Mr. SPROULE. Then I take it that these parts should go along with it.

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, they do not go along.

Mr. SPROULE. If I buy a threshing machine, I expect to get certain equipment. There are certain duplicate parts that always go along with it.

Mr. EMMERSON. That depends on the bargain.

Mr. SPROULE. No, that is the regular custom. You know you are getting parts in duplicate, but you get a completed machine, so that you can go to work with it at any time. What amuses the hon. member for Westmorland?

Mr. PUGSLEY. He is wondering what is the bearing on the discussion.

Mr. EMMERSON. I was not laughing at my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule). He need not be sensitive. I certainly would not think of laughing at him. I had better be laughing than looking glum.

Mr. SPROULE. I was saying that if I purchased a threshing machine I would get certain other parts in duplicate. It is supposed to be a completed machine. A completed dredge is a dredge with all the necessary parts to make it work.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. Does it include scows?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No.

Mr. SPROULE. I would not imagine that it could very well work without scows unless you were working alongside of a wharf where you were dipping up the stuff and throwing it over to the other side. I take it that it would not be a completed dredge unless you had the dippers and other equipment necessary to go on with the work and, therefore, they ought to be included with the dredge. I would ask again: Could a dredge work without a dipper?

Mr. PUGSLEY. That was all included with the dredge.

Mr. SPROULE. Could a dredge work without a boiler?

Mr. PUGSLEY. There was a boiler in when the dredge was bought.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. member says that we have a right to take that out because there was a defect in it, and we have reduced the price by the cost of that boiler —$10,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The owners were working it right along with that boiler, and we could have worked it with that boiler, but the Canadian inspectors were very particular. They pointed out this defect, and we thought it better to put in a new boiler.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman said that the cost of that dredge was reduced by the cost of the boiler which we refused to accept as value.

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, we accepted it. We owned the boiler, and we disposed of it when we took it out; but we made them reduce the price of the dredge because of this latent defect in the boiler.

Mr. SPROULE. And the hon. gentleman thinks that should not be included in the cost of the dredge. A dredge without a boiler would be incomplete and could not go to work. I do not know what parts of a dredge ought to be duplicated; but, as with other machinery, there are certain things that generally go with a dredge, and these ought to be included in the cost; otherwise the statement of the cost would be misleading to the House. When we ask the cost of a dredge, we mean the cost of everything connected with it completely equipped to go to work.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I go almost as far as my hon. friend does. When we got this dredge she was ready to go to work. She was a comparatively new dredge, and had been working with that boiler; but the owners, as a matter of prudence, bought duplicate parts, which formed no part of the dredge and were not necessary to its operation unless some part should get broken, when it would be necessary to have repairs made or to buy new plant. In this particular case, we bought the dredge for a certain price, and the parts were bought separately. When the dredge was brought into Canada she had a boiler which was comparatively new, which had been working, but which we thought, under the Canadian inspection law, it would be desirable to take out and put a new one in its place. We asked a reduction in price which would enable us to put in a new boiler, and the owners agreed to the reduction because of this latent defect.

Mr. BLAIN. Did the dredge go to work before the new boiler was put in?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No.

Mr. DANIEL. Has she gone to work yet?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes.

Mr. DANIEL. With regard to these duplicate parts, I think the minister is not entirely frank with the House when he says that a dredge is in working order without these duplicate parts. I think his experience and knowledge of dredging will bring to his mind the fact that there is not a dredge working anywhere that has not these duplicate parts. It happens constantly that something comes away, and these duplicate parts are absolutely necessary to keep a dredge in order.

At six o'clock House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

NELSON RIVER RAILWAY COMPANY.

House in Committee on Bill (No. 52) to incorporate the Nelson River Railway Company.—Mr. Rutan.

Mr. LENNOX. I would ask that this Bill should stand over for to-night. It contains a provision as to developing water-powers. Two or three similar Bills have passed the committee, but to-day, after a good deal of discussion, the committee postponed the consideration of a similar Bill in order that the minister might be present and declare some general policy in reference to matters of this kind. My desire, and the desire of many members of the House and the committee, is that all these Bills shall be treated on the same basis.

Mr. RUTAN. I cannot see the justice of asking to have this Bill stand over. The Burrard Inlet Bill had similar and even larger powers, yet it passed this committee. This Bill has been delayed and held up from time to time, and now that it has passed the Railway Committee, I would ask that it should not be delayed further. We are not giving more than is granted by other Bills, and in justice to the promoters, it should be allowed to pass.

Mr. PUGSLEY. If the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) asks that it should stand over, the Minister of Railways not being present, I would think it would be better for my hon. friend to accede to his request, as it will only mean a delay until Monday or Tuesday.

Mr. RUTAN. I do not object then to it standing over.

Progress reported.

PRINCE ALBERT AND HUDSON BAY RAILWAY COMPANY.

House in Committee on Bill (No. 69) respecting the Prince Albert and Hudson Bay Railway Company.—Mr. Neely.

Mr. BLAIN. The promoter of this Bill is not present, and I would, therefore, ask that according to our practice, it should stand over.

Mr. EMMERSON. I think that is hardly fair; we do not observe that rule on all occasions.

Mr. BLAIN. There are reasons against this Bill, which I think it would not be fair to present in the absence of its promoter, and I am not quite sure, but that it is very good policy in any case not to advance a Bill when its promoter is not present.

Mr. EMMERSON. We did it in the case of the Burrard Inlet Bill—the very one cited.

Mr. LENNOX. The rule is that if no objection be raised, the Bill goes on, but if there be any objections, it stands. Objections should not be taken unless there is some reason, and my hon. friend from Peel says he has good reasons.

Mr. RUTAN. There are the same objections to this Bill as to the other.

Progress reported.

THE SASKATCHEWAN CENTRAL RAILWAY COMPANY.

House in committee on Bill (No. 121) to incorporate the Saskatchewan Railway Company.—Mr. Martin.

Mr. BLAIN. Are the directors of this company railway men?

Mr. W. M. MARTIN. I could not give a definite answer. Any of the directors I do know are not railway men.

Mr. BLAIN. We have a great many charters put through this House by men who are not particularly interested in the construction of the railway, and whose only object is to make money out of the charters. I am not suggesting that the present Bill is a case of that kind, although I suppose my hon. friend would not contradict that statement very much. I think we should put a provision in the Bill that the charter cannot be sold or disposed of without the consent of the Governor in Council. It seems to me that we should put a stop to this barter and sale of railway charters by people who are not engaged in the railway business and are not particularly interested in the development of the country. I am not going to say that this should apply to this Bill more than to any other, but I think it would be a fair precaution to take, so that in the event of a sale of a charter, the company would have to get the previous consent of the Governor in Council. Then the responsibility would rest on the government.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CONGREGATIONAL UNION OF CANADA.

House in committee on Bill (No. 142) to incorporate the Congregational Union of Canada.—Mr. A. Haggart.

On section 4, subsection (e)—amalgamation with similar associations.

Mr. A. HAGGART. It is thought that this clause is objectionable, first, because such associations are not required to be incorporated, and second, that they may be associations under provincial charters or otherwise. I suppose that that clause might better come out altogether.

Mr. FIELDING. I would suggest to my hon. friend (Mr. A. Haggart) that it would be better to let the Bill stand and consult the law clerk with regard to the matter. There is danger, in making a change at the table in this way, that we may spoil the Bill. Of course, if my hon. friend is satisfied, I have no objection, but I think it will be more satisfactory for him to take time for consultation with the law clerk.

Mr. A. HAGGART. Thanks for the suggestion.

Bill (No. 152) to incorporate the Northern Quebec Colonization Railway Company.—Mr. J. P. Turcotte.

Bill (No. 148) for the relief of Bernard Shea.—Mr. Rankin.

Bill (No. 149) for the relief of Clara Louise Holden.—Mr. Rankin.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 127) respecting the Grand Trunk Pacific Branch Lines Company.—Mr. Turriff.

SUPPLY.

The House resumed in Committee of Supply.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think we have about finished the discussion of the item of maritime provinces dredging plant, and I suppose the item might carry.

Mr. BLAIN. Can the minister state now how much the cost was?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The item is $180,000. We had $100,000 last year.

Mr. BLAIN. We did not have the difference between the actual cost and the cost that was brought down in the return fully explained.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I have not been able to get the particulars. I did not know that the hon. gentleman would want them tonight.

Mr. BLAIN. Which is correct?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The Auditor General's Report is absolutely correct. The other is correct also, being limited to the cost of the dredge, whereas the Auditor General has taken in the cost of the dredge, the duplicate parts, and the new boiler, and also the customs duty.

Mr. LENNOX. It is very important, of course, to members on this side of the House, who are not always able to get all the information we desire, and it is very important to the people, as the information they receive on these subjects must filter out to them through such channels as we can open, that the returns presented to the House should be correct. The return placed in my hands showing the cost of a number of dredges includes the figures concerning the dredge 'Industry,' which, I think, is the one spoken of—I was not in before the House rose at six o'clock. The price given here is $150,000. If I am correctly informed—the minister (Mr. Pugsley) will tell me if I am wrong—as a matter of fact, the dredge cost $157,000 or thereabouts.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That includes the cost of the duplicate parts.

Mr. LENNOX. I understand that the dredge itself cost $157,000, and that the new boiler put in cost something over $9,000, and that customs duty of 25 per cent on $150,000 was paid. As to the extra boiler, there might be room for argument as to whether that should be included in the first cost. But I understand that the item $157,000 is first cost, and the duty, about $39,000, is equally an item that we should be notified of in this return, brought down on the application of a gentleman for whom we on this side have the greatest respect—the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German). We do not get very much aid from the activity of members on the government side of the House in the way of bringing out information, and, when information is so brought out we certainly desire to have it accurate. I hope that the government did not feel that, as one of their own supporters moved for this return, they need not be accurate in their figures. Now, I would be glad if the minister could explain exactly how this matter arises. As to this discrepancy between $150,000 and $157,000, I do not see how there can be an explanation.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think my hon. friend was not here before recess. I stated then that the price of the dredge at first was to be $150,000. Afterwards, when the transaction was about being closed, we decided to have a further examination by boiler experts, and they discovered a defect in the boiler which they thought was ground for raising an objection. We did raise the objection, and on that ground, and as a result of further negotiations, the price was reduced to $140,000. Now the difference between that $140,000, and the amount of $157,000 mentioned in the Auditor General's Report, is made up by what the department paid for the duplicate parts, which, as I have said, were bought separately from the dredge, and were not in the contract for the dredge, except that they had to be taken at the invoice prices. The duplicate parts were all new, and had not been used, and we agreed to take them at the invoice prices. Then there was the actual cost of bringing the dredge from Massena to Cornwall in Canada, which the department agreed to pay, and I think some insurance, but I am not positive. This brings the figure up to what is stated by the Auditor General as $150,000 odd. Then the report shows that there was in addition the duty which was paid. Now I take it for granted that the clerk has seen the statement of the agreement to pay $150,000, I assume that is where he got his information, and he has put that in. But, he has not given any account of the cost of the duplicate parts, he has not given any account of the duty, because I suppose he assumed that that was paid by one of the departments, and went into another department. He has not taken any account of what was subsequently paid for the new boiler. He has simply taken what was the price of the dredge. That is the explanation which I think can be given for the clerk making the mistake he did. I may say that I had never seen this return, and have not seen it up to the present moment; but I assume that is the way in which the clerk has made up the amount. But the cost is correctly given in the Auditor General's Report, of course, that is, the $157,000 odd for the dredge, and the duplicate plant which was taken at invoice prices, also the duty and new boiler. But neither of these items were considered by the clerk as being a part of the cost of the dredge.

