known: When her mother, on hearing Arington descend the steps, re-entered the apartment, she found her daughter stretched on the floor, motionless and insensible. Long that death-like swoon continued; and when at length consciousness returned, the unhappy girl buried her face in the pillows of her bed, and feebly articulating— Take me away! oh, mother, take me home. relasped again into insensibility.

As soon as the medical men judged it safe for the invalid to be removed, Mrs. Howard returned home, carrying with her the broken hearted creature, who had so lately entered that fair city, buoyant with health and happiness, radiant in beauty, and filled with bright hopes and gay acticipations.

Before leaving the city, Mrs. Howard, at the request of her daughter, wrote to Arington, releasing him from his engagement, and returning the little memorials which Virguina had received from him during the short period of their engagement. She wrote also to her sister, who had not yet returned to town, explaining that it, was Virginia's desire to reside for the future cutirely in the country, and thanking her for all the kindness she had bestowed on her. These duties performed, Mrs. Howard set off on her melancholy journey, and on the evening of the third day arrived safely at home. Virginia retired immediately to her chamber, nor could all, her mother's entreaties induce her to leave it, or to admit even her cousin Alice. Days, weeks and months passed away, and still the miserable girl continued to retuse all society, except that of her mother, and even that appeared irksome to her.

Do I not disgust you, mother, she said one day, as the latter, sat in her chamber, looking with an aching heart upon the wreck of what was once so beautiful.

No, my daughter, answered Mrs. Howard, solennly, you do not disgust, but you pain me. You disappoint me. I had hoped that you had a higher sense of the duty you owe your Heareally Father, than thus to rebel against the chastisement which, for wise purposes, he has inflicted. Is it possi sooth her anguish, and her mild reasoning were not without effect. That evening, Al. ice was admitted to her cousin—and after the agitation of the first meeting was over, the latter seemed to derive consolation from her presence, and Alice cheerfully des 15 0 0

The Novascotion replies,—
First,—We consider a Responsible Government to mesh, a government accountable to the people whose business it presides over, as NEV distinguished from a government having no accountability, except some very vague thing of the kind, connected with an office at the other side of the Atlantic — Secondly,—the power of the Representative body, and of its constituents, seems to us to be enhansed in the following manner: Instead of working in ignorance of the acts or designs or government, as if—which appears to be the wish of ment, as if—which appears to be the wish of ment, as if—which appears to be the wish of the Representative and the Executive branches were hostile powers, the Assembly branches were hostile powers, the Assembly, now has immediate information, from members of its own body, who are known to pos-sess the requisite knowledge, and bound to impart it. These men, the avowed advocates of the government, pledged to retire if they cannot approve of the acts of the Executive, are subject, as the representatives of that government, to the perpetual controul, and inestigation, and censure or support, of the deliberative body to which they belong; this For Terms apply to must be very influential on any set of men.— They have stated their tenure of office to depend on the well understood and well exprespend on the well understood and well as seed wishes of the people, and are therefore bound to retire when the representatives of STOLEN from the Barque Plutus while lying at Aymar's Wharf on the night of the 11th inst. a bound to reture when the representatives of the people pronounce a deliberate and solemn "want of confidence" in the body. The position of a portion of the Administration, as responsible for the acts of the Executive, and as members of the Assembly, brings them before the public at stated periods, to give account of their stewardship, and to receive upproval or disapproval: thus the people, immediately, have a voice in the selection of the Council; and the people's House have a voice on the continuance in office of the members of that body.

STOLEN from the Barque Platus while lying at Aymar's Wharl on the night of the 1th inst. a Gig Boat, about 18 feet keel, Liverpool build, lep work, painted green bottom, black top, with a red streak of green inside, Platus on the stern outside. Any person who will return said boat or give information where she can be 'had, will be handsomely rewarded.
