction were interlined it would attract the attention of the fishermen and possibly cause an uproar among them, but if it were printed it would probably attract less attention.

Mr. HAZEN: It is impossible for my hon. friend and myself to say what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hoitt) did mean. I am sorry he is not here, but from a conversation I had with him I think he meant the very reverse of the construction that my hon. friend places upon his letter. However, perhaps before the session is over, the hon.

member for Charlotte will have an opportunity of explaining. From what I know of the hon. gentleman, I know that he would not for one moment entertain the idea of doing anything which would not be in the greatest interest of the fishmen and of the public generally.

Mr. PUGSLEY: He is an old school teacher, and he knows what the word "attention" means.

Mr. NESBITT: Is that regulation still in force?

Mr. HAZEN: No, it never was in force.

Mr. KYTE: Some months ago tenders were invited for a patrol service on the coast of Newfoundland. I am aware that a tender was put in by Captain Charles A. Stewart, of Wood's Island, Newfoundland. He received information from the department that his tender was the lowest, but I was never able to ascertain whether a contract had been awarded. I had some correspondence with the deputy minister of the Naval Service on the subject, and the last I heard from Captain Stewart was that an inquiry was being made at St. John's, Newfoundland, to ascertain whether his boat was suitable for the service.

Mr. HAZEN: How long ago?

Mr. KYTE: In April. Perhaps the minister would be good enough to write me a letter giving a statement with regard to the position of affairs.

Mr. HAZEN: I will ask my officials to take note of it, and I will have the information sent to my hon. friend.

Mr. GRAHAM: I know the department are very anxious to keep in Canada all the boats we have. Had they anything to do with the sale of a steamer called the John Webster to the United States Government last month?

Mr. HAZEN: That is a matter the Department of Naval Service has nothing to do with. It might come under the attention of the Marine and Fisheries Department, but it has not come under my attention. I saw that a steamer named the John Webster had been sold to parties in the United States. The steamer was one that went between Brockville and an American port.

Mr. GRAHAM: A new steamer.

Mr. HAZEN: If she is a Canadian-registered steamer the registry could not be transferred to the United States without the approval of the department and the approval would not be given without my sanction. It has not come to my attention. Possibly the steamer was registered in the States, and that being so we should have nothing to do with it. Does my hon. friend happen to know whether it was American or Canadian registry?

Mr. GRAHAM: No.

Mr. HAZEN: If it is registered in the United States they could sell it to whomever they choose without let or hindrance on our part. If it is registered in Canada, before Canadian registry can be closed they have to get the consent of the department.

Fisheries Protection Service—To provide for new vessels, $100,000.

Mr. HAZEN: I have kept that item in the estimates because it was in last year, but under existing conditions we do not intend to expend the money. We feel we ought to have better fishery protection on Lake Erie than we have at the present time. We have one vessel, the Vigilant, but in spite of the greatest vigilance the Vigilant can exercise there is no doubt that there is more or less poaching from the American side.

This item was inserted to provide a faster boat for that service, but owing to the general cutting down of expenses we have not proceeded with that work, and we shall try to get along for another season.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Has the minister given up hope of having the treaty passed some years ago between the two nations, for the protection of these contiguous waters, ratified by the American Senate? It is a very valuable treaty and was pressed upon us by some Americans as vigorously as by our own people. I know that special interests have so far been able to prevent the ratification of the treaty.

Mr. HAZEN: I think Canada went almost to the very limit it could go without humiliating itself with regard to the matter.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. HAZEN: And I might say to my hon. friend, in all candour, that I think there is practically no chance of it at all.

Mr. GRAHAM: At one time it looked as if Congress were about to consider the matter favourably, but, as the minister said, private interests intervened and were sufficiently influential in Congress to prevent ratification. In reference to the fishing in the St. Lawrence river, particularly in the Thousand Islands where it is mostly sporting fishing, owing to the conflict of interests between the federal and provincial authorities, what was the business of both for a time became the practical business of neither, and Americans were fishing in our waters among the Thousand Islands with impunity. An arrangement was entered into, largely through the efforts of the Thousand Islands Anglers' Association, by which, while perhaps the letter of the law was not adhered to on either side, the fishermen on each side were controlled. It is difficult to say whether a fisherman is on one side of the line or the other, and thus many poachers escaped. Does the minister know anything about that arrangement and is it still being carried out?

Mr. HAZEN: The Government of Ontario has taken over the administration of its own fisheries. Under the decision we make the regulations, but they are administered by the provincial government. We make the regulations at their request in matters of that sort.

Mr. NESBITT: The province has nothing to do with the enforcement of the law on lake Erie.

Mr. HAZEN: Those are commercial fish. We prevent encroachment on our waters by people from the American side, but the province would have control so far as its own people are concerned.

Mr. NESBITT: I shall be glad when the Government can afford a swifter steamer on lake Erie because there is undoubtedly a good deal of poaching by fishermen from the other side.

Mr. GRAHAM: Has the Government changed its attitude in respect to extending the season for fishing every autumn? Regularly, particularly at election times, certain extensions in the open seasons are asked for. It is always suggested and argued that the season has been a bad one up-to-date, and that the fisherman will not have had the full fruition of his year's toil unless a certain extension is made. Whenever there has been a kind of undertone from the country that there is going to be an election, the fishing season has been bad, judging by the extensions. I think the minister made an announcement in the House at one time that they were not going to do that any more, that they were going to have a certain stated close season which was going to be adhered to, and that it would be fixed after all due consideration. Would there be any chance this autumn of the minister extending the fishing season, or is he obdurate on that, and will he refuse to do anything?

Mr. HAZEN: We will always be open to reason. If the hon. gentleman would advance good reasons, in the public interest, why it should be done, we will consider it. My hon. friend refers to what I stated in the House. I said I thought the close season should be fixed by statute. At present it is fixed by order in council. Practically every year there are demands for an extension of the fishing season.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Would it not be better to have it fixed by statute?

Mr. HAZEN: Perhaps it would be. I know the hon. members from Northumberland (Mr. Loggie), Gloucester (Mr. Turgeon), and Kent (Mr. Robidoux) would not agree to that, because, they say, there are certain exceptional seasons when it would be a hardship to fishermen if an extension were not granted. Sometimes for weeks in the early season the ice will set in along Northumberland Straits and the Gulf of St. Lawrence. The hon. gentleman from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) made a strong appeal on one occasion for an extension. For weeks people could not get out to fish at all. There are certain seasons when the weather is so stormy that they cannot set out their nets. A great many people are dependent on fishing for their livelihood, and when the seasons are not extended they are without the means of livelihood. Sometimes requests are made which are not justified, when these conditions I refer to do not exist. If my hon. friend has any particular fishery in view, I will give consideration to the matter.

Mr. PUGSLEY: But the hon. gentleman will not get credit for it, if an election is held.

Mr. HAZEN: I think my hon. friend will see he gets the credit.

Mr. MARCIL: Was there a request made in regard to the extension of the season for salmon fishing on the Restigouche?

Mr. HAZEN: I cannot say. A request came in to-day for an extension of the season for salmon fishing on the Miramichi.

Mr. MARCIL: I received a letter from Mr. H. C. Gillis, Tide Head, N.B., who said he was not able to put out his net before June 27.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will the minister make a statement as to the regulations regarding the size of lobster? Some years ago the late Colonel Tucker who represented St. John's county in Parliament, was appointed on a commission to examine into the whole question of lobster fisheries—I think that was the subject—and I remember how greatly he prided himself upon the fact that no lobsters could be caught of less length than nine inches. He took great credit for that. It occurred to me that his views were sound, because I understood that until a lobster reached that size it had not arrived at the age of maturity, and that it would prevent reproduction of a most valuable species, and would be very injurious to the public interest, if the small lobsters were killed. About two years ago I received a letter from a gentleman who carries on a large business in fish in St. John, enclosing me a little bit of a lobster about two and a half inches in length, which was a sample of lobsters of the waters of the province of Nova Scotia, which were on the market in St. John. It was a great surprise to me. I made inquiries, and I was informed that lobsters at that time could be caught of any size in the waters of Nova Scotia, whereas in the waters of St. John and Charlotte they could not be caught of a less size than nine inches. The lobster fisheries are of enormous value. I think the lobster is the most valuable shell fish that can be found. It is in very great demand in all the cities of the United States, and before the war was in great demand in Europe. Canned lobster is a very great luxury, and is a most delicious article of food. I am sure the minister will agree with me that it would be a great pity to have any regulation which allowed the sale of these small fish, and I hope he will be good enough to make a short statement with regard to the regulations respecting the size of lobsters which may be caught.

Mr. HAZEN: The hon. gentleman is quite right. In St. John and Charlotte county there has been a limit for many years. There are no lobster factories in St. John and Charlotte—no licenses are granted lobster factories in either of those two counties. The lobsters are accordingly shipped away, very largely to the Boston market for sale. The result of there being no lobster factories in St. John and Charlotte county is that in the last few years there has been a small increase in the catch of lobsters in those two counties. The lobsters which my hon. friend refers to in the store in St. John no doubt came from the south shore of Nova Scotia, where there is no size limit to the lobsters that may be caught and canned. There are many canneries there, the business having been long established. It was claimed on behalf of the canners that fresh lobsters could not be sent to market and sold at a price which would be profitable to the fishermen. The season there is very much shorter than in St. John and other places where there is a size limit. I agree with my hon. friend as to the impropriety and undesirability of allowing the catching of immature lobsters, and I believe in a very short time it will be possible to pass a law that will prevent any lobster canneries existing in Nova Scotia at any point west of Halifax. When you get beyond that there is no line of railway across the country, and it is a very long distance for the canner to bring lobsters around to Canso, and ship them to the United States. But we are right up to the time when it will be possible to prohibit the canning of lobsters altogether, and to enact a size limit such as we have in the counties of Charlotte and St. John.

Mr. PUGSLEY: How is it on the northern coast?

Mr. HAZEN: If you come to the northern coast you will have to observe the rule there, for the reason that the people in Northumberland county, Kent county and Prince Edward Island cannot get lobsters fresh into the American market, because it is too far away.

Mr. PUGSLEY: There is no size limit?

Mr. HAZEN: No. In all these districts there is a difference in the length of the season, having regard to the habits of the lobster. In spite of that, last year, along the Northumberland Straits, up at Point Sabin, there was the largest catch of lobsters in the district in forty years.

I am told that they were caught in such large numbers that in some cases the factories could not handle them, and they were sent to other factories some distance further down the coast. This year the catch has been very small.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That may be owing to the catch being so large last year.

Mr. HAZEN: Possibly. I agree with what my hon. friend says with regard to the catching of the little lobsters at points where there is fair chance of shipping live lobsters to the market to be used in fresh state. I hope that in a short time a regulation may be passed for the Nova Scotia coast similar to those now in force in St. John and Charlotte counties.

Hydrographic surveys, $290,000.

Mr. NESBITT: How much was spent on this last year?

Mr. HAZEN: In 1915-16 the expenditure was $231,000 and in 1916-17, up to December 31, $170,000.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Upon what basis is this work done?

Mr. HAZEN: This work is for the purpose of having charts made of harbours and coasts. The chart with respect to Nova Scotia is pretty well completed; the same may be said of the lower St. Lawrence. Formerly the Admiralty charts were used, but in many cases they have been found to be inaccurate. The work is done at different places in different years. The survey is in charge of the gentleman who has been engaged in that work for many years, Mr. W. J. Stewart, chief hydrographic officer.

The following is a statement with respect to this work:

Atlantic Coast, C.G.S. Acadia.—This survey is being conducted along the south-east coast of Nova Scotia, starting from Halifax harbour to modernize the present charts of that locality.

Lower St. Lawrence, C.G.S. Cartier.—The work of this party is being gradually extended eastwards from the river and work has now been completed as far east as Point des Monts on the north shore and Cape Chat on the south shore. It is intended to carry the work along the south shore embracing the route of vessels approaching the St. Lawrence, during the coming season.

Lake Superior, C.G.S. Bayfield.—During the coming season it is intended to use this party in surveying the more exposed coasts of Lake Superior, in the vicinity of Caribou island and Michipicoten.

Lake Superior, C.G.S. La Canadienne.—This steamer, owing to her age and small power, is employed in surveying more sheltered waters. Last season she completed the survey of Nipigon bay. This year she will complete Black bay which was omitted in the general coast work. If time permits she will be moved to work in the North Channel of lake Huron.

Pacific Coast, C.G.S. Lillooet.—This steamer is working around Queen Charlotte islands and Hecate strait and it is proposed to continue in that locality.

Radiotelegraph service—to provide for the building and maintenance of wireless stations, $295,000.

Mr. MARCIL: I saw an item in the paper this morning that the wireless telegraph service between United States and Canada and Great Britain had been suspended. That, I suppose, would affect the service in Canada.

Mr. HAZEN: The deputy minister tells me that that was confirmed this morning.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I suppose that is a proper measure. I have heard that our signals were being tapped by the Germans.

Tidal service—to provide for the maintenance of tidal stations and surveying steamers, $35,000.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: How many steamers are employed in this service?

Mr. HAZEN: Only one; it is really employed for the purpose of the naval service. This is for the maintenance of tidal stations and the preparation and publication of the tide tables, which are published not only for the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, but also for Hudson Bay. The expenditure in 1915-16 was $16,000, and 1916-17, up to December 31, $13,682. I do not think the expenditure will be any larger this year. These scientific services are suffering because of the loss of some of our young men who have gone to the war and whose places we are unable to fill. We are unable to carry on the work, therefore, as accurately as we have done in previous years.

Patrol of the northern waters of Canada, $50,000.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What is being done under this head?

Mr. HAZEN: We expect this will wind up everything in connection with the Stefansson expedition. The hon. gentleman will remember that some years ago Stefansson went north under the auspices of the Canadian Government. He has been gone now for over three years, and is expected to return in the course of a few months. His southern party has already returned. I hope that we shall not have to ask Parliament for any further appropriation in connection with this expedition.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I must say that I never had much faith in Stefansson's expedition. I think it would be very inopportune to give up the patrol of these northern waters, because up there we have lands of great value, which will be of greater value still by-and-by, when their mineral resources are developed. American poachers invade not only these northern waters, but the mainland too, for fur-bearing animals, and I think we should have cause for regret if the service were discontinued.

Mr. HAZEN: The work my hon. friend refers to is carried on largley by the Mounted Police. Stefansson went up north to find new lands, mineral deposits, and anything of that nature that might be of value to Canada.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. W. H. Bennett in the Chair.

Civil Government—Royal Northwest Mounted Police—Salaries, $21,712.50; contingencies, $1,700.

Mr. GRAHAM: How many Northwest Mounted Police are there now?

Mr. ROGERS: We have about 800, I think. There is a proposal to increase the staff, but it is very difficult to carry it out, because the men who would join the mounted police are the ones who join the army and go to the front.

Mr. GRAHAM: Is it not the case that a good many of the mounted police have gone to the front?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, a good many of the police have gone over too; but it is necessary to keep the force up to reasonable strength.

Civil Government—Departments generally, $275,000.

Mr. GRAHAM: What wages are now being paid to the poor women who clean up the buildings?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: They get one dollar per day for a few hours' work. They do not work the full day.

Mr. GRAHAM: Although it may not be relevant to this particular item, as an expert maker of lawns I would like to tell the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) that so long as he allows the sprinkling of his lawns in the middle of the day when the sun is hot, so long will he not have good lawns around these buildings. You might just as well pour hot water on a lawn as to sprinkle it when the sun is shining as it has been for the last few days. I do not wish to steal any person's job, but if the minister will inquire from any one who has had experience in making lawns, he will find what I say is correct.

Mr. ROGERS: We do not usually sprinkle the lawns until between four and five o'clock in the afternoon, but during the recent very hot spell we changed the hours of sprinkling, particularly around this portion of the buildings. This was done because the sprinkling had a very cooling effect, and seemed to be much appreciated by those who were working in this Chamber. Immediately the temperature changes we will go back to the old hour of sprinkling.

Mr. GRAHAM: The reason I spoke was because I saw a man sprinkling about half-past one the other afternoon, and I suggested it was not a very good time for the work. He said his orders were to sprinkle the lawn in the middle of the day. I could understand using a good deal of water on the roads, or even on the building itself, but sprinkling the lawns at that hour of the day will simply kill the grass.

Mr. ROGERS: The employee my hon. friend refers to was evidently making a mistake. Not only was he mistaken, but he was violating the rules of the city, because we are not allowed to sprinkle except at certain hours of the day. When we wanted to change the hour we had to get permission from the city authorities to do so.

Royal Northwest Mounted Police, $1,158,169.

Mr. GRAHAM: Every person is in favour of any reasonable vote for the Northwest Mounted Police. I was asking some questions as to the number and the Minister of Public Works gave me some explanation. I think it would be interesting if the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) would say a word about the Royal Northwest Mounted Police force. How many men have gone overseas and how many are in the force now?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There was a very earnest desire on the part of practically the whole force at the commencement of the war to enlist for service overseas. But it was not practicable for them all to do that because they were needed in the West. Especially during the past three years they have done very excellent work indeed. Occasionally, from time to time, we have permitted discharge a little in advance to men who wanted to enlist. How many men have enlisted and gone to the front? I am not prepared to say just how many. A few years ago we increased the force by 500 or 600 men. The term of enlistment was altered at that time from three years to one year. I think nearly all of the men took their discharge at the end of the year. The force now is about 800. In view of the reduction in the military forces in Canada, authority has been given to increase the mounted police by about 500 men. In addition to that, I have had communication with the commissioner as to the possibility of raising a regiment, or even a brigade, of cavalry, from the Northwest Mounted Police if the time should ever come when cavalry would be needed in any of the theatres of war. We have communicated with the War Office from time to time, but they cannot say at present that any mounted force is needed. However, the commissioner has been authorized to announce that it is the intention to permit enlistment of a mounted force should it eventually be necessary. Some preparation has been made with a view to carrying out this proposal, should it be practicable to do so. The force has been provided with machine guns and a certain number of motor cars for expedition in case of certain contingencies that were at one time apprehended. I believe that at the present time the force is in a highly efficient condition. That is the report made to me by Commissioner Perry. I do not know of any further information that I can give, but if any hon. gentleman would like to ask any question, I shall of course answer it to the best of my ability.

Mr. PARDEE: I saw in a newspaper four or five months ago an article headed "The Passing of the Northwest Mounted Police". It read as if the Northwest Mounted Police had been done away with. Am I mistaken in supposing that that is the case?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: They are not done away with at all. Perhaps the article originated from the fact that the arrangements with the three Prairie Provinces, Alberta, Sackatchewan and Manitoba, were abrogated and the force is now used entirely for Dominion purposes. That was done upon the recommendation of the Commissioner who thought that in view of certain changes in the laws of the western provinces the men were being called upon to perform duties which would not tend to keep the force up to that high degree of excellence which has always characterized it. Under a very old arrangement the force performed the duties of a local police force for the Northwest Territories and afterwards for the new provinces. Legislation in regard to the liquor traffic and other matters was recently enacted and the Commissioner made reports to this effect: In the first place, that there was ample scope for the time and energies of the force in dealing with conditions as they presented themselves in time of war, and, secondly, that a force called upon to enforce local police regulations was hardly able to maintain the morale and the efficiency which had always been maintained in the past. He recommended that there should be consultation with the provincial government. Negotiations were carried on and an arrangement, by common consent of all the provinces, was made by which the amount payable by each province to the Federal Government for the services of the force was to be discontinued and on the other hand the force was to be entirely under the direction of the Commissioner and used for purely Dominion purposes. I imagine that this charge is the foundation of the report to which my hon. friend alluded.

Civil Government—Department of External Affairs—Salaries, $34,512.50; contingencies, $15,500.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The increase is due to the fact that the Department of External Affairs has had imposed upon it much more work than in previous years, notably in connection with the issuing of passports. The number of clerks has been considerably increased and they work very hard, to my personal knowledge. On the other hand, the revenue from the passports issued more than counterbalances the increased cost.

Mr. GRAHAM: We had some discussion the other evening with reference to the issuing of passports to ladies to go to England under exceptional circumstances.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There have been two or three cases where that has been permitted since the order in council was passed. The subject is under the general direction of a small committee of the Privy Council, of which Sir George Foster is chairman. I have asked Sir Joseph Pope to be guided by the direction of that committee in respect of such matters.

Mr. GRAHAM: We had some discussion as to what would be considered exceptional circumstances. To be candid, I am interested in a case of this kind. A bright young man was engaged to be married to a young lady. The ceremony was to take place within a few weeks, when he was ordered overseas. On the advice of friends, it was arranged that the ceremony should take place in England, and he was to send for the young lady after his arrival there. It does seem a hardship that in such a case the young lady should be refused permission to cross.

Mr. HAZEN: I think I shall have to join hands with my hon. friend and see if we cannot influence the obdurate hearts of Sir George Foster and Sir Joseph Pope. I have been for some time urging the case of a young lady, but I have been able to make no more impression than my hon. friend.

Mr. NESBITT: What would be done in a case where a woman's husband had gone to England and obtained a permanent position there? Would she be allowed to go?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am afraid I could not answer my hon. friend. I have not had much to do personally with these cases. While I was in England I made an application in a case of very severe illness. In another case where I sought to secure some modification, at the instance of one of the members of the House, I was entirely unsuccessful. I think if my hon. friends would speak to Sir Joseph Pope it would be the most effective course.

Salaries and contingent expenses of the Board of Pension Commissioners for Canada, $375,000.

Mr. GRAHAM: Was not an Act passed establishing this board?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No Act was passed. An order in council was passed to give effect to the committee of last year.

Mr. GRAHAM: We had something before us the other day in the House.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There is a resolution on the Order Paper.

Mr. GRAHAM: We had a resolution on it, had we not?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The resolution relates to the scale of pensions. This is intended to be the foundation of an Act.

Mr. NESBITT: It has nothing to do with the matter we are discussing.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Not directly. This item represents the expenses of the board which would administer the regulations that are now carried out under an order in council, but will eventually be carried out under statute.

Mr. NESBITT: This is an increase. Could anybody tell us how much of that was used last year?

[Mr. Graham.]

Mr. HAZEN: It is a new item.

Mr. GRAHAM: In the House the other night we were discussing the question of pensions, not on an item in the estimates, but on a resolution.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not think we discussed that question.

Mr. GRAHAM: Some member of the Government explained that what had hitherto been done by order in council or regulation in reference to the appointment of a pensions board was now to be done by statute.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes, but the statute has not yet been enacted.

Mr. GRAHAM: At what stage is it?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: At the stage of a resolution on which to found a Bill.

Mr. GRAHAM: The resolution is in the name of the Finance Minister (Sir Thomas White) and reads: "Resolved that it is expedient to establish a commission to be known as The Board of Pensions Commissioners for Canada"—and so on—

This board is to be established by statute?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes, the commission made a unanimous report. There was no time to pass an Act last year. The recommendations of the commissioners were made effective by order in council under the War Measures Act. This resolution on the Order Paper is intended to be the foundation of the Bill.

Mr. GRAHAM: Are any members of that board acting without salary?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The chairman of the board does not receive a salary, although he is entitled to it.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is Mr. Ross. What are the salaries of the other two gentlemen?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Five thousand dollars.

Mr. NESBITT: Would this item include salaries of the commissioners after the Bill is passed?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Salaries and contingent expenses.

Mr. NESBITT: Salaries would be included?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM: How much money has been paid out of the pensions fund?

Mr. REID: When we take up item 79 we will have full information in regard to that.

Mr. PARDEE: Will information be given later which will show what that $375,000 is made up of?

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. PARDEE: The item says: "Salaries and contingent expenses, Board of Pensions Commissioners." The salaries cannot amount to very much, but the contingent expenses must be a very large item.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: They have a pretty large staff. They have taken over a good many of the officers in the Department of Militia and Defence who were engaged in doing this work on a much smaller scale before the board was established. Besides that, they brought in a considerable additional staff. I have no information about it here, but when we take up item 79 I think we can give my hon. friend full information.

High Commissioner's Office, London—Salaries, $21,650; contingencies, $58,151.

Mr. GRAHAM: How big a staff has the High Commissioner as High Commissioner?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I cannot give my hon. friend accurate information as to the number of the staff, but I know that it has been very considerably increased, and contingent expenses in the way of telegrams and expenses of that character generally have naturally been very considerably increased since the war broke out. Sir George Perley has received, during all the time he has been over there, no salary whatever as High Commissioner, nor as Minister of the Overseas Service, and I understand that he is not willing to receive a salary in either capacity, although there is a resolution on the Order Paper providing for a salary to him as Minister of the Overseas Service.

Mr. GERMAN: Does the right hon. gentleman not think it would be more becoming, and more seemly to Canada, for our High Commissioner to be really High Commissioner, and draw his salary, and not represent a constituency in Canada, when he is really not sitting in Parliament and not actually representing the constituency at all? He is acting in a treble capacity: He is member for Argenteuil; he is High Commissioner; and he is Overseas Minister of Militia. It seems to me it is placing too much of a burden on one man, particularly when he is not drawing any salary in any of these offices. It looks very much to me as though he should fill one capacity, and the man who fills one capacity and does it well is doing about all that one man is able to do. It looks to me as though he were overburdened with duties. He cannot perform all these duties and do them properly. I submit, the High Commissioner should be the High Commissioner and should have a salary commensurate with the duties of the high position which he fills. He should not occupy the three positions I have named. I think that instead of considering a union Government the right hon. Prime Minister had better disunionize that position.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think that particular union has worked very well indeed so far. With a good deal of what my hon. friend says, I should be inclined to agree. It must be remembered that Sir George Perley went over in June, 1914, intending to return in September of the same year. The war broke out, and he has remained at his post ever since, with the exception of a couple of months last year, when he visited Canada. The duties of the High Commissioner are very important, and sometimes pretty onerous. I know that he has had a great deal to do during the past three years by reason of matters connected with the war, and I agree entirely that his duties as overseas minister are also important and sufficiently onerous of themselves. I realize that the arrangement which has been going on for some months is not one that could be made permanent, but I hope my hon. friend will give us till after the session to consider what may be the future disposition, and to endeavour to effect some arrangement which will be satisfactory, even to his critical judgment.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is enlightening so far. It would appear that the Prime Minister has in his mind a change of some kind in connection with the High Commissionership at London. I am not going to argue whether it ought or ought not to be made. To be frank, it has been rumoured that he was going to insist on the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) accepting that high position.

As the Prime Minister has intimated that something is going to be done in this respect after the close of the session, now would be a good time for him to take the committee into his confidence and tell us whether he is going to appoint the Minister of Public Works as High Commissioner for Canada in London.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am afraid that my hon. friend's curiosity is quite too excessive. I really have nothing to take the committee into my confidence about just at present. I may say in reply to the member for Welland (Mr. German) that I see a good deal of force in his observation and that after the session is over I will give my most careful and attentive consideration to what he has urged.

Miscellaneous—Amount required to meet expenses of the Technical Board appointed to consider questions relating to the level of the Lake of the Woods, $8,000.

Mr. NESBITT: Has that work been finished?

Mr. HAZEN: I think that the work has been finished; I am surprised that the amount is so reasonable. Hon. gentlemen will remember that the International Waterways Commission had referred to them a question with regard to the level of the lake of the Woods, affecting interests in Manitoba and Ontario and in the United States. It was necessary for that International Commission to arrive at what would be a proper minimum and a proper maximum level for the lake of the Woods, taking the season throughout. In order to decide this, they had to consider questions affecting navigation, power, fisheries. and many other matters. If the level of the lake were raised to a certain height, some land would be flooded, and there was a question as to what damages should be paid. Moreover, if the lake were raised to a certain level, certain advantages would result to people upon the United States side of the lake, while certain interests there would be injured; the question was how to adjust satisfactorily these various conditions resulting from the raising of the level. An immense amount of information was scattered among the departments in Ottawa—the Interior Department, the Department of Marine, the Public Works Department, and others—and in order to get that information consolidated and in such form as to be of use for the Canadian Commissioners, it was found necessary to appoint a Technical Board for that purpose. I was assigned by council the duty of organizing the board and of acting as chairman. As a matter of fact, I was chairman only in the sense of organizing and consulting. The real chairman of the board, the one who had the scientific and technical knowledge enabling him to do the work far better than I could, was Mr. W. J. Stewart, Director of Hydrographic Survey. We had on that board also representatives of the Public Works Department —Mr. Challies and Mr. Chapleau—together with representatives of the other departments in which there was information of this kind. A great many meetings of this committee were held. It was found necessary to employ surveyors and others in order to get the necessary information together and be able to advise the Canadian members of the International Waterways Commission.

Mr. NESBITT: Outside of the surveyors, the personnel of the commission consisted of men who were at that time civil servants?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes; they got no extra pay for their services. Certain clerical assistance, however, had to be provided; travelling expenses had to be paid, and certain surveyors and engineers had to be employed to take observations from time to time. This item is for the purpose of covering that expense. I have been informed by members of the International Waterways Commission that the information thus obtained was invaluable—indeed, was indispensable; that without it, it would have been impossible to get along at all. The result has been that the International Waterways Commission has been able to come to an arrangement with regard to the many diversified interests that were affected—an arrangement that will work out satisfactorily and will be acceptable to the people of both countries.

Mr. NESBITT: The result of the work of the commission was satisfactory to the United States Commissioners?

Mr. HAZEN: The commissioners of both countries agreed to it, yes.

Mr. NESBITT: And they have fixed the level?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes.

Mr. NESBITT: Without land damages?

Mr. HAZEN: They made some provision with regard to land damages, and with regard also to the water-powers on the lake and on the Winnipeg river, which is entirely, I think, in Manitoba. My understanding is that both the Canadian and the United States sections of the International Waterways Commission have been able to agree upon a finding that is mutually satisfactory.

Mr. NESBITT: But this item does not include any provision for land damages?

Mr. HAZEN: No. There may not be any land damages for a long time to come; indeed, there may never be any.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The report has not yet been completed, but pending its completion the hon. gentleman will remember that I read a summary of the results of the investigation not long ago. The report is being printed and will be distributed, but it is pretty voluminous and there will be some delay.

Mr. MURPHY: Has the Commission to which this item relates concluded its work?