Mr. LENNOX. Is there anything on record in the department to show the change from $140,000 to $150,000 and the $157,000?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, that is all on record in the department.

Mr. LENNOX. This does not get better very fast. The original contract, according to the minister, was $150,000. Then another contract was made subsequently amounting to $140,000. The record of the $150,000 is of course in the department, as the minister says; the record of the changed contract, the reduction to $140,000, is also on record in the department. We have the solemn order of this House that they are to bring down certain information, and that is consented to by the government, and that information they profess to have given us. We are altogether dependent on these returns for the knowledge of what is going on in the department. Now it is a strange thing that neither of these transactions is correctly set forth. If it had gone from the $150,000 down to the reduced price of $140,000, and left at this, it would have been a little more consistent than it is to-day on what the minister says. But we have neither the one figure nor the other, and we have a figure between them. Now are we to understand that in this long list of probably twenty dredges, all these returns are as reliable as this one of $150,000? This return was not brought down until the 24th of February last. All this explanation was not made to appear in the Auditor General's Report, the last report I understand before that. Surely there was time enough to have these things brought down, and surely there is an indication at least of a very dangerous kind of carelessness, if this kind of thing can exist in a well ordered department of this government. Surely the minister realizes that these duplicate parts, which I understand to be parts to take the place of those which are worn out, and unfit, making the total $150,000, are as much a portion of the dredge——

Mr. PUGSLEY. Allow me to correct my hon. friend. The duplicate parts were not to take the place of the parts that were worn out, but the parts that might in future become broken or worn out, a very different proposition.

Mr. LENNOX. They were to take the place of what would be likely to give out. The government were not buying them for fun; I assume the government were not buying them for the purpose of pleasing any vendor of this class of goods, they were buying them because they thought they would need them. Surely the government must have considered them absolutely essential to the dredge, or else the government would not have bought them, and the price is as much a portion of the purchase money, when we ask what this thing cost, as the original figure of $150,000, or the substituted figure of $140,000. This has to be paid for, and has been paid for, and does form part of the price. To my mind, without going any further into the matter, I fail to see that the minister has made a satisfactory explanation, although no doubt he has made the best explanation the case is capable of.

Mr. BLAIN. Would my hon. friend explain why they put the $29,000 of customs in the Auditor General's Report if it is not paid?

Mr. PUGSLEY. But it was paid.

Mr. BLAIN. Then as a matter of fact it was part of the cost of the dredge. The return states that the dredge cost $150,000. If we were without the Auditor General's Report we would have no opportunity of knowing whether this dredge cost only $150,000 or whether it cost more. We make a comparison between the return laid on the table of the House and we find that while the return says that the dredge cost this country $150,000 the Auditor General's says: 'New dredge plant; purchase price of dredge and plant, $157,378.78.'

Mr. PUGSLEY. You will observe the Auditor General uses the words, 'and plant'.

Mr. BLAIN. Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That would be duplicate plant.

Mr. BLAIN. Yes.

Customs duty, 25 per cent on $157,379.	$39,344 75
Polson Iron Works: installing Scotch marine boiler, $9,300; less $4,650 paid in 1909-10..	4,650 00
Legal services, D. B. Maclennan, Cornwall..	150 00

From my hon. friend's explanation it appears that there is a great difference between the actual cost of this dredge and the price that was inserted in the return. I do not think my hon. friend's explanation will dispose of the fact that the return is altogether misleading, and if we had not had an opportunity of verifying the return we would still have been under the impression that the cost of this dredge was only $150,000. Was I wrong in understanding the minister to say before six o'clock that the dredge did not go to work until after the new boiler was put in?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, that is right.

Mr. BLAIN. The dredge was of no service to this country until after this boiler that the minister is leaving out of the price of the dredge was put in. Therefore, I think it is fair to say that the cost of the boiler should be included in the price of the dredge.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Suppose the clerk should have added in the duty, and the cost of the boiler, does my hon. friend think that is worth taking up a great deal of time over, because, before this return was brought down, the Auditor General's Report had been in the hands of members for months. Therefore, there could be no intention to deceive any body. The uttermost you could say would be that the clerk should have put in the cost of the duty, and the cost of the boiler.

Mr. LENNOX. Will the minister say that it will not occur again?

Mr. BLAIN. I am not offering any particular criticism of the clerk. Mistakes will occur, but I am pointing out that my hon. friend is unwilling to say that we have there a misleading statement. I am emphasizing the fact that we must be very careful when this government bring down returns, because we find that they are not always correct.

Mr. EMMERSON. The price is stated as $10,000 in excess of the actual cost of the dredge.

Mr. LENNOX. It is nothing of the kind; it is stated a great deal less.

New dredging plant—Ontario and Quebec, $135,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This amount is required to make provision for the purpose of new dredging plant. The details are as follows:

New hull for dredge 'Nipissing,' complete..	$ 10,000
New boiler and machinery for dredge 'Nipissing'..	10,000
New boiler and machinery for tug 'Sir John'..	10,000
New hull for dredge 'Challenge'.. ..	18,000
New boiler for dredge 'Mattawa'.. ..	3,000
2 new 32 cub. yd. dump scows for dredge 'Deschenes'..	4,000
New light draught tug for dredge 'Deschenes'..	9,000
6 yawl boats for different vessels.. ..	300
New light draught tug for dredge 'No. 3'..	10,000
Dippers for different dredges..	5,000
New engine for tug 'Storm King'..	6,500
New steel spuds for dredge 'Industry'..	10,000
New 8-yd. steel-bucket dredge 'Industry'..	2,000
New steel scow dredge 'Industry'..	25,000
New spuds, dredge 'International'..	2,000
Extras on contract not yet decided upon tugs 'Lisgar' and 'Peel'....	$ 1,000
Establishment of a small shipyard on Lake Timiskaming, near Haileybury, to provide repair facilities and winter quarters for dredging plant, &c., used on this lake and the streams flowing into it..	5,000
Add for balance that may have to be paid in 1910-11 on new plant begun in 1909-10, unforeseen requirements for 1910-11, possible shortages in the above estimate, &c..	4,200
Total..	$135,000

Mr. DANIEL. How much for spuds for the 'Industry'?

Mr. PUGSLEY. $10,000; these are steel spuds.

Mr. DANIEL. How many will that supply?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Four.

Mr. DANIEL. How many did she have when she was bought?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Four wooden ones.

Mr. WRIGHT. I think it would be a long time before the United States would come over to Canada to buy a dredge, and I hope that all the machinery for these dredges will be bought in Canada, and that the repairs will be done here.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It is the custom to-day for all repairs to be made in Canada.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. I see by the Auditor General's Report, Page V—318, that there is an expenditure of $17,401 on the steamer 'Speedy'. I would like to inquire where she is working, and what she is doing?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The steamer 'Speedy' is used as a tug boat for towing dredges around from one place to another.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. Where?

Mr. PUGSLEY. On the St. Lawrence and the lakes.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. In Ontario and Quebec exclusively?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. Where did she spend last season?

Mr. PUGSLEY. On the lakes.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. Where was she fitted out in the spring?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Toronto.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. And where was she laid up in the fall?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Toronto.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. How does it come that there is an expenditure of $517.70 to pay travelling expenses in connection with the staff on that boat as follows:

Chief engineer, board and travel.. ..	$48 80
2nd engineer, board and travel..	43 08
3rd engineer, travel..	11 95
1st officer, travel..	65 11
Cook, travel..	33 60
Steward, travel..	59 81
Stewardess, board and travel..	54 38

Making $517.70 for travel for crew. I would like to know how that comes?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The travelling expenses of the crew are paid from their homes to the place where the vessel might be in the spring, or from the vessel to their homes in the fall when it is laid up. The steward is utilized when not required on the 'Speedy' in connection with other matters, and his travelling expenses are paid. Then there would be the board of those of the crew who are engaged in the spring in fitting out the vessel before she is ready to enter upon commission. That in a general way explains all the travelling expenses.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. What is the nature of the work done by this steamer?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Towing government dredges and scows and also inspection work.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. She has a first, a second and a third engineer. Is the work such as to require the services of three engineers?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes; she has to be going night and day.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. Then you paid out in wages for the whole staff for the season, $7,255, and the board for the staff amounted to $2,595, equal to over 33⅓ per cent of the wages. We thought the government had dispensed with the patronage system. The Minister of Marine promised that he would make an arrangement with the steward to board the crew for a certain figure. That system was adopted on the 'Montcalm' several years ago, and resulted in a saving of about fifty per cent. But in the Department of Public Works the patronage system is still maintained, and not one dollar's worth of provisions is bought from a Conservative; they are all bought from the hon. gentleman's political friends. For the steamer 'Speedy,' provisions to the amount of $2,300 were bought from the hon. gentleman's friends.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Are not the prices fair?

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. As a rule they are not fair and just. We had evidence before the Public Accounts Committee last year that whenever a messenger with brass buttons came from the government to buy goods the prices would be raised from 25 to 30 per cent. All these dredges and tugboats requiring repairs are sent to two special friends of the government. One is Mr. Davie. Where does he live?

Mr. PUGSLEY. At Levis.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. And Mr. Drolet is at Quebec. Last year the 'Speedy' was laid up at Toronto, but she had to have some little repairs, and she was sent to Levis to Mr. Davie. The hon. gentleman misinformed the committee when he stated that this vessel was laid up at Toronto last fall and winter, and started out in the spring, or else he paid Mr. Davie $1,778 for nothing, because this is what Mr. Davie charged up for hauling, wintering, repairing and launching the vessel; and I am informed that Mr. Davie does not do the work at tender prices, but generally gets a good round sum for anything he does for the government. Last year he got no less than $8,483 for hauling out and doing some little repairing on tugs, and Mr. Drolet was paid another large amount. The minister cannot, therefore, say that the patronage system is dispensed with in his department.

Mr. EMMERSON. Is not Mr. Davie a Conservative?

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. No. My hon. friend knows that quite well.

Mr. EMMERSON. I am informed that he is.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Mr. George T. Davie is a very respectable and reliable man, even though he may be a Conservative, and he does his work thoroughly well. There is no better machinist in the whole of Canada. He has a dock at Levis, I think a marine railway, and he does a good deal of repairs. My hon. friend has unintentionally fallen into an error. He assumes that because the 'Speedy' was at Toronto last winter Mr. Davie's account for hauling up and wintering the 'Speedy' at Levis could not be correct. She was at Levis the year before, and that fiscal year ended on the 31st of March, and Mr. Davie's account for services during the winter and spring would be charged in the fiscal year following, the accounts of which we have before us. The important question is whether Mr. Davie's account is too large. I have no reason to suppose that it is at all out of the way. But that is work we could not let by tender. There was at that time nobody at Levis except Mr. Davie who could do that class of work. The Quebec Machinery Company is there now, and we are asking for tenders.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. It is not very far from Quebec to the government shipyard at Sorel.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Quite a distance, and I do not think the work would cost us less there. Look at some of the items in the Auditor General's Report. Soft coal bought on the St. Lawrence and great lakes at $4.25 a ton. Will any one say that is out of the way?

