We are sorry, says the Pioneer, to learn that Mr. Frank Barry, of Egmont Bay, died quite suddenly at his home last Wednesday morning. He was apparently in the best of health on the previous day. It is believed that disease of the heart was the cause of his sudden death. The deceased was one of Egmont Bay's most respected residents and we tender the family our sincere sympathy in their sudden loss.

We regret to learn of the death, in Boston, of Mr. John Bowers, an old and respected resident of this city. Only about a month ago, Mr. Bowers went to Boston, to visit his daughters, married there. The hot weather probably proved too much for him in his advanced years.

The Montreal Gazette, of Wednesday, to hand, reports that cheese prices continue to advance in the country, Belleville distinguishing itself by an advance of 10c. on last week to-day. The public cable in colored also advanced sixpence. Demand on spot was of a quiet, steady character, but the majority of buyers were not disposed to concede any higher prices. They were strengthened in this position by receipts which came forward to-day from different sections of this Province, which were available at 75c to 78c, at which basic business was done in Quebec market to-day. In fact West-ern no actual spot transactions were noted, but it is claimed that business was doing over the cable at cost, or 75c, with a possible commission. The problem is to make out what this commission is.

On the first evening of the fair, a first-class concert will be given. An attractive as well as unique feature will be the display of Indian curios, provided over by two aborigines arranged in their peculiar garb. This itself will be worth the price of admission. In consideration of the many attractions, as well as the object for which the fair is held, there should be a large attendance.

Accidents by Land and Sea.

A fatal accident last Sunday evening, killed a young man named William Wile on the farm of John Atkinson at Macan N. E. While working in the hay field he slipped from a load he was building and fell upon a young tree. The hay fork he had been using. The prong of the fork entered his groin and making an upward course penetrated his abdomen some six inches. He was removed to Mr. Atkinson's residence and medical aid called in. It was there found that little vitality remained, and he died about six hours after the accident. The deceased was about thirty-two years of age, and a resident of the place, his home being in Bridgewater, Lunenburg Co. He had been working with Mr. Atkinson only a short time during the hay season. He was conscious of his condition, and asked that his mother at Bridgewater, and his father, who is at present employed at Windsor be notified.

A terrible and awfully and drowning accident happened Saturday afternoon at the farm of John Atkinson at Macan N. E. A young man named Smith, from Boston, who had been spending the summer in Lower Cove, was in a yacht with two young men, Corrier and Brien, west of a point in the river. When opposite Big Marsh point the centre board of the yacht struck in the flats and immediately the yacht upset and sank, and the men were thrown into the water. They clung to the wind vane which are strong in the water. The boat came to the surface again and Smith, being a good swimmer, jumped from the yacht and swam to the shore. Corrier and Brien were carried by the tide up the river. Brien and Corrier held on to the mast until washed off by the heavy swell, when they immediately sank in the presence of a large number of people who witnessed the accident but for want of boat and crew to the rescue, the loss of the tide it was totally impossible to render any assistance. A man on horseback named John Atkinson and John J. Downey, the ferryman, of the accident, and who is over twenty years of age, was in the boat with the ferryboat and rowed against the tide up stream a mile and was just in time to rescue Smith from a watery grave, but was too late to slip the other two men. Brien was a married man, thirty years of age and leaves a small son, unmarried, and employed by Rufus Hibbert at Lower Cove. A search was made for Corrier and Brien, but they were not recovered.

A bad drowning accident occurred at Egmont Bay on Sunday morning last. John R. McDonald, a young man commonly known as "Red," employed as a miter at Galesburg millery, went swimming in Little Gales Bay harbor. He attempted to swim to the shore and when near the shore, was seen to suddenly sink without a cry. The body did not rise again until about an hour later. He was in deep water, and although a boat was quickly on the spot these in it were unable to reach him. The body was taken in a net and was found to be a cramp, as Daniel Welton, who was bathing with him, but nearer the shore was taken in that way and with slight delay was rescued. An inquest was held that afternoon by Coroner Mackenzie. Verdict, accidental drowning.

Items of Interest to Catholic Readers.

(Sacred Heart Review.)

