Lottie Ray. A gloomy feeling lurks within

My aching heart to-day, For, just one year ago, I lost My darling, Lottie Ray. How like an angle was she then! I thought it could not be That Heaven could send a rarer gem Than Lottie was to me.

I caught a glance, when we were young, Of her exquisite face, And in her ears love songs were sung That won this pink of grace. And, as those days of pleasure passed, My admiration grew To that of worshipping, at last, With love most fond and true.

I was a country lad, I own, Not skilled in erudition, While Lottie had above me grown In learning's best fruition; Yet this to her I knew was naught Compared with love supreme Her heart was then too deeply fraught With thoughts of love's young dream

How oft, as we have tripped beside The clear and rippling stream, I've looked upon her lovely form And thought I did but dream. At length an hour of sadness came; While yet t'was blooming May, Death's cold hand touched her feebl. And bore her hence away.

O cruel death! could'st thou not spare My heart's lone object here? Was she so lovely and so fair Thou should'st so soon appear? Sleep, Lottic, neath thy grassy mound, And I will faithful be. To deck thy tomb with flowers around Till joined by death to thee.

Thus am I left to wander here Till called from earth away. To mourn for her I loved so dear, My darling Lottie Ray. Now, as the weary hours pass, Most fervently I pray, In Heaven's bright realm to meet again My own-my Lottie Ray.