Mr. S. SHARPE. That is a pretty high price.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Is it not a fair price for Sydney coal bought on the lakes or on the St. Lawrence?

Mr. G. TAYLOR. It is steam coal, is the minister sure it is Sydney coal?

Mr. PUGSLEY. So the engineer says.

Mr. DANIEL. In that case it is cheaper there than in the city of St. John.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Take anthracite coal bought in small quantities at $7 a ton on the lakes.

Mr. G. TAYLOR. $6.50 I pay, delivered in my cellar.

Mr. HARTY. $6.75 I pay in my city.

Mr. BOYCE. You can buy it at Sault Ste. Marie for $7 a ton.

Mr. PUGSLEY. In Ottawa it costs $7.50. Then there are sailors' suits, $13 a suit, that is not out of the way.

Mr. DANIEL. Is the coal weighed by the department or not?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Weighed by the department, yes. Then there is coal oil, 18c. a gallon. Is that out of the way? So I ask my hon. friend to go through this item by item, and I venture to say he will find abundant evidence to support the statement that the captain and steward have exercised great care in making purchases and have gone around and got the lowest price. These are the directions to the captain. Where a steamer like the 'Speedy' is travelling about, we cannot call for tenders in a public way. They have to get meats and vegetables, groceries, &c., and their instructions are to get them at the lowest market price. I was on the 'Speedy' year before last, and saw evidence of nothing but the strictest economy. More than that, while a good deal has been said by hon. gentlemen opposite about the 'Speedy' the officers of my department assure me that the 'Speedy' earns to the government very considerably more than the cost of operation, so it is not a loss to the government. The only fault I have to find with her is that she is not as strong as she ought to be for doing towing work.

Mr. DANIEL. The minister said that the coal was really weighed by the officers of the department. Did he make that statement really and truly, or did it just come to him off-hand?

Mr. PUGSLEY.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I thought my hon. friend was a gentleman, and I think so still, and therefore I am greatly surprised at his putting that question to me. The information I gave is based upon the statement of my deputy, who has seen the weighing actually going on, and the department is always careful to see that the coal is weighed.

Mr. BLAIN. I see two items, Geo. T. Davy, hauling up, wintering and launching the 'Speedy,' and on the same page an account of Geo. Summerville, wintering vessel, $75.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That would not be the 'Speedy,' it might have been a caretaker, but I could not give the information to-night.

Mr. BLAIN. Are any of these items bought by public competition?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, they are all bought by seeing different dealers, and getting the lowest prices.

Mr. BLAIN. I see a whistle, $65.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It is usual for steamers to have whistles, that is a fair price.

Mr. BLAIN. Has my hon. friend abolished the patronage list? Some ministers state that there has been a brand new departure lately, and that the patronage list is unknown. Would my hon. friend say that the list is unknown in his department?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, I think I can safely say that the patronage list, as it used to exist from 30 to 40 years ago, down to last year, has been abolished. We do not furnish to our officials a list, as used to be done when my hon. friend, perhaps, had a good deal to do with patronage.

Mr. BLAIN. No.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Well, my hon. friend's predecessors in love and affection. We instruct our officials to buy where they get the goods cheapest, but I take it for granted, where there are articles of any considerable amount to be purchased, they will invite tenders. Where purchases are made through the department, the rule is that we invite tenders here, but the resident engineers, the superintendents of dredging, must buy supplies, and their instructions are to purchase them at reasonable prices.

Mr. BLAIN. When did the change take place?

Mr. PUGSLEY. It was announced last session, I think.

Mr. BLAIN. Does the minister find, under the new arrangement, that goods have been purchased cheaper?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not think so, not so far as ordinary supplies are concerned. There has been a difference and a saving to the department in this respect, that when we require fittings for different public buildings we are in the habit of giving a wider advertisement than was formerly the case. We secure greater competition, and I think the accounts will show that we are making a considerable saving in that way.

Mr. DANIEL. Would the minister state that within the last year there has been really any change in the list of firms from whom the department has been purchasing?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not follow that at all. Having done away with the patronage list, it is no part of my duty to follow that. We leave that to the discretion and judgment of our buyers and do not interfere with them at all.

Mr. DANIEL. Does the hon. minister say that the agents of his department have full liberty to purchase goods from any one outside the supporters of the government?

Mr. PUGSLEY. They have a perfectly free hand.

Mr. DANIEL. It is strange then that they do not seem to make use of their freedom.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. They would lose their job if they did.

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, I never inquire from whom they buy.

Mr. BLAIN. My hon. friend says that where tenders are called for, he has broadened the scope of the advertisement. Does he now advertise in any newspapers other than those supporting the government?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, we have not ordinarily found it necessary to do so. We can get sufficiently wide publicity by utilizing the papers friendly to the government. What I meant was that we have widened the circle in the way of informing contractors. Formerly the practice was not to advertise in the newspapers for fittings but to send out to people in the business asking them to tender. We now, however, advertise generally in the newspapers so that there is wider competition and the same opportunity is given to Conservatives as to Liberals.

Mr. BLAIN. But the hon. minister does not deem it expedient to advertise in any Conservative newspapers?

Mr. PUGSLEY. We have not found it necessary to do that.

Mr. BLAIN. Where the hon. minister finds a Conservative newspaper in a city having a very much larger circulation than the newspaper supporting my hon. friend's government, he will still advertise in the newspaper with the smaller circulation, and not in the Conservative newspaper with a much larger circulation. He will have some difficulty in explaining that there is very much change in this practice from the former one. The only difference he says is that heretofore the department had a list and only invited the people on the list to tender for supplies, but that now he has broadened that practice by advertising in the newspapers which support the government. Does my hon. friend think that is a change in the public interest?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think so.

Mr. BLAIN. Would not that rather increase the government patronage?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No.

Mr. BLAIN. I beg to differ with my hon. friend on that point. Heretofore he had a list of the faithful, but now he advertises in the newspapers that support the government but not in any other. How does he know that a paper supports the government or not? Has he a list of the papers supporting the government?

Mr. PUGSLEY. As a rule, I endeavour to see if they take an enlightened view of public matters. From that I can pretty well judge on what side they are.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. The minister appears to think that in the letting of contracts for supplies he is taking an entirely new departure and is giving Conservatives just as good an opportunity to tender as Liberals. But he knows that the Conservatives, to a large extent, do not take Liberal papers.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is a great misfortune. I am surprised at that.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. When it comes down to advertising for tenders, it does not seem very good practice for the minister to advertise only in government newspapers. If he were conducting his own business, he would not conduct it in that way.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. My hon. friend the minister read out a few items a moment ago which he said were fair and reasonable. Let me draw a few to his attention, taken from page V—319 of the Auditor General's Report. On dredge scows—Mr. Davie had something to do with this—he spent $1,333.13. Let me just mention a few items and ask the hon. gentleman if he considers the prices fair. Elm, 950 feet at 8 cents per foot or $80 per 1,000 feet. Why, we are buying elm lumber at home at $12 per 1,000 feet.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Where?

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. At my home.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That must be an elm country. Is that what they call swamp elm?

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. What my hon. friend bought no doubt was slippery elm.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I would sooner have that than swamp elm. My hon. friend will not answer my question.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. Here is an item of iron spikes, 457 pounds at 6 cents per pound. I want my hon. friend to state if 6 cents for spikes is a fair price. He can buy them by retail at 3 cents.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The chief engineer disputes that statement absolutely.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. Let him go to any hardware store and he will get them at 3 cents per pound. What do you pay for railway spikes on the Intercolonial Railway?

Mr. EMMERSON. There is a vast difference in spikes.

Mr. PUGSLEY. You buy them by the ton for the railway.

Mr. EMMERSON. There is a difference between ship spikes and iron spikes.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. They are all made of iron and steel, and steel and iron are the same price to-day.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am told not.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. I know better, for I am handling 1,000 tons every year. Here is an item for labour, one and a half day at $5 per day.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It depends on whether that was expert labour or not.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. $5 a day would be a pretty good price for Mr. Davie himself.

Mr. LOGGIE. Ship spikes and steel spikes are entirely different. Ship spikes are wrought spikes. They are entirely different from the ordinary wire spikes and cut spikes.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. Here is oakum, 434 pounds at 8 cents per pound. What is pitch worth a barrel?

Mr. HARTY. I do not know. I never handled it. We do not use it.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. It is used in Kingston. The government use a good deal and pay $5.50. I can buy it at $3.50 laid down.

Mr. HARTY. How many barrels are charged there?

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. Four. The government are paying $5.50, and other people can buy it for repairing their roofs at $3.50. Then, there is an item, use of forges, etc., $30. These are hand forges that you can buy at $15 or $16 apiece. Yet, the department pays $30 for the use of two or three of them. Another item reads, use of tools, $75. These are tools brought over to repair these scows. And the minister pays a bill like that. It is like the cross-cut saw that was spoken of last year for the use of which $30 was paid. Then there is cartage of tools, etc., to and from dock, $25. Also wood wedges, $25.60. I am sure that if we moved for these accounts and got them down, we should find them all certified as 'fair and just'. But plenty of the members on that side of the House know that the prices of some of these articles are not fair and just. And the minister pays these prices that are made without tender and without calling for competition. Then he will tell us that the patronage list is done away with.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The hon. member (Mr. George Taylor) is out, as he sometimes—I will not say always—is. Take, for instance, the item of $5 for labour about which he makes such an outcry. This is a day and a half at $5 for the day and a half.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. No, it is carried out at $7.50.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Well, I will not quarrel with my hon. friend over $2.50. With regard to the elm, I am told that such elm as was used for this work costs what is charged. It is what they call rock elm.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. You can buy it for $20 a thousand.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The hon. member said it could be bought for $12.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. I say we are buying it at $12—not rock elm.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think we should be glad to take all that the hon. member (Mr. George Taylor) can furnish at a good deal more than $20. With regard to the hire of tools—

Mr. NESBITT. I will say that if the rock elm is of the right kind it is worth $80 a thousand.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. I presume my hon. friend (Mr. Nesbitt) is a good judge of it.

Mr. NESBITT. Yes, I know all about it. I will guarantee that I know more about it than the hon. member (Mr. George Taylar), and put up money on it.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. I dont' bet money.

Mr. NESBITT. My hon. friend ought to be fair. You cannot buy mill run rock elm with the culls out, for $20.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It does me good to have a practical man meet my hon. friend (Mr. George Taylor)—

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. I do not admit that the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) is a practical man—practising law and knowing all about the price of lumber. I will tell him that we can buy elm lumber—we refuse it—at $12 a thousand, and not mill run—

Mr. NESBITT. I do not believe there is a man in the world who would be foolish enough to sell mill run, culls out, rock elm at $20 a thousand. And even swamp elm cannot be bought at $12 a thousand, unless he takes it mill run without the culls out.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. We are buying it, cut, four, five and six inches, specially sawn, five-eights thick, at $12 a thousand.

Mr. NESBITT. Log run?

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. No. I know what we are doing.

Mr. PUGSLEY. From what the chief engineer of my department tells me—and he is an expert, buying these materials continually—I am led to believe that my hon. friend from North Oxford is a much more practical man than the hon. member opposite (Mr. Geo. Taylor).

Mr. COWAN. On what does the minister base his judgment?

Mr. PUGSLEY. On the opinion given me by a gentleman who knows about these prices.