Mr. HAZEN: I do not think there will be anything more for the Commission to do. Its functions were to gather this information for the use of the Canadian section of the Commission. That having been done, and an understanding having been arrived at, I do not think there will be anything further.

Special allowance to the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada to cover travelling and other expenses in connection with his services while acting as Deputy to His Excellency the Governor General, $2,500.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Why is this item reduced by one-half, to $2,500?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We might pass the item and I will find out what the reason is. If there is any mistake it can be corrected in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. NESBITT: What are the travelling expenses in connection with this item?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The Chief Justice of the Supreme Court acts as Deputy Governor when the Governor General is absent, and there has always been an allowance for travelling and other expenses in that connection.

Expenses under the Naturalization Acts, $11,000.

Mr. McKENZIE: This item stood for information which the Minister of Justice was to get for the committee.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Perhaps the item might pass, and if my hon. friend will give me a little memorandum of the information required I will have it prepared.

Mr. McKENZIE: A question arose as to the amounts paid to the officers of the different courts for signing orders and so forth. In our province there is no fee for signing an order of this kind, and when this item was up before a question was asked as to what really was the purpose for which this money was to be voted. No explanation was given at the time.

Item stands.

Mines and Geological Survey—Investigation of ore and other economic deposits, structural material, expenses of Fuel and Ore Dressing Plant, collection of mining and metallurgical statistics, $71,620.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I have had occasion to consult some of the geological survey reports of late, and I find that the translation is certainly of a high order. I understand that the translation is under the direction of Mr. Sauvalle, an old journalist who sat in the press gallery here for many years. I want to pay tribute to his work as translator of the geological survey reports. The matter is very difficult and technical to translate, and the translation is certainly done in a most commendable way. I understand that Mr. Sauvalle has been ill through the winter, and I trust that the department will take that into consideration and see that Mr. Sauvalle gets a good rest, because I am sure it would be difficult to find in the whole Dominion a man capable of replacing Mr. Sauvalle in the very important post of translator of such technical matter as the geological survey reports.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My attention had not been directed to this particular work, but I know that Mr. Sauvalle is a very capable man.

Mr. MURPHY: Would the minister explain how and where this money is spent?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am afraid I am not able to give my hon. friend precise particulars with regard to it. I do know, however, that investigations are made along a great many lines by the appointed officers of the department, and occasionally they come to my attention in a more or less casual way.

Mr. MURPHY: Perhaps the Prime Minister would secure information for the committee as to how much money is spent at Ottawa and outside in connection with this item?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Certainly.

Mr. NESBITT: I wanted to ask the same question. I can understand the item "collection of mining and metallurgical statistics," but I cannot understand what is being done under the heading of "Investigation of ore and other economic deposits, structural material, expenses of fuel and ore dressing plant," and I should like to see the expenditure under these three heads,—separate, if possible. I know something about the mining business, and I do not see what good is being done by this expenditure.

9 p.m.

Mr. HAZEN: Certain investigations have been going on in connection with peat deposits, asphalt, and so forth.

Mr. NESBITT: I thought it had reference to peat. We have been carrying on investigations along that line for a number of years, and, to my certain knowledge, nothing has come of it. As for the men that lay down our asphalt, they are perfectly capable of investigating for themselves. Nothing whatever has come of these investigations so far as I know.

Mr. PROULX: Is the department still making experiments with regard to peat?

Mr. HAZEN: I do not know.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think they do work of this character. Where there is a well-founded rumour of the discovery of an important mineral, sometimes a rare mineral, like molybdenite, the Geological Survey makes investigation and assists in procuring information which might be useful to show whether the deposit would be capable of commercial development. That is one thing which occurs to me at the moment. I am not sure about structural material. The collection of mining and metallurgical statistics is, of course, perfectly obvious.

Mr. NESBITT: I quite understand the last item, but where there is a discovery of any valuable ore the commercial interests of the country will very soon find out whether it could be worked on a paying basis or not. The mining men do not depend on any one else to tell them whether it is worth their while to work it or not. They see for themselves.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not think my hon. friend has the right idea. I know something about this matter in my own province, and I can tell him that work of that character done by the Geological Survey has been worth a great deal to the people of the province. For example, in the determination of faults. In a particular district a fault will be in a particular direction and of a certain distance; in an adjoining district, under different geological conditions, the fault may be different—the push may be in a very different direction and of a different length. I am quite sure the Geological Survey of Canada in investigating that, which is only one, I dare say, of a score of features in which they have been of assistance, has rendered important service to those who come with a view to possible development. It is very important to a man who is operating a gold mine, for instance, if he strikes a fault, to know that the faults in that particular district mean a displacement for a certain distance in a certain direction.

Mr. NESBITT: I quite understand that, but the mining men themselves employ geologists to find out the nature of the faults, and where to test for them.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In Nova Scotia it has been done to a very great extent by the Geological Survey, and the service which can be given by general survey of the whole province and an examination of the differences between different districts is one that would hardly be rendered by private enterprise.

Mr. MURPHY: My right hon. friend mentioned the possibility that some of this money was expended in connection with the development of properties in which molybdenite, for instance, had been discovered.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In connection with their examination, not in connection with their development.

Mr. MURPHY: The discovery of molybdenite just north of the city of Ottawa has been rumoured. I understand the greater part of the output from that district is sold to the Imperial Munitions Board, and presumably sent out of the country. I would ask my right hon. friend if the Government has taken any action with reference to regulating the export of this mineral.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In all these matters, where the mineral is of importance for war purposes, we act in thorough co-operation with the Imperial Munitions Board. I do not know what may have been done in the particular instance to which my hon. friend refers, but we have tried to act in absolute co-operation with the Imperial Munitions Board, in order that they may be supplied with all mineral necessary for their purposes.

Mines and Geological Survey, Geological Survey Branch—For explorations, surveys and investigations, wages of explorers, draughtsmen and others, $150,000.

For publication of English and French editions of reports, maps, illustrations, etc., $65,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Are the explorations for oil begun some years ago in the peninsula of Gaspé still being carried on? I remember about twenty-one years ago a company known as the Petroleum Oil Trust controlled some twenty or twenty-two borings, and I was told by reliable people in that section, who were not interested in the syndicate, that there were indications of oil. I would like to know if the explorations have been continued by the department, and if there is any hope that those wells will be operated. Twenty-one years ago, when I first ran in Gaspé, the oil business was an important element there. The syndicate controlled some large stores, and employed several hundred people. They had even built a large refinery about five or six miles from Gaspé Basin. I remember reading in some of Dr. Dawson's early reports very favourable comments on the oil possibilities in that region. The whole district of Gaspé is rich in minerals. Quite recently, the firm which is now engaged in the reconstruction of the Parliament Buildings became the owner of a large copper mine not far from Paspebiac, in the county of Bonaventure which forms part of the peninsula of Gaspé. To my knowledge large deposits of asbestos have been found in the vicinity of Douglastown. I should be glad to know if the explorations which were very actively conducted in that district by the Government some twenty-five years ago are still being carried on.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I really could not give my hon. friend any information on that point. I am not very familiar with the administration of the department, and the acting minister is not here at the moment.

Mr. NESBITT: Is not the carrying on of the investigations provided for under the first item?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I could not tell my hon. friend. If the item is allowed to stand, we will get the information for him.

Mr. NESBITT: I think it ought to be struck out. It should be covered by the item above—"investigation of ore and other economic deposits, etc." There are two large items.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We would hardly agree to have it struck out. Let it stand.

Mr. NESBITT: There is no use in letting it stand as it will simply go through at some other time. I move that it be struck out.

Mr. DEVLIN: A careful study ought to be made of a region within close proximity to Ottawa known as the Gatineau region. Most members of this House are familiar with it. There are large mineral deposits in that region. Up to date the most productive finds have been in mica. It is perhaps the greatest mica-producing country in the world for its size. I would like to see some of this money, since it is going to be spent, directed towards mineral researches in the Gatineau region.

Mr. GERMAN: What benefit does the country derive from the expenditure of $134,620 for the Mines branch and $430,020 for the geological survey? I think that the people would be very much interested in knowing what financial benefit the country derives from this expenditure. These services get information, it is true, but that information is of no financial benefit to the country. It may enable certain interests to go in and take possession of the land. The Government do not sell the land and they have no control over it. They may acquire some information which they give to private interests and by means of which the private interests derive some advantage, but how does any advantage come to the country? As stated by my hon. friend from North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt), private interests find these things out themselves. I never could understand wherein the country was deriving any financial benefit commensurate with the very considerable expenditure that is being made from year to year on these surveys and explorations.

Mr. DEVLIN: Has any of this money been expended towards finding minerals in the Ungava region? There was a report some time ago that diamonds had been found there. There were reports that there were other mineral deposits.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I really am not in a position to answer my hon. friend about that.

Public works chargeable to capital—Ottawa Parliament Building, restoration—The plans for the said building and the method to be adopted for securing the reconstruction thereof to be subject to the approval of the Joint Committee appointed by the Prime Minister and the leader of the Opposition, $2,000,000.

Mr. NESBITT: Would the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) please give us a little information about what is being done up there? They do not allow us to go and investigate for ourselves. What room will we have?

Mr. ROGERS: We are going to have a very largely increased space, very nearly a hundred per cent more. Members will have more room. The work upon the building is getting on very satisfactorily, as I am sure hon. members will see if they will take the trouble—and I hope they will—to go up and view the work that is being done. The building is up three stories above ground and there is a story and a half to go on top of that. We expect the roof to be on this fall. We shall be able to carry on the work during the winter months.

Mr. NESBITT: Will there be plenty of accommodation for the members in the so-called office rooms?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, plenty.

Mr. NESBITT: I went to see it the other day but they would not allow me in.

Mr. ROGERS: They did not know you. You have to get a ticket. I had the same experience myself not long ago.

Mr. DEVLIN: When is it expected the building will be completed?

Mr. ROGERS: The contract has to be through by next December and I think it will be completed in the contract time.

Mr. GRAHAM: There was a rumour in the House the other day that work had partially ceased on the construction of the building. Is there any truth in that?

Mr. ROGERS: No.

Mr. GRAHAM: That a large number of men had been laid off.

Mr. ROGERS: There was some delay for want of steel; that was all.

Mr. GRAHAM: Is there any trouble in getting steel now?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, we have had a little trouble in getting steel, but it is coming forward now.

Mr. GRAHAM: Where do you get the steel?

Mr. ROGERS: Most of it from the Dominion Bridge Company.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How much has been spent so far?

Mr. ROGERS: I have not the exact amount, but I am glad to be able to say that they are keeping well within the estimate laid down by the architect.

Mr. GRAHAM: I have been through the building. I happened to be a member of a committee in connection with the commemoration of the anniversary of Confederation, and, being on that committee, I suppose, secured me a safe passage into and out of the building. I was very much interested in the work being carried on. I think the accommodation, judging from the general plan of the building, will be highly satisfactory to the members of both Houses when they come to see it in the actual construction. For myself, I never could tell anything about an architect's plan or an engineer's drawing. To me, they bring no more information than a map brings me—none at all. I have to have some other means of getting the locations and situations into my mind. But when one goes in the main entrance and looks east and west, it gives him some idea of the size of the structure. As far as I could see, I think it is a wonderfully convenient edifice for the purpose for which it is being erected. I was impressed with the stone that was being cut and prepared for the erection of the building. Where is that stone secured?

Mr. ROGERS: It is the same stone that all the buildings have been erected from. It is from the Nepean quarry about six miles out. It is from the same quarry that the original building was erected, and it is the same stone that was used in the construction of the Customs building.

Mr. GRAHAM: I suppose the minister is making sure that we shall have a proper system of ventilation.

Mr. ROGERS: We hope we are.

Mr. GRAHAM: While the appearance of the old buildings was magnificent, the ventilation was not just what it ought to have been. I am inclined to think that the lack of proper ventilation has brought ill-health to more members of the Commons than the real hard work of the session. Any building erected to-day that does not provide for proper heating, with an ample supply of fresh air, is not a success, particularly when it is to house any large number of people.

Mr. ROGERS: The committee in charge of the work have given great attention to the ventilation, and every effort is being made to make it as perfect as possible. The architect is satisfied that he has a plan that will be entirely satisfactory, and he convinced the committee that he was on the right track.

Mr. DEVLIN: Will the seating in the new chamber be on the same plan as the old one?

Mr. ROGERS: The Speaker's chair, as the plan is now laid out, may be either in the centre or at the end. My own opinion is that it should be at the end, and I think that hon. members who inspect the proposed chamber, which is partially constructed, will agree with me.

Mr. DEVLIN: There will be seating capacity for only two parties as at present?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. DEVLIN: Does the minister think that wise? There are rumours of a union Government, of a coalition Government, and of different parties. For instance, we hear of a Sifton party in the West, and of other parties. If the seats are arranged as before, there may not be proper seating capacity for all these different parties.

Mr. ROGERS: So far as I understand conditions in Canada, there are only two parties. Of course this building will not be completed for a year and a half, and probably conditions will change. You know we are getting closer all the time to the millennium, and possibly there will be only one party by the time we get into the new building.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Has the minister or the committee considered the removal of the desks and the adoption of the ground floor plan of the British House of Commons? I believe that our debates are greatly lengthened by having desks in the chamber. In England no newspapers are allowed, and no writings except such as a member can take on his knee or on his hat, and the result is that the speeches are much more concise. If the desks were abolished you would have a more compact chamber, shorter debates, and speeches more to the point.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I beg to differ with my hon. friend. Not that I care for desks, but I do not think they have the slightest influence in relation to the length of speeches. If you read the history of parliamentary eloquence in England you will find that at the beginning of last century, with Pitt and Burke and Sheridan, the speeches were long and lasted sometimes for two of three days. If you read the debate on the famous case of Warren Hastings, not the trial but the debate, in which some of the finest addresses were delivered, you will see the debates were very long. According to Lord Curzon, who lectured on the subject of parliamentary eloquence at one of the English universities, it was only in the last part of the nineteenth century that the speeches in the House of Commons became more matter-of-fact, and that the practice of making long speeches died out. To-day Asquith, Balfour, Lloyd George and all the leaders—there are no Sirs amongst them, all the leaders of parliamentary eloquence—they are very short and pithy.

Mr. NESBITT: If I have the honour to sit in the next House, I will guarantee that the desk will not lengthen my speeches, and I will suggest to my hon. friend (Mr. Guthrie) that he should move over to one of these seats beside me to-morrow and leave the desk which is now in front of him. I should like to see the desks remain.

At the close of the last session, the minister told us it would not be necessary to take down the walls of the old building. Would the minister tell us why they were taken down?

Mr. ROGERS: The walls were in such a very, very poor condition that it would be absolutely out of the question to attempt to construct a new building such as this on them. The brick was separated from the mortar, or the filling, and the stone was separated from that again, and they were standing in three different parts. It would be ridiculous to attempt to utilize those walls.

Mr. NESBITT: The hon. minister told us the walls would not come down.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes. The first report of the architect was that it would not be necessary to take them down. But when they opened them to see whether they were sound or not they decided that they must come down. We acted entirely on the advice of Messrs. Pearson, Marchand and Ewart. They were all of one opinion, and the minister has to follow the united opinion of the architects in such a matter. In fact, the condition of the walls was so bad that they did not even consult me. I was not aware of the fact that they were going to take them down until most of them were down. The necessity was so apparent to them that they did not think it necessary to consult the department. In reply to the question by the hon. gentleman from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) in regard to the seats, I may say that this is a very important matter, and one that concerns the committee very much, because we have no opinion of our own to advance as to which would be the best plan. There is sure to be difference of opinion between the members of the House, but let me say that it will not be necessary to arrive at a decision in regard to the matter of arranging the seats for some months yet. We shall probably have another session before this matter will have to be decided, and then the members of this House will have an opportunity, and, if I have charge of affairs, they will have an invitation, to come and give the matter careful consideration, because the seating of the Chamber is one which interests every individual member of the House, and all should have their say. That matter will not be settled till, probably, this time next year.

Mr. DEVLIN: When will the next session be called? Is the minister referring to the session after the general election?

Mr. ROGERS: We will have to have a session in January or February.

Mr. DEVLIN: This coming January?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM: It might be well to remember that the ministers of the Crown in the Old Land are represented in Parliament when details have to be explained, minor details particularly, by under secretaries, and the ministers can retire to their offices, go on with their work and attend to their correspondence. With us, if an item is being discussed in the House in which a minister or his department is at all interested, the minister must of necessity be in the House. I submit that both the members of the Government in Canada and the members of the House are in a somewhat different position from that occupied by a majority of the members in the British Parliament. The ministers of the Crown in Canada not only have their public duties here, but most of them have a lot of correspondence outside of that as well. The members are in the same position. I suppose there is not a man in this House who has not a business he is trying to look after, in a degree at least; and if he has a desk in the Chamber, a lot of his correspondence is signed while he is sitting here, taking part—spasmodically it may be, but yet taking part—in the business of the House. If we were to have no desks in this House, the man who is actively engaged in business, as nearly every member of this House is, would have to absent himself from the House a good deal more than he does, looking after his correspondence. Speaking for myself, I think I do twenty-five per cent of my outside business while I am in the House. I think nothing of importance escapes me. But I would be in the House much less if I had no desk before me on which I could attend to these little matters when I have a moment or two in the House, to get them off my hands. These things will have to be considered. The position of members of Parliament in Canada, including the members of the Government, is not identical with the position of the majority of the members in the British Parliament.

Mr. GERMAN: Would the hon. gentleman be good enough to satisfy the curiosity of a great many people as to why the outside decorations of the new building have not been in keeping with the old buildings that are standing there. The hon. minister knows that round the windows and doors there is a red stone, which gives a very rich and beautiful apearance. The new building is a dead white, without any relief whatever. A great many people say they would like to see it covered with something that would relieve the monotony of that dead whiteness. I should like to know why the difference exists, as between the old building and the new. I understand the red stone has been purchased. Why was it not put in? It would have made a more elegant appearance.

Mr. ROGERS: That is a matter to which we have given a great deal of attention, and we had a great deal of difficulty in deciding. I may say that I, and a few more, have held the same idea as my hon. friend, but we were overruled by every architect, and we finally called in His Royal Highness, who was very strongly against us, and ruled with the architects that the matter of a red stone around the window was not desirable or suitable, or not an improvement, but rather a detriment to the building; and it was finally decided, after many meetings, that we should take the stone that is being used to-day for reasons I have given.

Mr. GRAHAM: Where do we get the white stone?

Mr. ROGERS: I do not know. I am not sure which stone is being used around the windows. It is perhaps Ohio sandstone.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is it finally decided what stone shall be used for the interior decoration?

Mr. ROGERS: I think Tyndall stone will be arranged for the interior. We have had meetings about it, and the matter was discussed at our last meeting. We had hoped to get another kind of stone, but it was not possible to get a sufficient quantity, and the architect recommended us to go back to Tyndall stone. It is a very nice stone, and it will look very well.

Mr. GRAHAM: Will there be any residences provided for in the building?

Mr. ROGERS: We have not reached that point yet. The construction of the building is such that we could very easily place a residence at each end.

Mr. NESBITT: Cut them out.

Mr. ROGERS: That has not been decided. We are economizing as much as we can during war time, but the buildings are always open to extension in that way.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Does the hon. gentleman mean residence for the Speaker?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What has been decided regarding the library? There was a plan extending the library out to the covered walk? Has anything been changed in connection with that library?

Mr. ROGERS: No, I do not know that there has been any change. There was a plan prepared, not for an extension of the library, but of the stack room, to be built at the back of the present library at an expenditure of $250,000. We decided that, for the present at all events, we would not go on with that expenditure; that we would use the vacant space in the basement of the main building as stack rooms for the library. We tried to economize in that way, saving the estimated cost of $250,000 for the library extension.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What about the power house?

Mr. ROGERS: I do not think that we are going on with it on the far side; there was some objection to putting it near Nepean point. That was decided on some time ago.

St. John harbour improvements...	$1,000,000
Quebec harbour — dry dock at Lauzon	1,000,000
Quebec harbour—River St. Charles —improvements to navigation ...	700,000
Toronto harbour—improvements....	1,000,000
Port Arthur and Fort William— harbour and river improvements	750,000
Victoria harbour—improvements ...	1,000,000
	$5,450,000

Mr. ROGERS: This is an item about which many members may like to say something. There will be an item in the supplementary estimates upon which hon. members may discuss anything which would arise under this item.

Mr. GRAHAM: Is the work at Courtenay bay still going on?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM: Who are the contractors?

Mr. ROGERS: We have not any just now. The original contractors did not succeed; their contract has been closed, and specifications are now being prepared with a view to calling tenders immediately to finish the work. We have built several docks in West St. John; we are preparing to build dock 17 this year. We are calling for tenders also for an extension of the Negro Point breakwater. This has been recommended by all the engineers as a very necessary and desirable work in connection with the improvement of the harbour of St. John. Trouble has been experienced with the high tide and with the sea coming in at a terriffic pace; it has been found necessary, therefore, to extend the breakwater from Negro Point to the mainland. St. John harbour will then be improved in such manner as to make it almost as perfect a harbour as can be found anywhere. That is the judgment of the engineers.

Mr. NESBITT: Three of these items are revotes. Is it the minister's intention to go on with all these improvements this year?

Mr. ROGERS: We have a good deal of work to do at St. John harbour. The business there has grown more rapidly than the business at any other harbour in Canada Last year we suffered a great deal through lack of the necessary accommodation for the trade that was pressing itself upon St. John harbour, and it is necessary that certain improvements there be carried out in order to meet requirements. At Quebec harbour we are building a large dry dock which will be completed some time this autumn. There is pressing need for it; we are frequently urged by the Admiralty to hurry it up as fast as we can. Dry docks are at a premium just now, because all ships find their way into dry docks from time to time for purposes of repairs. That work will have to go on to completion. As to the Quebec harbour and River St. Charles improvements, we are trying to have that work closed down for the time being; we think we can get on without spending much more money there at present. The work at Toronto harbour is under contract; it is getting on very well. Probably the total amount will not be expended, but a reasonable amount will be required.

Mr. NESBITT: There is no rush for that.

Mr. ROGERS: We are not rushing it; we are proceeding as quietly as we possibly can. The Port Arthur and Fort William harbour improvements are very important works; there is always a demand for additional work there. Last year two or three of the grain growers organizations of Western Canada established large terminal elevators at these places, entailing a considerable cost upon the Government for the providing of the necessary dredging and breakwaters in front of the elevators. The same applies at Victoria harbour; we have done a great deal of work there. The work is practically completed; this amount will be required to finish it and to pay the balance of the contract price. We have two splendid docks there. The Munitions Board are asking us to rush immediately the erection of a large shed on one of these docks, to be used in connection with the assembling of machinery for the ships that they are constructing at that point. We are hurrying the completion of this shed as fast as we can in order that the Munitions Board may have the accommodation that they are asking for. We are allowing them the use of our docks for the very important work that they are carrying on in the construction of ships.

Mr. NESBITT: Will that shed be useful after the war?

Mr. ROGERS: Oh, yes; it will be used for storage, and that sort of thing.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is the Victoria harbour not under a commission?

Mr. ROGERS: You are thinking of Vancouver.

Mr. McKENZIE: Are fees charged in that harbour?

Mr. ROGERS: Not yet.

Mr. McKENZIE: When the war broke out we in Nova Scotia were willing to give up all our public works. We had large votes in the estimates, and even before the war began, on account of the fall in the revenue, we were advised that we should cease pressing for improvements that had been promised, or from pressing for the expenditure of money that had already been voted. We were told by the minister that large expenditures had to be dropped; that practically all public expenditures that were not absolutely necessary were to cease. Accordingly, we have not been pressing the minister for any expenditure, although some of these works are very necessary. It has been brought to the notice of the House several times that the fisheries of Canada are becoming more important every day; that fish as a food commodity is of the highest importance. In order to catch fish, ample facilities must be provided in the way of harbours, wharves and breakwaters. Facilities of that kind are very much needed in the part of the country from which I come. There was a very substantial item in the estimates of 1910 and 1911 fo the opening of a harbour at Ashby Bay in the county of Victoria. The question of the opening of that harbour was before this House and the Government for a good many years, and at last they reached the conclusion that the harbour should be opened. It would not involve the expenditure of a great deal of money, and once it was opened it would be of the greatest importance to the fisheries and the trade of the country generally. The vote was dropped some years after this Government came into power. I did not press the matter very much then, by reason of the fact that the war had broken out, and there was a fall in revenue and great need for economy. But now, the Minister of Public Works is spending large amounts of money on St. John harbour, for instance, which is an old harbour which they have got along very well with for a great many years, and I venture to think they could get along fairly well with it as it is now. Although a layman, so far as the engineering business is concerned, I wish to warn the minister that he may find he has made a very grave mistake if he expects to make a good harbour at St. John by building a breakwater across the harbour. We had a trial of that sort of thing as a protection to the entrance through the Grand Narrows in the Bras d'Or lakes. A breakwater was built with the expectation of diverting the current and getting calm water where a very rapid current used to run. A large amount of money was expended, but the result was simply to make the thing worse than it was before. I am simply warning the minister that by the building of this breakwater at St. John, the currents he disturbs may make the water more treacherous than before. I think the item providing for the expenditure of this large amount of money on an old harbour could very well stand over, and preference should be given to such places as I have mentioned, where there is crying need for improvements that could be made at comparatively small cost. If the minister would undertake this work, the fishermen, not only of my county but of the whole coast of Nova Scotia and in parts of New Brunswick, where they go for mackerel, cod and other fish, would be given a shelter that would enable them to carry on their work very much more conveniently and at a greater profit than at present.

Now that the minister is starting out to spend money, I must, in justice to that part of the country which I represent, emphasize as strongly as I can the necessity of restoring those votes in the estimates of 1910, 1911 and 1912, providing for substantial improvements of the character I have mentioned and going on with the work.

Mr. ROGERS: If my hon. friend, who says that I am undertaking new work, will only look at the item he will see that there is a reduction in it of over $2,500,000, which is an evidence that we are adhering to our policy of economy during war time, even in such important matters as the great harbours of this country. The harbours enumerated here are our national harbours. Before the outbreak of the war large contracts had been let for the purpose of improving the harbours to meet the trade requirements of the country, and the amounts here asked for are simply to carry out the contracts that were then entered into. I quite appreciate the importance of harbours such as my hon. friend has mentioned, and no one will be more pleased than I when conditions will allow me to restore any vote that is required in the interests of the fishing industry of Nova Scotia, or any other place. There was great need for additional accommodation at the harbour of St. John last winter. It is our great winter port, and the traffic has greatly increased on account of the war. New docks are urgently required. Only a few months ago several ships had to lay off the harbour awaiting their turn to dock, so great was the need for additional dockage. We hope, with the money we are here asking for, to be able to complete the docks now under way, in order to relieve the congested condition that has existed at the port of St. John for some time. In regard to the harbour of Victoria, the contract had been let and there was a pressing need for the completion of the work at the earliest possible date. I can assure my hon. friend that when the opportunity presents itself the needs of that part of the country from which he comes will not be overlooked.

10 p.m.

Mr. HAZEN: I might point out that the goods that were exported through St. John during the last winter season amounted in value to nearly $200,000,000. There has been an enormous development in the business of that port during the last two years. New wharves have been erected, but they are not yet capable of handling the tremendous business that is offering every winter. The expectation is that this winter the exports through that port will be even larger than last year, when they far exceeded the exports through the port of Boston. I want the committee to understand that the money that has been spent on these new wharves at St. John is not lost to the country. These wharves are revenue producers and when they have been completed, they are handed over to the administration of the Marine and Fisheries Department. Last year we collected at the port of St. John a revenue of something over $100,000 in round figures, and that figure will be largely increased during the present winter, and will go a long way, at 3½ per cent, towards paying the interest on the money that these wharves cost. It is absolutely necessary for the protection of these wharves that the breakwater that was built many years ago and extends from Negro Point to Partridge island, should be extended the whole way across. Otherwise the wharves would be in danger of being destroyed. I would be the last to urge the Minister of Public Works to spend the public moneys at the present time unless it was for an absolutely necessary purpose, and this particular work, as I have pointed out, is absolutely necessary in order to protect the trade of the country and to protect the investment which the country now has in the wharves which have been erected there of late years, and which are substantial revenue producers for the public exchequer. Tenders for this work had been asked for before the war broke out—before there was any idea that war would be declared.

Tenders were received after the outbreak of the war, but in view of the fact that it was felt that economy should be exercised, the deposits made by the tenderers were returned to them, and it was decided not to proceed with the work. The action of the Public Works Department in proceeding with the work now is because of the fact that it is necessary in order to protect the country's property which was constructed at an expenditure of a good many hundred thousand dollars and has been of such tremendous benefit to the trade of the country. Not only has the country spent money in developing it, but the Canadian Pacific railway, of which St. John is the terminus on the Atlantic coast, has spent a very large sum during the last two years, lengthening its sidings, extending its yard room, improving its track and roadbed, and in other respects, so that last winter it was able to handle about twenty per cent more traffic than it had been able to handle the year before. During the coming winter it will be able to take care of more still. The work is an absolute necessity if we are to maintain properly the trade facilities of the country.

Mr. McKENZIE: I quite understand that the hon. member from St. John, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, should stand up for his county and for his port. No one appreciates the enterprising people of St. John more than I do. At the same time, there is no use concealing the fact that the harbour of St. John is taxed beyond what God and nature ever intended it to be.

Mr. HAZEN: Not by any means.

