I shall never forget my first morning... He was a very nice boy, but with a very conversational tendency.

"Florence is coming this evening," he said one morning, about a week after my arrival, as he was finding the place (always a long business) before commencing to translate.

"Who?" I asked. "Florence's sister, you know. It is always better when she is here. You ought to see her. Meet of girls are great muffs, I think; but she isn't a bit."

I heard a little more of Florence, but I did not see her until dinner-time. We had taken our seats when the entrance, and I saw Mrs. Gawston seated at the piano, playing the Largo Appassionato from Beethoven's second piano-sonata.

"That movement is more than beautiful," I said. "You play, papa, or sing, or do something else." "I play the violin, and sing to a certain extent."

I was longing for her to ask me to bring my violin down. It was a small volume, close by labeled "Violin and Piano-forte." Mrs. Gawston sat at the piano, and her son reading "Myrtle" or something of the kind, possibly the feared article of the "New York Herald."

"I have thought so, certainly," replied the lady. "I was nothing but a penniless editor who had abused his peculiar position by using the many opportunities it afforded him of making love to a young lady, a reputed beauty of apparently superior rank. I could not help being amused, nevertheless, as I reflected how different his fate would have been had he known all."

"Mr. Linton, when I engaged you," he said, "there was something in me that was assured of most emphatically, and that was that you were a gentleman. This is not the conduct of a gentleman, and I am sorry to say that you have done it."

An Old Soldier's Experience.

"Oh, no," was the reply, and so we were soon rattling away in a homely way to my father's house as he appeared.

"I will both dine here to-night, of course, and sleep," said my father shaking hands with me. "I am going to London to-morrow by the 11 o'clock train."

"I had managed to get Florence home before I left that the obstacles in our way were not as insuperable as they appeared."