Mr. COWAN. I thought it was on the noise the hon. gentleman made.

Mr. NESBITT. I have a letter upstairs offering me $18 a thousand, log run, dead culls out, for swamp elm.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Is that from the government?

Mr. NESBITT. No, from a private party.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Carried.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. No, the minister was about to explain about the tools.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This was in cases where the work was done by our own men.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. How about the $30 for a couple of hand forges?

Mr. PUGSLEY. It depends on how long they were used.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. You can buy them for $15 a piece.

Mr. S. SHARPE. What is the difference between the maintenance expenses and operating expenses as shown in the return brought down to the motion of the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German)?

Mr. PUGSLEY. It is sometimes difficult to draw the line between the two. In operating expenses are included wages, coal, oil and other items of that kind. Some slight repairs might also be charged in operating expenses. But it is at this point that it is hard to draw the line.

Mr. S. SHARPE. What principle does the department follow?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The chief engineer tells me that there are charged to maintenance those repairs which cannot be fairly made by the crew when the boat is in use.

Mr. S. SHARPE. Are the expenses of each of these dredges shown separately in the Auditor General's Report—all the expenses of each dredge?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I understand so.

Mr. S. SHARPE. In the case of the dredge 'Challenge,' I find at page V—305 of the report of the Auditor General for the year 1908-9, the items chargeable against the vote amounted to $7,394.44. But in the return brought down, the operating and maintenance expenses amount to $12,058.27. Why do not the items in the Auditor General's Report and in this return correspond?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The reason might be this: The statement in V-305, I think, is for dredge vessel repairs. In the statement which the department brings down, there is the cost of operating, $5,976 and the cost of maintenance, $6,081. Now the Auditor General may not apportion the cost of dredge vessel repairs or of operating and maintenance the same as the department does, he may take a different view. But the total should be the same for the 'Challenge.' The two items, dredge vessel repairs and dredging, ought together to make the sum total we have in our return. But the difference would be accounted for by the fact that the auditor might take a different view of the operating expenses.

Mr. S. SHARPE. I understand that the expenditure chargeable against any dredge, both for operating and maintenance, would be included under the name of the dredge in the report.

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, because there is another item for dredging. My hon. friend will see in the estimates, page 72, for Quebec and Ontario, dredging, which includes operating expenses.

Mr. BOYCE. Is there any account kept with regard to this dredging work, giving the cost of dredging, then what amount of material the dredge has taken out, so as to get an idea of what the dredge is doing in the shape of work per day, and per quantity, classifying the cost, and ascertaining how much that class of work is costing?

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is done periodically. My hon. friend will find all that in the annual report of the department. The report does not write off anything for depreciation, but the actual cost of operating is given with the quantity of dredging.

Dredging plant, Manitoba, $13,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This amount is to make provision for the construction of new dredging plant to do the dredging required in Manitoba. We require a new hull and boiler and a small tug for the dredge 'Assiniboine'; also a new hull for the dredge crane, and improvements in machinery.

Mr. BRADBURY. Where is that dredge going to operate?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The 'Assiniboine' works at the mouth of the Red river near Selkirk.

Mr. BRADBURY. Is that the new dredge built last year, constructed out of an old snag boat?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think the 'Assiniboine' was renewed about a year and a half ago.

Mr. BRADBURY. The dredge I refer to was a snag boat converted into a dredge. I understand they are both working at the mouth of the Red river. One was a suction dredge, and the other a dipper dredge.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am not familiar with the names of the dredges, but the chief engineer tells me the 'Assiniboine' is working at the mouth of the Red river.

Dredging plant, Saskatchewan and Alberta, $65,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This is to make provision for building two snag boats and stone lifters, to be operated on the Saskatchewan river. We find these boats are urgently required to remove boulders and improve the navigation of the river.

Dredging plant, British Columbia, $160,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. A new elevator dredge is required, and we require a gasoline launch for use on the Thomson river by the assistant resident engineer estimated to cost $5,000. Then we want a drilling plant for Victoria harbour, $30,000. We shall have to increase this vote largely. Improvements are very urgently required in Victoria harbour, and we want to make them more rapidly. These improvements are required by reason of the Grand Trunk Pacific having determined to build a wharf in Victoria harbour. They have applied to the department for approval of the location of it, and it is going to very seriously interfere with other steamers coming in unless we can widen the harbour. We will find it necessary to do a considerable amount of rock blasting and also a considerable amount of dredging. We have now in contemplation the purchasing of two Lobnitz rock breakers. We propose operating both of them and also having double shifts in order to get through with the work as rapidly as we can. The work is most urgently needed by reason of the increased number of steamers that are going to Victoria harbour. There are steamers running between Seattle and Victoria, between Vancouver and Victoria, between Prince Rupert and Victoria, and the number is to be supplemented by the steamers that have lately been acquired by the Grand Trunk Pacific. Therefore, we shall have to ask probably a little later on for a considerable increase in this vote. Then, in regard also to Vancouver harbour, we shall require a very considerable increase. We have had a very careful survey made of the entrance to Vancouver harbour, or what is known as the first narrows, and we propose to do a very important and very necessary work in the immediate future, namely: the widening of the channel to about 1,200 feet. This work is going to cost up probably $400,00, apart from the cost of the dredge. We will require a dredge having peculiar features to do that work most expeditiously and economically. The dredge which the engineer recommends is one of the elevator variety.

Mr. COWAN. Is that the dredge you referred to?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, and that dredge, it is estimated, will cost somewhere in the vicinity of $275,000 in addition to the duty.

Mr. BLAIN. Why could not that be built in Canada?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The only dredge of the kind that has ever been built in Canada is the 'Fielding,' which was built at the Sorel shipyards, and which cost very considerably more money than this dredge cost. We may be able to get it built in Canada although it would take considerable time. This work is urgent. We have not positively decided that we shall go abroad. If we can get it built in Canada within the time that we ought to have it at work we shall be very glad to do so.

Mr. COWAN. I understand the minister to say that the elevator dredge for which $135,000 of this item is intended is for work on the first narrows?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes.

Mr. COWAN. That is the dredge the minister is speaking about?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes.

Mr. COWAN. As I understand from the reports of the various engineers who have examined the situation, an ordinary dipper dredge or a suction dredge will not do; it must be an elevator dredge. Did I understand the minister to say that dredge will be ordered in Canada or not?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No. what I said was that I am inclined to think that we shall find it most advantageous to purchase that dredge in the old country, because these dredges are not ordinarily built in Canada. I do not know of any elevator dredge built in Canada except the 'Fielding.' The capacity of the 'Fielding,' is about the same as the dredge we propose buying, and if I am right in the figures we will get this dredge, which is of steel and has a capacity of about 800 or 1,000 cubic yards per hour, for about half the cost of the 'Fielding,' excluding the duty. If upon inquiry we find that we can get an elevator dredge built in Canada within a reasonable time, I would be very glad indeed to get it here, but I am sure we can get it very much earlier if we buy it abroad.

Mr. COWAN. It is the advice of the government engineer, is it not, that it will be necessary, in order to get the right kind of dredge, to order it in the old country?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, of the resident engineer.

Mr. COWAN. Did I understand the minister to say that this item will have to be increased?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes.

Mr. COWAN. I understand then that the $90,000 taken out of this item will not be devoted to the purchase of a dredge or plant?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, we will use the $90,000 for operating.

Mr. COWAN. Might I ask the minister, who has been giving, I am very pleased to be able to say, good attention to the first narrows, about when the dredge will be ordered, and in operation?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The dredge will be ordered immediately upon the passing of the Appropriation Act. We have no power to give an order till then, but immediately after the Appropriation Act passes we shall give the order for the dredge. We are making inquiries and getting all the information, but we cannot enter into a contract until the Appropriation Act passes. I recognize the great importance of going on at the earliest possible moment with this work of widening the first narrows, and also the work in Victoria harbour. The work at both places is most urgently required, and I can assure my hon. friends from British Columbia, that there will be no time lost whatever after the Appropriation Act is pessed.

Mr. COWAN. I think the minister is aware that on the south side of the narrows there are some submerged or partly submerged rocks that the engineer advises should be removed?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes.

Mr. COWAN. Some 63,000 yards, I believe. May I ask the minister what machinery is being provided for the removal of that rock?

Mr. PUGSLEY. That will be removed by means of the Lobnitz rock crusher. We also propose to remove the Parthia shoals as well.

Mr. COWAN. That is one of the objects for which these rock crushers are to be purchased?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, we intend using Lobnitz rock crushers there, and at Victoria harbour. We will put them at work in Victoria harbour first, but we will start work at the first narrows as soon as we can conveniently, and we will use the Lobnitz crushers on the south side of the channel.

Mr. COWAN. I think the attention of the minister was drawn when he was at Vancouver to the necessity of providing anchorage for vessels in English bay, at a cost for dredging and a breakwater of somewhere in the neighbourhood of $50,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not remember just what the cost is estimated to be, but I remember my attention being called to the need of it.

Mr. COWAN. May I ask the minister what provision is being made for that very much needed work?

Mr. PUGSLEY. We are taking an amount for operating the dredging plant in British Columbia. We have several very urgent propositions in British Columbia in respect to dredging. We have the Fraser river, the north arm of the Fraser, the entrance to False creek, the Vancouver Narrows, Victoria harbour, and Nanaimo. These are the most important places. Then we have quite a number of less important harbours in British Columbia where dredging work is urgently required. All I can say to my hon. friend to-night is that we shall give attention to the work of dredging the basin at the entrance to False creek as soon as we can, but I feel that the first work to be done is the widening of the narrows.

Mr. COWAN. The present estimates make no provision for that?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Not specially for the work at the entrance to False creek. It can be done out of the general vote, if we have enough money.

Mr. COWAN. I understood that the engineer suggested that there should be a breakwater as well as a little dredging at the entrance to False creek.

Mr. PUGSLEY. We would require a special vote for that. I did not understand that a breakwater was needed, but simply dredging of a basin, and the approach to provide an anchoring ground for vessels entering False creek.

Mr. COWAN. Do the estimates before the House provide for the removal of Parthia shoal? I think the minister is aware that that will not require a rock cutter, but only an ordinary dredge.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes. Both the widening of the narrows and the removal of Parthia shoal could be done out of the general dredging vote.

Mr. COWAN. The minister, with a keen eye to the situation, notwithstanding the entertainment he received at Vancouver, was good enough to tell us that we would have a dredge before the season expired. Our seasons there are fairly long, like our patience. We would be glad if the minister would be good enough to say, if he can, when a dredge for this general work is likely to be in the harbour.

Mr. PUGSLEY. From the best information I can get, I believe we can have an elevator dredge launched by the middle or latter part of July, and we can have her at work in Vancouver harbour probably by the first of September.

Mr. COWAN. I was referring, not to the elevator dredge, but to the ordinary dipper dredge, which has a good deal of work to do there—the removal of Parthia shoal, for instance. I believe that the engineer has recommended very strongly that a dredge should be got there at once to do this work.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I may say to my hon. friend that the dredges are all busy. The 'King Edward' is, I think, at this very moment engaged in dredging in False creek at the request of the city of Vancouver. We brought her from Nanaimo for the very purpose of doing urgent work there. What we are trying to do is to keep all the dredges busy all the time. I can assure my hon. friend that the removal of Parthia shoal will be done just as soon as we can do it.