Mr. McKENZIE: Practically speaking, it is not a harbour at all. It is just a sort of bay, into which the magnificent St. John river rushes, and where there is continually a battle royal between the tides of the Bay of Fundy and the rushing waters of the St. John river. That is the kind of harbour my hon. friend is trying to tame into a mill-dam for vessels to get into. We can have harbours anywhere where there is an island off the coast, if we get people generous enough to build any sort of structure between the mainland and the island, and then some extension beyond the island, but it is costing the country too much, to satisfy the ambition of my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. At the same time, I think it would be better to give more attention to places where there are harbours. I am sorry the magnificent harbour of Halifax seems to be forgotten to-night. There is also the magnificent harbour of Sydney and North Sydney, which nature intended as a harbour, but it is neglected. No attempt is made to develop a number of places where there are proper harbours, but the minister asks to spend millions of dollars to fight the tides of the Bay of Fundy and the rushing torrents of the river St. John, in order to make a harbour to please my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. HAZEN: I am very much surprised that my hon. friend, usually a well-informed man, is so much at fault regarding the geography of the Maritime Provinces, and I extend to him an invitation to come to St. John this summer, when I am at home and may have the pleasure of entertaining him. I am sure when he looks over our harbour and its possibilities, that he will—I will not say apologize,—but he will admit he was wrongly informed and making a mistake in crying down one of the great harbours of Canada. I think it is a great pity that a Nova Scotian should cry down the harbour of St. John, and I think it is a great pity that a New Brunswicker should decry the harbour of Halifax, I do not think that is the way to promote the interests of the Maritime Provinces. I think we should give credit to one another, and help one another, having more of a feeling of patriotism for our own province rather than seek to spread disunion and create discord in reflecting upon the merits of the different localities. My hon. friend is a bit of a joker, I know, and says things in a facetious way; but it is really absurd to speak as the hon. gentleman has spoken of the port which has been selected as the terminus of the Canadian Pacific railway on the Atlantic coast and from which goods to the enormous value of nearly $200,000,000 were shipped last winter. The fact I have just mentioned carries with it the refutation of what my hon. friend has said in regard to the merits of the port. I think the port of St. John has enormous possibilities, not only because of its geographical position, but because of the enterprise of the people and because of the fact that the Canadian Pacific railway, the greatest of Canadian carrying companies, has made it its terminus on the Atlantic coast, which will lead to its constant development year by year, and to an enormous increase in the traffic which will pass through it. So far as results are concerned, St. John is to-day, without question, the greatest port on the Atlantic coast.

Mr. GRAHAM: We have been asking the farmers all through the West and all through Canada to produce more in order that the Allies may be fed. One of the greatest requisites to production on the farm or anywhere is the expedition and cheapness with which those products can be shipped to the market. I notice there is nothing in these items for elevator accommodation at Quebec, Saint John, and Halifax.

Mr. REID: The hon. gentleman will remember that is in the railway estimates.

Mr. GRAHAM: I remember the railway estimates. An elevator system should be a part of the development of those harbours. The elevator system which is being constructed by the Railway Department is part of the Government railway system, as the Halifax elevator is part of the Government railway system. We are not making a concentrated effort in the development of our harbours to make them in uniformity and have them completed harbours when we are through. At the head of the Great Lakes there are a large number of elevators. On this side of the Lakes there are a large number of elevators. We have spent millions of dollars in Canada to get through lines of transportation by land. Without elevator accommodation at Quebec, Saint John, and Halifax, a portion of the year when those railway facilities could be used and navigation is closed is of no avail to us at all. At the present time, there is no means of rushing by rail the products of the West and having them stored at Quebec, say, during the winter, awaiting navigation.

Mr. HAZEN: There is a million-bushel elevator at Quebec now.

Mr. GRAHAM: But that is a small-sized elevator for the purpose required. It is only the size of the elevator at the head of the Welland canal.

Mr. COCHRANE: That is a two-million-bushel elevator.

Mr. GRAHAM: It started out as one of 500,000 bushels. The foundations were provided so that enlargement could be made, which has since been done. With a two-million-bushel elevator at the head of the Welland canal, a one-million-bushel elevator at Quebec is of minor importance. In order to encourage the farmer in the West to produce we have to complete our transportation facilities to the seaboard, otherwise there is no use building railways to the seaboard, and there is no use urging the farmer to produce because he cannot get his product to the seaboard. Then you will tell me that there is no tonnage to take it across when we get it there. I think the honourable member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), a year ago, brought up the matter, which I consider of very great importance. At that time, if the Government had taken some means of providing against what was inevitable, the loss of tonnage, and had gone on with the erection of elevators, we should have been in a magnificent position to encourage the farmers of the West to produce, because we not only could have taken their grain to the seaboard but we would have had elevators to handle it and a certain number of ships to carry it across. My honourable friend the Minister of the Naval Service (Mr. Hazen) informed us to-day that the shipyards of Canada were largely engaged in building ships of various capacities for the Imperial Government. It is our duty to do that but we ought not to leave the other undone. I believe, as much as I believe anything, that the whole country would have been well served, and perhaps better served, if we had set the shipbuilding capacity of Canada to work constructing ships a year or two ago for Canada herself, either through private or Government enterprise; because at that time when the submarine menace was becoming very serious we might have looked sufficiently far ahead to realize that one of the difficulties of our Allies would be to get their food supply, through lack of tonnage. Even at this moment, because we do not know when the war is going to cease, it would not be out of place for the Dominion Government to utilize certain of the shipbuilding establishments for the construction of vessels for ourselves to carry the products of the country overseas. The United States is doing a good deal in this way but she is not doing it for us; she is doing is for herself and the Allies. The links in our transportation system are altogether lacking when we have not elevator facilities at the seaboard and when we do not seem to be making any provision to secure tonnage to carry our products overseas.

Mr. ROGERS: In so far as giving consideration to the carriage of the products of the farmers is concerned, I think the Government can reasonably claim that they have taken a very great interest in matters of that kind. With respect to the question of elevators, we have built for the producers of western Canada large interior elevators which are of great benefit. We have also established a Government terminal elevator at Fort William and we have established practical control of all the elevators at that terminal, which control is sufficient to regulate all the conditions incident to the transport of our grain through the elevators at that point. My hon. friend quite appreciates, I am sure, that so far as the producer of western Canada is concerned, he is almost entirely dependent upon the elevator space at Fort William and Port Arthur. The space at the points named is quite sufficient at present to take care of the trade of western Canada. I quite appreciate the importance of additional elevator space at the seaboard, at such points as St. John and Halifax, but I do not see that any special purpose can be served by additional elevator space at Quebec, for example. Quebec is only a summer port, and any grain stored in an elevator at Quebec in the fall, or at the close of navigation, would have to remain there until navigation opened in the spring. It would be of very little importance in the matter of the placing of grain whether it was at Quebec or at Port Arthur or Fort William. By placing it at Quebec you would probably have the long rail haul which would make it very expensive to the producer, and I do not think it would be a point at which additional elevator space would be particularly necessary. There is no doubt that we should have additional elevator space at St. John but the Canadian Pacific have already a large elevator there and the Government have erected one in connection with the Intercolonial railway. If my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane) is assured that there is a pressing need for elevator space at a point of that kind, I am sure he will meet the requirements as soon as it is possible for him to do so.

Mr. ROBB: For many years the Canadian people have been spending millions of dollars deepening harbours and building docks at different ports, not only on the Great Lakes but on the seaboard, and whenever a harbour has been completed or a splendid dock erected, with possibly great elevators for the storage of grain and sheds for facilitating the handling of the products of the farms, we discover that some privately-owned railway controls the right of way along the docks and this railway, in its selfishness, places all sorts of obstructions against other railways. It would be well that every precaution should be taken to see to it that the nation shall own the right of way and the railway tracks to all harbours in Canada and provide for running arrangements so that privately owned railways shall be able to receive and discharge freight on these docks without being hampered by another privately owned road which would naturally look after its own business. Is the minister making provision for this in the new works that are going on at these harbours not only on the Great Lakes but on the sea coast?

Mr. ROGERS: I do not know to what points my hon. friend makes particular reference when he says that privately owned railway companies are in possession of the right of way and obstruct others from getting access to the harbour, where the work has been constructed by the Government. Now that we have a Railway Commission, it has full power and authority to deal with and regulate any conditions such as my hon. friend suggests. If there is any particular point at which the difficulty that he mentions exists, I am sure it will only be necessary to bring it to the attention of the Railway Commission. If the Railway Commission has not sufficient power to regulate such a condition, if the complaint is genuine, as I am sure it is or my hon. friend would not have mentioned it, then I can assure him that the Government will be only too glad to take it up and find a remedy in some form or other.

Mr. ROBB: I have no special reference to any particular port or railway. I think it is generally admitted that this has been the policy for years, and everybody in the trade knows that a railway is always able to hamper other railways, notwithstanding the efforts of the Railway Commission.

Mr. ROGERS: Of course they will do that if they can.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Have the works at River St. Charles been resumed?

Mr. ROGERS: Owing to the policy of economizing as much as possible, a portion of the work under the existing contract is being delayed, but a portion has been resumed; that is the providing of a bridge across the river, which was necessary, and preparation for the erection of a shipbuilding plant under the programme of the Imperial Munitions Board, which awarded contracts for the erection of four ships to parties at Quebec. The board have been in communication with the Department of Public Works for some time with a view to getting a piece of ground which we had expropriated there, for the purpose of establishing a shipbuilding plant.

Mr. GERMAN: Representations have been made to the minister in connection with a public building for a post office and custom house at Thorold, and I was given to understand there was to be something in the estimates for that purpose. Thorold is a growing town, with large numbers of extensive factories, and the post office facilities are absolutely inadequate for the public service. It is almost imperative that there should be a public building there for post office and customs purposes. I trust the minister will have something in the supplementary estimates for this and will at least make a beginning this year, even if he does not have money enough to complete the enterprise.

Mr. ROGERS: I should be very glad to accommodate my hon. friend but, in view of the existing conditions, I am afraid it will be impossible, especially as I have not one single new item in the estimates.

Mr. GERMAN: What about the Cardinal building?

Mr. ROGERS: That is the only one, and it was arranged for previous to the change of policy of the Government. When we come to the next item I hope my hon. friend will give me credit for practising economy in the construction of public buildings. I hope the day is not far distant when we shall be able to accommodate my hon. friend at Thorold.

Mr. McKENZIE: In the Island of Cape Breton there are quite a number of telegraph lines owned by the Government, and they are very useful institutions, serving an excellent purpose in many sections where there are no other telegraph lines. I understood it was the intention of the department to change these telegraph offices into telephone offices. Is that so? And have any been converted?

Mr. ROGERS: It was the desire to make many changes along that line, but they have not been made up to date because we have been keeping down expenses and putting off the work from time to time.

In the Supplementary estimates we are making some extensions in Cape Breton, and I shall be very glad, when the deputy is here, to give any information that is available in the department in reference to the telegraph system of the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. McKENZIE: In the county of Inverness there is practically a new line running from Margaree through lake Ainslie into Whycocomagh and on, connecting with the Intercolonial at Orangedale. It is quite a lengthy line and very serviceable indeed. This place called Lake Ainslie is my birthplace, and I am quite familiar with the conditions there. There is a settlement about ten miles along the east side of this beautiful lake, and I think they have only one office in the ten miles. There has been a good deal of negotiation back and forth in the effort to get another office. There is a place of resort and a fishing place called Trout Brook, where there is a little hotel, and where many people go, and a telegraph office near that point would be a great convenience and would be of great public service. The minister might inquire as to some of his friends who might get the office there; I am not seeking for patronage, but only want to see that this public convenience is put in the most central place in that part of the county, particularly on account of the great number of strangers who go there and sometimes desire to communicate with the outside world. The nearest telegraph office would be at Whycocomagh or the first telegraph office on the other side of this place at three miles down. It is not a matter of very great expense, and I wish the minister would make a note of it and see that something is done.

Mr. ROGERS: I think I had this matter before me two or three days ago, and on the recommendation of the officers of the department some action was taken—just exactly what it was I have no idea—with a view of meeting the necessity which appears to exist, which my hon. friend describes. I shall be glad to take a note of it, and get the details.

In reference to item 142, "Public Works—Miscellaneous—$936,641.50," hon. gentlemen will find a reduction of eleven or twelve millions, so they will see how full of economy we are, in reducing the expenditure during war time. This item was passed the other day.

Life saving stations, including rewards for saving life, $125,400.

Mr. GRAHAM: How many of these on the Pacific, and how many on the Atlantic?

Mr. HAZEN: In British Columbia, four; Ontario, ten; New Brunswick, four; Nova Scotia, fifteen; Quebec, one, and Prince Edward Island, five.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Might I renew my humble request that life-saving stations be established around Gaspé?

Mr. HAZEN: I will be glad to make a note of the suggestion.

Progress reported.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Rogers, the House adjourned at 10.40 p.m.

Tuesday, August 7, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

COMMITTEE TO REVISE RULES GOVERNING DIVORCE.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN moved:

That the following members be appointed a special committee to consider and report on the desirability of revising the Rules and Regulations governing the granting of divorce, and if, in the opinion of the committee, a revision is advisable, to submit to the House such amendments as are deemed necessary, and that the committee be empowered to meet in joint sittings with a like committee of the Senate: Messrs. Boyce, Maclean (Halifax), Northrup, Pugsley, and Steele.

Motion agreed to.

SALE AND USE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

BILL IN AID OF PROVINCIAL LEGISLATION INTRODUCED.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 121, to amend "An Act in aid of provincial legislation prohibiting or restricting the sale or use of intoxicating liquors."

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Explain.

Mr. DOHERTY: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this Bill is to make certain amendments to the Act which was passed at the last session of the House in aid of provincial legislation prohibiting or restricting the sale or use of intoxicating liquors. There are five provisions. The first is merely to reinstate in the Act a clause which was in it as it passed this House and which was struck out by the Senate. That clause provided that for an offence under the Act the party accused could be tried either at the place whence he sent the liquor in contravention of the Act, or within the province into which he sent that liquor. The Senate amended the Bill by striking out the provision permitting of a charge being brought against a person in the province into which the liquor was sent.

The second provision authorizes the seizure of liquors in connection with charges made of violation of the Act. The Act as it stands provides that liquor, in regard to which any such offence has been committed, may upon the conviction of the party accused, be confiscated. But it has been found in practice that the provision was defeated by reason of the disappearance of the liquor between the laying of the charge and the obtaining of the conviction.

It is proposed that there should be power to seize the liquor and hold it pending the determination of the charge.

The third provision is to supplement provincial legislation prohibiting the circulation of advertising matter seeking to promote the sale of liquor. The proposed clause prohibits sending through the mails into or within any province advertising matter looking to the sale of liquor, the circulation of which is forbidden by the provincial law. Certain provinces have enacted legislation prohibiting the circulation of such literature and it was thought that it would only be proper that the post office should not carry matter in violation of a provincial law.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Does that cover an advertisement in a newspaper?

Mr. DOHERTY: It covers any advertising circulated in any form provided the legislation of the province itself prohibits that sort of advertising. It is a general provision supplementing and protecting provincial legislation.

Mr. MARCIL: Will this prevent an Ontario house advertising in Quebec papers?

Mr. DOHERTY: As far as circulation in Quebec is concerned, this law would not touch it unless the provincial legislature of Quebec prohibited the circulation of such advertising. But if a province, say the province of Ontario, prohibits the circulation within the province of advertisements looking to the sale of liquor, this Act will make it an offence for any one to use the mails to send these advertisements into that province, or to use the mails for the purpose of circulating them in that province. It is following up the principle of the measure that, where a province prohibits a thing in the exercise of its power, the legislation enacted will protect that provincial legislation from being violated from an outside source.

Sir SAM HUGHES: It would prevent an English or American paper, or a paper from any other province, containing an advertisement of that character, from coming into the province of Ontario without contravening the provincial law?

Mr. DOHERTY: If the provincial legislature forbids the circulation of such advertising, then this law will prohibit the use of the post office to send such literature in. The next clause is introduced at the request of a large number of persons interested in temperance. It provides for the suspension of the Scott Act wherever it is in force in counties upon the petition for an election, but without an election, in all cases where there is in force in that province legislation prohibiting the sale of liquor which in the judgment of the Governor in Council is not less restrictive than the Scott Act. This is in response to a very widely expressed desire on the part of those who are interested in the temperance movement.

Finally, there is a provision to avoid a clash which it has been pointed out exists between a provision in the Proprietary or Patent Medicines Act and the prohibitory laws of certain provinces. The Proprietary and Patent Medicines Act contains a provision imposing a penalty for the fabrication or sale, under the names of patent or proprietary medicines, of preparations containing certain quantities of alcohol. It appears that the courts have held that by reason of that provision, even though the so-called patent medicine may be clearly an alcoholic beverage, as prohibited by the provincial legislation, that clause in the Proprietary and Patent Medicines Act, the Act being Dominion legislation, superseded the provincial legislation. It is proposed by this clause, inserted in the present Bill, to enact that any of the penalties imposed by the Proprietary and Patent Medicines Act shall be in addition to, and not in substitution for, any penalty provided under provincial legislation for the sale of the same article, treating it as the sale of liquor for a beverage.

Sir SAM HUGHES: What is the penalty, under that advertising section, in case a person should happen to address a paper innocently to a friend in Ontario? Would the party sending it, or the friend in Ontario receiving it, be liable?

Mr. DOHERTY: The penalty is not less than ten dollars and not exceeding one hundred dollars or imprisonment on any person who, by his clerk, his servant or agent, or any person who as servant or clerk or agent, etc., sends or attempts to send through His Majesty's mail, to or from or within the province, advertising matter the circulation whereof is forbidden by the law of the province.

Sir SAM HUGHES: How would you get at an American citizen who sends such matter into Canada through the mail?

Mr. DOHERTY: I cannot devise any criminal law that will apply to people in the United States. It is not within our legislative jurisdiction.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CONFLAGRATION OF PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS.

LOSSES INCURRED BY SOME MEMBERS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. ROCH LANCTOT (translation): Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should desire to hear from the Government when they intend to bring down the report asked several weeks ago, about the losses incurred by some members at the time of the fire that destroyed the Parliament buildings.HrdI

Mr. DOHERTY: Any provision to meet claims of that sort would require to be dealt with in the supplementary estimates, the question of what claims, if any, should be recognized, and to what extent there should be compensation, is presently receiving consideration.

MILITARY SERVICE BILL—LOCATION OF TRIBUNALS, ETC.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): I desire to announce to the House, for the information of hon. members, that there is and will be in attendance in the office of the Solicitor General, room 260 of this building, an officer of the Department of Justice, for the purpose of receiving information which any members of the House may desire to give with regard to conditions in their respective localities which may be useful to enable us to facilitate, in the carrying out of the Military Service Act, ready resort to the proper tribunal of any persons interested in presenting themselves. It is necessary to provide the proper number of tribunals and to determine their locations, and we feel that nobody better than a member of this House, is in a position to give us information as to the particular conditions in each locality which might necessitate a large or small number of tribunals, and which also might affect the places at which it would be desirable to locate these tribunals. We shall appreciate it very much if hon. members will take pains to put at the disposal of this officer local information of which they are possessed. I think it will be recognized that it will be in the interests of their respective constituents that means should be afforded, in the administration of this Act, to meet, so far as may be possible, the reasonable requirements of each locality.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Who is the officer?

Mr. DOHERTY: Mr. Plaxton.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Would the minister repeat what information is desired? Is it simply geographical information?

Mr. DOHERTY: All information of any kind that would be helpful in determining how many tribunals would be required to meet the reasonable convenience of the population and also as to the location of tribunals that would most readily lend itself to the convenience of the population. We would be glad to have any information in regard to local conditions that would make it easier to adjust arrangements so that they would be convenient to the people affected by the Act.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I do not want to interfere, but I think it is quite undignified to ask a member of parliament to go around and call on any clerk or officer, no matter how distinguished he may be. It is the duty of the clerk to hunt up a member of parliament if he wants information concerning a riding. If this officer wants any information concerning my riding, I shall be very glad to give him that information if he calls on me.

DR. BRUCE'S REPORT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. MURPHY: Has the Prime Minister or the Government received an answer from Sir George Perley as to the Bruce report?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We have received a cablegram from Sir George Perley.

Mr. MURPHY: When may we expect to receive the report?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not know whether the hon. gentleman will receive the report or not. The Government have not come to a conclusion to lay the so-called report upon the table of the House. In any event, we shall not lay it upon the table of the House until the communication which Sir George Perley says he has posted has arrived.

Mr. MURPHY: The right hon. gentleman may have noticed a cable message published in yesterday's Montreal Gazette referring to the fact that Sir George Perley has said he had sent the report and going on to detail what purported to be an outline of its contents, so that there is nothing very private about it.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not know anything about that.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Sir George Perley has seen fit to go on and answer certain data which I presume are found in Colonel Bruce's report on the Babtie Commission, so I think it very strange that the House is not permitted to have it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member is not in order in discussing the subject.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I am perfectly in order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is not in order.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I am entitled to ask why—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Discussion is not in order; there is no motion before the House.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I can surely ask a question. I desire to ask the Government why Sir George Perley has purported to publish to the world an answer to the Babtie report without communicating it to the House.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am not aware that Sir George Perley has done anything of the kind.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Somebody has done it.

EXCHANGE OF PRISONERS OF WAR.

THE POSITION OF HON. MR. BELAND.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX: I notice in the press a statement that there has been an agreement for the exchange of prisoners between the British and the German Governments. I do not know if my right hon. friend the Prime Minister has read that agreement, which is published in the press. What I am anxious to know is if, under that agreement, there is any hope that our colleague, Dr. Béland, may be released or exchanged.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There is always hope. My hon. friend knows that on every possible occasion effort has been made to secure the release of Dr. Beland, but up to the present without success. Under the new arrangement which has been alluded to it may be possible to accomplish something. In view of the new arrangement that has been entered into, I shall direct the attention of the British Government to his case.

MINISTER OF OVERSEAS MILITARY FORCES AND PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES.

INTRODUCTION OF RESOLUTION FOR THEIR APPOINTMENT.

On the motion of Sir Robert Borden, the House went into committee on the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to provide for the appointment of a Minister of the Overseas Military Forces, a Parliamentary Secretary of the Department of Militia and Defence, and a Parliamentary Under Secretary of State for External Affairs, and that the salary of the said minister be $7,000 per annum, and that the salaries of the said Parliamentary Secretary and of the said Parliamentary Under Secretary be $5,000 per annum. The said offices to continue during the war and until the end of the session of Parliament held next after the war, or, if Parliament is sitting when the war ends, then until the end of such session of Parliament.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The documents relating to this resolution have been laid on the Table.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I must respectfully ask that hon. members speak a little louder. I have not heard a word uttered by the Chairman or by the minister.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I am sorry the ex-Minister of Militia has not heard what the Prime Minister stated, because he has already expressed himself on this question, and pronounced himself against it. There are three propositions involved in this resolution. I think, perhaps, it would have been better if they had been kept separate, instead of being bulked together. One proposition is for the creation of a second Minister of Militia, to reside in England. Another is to appoint a parliamentary under secretary for the Department of Militia and Defence, and the third proposition is to appoint a parliamentary under secretary for external affairs. It provides that the salary of the minister shall be $7,000 per annum and the salaries of the under secretaries $5,000 each. Here are three distinct motions, to create three different offices.

Let us take them separately. The proposition to create a second Minister of Militia seems to be one of very questionable wisdom. We are to have two heads of the Department of Militia, one residing in London and one residing in Ottawa. The matter was discussed between the Prime Minister and the ex-Minister of Militia when the latter was in office, and the judgment of the ex-Minister of Militia, was very strongly pronounced against the creation of the second office. I believe the conclusion arrived at by my hon. friend (Sir Sam Hughes) was absolutely correct. It is impossible for me to conceive why there should be a second head of the Militia Department. There must be confusion, there must be delay, and instead of expediting business, result must be the very reverse. We have this very day a case in point. We have had as hon. gentlemen know, a report sent in by Dr. Bruce in answer to a report which has been before the House for a long time. Last year the ex-Minister of Militia, when he was in office very properly I believe, appointed Dr. Bruce to examine into the conditions of the military hospitals in Great Britain. Everybody remembers that just twelve months ago the newspapers were filled with complaints against the treatment of our wounded in the military hospitals of Great Britain. Although I followed the matter pretty closely at the time, I could not understand what the nature of the complaint was, but I knew, and everybody knew, that there was dissatisfaction. My hon. friend the ex-Minister of Militia very properly tried to have the matter cleared up, and he appointed one of the most eminent surgeons in Canada, Dr. Bruce, to look into the matter. Dr. Bruce went into the matter very thoroughly, and made a report. The report was not given to us in Canada, but it was given circulation in Great Britain, and it became at once the subject of very severe comment in the press of Great Britain, for what reason it was impossible to conceive.

Another commission was then appointed to investigate the investigation which had been made by Dr. Bruce, and so we had the Babtie report. That report condemns Dr. Bruce in many respects, but it agrees with him in sveral things, and the disagreement, after all, was only confined to one or two matters. Upon everything else the Babtie report confirmed the judgment pronounced by Dr. Bruce. The report dealt especially with what is known as the segregation of wounded and sick in the hospitals. Dr. Bruce thought it advisable, and rightly so, I believe, to propose a review of this report. It is to be borne in mind that the committee of investigation never heard Dr. Bruce, never gave him opportunity to reply, and never called upon him to give his views or state the reasons why he had come to his conclusion. He was condemned ex parte. Dr. Bruce very properly, under such conditions, thought he should state his own view of the case, and he made a rejoinder to the report of the Babtie Committee. We have this spectacle at the present time—the report was made here to the Minister of Militia; the Minister of Militia in Ottawa sent it to the Minister of Militia in Great Britain, and so we cannot have from the Government a decision upon a matter of such moment as whether or not a report of that kind shall be communicated to Parliament. In my humble judgment, all these reports should have been communicated to Parliament without any comment at all, or without any demand being made for them. This is a matter which specially concerns Parliament. It cannot be said that these reports should not be communicated to Parliament because they were of such nature that their publication might be prejudicial to the service. No information detrimental to the service could be given to the enemy by these reports. The enemy could not possibly get any information which would be serviceable in military operations from anything that is contained in this report. All that is contained in the report is simply a statement as to the treatment which our wounded and our sick received in the hospitals in Great Britain.

Why, therefore, is this report not communicated to Parliament? We were told the other day by the Minister of Militia that this report had been sent to Sir George Perley, the Minister of Militia Overseas, and that without the consent of Sir George Perley we cannot have it. There you have at once a conflict of authority. I understood from the Minister of Militia the other day that he had no objection to communicating the report to Parliament, but he thought that it should be sent here through Sir George Perley. Sir George Perley has it; he has been communicated with, and so far as we can gather from the answer given to-day by the Prime Minister, he has not even given an opinion as to whether this report should be submitted to Parliament. Parliament, therefore, is blocked in its work by the fact that we have a second Minister of Militia who is to-day in Great Britain.

I do not see what advantage can result from our having two heads of the Militia Department, one here and one on the other side of the ocean. The Minister of Militia is responsible to this Parliament. Another Minister of Militia, sitting in Great Britain, is responsible also to this Parliament. What control has Parliament over him? If the Department of Militia is to be properly administered, the gentleman who holds the office of minister should sit in this House. It is unheard of; it cannot conduce to good administration, to have a Minister of Militia who does not sit in this House. The gentleman who administers the Department of Militia, or any other department, should be a member of the Senate or of the House of Commons, sitting each day in his place, ready at all times to give information and to account for the business with which he is entrusted. I may be told: you must have somebody in England to look after militia affairs. Certainly, you must. The gentleman who should be in England to represent the Militia Department should be an officer of that department, responsible directly to the Minister of Militia, who, in turn, is responsible to Parliament. Take the case of the administration of the fighting forces in Europe. The general in charge of the British army fighting in France is responsible to a minister, who is responsible to Parliament. A condemnation of this new proposal of my right hon. friend is found in the fact that we have two ministers of the Department of Militia, one here, from whom we can get no information and answers to any questions that may be put, and one in England, from whom we cannot get information in relation to a matter of such moment as that to which I have referred.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The right hon. gentleman continually comes back to the report of Dr. Bruce, whatever subject may be under discussion by Parliament. He entirely overlooks the fact that since Colonel Bruce's report was made there has been an entire reorganization of the army medical service overseas. That service is now under the direct control of General Foster, of whom I spoke yesterday. General Foster is the Director of Medical Service so far as the Canadian Expeditionary Force in Great Britain and France is concerned. The management, therefore, which was the subject of Colonel Bruce's report and animadversion has been changed in the meantime, and I have not heard any criticism of the management or administration of General Foster since he took charge. So far as the comment of Colonel Bruce is concerned, I have explained over and over again that in the ordinary course it should have gone to the Minister of Overseas Service, because it related to matters which are under his jurisdiction. The jurisdiction is not common to the Minister of Militia and Defence and the Minister of Overseas Service. The jurisdiction was divided, just as in Great Britain the ministry of munitions took over part of that jurisdiction which had previously been exercised by the Secretary of State for War, and just as the ministry of shipping in Great Britain has taken over part of the jurisdiction formerly appertaining to another department.

I could name twelve, fourteen, perhaps twenty different instances in Great Britain where a part of the jurisdiction of one department was transferred to another department, for the very simple reason that the exigencies of the war demanded it.

Mr. MARCIL: Do these new ministers sit in the British House of Commons?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think that nearly all are members of the House, but they do not pretend to sit in the House all the time. Sir George Perley is a member of this House. He cannot be here and at the same time attend to his duties overseas; questions have to be answered here on his behalf. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) informs me that Sir Joseph Maclay, Minister of Shipping, is not a member of Parliament in Great Britain. Sir Joseph Maclay has direction of all matters respecting the providing of shipping. He directs where it shall be employed; whether it shall be employed on the Atlantic or on the Pacific; whether it can be most usefully employed in transportation between Great Britain and Australia and New Zealand, between Great Britain and Canada and the United States, or between Great Britain and Argentine. He has under his direction the building of additional shipping, not only in Great Britain, but in all parts of the world. He has an exceedingly important jurisdiction. One of our last duties in our recent visit to Great Britain was to confer with him.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: He does not sit in Parliament, but he must be responsible to some minister who does sit in Parliament. He cannot be independent; I am sure of that.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: So far as that is concerned, Sir George Perley, as I have already mentioned, is a member of and is responsible to this Parliament.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: At long range.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It is true that he does not happen to be here. But the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, although a member of Parliament, does not attend all the sittings of Parliament. He goes there only on very exceptional occasions.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Oh, he does attend.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I beg my right hon. friend's pardon. An arrangement was made under which Mr. Bonar Law, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, was appointed leader in the House of Commons, with the direct intention, which has been carried out very fully, that the leader of the Government should not be burdened with parliamentary duties, but that he should direct the whole of his time and energies to matters concerned with the carrying on of the war. He does go there on important occasions, but very rarely indeed. While we were in Great Britain, during more than two months I do not think that he went to the House of Commons half a dozen times. The leadership of the House of Commons is carried on by Mr. Bonar Law, not by the leader of the Government.

