FASHIONABLE FOR MEN.

If you were a hatter we'd tell you all about the superior quality of the fur of which our hats are made, the extra heavy silk band and binding—which, by the way, you know is the part of a hat that wears out first-that our manufacturers use; and also we'd say something about the high grade leathers that go into Suffolk Hats, but as you are not a hatter it might be all "Greek" to you, so instead we just ask you to see these hats. In addition to the Suffolk, which is a high grade American hat, we are showing the Lawson & Hubbard stiff and soft hats for young men. The spring styles are particularly attractive and not extreme in any way. The wearing qualities of Lawson & Hubbard hats are equal to any five dollar hats made in the United

SAMURAI AND JIU-JITSU.

The Most Wonderful System of Athletics In the World. More than 2,500 years ago there sprang into existence in Japan an order of knights who were known as the samurai. To them was imparted all the learning, the polite breeding and the forms of superiority that mark the gentleman. They were skilled in arms and versed in the arts of war, for they were the emperor's fighting men, and none but they were allowed to bear

As there could not always be war on hand, and as it was considered beneath the dignity of the samurai to go into any ordinary callings, it came about naturally that these little knights found much idle time on their hands. Being men of war, they turned their attention to athletic feats.

One among the samurai conceived the idea of learning by practice the location of every sensitive nerve and muscle in the body. After that he discovered all the joints of the bones that could be seized in such a way as to give momentary power over the muscles of an adversary. He practiced degrees was developed the most wonderful system of athletics known in the world.

The Japanese call this work jfu-jitsu. tice of jiu-jitsu produce only momentary pain, but do not really injure the muscles or nerves. In all other things the Japanese are the most polite peoeven in their fighting they have developed a humane yet effective method of self defense. They do not strike out with the clinched fist and seek to bruise, as do the Anglo-Saxons in their | the county boxing contests.

A knowledge of jiu-jitsu enables one almost instantly to convince his opponent that it is useless to fight. There are now schools of jiu-jitsu everywhere in Japan. Every soldier, sailor and policeman is obliged to perfect himself in the system. The Way of the World. When Thackeray was in this country he called on General Scott, full of admiration for his remarkable campaign in Mexico and eager to hear the warrior explain how battles were fought and fields were won. "Not at all," replied Thackeray, with a twinkle in his eye. "The general takes no interest in strategy. I found that literature was his forte."

have recommended Nora to reflect on Marsden's offer. She was haunted by the recollection of his words, his voice, his eyes. It is true that he kent himself well in hand, and kept back many a passionate expression that rushed to his lips. Nevertheless, he had impressed Nora very deeply with the conviction that she was very essential to him. It rather weighed her down with a vague sense of alarm. What was she to do with this tremendous gift of love?—so strong that his voice trembled in spite of his efforts to be steady, when he described it, and his heart throbbed fast and hard when he pressed her hand for a moment against it. Ought she to condemn one who was so tenderly attached to her to suffer the pangs of disappointment and rejection, because she had a morbid fancy for another who did not care for her? And with the thought came a suggestion that sent thrills of pain quivering through her and cutting for the retail trade—the very best beef, mutton and pork we cau find anywhere. You'will lose no differently she would have responded! Perhaps, by cultivating gratitude to Marsden, and giving herself up to his efforts to please and win her, she would succeed in loving him; and then she would make him happy and be happy herself. What a solution of all difficulties that would be! Perhaps it would be the right thing to do. How hard it was to know what was right. Finally, the tears welled up, as she thought with regretful compassion of the strong emotion

Marsden had displayed—surely such may be interested, that Wan McWhirter any kindly heart! Yet she ardently wished he had not taken such a fancy to her! So, after struggling with contradictory thoughts for half the night, she fell asleep toward morning, with a half-uttered prayer to be directed upon her lips. Mrs. L'Estrange received Marsden cordially and cheerfully. She did not doubt for a minute that Nora. having recovered her first startled surprise at his unexpected proposal. would marry him willingly, as it was Dutchman, who also sired the follow-natural she should; and she was anxious he should see how very heartily she was on his side. "I feel sure I have a friend in you," were almost his first words, after he had shaken hands warmly with her, "we were always allies since your first appearance at Brook-"Yes, Mr. Marsden, you were always welcome to my husband and "Nora has told you of the start I gave her," interrupted Marsden, It being a filly was bred to Flying Dutchman. The filly was Daisy Dain of Sir Charles Jr.

I gave her, interrupted marsden, who was absorbed in his own projects. "I feel I have been too abrupt. In short, having been pretty far gone about her nearly ever since we met last spring, I fancied about the candid. she must see it, and to be candid, her blindness suggests that she may be preoccupied by some lucklier fel-low than myself. Am I right?"

'You ought to ask her, Mr. Mars-

"And seem a conceited jackanapes by implying that only a previous at-tachment would have prevented her falling in love with me?"

Mrs. L'Estrange smiled. "I do not think Nora is disposed to fall in love very readily. Then there was no one for her to fall in "Some women might fancy

"I do not think Nora did. Indeed, they never seemed to take much to each other, especially of late." "Well, Mrs. L'Estrange, you will back me up? I may depend on you?"
"You may. Ilow did you and Nora "Oh, she was very anxious to get rid of me; I could see that, but I told her I would not take her first 'No,' nor her second either! Mrs. L'Estrange, I am determined that Nora shall be my wife." "Not against her will?"