Mr. BURRELL. I did not quite catch what the minister said about $5,000 for a launch.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is applied for by Mr. Aylmer, the resident engineer, for use on the Thompson river.

Mr. BARNARD. What work is he doing on the Thompson river?

Mr. PUGSLEY. There is work all around there—east and west, north and south; for instance, the inspection of booms, and the clearing out of the channel. Then, the Thompson river connects with the Shuswap lakes, and his duties will take him there. He told me when I was in British Columbia last year that he could not do his work without having a launch for the purpose of getting to these inland waters.

Mr. BURRELL. Is the engineer changing his headquarters from Revelstoke to Kamloops?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes.

Mr. BURRELL. The minister had an application for some dredging on the North Thompson river to make that navigable. Will that be part of the work?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Not out of this vote, but that work, if recommended by Mr. Aylmer, will have careful consideration. He thought Kamloops would be a more central point for him, in view of the duties he has to perform in various directions.

Mr. BARNARD. In regard to the rock drilling plants which the minister spoke of for the harbour of Victoria, about how soon does he expect to begin operations there?

Mr. PUGSLEY. We shall have to build very heavy scows on which the rock drilling plants are to be placed, and it will take probably three or four months to have the rock drilling plants delivered, as they are made in the old country. Of course, I cannot enter into a contract until the Appropriation Act passes.

Mr. DANIEL. It appears that this return does not comply with the order of the House, because it contains only a list of the dredges owned by the Department of Public Works. The return is indorsed as a return to an order of the House of Commons dated 15th March, 1909, showing the number and names of the various dredges owned by the government. This deals only with the dredges owned by the Public Works Department, and so does not comply with the order of the House.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It complies as far as my department is concerned. It would be for the Marine Department and the Railways and Canals Department to bring down their returns separately. This is limited to the Department of Public Works and professedly so. If my hon. friend would bring the matter to the notice of the other ministers, I have no doubt they would bring down their parts of the return.

Mr. S. SHARPE. Why should it be necessary for an hon. member to call the attention of the government further?

Mr. PUGSLEY. It may be that the member only wished the Public Works Department dredges. I know it was to me he spoke.

Mr. COWAN. Referring to the first narrows works, what is the capacity of the elevating dredges, what is the quantity that it is estimated will have to be removed, and will the $90,000 be sufficient to carry on the work to the end of the year?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The quantity is estimated at about 2,500,000 yards, and the actual cost of removal with a powerful elevator dredge, without making any allowance for interest upon the cost of the dredge, wear and tear, sinking fund, &c., will probably be about 15 cents per cubic yard. The dredge has a capacity of about 800 cubic yards per hour. There will be no question about keeping the work going when we get the drege there, it will be kept going.

New Dredging Plant, Generally, $340,000.

Mr. S. SHARPE. What is the lowest price per cubic yard for any dredging done under the Dussault-Lemieux contract in Quebec harbour?

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is an entire contract for wharf building and dredging together. For dredging, my recollection is, it is 57 cents per cubic yard scow measurement for the crib seats.

Mr. S. SHARPE. When the minister rents a scow to a sub-contractor, I understand he rents the crew and outfit?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, just the bare scow

Mr. S. SHARPE. A dredge?

Mr. PUGSLEY. If we rent a dredge, that includes the crew, because we have to keep our crew aboard.

Mr. S. SHARPE. So in 1908, when the Dredge 'International' was rented to Dussault et Lemieux, we received $25,200 at 15 cents per cubic yard. That would be 168,000 cubic yards for which the contractor would receive 57 cents a cubic yard, and we, although we supplied the dredge and all the men, paid all the wages and bore the whole expense of the dredge, received only 15 cents a cubic yard. In other words, the contractor made 42 cents a cubic yard, and on the item of rent of the dredge alone, he has a profit of something like $57,200. The resident engineer, Mr. Valiquette, stated before the Public Accounts Committee last year that while the department received $150 a day, the expenses and upkeep came to $125, leaving apparently a profit to the department of $25 a day, but it was shown by the evidence of the same witness, that sometimes as much as 1,000 cubic yards, amounting ot $800 or $900, was dredged, so the contractor was making $600 or $700 a day out of the dredge, and the department was making only $25. According to the minister's statements, this item will give as alarming a profit out of a dredge owned and operated by the government——

Mr. PUGSLEY. Which dredge is that?

Mr. S. SHARPE. The 'International.' The government pay all the expenses, and all they receive is 15 cents, and the department pays the contractor 57 cents for the work we do with our own men and dredge, while we pay all the expenses. In other words, out of that contract the contractor is making $67,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The hon. gentleman is far from stating all of the facts in the case.

Mr. S. SHARPE. I have stated all the facts from the minister's answers.

Mr. PUGSLEY. He has overlooked some facts.

Mr. S. SHARPE. Then it is due to the minister's answers.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The hon. gentleman overlooked some things. The contract was made long before I became Minister of Public Works. I found it in operation when I became minister. The dredge 'International' dredged out the crib seats, it is true, for the contractor, but it was also dredging out the channel, and, under ordinary circumstances, that dredged material would have been taken out three miles or so to deep water and dumped there. But the contractor, who had the contract for the crib work, dredging, and back filling—which he, being the lowest tenderer, obtained after public competition—bought this material from the government and paid 15 cents per cubic yard all round, not only for what was taken out of the crib seats, but also for vast quantities which the government was not paying him a copper for. The result, as brought out before the Public Accounts Committee, was that the government was actually the gainer by the operation.

Mr. S. SHARPE. I do not remember that.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. George Taylor) brought that question up a couple of years ago, but when he found out the facts he dropped it like a hot potato, and we heard nothing more about it until my hon. friend resurrected the matter to-night. When I became minister I found, in connection with the further work, that there would be a greater amount of dredging in connection with the crib seats and less channel work, and I saw the thing would not work out as before. These contractors were going on with the work of building the cribs in regard to which their tender was very low—much less than the work could be done for to-day, in view of the advances in prices of materials. I made a new bargain and insisted on their paying $200 per day for the use of the dredge. After allowing for the cost of operation and wear and tear, and sinking fund and a reasonable contractor's profit, that gives to the government for the dredge 'International' $110 per day in profit.

Mr. S. SHARPE. How many cubic yards per day?

Mr. PUGSLEY. It varies from day to day. Some days she would strike hard material and dredge a less quantity, or storms might arise when she would be more or less idle.

Mr. S. SHARPE. The hon. minister's statement may be clear to himself, but I cannot understand it. The bare fact is this, that the dredge was rented by the contractor on a cubic yard basis at 15 cents per yard and he is paid for excavation at the rate of 57 cents per yard, so that while the government dredge did the work the contractor got a profit on that work of 42 cents per cubic yard.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is not so.

Mr. S. SHARPE. The hon. minister obscures the issue by bringing in a lot of side contracts, dumping down the river, filling in the crib work, &c., but the main fact is that the dredge was rented by the contractor at 15 cents per cubic yard, and the contractor was paid 75 cents per cubic yard, and we did all the work, thus leaving him net 42 cents on our work.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is not the case. That was ventilated before the Public Accounts Committee two years ago, and we never heard a word of it last session from my hon. friend or the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. George Taylor) when the matter was fresh in their memory. Now, however, when not only my hon. friend but others have forgotten the facts most absolutely essential to understand the matter, my hon. friend brings it up again. But in so doing he forgets the most essential fact, which is that, while we were paying for a portion of the dredging at 57 cents per cubic yard, the contractor was paying the government for thousands upon thousands of cubic yards for which he was not getting one cent from the government, so that the one account over-balanced the other, and the government received more than it paid out to the contractor. When I became minister I found that there was more dredging to be done in connection with the crib seats and less channel work, so I made the contractor pay $200 per day for the use of the dredge, on which we get a net profit of $110. There are many days when the dredge would not average 700 yards. It does not average that for the season. On some days, therefore, we would be getting at the rate of 40 or 50 cents per cubic yard for the work done.

Mr. PUGSLEY.

Mr. S. SHARPE. When we lend a dredge at so much per cubic yard, if there be a day when the dredge is not working the government pays the inspection.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This charge is for every day, whether the dredge works or not.

Mr. S. SHARPE. I am not speaking of the $200 per day, but of the item per cubic yard.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That was an old arrangement before I was minister.

Mr. S. SHARPE. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will admit that I was correct so far as 1908 was concerned?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, because my hon. friend leaves out of account the vast quantity of dredging out of the channel for which the contractor was not receiving one cent from the government, and which, if the arrangement had not been made with the contractor, we would have had to tow out to deep water some three or four miles distant. For those thousands and thousands of cubic yards of dredged material, the contractor paid us and used it for back filling.

Mr. S. SHARPE. If he had not got it from the government, he would have got it from some one else.

Mr. PUGSLEY. But we would have had to tow it out to sea and dump it there.

Mr. CROCKET. Does the $90 a day cover the wages of the crew and the expenses in connection with the dredging as well as interest upon the investment?

Mr. PUGSLEY. $91 covers the wages, the coal, the interest upon the expenditure, and a reasonable amount for wear and tear.

Mr. CROCKET. What is the capacity of the dredge?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Working under favourable circumstances, about 700 cubic yards per day at that depth of water.

Mr. CROCKET. What is the depth of water?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Forty-eight feet.

Dredging, maritime provinces, $675,000.

Mr. CROCKET. What are the details?

Mr. PUGSLEY. It is impossible to tell in a minute detail where this will be expended. We have many demands from different sections of the country. This covers the cost of operation of the government dredges in the maritime provinces, as well as contract work.

Mr. CROCKET. Has the minister an estimate which shows where the dredging is to be done?

Mr. PUGSLEY. It will take $250,000 for the government dredges, and about $425,-

000 for contract work. We have many applications from many points in Nova Scotia. In New Brunswick we have very urgent requests for dredging at the Miramichi and other places. We have most urgent requests for dredging Bathurst harbour, Shediac, Tracadie, Buctouche, Richibucto, St. Andrews and Leonardsville. We have requests for dredging on the St. John river, on Grand lake, in Prince Edward Island, and numerous other places. Until we go carefully over these estimates after the appropriation is made, we cannot tell where the various dredges will be put to work.

Mr. BLAIN. All this next summer?

Mr. PUGSLEY. As far as we can get along.

Mr. EMMERSON. I did not hear——

Mr. PUGSLEY. And Gaspereau.

Mr. EMMERSON. Ah, I was going to say that I had not heard the minister say anything of Gaspereau. I want to impress upon the minister the absolute necessity of the continuance of the work commenced there in 1908. He was not in the House at that time, and was not familiar with the circumstances, but as early as 1901, the Minister of Public Works of that day, the late Mr. Tarte, had the original survey made and items were put into the estimates for one or two years, encouraging the people there to believe that the work would be speedily prosecuted, but year after year disappointment came. There are some very large industries there requiring navigation facilities. There are large lumbering operations, a canning establishment and others. Steamers go there and boats ply up and down the river. The difficulty in the way of navigation is the bar near the mouth of the river. The main reason always given for not going on with the work was that there were not dredging plants available—that the government had not dredges in the maritime provinces to undertake the work. In 1908 tenders were asked for and operations begun. In the spring of 1909—unfortunately, in my judgment, and to the injury of the work that had already been commenced in 1908—the work was not prosecuted. It was near the close of the season of 1909 when the government dredge was sent. Then, owing to the inclemency of the weather, she had soon to desist from operations. The work done in 1908 would have been of advantage had the bar been completely dredged through so that the channel of the river could have been reached. But, unless this work is prosecuted so as to reach that channel every dollar that has been expended is absolutely wasted. I know the minister has made every effort to have this work done, and I can appreciate the fact that he has been besieged from every section of the maritime provinces for dredging. There is more work to be done than the plant can accomplish. I know that that has been the case ever since I first had any knowledge of these things—and my knowledge began in 1900, when I first became a member of this House. Still, I would strongly urge upon the department the continuance of the work this year. It seems to me it would not require a great deal more to make the work already done of practical advantage to the port and to the shippers who find it necessary to reach that port. Larger vessels are being used, and a great deal of lumber is being exported. As a result of the conditions of the channel, the lumber merchants are sending their lumber to Cape Tormentine and other ports, incurring the cost of railway charges, this being necessary in order to secure shipping facilities. If the dredging were completed vessels would go up the river and load at the wharfs of the lumber establishments at Port Elgin.