As far as the remaining criticism of my right hon. friend is concerned, I do not know that it calls for any answer at the present time. The duties which have been imposed upon the Minister of Overseas Service are very considerable; his jurisdiction is complete with regard to the troops that are overseas. He reports to Council through the Prime Minister; the reports that he makes are submitted to the Minister of Militia and Defence in order that Council may have the benefit of the suggestions of the Minister of Militia and Defence with regard to any recommendations so made. There has been no friction; there has been no difficulty, so far as I am aware, and I think the system has worked out very well.

Mr. MARCIL: What is the object of having a Minister of Militia and Defence overseas? The Overseas Minister must report to the minister here so that his recommendations may reach Council. Why would not a deputy minister in England responsible to the Minister of Militia here serve the purpose?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We did not think that would serve the purpose as well as a Minister of Militia overseas.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My right hon. friend states that a Minister of Shipping has been appointed in England. I am not aware of the circumstances of this new creation. There may be such an officer there, but I am satisfied that if he is not a member of one branch or the other of the British Parliament, he is serving under a minister who is responsible to Parliament, who sits in Parliament and answers for him. Without knowing the circumstances, I am satisfied of that. My right hon. friend is surely not serious in comparing the position of Sir George Perley as Minister of Militia overseas with that of Mr. Lloyd George, Prime Minister of England. When Mr. Lloyd George became Prime Minister and reorganized the Government, he divested himself of many of the duties which hitherto appertained to the Premiership. He has not undertaken to lead the House himself, having handed over that duty to Mr. Bonar Law, who is to-day the leader of the House and who attends to all the business of the House, because some member of the Government must be in the House to look after the business of the House generally, and, if needs be, to support before the House the policies of the Government. Although Mr. Lloyd George has to a large extent divested himself of the burdens appertaining ordinarily to the Premiership of Great Britain, still he is the Prime Minister and a member of the British House of Commons, and when some great occasion arises he comes to Parliament to explain the policy of the Government and to lead the House. Is my right hon. friend going to compare Mr. Lloyd George's position with that of Sir George Perley? It is true that Sir George Perley has been elected a member of this House, and that he can sit here at any time, but for all the practical purposes of his appointment as Minister of Militia overseas, he does not sit in this House, and under those circumstances there would be confusion. This appointment, so far from working with advantage, would, I think, work with great disadvantage, and a better way would be to make the position the same as that of the new Minister of Shipping, Mr. Maclay, who serves under a minister who is responsible for him in the British House of Commons.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not understand why my right hon. friend attributes to my remarks some meaning which I did not at all intend to convey. I understood my right hon. friend to raise the objection that Sir George Perley was not here to answer questions. In reply I pointed out to him that even a gentleman so directly responsible as the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom has found it necessary, for the purposes of this war, to divest himself almost wholly of his parliamentary duties and to hand those duties over to another member of Parliament. I was drawing the conclusion that, under our present conditions a minister of the overseas forces should stay at his post in Great Britain and devote himself to his duties there instead of coming here to discharge duties in this House. I was not comparing their relative positions. I was comparing the two facts that in both cases there was urgent need; in the one case that the Prime Minister should relieve himself of his parliamentary duties, and in the other case, as we think, that the Minister of Overseas Service should devote himself to his duties on the spot in Great Britain and not cross the seas, leaving those duties to take care of themselves, and sit in this House to answer questions.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Would the Prime Minister explain to the House what the functions of the overseas Minister of Militia may be, what those of the Minister of Militia in Canada may be, wherein they harmonize, and wherein they clash?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: They do not clash at all; they harmonize in every respect. The Order in Council already laid on the Table defines the duties of the Minister of Militia for Overseas Service. He assumes a part of the jurisdiction formerly exercised by the Minister of Militia and Defence. He assumes in respect of the Canadian forces overseas the duties which had been previously exercised in respect of that force by the Minister of Militia and Defence.

Mr. MARCIL: If Sir George Perley is to receive a salary from the day of his appointment, he will be violating the independence of Parliament Act because, having accepted an office of emolument under the Crown, he should vacate his seat in this House and return to his constituents to seek re-election. Does the salary date from the date of his appointment or from the date of the closing of this House?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The point raised by my hon. friend is provided for in the Bill to be founded on this resolution, and we have in regard to it numerous precedents in Great Britain since the war began.

Mr. MARCIL: Are there precedents in the cases of the other two appointments?

Sir SAM HUGHES: I have no objection whatever to the portion of this resolution referring to the Parliamentary Secretary for Militia and the Parliamentary Under-Secretary for External Affairs, and I shall be only too pleased to assist in the passing of the resolution as regards them. Their appointment is a very good idea.

I object, however, to the appointment of a Minister of the Overseas Military Forces, to be stationed in England, not only on the ground of the administrative character of the office, but on the ground of the manner in which it is being conducted. In the first place, we have the fact that although the second Bruce report in answer to the Babtie report has not yet been laid on the table of the House, we have a commentary upon it published yesterday in England by Sir George Perley. This report should be withheld until this House is in possession of it. From Sir George Perley's admissions yesterday, we have for the first time a clear idea of what the Militia Department has been up against so far as that gentleman as High Commissioner is concerned. From the outset of this war, Sir George Perley has taken the stand that Canada is in the position of a Crown colony and that we should have no right, nor recognition, nor control, over our troops beyond the seas, other than what may be accorded to us by the British War Office. Since 1914, Sir George Perley took the position that I, as Minister of Militia of Canada, had nothing whatever to say or to do in connection with the troops in England, and that any arrangements from a military viewpoint were absolutely under the control of the British War Office. The letting of contracts, purchases for the troops, the establishment of the V.A.D. hospitals and matters of that kind, of course, would be arranged, as they evidently, according to the report published yesterday, have been arranged, through Sir George Perley's influence with the British authorities.

The findings of the Bruce report of a year ago have been more than justified by reason of the fact that the V.A.D. hospitals in England are being practically wiped out to-day by the British medical authorities themselves. In fact, they are no longer in existence, orders having been issued that they are all to be congregated together and run as proper hospitals. I think the statement has been made that they will contain not less than 500 beds in place of the small number they used to contain, and I understand that the control is to be entirely different. As I have said, I have no objection whatever to this resolution, provided the Department of Militia overseas is left under the control of the Department of Militia in this country. There is no use shutting our eyes to the facts. There is not a member of this House who has had dealings with the Militia Department since Sir Edward Kemp took control who has not felt sorry for that gentleman on account of the humiliating position which he has been obliged to take again and again in connection with military matters.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Oh, no.

Sir SAM HUGHES: He has no say in these matters. I understand that he has been reprimanded repeatedly for presuming to ask certain questions of those in control across the sea. He bears it all with very good grace, but there is not one of us who has not realized the humiliating position in which he has been placed. I would sometimes write a letter to the department for some mother asking for information about her son, and would receive a printed reply saying, "We understand from Sir George Perley's Office that so and so," and I would be told to proceed under such and such a section of the Act, and in the course of a year or two I might get the desired information.

But apart from the personal element, there is also this fact: Officers sail from this country under pay, under discipline, under an allowance and under the administration of the Department of Militia in this country, but when they get to the other side they are subjected to an entirely different set of conditions. For instance, the Minister of Militia here, no matter what his knowledge of an officer may be, has no say in promoting him once he gets across the water. There is another very serious objection—I am giving these objections very briefly—and that is the tremendous expense involved. The statement is made that whereas General Carson administered the whole of Canada's war department in England with less than 50 men, and did it well, despite the fact that Sir George Perley attempted to thwart him at every turn by interfering, there are now 1,200 to 1,500 men, not counting the pay officers, doing the work of the Adjutant General's office and other offices. In fact, I understand that only about 30 men were employed by General Carson for this work. I challenge any member of this House who has taken a battalion overseas to stand up in his place and say that he has received satisfactory treatment from the Overseas Militia Office in England.

4 p.m.

Without going into details, I would simply point out that this division of the work is contrary to the principle of responsible government. There would not be the same objection if something similar to the plan of the British Government in respect of munitions had been followed; they have a minister in charge in England, and representatives in this country looking after certain work. There was also some justification for turning over the work of letting contracts to the War Purchasing Commission, because whatever difference of opinion there may have been as to the best form of administration, the administration by committees of the Privy Council was certainly very unsatisfactory, and the appointment of the Commission was a step that no serious objection could be taken to. But to divide the responsibility as is proposed by this resolution, to give control in Canada to one minister, and then for the troops to come under the control of the Overseas Minister of Militia immediately they arrive in England, is doing something which from a constitutional standpoint is quite illogical, and as to the working out of it I challenge any one to prove that the plan has worked satisfactorily. There is not a member of Parliament who knows how the department has been administered who has not stated over and over again, publicly and privately, that the plan has been very unsatisfactory, and the officers who have gone overseas have not hesitated for a moment to speak out in regard to this matter. The Prime Minister knows what is contained in the reports. At all events, gentlemen who know what the conditions are in England have no hesitation in giving their opinion publicly as to the administration of Sir George Perley and of the dual ministry of Militia.

Mr. MARCIL: Were the 1,200 men that my hon. friend speaks of appointed under the Civil Service Act, and what salaries are they paid?

Sir SAM HUGHES: I don't know anything about that. They are under the Militia Department, but I cannot say whether their appointments are civil or military.

I certainly cannot see why the Bruce report in answer to the Babtie charges has not been published; but that is neither here nor there. As it has not been published, I certainly think it was a strange proceeding on the part of Sir George Perley to seek to answer it in advance in the press of England yesterday. I will not say that his statement was given to his subsidized press, who have been sending out a continual stream of reports from his office during the last three years on lines suitable to him, but his statement was certainly calculated to prejudice public opinion in advance of the publication of the Bruce report after Parliament has been prorogued. Under all the circumstances, I think that that part of the resolution referring to Sir George Perley's salary should be withheld until the Bruce report is published.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am informed by the Minister of Militia and Defence that the printed fly-leaf to which my hon. friend refers emanated from the department here. It is entirely attributable to the Minister of Militia and Defence.

Sir SAM HUGHES: All I have to say then, is that the Minister of Militia and Defence has fallen very greatly in my estimation for permitting it to go out.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The blame will have to lie where it belongs, if it is a document of the character described by my hon. friend. It was really prepared, I think, for the purpose of giving certain information and suggestions in a convenient form, as the inquiries were very numerous.

I do not find that the press despatch in the Montreal Gazette contains any reply to Colonel Bruce's report. There is a reference to what Colonel Bruce's report contains, but the comments upon it are not set forth in the despatch in the slightest degree.

As to the number of men employed overseas in connection with the administration of the forces in England, I should be greatly surprised if the number exceeds the number employed under the administration of my hon. friend (Sir Sam Hughes). I cannot speak positively as to that, because I have never made any computation, but I know that most of the men at the head of departments over there are men in whom my hon. friend had a great deal of confidence. There is Colonel McRae, for instance, who was at the head of the Quartermaster General's Department under the administration of my hon. friend. He has proved himself very capable, and is still at the head of that department. Colonel Ross, who is at the head of the Pay Department, and is a very capable man, was also selected by my hon. friend. Colonel Foster had a long record in the permanent force, and was regarded by my hon. friend as a man worthy of an important position. I do not think he filled his present position under my hon. friend's administration, but I understand that he filled some position of importance in France. Colonel Thacker, I think, retains practically the same position he had before, that of Adjutant General. As regards General Turner, who is the head of the military organization in England, I think it is universally agreed that in the discharge of his new duties he has proved himself very diligent and very efficient. These, I think, are the most important changes that have been made.

There really has not been any friction in carrying out the work of the two departments. They co-operate with each other very harmoniously. There are doubtless suggestions from one department to the other from time to time, but there has been no friction, and no difficulty.

Sir SAM HUGHES: That fly-sheet, I understand, was prepared in England, or at least it is very similar to one that was in use in England. I do not know whether the Minister of Militia for Canada is anxious to claim the fatherhood of the thing or not, but I take the ground—I have taken it for a quarter of a century, and I shall take it for a quarter of a century more—that with all due regard to my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), and the proposition he has made to-day, I will not communicate with the Minister of Militia, or with any other gentleman occupying the position of minister, through any subordinate on matters affecting my constituency, or any of my constituents. The proper plan, when any member has anything to do with any department, is to notify the minister of the department. I notify the Minister of Militia and get back in return this notice: "You will be kind enough to read this over and see which section refers to the case in point; then notify your friend in the country that she is to apply to the P. W. X. Y. officer in her district, who will in turn report the matter to the Militia Department here; in due time it will reach England and France, and in the course of the next quarter of a century or more a reply will come back. That is not the manner in which things were done when I was in charge of the department. I recognized members of Parliament had the right to come to me and ask me questions, and I, as Minister of Militia, looked after these things and saw that their requests were properly attended to, and as far as we could we gave them the data. I could give an instance to this House where a mother had tried for over two months to find out what had happened to her son. I am not blaming the present Minister of Militia, because he had nothing to do with it, although he is taking the blame as a gentleman and trying to look happy. Finally, that poor mother appealed to me. Through the sources of information which I had, I found out in less than two days that her son was dead and had been buried in France last January, he having been wounded in the latter part of November. Three weeks after that mother had received my message, she received—I do not blame this office here—an intimation from that concern in London that this young man was dangerously ill at a hospital in France, when, as a matter of fact, her poor boy was dead and buried on the 5th of January. The mother again appealed to me, and upon making further inquiries the information which I had received was verified. I am merely pointing out what this system does. It is bureaucracy, and it is against proper administration and action. That is the only point I am making in regard to the matter. As to the officers in London, I venture to say that the number is twenty times as great as it was formerly. I am not speaking of the senior officers. They could not get rid of a good many of the senior officers over there if they tried.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In which department has there been an increase?

Sir SAM HUGHES: In the Adjutant General's department and in others. I do not know how they employ all the men there are to be found in the Argyle building. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister was over there and he saw them. There are six buildings filled with these gentlemen, whereas General Carson had only fifty and that included the clerical service and the Quarter-master General's staff.

Mr. MARCIL: Are these gentlemen civilians or soldiers? If they are soldiers why do they not go to the front?

Sir SAM HUGHES: I do not know, but I understand they are mostly soldiers. I would suggest to my right hon. friend the Prime Minister that he might inquire as to the number of men who are employed in that building alone. The information I have is largely obtained from gentlemen of high standing who have been over there, and who have returned to Canada, as well as some officers who have returned. I have not made any enumeration whatever, as I did not think it was part of my function to do so. I have assisted the minister in Canada in every legitimate way, and I have refrained from meddling in the work at all. But my information is that there are six buildings full of gentlemen in London doing the work which was formerly done by General Carson and his fifty men. I would ask any officer in the minister's department to speak up frankly and say how the thing is going. The department here has been wiped out of existence in so far as control of the Record office work or any other work is concerned. I believe that a change has come about in the last few months whereby Canada is recognized to a certain extent as being entitled to her rights. But all the service that I can find that Sir George Perley was rendering to this country was simply putting obstacles in the way and in bringing these V.A.D. hospitals under the patronage of some distinguished people in England, and in that way making them appendages to the British machine, rather than independent entities under the direction of the great nation which Canada is to-day.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I wish to register my protest against this resolution. I speak for those who think that as Canada is spending about $900,000 a day, or not far from the million dollar mark, we should not fail to remind the Government that there is such a word as economy in Webster's dictionary. I am opposed to the principle of the resolution because I believe that all offices of emolument that can be dispensed with might well be dispensed with at the present time. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister stated a moment ago that those who will be the recipients of these emoluments may evade the election which always takes places when a new minister is created. He says that there are precedents for that position. My precedent to the contrary is the election of Mr. Churchill not two weeks ago. After he had been called by the Prime Minister of Great Britain to join the British Cabinet, he had to go before his electors at Dundee for election. The British constitution is still our model, and I do not see why we in Canada should deviate from that time-honoured principle. Sir George Perley was elected for the county of Argenteuil in 1911, and made minister without portfolio, and he has been acting as High Commissioner in London since the death of Lord Strathcona. I do not see why, now that he is in receipt of the salary of a minister, he could not do as the Prime Minister did, as any member of the House would do if he were called to the Cabinet, go back to his county, appear before his electors, and let this country know whether or not he still has the confidence of his Canadian electors, because, after all, he is primarily responsible to his electors, to the farmers of the county of Argenteuil. As regards the under-secretaries, I have much respect for my hon. friend from Bruce (Mr. Hugh Clark), and also for my hon. friend from Queen and Shelburne (Mr. McCurdy).

But this is only a temporary provision in their case. If I read the resolution aright, these under-secretaries are going to act just during the present Parliament. The positions are not permanent. Some years ago, at the request of the Prime Minister, Sir George Murray, an English authority on civil service, came to Canada to investigate the whole of our Civil Service and our Government organization. Sir George Murray reported favouring the establishment of under-secretaryships. The Government has thought fit to ignore the report of Sir George Murray, and it is during the dying days of this Parliament that the right hon. gentleman comes before this House with a resolution which carries recommendations thus made. I think that, with the army, the thousands of civil servants, appointed in all departments since 1911, the under-secretaries are not needed for the time being.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Why should not an under-secretary of the Militia Department, for instance, relieve the minister of a great deal of work?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Let us take the under-secretary of External Affairs, and I say, without fear of being contradicted, that, with the Prime Minister as head of that branch of the service and with Sir Joseph Pope, who works night and day for his country, who attends to his duty as no other officials in the Government attend to their duties, an under-secretary is not needed—unless it is to prepare campaign literature. I do not say that the hon. gentleman does that, but I repeat that, with Sir Joseph Pope at the head of the department, no under-secretary is needed, and nobody in Ottawa will believe he is needed. My hon. friend says: What about the Department of Militia? If he will accept that bouquet from me, I will say that, as long as the hon. member (Sir Sam Hughes) was at the head of the Militia Department, the hon. member for Shelburne was not needed as under-secretary. The ex-minister could do his work and do it well.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I must say that I would have been only too delighted, and was delighted after he was appointed, to have the services of this worthy member. He was certainly of great assistance to me in the department.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Coming back to Sir George Perley, I say that the new office of Overseas Minister is not at all needed. We have the right to appoint a High Commissioner in London, and if a successor to Lord Strathcona had been appointed four or five years ago, the High Commissioner for Canada in London to-day would not have needed by his side an Overseas Minister. Australia is playing its part in the present war; New Zealand also; but I do not know that any Overseas Ministers have been appointed for those two Dominions. For what reason is Sir George Perley put in that position? The High Commissioner for Canada should be the channel of communication between the British authorities, the Canadian general, the Canadian troops and the Canadian Government. For my part, I do not want to see the day when a Canadian minister will be residing in London. I want to see the Canadian ministers in the Canadian House of Commons, and not in London. They are responsible to Canada and to Canada only, and I am glad to find my hon. friend (Sir Sam Hughes) taking the stand that the Minister of Militia is primarily responsible to the Parliament of Canada and to the Canadian people. The atmosphere of London is uncongenial to some of our Canadian statesmen. Not very long ago, I read in the Canadian Courier of Toronto the following, on the subject of Canadian autonomy:

> Sir Robert is imperialistic. Autonomy is rapidly disappearing and, ominously, the losses are being outrun by imperialistic phraseology. Sir Robert declares that he is a member of "The Imperial War Cabinet," although there is no such thing. He has agreed that Canadian resources shall be considered "Empire resources" and Canadian assets "Imperial assets." He has agreed to "concerted action" in the development of "the Empire's resources," and to the establishment of an "Imperial Development Board" to devise methods, to advise and to guide. He has agreed to the creation of the "Imperial Mineral Resources Bureau" to consider how our resources may be "made available to meet the total requirements of the Empire." He has bound up our economic interests with all parts of the King's dominions. He has associated us with all the Allies in a "common economic policy," as against all outsiders, including the United States. Sir Starr Jameson's Committee proposes making Imperial profit out of our lands. The Earl of Dunraven declares that our fisheries "must be viewed as an Imperial not as a local asset." Sir Robert agrees that "our natural resources ought to be conserved for the general national benefit." Canada has ceased to be autonomous. She has become a British sphere of influence.

Whilst I do not object to Canada being a British sphere of influence in the broad sense, I much prefer to have her one of the Overseas Dominions, possessing her full autonomy and living up to the precedents and the principles which are laid down in the British constitution.

Sir EDWARD KEMP (Minister of Militia): I wish to refer to only one phase of the discussion and that is in regard to what has been described as a fly sheet. I object to this document which I hold in my hand, a circular letter dated February 11, 1917, and for which I am responsible, being called by such an undignified name. It has been found that the more troops we send overseas and the more that arrived in France and the more casualties that occurred, the more inquiries reach the department from the relatives of the soldiers.

That is quite natural, and as the inquiries have increased in number, running sometimes into thousands a day, we have endeavoured to classify them. After careful study we classified them under ten different heads, and I think we have pretty nearly covered the ground. It is impossible for the Minister of Militia to personally see all the friends and relatives who make these requests, and it is impossible for the Minister of Militia to conduct all the correspondence in connection with them. Nevertheless a letter is dictated and sent to every relative and friend of the soldier at the front, or in England or in Canada, who makes inquiry. On the 1st February, 1917, we embodied these requests under ten different headings, and I shall take up a moment of the time of the House to read what was intended by the issue of this circular. I think the committee will agree with me that such action was necessary. In fact, I may say that the circular which I hold in my hand was found to be so popular that we have had several different editions printed since that time, and have had them circulated amongst members of provincial legislatures, members of Parliament, members of the Government, the judges, and prominent people from one end of the Dominion to the other. These circulars have done great service in giving information in respect to the conditions and the surroundings of soldiers with respect to whom requests were made that they should be sent out to Canada on furlough.

The circular reads:

Department of Militia and Defence
Canada.

Memorandum Regarding Methods of Dealing With Personal Requests Concerning Soldiers Serving Overseas With the Canadian Expeditionary Force.

A large number of requests of a personal nature with reference to soldiers serving overseas with the Canadian Expeditionary Force are daily received by this department and by the Canadian military authorities in England. It is, therefore, considered desirable to explain the methods which, in the interests of fair and equitable treatment to all concerned, are followed in each case.

The policy adopted with respect to these requests has been formulated with every possible regard for the personal interests of the soldiers concerned and the natural anxiety and interest on their behalf of their relatives and friends. It should be remembered, however, that, at this stage of the war the brave men of our own Canadian army and those of the British and Allied armies require all the support that can be given them in their heroic fight for liberty, justice and civilization. To this end the services of every available man in whatever capacity his physical and other capabilities fit him to occupy are urgently required both in England and at the front. It should, therefore, be clearly understood that the exigencies of the military situation must be the primary consideration in dealing with such requests.

The following statement explains the procedure adopted in dealing with the various cases mentioned.

A. E. Kemp,
Minister of Militia and Defence.

Ottawa, February 1, 1917.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is that the circular which says that Sir George Perley objects to having these questions thrust upon us?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: No.

Sir SAM HUGHES: You have taken that out, have you?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I do not find any statement of that kind in it. I will not take up the time to read the rest of the circular; I shall simply read the general headings, which are:

1. Requests for commissions for men serving overseas.
2. Requests for the return of men to take out commissions in Canada.
3. Requests for the return of officers for duty in Canada.
4. Requests for promotions.
5. Requests for transfer of soldiers overseas from one unit to another.
6. Requests for leave or discharge on medical grounds.
7. Requests for leave or discharge on "compassionate grounds."
8. Requests for leave to Canada during convalescence, after being wounded or after sickness.
9. Requests for return to Canada on the grounds that the soldier has been found medically unfit for service in the trenches.
10. Requests for discharge of soldiers overseas who are said to be under military age.

These are the general classifications under which we can fairly class the thousands upon thousands of requests that came from soldiers and friends of soldiers overseas in France or England, and it has been of great service to the friends of the soldiers, and has proved, in my opinion to be a great success.

Mr. BURNHAM: The hon. gentleman from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) has made a statement which will go from one end of this country to the other, and appear as an uncontradicted statement, to the effect that the newly-created office of Under-Secretary for External Affairs was for campaign purposes. Surely it must be patent to anybody that such a charge against the integrity of this Government is an exceedingly serious one. If either ought to be backed up or withdrawn, and it most distinctly ought to be promptly contradicted. The people of this country are more than alive to charges of any description, particularly at this time, and I cannot rest content without protest, if such a charge as this, made by a distinguished front bencher of the Opposition, is not at least disputed, or, in some way, required to be confirmed. The hon. gentleman from Rouville knows perfectly well that what he said will go with tremendous weight to the people of this country. An election is impending. The justification for the creation of the position has not been set out; no doubt it will be. The salary, I am free to confess, being $7,500 a year—that is the Sessional indemnity and the salary—is to my mind excessive at this time. I will vote for it, because we are on the eve of an election.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BURNHAM: I feel that we have got to vote for it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: You want all you can get.

Mr. BURNHAM: I think it is too much. I am willing to go it blind and vote for it, but I am not willing to go it blind with a charge uncontradicted, like that made by the hon. gentleman from Rouville. That statement is an absolute insult to this House, if it is not true, and if it is not true it most distinctly requires explanation of the most serious kind. If we can sit in this House and listen to charges of that kind and they do not disturb our equanimity, we are on the brink of a moral catastrophe, to put it mildly. I do not wonder the people are shocked at partyism and partisanship, which applies, of course, to both parties. I cannot resume my seat without reiterating the statement that such a charge as that should be promptly withdrawn as an ignominious exaggeration, made for party purposes at an opportune time, without one tittle of proof or reason, or that it should be substantiated. I hear nothing from the hon. gentleman from Rouville during the course of my humble remarks to indicate that he has the slightest intention of taking it back. It is a very sad commentary, indeed, upon the state of affairs in this country, if such a statement can be made with impunity.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I doubt very much whether the language which has fallen from the hon. gentleman from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) will produce anything like the impression which my hon. friend from Peterborough seems to imagine. We hear very often from the hon. gentleman from Rouville in a somewhat exaggerated way.

I do not know that any one takes his remarks very seriously. As a matter of fact, he is profoundly ignorant of the subject which he undertook to discuss. I know what the duties of the Prime Minister as Secretary of State for External Affairs have been during the past two or three years. I know those duties better, perhaps, than any other hon. member of the House, and I venture to say that they have been twenty times as great as they were under normal conditions. The correspondence with the Mother Country, on matters frequently of the greatest importance, has been as much in a month as under ordinary conditions it would be in a year; I believe that I am understating the fact in that respect. The Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs has been occupied with the duties of his office during very long hours. He has rendered very important assistance; he has done good work, relieving me from very many matters which previously occupied my attention. My only regret is that I did not take steps early in the war to have an Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs appointed; it would have been better for the interests of the country had I done so. I would have had more time to give to general considerations; my attention would not have been so much taken up with matters which, though important, were nevertheless of a somewhat routine character. As to the necessity that Parliamentary secretaries in Great Britain should go back to their constituents, on their appointment, the hon. member is as baldy informed as about other matters of which he has spoken. If he had seen fit to inform himself before speaking, he would have known that when the Government of the United Kingdom was reconstituted nearly a year ago, an Act was passed which made it unnecessary for the members taking office to be elected again to Parliament. The period over which that law took effect was two or three months, a sufficient length of time to enable the Government to be reorganized and the ministers to assume their duties. We are doing on a very small scale indeed in respect of these three gentlemen what was done in Great Britain in December and January last on a very large scale. When my hon. friend speaks of British precedent, he puts the best possible argument into my mouth because I need only refer to British precedent to establish thoroughly the position which I have taken. It is perfectly true that Mr. Churchill had an election recently in Dundee. I am speaking, however, of the period when the British Government was reorganized, a period of two or three months, over which the statute to which I allude extended. The statute ceased to have operation after the time mentioned; in the meantime, the Government had been reorganized. I am citing that as an instance where, upon a very large scale indeed, Parliament made provision for members accepting offices of emolument under the Crown without the necessity of being returned again as members of Parliament.

Mr. MARCIL: Does this salary of the Overseas Minister date from the time of his appointment?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It dates from the time he commenced to discharge his duties. I have already explained that Sir George Perley has written a letter to me in which he expresses a desire not to receive any salary. The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) has made remarks with regard to Sir George Perley that I think are not in very good taste. For six years Sir George Perley has discharged the duties of a minister of the Crown without any remuneration whatever. During that time he has continually undertaken the discharge of duties for other ministers, sometimes for three, four or five months at a time. He has worked hard and indefatigably in the discharge of the duties so confided to him, sometimes during the long summer months administering here in Ottawa three or four departments when the heads of those departments were taking needed rest. I venture to say that he has given more service to the people of this country without remuneration than a dozen like the member for Rouville ever did or are ever likely to. He has discharged the duties of High Commissioner for three years in London without any remuneration whatever. I think, therefore, that it is perhaps not in the best taste to comment in the tone which my hon. friend from Rouville saw fit to assume with regard to the salary which I now propose to ask Parliament to vote for that office.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My right hon. friend has said that the remarks of the member for Rouville were not in the best of taste; I would suggest that my right hon. friend's remarks in answer to the member for Rouville are far from being in the best of taste. The member for Rouville had good reason to speak as he did; he showed that he knew as much about the subject with which he was dealing as my right hon. friend did. Last year, or the year before, when the British Government was reorganized, a special Act was passed for a special occasion, dispensing with the necessity of the ministers going before their electors before accepting office. But this Act was only temporary, and they have now reverted to the old practice of requiring a member of the House of Commons to go before his electors before accepting an office of emolument under the Crown. The latest instance of this was the election of Mr. Churchill. In this respect, therefore, my hon, friend (Mr. Lemieux) was well advised in speaking as he did. I think that we had better approach the discussion of this matter not with our tempers, but with frankness and as becomes members of Parliament. I am prepared to believe what my right hon. friend says with regard to the work of the Department of External Affairs. I knew the work when I was in office, and I am sure that during the war it has increased immensely. That the inside work has increased, and that the member for North Bruce (Mr. Hugh Clark)—with whom nobody has any quarrel; whom everybody in this House respects—has done a good deal to relieve the Prime Minister of the discharge of duties which would otherwise have fallen upon him, I am prepared to believe. But in what respect has the Prime Minister been relieved upon the floor of this House by the member for North Bruce? Whatever the member for North Bruce may have done in his office, so far as the work of this House is concerned he has not earned the salary which it is proposed to give him as Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State. Whether or not he is entitled to the secretaryship we need not discuss now; we will come to that when the second reading of the Bill is reached.