The current Century contains the closing one of the very interesting series of papers which Marion Crawford has contributed to its columns on Rome. The subject of the present article is "The Vatican," whose existence, we are told, is mainly due to Nicholas V., who was called in his day the builder Pops, and who died in 1455. His plan was to construct St. Peter's and build around it a number of massive and imposing structures, covering the whole of that part of the city known as the Borgo, for the Papal administration. These structures were to extend from St. Peter's to the Castle of Sant' Angelo, from the bridge of which, in olden times, says Mr. Crawford, a portico, or covered way, supported by columns, led, which probably inspired the plan of Pope Nicholas; that, however, was only partially carried out. In his reign, though, were constructed the oldest parts of the present Vatican Palace, and these, we are informed, are now known as the Torre Borgis, from the fact that they were once inhabited by Alexander VI., who died in one of the rooms now used for a library. These old rooms of the Vatican look on the Court of the Belvedere, and the portion of the palace they constitute is not visible from the outside. Pope Nicholas V., is said to have utilized portions of the sub-structure of the first buildings, and to an earlier Pop, John XXII., who died in 1417, is attributed the construction of the secret gallery which connects the Vatican with the mausoleum of Hadrian; but, as a whole, the Papal palace is said to date from the Renaissance period, and additions to it have been made by nearly every Pope. With regard to the name of the palace, Mr. Crawford says the hill on which the Papal abode stands was not one of the seven whereupon ancient Rome was built, but forms a part of the ridge beginning with Mons Janiculum and ending with Monte Mario, all of which lay outside pagan Rome of ancient days; and he adds that the Emperor Numa, according to tradition, chose the Vatican hill or ridge as the place whence he de-termined to build the city, the name being claimed to have received from the gods, which fact invested it with a certain sacred character.

Middle Ages. "There were," the paper goes on to assert, "many Popes who were not perfect, who were more or less ambitious, arrogant, weak, according to their several characters; but it can hardly be said that any of them were really bad men through and through, vicious, unscrupulous and daringly criminal." It is true that Mr. Crawford excepts three Popes from this characterization; but the reader will do well to make due allowance, while perusing his article, for the fact that it was written for a non-Catholic publication and colored, unwittingly perhaps, to suit the majority of the patrons of that publication. Mr. Crawford, for example, goes into details as to the alleged death by accidental poisoning of Alexander VI., and says nothing of the contrary well authenticated version that he died from natural causes. He half admits though, that the eye witnesses who have testified to certain features of this Pontiff's death by poisoning, indulged in fairy tales, and he alludes rather sarcastically to the coolness which their statements invest them with; which facts may be taken as evidence that Mr. Crawford himself does not place any great credence in the account of Pope Alexander's death which he sets forth so minutely in this paper of his.

has proven a popular and favorite divinity." All which which may be taken as so many indications that this "St. Peter," even if he lacks a title to the exalted dignity which his countrymen have bestowed upon him, must have been a pretty good ruler in his day, one not devoid of virtues nor a stranger to benevolent deeds.

In the three-part story, "The Spirit of an Illinois Town," which she begins in the current Atlantic Monthly, Mrs. Harry Hartwell Catherwood, whose writings often breathe with a Catholic spirit, says in one portion of her tale: "I thought it a pity that Protestant churches never keep open doors for weary and passion-tormented souls, as the Catholic Church does. TOLLERS who left their work for a minute's prayer in the Cathedral were a common sight abroad." Mrs. Catherwood might, perhaps, find one reason for closed Protestant churches in the absence from those structures of that Real Presence whose dwelling in the tabernacles of Catholic churches draws to those edifices the faithful who frequent them, on all days of the week and all hours of the day, in search of strength and comfort, to adore the Divinity abiding there or to thank God for graces and favors received. The Protestant places of worship seem fully aware of the fact that, with no altar in them enshrining the Word made Flesh who, out of his great love for mankind, abides forever with us under the sacramental forms, there is little to attract people within their walls save when services are being held; and hence their doors on week days and on Sundays, except at meeting times, are closed and locked, so that those who would enter them find ingress denied to them.

In the entertaining article, "Some Armenian Notabilities," contributed by her to the current issue of Godey's Magazine, Emma Padlock Telford makes the Christianity of that unfortunate land contemporaryaneous with the life-time of Christ himself almost. She says that King Agbar, in the days when Christ was still alive on earth, wrote him a letter, whose genuineness was admitted by Eusebius and other writers, and the full text of which may be found in the history written by Moses Chorenensis, who says that he found it in the royal archives at Edessa, inviting the Redeemer to visit his country, which he described as "not a large country, but it is large enough for you and for me." To this letter Christ is said to have replied through the Apostle Thomas, saying that he could not visit Armenia himself, but would send two Apostles to go to the land.