Mr. CROCKET. How far is Port Elgin from the mouth of the river?

Mr. EMMERSON. I am not sure, but I should estimate it at between a mile and a mile and a half.

Mr. BLAIN. Who owns the wharf?

Mr. EMMERSON. The lumber establishment own wharfs where they would ship if the vessels could reach them. Then there are fishing concerns that ship.

Mr. BLAIN. Does the government own any wharf there?

Mr. EMMERSON. I think there is an old landing wharf below the railway draw-bridge. But the main shipping would be done at the wharfs above the draw-bridge. The New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island Railway which connects Sackville at the Intercolonial Junction with Cape Tormentine opposite Prince Edward Island, passes through Port Elgin and crosses the Gaspereau river at that point. In the bridge they have a draw to enable vessels to pass up and down the stream. Small vessels can go there. There is a large business with Prince Edward Island.

Mr. CROCKET. Do small vessels go to Port Elgin now?

Mr. EMMERSON. Vessels with light draft—yes.

Mr. CROCKET. What draught?

Mr. PUGSLEY. They can go at high tide.

Mr. EMMERSON. The difficulty is the bar which prevents the approach to the river. The river opens out into the Bay Verte. The sweep of the sea from Northumberland straits up into the bay has formed this bar. In former days, I am told, larger vessels could approach that river and navigate these waters.

Mr. CROCKET. Would not the river require to be dredged?

Mr. EMMERSON. Not to Port Elgin. After you get beyond a certain point the channel is sufficiently deep. The dredging is necessary at the mouth of the river —that is my understanding of it. The people there were very much interested. They have from time to time got up petitions and had public meetings. They are very anxious for the advancement of the trade of that section of New Brunswick, and so to have this work proceeded with. I cannot use language strong enough in which to urge upon the minister the importance and necessity of this work. I think he has had applications from time to time directly from the residents of that community, and must himself have some idea of the necessity of the work. He can readily understand, representing that constituency, and coming more closely in touch with the people, how zealous they are in approaching me, and if I could be inspired with the same zeal in my attempts to approach him, I am sure my appeal will be a successful one.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I have been very strongly urged by my hon. friend, repeatedly and incessantly urged, to complete this work. I have also been urged by prominent business men of Port Elgin, and I am happy to be able to say to my hon. friend that I anticipate that early in the coming season I shall be able to continue this work with one of the government dredges, probably the same one which was there last year.

Mr. FIELDING. I wish to remind the Minister of Public Works that there are a number of places in Nova Scotia, which he has not mentioned, but for which I shall not fail to put in an application in due course, places in which my constituents are interested.

Mr. BLAIN. I thought that everybody was served in the county of the Finance Minister.

Mr. FIELDING. Not at all. My hon. friend must come down and see that lovely neighbourhood.

Mr. CROCKET. I would like to ask the member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) if I correctly understood him to say that the government dredge was sent there too late in the season of 1909 to do any work, on account of stress of weather.

Mr. EMMERSON. I commenced early in the spring urging the minister to send a dredge there. His answer was that he hoped to have one available very shortly, one which was engaged either in Prince Edward Island or in Nova Scotia; he hoped that she would be relieved shortly and would go there early in the season. I assumed that it was because he was disappointed in his expectations that the dredge did not reach there earlier. She did reach there and did some work, but the season closed early with rough weather, and they were compelled to take her away.

Mr. WRIGHT. Following up the item which has just been introduced by the hon. member for Westmorland, asking for an appropriation for government dredging in some of those minor streams, I would like to ask whether the local government in New Brunswick does not do a good deal of this kind of work.

Mr. EMMERSON. No. I may say that the harbours and streams in the maritime provinces, as elsewhere in Canada, are not only under the control of the Dominion government, but are entirely within their jurisdiction. The provincial government and legislatures have never recognized any responsibility with regard to them for that reason, and for the further reason, that this dredging work being for the promotion of navigation, it is exclusively under the jurisdiction of the Dominion.

Mr. WRIGHT. I might point out that in the province of Ontario a good deal of this kind of work has been done by the provincial government, on just such streams as the hon. gentleman has made a plea for.

Mr. EMMERSON. In harbours?

Mr. WRIGHT. Navigable streams.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The provincial government?

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes, I have seen them doing it myself.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Would the hon. gentleman be good enough to tell me of any case where the Ontario government has done any dredging, except of course in connection with drainage works?

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes, in the Muskoka rivers and Muskoka lakes, and I have seen them doing it. You will find them dredging below Huntsville, where they have worked in a chain of lakes and have made these lakes navigable for steamers. They have done dredging in Peninsula lake.

Mr. EMMERSON. I must say that the provincial authorities of Ontario have shown a magnaminity which is refreshing.

Mr. WRIGHT. I think they will be inclined to drop this kind of thing if the Dominion government does it in other provinces.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think the hon. gentleman will find that it has been pretty well dropped long ago.

Mr. WRIGHT. I know a good deal of that work has been done in the upper lakes by the local government. I think it would be unfair to saddle this kind of work on one province and do it for other provinces. If that is the way it is viewed in the maritime provinces, I am pleased to know it. We will know where to go to get dredging done in future.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The Dominion government has done far more in the way of dredging for the province of Ontario than for any other province, I think we are doing more for Ontario than for all the other provinces combined. Take Port Arthur, Fort William, Victoria Harbour, Tiffin, Midland, Goderich, Port Burwell, Port Stanley, Rondeau, Cobourg, Toronto, Hamilton, Port Dalhousie—take them altogether, and you will find that they amount to as much as the dredging in all the other provinces put together. What my hon. friend says is a surprise to me. It is a strange thing that, having been minister for some years, I do not know of any dredging work being done by the government of the province of Ontario. I never heard of such a thing.

Mr. WRIGHT. In the very next item the maritime provinces get $675,000, a general vote for dredging, while Ontario and Quebec combined get the same amount. So the hon. gentleman is entirely wrong.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Go back to capital account, page 55, and you will find for Fort William and Port Arthur, $800,000, Tiffin, $120,000, Victoria Harbour, $145,000.

Mr. CROCKET. Has the minister estimated the cost of the work that will be necessary at Gaspereau to make a channel which will enable vessels to go up to Port Elgin, as suggested by the hon. member for Westmorland?

Mr. PUGSLEY. My recollection is that it is somewhere in the vicinity of 200,000 cubic yards.

Mr. CROCKET. Does that include dredging in the river as well as at the bar?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes. That will be dredging to give access to Port Elgin.

Mr. CROCKET. I do not propose to discuss this matter, because it has been under investigation in the Public Accounts Committee. But I saw the report of the resident engineer, Mr. Stephens, in which he stated that the depth of water there varied from 8 inches to 5 or 6 feet. Perhaps the hon. member for Westmorland has some information.

Mr. EMMERSON. On account of this bar a good deal of sawdust has floated down the stream and has reached a point between where the waters of the bay join with the waters of the river. There are some sawdust banks and they are a measureable obstruction, but they are of such a character that vessels going in and out, while they touch them are propelled or hauled through, I think, by tugs, and the passage is not difficult. As a result of that there may be a variation in the depth of the water near the mouth of the river. The cost of the removal of such obstruction would be a mere bagatelle. The main dredging is in connection with the bar and, where the bar comes along the channel, straightening the channel.

Mr. CROCKET. Did I correctly understand, the minister to say that the dredging which was done in 1908 did not complete the channel through the bar, but that it was left in such a condition that if the work is not continued that which has already been done will fill up and there will be an absolute waste of money?

Mr. PUGSLEY. When it is completed through the bar the work will be done.

Mr. EMMERSON. If you undertake to make a channel through a bar, only cut a certain distance of it, and do not complete the whole channel, and the channel is not available between the harbour and the sea outside, it follows that unless that work is prosecuted through, the money already expended will practically be made useless.

Mr. CROCKET. That is the condition in which the work was left in the fall of 1908?

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes, that is the condition in which it was left in the fall of 1908. Unfortunately some heavy storms came there that compelled the removal of the dredge. It is a very difficult place to dredge.

Mr. CROCKET. Because of the class of material?

Mr. EMMESRON. No, but because of the winds and the exposed position of the dredge. When the winds come in a certain direction it is very difficult for the dredge to do any amount of work per diem. In the fall of 1908 the weather became very severe.

Mr. CROCKET. They got 1,300 cubic yards in a day.

Mr. EMMERSON. I do not know how much they did in a day; I can only say that during a great many days they were unable to work at all. I know that from personal observation. What they did when the weather was good and when they could work is to me unknown, but I do know that time and again when I was in the vicinity, on account of the weather, the dredge was unable to do any work whatever. She was compelled to go away from the scene of her work in November.

Mr. CROCKET. The hon. member's statement agrees very largely with that of the resident engineer who reported that the work would require to be continued, and he stated in his report last year that the work that had already been done was of such a character that it would fill up during the season of 1909.

Mr. EMMERSON. I am not an expert on such matters, but it would be self-evident to me that this would occur at almost any place.

Mr. CROCKET. The statement of the engineer was that it would require to be continued last season. I understand from the hon. member for Westmorland that the work was not continued last season, and that the opening was not made in the channel.

Mr. EMMERSON. Then my hon. friend misunderstood me. The work was continued last season, but too late to finish it up and on account of the inclemency of the weather they had to leave it.

Mr. CROCKET. How long did the dredge work last season?

Mr. EMMERSON. I could not tell you. I was away in the United States during the time she was there.

Mr. CROCKET. The reason I ask is that I understood from the chief engineer of the department, in the course of his examination before the Public Accounts Committee, that the government dredge was not at work there, and did no work during the last season.

Mr. EMMERSON. She certainly did.

Mr. CROCKET. And I understood the minister to say the other day that the government dredge was sent there, and prosecuted the work during 1909.

Mr. EMMERSON. She did, and I know from a gentleman who was here recently who is very much interested, he being a citizen of Port Elgin, that the dredge had been there, and had done work during last autumn. I do not know of it personally, because I was absent from the country during the autumn months of last season.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The hon. gentleman must be mistaken as to what the chief engineer said. I cannot conceive it possible that he made that statement knowing that the dredge was sent there, and he tells me that he did not say such a thing. I made the statement myself that last year, owing to it becoming necessary, if we were to do this work at all, to do it by a government dredge, I tried to send a government dredge there as early as possible, but the government dredges were all engaged upon necessary work elsewhere, and it was not until late in the season that I was able to take a government dredge away from other work and sent her to Gaspereau. She went to Gaspereau and continued the work of dredging there until the season was so far advanced that it was necessary for her to leave the place, and go into winter quarters. In the coming season we propose to continue the work commenced on 1908, and which was continued last year in order to give access for vessels to Port Elgin.