With regard to the Parliamentary Secretary of the Department of Militia and Defence, I say the same; I leave it to every man in this committee whether he has been of any assistance to the Minister of Militia. The member for Rouville referred to the work done by Sir Joseph Pope. Sir Joseph Pope is a very good officer; he may have equals, but certainly he has no superior in activity, energy, integrity and all the qualities required of one in his position. If he requires a larger staff, it is proper that he should get it. However, we will defer the discussion of these matters until we reach the second reading of the Bill.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I rise only to say that I disagree with the right hon. gentleman in his belief that in Great Britain the duties of Parliamentary Under-Secretary are confined to answering questions in Parliament.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Not confined.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Or to doing work of that kind.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I did not say so.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If they are not confined to that, then my hon. friend's argument falls absolutely to the ground. Does he mean to say that Sir George Murray suggested the appointment of undersecretaries in this country merely for the purpose of having them answer questions in Parliament? Any such idea as that is out of the question. They were suggested for the purpose of relieving, to a certain extent, the ministers in discharge of their official duties, not only in Parliament, but in respect to the work of their office. The work of the office is much more burdensome and serious than the work in Parliament, because the former extends throughout all the year. So far as that is concerned, the new under secretaries may not, up to the present time, have taken up a very large share of the work in Parliament. They are new to the duties of their office, and it is beyond question that in other sessions they will, more and more, assume a larger share of parliamentary duties in addition to the work which they perform in connection with office routine.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I do not resent what my right hon. friend has stated in regard to the remarks I made, but I would like to know from him what he finds in those remarks which is out of taste concerning Sir George Perley. I have said nothing against Sir George Perley. He is a personal friend of mine, but if Sir George Perley chooses to be High Commissioner for Canada in London, as there is a salary attaching to that function, let him resign as a member of the Government and then let him accept that position, and nobody will find fault with him. But if he chooses to be acting High Commissioner in London and at the same time be overseas Minister of Militia and Defence, to accept emolument as such and not seek re-election, I say, as a Canadian, and as a student of British institutions and the Canadian constitution, that Sir George Perley is evading one of the cardinal principles of our Canadian constitution and of the British institution. I cited the example of Mr. Churchill, who is just as important a man in the British Government as Sir George Perley is in the Canadian Government. Mr. Churchill has had, for a young man, a long and brilliant career in public life, and yet when he is called upon by his Sovereign to join the British Government, he resigns his seat; he goes before his electors in Dundee; he gets re-elected, and he joins the Government and can receive the emoluments of office. By what divine right should Sir George Perley—who, it is true, has been acting High Commissioner in London without any emolument, but on whose head honours have been showered, he has been knighted for that very object—now join the Government, receive emolument and not seek re-election from the farmers of the county of Argenteuil? He must not expect the electors of Argenteuil to look upon him as their representative in the Government if he does not adhere to the principles of the Canadian constitution. By what right, I repeat, can Sir George Perley (after having been away from Canada for five years), become a minister of the Crown and not seek re-election from his electors in the county of Argenteuil? High as is Sir George Perley, knighted as he may be, I say that the plain farmer, Mr. McGibbon, who is a candidate against him in Argenteuil, will defeat him to-morrow if he runs in that county.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is it the intention that Sir George Perley or any other person accepting the office of Minister of the Overseas Military Forces shall not seek re-election?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: There is a provision in the Bill for that.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It is not in the resolution; it will be in the Bill. It is the same provision as was enacted in Great Britain last December or January.

Mr. MARCIL: In the British Bill the appointment was not made retroactive; here it is made retroactive, and Sir George Perley will draw his salary from the date of his appointment, not from the date of the passage of this Bill.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I object to there being two Ministers of Militia both on account of the dual control and on constitutional grounds. What we should have in England is an officer responsible to the Minister of Militia or some other member of the Government here, but that officer should not have ministerial functions. What has happened shows that my contention is justified. We should have some officer who will be in a position similar to that of General Carson. Let Sir George Perley be responsible to the Minister of Militia here.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And responsible to his electors here.

Sir SAM HUGHES: That goes without saying.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Not according to the Prime Minister.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I would not have a minister in England at all, so that the officer appointed would not require to be responsible to any electors. The manner in which the appointment is provided for in the Bill would place in the hands of the party in power an autocratic authority that should not be exercised by any Government, and it would have a tendency to take away from the people certain rights, which, under the constitution, they are entitled to exercise.

The Minister of Militia in Canada does not understand my objection to his circular. If my recollection serves me aright, the first circular that came out distinctly stated that Sir George Perley objected to being troubled with those letters. He objected to having those questions asked of him. The poor people throughout the length and breadth of the country do not know that the country is divided into military districts, and who these red tab and brass tab people in the Militia Departments are. I understood that the people were not posted on the petty details of the department, and when a mother from any part of the Dominion wrote a letter to the department, I instructed that it be handed to a clerk who had as many brains and as much capacity to act as any red tab officer in London, Kingston, Toronto, or other military district. Whenever a member of Parliament came into the department the instructions were that he was to be shown into my room at once; that when he sent a communication, that communication was to be acted on as though it was an order from the people's representative, and we did what we could to meet the people's wishes, so that any request which a member made, even although it was in regard to a poor, common soldier, should be looked after immediately. The reason I take exception to this appointment is that this is not meeting the people's representatives with the dignity, the courtesy and the business treatment to which they are entitled. Let me give a specific instance. A poor woman from London, Ontario, wrote to the Minister of Militia, asking some questions. An officer under the minister here sent the letter back to her with one of these circulars, telling her to read the circular and to apply under the proper heading. She did not know to whom she should apply. She did not know that London was a military district, although she lived in London. That is only one instance out of tens of thousands throughout the country. I took the case up and put it through for her myself.

The point I want to impress upon the Minister of Militia is that members of Parliament, in making requests or asking for information from the minister, should not be placed in the same position as an unofficial citizen, but should be treated with that courtesy and dignity to which a member of Parliament is entitled. So far as the under-secretaries are concerned, I think they can be of very great service, especially during war time, and I purpose with all my heart supporting that section of the resolution. But as regards the other part of the resolution, it is constitutionally wrong, it is wrong from the standpoint of our success in the war, and it is wrong upon a great many other grounds that I do not care to enter into here to-day.

[Sir Sam Hughes.]

Mr. PROULX: Will the salaries of these under-secretaries date from their appointment or be retroactive?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: They will begin from the date of their appointment.

Mr. NESBITT: I should like to ask the Prime Minister what authority, if any, the Minister of Militia here will have over the Minister of Militia in England, and if he has none, to whom is the Minister of Militia in England responsible? I was also going to ask why it is necessary to appoint an Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, but the Prime Minister has explained that it was necessary, and I am quite willing to accept his explanation. I might remind him, however, that we vastly increased the office expense of that department by a vote last night. However, if the Prime Minister still thinks the appointment is necessary I have no objection, because he ought to know best. Nor have I any objection to the persons he proposes to appoint to these positions. With regard to the other part of the resolution, I have never seen any great department, whether in private business or otherwise, prove a success under dual management. If the Minister of Militia here has no control whatever over the Minister of Militia in England, I hope it will work out successfully, but I seriously doubt it.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The Minister of Militia Overseas is responsible, just as any other minister of the Crown is responsible, in respect of the duties which are confided to him by the order in council which has been passed. He reports to the Governor in Council through the Prime Minister, and a copy of his recommendation or report is sent to the Minister of Militia and Defence here, in order that there may be perfect co-operation and co-ordination between them.

Mr. NESBITT: He reports to the minister here?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: He reports to the Governor in Council through the Prime Minister, but a copy of his recommendation or report is also sent to the Minister of Militia and Defence in order that there may be perfect co-ordination of action and effort between them. No practical difficulty has been found in that arrangement.

Mr. NESBITT: Would that necessarily follow, simply because a copy of his report was sent to the Minister of Militia and Defence?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It has been found to follow. My hon. friend will understand that the duties of the Minister of Militia Overseas are concerned with the expeditionary force in Great Britain and France. As soon as an officer or man is returned to Canada, he comes under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Militia in this country. In respect of the organization which the Minister of Militia Overseas establishes, and in respect of the action which he takes, he is responsible, just as is any other minister of the Crown, to Parliament and to the Prime Minister also.

Mr. NESBITT: I wish to add that I have written a great many letters to the Militia Department since the war started, and have received nothing but courteous treatment.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The Prime Minister states that the Minister of Militia Overseas is responsible, just as is any other minister of the Crown. But there is this difference. Suppose the Minister of Public Works, for instance were to build one story of a building, and another minister then took charge and put up a second story and furnished the building. That is analagous to what it is proposed to do here. The Minister of Militia in Canada does a certain portion of the work; he arranges for the letting of contracts, gets all the equipment ready, makes appointments and promotions, and the troops are then sent over to the Old Country and put under entirely different management. We should have the same control, the same exercise of administrative authority and discipline over our troops in England as we have in Canada, but we have not got that to-day. I do not propose going into that just now, but I am prepared to go into it if necessary.

Mr. MARCIL: I do not wish to say anyting against Sir George Perley, because I have had the pleasure of his acquaintance for several years. He has been an active and successful business man, we must admit, but he has certainly undertaken to do too much during the war. If he had remained content with being a member of Parliament, and a member of the present Administration, and devoted himself to the duties devolving upon him in connection therewith, he would have not been criticised. But in addition to those duties he has undertaken the work of the High Commissioner, and on top of this, it is now proposed to make him Overseas Minister of Militia. On the formation of the present Administration five Cabinet seats were allotted to the province of Quebec. One was the minister now under discussion, without portfolio; the others were the Minister of Justice, the Postmaster General, the Minister of Inland Revenue, and the Secretary of State. The result is that to-day the Minister of Justice is administering his own department and the Post Office Department, and the Minister of Inland Revenue is administering his own department and the Department of Secretary of State. Hon. Mr. Blondin being on active service, and Mr. Patenaude having resigned, the province of Quebec finds itself with but two representatives in the Cabinet. What would the people of Ontario think if Ontario had only two representatives in the Cabinet?

5 p.m.

I think a word should also be said for the electors of Argenteuil. Sir George Perley—he was plain Mr. Perley then—was given a seat in the Cabinet on being elected by a large majority for the county of Argenteuil. Being an English Protestant, and representing one of the thirteen Protestant constituencies in the province of Quebec, he became by that fact a representative of the Protestant minority in the province of Quebec. We have always had such representative in every Cabinet. But since Sir George Perley went to England the Protestant minority of Quebec has been without a representative in the Cabinet, and the electors of Argenteuil without a representative in this House. We are now asked to vote a salary to Sir George Perley and make it retroactive. Next week we shall probably be asked to vote him a salary as High Commissioner. And during all this time he has not had to go back to his electorate, as Winston Churchill in England, and the Minister of Inland Revenue in this country did only a short while ago. The whole thing is false from top to bottom. Any fair-minded man will admit that the whole thing is a mess, and contrary to constitutional practice in this country.

Mr. KYTE: Is Mr. Christie, for whom a salary of $5,000 was voted some time ago, an employee of the Department of External Affairs.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: He is legal advisor for the Department of External Affairs. He was appointed at a salary of $3,000, I think.

Mr. KYTE: Mr. J. P. Bill was taken into the same department, was he not, about the same time?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: He is in the Department of Justice.

Mr. McCURDY: On the question of the need of establishing parliamentary under secretaryships I do not intend to offer any observations at the present time, but, in order that there may be no misapprehension in regard to the circumstances under which I assumed and occupy the office of Parliamentary Secretary of the Department of Militia and Defence, I think it is right that I should make a statement to the House.

Every hon. member in this House knows of the large number of cases throughout the country in which public-spirited citizens are willingly and gladly giving vountary service in connection with war work. Therefore, I think it is not surprising that a member of Parliament should wish to share in this public service.

I received in July last an intimation from my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) that further assistance was required in the Department of Militia and Defence. The correspondence disclosed the fact that the burden cast by the war upon all departments had become increasingly onerous, and particularly so in the case of the Department of Militia and Defence. Perhaps I cannot do better than read the correspondence. It is as follows:

Ottawa, 9th July, 1916.

Dear Mr. McCurdy:—

As you are aware, the burdens cast by the war on all departments having to do with its prosecution have become increasingly onerous.

In particular, the work of the Minister of Militia and Defence has become very great. The nature of his duties also constantly call him away from his department. To assist him, and to provide for continuity in the conduct of the department's business and business policy, the minister, Major General Sir Sam Hughes, has requested the Governor in Council through me to establish an office to be known as Parliamentary Secretary of the Department of Militia and Defence, and to select a member of the House to perform the duties above referred to.

In connection with your offer to serve in any capacity, the Minister of Militia has, recognizing your business qualifications, experience, and attention to public duties, suggested your appointment, and I am pleased to say that my colleagues gladly concur in his nomination.

It is proposed that the Governor in Council shall forthwith establish the office referred to, and until Parliament has made provision, the appointment cannot carry any salary, allowance, or fees of any kind. The Government will be prepared, however, to recommend any reasonable request in that connection.

My colleagues and I realize the demands already made on your time in connection with your parliamentary duties and appreciate that, if you accept this position of public service, necessarily you will be called upon to make further sacrifice in connection with your business affairs.

If, however, you can see your way clear to accede to their request, we shall be pleased to have your appointment completed at once.

Yours very truly,

R. L. Borden.

Mr. F. B. McCurdy, M.P.,
Halifax, N.S.

To which I replied on July 14, 1916.

July 14, 1916.

Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden,
President of the Privy Council,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir Robert:—

Replying to your favour of the 9th inst., I desire to record my appreciation of your attitude and that of your colleagues towards me. I am gratified that the Honourable the Minister of Militia himself should suggest me for the appointment referred to by you.

In connection with the prosecution of the war, I am still desirous of serving in any capacity for which I may be considered competent by the minister. It, therefore, affords me pleasure to concur in the suggestion made in your letter, and to say that if the appointment is made, the duties attaching to the post will have the best attention of which I am capable.

With regard, however, to remuneration, I desire to say that my acceptance is made conditional upon the understanding that I shall not receive in connection therewith any salary, fee, or allowance of any kind. I shall be only too pleased to place in this regard my services and whatever capacity and business experience I possess freely at the disposal of the State while the war lasts.

Yours faithfully,

F. B. McCurdy.

That was my feeling at the time, that is my feeling to-day, and I wish to make it clear that should Parliament in its discretion see fit to vote a salary for the Parliamentary Secretary of Militia and Defence I have no intention myself of retaining that salary.

Sir SAM HUGHES: That is the only point of difference between your humble servant and my hon. friend from Queens and Shelburne (Mr. McCurdy) I positively object to any person in the employ of this Government working for nothing, when there is a salary attached to the job. My good friend, I presume, is blessed with this world's goods. Many of us are not. Why should a man, of possibly as great ability as my hon. friend from Queens and Shelburne, be debarred by having the precedent set that he must not take office because there are young men, whose fathers had money, or who have money themselves, and who are willing to do the work for nothing? I claim that when a man offers his services to the Government he is entitled to his pay, and that he should take it. It is all right to hand it over to the Red Cross or to any other fund if he likes. That is another matter. My hon. friend from Queens and Shelburne knows that I never could harmonize with him on that point. Let every man be paid a fair wage, and then if he chooses to hand it over to some worthy object, let him do so. I maintain that this business of giving jobs to gentlemen because they are in a position to do the work for nothing is wrong. You have no control of, or hold upon, them, and after all it is the question of responsibility for which we must have regard. If the hon. member for Queens and Shelburne will accept the salary of the office, and then hand the money back to the treasury, or to the Red Cross, he should do so and not establish a precedent whereby some other worthy member of Parliament equally as capable as himself, and equally entitled to get the job, is subjected to the contrast that for one office a salary is paid and for another there is no salary.

Mr. KYTE: It is perfectly apparent from the statement of the hon. member for Queen's and Shelburne (Mr. McCurdy) that he is not disposed to accept any salary for his services. That declaration will be received by many of his friends in Nova Scotia with a great deal of gratification. But the hon. member for Victoria and Haliburton (Sir Sam Hughes) says that it must be insisted upon that the hon. member for Queens and Shelburne shall accept his salary and dispose of it in whatever way he thinks proper. I think it would be well in the interests of the hon. member for Shelburne himself that the matter should be cleared up. If he is working for a salary, and if he is going to accept that salary, I think it would be well that the general public should know it. If he is going to work without any salary he should get the credit that his sacrifice entitles him to. There seems to be several gentlemen who are willing to give their services to this Government for nothing. The other evening, when we were discussing the appointment of Mr. Henderson as chairman of the committee to inquire into the operations of the William Davis Company, it was said that he was going to work for nothing. I am bound to say, quite apart from the case of the hon. member for Queens and Shelburne, that I am extremely suspicious when gentlemen outside of this House offer their services to the country free of charge. I might enumerate several others who are offering their services, and I could only repeat what has been said by my hon. friend (Sir Sam Hughes). I think that this Government is in a position to fairly compensate any citizen for valuable services rendered. I do not think that it makes for confidence in the work of these gentlemen, or for the reputation of the Government that they should offer and give their services free of charge. Whenever services are accepted, there should be proper compensation for them.

Mr. EDWARDS: I appreciate, as I am sure every member of this House appreciates, the motive behind the words of the hon. member for Queens and Shelburne (Mr. McCurdy), but I object, as one member of this House, and one of the citizens of this country who was not born with a silver spoon in his mouth, to any such practice as the hon. member for Queens and Shelburne suggests.

If I have any criticism to offer in regard to the conduct of public business in this country it is that there seems to be rather too much a tendency for jobs to go to men who have any amount of money, men who are in the millionaire class. It is all right for a man who can count his money by the millions and who is patriotic enough to offer to perform certain duties which he can perform without drawing any salary. I have not a word to say against his motives; the motives of that gentleman are just as good and sound as mine would be in offering to perform those duties. But the amount of this world's goods that I possess would make it impossible for me to do what he is willing to do for nothing. Now, Mr. Chairman, it strikes me that in a country like Canada, which is, and I hope will always be, a democratic country,—notwithstanding that we seem to be piling up a number of knights and barons, rather more than I like to see—I say that it is subversive of democracy and against its best interests that men should be allowed to take offices, no matter how faithfully they perform the duties of those offices, and not accept reasonable pay for the work so performed. If you followed that out to its logical conclusion, you would encourage the general public to believe that that is the right thing to do and you would soon have a demand in this country that, in order to save a few thousand dollars here or there, we should appoint to these important positions only millionaires and people of that class, able to do the work without remuneration. I object to that most strongly. It seems to me that the creation of these three positions that have been mentioned here is a matter that should be considered by us on its merits. So far as the work of Sir George Perley is concerned, Sir George Perley is a wealthy man and has shown himself from 1911 up to the present to be a true and patriotic Canadian, willing, although a man of large business interests, to devote his time without remuneration to the service of his country. He is engaged in work over there, and what I said a few moments ago in regard to paying the under secretaries applies also to him. We as members of this House, should consider whether this position overseas is necessary or is not necessary. I for one believe that the appointment of an Overseas Minister of Militia was a wise appointment to make and I believe further that, since we have appointed a gentleman to that position, he should be paid for the work he does in it.

We have also to consider, it seems to me, whether it was a wise thing to appoint the hon. member for Queens and Shelburne (Mr. McCurdy) and the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Hugh Clark) to the positions they occupy. I am disposed, as is my friend who spoke a few minutes ago, to accept the statement of the Prime Minister that he has been greatly relieved by the work done by the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Hugh Clark). These hon. gentlemen have been appointed to certain positions to do certain work. It is for us to consider whether those positions were necessary. If we consider or agree that those positions were necessary, then it is up to us to consider how much should be paid as remuneration for filling those positions.

I want to say to some hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House—who are mighty saving of dollars sometimes when those dollars are being expended from this side of the House, that they had better look over their own history. We have not the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) here to-day. If we had, I suppose he would be objecting on the ground of economy to the paying out of a few thousands of dollars to these under-secretaries. And yet in what position is that gentleman? He is in the position of having taken royalties and put them in his own pocket, royalties that belonged to the treasury of this country, and he has kept them there, and there has been no condemnation of that practice on his part by his leader or by any other hon. gentleman opposite. That is a fact, there is no getting around it, a fact which he admitted himself on the floor of the House; that he took royalties on coal lands or mines in the West, that he has that money in his pocket at the present time—unless he returned it before starting for Winnipeg just lately—and I want to say to hon. gentlemen, when they are talking about economy and saving a few dollars here or there, that they should get after their own member, the member for Edmonton, and ask him to put back into the treasury the money which he took wrongfully, which he is not entitled to, and for taking which, any man who was not a member of this House would be criticised in language which I am not permitted to use.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am not surprised at the attitude taken by the hon. member for Shelburne (Mr. McCurdy). Anyone might have expected that from him. We all know that he is favoured with a large fortune, and so is Sir George Perley, who is in the millionaire class. For me it is not a question of money, although I say that at the present moment it has not been demonstrated that these new offices are needed; more particularly I urge that we should not create new offices when we have to make the sorry admission that Canada to-day is borrowing at usurious rates of interest in New York, when we consider that the bonds of Canada are selling at 98, bearing 6 per cent interest. Surely it is time for Canadians to cry halt. When we are spending nearly one million dollars a day it is no time for the Government to create new offices, the necessity for which is not demonstrated.

But this is not the point which I raise this afternoon. It is not a question of money; it is not a question of dollars and cents; there is a principle which is far above dollars and cents. I say that Sir George Perley, millionaire as he is, Overseas Minister as he has been created, receives emoluments from his office, and because of such emoluments should come back before the people of Canada and be re-elected, as all ministers of the Crown in Canada are re-elected. I was made Solicitor General a few years ago, a subordinate position in the Government. I had to seek re-election in the county of Gaspé. Two years afterwards I became a minister of the Crown, but as I had been re-elected as Solicitor General it was not necessary for me to return before the people. But every new minister of the Crown must seek re-election at the hands of his electors. I want to know by what divine right should we be creating to-day that new family compact, because this departure is nothing else but a new edition of the old family compact. To-day it is Sir George Perley; to-morrow it will be Sir Joseph Flavelle; the day after to-morrow it will be Sir Clifford Sifton—all those millionaires will be given offices in the Government to save the country and to save the Empire without re-election. Canada is being dominated by a caste of war profiteers, by a coterie of millionaires and plutocrats.

Mr. MURPHY: It is evident that the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) had read the reports from the Winnipeg Convention before he addressed the House, because I cannot understand how otherwise the milk of human kindness would have become so curdled in the hon. gentleman's noble breast. I will not allude further to his extraordinary attack upon an hon. gentleman who is not here present in his seat to defend himself, but who, before those who know him best, evidently requires no defence.

I listened with real interest to what my hon. and genial friend from West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) had to say. He expressed himself as shocked at one charge which he seemed to find in the language my hon. friend from Rouville levelled against the Government. Observing that immediately in front of my hon. friend from Peterborough the hon. member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) is sitting, and recalling that that hon. gentleman has made, not one charge but a whole series of most damaging charges against the Government ever since he wrote his famous letters to the Prime Minister last fall, I cannot understand how the hon. gentleman from West Peterborough would be so shocked at one charge made by the hon. member for Rouville, and overlook completely all the charges made by the hon. member for Victoria.

Mr. BURNHAM: Who said I overlooked them?

Mr. MURPHY: If he has not overlooked them, we have not heard any protest from him.

Mr. BURNHAM: That is another thing.

Mr. MURPHY: Yes, that is quite another thing, and I am glad to find by the hon. gentleman's intimation that he has not overlooked them. We shall expect to hear from him on that subject. Up to the present, the Government completely overlooked them, and these charges remain, not only unrefuted, but uncontradicted in every particular.

I desire to refer to a question that my hon. friend from Victoria addressed to the Prime Minister, and which remains unanswered. He asked what kind of structure we should put up if one minister built one story and another minister built another story, and the hon. gentleman received no reply to that question. There is historic precedent for such an inquiry. That is precisely the same question as was addressed on a famous occasion by Hennessey to Dooley, the philosopher of Archey Road, with whom my hon. friend, the member for Victoria will be familiar. They were discussing the construction of the national edifice in the United States, and Hennessey asked Dooley what kind of building would be put up if he had one kind of man at one story and another kind of man at another story, and Dooley said, "The outer walls would resemble the homeward tracks from a wake." That is the answer to my hon. friend's question. The Prime Minister told us that he had received a letter from Sir George Perley stating that he did not intend to accept any salary as overseas Minister of Militia. My hon. friend from Shelburne and Queens (Mr. McCurdy) stated a short time ago that he also had declined to accept any salary in the position which he has been filling for some time, and to which it is now proposed to appoint him by the resolution under consideration. In view of these two statements, I submit to the Prime Minister in all seriousness that neither of these salaries should be voted. What is the sense in voting salaries which gentlemen say they will not accept? On the other hand, if they are voted, the effect of voting them is to place these two hon. gentlemen under an unjust suspicion. Either those salaries should be dropped, or if voted, they should be accepted; and from that point of view I entirely agree with what has been said by my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards). I think the position he took with regard to these salaries, and with regard to the creation of similar positions with salaries attached, is entirely the correct and constitutional position to take.

That brings me to another matter which was briefly referred to by the Prime Minister, but which is of transcendent importance to the people of Canada. In criticising the objections offered by the leader of the Opposition to this resolution, the Prime Minister drew an analogy between what is proposed under this resolution, in so far as the position of Minister of Militia Overseas is concerned, and what had been done by Mr. Lloyd George in creating an authority outside Parliament. In his reference to that authority created outside Parliament in Great Britain, I submit with great respect, the Prime Minister was hardly correct. He said that, owing to the pressure of his war duties, Mr. Lloyd George had found it necessary to divest himself of certain duties as Prime Minister within Parliament, and to depute the performance of those duties to Mr. Bonar Law. That, I submit, is not exactly what occurred in Great Britain. Mr. Lloyd George, in conjunction with Lord Curzon and Lord Milner has, in the opinion of some of the best thinkers of Great Britain, taken away from Parliament a number of its constitutional privileges and liberties, and has set up outside Parliament an autocratic council or committee which, if it has any analogy at all, is analogous to the position of affairs in the United States, where the cabinet is not elected, but is selected, and where the President does not sit in the House, but only goes to the House on certain occasions and addresses that Chamber. I have read articles protesting against the denuding of Parliament in Great Britain, written by some of the best thinkers and most eminent men in England, and pointing out that while this condition of affairs lasts Parliament is a mere registering body, and is not a legislative or administrative body in the sense that it was before this autocratic council of four was created practically outside the jurisdiction of Parliament. So that, agreeing with that view of the functions and duties and responsibilities of this small council in Great Britain, I do not think the analogy which my right hon. friend sought to draw with reference to the present resolution was a very happy one, or, indeed, an appropriate one. As the leader of the Opposition pointed out, this resolution is divided into three parts, one relating to the Minister of Militia Overseas, and the others to the two undersecretaries. I do not intend to criticise the creation of these offices further than I have already done, nor to refer to the gentlemen who, it is proposd, shall fill these offices; but I entirely agree with what has been said by the hon. member for Victoria and other hon. gentlemen, that the creation of this second Minister of Militia is entirely unnecessary. If there are duties to be performed overseas, they can be performed by an official who would be responsible to the Minister of Militia here, who would have a seat in this House, and who would be responsible to Parliament. Already we have practically two Ministers of Justice. I cannot at the moment recall that that has operated to the public disadvantage, but it is an anomaly which did not present itself heretofore. Now, we have two Ministers of Militia. As the hon. gentleman from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) intimated, who can say but to-morrow we shall have two ministers of another department, and the day after two ministers of a third department, and so on? I think it is a dangerous innovation, and does not make for the benefit of representative institutions as we understand them in this country, and will not be approved by those who are apprehensive, and naturally apprehensive, regarding the gradual diminution of democratic government, not only in this country, but in several of the Allied countries engaged in this war. My hon. friend from West Peterborough has criticised the salaries of the under secretaries and disapproved of them, but, curiously I thought with all respect to him, he said, he would shut his eyes and vote for the salary, because we were near an election. I submit to my hon. friend and to my other colleagues in this House on both sides that that is scarcely a good reason for supporting a resolution of this kind.

Mr. BURNHAM: I do not want to start a row at the last moment.

Mr. MURPHY: I know that my hon. friend is a man of peace. I also am a man of peace, and desire to proceed with the business of the House harmoniously. Still, we must not lose sight of the representative character of the measures that are submitted for our consideration, and it is from that point of view that I offer these observations.

Mr. EDWARDS: I do not want the impression to go out that I said what I did in reference to the member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) in his absence, and was afraid to say it in his presence. The member for Russell (Mr. Murphy) was not in the House when, on two previous occasions, in the presence of the member for Edmonton, I alluded to the matter to which I referred this afternoon. The hon. gentleman characterizes my statement as extraordinary; I assume that he refrains from characterizing the member for Edmonton because of his lack of a suitable adjective

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: With regard to what the member for Russell (Mr. Murphy) has said, I think that salaries ought to be attached to these offices whether they are accepted or not, and whether being accepted, they are devoted to some patriotic purpose. Other gentlemen might occupy these offices at a later date; it is proper, therefore, that salaries should be attached to the offices. As far as the amount of the salary is concerned, that of the Overseas Minister is exactly in accordance with the salary which is fixed for ministers of the Crown. The salaries of the parliamentary secretaries are precisely the same as those of the permanent heads of departments, $5,000. I do not desire to enter into a discussion as to the constitutional changes in Great Britain. I alluded to the attitude taken by the Prime Minister of Great Britain only for the purpose of indicating that a minister might find more appropriate exercise for his energies in duties outside of Parliament than in duties in Parliament. It is merely in that connection that I used the illustration.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has Sir George Perley made any report since he has been overseas?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Many reports.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Have they been laid on the Table?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Are they in the hands of the Prime Minister?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: They are in the hands of the Prime Minister and of the Minister of Militia and Defence.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will they be printed?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have not considered that.