"No; that would be too ungallant," returning to his usual light tone;

"but with her will." "Take my advice; wait a few days before repeating your offer. Let me tell her you will give her time to think, and, meanwhile, that she must let you come as a friend and kins-

"Very well. I shall be guided by you, but I can't stand this uncertainty long. Why does she not like me? for she doesn't." "It is impossible to say; a commonplace girl."

own. "You are very good," said Mrs. L'Estrange, softly.
"Now," continued Marsden, "what shall we do? It is an awful time in London; I almost wish I had not come up. There is shooting, or hunting, or something to be done in the country. Have you been to Windsor? It is a tolerably fine day. Let us go down and lunch there, and walk about after? Just settle it with Nora.'

"Very well," said Mrs. L'Estrange, and left the room. She was some little time absent, during which Marsden walked to and fro, picked up and put down books and papers which lay about, and occasionally looked at the clock. He was impatient, but not uneasy; did not doubt his ultimate success. and was not altogether displeased with Nora's hesitation. It was the sense of difficulty which was her crowning charm. He had seen many lovelier and more fascinating women; but none had ever charmed and vanquished him as this unworldly, natural young cous-

What a sweet mouth, half sad, half haughty! Would she ever press it fondly to his? What would he not dare, what villainy would he not commit, to secure her for himself safe away from every one? And would the day ever come when she would be to him as other women, graceful and pleasant enough, nothing remarkable? Well, not for a long time. There would be a spell of heaven first. Here he threw himself into an arm-chair and took up a book of photographs; it opened at the portrait of Mrs. Ruthven. Was that an evil omen He hated her, yet, when they had met early that year in Paris, before he had seen Nora, he was rather taken with her. Her veiled admiration for himself flattered and amused him. He even thought of appropriating her wealth exchange for his name. Now! l'ah, how he wished she would die and take herself out of his world, where she was not wanted! The telegram that morning was about as bad as it could be; perhaps luck would still be on his side, for he had-that Mrs. Ruthven would work him Here Mrs. L'Estrange returned, and handed a little twisted note, which he eagerly opened, and read: "You are very kind and considerate, I accept your suggestion." This was simply signed "Nera." "I think you ought to be content," said Mrs. L'Estrange smiling.

"I am—and our expedition to day?" "We will be ready to accompany you in an hour. Nora made no objection." The meeting, under such trying circumstances, was less awkward than Nora expected. She could not help admiring Marsden's tact and cool self-possession. If anything, he was more attentive to Mrs. L'Estrange than to herself. The weather was fine, the conversation light and animated. Marsden spoke of Mrs. Ruthven with much good feeling, and the day was far more agreeable than Nora anticipated, nor did Narsden leave them without making some plans for the morrow which could bring them together. A week passed swift yet slew; for Nora watched the days, with a dim ense that she was committing herself deeper and deeper.

The accounts from Chedworth were worse and better alternatively, and, considering his relations with the sufferer, Marsden felt bound to go down to his sister's for a day, at least, to show proper interest is

Mrs. Ruthven. His short absence was of use, for Nora missed him, and recognized what a charming companion he could There was, in short, not one reasonable reason for refusing to be his wife, and, no doubt, as soon as hopes and new duties would help her to forget a folly she ought to have surmounted long ago.

A letter from him to Mrs. L'Estrange gave a greatly improved account of Mrs. Ruthven. She had really taken that turn for the better for which her attendants had so eag-erly watched. Marsden himself would come up by the night train, and see them next day. "Now be sure you receive him well, Nora." said her step-mother. smil-

During her brief absence some notes and letters by the second post were brought up; am invitation or two, a hasty letter from Nora's German friend respecting an engagement just offered to her, and another letter with a foreign stamp for Mrs. L'Estrange-Nora felt almost sure it was from Mark Winton.

While she looked, Mrs. L'Estrange returned. Nora took up the letter and handed it to her. "Ah!" she exclaimed, opening it hastily and glancing through the con- Milier's. tents gravely. Then looking through the window she exclaimed: "The cab is waiting; there, dear, you can read Leaving the letter in Nora's hand she went quickly downstairs.

"Dear Mrs. L'Estrange," ran the lines, "I am much obliged for yours, but sorry to find Lady Dorrington has so serious a case on her hands. I was afraid Mrs. Ruthven would feel the effect of such a shock as she has had; but after two months it is curious she has not thrown it off. I trust she will pull through; she al- ed for four or five years with a conman, in spite of her fragile airs.

"Remember me to Miss L'Estran and believe me,

"Yours most sincerely, "MARK WINTON." "Oh! yes; it is clear enough. Helen, like myself, has hesitated, and he is returning for her final decision. I wonder it she has taken this method of informing me? It is rather well done. Probably my engagement would facilitate matters, and we might both live happy ever after! Why not? Helen and Mark Wintom deserve it. How constant and true he has been. That is his character, though. What perfect trust one could have in him. How good he will be to his little step-daughter. What a funny jumble of relationships. Shall I be his step-daughter too? No, no; neither in fact or fiction can I ever be anything to him, nor does it matter much. Oh! no, nor could I have any pleasanter, more disinterested partner for life than Clifford Marsden. I ought to be thankful for so fair a lot. I shall soon grow to love him. I love him already—a little. I wish he would come; I shall not tease him any more. I will be very good—very good—he deserves it. Perhaps, when Helen goes to India, she will leave Beatrice with me, she is too young to go out just now. I do hope she will; I shall then have a little bit of the eld home to cling to. Oh! how happy, how happy the last year has been, till my blind eyes were opened. What a foolish, conceited girl I have been. Yes, I will marry Clifford—dear Clifford; he will he year dear to me content. will be very dear to me soon, and then I shall be happy again. How intolerable unhappiness is. If I could but throw it off!" She wiped away the tears which would spring to her eyes; she put away Winton's letter, and setting out her writing things, resolutely fastened her attention on the directions she had promitted to send Bea's little Kindergartands.