Mr. CROCKET. I certainly understood the chief engineer—and I do not intend to discuss the evidence which has been taken—to make the statement which I have repeated to the committee. I will be very much surprised if the minister does not find that statement in the concluding portion of the chief engineer's evidence where I asked him if the work was continued the following season by the government dredge, I referring at the same time to the statement that the minister had made in the House. He may have misunderstood me or I may have misunderstood him.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The hon. gentleman knows that I stated in the House that the government dredge had been sent there.

Mr. CROCKET. Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The chief engineer tells me, that you may have misunderstood him, or he did not understand your question, because he did not intend to say anything of the kind. The reports show the time she was there.

Mr. JAMESON. While the item of general dredging for the maritime provinces is under discussion, I wish to ask the minister whether he has decided that he can do any dredging at the port of Weymouth this year?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am not able at this moment to say when we shall be able to do the dredging work that will be required at Weymouth. What we intend to do, is to apportion the vote among the places which most urgently require dredging work.

Mr. JAMESON. At this point it may be desirable for me to give the minister some information respecting the needs of Weymouth. I brought this matter to the attention of the minister last year, and at that time there was no money available for the purpose, or the arrangements had been made for the dredging for the season, and consequently it was not convenient to take the matter up. At present, Weymouth is very much in need of some dredging at the entrance to the harbour, and also for the straightening of the channel up the river. Some time ago a plan of the river and harbour was made by the department's engineer, and it was intimated that certain dredging work would be undertaken before long. Up to the present time the department has not reached that work. I may say that very great inconvenience is experienced by shippers and others at this important commercial centre owing to the fact that it is very difficult to get the class of vessels that go to Weymouth over the bar and up the river at different times of the tide. At certain times also two steamers, which call at that port regularly, are obliged to lie off St. Mary's bay, because they cannot pass over the bar at the entrance to the river. I pointed out to the minister last year that Weymouth was an important commercial centre, the geographical centre of the county of Digby, and the centre of a large population; that a large lumbering business and a large pulp business were carried on in the immediate vicinity, and that the business of the port would be very considerably increased if the shipping facilities were improved by some dredging and some improvement of the harbour. As the vote this year is almost twice what it was last year, I hope that it will be possible for the minister to give some attention to the needs of Weymouth. It seems, from the report which has been brought down in reference to the dredges which are available for the Department of Public Works, that there are now no less than ten in use; and as three of these at least—and they seem to be dredges of greater capacity than those that have heretofore been used by the department—have been provided in the last four years, I hope that the minister, when he makes his arrangements with regard to the dredging in the maritime provinces, will be enabled to consider the needs of Weymouth.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I have given a good deal of consideration to the question of dredging at Weymouth, and, while I recognize that dredging is required there, as it is in many other places to which we are not able to give attention at the present time, yet the quantity of dredging required at Weymouth, to be effective and to give to the people what they are asking for is so large that I hesitate to recommend to my colleagues the undertaking of the work, at the present time at all events. If I remember rightly, the estimate of the chief engineer is that about 500,000 cubic yards will have to be removed. That is a very large amount of dredging; and, in view of this fact, I am not able to say with any definiteness to-night, whether the work will be undertaken during the coming season, or just what decision will be arrived at with regard to it.

Mr. JAMESON. I may point out to the minister one fact in regard to Weymouth which may influence him a little in making his decision; that is, that for years, I think since confederation, there has not been a dollar of public money expended there for any harbour improvements, with the exception of a very small sum which was spent at some little distance from Weymouth. I am not asking the minister to do all the work which the report he has before him states it is essential to do in order to bring that port up to the position it should occupy; but I submit that he might make a beginning. He might, for instance, do some work at the entrance to the harbour in connection with the bar which I have mentioned, which would afford considerable relief to shippers and to the operators of the two steamers which call regularly at the port. I do not ask that all the work which the plans show to be necessary should be carried to completion out of this vote or during the ensuing year; but I submit that some commencement should in all reason be undertaken during the year for which this vote will be available.

Mr. CROCKET. I would like to get some information from the minister in regard to some of the dredging that is going on in the province of New Brunswick. I would like to know how much money has been expended in dredging at Dalhousie, and how much it is estimated will be expended there out of this vote during the coming summer?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I cannot give my hon. friend to-night a statement of the dredging which has been done at Dalhousie. I did not suppose my hon. friend would ask for that, because the matter has been under investigation by the Committee of Public Accounts.

Mr. CROCKET. How much has been expended at Dalhousie since the close of the last fiscal year?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I have not that information to-night.

Mr. CROCKET. Also, when is it expected that the work of dredging at the public wharf and also at the ferry slip at Dalhousie will be completed?

Mr. PUGSLEY. A good deal of dredging work is to be done at Dalhousie, and how soon it will be completed will depend on the description of dredge that will be used. If we had a large and powerful dredge the work would be done much more quickly than it can be with one of the small dredges. I am not able to give the hon. gentleman the information to-night, but I should think that it would take the whole season and perhaps two seasons to complete the dredging at the railway wharf and public wharf.

Mr. CROCKET. Is the minister able to state the quantity of dredging required at the public wharf?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I have the information in the department, but not here.

Mr. CROCKET. I would like to have that information.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I shall be glad to get it for my hon. friend.

Mr. JAMESON. Does the minister propose to continue the dredging which was done at Digby last year?

Mr. PUGSLEY. There is more work to be done at Digby. I am not at the moment prepared to say whether we will continue it during the present season or not. I will look into the reports and determine whether it is urgently required or not? Of course, we cannot engage in all dredging work at once, and we have to take first the places where dredging is most urgently required.

Mr. JAMESON. The plans will disclose that they have not been worked up to.

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, there is still work to be done under the plans.

Mr. JAMESON. To show the urgency of the need for this work I would say that an arrangement has been made with one of the steamship companies plying between the United States and Nova Scotia to run a direct boat from Boston to Digby beginning on the 1st of July. That boat will require more wharf and harbour accommodation than is required by the boats plying between St. John and Digby. The operating of this new service will be of importance and benefit to all of Nova Scotia, and also to the province of New Brunswick, which is sharing very largely in that profitable summer business. Then, the fishing interests in Digby, along with some others in different parts of Nova Scotia, are being, I am informed, amalgamated, and when that amalgamation is completed, I understand considerable additions will be made to the plant, and a much increased business in this line will be done in Digby. A reasonable amount of dredging in one part of the harbour would undoubtedly afford this Boston steamer increased accommodation, and would also afford better facilities for the larger fishing business which it is likely will be carried on by the fleet.

Mr. PUGSLEY. When we come to apportion the amount the question of continuing the dredging at Digby during the present season will be carefully considered. Referring to Dalhousie, during the season of 1909, the A. and R. Loggie dredge 'Reliable', afterwards named the 'Invader', worked in the ferry business at Dalhousie, dredging about the pier head, and the new ferry wharf berths for schooners with thirteen feet of water, and next the Dalhousie wharf a berth for deep water vessels seventy-five feet wide six hundred feet long, and twenty feet deep at low water. The material removed was 62,735 cubic yards, costing $31,632.

Mr. CROCKET. Is the work at the wharf of the Dalhousie Lumber company completed?

Mr. PUGSLEY. It is completed to the depth of fifteen feet, but the traffic coming to the wharf requires a depth of twenty-one feet. It is for us to consider whether we will go on dredging to a depth of twenty-one feet or not.

Mr. CROCKET. How much was expended last year upon that?

Mr. PUGSLEY. 30,546 cubic yards were removed since the close of the last fiscal year.

Mr. CROCKET. Was any work done at Caraquet last year?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, dredging operations were performed across the shoal in Caraquet harbour. 48,772 cubic yards were removed.

Mr. CROCKET. Is that to be continued during the coming season?

Mr. PUGSLEY. We have not decided as to that; there is necessity for completing the work.

Mr. CROCKET. When contracts are let do they specify the depth to which the dredging is to be done, or the quantity that is to be removed?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Sometimes they have in the past and sometimes not. We think it is the better practice to determine the depth to which the dredging shall be carried on and specify it in the specifications. I think the coming year we will do it in all cases.

Mr. CROCKET. At Caraquet I judge the depth was not specified.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is a matter for the resident engineer. He lays out the work and the dredge is supposed to work according to his direction.

Mr. CROCKET. This seems a very objectionable practice in the letting of contracts. At Dalhousie, for instance, I understand the contract was simply a contract to do dredging at Dalhousie without specifying where. The contract was let to a contractor, and the work might go on from year to year for ten years, or as long as the resident engineer could find anything to dredge at any point in the harbour. In the case of Dalhousie, from the documents brought down, the contemplation of the department at the start seems to have been that the dredging should be done at the public wharf. The dredge was removed, after a few weeks work, from that to another point, where I do not believe any work was contemplated at the time the contract was let. They go on working her the greater part of the season, then they go on the next season at the same place, and the minister tells us the work is going on next year and has no idea where it is going to stop. This is a most reckless way of letting contracts involving such immense sums. The same remark is true with regard to Loggieville, and other places where dredging is being done. A contract is let and one has not the slightest conception how many years it is to continue. It is all done as the resident engineer may direct. He may direct dredging to be done and to be continued to a depth as in the case of Loggieville, of 15 feet. Then the department determines to carry it another season to 20 feet, and that contract goes on, and the government seems helpless. The practice is most objectionable. If the minister had any regard for the proper conduct of his business, he would introduce some new regulations which would provide for contracts that had some definiteness, and the department would have some idea when they would come to an end. At present A. & R. Loggie, and other firms in New Brunswick have contracts for dredging that may be continued for years to come.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The hon. gentleman either forgets the facts or he does not think it worth while to state them. Ever since the department has been doing dredging work the practice has been, in the great majority of cases, to let contracts for dredging at certain points. The resident engineer is on the spot. He knows better whether it is best to make one cut right up to the wharfs or two cuts, depending on whether it is possible to give accommodation by making the one or the two cuts, or giving a lesser depth first and making the cut right up to the wharf and later on digging to a greater depth. The practice has been to let contracts for dredging at certain places without actually attempting to lay out the work definitely, to do which would require a great deal of survey work in order to have any accuracy. The hon. gentleman says that the Loggie contract may go on for years, and that the other contracts may do the same. According to my recollection, the contract of the Messrs. Loggie is for the season of navigation, or such further period as the minister may determine. Therefore, unless the minister extends the contract, the Messrs. Loggie or others will only be entitled to dredge for that season. As regards extending a contract, the minister would naturally consult his engineering staff, and from the plan made by the resident engineer he would see how much dredging had actually been done, what depth of water there was in the harbour, and what accommodation to shipping, and whether it was reasonably necessary to continue the work. By all these things he would be influenced in determining whether or not the contract would be extended. As regards Dalhousie harbour, a contract was let for the work.

Mr. CROCKET. Without specifying any particular part.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, where necessary to accommodate the people, and the layout of the work was done entirely by the resident engineer. Some remarks have been made by the hon. gentleman as to work being done at certain points. With that the minister has nothing to do. That was purely determined by the engineering department, especially the resident engineer. The resident engineer would be guided by the interests of the port and would have the work done where it would best accommodate the pressing necessities of business, and the layout of the work would rest entirely with the resident engineer. Neither the minister nor any of the officials of the department interfere at all with him in the exercise of his judgment.