Mr. LEMIEUX: As minister of the Crown, I suppose he administers a department, or part of a department, on the other side of the Atlantic. He has official correspondence; he has reports made to him by his chief officials; therefore he has an account to render to this Parliament. Before voting money to that minister, we should know what are his activities on the other side. We should have an assurance from the Prime Minister that his report will be printed; we would then be able to discuss it.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: As far as any report has been embodied in orders in council, I think a good many of them have been brought down. I do not know that all have been brought down.

Mr. McKENZIE: There is a good deal of confusion in the minds of the common people as to the supervision and control over our troops when they reach the other side. Before the department was divided it was understood that once the troops got on the other side they were practically under the control of the British Government and the War Office. Whether they were sent to the front as a unit or as drafts, that was a matter over which our own department had no control. Has that condition changed, now that we have a minister of War on the other side?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: While the troops are in Great Britain, they are under the disposition of the Minister of Militia and Defence, and to a certain extent, of course, in France. In France, they are under the immediate direction of their own officers. The Canadian Army Corps is under the immediate command of General Sir Arthur Currie. In common with all the British forces, the military operations are under the supreme direction of Sir Douglas Haig, Commander in Chief of the British forces.

Resolution reported, read the first and second times, and concurred in.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 122 respecting the Minister of the Overseas Military Forces, the Parliamentary Secretary of the Department of Militia and Defence and the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

At six o'clock the House too recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

THE CANADIAN RAILWAY SITUATION.

CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE OF RESOLUTION RESPECTING CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

On the motion of Sir Thomas White (Minister of Finance) that the House go into Committee of the Whole to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to provide:

1. That His Majesty may acquire on such terms and conditions satisfactory to the Governor in Council as may be set out in the agreement to be made with the owners and pledgees of not less than five-sixths thereof, and for a price to be determined as hereinafter provided, the six hundred thousand shares of capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company (par value sixty million dollars), not now held by the Minister of Finance in trust for His Majesty.

2. That the Governor in Council shall appoint one arbitrator, the said owners and pledgees shall appoint another, and the two so appointed shall appoint a third, or failing agreement as to such appointment, the third arbitrator shall be appointed by the senior judge of the Exchequer Court.

3. The said arbitrators shall determine the value of the said six hundred thousand shares as of the date of the said agreement and the said arbitrators shall proceed in a summary way and may apply their own judgment in determining such value and may receive with respect thereto, such reports and statements authenticated in such way as they may decide and such evidence as they may deem necessary or helpful, examine witnesses under oath and hear the parties by counsel or representatives and that the unanimous determination of the arbitrators shall be final, but should the determination not be unanimous an appeal from such determination shall lie to the Supreme Court of Canada on behalf of the Governor in Council, or if the owners or pledgees, upon any question of law or fact, such appeal to be made within thirty days from the rendering of the determination.

4. That the amount of the value so determined shall be paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, or otherwise secured in accordance with the terms of the said agreement.

5. That upon the making of said agreement, at least five-sixths of the said six hundred thousand shares shall be transferred to the Minister of Finance in trust for His Majesty, and if there be any of said six hundred thousand shares not transferred as aforesaid, the Governor in Council may declare said shares to be the property of the Minister of Finance in trust for His Majesty, and the same shall thereupon become the property of His Majesty and shall be paid for pro rata with the shares so transferred.

6. That so soon as said five-sixths of said shares has been transferred as aforesaid, the Governor in Council may assist the Canadian Northern Railway Company, or any company included in the Canadian Northern Railway system, in paying and settling any indebtedness of such company or postponing the payment thereof on such terms as may be agreed upon, and for such purposes may make advances out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, may guarantee payment in whole or in part, and may give the obligation or securities of the Government in connection therewith.

7. That the Canadian Northern Railway Company, and each company included in the Canadian Northern Railway system, shall from time to time do such acts and things, make and issue such agreements, obligations and securities in connection with the payment or settlement or postponement of payment of the said claims as the Minister of Finance may require.

8. That the necessary qualification shares for directors may be transferred to or allowed to remain in their names by the Minister of Finance on such conditions as he may determine.

[Sir Thomas White.]

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Mr. Speaker, this is a very important resolution, important for our whole country and especially so for the western part of the Dominion. It will be observed that there is a very slight attendance in the Chamber. I do not see on this side of the House, nor at the moment on the other side of the House, more than one hon. member from west of lake Superior. The hon. members who represent that section of the country are, at the present time, engaged in a very important meeting elsewhere. Would it not be preferable, instead of going into Committee of the Whole, to refer this resolution to a small special committee to secure information which we must thresh out in Committee of the Whole? So far as the financial position of the company is concerned, we have only a statement entitled "Financial statements respecting the Canadian Northern Railway company and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway company." We have no information whether this is the whole of the liability of the Canadian Northern Railway company or whether there are other liabilities. I understand there are other liabilities beyond those mentioned in that statement, being balances due by the company to contractors and so forth. We have no statement at all as to the actual condition of the road, how much is needed for immediate expenses, what are the prospects of the company, or what was the business transacted last year, except in a very general way. If the resolution were referred to a small special committee, the general manager could be summoned, and a good deal of information acquired which it would otherwise be difficult to obtain. I make that suggestion to my hon. friend in the hope that it may be favourably considered.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I would suggest to my right hon. friend that we might go into committee on the resolution and perhaps pass it, and then, before the second reading takes place, we could consider my right hon. friend's suggestion. It is desirable, of course, that all information that is relevant should be afforded, but whatever discussion could take place upon the resolution could also take place in committee after the second reading of the Bill. There is no difficulty either in the one case or in the other. Perhaps we had better go into committee on the resolution. My right hon. friend could then let us know what information is needed, and we could discuss the resolution, and perhaps, if there is no objection, pass it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Might I suggest to the Minister of Finance that it would be well that a list of the shareholders and bondholders be added to the documents which have been printed. I assume the list is not so long that it cannot be easily printed and distributed.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am afraid that would be quite impracticable. The securities of the companies are bonds and debenture stock, which have been issued largely in Great Britain. It would be quite impossible to ascertain the bondholders, because they must be thousands in number The securities pass from hand to hand, and an owner to-day might not be an owner to-morrow. The Canadian Northern made some short term loans in New York, and the same remark would apply to those. I think there is full information in the printed document as to the financial position of the company. The securities outstanding, the amount of the floating loan and other liabilities, are all shown in the statement certified by the auditors of the company. If there is any other special information that would seem necessary in order that the committee might come to a determination upon the matter, we should, of course, endeavour to obtain it. I do not see what bearing the matter of the owners of the securities has upon the question. The transaction, although one of magnitude, is in reality a very simple one, namely, to acquire the outstanding stock of the Canadian Northern Railway company which controls all the underlying companies. We have pretty full information as to all matters relevant to a consideration of the resolution.

Motion agreed to, and the House went into committee on the resolution, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Mr. GRAHAM: This question is of such vital importance to the people of Canada, particularly at the present time, that it is wise that we should make progress slowly and be sure of every step. It is important, not only from the standpoint of the liabilities to be assumed, but on account of the departure being made in removing from private to public ownership one of the great transcontinental highways of the country and its various branches and subsidiary companies.

The policy of public ownership is one that has been tried in many countries of the world, including our own, and the principle itself, as well as the details of this proposition, ought to be viewed from all aspects. As I said the other day, I am not so sure that a government monopoly would be a very great improvement upon a private monopoly, so far as the real details of operation and the benefits to be derived by the public are concerned. Railway managers the world over, like the managers of every other concern, are naturally most anxious to have a good showing for their enterprises, and once the incentive to service, which is brought about by competition, is removed it is not so sure that a monopoly, even if it be a public monopoly, would be the best thing for the public. In this case, however, the question of a monopoly does not arise to any great extent, as two of the great railway systems of Canada are not included.

The Government has decided to embark upon a policy of public ownership of the Canadian Northern system. Friends of that policy—and there are many throughout Canada—want to be assured that public ownership is not being burdened with such a colossal financial load at the outset as to hamper materially the success of the undertaking. We ought to view fairly, I think, the amount of money that has been expended upon the Canadian Northern railway system, and its present value as well, and then ask ourselves the question: Could the Government construct this system for the amount presented to us as the future liability of the country on account of taking over the Canadian Northern? If we pay altogether too much for the property some person may arise in a few years and blame government ownership for a failure, which, might not be the fault of government ownership at all, but the fault of an improvident bargain. I am not saying that such is the case, but am pointing out that in making this departure the members of the House ought to make sure, so far as possible, that the Government is getting full value for the liability which it proposes to assume, or the project cannot be the success it might otherwise be.

The fixed charges have a great deal to do with the success or failure of any business enterprise. If the fixed charges be altogether too high, then, although the enterprise may be a fairly good, paying concern, it is hampered to the extent of these excess fixed charges.

In this connection let me point out that there are three ways in which the Canadian Northern could become the property of the country. First, by allowing it to go into a receiver's hands, and the Government becoming the owners of the system by process of law. It is true, as I view it, that in that case the Government as purchaser would perhaps have as its competitors other interests that might desire this line and would be willing to pay a fairly good price for it. But, on the other hand, if a private corporation were prepared to pay a certain amount for this system it would be fairly good evidence that the road was worth that amount, because a private concern would not be willing to pay a sum on which it could not realize a fair return. As I said the other day, personally I am rather disinclined to favour the idea of a receivership for the reasons which I then gave, and which I think will be obvious to all the members of the House. The Dominion and the provinces have guaranteed a large amount of the securities of this system. Having guaranteed those securities, it has struck me that if the project which the Government has backed with these guarantees were allowed to go into a receiver's hands, it might be injurious to our financing in the markets of the world as a government, because as a parliament we have practically endorsed the notes of this concern. Speaking for myself, I do not view the idea of allowing the road to go into the hands of a receiver in the same light in which such a proceeding might be viewed if financial conditions in Canada at the present time were not strained on account of the great burdens we have assumed and must assume by reason of the war.

Another method of taking over the road would be by expropriation, just as the Government can acquire any other property, and allowing the Exchequer Court to decide the value. That method is debatable, and I will not deal with it.

The other method is the one proposed by the Government, that the Government should become the possessor of the common stock of the enterprise, and thus really become the owner of the system. In doing that, if the company be allowed to retain its entity and idenity as a corporation, the Canadian Northern railway, with the Government the owner of the stock, would be liable for all the bonds, guaranteed and unguaranteed, and other liabilities as well. While at present the Government is liable for the securities which it has guaranteed, when it becomes the owner of the property it will have to assume liability for all the securities that have not been guaranteed, as well as the floating liabilities.

Let us see what we are assuming, for I take it that before we proceed far with this Bill we must know what our entire liabilities will be when we become the owner of all this stock. The statement placed before us does not, I submit, give us all the information required. The Finance Minister will remember that when aid was last given to the Canadian Northern, it was agreed that there should be a continuous audit, the Government being part owner of the system. This report contains an audit, but it has only been brought down to June 30, 1916, over a year ago. In order to know exactly what the conditions are, the House ought to be possessed of a certified audit of the Canadian Northern accounts up to June 30, 1917, with any additional information that could be given for the period intervening between June 30, 1917, and the present date.

As to the value, it would not be amiss if I were to call the attention of the committee to a portion of the majority report of the Royal Commission, the gentlemen assenting to this report being Sir Henry Drayton and Mr. Acworth. On page XII of that report I find reference to the Canadian Northern Railway system which bears on the point to which I have been directing my observations:

> Value of Canadian Northern Undertaking.
> 1. Cash Investment.
> The property investment of the Canadian Northern Railway system is stated in the balance sheet of June 30, 1916, at $494,112,489.34. This figure admittedly has been written up to include $100,000,000 of capital stock. And this stock, as we have already said, was issued without any cash consideration. We have endeavoured to ascertain the actual cost of the system. From the company's official reports and special statements supplied to us, we have ascertained that the maximum cash investment that can have been made in the property is $383,302,451.33.

That is the statement. Then follow tables which I need not give to the Committee. After making some calculations, including the amount of stock held in subsidiary companies, not held by the Canadian Northern, the Drayton-Acworth Report concludes:

> We find then $370,000,000 to be the maximum possible cost of the Canadian Northern system as at present existing. In other words, as indeed is frankly admitted by Canadian Northern witnesses, the Canadian Northern shares represent no cash investment.

If the House will bear with me I want read one or two other paragraphs. There is another one dealing with the physical basis. The report proceeds.

2. Physical Basis.

But money cost is not all. We decided also to ascertain the approximate value, on the basis of reproduction cost, of the property as it exists to-day. And we rely on Professor Swain's valuation for this purpose. This valuation is, in his opinion, a liberal estimate of the fair cost of reproducing new, at pre-war prices of labour and material, the system at present existing. It includes property belonging to the system at its estimated cost, if it had to be acquired or constructed to-day. And therefore it not only gives the company credit for lands which it in fact owns, even though it obtained them as a grant; but it also credits the company with the increment of land values since the date of the original acquisition. And these two items are quite large.

It will be noted that in making this statement the Royal Commission is endeavouring to get at what it would cost to reproduce the Canadian Northern Railway system at the prices and values ranging just before the war, as it would not be fair to take the scale of wages and prices of everything at the present time, because after the war is over these will drop again. In making its valuation it gives the system credit for the land values, and the increase of these land values since they were acquired by the Canadian Northern Railway company from the Parliament of Canada. Then it proceeds:

Professor Swain's method of arriving at his results are fully explained in his report, which is printed as an appendix hereto. He makes the total cost of reproduction new, $397,441,567. From this he deducts for depreciation $40,031,889, making the cost of reproduction of the property in its present condition $357,409,678. This, however, does not include equipment. The equipment was inspected by Mr. Buchanan and, on the basis of his report as to quantities and condition, a valuation has been made by Mr. W. H. Chadbourn, C.E., chief engineer of our valuation staff. He finds the cost of reproduction new at pre-war prices to be $56,590,418, and the depreciation to be $11,250,433, making the present value $45,339,985. Putting the two valuations together, we have $402,749,663 as the fair cost of reproducing the entire physical Canadian Northern system in its present condition. Now the outstanding liabilities (bonds, debentures, notes, and bank and other loans) of the company exceed $400,000,000.

Reckoning on this basis, it appears that the liabilities are practically equal to the reproduction cost of the physical property. But the physical property does not all belong to the Canadian Northern shareholders. There are minority holdings in several of the subsidiary undertakings. And the Canadian Northern interest in these undertakings only corresponds to its percentage proportion of their respective share capitals. This implies a reduction of more than $10,000,000 in the estimate of the assets belonging to the Canadian Northern shareholders.

We find then that, on the physical basis, the value of the property of the Canadian Northern shareholders is distinctly less than the amount of the liabilities against it. On this basis the equity of the shareholders must be regarded as non-existent.

Now I propose to read a paragraph referring to the Canadian Northern as a going concern. It is as follows:

3. Going Concern.

A third basis of estimate is the value of the property for sale as a going concern. A purchaser would not consider either original cost or reproduction cost as of much importance. The price he would pay would be based on earning power, present and potential. On this basis he would consider how far the Canadian Northern is at present short of covering its fixed charges, how long it will take to reach equilibrium, how much new capital will have to be spent, how soon a dividend may be expected and at what rate. Calculating on this basis, in the light of the figures set out above, it is evident that no purchaser would offer for the property a sum amounting to the total of its liabilities.

The commissioners conclude in these words:

Conclusion As to Canadian Northern.

We conclude, therefore, that the shareholders of the company have no equity either on the ground of cash put in, or on the ground of physical reproduction cost, or on the ground of the saleable value of their property as a going concern.

If then the people of Canada have already found or assumed responsibility for the bulk of the capital; if they must needs find what further capital is required; and if they must make up for some years to come considerable deficits in net earnings, it seems logically to follow that the people of Canada should assume control of the property. We return later to the Canadian Northern Company in order to set out our recommendations as to its ownership and management in the future and as to the returns to be offered to the existing shareholders.

I have read that to give the committee the viewpoint of the Royal Commission, on the value of the property, and the intrinsic value of the physical assets of the company as well as the lack of value of the shares. They say that the shareholders have no equity, or that the equity is not worth anything.

Let me take up the figures as set out in the financial statement of the Canadian Northern system, audited, as I pointed out to the minister, only to June 30, 1916.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The annual accounts of a system such as this are not usually closed for six weeks or two months after the end of the fiscal year. It is not possible to obtain at the present time the financial statement to the 30th June, 1917. I do not think it will be possible to obtain it for three or four weeks. I have a statement as to the earnings, gross and net, down to June 17, 1917, which I shall place upon Hansard. My hon. friend will observe also in the statement which was laid on the Table the other day, that a statement is given as to the securities outstanding as on June 30, 1917. In other words, I have brought down all official documents that I think are extant and authenticated to date. The audit to which my hon. friend refers, by the Government auditors, was a continuous running monthly audit, and they have reported from month to month.

Mr. GRAHAM: The company's financial year ends on June 30. If, with the information we have, the minister could give us the net earnings or the gross earnings and the expenditure, and the liabilities, if any, incurred during the year, it would perhaps answer the purpose.

I find that in the statement laid on the Table of the finances of the company up to June 30, 1916, the company, as stated by the Royal Commission, placed their property investment, including their equipment, acquired securities, etc., at $494,112,489.34. Taking the whole statement, I find that they place their assets at $578,747,291.25 and the liabilities, which include a surplus on land account and railway account of about $40,000,000, at the same amount.

But let me take up just for a moment the securities guaranteed by the Federal and Provincial Governments. I find on page 5 of this report that the Dominion and Provincial Governments have guaranteed bonds, debenture stock, to the extent of $104,613,247.83.

The bonds guaranteed by the provinces are as follows:

Manitoba	25,662,545 51
Saskatchewan	14,884,213 32
Alberta	18,950,361 99
British Columbia	40,157,523 86
Total provincial guarantees.	$107,514,642 27

In addition to this list of securities guaranteed by federal or provincial authorities, we find, on pages 6 and 7, that there are unguaranteed securities to the extent of $147,803,745.54, or a total of $359,931,635.64. In addition to these amounts it must be remembered that nearly all these lines were subsidized over and above the guarantees given, so that what we have now guaranteed together with the provinces and what we have given in subsidies constitutes a very large portion of the money that has gone into the Canadian Northern system. I have gone over this hurriedly, just to draw attention to two or three points; first, we ought to know absolutely what all our liabilities will be when we take possession of this system—all the liabilities. I have outlined the guaranteed securities. Then I think it will be admitted that, in addition to our own guaranteed securities of $104,000,000, we will eventually have to see that the provinces are protected in their $107,000,000 guaranteed bonds as the property becomes ours, and, in addition, we will have to assume liability for $147,000,000 unguaranteed securities. But, in addition to this, there is a large floating indebtedness. I am of the opinion that, in addition to any amount included in this statement, it will be found that there are various bills payable throughout the Dominion to contractors and others, which the Government will have to assume if they become owners of this system.

Before very much progress is made we ought to have before us the amount of these other liabilities. Instances have been called to my attention, contractors have visited me, to see if the Government was likely to take over this line, and what I knew about it. And they asked, if the road were taken over would they be sure of having their bills settled. The Government could take the position, it is true, with regard to these outstanding accounts, that the liability was that of the Mackenzie-Mann company, and that when we take over the property we will not assume the liability. Legally, I suppose they could take that position. But the Government would not argue—and the people would not allow it to argue, and Parliament would not consent to the proposition that the country should take over, say, a bridge for which the contractors had not been paid, and leave that account unpaid. If the contractors can substantiate their accounts, I take it for granted the Government will have to assume liability in respect for them.

Then there is another matter to which the Drayton report refers, for which I am not going to take their figures, but will just make a general statement, because I have not had time to go into it. There are many enterprises in which the Canadian Northern is engaged at the present time. There are the terminals at Montreal, the Vancouver terminals, betterments all along the line, improvements yet to be finished in the city of Quebec, some probably in the city of Toronto—in fact, in a great many towns, the Canadian Northern is making betterments, as well as along their line. We ought to have a statement before we proceed to purchase this property, not only as to the value of the line itself and as to the liabilities, but as to how much money it will take to complete the undertakings which the system has launched; because, without the completion of these undertakings the system will not at all be perfect according to the view of the present proprietors and managers. In addition to that, I think it is fair to assume that millions of dollars will be needed for betterments along the line of the Canadian Northern—the strengthening of bridges, the improvement, not of grades, but in ballasting and improvements in a great many ways which the Finance Minister understands, and which the Minister of Railways understands perhaps better. That will take millions of dollars. Then, it is admitted on all sides that the Canadian Northern, like all other railways, is short of rolling stock. The Canadian Pacific railway is equipped with, I think, seven freight cars to the mile, while the Canadian Northern has three. The fair proportion at least for the Canadian Northern business would be five freight cars to the mile. This will cost millions of dollars, too. Roughly speaking we are entering upon a scheme of purchase, the value of which we do not know, with a liability for completion the figures for which we ought to have in our hands, with a further liability for betterment the amount of which we ought to know, and with a still further necessary liability for rolling stock and motive power. These things we must know before we can tell just how far we are going, or what investment we intend to make in this great project of public ownership. Another point that comes to my mind is that in some portions of the main line, and particularly in the subsidiary companies, the securities have been disposed of at a very small rate. Their face value is par. The moment the Government becomes the owner of this road, unless legislation be introduced to prevent it, the value of these securities is likely to approximate par, perhaps not go to par, but it will be enhanced in value very materially, and this will open the door for an immense stock-jobbing process, out of which those who are sufficiently fortunate to be on the inside will be able to make fortunes compared with which anything gotten out of the Canadian Northern will be a bagatelle. During the past five years, if any of the investors in the unguaranteed securities had been assured that they would receive the principal invested in these securities, with the interest up to date, they would have been happy individuals. I think it is feasible, when the Government is proposing to take over this property and become responsible for all these securities, to take steps to provide against the country becoming liable for par value for securities, the proceeds of which, in some instances, have been very much below par value. If on the other hand, no steps of that kind be taken, and these bonds become enhanced in value as they will, and the Government be obliged eventually to pay par, then we shall be compelled to pay millions upon millions of money for this road for which there is no value in the road itself, because no one pretends that par value has gone into the construction of the road. Just what that would amount to I am not prepared to say, but the Finance Minister would have an idea, if he has access to these securities—and they are all quoted to-day, I think. The question of the valuation of the shares is one that is very important. No one can accuse me of endeavouring to deal unfairly with any men of enterprise who have put their labour and money into these public concerns, but at the present time I am rather inclined to think that whatever might be given to Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann or the holders of the common stock of the Canadian Northern would be in the way of a recognition of the work they had performed in the development of Canada, rather than of any value as attached to the shares of the company. The Drayton-Acworth report comes out very strongly as to the lack of value in these shares. I am not going to discuss that, but in view of the fact that this system could now be taken possession of by the Government, either by allowing it to go into the hands of a receiver or by expropriation and a valuation placed upon it by the Exchequer Court, I am inclined to think that the value to be placed upon these 600,000 shares should not be made by a board of arbitrators at all.

But if the Government believe that something ought to be given to Mackenzie and Mann on account of other considerations, the amount proposed to be given ought to be stated in the legislation; then we shall see whether or not Parliament will accept the proposal. I have not the most implicit confidence in what might be done by a board of arbitrators. If I had to leave a matter of this kind to any body at all, I would rather leave it to the Exchequer Court, the body that ought to deal with such things. Under present conditions, therefore, I am rather inclined to think that if any method is to be adopted of placing a value on these shares, it should not be that of arbitration; the matter should be sent to the Exchequer Court. If the Royal Commission be right and the shareholders have no equity of any value, we ought to say so distinctly, rather than imply by referring the matter to any body that the contrary is the case. On the other hand, if the Government see fit to recommend that an amount be given to the proprietors of the Canadian Northern Railway system in recognition of the development of the country through their work and in consideration of the Government's taking over their handiwork, I would suggest that the Government make up their mind what the amount is to be and, as I have said, have the amount stated in the legislation brought before the House. In any case, we ought to know what this enterprise is going to cost us before we go into it. Even if we have before us all the information in regard to the other items, a board of arbitrators might place upon these shares a valuation that would not be approved by the Exchequer Court. The country will not know what we are going to pay for this enterprise unless we state in definite terms what we propose to spend, if anything, for these shares. Full information should be brought down in reference to the proposed cost for betterments, for completion, for liability to contractors, so that we shall know just what we are assuming. I suggest that the Government abandon the idea of leaving to arbitration the valuation of these shares; that they rather make a concrete proposal so that we shall know what we are doing.

When aid was granted on a previous occasion to the Canadian Northern Railway system, there was a trust deed under which these securities were dealt with, carrying with it certain obligations on behalf of the company. I think it was called the new trust deed; its terms, are not to be found in the statute. In order that we may be informed whether the company have complied with the obligations embraced in that trust deed, it is fair that a copy of it should be placed before us.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend has covered a good deal of ground and has asked for considerable information, much of which, I think, is already before the committee. I will take up his arguments as he proceeded. I think he fully outlined the three courses that are open to us in respect of this railway system. The first was that the Government might allow the Canadian Northern railway system to go into the hands of a receiver. It has been common ground on both sides of this House, and it was the opinion of all the members of the Royal Commission appointed last year to deal with the problem of railways and transportation, that the Canadian Northern system and the Grand Trunk Pacific system should not be allowed to go into the hands of a receiver. That was the position taken on both sides of the House—there may have been some exceptions—in 1914. For example, we find the right hon. leader of the Opposition in 1914—Hansard, page 3681—making the following statement:

> I said a moment ago, and I repeat, that this enterprise must go on. It has been conceived for the benefit of the Canadian people. We require this railway. My right hon. friend said he would not let it go into liquidation. It must not go into liquidation.

So that my hon. friend, in expressing the view that he did against allowing the Canadian Northern railway system to go into liquidation, merely agreed in the views which have been expressed on both sides of the House and by the members of the Royal Commission. My hon. friend adverted to a further consideration in that connection—the guarantees by the provinces and by the Dominion Government. I stated when giving notice of these resolutions that the credit of the Dominion Government and of nearly all the provincial Governments of Canada, especially of the western provinces, are inextricably involved with the credit of this great railway enterprise. That is an additional reason why the system should not be allowed to go into the hands of a receiver.

My hon. friend next mentioned the alternative of taking proceedings of expropriation and acquiring physical possession of the Canadian Northern Railway system. But one good reason why that should not be done is that the corporate entities of the several corporations embraced in the Canadian Northern Railway system would then be lost. The Dominion Government would then own the physical properties of the Canadian Northern Railway system just as it to-day owns the physical property of the Intercolonial and of the National Transcontinental from Moncton to Winnipeg. Upon these two latter railways there are no obligations. If the Government foreclosed and took possession of all the physical properties of the system it would find itself in immediate ownership and also in immediate privity of obligation. Undoubtedly as a result there might be a great deal of litigation, because the Government's foreclosing under the $45,000,000 mortgage, or under the mortgage which was taken last year, would constitute default under most of the trust mortgages securing the underlying issues, with the result that receivers and liquidators might be appointed. I do not say that that result would necessarily follow, because if the Government foreclosed the holders of these securities would probably assume that the Government would take care of the whole situation; consequentiy they would not resort to litigation. But there seems no doubt as to their legal right to do so, and there might be a considerable amount of litigation. But that is not the main consideration why the Government should not foreclose and take over the physical properties in this system, although it is a very strong reason for our not doing so.

The chief advantage of preserving the corporate identity of all the companies embraced in the system is that it maintains the financing which is already being done and it facilitates future financing; that is to say, by acquiring—and that is the third alternative, of which my hon. friend spoke —the entire $100,000,000 of the capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railway company, which in turn controls the stock of all the underlying companies, the Government is enabled to asist the corporate financing of that system. In other words, the system of finance which has been adopted and which is now being employed will continue to be employed, the Government giving such assistance as may, from time to time, be necessary.

My hon. friend spoke of the liabilities which the Dominion Government would assume in acquiring the stock of this road. Legally, the Government does not immediately become in privity with the holders of the outstanding securities and indebtedness on the road, but I should not be frank with the committee if I did not say that a Government taking over the capital stock and controlling an enterprise such as this would, of course, have the intention of continuing the system as a going concern. I might, however, point out that by acquiring the stock, we are in no materially different position from that in which we are to-day by reason of the guarantees which the Dominion has given in the past. The $45,000,000 guarantee given in 1914 and the advance of $16,000,000 which we made last year are both secured by mortgages which come next after the mortgages securing the underlying bonds, debenture stock and other issues. The Government is, therefore, in this position, that, having regard to the guarantees given in the past—that is to say, the first mortgage guarantees and the guarantees given in 1914 and 1916 —unless we decide to forego the value of the equity which we hold under those mortgages, we practically must pay the interest on the underlying securities. That is also a very strong reason against a receivership, because if a receivership of the Canadian Northern Railway system took place, the Dominion Government and several of the provincial Governments would really be the receivers, because, being guarantors of the securities, they are liable. That is a very strong argument, as I think my hon. friend intimated, against placing these roads in liquidation.

I stated that most of the information for which my hon. friend asked was before the committee, and in order that we may see what we have and in order then that we may learn what further information is required, and that we may obtain it, I would like to refer to the information we have which was placed upon the Table the other day.

Mr. PUGSLEY: This was brought down only to considerably more than a year ago.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Before my hon. friend came in, I explained the reason for that. The Canadian Northern Railway system is so large, like indeed other railway systems such as the Canadian Pacific or the Grand Trunk, that it is not possible to obtain a balance sheet immediately at the close of the fiscal year. It usually requires four or six weeks to obtain a balance sheet.