"Christianity thus introduced and spread throughout Armenia," this writer adds, "during the reign of Agbar, received a new impulse under the hands of Gregory the Illuminator, first patriarch of Armenia, who preached the Gospel both east and west of the Euphrates, baptized many, destroyed pagan temples, built churches, and converted most of the nation." This Armenian patriarch, we are told, took an important part in the Council of Nice (A. D. 325) when the Nicene Creed was formulated, the Arian heresy was suppressed, and the controversy concerning the proper time of celebrating Easter was settled. Mention is also made of the fact that following the Christianization of Armenia came the golden age of its literature, when the monk Mesrob invented an alphabet and created an epoch by his translation of the Bible; and the historical works of the famous Moses Chorenensis produced the Armenian Chronicles; and we are told that many of the old monasteries of Asia contain records of this period which, if they were brought to light, would be of great historical and philological importance.

Robert Howard Russell has an illustrated paper on "Montenegro" in the current number of Leslie's Popular Monthly. He writes mainly of the country as it exists to-day, but allusions to the time when Catholicism was the universal faith of the people are found in his paper. Thus, in speaking of the islands in the harbor of Bocche d Cattaro, Mr. Russell says: "On one of these stand the miniature monastery of San Giorgio, with chapel and garden and cloisters complete; and on the other is a little pilgrimage church, Santa Maria dello Scarpello, in which is a portrait of the Madonna, said to have been painted by St. Luke. The white walls, red-tiled roofs and green domes of the little church, which seems to float on the water like a lily-pod, make a charming bit of color against the black gray mountainside which rises majestically behind to such heights that the tiny church in the foreground seems no bigger than a child's toy." The present "patron saint" of Montenegro is of home manufacture. He is styled St. Peter, and Mr. Russell says of him that "he is rather a home made saint, with a distinctly modern flavor, as he did not die until 1830, and was immediately canonized by his nephew, Peter II., who wanted a saint in the family; and as many of the older men in Montenegro to-day know 'St. Peter' intimately during his life, and can really be responsible for whatever evil has been spoken or written against the character of the Popes of the same for the position he holds, he placed or shrines which are venerated by those who visit them are naturally supposed to have pious purposes in view, such as the sanctification of the pilgrims, for instance, or their religious improvement in some way. Our Protestant friends who have recently taken to copying the good old Catholic practice of making pilgrimages seem to lose sight of the fact, judging from the following paragraph taken from the last issue of the Congregationalist: "What a splendid service to international unity have our readers by your tour to the Pilgrim shrine, writes one of the editors of the Examiner, our Baptist contemporary. We are certainly glad to have a share in anything that makes manifest the oneness of men of Anglo-Saxon blood." "If international unity" and "the oneness of men of Anglo-Saxon blood" constitute the chief aims of Protestant pilgrimages, our Congregationalist brethren will have to take second place. For, judged by that standard, by all odds the most successful pilgrimage of the year was, if we can credit reports, the late trip of Colonel Walker, and the valiant warriors of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company to London and Windsor Castle.

In an earlier one of those syndicate letters which she is furnishing certain American papers from Europe, Miss Josephine L. Gilder went into rhapsodies over the strength and beauty of Zola's "Rome," praising particularly those portions of that book which it has since been shown Zola stole bodily from another French author. In one of her last letters she eulogizes "the good work" which the notorious Doctor Barnardo is doing in London. This "good work," as the readers of the Review know, consists largely in entrapping Catholic children into the Barnardo Home for the purpose of corrupting and, if possible, destroying their faith and making perverts of them. If Miss Gilder does not speedily change the character of her letters, people on this side of the water will come to the conclusion that her mission abroad is in the interests of European shady notoriety, a very unbecoming undertaking for any American woman to engage in, and one in which success is impossible.

Don't neglect the eyes. Lost sight is irrecoverable. A dentist can replace a lost tooth with an artificial one which may pass for the tooth of nature, but no oculist can restore the eye once sightless to its normal state. Save your eyes from being overtaxed by using spectacles to relieve and strengthen them. We can fit almost every eye with the lens required to aid the sight and spare its optic nerves. Parties in town or country can have their eyes tested at their own homes if sufficient notice is given us at our store.