Mr. PUGSLEY: At last session, when the loan of $16,000,000 was authorized, the minister made a very strong point of the fact that there was to be a continuous audit by auditors appointed by the Government, and it seems to me it follows from the fact that an audit is made from time to time that the information ought to be presented to this committee for the consideration of the resolution.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend was out of the Chamber when I adverted to that matter, but I will repeat what I said.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I will learn it from another source. The minister need not take up the time of the committee in repeating what he said.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We did make that announcement, and we did, forthwith, after the legislation was enacted, appoint Messrs. Marwick, Mitchell & Company, a very reputable firm of chartered accountants, to carry on a continuous audit of the revenues and expenditures of the Canadian Northern Railway system. That continuous audit is a different thing from the yearly balance sheet. That audit has been duly performed, and reports have, from time to time, been made to the Railway Department.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does the minister not think we should have those reports?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I have no objection. I will make inquiry and see if they are available, as I believe they are, and there is no reason why my hon. friend should not have them. It is my desire to give the committee as full information as possible. A statement was placed in my hands by the Secretary of the Canadian Northern dealing with the items of gross earnings, operating expenses and net earnings, corresponding with the audit made by the auditors appointed by the Government. For the year from June 30, 1916, to June 30, 1917, the gross earnings amounted to $42,071,086.66, the operating expenses to $30,623,732.08, and the net earnings to $11,447,354.58. Those net earnings, being subject to certain adjustments when the balance sheet is finally completed, are in excess of the net earnings shown by the balance sheet of last year, the net earnings being then $9,500,000. In other words, according to the statement submitted by the Canadian Northern Railway company and verified by the auditors appointed by the Government, there appears to be an increase in net earnings for the past year of some $2,000,000.

Mr. GERMAN: Has the Canadian Northern Railway company, or any person on their behalf, applied to the Government for financial aid, or why is this proposition being suggested? Having net earnings to the amount of $9,000,000 to $11,000,000, are they applying to the Government now for financial aid?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is a very proper question. But perhaps my hon. friend was not in the House the other day when I made a speech on this subject. I thought I had attended to that point very fully. I shall, however, be glad to give my hon. friend the information. The explanation is a very simple one. A railway company like the Canadian Northern—in fact, any railway company—is continually required to make betterments, to provide rolling stock, and to make instalment payments upon equipment secured.

Mr. GERMAN: I heard what the minister said the other day.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The reason why the Canadian Northern requires aid at the present time is found conclusively in the financial statements which I have mentioned.

Mr. GERMAN: Have they asked for aid?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I hope my hon. friend does not think that the Government is without any intimation from the Canadian Northern that they need aid, and is going out of its way to provide aid, or to take over the system. If the Canadian Northern was able to finance itself this matter would not be before the House; the Canadian Northern would be paying interest upon its underlying securities, would be financing its betterments, paying for its rolling stock, floating all its temporary loans, and not putting in an appearance at Ottawa at all. It is because they find themselves in a position where they cannot go on and where Government aid is imperatively necessary or default must occur, that this measure is before the House.

Mr. GERMAN: How much do they ask for?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Canadian Northern have presented their situation to the Government, and this situation is disclosed in the statement which I have laid before Parliament. The Government, instead of bringing in a Bill to afford aid as they did last year, have taken the ground that they will acquire the stock interests of the Canadian Northern owners, so that such aid as they afford will be aid to an enterprise which will be owned by the people of Canada instead of by the present proprietors.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does the minister state that the Canadian Northern have made no written application for assistance which can be submitted to the House?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: They have made no written application for assistance.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What verbal application have they made, what amount have they asked for, and for what purpose?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Canadian Northern officials presented their financial statement to the Government. They have certain short-term liabilities maturing during the present year, which they may be able to renew—probably will be able to renew.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Are they not all secured by Government guaranteed bonds?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Nearly all of them are. I believe they will be able to renew most of them, if not all. It must be borne in mind that we are in war time, and that it is not possible to speak with certainty as to whether loans secured, as my hon. friend has said, by the highest kind of collateral, can be renewed, although I believe myself that they will be renewed. But apart from that, by reason of the fact that the Canadian Northern has to take its net earnings to provide for betterments, for principal payments on rolling stock already required, and for new rolling stock, it is not possible for them to pay the interest on their underlying securities. Apart from the question of the renewal of short-term obligations, and the question of liability upon open account, which I believe is considerable, the Canadian Northern would require in the neighbourhood of $20,000,000 to pay interest obligations incurred and to be incurred in respect of securities taking priority over the $45,000,000 mortgage of the Dominion Government.

That was the position brought to our attention, and that being the position, instead of bringing down a Bill to give aid to the extent of $20,000,000 or $25,000,000, which would, I think, be the minimum that would be required for the purpose of enabling the Canadian Northern to continue during the coming year as a solvent, going concern, the Government determined to take over the road for the people of Canada, so that any aid we might be called upon to furnish would inure to the benefit of the people of Canada.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Would the minister state what is the amount of these short-term notes, where they are held—I presume either in London or New York, or both—and what are the guaranteed securities which have been hypothecated as security for these short-term notes?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is the point to which I was about to advert. I think my hon. friend will find all that information in the document which has been laid on the Table. I want to find out just what we have before the House, because a great deal of the information asked for by the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) has already been placed on the Table; and when we have ascertained definitely what there is before the House, we can see what further information may reasonably be required, and endeavour to obtain it for the information of the members of the committee. My hon. friend from South Renfrew referred to the securities some of which he thought had been issued at a rate very much below par. That is not my understanding of the situation.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will my hon. friend answer my question?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I intended first to deal with the long-date securities, and then come to the short-term securities, as I thought I could cover the ground better in that way. As I was saying, I am not aware that the securities of the Canadian Northern system have been sold at a heavy discount. On the contrary, in 1914, when a complete statement was made to this House as to the securities which had been issued and as to the amount which they had realized, the entire House was surprised that they had been so successful in placing at low interest rates their securities by successive issues in London.

Mr. GRAHAM: Some of the subsidiary companies are pretty low.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: They did not issue the securities of the subsidiary companies. What they did was this: The parent company would take the debenture stock or other securities of the subsidiary company, and against that issue their own debenture stock, and that debenture stock was issued at a very low rate of interest indeed, even at that time, but exceedingly low as compared with the rates prevailing now.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That does not apply to the $147,000,000 of their securities against which there is no debenture stock.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am speaking of the securities, and in passing, I want to make this observation. If ever there was a proper time to acquire a railway system whose securities have been put out at a comparatively low rate of interest this is the time, because this is the time of high interest rates, and it will be many years indeed before it will be possible even for the Government of Canada to issue securities on the basis on which these securities were issued by the Canadian Northern. The same argument applies to the Grand Trunk. It is surprising at what a low rate of interest they put out their securities in view of the rates which prevail to-day for securities of the Imperial Government in London, and of the Dominion Government here.

Mr. LEMIEUX: This is a time when the Government is paying a very high rate of interest—an abnormal rate.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I agree that it is a high rate. My hon. friend has made several speeches in the House about the increasing public debt and the rate of interest paid, and while I did not interrupt him the thought was in my mind whether he fully realized that this country has been engaged for the last three years in the greatest war of all history. What kind of rates does he expect the Government would be paying at a time like this? Does he expect that we would not have an increasing public debt, and that we could finance on the same basis as in the piping days of peace? My hon. friend should realize that we have been engaged for three years in the greatest struggle of all history, and in that struggle we have played a great part. It is not to be wondered at, that the national debt is increasing, or that, in common with all other nations, we are called upon to pay an abnormal, war-time rate of interest.

I want to point out the extremely favourable situation which exists in so far as these securities are concerned. In looking over the statement I am agreeably surprised to find that the financing has been such that the payment of the principal of the obligations is for the most part extended away into the future at comparatively low rates of interest. If my hon. friend will look at page 5 he will find the following:

Statement of Securities Outstanding, showing: Securities guaranteed by Dominion Government, Securities guaranteed by provincial governments, Securities unguaranteed, Maturities of all issues, Annual Fixed charges, June 30, 1917.

In passing, let me point out that this statement is to June 30, 1917. For these securities, being securities guaranteed by the Dominion Government, the dates of maturities are 1953, 1958, and 1934, and the interest rates at three per cent, three and a half per cent, and four per cent. You have these extraordinarily low rates of interest for a debt funded for all that time. Take the Canadian Northern Alberta railway; you have three and a half per cent debenture stock maturing in 1962 and 1960, and Canadian Northern Ontario three and a half per cent debenture stock maturing in 1961. Taking these altogether, you get a total of Dominion guaranteed stock of $104,613,247.83 most of it maturing from thirty-five to more than forty years from now. Looking over the balance sheet, one is immediately impressed by the fact that this debt is funded for thirty or forty years at lowest rates of interest. It would not pay the Dominion Government to substitute other securities at par because the Government to-day could not issue securities at as low a rate of interest as these bear. Guaranteed by Ontario, you have maturities in 1938 and 1936, and guaranteed by Manitoba you have securities maturing in 1929 and 1930. I shall not go over the entire list, but the committee will see that most of the debt of the road is well funded at rates of interest exceedingly low having regard to the prevailing rates of to-day.

Now, let us take the unguaranteed securities. The largest issue of the lot is an issue of $61,837,788.96 four per cent perpetual consolidated debenture stock. This statement also shows the dates of maturity of all the other unguaranteed securities. The land securities are shown at the top of page 7. Then there is the Canadian Northern railway four per cent Dominion Government guarantee debenture stock under the legislation of 1914, amounting to $44,866,667.33; and there is the Canadian Northern Ontario three and a half per cent debenture stock amounting to $35,770,000. These are all long-date issues. There are also the securities guaranteed by the province of British Columbia.

So far as the long-date securities are concerned, the situation is a very simple one, and one in regard to which the sole question that arises is: will the interest be earned? The debt is so well funded and matures so far away in the remote future, that it can then be paid or extended if necessary.

Now, we come to the question very properly raised by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) as to the short-term securities. My hon. friend will find a memorandum on page 8, and he will find particulars as to the collateral on page 11. Taking up page 8 first, we find that the short-date loans amount to $98,276,883. Those loans mature over the next two years. The way that situation would be handled would be this: as the loans are practically all well secured, the officers of the Canadian Northern—for the Canadian Northern is still to be preserved as a railway company—would approach the issuing houses and arrange to retire these loans from the proceeds of new short-term issues. They would take the collateral and make new short-date loans of a year, or two years, or three years. They might have to pay off a few hundred thousand dollars in the transaction but by making new loans they would be put in funds to retire the existing loans. Supposing that by reason of the war it was not possible, in the case of any given security, notwithstanding the high class of collateral lodged against it at the present time, to renew the loan, the Dominion Government might have to assist in paying off the loan; but in assisting in paying it off it would have, of course, the collateral lodged against it, which is a substantial percentage in excess of the amount which is borrowed. The committee, therefore, is in possession of full information with regard to current liabilities. They are all shown on page 8.

Mr. GERMAN: Are the figures given under "obligations" current liabilities?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am glad that my hon. friend has mentioned that. He has in mind, no doubt, what my hon. friend from South Renfrew said as to whether there was any indebtedness to contractors. I made careful inquiry about that, and I am getting a statement respecting it for the information of the committee. But I am told that all obligations to contractors are practically cleaned up. The secretary of the Railway Department tells me that there is not on record with the department at the present time $100,000 of claims against the Canadian Northern Railway system. The situation has been cleared up since 1914 when there were large amounts outstanding due to contractors. There may be some outstanding liabilities, but if there are they are comparatively small.

Mr. MURPHY: There was an action commenced for a large amount some two years ago.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: By Foley-Welch?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The claim with regard to the Sudbury-Port Arthur branch has been settled.

Mr. PUGSLEY: On the question of short-term notes, would the minister give the committee some information? From the statement on page 12 it would appear that the amount borrowed in New York is $21,750,000. As collateral for that, there are $30,648,247.33 of Government securities. Those would be guaranteed securities and there would be a margin of nearly nine millions. Is it open to the Canadian Northern Railway company to dispose of those guaranteed bonds that are now simply up as collateral? Is there anything in their agreement with the Government which would prevent them from selling them outright?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There is no arrangement. If, when these notes matured—and it could not be done before—the Canadian Northern paid them off, the collateral would go to the Canadian Northern and would become part of the assets of that company.

Mr. PUGSLEY: On the New York loans there is a margin of 50 per cent.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Not of real value; that is of face value. I have shown the committee that we have a complete statement as to Government guaranteed loans and as to unguaranteed funded debt; also a complete statement as to the short-term loans and current liabilities, and also a complete statement as to the collateral held as security for the latter. I have said that there is practically no indebtedness outstanding to contractors.

I come now to the last point made by the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham), as to the mode of acquiring these shares, and also as to what would be the prospective requirements of this road for the next two years. The amount of money which may be spent upon any road is variable. There is no doubt that very large sums might be spent upon the Canadian Northern to equip it properly in order that it may render the maximum of public service. On the other hand, a road can be operated so as to give a reasonable public service with an expenditure that falls short of the amount which would be required to give an ideal service. Therefore, the amount which would be required upon the Canadian Northern for the next five years is a matter, necessarily, of estimate, and, not only that, but it is one which may depend upon the amount of money available. In the report which is before the House, made by Sir Henry Drayton and Mr. Acworth, the matter is gone into very fully. There is an immense amount of information in this report. Nearly all the information asked for by the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) will be found in it. On page XL there is a paragraph headed "Prospective Requirements of Canadian Northern." They say:

The Canadian Northern estimate submitted to us further calculated that, in course of the next five years, the company will need to spend $12,500,000 of new capital for additions and betterments, and $25,000,000 for new equipment. We consider these estimates entirely inadequate, and especially so in relation to the estimate of 90 per cent increase in gross receipts. The company has acknowledge that its equipment is inadequate to take care of its existing business. That equipment stands in the company's books at $59,000,000. If the business were to increase 90 per cent, it would seem to need not $25,000,000 but over $50,000,000 spent on new equipment to handle it.

That is to say, if $50,000,000 is spent the business will increase 90 per cent, and, of course, if the business increased 90 per cent the expenditure would be more than justified and to a considerable extent liquidated by the earnings. The amount that will be spent upon the Canadian Northern in the future is not susceptible of accurate estimate, but if the Dominion Government is acquiring, as it is, a system such as this, it should be its object, consistently with the financial position from time to time, to so improve the facilities of the road as to render the best service to the public. The railway companies of Canada, with the exception of the Canadian Pacific, are all short of rolling stock. The fact that the Government of Canada will have to expend a certain amount on the Canadian Northern line and large amounts for rolling stock for the road is, of course, no argument against the acquisition of that system, because the rolling stock is required to carry our agricultural products to the seaboard and to render service generally to the commercial community. I do not know of any greater need in this country than that of rolling stock. The shops are working to their utmost capacity. The Minister of Railways is, I believe, willing to place orders for rolling stock practically to the maximum of the capacity of the industrial establishments of the Dominion, to the end that the railways of Canada, the Intercolonial, the National Transcontinental, the Canadian Northern, may be equipped to render the best service to the public.

The hon. member for South Renfrew spoke of having a valuation made by the Exchequer Court. I may say that in reaching a determination to have the value of these shares fixed by an arbitration we were influenced by several considerations. I shall mention only two main considerations.

Mr. GERMAN: Why not give us all?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The two principal considerations. The Drayton-Acworth report recognizes that there should be equitable consideration for the owners of the stock of the Canadian Northern railway, and they suggest, in a plan which they propose, that arbitrators should determine the amount of stock which the Canadian Northern Railway owners and pledgees should be allowed to retain, and further the amount of the earnings of the Dominion Railway company which would be properly attributable to these shares. They recommend arbitration, and the mode which we have adopted in the resolution is precisely on all-fours with the recommendation of the Drayton-Acworth report; that is to say, that the owners of the stock should name one arbitrator, the Dominion Government should name another, and the two so appointed should name a third, or if they cannot agree that the third should be named by the senior judge of the Exchequer Court. There is another principal consideration. A legal controversy as to values, based upon all the factors that might enter into it, of a great railway system could extend quite conceivably over a year and a half or two years. I refer to the various factors entering into the valuation of the shares of a railway. They are all indicated by Professor Swain and are set out in the Drayton-Acworth report. In the first place, there is the question of physical value. I need not say to this House that if we had as able a lawyer on our side as the hon. gentleman from St. John, and the owners and pledgees had on the other side as equally able a lawyer, if he could be found in Canada—

Mr. PUGSLEY: And both sides interested in making a strong case?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: and both sides interested in making as strong a case as possible as to the value of the physical properties of a railway system of 9,500 miles, my hon. friend can see the vista opened to the legal imagination, as to the element of original value and all interest upon that, and the reproduction value. All that would be talked about by the lawyers, and all that would be dealt with by the expert witnesses who would be called by legion.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Marvellous possibilities in arbitrations.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No, before the court.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have been on arbitrations. Give me an arbitration every time.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is only one factor of cost, and by no means a conclusive factor in the case. The least conclusive factor as to value is the matter of the physical property. It is a factor, as pointed out in the report, but it is by no means conclusive as to value. You may have a book value in which the assets are very much greater than the liabilities, but that is by no means a conclusive factor as to what is a fair value for the shares, because the question arises as to what is the actual earning power, the potential earning power, and, apart from that, the financial position of the system. All those factors would have to be taken into consideration. Now, with the procedure before the court, I could well conceive an inquiry on expropriation lasting over a couple of years. My view is that the Board of Arbitrators, selected as set out in this resolution, would be able to deal with the situation very much more expeditiously and just as fairly as before the Exchequer Court.

Mr. MURPHY: Would that not depend on the scope of the reference of submission to arbitration?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The scope of the reference is a simple one. It reads as follows:

3. The said arbitrators shall determine the value of the said six hundred thousand shares as of the date of the said agreement and the said arbitrators shall proceed in a summary way and may apply their own judgment in determining such value and may receive with respect thereto, such reports and statements authenticated in such way as they may decide and such evidence as they may deem necessary or helpful, examine witnesses under oath and hear the parties by counsel or representatives and that the unanimous determination of the arbitrators shall be final, but should the determination not be unanimous an appeal from such determination shall lie to the Supreme Court of Canada on behalf of the Governor in Council, or of the owners or pledgees, upon any question of law or fact, such appeal to be made within thirty days from the rendering of the determination.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What is meant by "summary"? In what way could they proceed?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not know any one who knows better than my hon. friend the meaning of the word "summary." I have a good memory, and so has he. I remember one occasion in the House, when I was called upon to define the word "summary," my hon. friend came to my assistance, as he sometimes does, and he defined the word "summary" in a very satisfactory way. No doubt he will recollect, because no one knows better than he does what it means.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I know what it means in criminal proceedings, but I don't know about this matter.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think it denotes freedom from the rigid proceedings of a court, dealing with a matter in a summary or direct commonsense way, the idea being to obtain an award in a reasonable time.

Mr. GERMAN: "Summary" in legal phraseology sometimes means that only one party is heard.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Here we give the power to deal with it in a summary way. My hon. friend from South Renfrew thinks that, instead of determining the value of the shares we should approximate a lump sum in recognition of the services of Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann. I do not agree with that view at all. I do not believe that it is part of the duty of the Government of Canada, or of Parliament, to recognize the services of men working for their own interests in the building of a transcontinental road or otherwise. I think the proper way to deal with it, if we determine to acquire the shares—as we have to acquire the shares— is to have their fair and reasonable value fixed by arbitration, or by such other procedure as may be determined upon by Parliament.

I think I have traversed the entire ground covered by the hon. member from South Renfrew. I believe that the only information that is not before us and that is required is a statement as to any outstanding liabilities to contractors, and, if possible, a balance sheet for 1917. A balance sheet got out now will not be quite accurate for the reason I have given; it will be a matter of estimate as to the last month or so if the position of the Canadian Northern Railway system is to be shown as of June 30, 1917. It is pointed out to me by he Financial Controller of the Railway Department that on page 8 the amount due contractors is set out as follows:

Due to construction contractors at April 30, 1917, $1,277,323.

These, he tells me, are nearly all holdbacks.

Mr. GERMAN: Would the minister give us the names of the pledgees of this stock, particularly of the one-sixth which, it is said, is not immediately obtainable?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I may be able to obtain that information. The majority of the stock, that is to say, 51 or 52 per cent—I am not in a position to state the precise percentage—is held by Sir William Mackenzie and Sir Donald Mann and their pledgees. The one-sixth, about which my hon. friend has inquired, is held, I believe, in England. From time to time in past years certain amounts of that stock were sold or transferred to parties with whom the owners were doing business. I am not positive as to that, however. No doubt the books of the company would show the names of the shareholders, although in the case of scrip stock, the names appearing in the books of the company are not necessarily the names of the owners of the scrip. For instance, Canadian Pacific stock might stand in the name of my hon. friend, but might be transferred by his endorsement to another party. However, I shall endeavour to obtain that information for the House.

Mr. PUGSLEY: On page 12 of the financial statement the gross earnings of the Canadian Northern Railway system are given as $42,319,000. Part of that consists of miscellaneous earnings of some subsidiary companies, including interest on investments, etc. Would that include interest upon land stock?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The financial comptroller of the Railway Department tells me that the interest on the lands is not included in that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why does the Government propose to take over certain stock in the Canadian Northern Prairie Lands company and assume thereby liability for the mortgages against the lands amounting to over $21,000,000?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The lands of this company were mortgaged to secure a debenture issue in London. The proceeds of that issue were used in the construction of the road. As the lands were sold, their proceeds are available to reduce the mortgage. As the lands are of greater value than the mortgage debt, there would be a substantial equity in those lands when the transaction is complete.

Mr. PUGSLEY: These lands to which I refer are unproductive; they are bringing no interest whatever, and they are subject to heavy municipal taxes. They are lands the cream of which was selected during the boom days. It is doubtful whether it is advisable to ask this country
10 p.m. to assume a debenture liability of $21,000,000 for something which is in no way connected with the Canadian Northern Railway system. To leave it in the hands of the present proprietors, the Canadian Northern Prairie Lands company, would be no injustice to them.

[Sir Thomas White.]

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The appraisal of the company is $29,000,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is the book value.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In one sense it is the book value, but it is also the value placed upon the lands by the company.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is the Government going to take their valuation?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I will come to that in a moment. I do not agree that these lands are not valuable; the best evidence that my hon. friend is wrong is the fact that the land mortgage debentures were floated against them. The land mortgage debentures aggregate some $17,000,000; as against that there is the value of these lands, $29,000,000. My hon. friend says: Why does the Government take over those?

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is more than $17,000,000; it is $21,000,000.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We do not take them over directly. On the one side of the balance sheet of the Canadian Northern Railway company are these lands, although they are pledged. On the other side is the liability of the stock issued in respect of them. It would be a very foolish thing for the Government, if they are to become proprietors, to allow the equity in those lands to be lost to the company. My hon. friend would not suggest that the Government should waive the equity in the lands held as security under these land mortgages.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why not?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Some years ago I knew a good deal about the land grants of the Canadian Northern, and they sold to good advantage. There are deferred payments and accrued interest on sales amounting to $7,140,000; there is cash, $2,400,000, as against a liability of——

Mr. PUGSLEY: Of $21,000,000.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: of $17,000,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Of $21,000,000—$17,000,000 and $2,000,000 and $1,850,000.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Twenty-one millions. There are lands unsold to the amount of over $19,000,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Unproductive lands are not of much value. If you have an agreement of sale and your purchasers are good and substantial amounts are paid, your agreements are valuable. They might not all be paid up.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: But the point is that there is a substantial equity.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What is the par value, not the actual value of the land company's stock which the Government is to take over under this arrangement?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Canadian Northern Railway company have put out these securities that my hon. friend has mentioned, and they are liable for them as is shown on the balance sheet. An asset which they have on the other side against that is these prairie lands. How could we take over the Canadian Northern Railway company and have that company relieved from debenture liabilities? If that is so, why should we give away to some one else the lands which the Canadian Northern has pledged?

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is one very good argument why you should expropriate the railway and rolling stock instead of placing upon the shoulders of the people of this country a liability of $21,000,000 in respect of lands they do not desire.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think that is one of the best assets the company has, except the Government guaranteed stock, because I believe in the lands of the West.

Mr. PUGSLEY: With the taxes, the surtaxes and the interest running up, nonproductive prairie land in the West is not a very valuable security. The minister ought to be able to give us some information as to these lands, because under the guise of taking over a railway and rolling stock for the purpose of operating it for what is purported to be the interest of Canada, there is included in the liability which this company will necessarily assume $21,000,000, and all the Government will have to represent that will be whatever shares of stock they hold in the Prairie Lands company. The minister is not able to tell us whether that is much or little. I have seen it stated somewhere that the par value of the stock which is held directly by the Canadian Northern Railway company is only about $50,000. That may be true or not, but the minister ought to be able to give us the information.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The chances are that the capitalization is small.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That may be. On the one hand there is the uncertainty as to the value of this unproductive land, but on the other there is the absolute certainty of the liability of this country to make good those debentures to the amount of $21,000,000. That is not fair to the people of Canada. If you want to take over this railroad because you think it will be in the public interest to improve the line and the roadbed, and to increase the rolling stock, that is one thing, but to take a lot of unproductive real estate and to assume in respect of it a bond obligation of $21,000,000 is wholly unjustifiable. The minister says: Oh, well, we cannot take the stock and leave the company with a liability upon those bonds. There might possibly be something in that were it not for the fact that in the next breath he says that the Canadian Northern Railway company is practically bankrupt. If that be so, then all the security which those debenture holders could have would be the liens upon the lands. If the Government did not assume the liability, the debenture holders would still have the security. I assume the titles for the lands are vested in the Empire Trust company. They would still hold those lands for the debenture holders, and that is the security which those gentlemen who took the debentures understood they were getting, and it is the security which they will still continue to have. If there is nothing else in this proposition, that fact alone ought to prevent this resolution from having the approval of the committee. Twenty-one millions of dollars is a very large amount of money. While the minister says there are assets upon the other side consisting of over $2,000,000 in cash, that would not much more than pay the interest for two years on those debentures. While he says they are deferred payments and accrued interest upon sales, it does not at all follow that those agreements of sale are good security; that depends upon how much has been paid on them by the purchasers, whether the purchasers have made improvements on the land, whether there are good crops in the locality in which those lands are situated, whether the crops are liable to be burned up by drought or destroyed by hail, and so on. The minister, before he asks the country to assume such an enormous liability in respect of those lands ought surely to give us some information as to where the lands are situated, how many payments have been made upon those agreements of sale, and he ought to have a statement made by an expert of the actual value of the land and how many acres have been sold. The book value of the unsold lands is put in at about $19,000,000. Where are the lands situated? Are they close to the railway, in good, productive country, in a country which is well settled? Or are they in a country which is liable to frequent drought, or in which there are other conditions which would practically destroy the value of the land? I happen to know that the energetic firm of Davidson, McRae and company, during the boom days running along prior to 1913, brought in large numbers of people from the United States, and they sold what we have a right to assume was the cream of the land grants of this company; and to-day the lands which they hold are what have been left by the people who came in from the United States. Can my hon. friend tell me what were the sales last year by this company, and what was the average value of the sales? If he could do that, it would give us an idea of how long it would take us to dispose of these lands after the Government acquired them and we should also have some idea as to whether the interest on the debentures during that time would not very largely exhaust the value of the land. I quite agree with the minister that lands well situated in the West are quite an asset, but they are not nearly as good an asset as many people think they are, because in the provinces of the West to-day there is not only a pretty heavy tax against farm lands, but also a surtax on farm lands that are not under cultivation and that surtax adds very largely to the burden of the holders of those properties. During the time the land would remain unsold, which would likely extend over a number of years, the interest has to be paid, and when you consider it all a pretty big hole is made in the value of this unproductive real estate. I, for one, no matter what I may do with regard to the general proposition of the railway, would not consent to take over these lands at all, and I think Parliament ought not to be asked to take them over, except upon the most satisfactory evidence of their having value commensurate with the enormous liability which would be assumed by the Government. To my mind, the issue of debentures to the enormous sum of $21,000,000 against unproductive land grants of this company is something beyond reason, and yet this country is actually asked to assume this liability, to make good these debentures. I think the minister should give the committee more information on this subject than he has yet afforded, and should also find out the amount of stock in this prairie land company, where the lands are situated, and what is their appraised value. I know plenty of people who have been holding lands for fifteen or twenty years because they are unable to dispose of them. A good deal depends upon the locality and upon the settlement around these lands, because settlers necessarily give a value which is not possessed by land in localities that are not settled.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: My hon. friend was asking for the location of these lands. If he will turn to page XV of the Drayton-Acworth report, he will find the following figures:

Land Grants to Canadian Northern.

Location.	Received.	Of which sold.
Nova Scotia	150,000	150,000
Quebec	402,860
Ontario	2,000,000
Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta	4,002,848	3,159,720
	6,555,708	3,309,720

In round figures the amount realized from the land sales was $16,000,000, and the company appraises its unsold lands at $19,000,000 present value. That does not appear to be an unfair value placed upon the land in comparison with the amount of money they have received, because the land will naturally be close to the railway.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The statement of my hon. friend shows his faith in human nature. He says that because the company has estimated its unsold lands at $79,000,000 and because it has already realized $16,000,000 in round figures, that that would show that the price was not unreasonable.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: That is only half the acreage sold.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does not my hon. friend realize that in the West there are lands and lands? If he would examine the reports of the surveyors of the Interior Department he would find that there is first-class land, second-class land, and third-class land. Some is good for agricultural purposes; some is easily capable of being cultivated—

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: I understand that these lands are carefully selected.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend may rely upon it that these shrewd settlers who came in from the United States when the late Colonel Davidson was actively managing that company, selected the best lands which they could find in the tract. I do not want to disparage the lands at all, but I do say that this country does not want to buy back these lands at this very high price. This country does not want to assume a bonded indebtedness of $21,000,000 against these lands. There is no necessity for it; it does not improve the railway system, and it will be of no benefit whatever to the country to have them.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Before the hon. gentleman leaves that point I should like to understand just what he means. It may be all very clear to himself, but he has not made his argument intelligible to me at all. As I understand it, the moneys derived from the sale of these bonds have gone into the road. Does not my hon. friend understand that? If he does understand that, what does he suggest? Does he suggest that we should not take the lands as an asset? The liability is there. Does he suggest that we should not take the asset with it?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I would abandon both the asset and the liability.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We are not taking the lands except in so far as we are taking the stock. We are acquiring the stock of the Canadian Northern system, and we are acquiring it by the very method he himself suggested a few years ago, namely, by arbitration. Perhaps my hon. friend has forgotten that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Not at all.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We are following out precisely the path which he indicated at that time. I really am unable to appreciate the argument of my hon. friend on that basis. The money has gone into the construction of the road; therefore, the liability on these bonds is a liability on the road. Does he mean that we should accept that liability and not take the asset which it represents?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I did not say that.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If my hon. friend's argument means anything at all it means that. If it has not that meaning it is not very intelligible to me, however intelligible it may be to him. Perhaps my hon. friend would define precisely what he is driving at.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am afraid my right hon. friend was paying more attention to his own thoughts than to what I was endeavouring to say. If he was paying attention to me he must have understood that what I was saying was that neither with the liability nor with the lands should Parliament have anything to do. We should neither assume the liability nor take the lands.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: How could the Canadian Northern, whose stock the Government is acquiring, divest itself of its bonded indebtedness upon securities issued against this land?

Mr. PUGSLEY: My argument is based upon the fact that the Government should expropriate the railway and rolling stock of the company and nothing more. Leave the company in existence, leave it the stock, and leave it the liabilities.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Why does my hon. friend depart from the method which he suggested a few years ago, when he said that we should acquire the stock by arbitration?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I did not suggest it. I opposed the transaction at that time, but as a last resort when we, being in the minority, found the Government determined to carry this measure through, I said that at all events before making a loan of some $45,000,000, the Government should make it obligatory upon the Canadian Northern that we should have the opportunity of acquiring the stock and that either by arbitration, or by the Exchequer Court, or by the Governor in Council, the amount should be fixed not to exceed a certain sum—

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Thirty million dollars.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is the argument I endeavoured to make. Not that I approved of it, but I said that if it was to be forced through, there should be that condition attached to it.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend said much more than that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I could not have said more.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend said that:

> It is fair, fair to Mackenzie and Mann and Company and it is a fair and reasonable proposition on behalf of the people of this country.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The amount mentioned was not more than $30,000,000. If it was going to be acquired at all, I suggested that that stipulation should be made. The same argument was made last year. It was argued that, the country having during past years from time to time come to the rescue of the Canadian Northern, an agreement should be made that, if deemed desirable, it might acquire the stock at an amount not exceeding $30,000,000. Now what I said is that the fact that there is this enormous liability outstanding is a practical argument against taking the property in such a way that the Government would not only acquire the railway and rolling stock, but would acquire this liability also.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Was not that enormous liability outstanding then?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not know as to that. I take it for granted that the question did not come up. My attention was not called to it at that time, because it was not proposed to take over the stock of the company. It was only proposed to make a loan or give a guarantee. But now it is proposed that the Government shall take over all the stock of the company, and become, in equity and to all intents and purposes, the Canadian Northern Railway company, and, therefore become, ipso facto, liable for all the obligations of the company, including these land grant bonds of $21,000,000.

There is another very strong argument against this proposal for taking over the stock, and it is that it is proposed to do it by arbitration. Perhaps that would be a proper way to proceed if you are simply going to take the stock; but I would ask why, if it is desirable to acquire the Canadian Northern railway and rolling stock, it should not be taken by expropriation in the ordinary way. It used to be the law in this country that whenever the Government expropriated property the valuation was determined by arbitration. That was found to be a very unsatisfactory means of arriving at the value of the property which was expropriated. Favoritism and sympathy entered into the question of arbitration. The claimant against the Government always had the sympathy of his own arbitrator, because, of course, with respect to him, he would not only have his sympathy but his actual support, and as his arbitrator he would naturally endeavour to get the most he could for the man on whose behalf he was appointed. But it was likewise the case that on the part of the arbitrator appointed to act for the Government there was a feeling of sympathy for the claimant. Then, in the appointment of the third arbitrator, a shrewd clever arbitrator appointed on behalf of the claimant would use his best endeavours to get a third arbitrator who would likely be favourable to the claimant. An arbitrator acting for the Government, having the whole nation behind him, is not likely to have the same sympathy for the Government that an arbitrator acting for the claimant would have for the claimant. The reason why that plan was changed was that there was a feeling that arbitrators allowed to claimants against the Government more than ought to have been allowed. That is why the Exchequer Court was established. With a gentleman possessing a knowledge of the law, with experience as to the valuation of property, and utterly impartial—because it was felt that from his judicial position he would be likely to be impartial—and having no sympathy for either the claimant or the Government, it was thought that the Exchequer Court would be a tribunal which would decide these questions equitably as between the individual and the Government. The Exchequer Court has been for many years in operation in Canada, and I have yet to learn that there has been any public dissatisfaction with the manner in which the different judges who have presided over that tribunal from time to time have discharged their duties. Why has that course been departed from in this case? If it is desirable in the public interest to take over the railway property of this company and nothing else—its rolling stock, elevators, and perhaps its hotels—why has the Exchequer Court been passed over? Why have we reverted to what was the practice forty or fifty years ago, why have we gone back to the proceeding by arbitration as between the claimant and the Government instead of adhering to the practice of submitting a claim of this nature to the Exchequer Court?

There is another objection to this resolution. It does not propose to have the property of this railway system valued. It is not proposed simply to pay for this railway system what it is fairly worth, but the resolution in effect declares that this stock has a value over and above the securities which are against the road. Arbitrators are to be appointed to determine what that value is. Whatever the value is found to be, when the Government takes over the stock at that valuation, it becomes liable for all the securities which are outstanding against this system and for all the liabilities, whether these liabilities are secured or not.

We find, Sir, that there is another motive which might influence the arbitrators who may be appointed by the Government and induce them to take a friendly view of the claim which the Canadian Northern, or Mackenzie and Mann, may put forward for the stock.

It is this. When the bonds of the company to the extent of $45,000,000 were guaranteed under the legislation of 1915, this Government sought to make this House and this country believe that, in taking over $40,000,000 of its common stock, they were getting an asset which would be of value to the country. Else why did they take it? They were not getting a controlling interest; Mackenzie and Mann were left to continue to operate the line and to have its management just as before. They put it forward that it was a stock that might be of very considerable value to the people of this country. In what position would an arbitrator appointed by this Government be if he found that the $60,000,000 of stock was of no value? The reproach would be made against the Government which appointed him and whose representatives he would be that the Government of 1915 had simply taken over waste paper as a consideration for entering upon the enormous liability, and that that which the Government then put forward as likely to have a very great value in the future was practically of no value at all. On the other hand, if the Government arbitrator were to recognize that the Government were right in assuming that the stock of the company had a value in 1915, he would enable this Government, whose appointee he would be, to say: What foresight we had in 1915; we took over, as a consideration for our guarantee, $40,000,00 of stock, and see the three arbitrators have valued $60,000,000 of stock at par, showing that we, in 1915, with that prescience and foresight for which at all times we are prepared to claim credit, got a security worth $40,000,000 as consideration for entering upon this liability.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend, I understand, admitted that he had suggested $30,000,000 as a figure for the whole amount of stock. Let me ask him whether, on his own assumption ,the obtaining of $40,000,000 out of $100,000,000 in 1914 was not of advantage to the people of Canada?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Provided I was right or would have been right. But my hon. friend is doing me an injustice. What I said was that as a condition of giving this guarantee, the Government would have to contract to take over this stock at the valuation fixed under law.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: By arbitration.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Did I say by arbitration? If you like, by arbitration, but not to exceed the sum of $30,000,000. Does my hon. friend think I am always right?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No, no, no; we do not claim that at all.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Has he introduced this legislation because of that amendment which I suggested—forced and driven to the last ditch in resisting the proposition put forward, a proposition which the country at large did not approve, and which I did not approve?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Oh no.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If he does so, I am prepared to admit that if a proposition had been made then as it is to-day to take over the entire system, I would have said: Take it over by expropriation and let the Exchequer Court determine its value.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend did not say that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If you took it by expropriation what would be the result? The country would have to pay what the Exchequer Court would find to be the actual value of the property. If you take it by arbitration, take it in the way you propose, no matter whether the country has to pay $10,000,000 or $60,000,000 for the stock, the country becomes liable for all the outstanding liabilities of the company, amounting to over $380,000,000. That is the position in which you are going to place this country. The hon. member for Welland (Mr. German) says it is something over $400,000,000. At all events, it is in that vicinity, and whether the road to-day is worth $200,000,000 or $400,000,000 under this proposition the moment the arbitration is made, the moment the arbitrators finish their work, the Government, under this resolution and under the Bill that is to be founded upon it, will be obliged in law to take it over and become responsible for all outstanding liabilities of the company. That is the result which will follow the arbitration and, as I have said, if the finding of the arbitrators, is unanimous, whether it is $10,000,000 or $60,000,000 or more than that, this Government will be bound to pay that amount, without any further authority from this Parliament; they are providing by this resolution that the Government must pay the amount and charge it against the consolidated revenues of this country.

My hon. friend has said that there are guaranteed liabilities, that the Dominion has guaranteed $104,000,000 and the provinces of Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, have also guaranteed debentures of this company. What are those guaranteed debentures? Those guaranteed by the Dominion amount to $104,000.000, and those guaranteed by the provinces to $107,000,000, a total of $211,-000,000. Assuming that it would be in the public interest that these liabilities should be entered into by the Dominion and that Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia should all be saved from their liabilities, what reason or what excuse is there for passing legislation which will compel this country to assume $147,-000,000 of liabilities which are unguaranteed, of liabilities to which the public faith has been in no way pledged? What reason is there for that? The investors who took the unguaranteed bonds upon the various sections of the Canadian Northern system had no promise from this Government or from the provincial governments that the securities would be made good. And yet, irrespective of the value of the securities, this Government is asking Parliament to become liable for this enormous additional sum of $147,000,000 of unguaranteed securities, and that without any regard whatever to what amount the investor paid, or to the market value of its securities. If my hon. friend will take up the financial journals, he will find these unguaranteed securities have no value in the markets of the world of much over fifty per cent, taking one with another. He will find, if he studies the financial journals, and the markets of England, Canada and New York, that he could go and buy these $147,000,000 of securities for somewhere in the vicinity of $70.000,000 to $80,000,000, according to the quoted market value to-day. And of course the securities are based, to a very considerable extent, upon the view which the investors take of the value of the property by which their securities are so secured. Yet to those securities, which I have said are not quoted in the financial market at very much over fifty cents on the dollar, ranging from fifty to sixty, and in some cases seventy per cent, it is proposed to at once give an absolute value, by the Government going behind them and taking the place of the Canadian Northern. I do not think that is a fair proposition. It seems to me that what ought to be done is for the Government to expropriate this property, to have the various portions of the system, so far as these portions are covered by independent securities, valued by the Exchequer Court, have them disposed of, and, if the holders of the securities will not make the necessary arrangement, dispose of the property, and divide the assets according to the priorities and according to the claims of the various security holders. But, without any evidence whatever of the actual cost, and knowing that the actual value as represented by the earnings is not sufficient to cover what it is proposed to pay, why the Government should undertake to pledge the credit of the country, not only for what may be awarded to Mackenzie and Mann as the holders of the common stock, but also to meet the necessary liabilities up to their face value, passes my comprehension. It seems to me it is a proposal which should not commend itself to the people of this country. And it is proposed to assume this enormous liability, which will run up to somewhere in the vicinity of $500,000,000, at a time when, in consequence of this war and in consequence of the markets of England being closed to the Canadian Government, Canada is obliged to strain every nerve to borrow the money for the purpose of doing her part in connection with the world conflict. The minister proposes to do this at a time when he is obliged to forget his determination and the determination of the people with whom he was acting not long ago, when they cried out: "No truck or trade with the Yankees," and to go to the New York money market and pay the very high rate of interest of six per cent for a short-term loan extending over a period of two years. This Government's credit has been strained to such a point that Canada, with all its vast resources, with its wonderful possibilities of future development, with its enormous riches, is compelled to pay two and a half per cent more in the markets of the United States than the United States Government was obliged to pay in connection with the flotation of its Liberty Loan, amounting to some $3,000,000,000. Is that a good record for this Government, and is this a good time in which to further strain the credit of the country, and to incur this enormous obligation, of, as I have said, in the vicinity of half a billion dollars?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: How would my hon. friend suggest tnat we should escape the financial liability and the necessity for providing a large sum of money, if we expropriated the system? If we expropriated the system, should we not have to pay a very much larger sum of money than by acquiring the stock and running the road at the present time?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Not at all.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend wants us to expropriate it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If we expropriate and the Government only has to pay $300,000,000 for this property, which I believe is all the Exchequer Court would fix as the value, surely it would be better to do so and wipe off all the liabilities.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: When?

Mr. PUGSLEY: At once.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not follow that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It would not mean paying $300,000,000, because there are $104,000,000 of obligations running for a long time, guaranteed by this Government, for which we would not have to pay the cash. There are $107,000,000 guaranteed by the provinces of Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, which we would not have to pay provided we were prepared to guarantee those provinces against any liability in respect of bonds.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We know that those securities are in the hands of investors, and not in the hands of the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. They are outstanding. The hon. gentleman suggests that we expropriate this property, pay $300,000,000, and pay off all the liabilities which would then become due. The way we are suggesting is to acquire the stock and allow the securities which are outstanding to remain outstanding and the matter will be financed in that way. If my hon. friend's point is that it is difficult to raise money now, he must realize our difficulties would be treble what they are at present if we had to expropriate and find $300,000,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The position of the Minister of Finance is that of a desperate debtor, who is willing to pay double the value of a property in order to get extended credit —who is willing to pay $500,000,000 to-day for a property that I do not believe the Exchequer Court would value at a figure upwards of $300,000,000.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. gentleman from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) suggests taking over this property at $300,000,000. If we took it over at that figure, we could not get the money at less than six per cent, which would be $18,000,000 a year. As it stands now the security of the company will average about three and a half per cent on $400,000,000. The reason that these securities are only worth half their face value today—

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is the hon. gentleman asking a question, or making a speech?

Mr. CURRIE: I am asking a question.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I will be glad to answer any question, but if the hon. gentleman wants to make a speech, he can do that later.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. gentleman has made two or three speeches on every subject this session, except where the rules of the House won't let him, and where the rules won't permit him to make a speech he generally interrupts during the speeches of everybody else.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is particularly trying to my hon. friend, who speaks so little and is so very free in his remarks, to have to wait till I get through, having made up his mind he ought to speak on this question.

Mr. CURRIE: I thought the hon. gentleman had given me his place.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am not through yet. I did not say that we would pay $300,000,000 for the property by expropriation, but what I say is that, having reference to the system, to the mileage, the mode in which it has been constructed, and the report of these commissioners, I doubt very much whether the Exchequer Court will allow more than $300,000,000, for this entire property.

When you consider the valuation put upon the property of the Canadian Pacific and the superiority of its construction over that of the Canadian Northern, you realize that the Exchequer Court would hardly value the Canadian Northern property at upwards of $300,000,000. But the Minister of Finance says: Even though the property may be worth only $300,000,000; even though there are $147,000,000 of unguaranteed debentures outstanding which in the markets of the world are not worth more than fifty or sixty cents on the dollar, these bonds have quite a long time to run and it is better for us to buy than to be obliged to pay cash for the property. I was pointing out, when my hon. friend interrupted me, that in all probability, no cash would have to be paid so far as the securities guaranteed by the Dominion or the provinces are concerned, because the holders would be willing to exchange the securities which they had for any new securities which might be issued. But the matter might be dealt with in another way—the way that was pointed out by the member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) at the last session, when in very strong language he took the ground that this Parliament ought not to assume—until it was obliged to do so—liability with respect to these unguaranteed securities. The Minister of Finance sought at that time to make it clear that under the mortgage of 1914 the Government had amply provided for taking entire control of this property in case any default were made. The Finance Minister made a very strong point of the fact that the moment there was any default all the mortgages became ipso facto foreclosed; the equity of redemption would ipso facto be completely wiped out, and the Government would be able to take action without foreclosure proceedings—which would amply protect the public. But the member for Calgary was not satisfied with what was proposed. I would like to read some of the views which that hon. gentleman presented with regard to the proposal to take over the unguaranteed liabilities of the Canadian Northern system. I do this because the member for Calgary devoted a great deal of attention to this subject. He is a gentleman whose views are generally listened to by hon. gentlemen opposite with a great deal of respect. Coming as he does from one of the western provinces, and having had large experience in railway matters, his views are entitled to consideration. On page 3952 of Hansard of 1916, that hon. gentleman is reported as follows:

> Then I ask this question: how are you going to adjust that $147,000,000 of unguaranteed securities? You have your federally-guaranteed securities, your provincially-guaranteed securities; now you have your unguaranteed securities. I, for one, will protest as long as I have a seat in this House against the substitution of the Canadian taxpayer for the Canadian Northern with relation to these unguaranteed securities. I will not become a party to the people of this country being told that they must insure and guarantee unguaranteed securities. If men in England bought $25,000,000 of income certificates of the Canadian Northern and paid par and more for them; if they bought $147,000,000 of unguaranteed 4 per cent perpetual debenture stock and paid par for it, that is their business. But I do protest against the subsitution of 8,000,000 Canadian people behind an unguaranteed security of any railroad company. I go further. Not only is it unsound business, unsound in principle and in detail; I say further that it puts a premium upon watering railroad securities and stocks. A point to which I shall presently direct attention is this: If we are to take over the Canadian Northern railroad, or if we are to prevent a receivership occurring; if we are to act the part of the receiver; if we are to reorganize the system, then we must proceed to reorganize even as the receivers of the Wabash reorganized that road two years ago; even as the receivers of the Frisco system are now endeavouring to reorganize that system; even as the receivers of the Rock Island system are now endeavouring to reorganize that system.

[Mr. Pugsley.]

He says further:

> I am not adverse to any system of reorganization by which these securities would have some value placed upon them; but I would deprecate greatly any endeavour to substitute for the Canadian Northern Railway system, which was the security upon which they were sold, the collective credit of the people of this Dominion. That is the reason why it seems to me that we must go further than we have gone; we must do that very shortly, in order that an opportunity may be afforded by the lodging of these securities with a trust company, or otherwise to bring about some scheme of reorganization, because I think the time is gone by when men of business and intelligence, sitting in this House, should be frightened by the word "receivership." It is a great bogey, this word "receivership." All it means is that you put somebody in who takes charge of the property to conserve it and save it for the people whose money built it.

With that statement of the member for Calgary I thoroughly agree. In naming $147,000,000 of unguaranteed securities, he was below the mark to the extent of this $21,000,000 of land grant bonds issued by the company. Neither the Dominion as a whole, nor the provinces are in any way behind those securities of $147,000,000 and $21,000,000. The people ought not to be called upon to assume liability in respect to unguaranteed securities for which they are in no way liable. The member for Calgary said that there were two ways in which this plan could be worked out: one by expropriation and the other by reorganization. Reorganization could, with very little trouble—with some delay, I admit—be brought about by this Government because of the fact that they have guaranteed bonds to the amount of $104,000,000. Still more easily could it be brought about if they would co-operate with Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, who have guaranteed bonds to the extent of $107,000,000. It would not be difficult to bring about reorganization which would do justice to all concerned and which would enable the Government to avoid paying more than the property is fairly worth. There is no reason why the people should be called upon to assume this enormous liability in respect of a property which may or may not in the future render any return commensurate with the amount that has to be expended. The minister says that expropriation would cause delay; that the valuation of the property by the Exchequer Court would cause delay; that lawyers would have to be engaged. I am unable to appreciate that point. Under expropriation, the title would immediately vest in the Government.

The Government would have entire charge of the property and would be compelled to pay what the Exchequer Court would find it to be fairly worth. That is all. The delay would be only in the payment over of the money, and no great hardship would be inflicted upon those who would be entitled to it, because they would be entitled to get the money with interest as provided by law.

What reason is there for the Government taking this course at the present time? This is surely not the time to rush into a new investment of such a large character. What will the people of this country—who have been taxed very largely under the business profits tax, the income tax and the taxation by way of customs duties, in order to raise many millions of dollars for the purpose of carrying on the war—say when they find that this Government proposes assuming not only these enormous liabilities in connection with the property owned by the Canadian Northern, but an obligation which will compel them to pay many millions of dollars to Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann? Will they justify this Government in crippling the credit of the country at a time when that credit is being strained, when we shall have to go again, and perhaps again, into the markets of Canada and of New York for the purpose of raising money to carry on the war and to meet existing obligations? Will they say that this is a time to engage in new enterprises of a doubtful character, the necessity for engaging in which has not at all been shown?

Why is it necessary to do this? Is it that the Canadian Northern is not able to carry on its business? The Minister of Finance has not established that as a fact. We have asked him if the Canadian Northern has made any application for assistance. He has not answered that question directly. He says that they have not done it in writing, but he says that, from looking at the statement and from what they say, they will not have enough money to make large betterments to the road. He has also read to us a statement as to the amount the Canadian Northern require for betterments during the next five years, and that amount is only $12,000,000. How much will they require during the coming year? If they need only $12,000,000 during the next five years, the amount they will require during the coming year should be only about $2,000,000. For rolling stock during the next five years they estimate they will require $25,000,000, but the minister has not told us what they will require for rolling stock during the coming year.

Let us look at the position of the company if the figures are to be relied upon. According to the statement made up for the year ending June 30, 1917, the gross earnings are $42,319,686, the operating expenses, $30,794,332, leaving net earnings of $11,525,354. According to this statement, the total interest upon their securities is $14,405,643. Under the agreements made with the Dominion Government, the Government of Ontario and the Government of British Columbia, those different governments are to provide the interest for a certain period after the railway was concluded. The Dominion Government is bound to pay interest until September 1, 1918; the Ontario Government, until January 20, 1918; and the British Columbia Government for a certain period, I believe some two or three years—the period is not stated in the report, but there is the general statement that during the first three years of operating, the company calls upon the British Columbia Government to pay the interest. The statement does not show just when the operating began, but I assume there would be at least two years for the agreement to run. That would deduct $4,514,507 from the interest, and would leave a little over $9,000,000 of fixed charges to be paid. If the estimate up to June of 1917 is correct, there would be about $11,000,000 with which to discharge that liability. In other words, there would be a surplus of about $2,000,000. That being so, is there any evidence upon which we can rely that if the Government does not take over the system, it will go into the hands of receivers? Is there any evidence before this committee upon which the slightest reliance can be placed that with those large earnings amounting to upwards of $42,000,000, the company will not be able to carry on until times become somewhat better? Their earnings are increasing. During the last three years their earnings have increased from $30,000,000 to $42,000,000, with, as I have said, a surplus, after providing for the interest they are called upon to pay, of about $2,000,000. We ought to have much stronger evidence than merely the verbal statement of Messrs Mackenzie and Mann as to the equipment and betterments required in the near future in order to convince the committee that it is necessary to assume this great obligation. The minister stated I think in 1916 that the Canadian Northern during the preceding year had carried at least 40 per cent of the entire grain of the Northwest. If they were able to do that a year ago, what is to hinder them, with their present rolling stock and equipment, from handling the grain business of the West fairly well during the coming year? Nothing that I can see. I am told that the Canadian Northern has given a very satisfactory service in the West, and there are many parts of this country where the service given by the railroads is not at all as satisfactory to the people who ought to be served by those roads as the service given by the Canadian Northern and the various branches of the system in the section of the country through which it runs. As long ago as the year 1911, the Prime Minister authorized Mr. Fowler, who has until lately represented the constituency of Kings and Albert, and who is now a member of the Senate, to declare to the people of New Brunswick in effect that if the Conservative party came into power, it would take hold of all the branch lines of the Intercolonial and make them a part of the Intercolonial system.

That message was communicated to the people of New Brunswick, who were deeply interested in this question of railway accommodation, and no doubt it had considerable effect upon the people, because they relied on the statements which were made. Yet from that day to this, with only two exceptions, the people have seen those promises unfulfilled; they have seen nothing done to ensure better accommodation for the people of the province so far as the branch lines connecting with the Intercolonial are concerned. What am I to say to these people, and what are the representatives of that province to say to them, when this enormous liability is imposed upon the country?—a burden which they are to bear in common with the rest of the people. They will say: Before incurring these new obligations the Government ought to carry out the pledges which they have made to the people of a section of Canada which is not less important than the sections of the country through which the Canadian Northern system runs.

Just a word with regard to what my hon. friend says as to the fact that now is the best time to buy the railroad because the securities were floated at a low rate of interest. All other things being equal, that might be so, but I would point my hon. friend to the remark which he made in 1916 when it was proposed to lend to the Canadian Northern the sum of $15,000,000. My hon. friend then referred to the facts that in this war, which had been going on much longer than was ever anticipated, Canada had been obliged to borrow large sums of money, and that our expenditure was running up to about $900,000 per day. He said that that was not the time to engage upon new liabilities. I ask him to remember that statement to-day. Surely the time is no more opportune to-day than it was a year ago. I think that the people of this country will regard this proposal as a most improvident one. There may be a question whether any time it would be desirable to enter upon the system of government ownership; but this is not the occasion when the country should be committed to an obligation so vast in its character and so uncertain in its results as this proposal involves, nor is this the mode in which so great a change should be presented.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend has been engaged for about an hour and a half in showing that he did not know what he was talking about in 1914 and 1916. He distinctly advocated on three or four occasions in 1914 the acquisition of the stock of the Canadian Northern railway by arbitration, and in no other way. He is proceeding to demonstrate now, to his own satisfaction if not to the satisfaction of any one else, that to acquire that stock by arbitration is a most improvident method, and absolutely against the best interests of the people of this country. He has told us that arbitration was discarded forty or fifty years ago. Might I ask him, then, why he advocated it in 1914 and in 1916 for this very purpose? Were those considerations which he has so eloquently expressed at very great length this evening entirely absent from his mind on that occasion? What is the reason that he regarded the proposal to acquire the stock by arbitration as an eminently wise and reasonable one in 1914 and again in 1916, and that he spends an hour and a half this evening in demonstrating that any such proposal is absolutely absurd and entirely opposed to the public interest? My hon.

friend has taken a long time to explain himself, and I think he will require a much longer time before he convinces the committee that there is really anything in his explanation.

Then he says that the mere suggestion of arbitration puts a value upon the stock. He did much more than that in 1914, when he suggested a value of $30,000,000 for the stock. We have done no such thing on this occasion. We have simply left it to the arbitrators to determine what the value of the stock is. If they consider it of no value, they will find accordingly; if they consider it of some value, they will find accordingly. We do not suggest to the arbitrators, as he proposed to do, and did do in 1914, that the stock might have a maximum value of $30,000,000.

Then he says that a proposal of this kind gives value to the unguaranteed bonds. If the value is affected by this proposal did not his proposal of 1914 and of 1916 effect precisely the same purpose? What is the distinction which the hon. gentleman draws in his own favour between a proposal to acquire by arbitration the stock of this railway at a maximum value of $30,000,000, and a proposal to acquire $60,000,000 now without suggesting any such value as he then named? I am bound to say that I have followed the hon. gentleman with a great deal of attention, and I still adhere to the opinion I expressed a little while ago, that it will be necessary for him to occupy the time of this committee and of this House at a very much greater length than he has done this evening if he wishes to make us understand the supposed distinction between the arbitration which he proposed in 1914, and the proposal which the Government makes at this time.

As far as the additional cost of completing the road, is concerned, and as far as the liabilities outstanding against the road are concerned, it must be perfectly obvious to any one that the arbitrators, when they come to determine the value of the stock, will have to take into account those considerations, and therefore it seems to me that he is merely wasting the time of the committee when he dwells at great length upon such matters. He started out with a proposal respecting the land bonds. Up to the present I am not at all clear as to what he means. The proceeds of the land bonds went into the construction of this road, and therefore they are properly to be taken into account, I suppose, as part of the cost of this road. Does he suggest, as I inquired before—although I have not obtained any satisfactory answer—that that part of the cost of the road should be omitted? If he agrees that it should not be omitted, why does he suggest that the land against which these bonds were issued should be eliminated from the assets of this system?

Mr. PUGSLEY: What I say is this. The investor who put his money in those bonds had nothing to do with what was done with the proceeds. The investor lent his money on the security of the land. I would eliminate both. I would neither assume the liability nor take the land.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That is a most extraordinary proposition. The proceeds of these bonds have gone into the construction of the road. If there had not been any lien to secure them at all how could you omit them from the cost of the road? The money was spent, and is represented in the road to-day. What he suggests, if he suggests anything at all, is that we should omit from the assets of this system, the land upon which those bonds are secured. Surely he must realize upon reflection that that is not a suggestion which is in the interests of the people of this country. Further than that, so far as all these assets and liabilities are concerned, they must be taken into account by the arbitrators when they come to determine the value of the stock, if it has any value. Therefore all the argument which my hon. friend has poured forth in such volume to the committee this evening does not seem to have any relevancy to the debate at all. The money went into the road, and therefore must be taken into account. Why, in the name of all that is reasonable, should we omit the land upon which that money was raised?

I must confess, although I followed my hon. friend with the greatest possible attention, that I am utterly unable to see any common sense—if I may be permitted to say so without any desire to be offensive—in the suggestion he made.

However, it is perfectly obvious that we cannot get the resolution through to-night. My hon. friend will have an opportunity of making any further explanation that he desires to-morrow, and I shall move now that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. GERMAN: There is a provision for default in the statute of 1914, section 21. I would like to ask the Minister of Finance if the Canadian Northern has made default and if the penalty provided by subsection (a) of section 21 of the statute of 1914, under the provisions of the new trust deed, has been exacted. I would ask the minister if he would produce the trust deed.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes.

Mr. GERMAN: Has there been any default under the provisions of that trust deed.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Canadian Northern has not, so far as I am aware, defaulted on any of its securities. But my hon. friend knows that financial aid is required, and will be required each year, to prevent default. We will be glad to bring down a copy of the trust mortgage, which was executed in 1914—and which I think has been laid on the Table once or twice during the last two years—and any other information that my hon. friends desire.

Progress reported.

On motion of Sir Robert Borden, the House adjourned at 11.30 p.m.