Mr. CROCKET. The minister has said that I either forgot the facts or deliberately refrained from mentioning them. But no one who has listened to his statement could have failed to observe that he himself mentioned no fact whatever which I had not mentioned myself.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Did not the hon. gentleman say that the Messrs. Loggie had a contract which they could hold the Crown to for ten years?

Mr. CROCKET. I said they had a contract which might go on from year to year for ten years, and which has gone on, in the case of the dredging at Loggieville and Dalhousie, for three years and apparently, according to the minister's statement, is intended to be continued the coming season at least.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The hon. gentleman is wrong. There was only one extension of the contract at Loggieville. They were tenderers in the different years and they received the contract in the ordinary way, and after that there was but one extension.

Mr. CROCKET. I refer to the dredging given them in the season of 1908, and which the minister said had been continued last year, and they got some three years in all.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That was only one extension, and the hon. gentleman said it had been extended for three years.

Mr. CROCKET. I said in the case of the dredging at Dalhousie there was a contract two years and the minister announced it was to be extended next year.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I did not.

Mr. CROCKET. Then I certainly misunderstood him. Did he not state the dredging was to continue next year?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The hon. gentleman wishes to draw the inference that I said the Loggie contract was to be continued another year. I made no such statement, and no decision has been arrived at on the subject.

Mr. CROCKET. Can he not state whether the Messrs. Loggie will continue the dredging at Dalhousie next season?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The matter has not been considered at all.

Mr. CROCKET. But the work not completed, which was let them by contract in 1908, was continued by them last year?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes.

Mr. CROCKET. The minister states that, according to his recollection, there is a clause in the contract which limited the dredging to the season of navigation.

Mr. PUGSLEY. And which may be extended further as the minister may see fit.

Mr. CROCKET. I would not care to speak from memory as to whether in these particular contracts there is such a term. I know there are some which are thus limited, and the contents are sometimes required by order in council to be so limited.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I feel quite sure such a limit is in this, but I am not quite positive.

Mr. CROCKET. That does not alter the case if the minister, as a matter of course, does renew the contracts from year to year. If it be the case that the contract is limited to the season of 1908, did he call for further tenders in 1909?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The hon. gentleman has already been informed that I did not.

Mr. CROCKET. So it amounts to precisely the same thing, whether the term is in the contract or not. Contracts are let for dredging in a harbour without designating the wharf or the localities where the dredging is to be done, and it is only one who is able to get information either from the resident engineer or the officers of the department, who is in a position to tender. That is one thing which is very objectionable. Tenders are called for without giving any information whatever upon which contractors could base a tender. It is necessary, before a contractor can put in a proper tender, or estimate what the work is likely to cost, to ascertain where the dredging is to be done.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Which he always can do.

Mr. CROCKET. That may or may not be.

Mr. PUGSLEY. And more than that, when the contractor puts in his tender, he must state that he has acquired information as to the dredging.

Mr. CROCKET. Nevertheless there are cases where intending tenderers have not been able to obtain that information. I have not introduced this discussion for the purpose of raising matters that have been under investigation in the Public Accounts Committee, but to call attention to what seems to me a very loose method in awarding these contracts, a method that leaves the door wide open for all sorts of conduct which, I think, would not be thought to be in the public interest. I think that, in connection with this matter, there ought to be some requirement that, when a contract is let, the department itself and the public ought to know just what is expected to be done, and not leave it open to what the minister says has occurred in the ports of Dalhousie and Loggieville—a contract made for one season and continued from year to year so long as the department can find anything to be done in the vicinity of the particular point which is named in the contract.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Shall the item carry?

Mr. CROCKET. Is there anything in this vote for dredging in the St. John river between the city of Fredericton and Woodstock?

Mr. PUGSLEY. It is not decided yet.

Mr. CROCKET. Has the survey of the St. John river channel between Fredericton and Woodstock been completed?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Not wholly completed.

Mr. CROCKET. Is it to be continued next season?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think so.

Mr. CROCKET. How much has the survey cost up to the present time?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am afraid I cannot tell my hon. friend to-night. I will have to get that information. I will afford my hon. friend opportunity to discuss the matter after I get the information from him.

Mr. CROCKET. I was going to suggest that this item stand—

Mr. PUGSLEY. No need of keeping the item for that—

Mr. CROCKET. Not for that particularly. But there are many other matters in connection with this item, many other places referred to, concerning which I wish to get information—not only places of which I have spoken but other places in New Brunswick and in other parts of the maritime provinces. Furthermore, there are matters that I would like to discuss later on that are not ripe for discussion at the present time. Examination has been proceeding in the Public Accounts Committee with reference to dredging in the maritime provinces which cannot be properly discussed now because the evidence is not reported to the House. It may be that some of these are subjects which ought to be brought to the attention of the House, and it is only in connection with this item that this can be properly done.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It would be very unreasonable to ask that the passing of items be delayed until the Public Accounts Committee get through the investigation of what may be before them. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Crocket) has spoken of surveys of the St. John river. There will be an opportunity to discuss that. Upon the motion for concurrence, he can discuss anything he wishes. And, on any item in my estimates, I will afford him opportunity to discuss to the fullest extent matters in connection with dredging or any other matter. But I hope he will not ask that the passing of these items be delayed. I think that, upon reflection my hon. friend will not do that. There is nothing to be gained by doing it.

Mr. CROCKET. I think we are not called upon to pass this item with the meagre information which the minister has communicated to the House to-night. There are many places the minister has mentioned in which these moneys are to be expended. For my part, I wish to know, first, whether, where the dredging is to be done during the next season, and I want, at this time and before the item passes, to attempt to discover just what reports have been made as to the necessity of dredging at these places, what examination has been made and what reports received, and what the estimated expenditure of the dredging is. And I think it is a most unreasonable thing for the minister to think that we who are sent here to watch the expenditure of the people's money shall sit here and see $675,000 voted upon such meagre information as the minister has given here to-night. I do not think the request I make is unreasonable. I say to the minister, quite frankly, that I want information with regard to the places that he has named in which dredging is to be done, and this information I am entitled to as a member of this committee. As far as I am concerned,I certainly do press the request I made that the item should stand until the information is given to the committee.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Question.

An hon. MEMBER. Carried.

Mr. CROCKET. No, it is not carried—

Mr. PUGSLEY. The hon. member cannot speak twice unless some other member speaks—he cannot resume his seat and then rise again.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Crocket) is entitled to speak.

Mr. CROCKET. That is a rather novel proposition to come from the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley). But we in New Brunswick are all aware of the ingenuity which has characterized him all through his public career, and—

Mr. PUGSLEY. I was referring to what I understood was the rule of the House.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I think that in committee an hon. member is entitled to speak as often as he pleases. I do not know any rule under which it is provided that after he has spoken he cannot speak again until some one else has spoken.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think that is the case.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I have not so understood the rule. If the hon. minister (Mr. Pugsley) can point to the rule—

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is the rule in the New Brunswick legislature, whose rules are modelled on those of this House, but I have not examined the rules of this House. Of course, I accept your ruling, Mr. Chairman. In the New Brunswick legislature, whose rules, as I say, are modelled on those of this House, a member cannot speak a second time unless some other member intervenes.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I do nto so understand the rule.

Mr. CROCKET. I would like to know, with reference to the dredging at Bathurst, just what it is proposed to do there. What expenditure was made at Bathurst last year?

Mr. PUGSLEY. So far as future work is concerned, we have not decided concerning Bathurst. We want a full report as to Bathurst. We did considerable at Bathurst last year. There appear to have been 272,00 cubic yards removed last year both from the harbour and from the bar.

Mr. CROCKET. Who were the contractors at Bathurst?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Messrs A. & R. Loggie.

Mr. CROCKET. When was the contract awarded for the Bathurst dredging?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I have not these particulars with me to-night.

Mr. CROCKET. I would like to have the information.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I shall be glad to give the information later.

Mr. CROCKET. I would like to know if tenders were called for.

Mr. PUGSLEY, I will get the information.

Mr. CROCKET. That was in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1908. That expenditure, the minister will remember, was ordered by himself, by telegram sent from Dalhousie on the 14th of October, 1908, to the chief engineer of the Department of Public Works, limiting the expenditure to $5,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That was in the previous year.

Mr. CROCKET. How many cubic yards were taken out?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Some 72,000.

Mr. CROCKET. Was that done at the same rate as was fixed under the minister's telegram of the previous year?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am satisfied tenders were called for that work; it was let under a contract.

Mr. CROCKET. I would like the information as to whether tenders were called for, and if so, when they were called for, what tenders were received, and the prices offered.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I will be happy to give my hon. friend the information later.

Mr. CROCKET. What was the price?

Mr. PUGSLEY. $3 per cubic yard for rock, and 41 cents for loose material.

Mr. CROCKET. Was that material all towed to the dumping ground, or was it cast over as in the previous year?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I have not the information, but I will be glad to get it.

Mr. CROCKET. We understand that a portion of this $675,000 is to be appropriated for the continuation of this work at Bathurst.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I have not said so.

Mr. CROCKET. Well is it, or is it not?

Mr. PUGSLEY. It is not decided yet, and will not be until the report is received.

Mr. CROCKET. I think the members of this House are entitled to know where it is proposed to expend this $675,000 which is appropriated for dredging in the maritime provinces. I would like to know, further, in reference to the dredging at Bathurst, if it is intended that the work which is to be continued, if it is to be continued during the coming season, is to be done by the firm of A. and R. Loggie, under the same arrangement they had with the Department of Public Works for doing last season's work?

Mr. PUGSLEY. We are considering doing considerable dredging at Bathurst, necessitated by the development of the iron deposits some eighteen miles from Bathurst. These deposits are being developed on a large scale, and Bathurst is the nearest point of shipment. The company have in contemplation, if the harbour can be improved, the shipment of a large quantity of their ore from Bathurst, and also the establishment of smelting works there. An improved harbour will also accommodate vessels taking out lumber. If this large work is entered upon, it is not unlikely that the government may arrange for a suction dredge to be sent there. But until a report is received showing the character of the soil, and the quantity of material to be dredged, and until we make up our minds as to what it is going to cost, we will not be able to come to a decision. Borings are now being made by one of the engineers of the department, through the ice. We expect these reports in shortly, and then the matter will be taken up and considered.

Mr. BLAIN. I think it is now about time to adjourn. This is an item that will provoke a good deal of discussion.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think we had better finish up this item.

Mr. CROCKET. I do not think the minister should attempt to force this item through. He has admitted that he is not able to furnish the information I have asked for, and that I am entitled to receive. With regard to the dredging at Bathurst, I think the great majority of the people of New Brunswick would approve of the scheme. If Bathurst harbour can be dredged so as to accommodate these large vessels for shipping the ore of the Drummond company, who are establishing a great industry there, I think the people would approve any reasonable expenditure to accomplish that object. I understand an engineer went down there especially to investigate that matter, and I would like to know if his report shows whether that scheme is feasible.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I have just stated that we have not the completed report. But the engineer is now completing his work of survey.

Mr. CROCKET. Does the minister say that if that scheme is decided upon, and it he enters upon that larger scheme of dredging he has spoken of, a portion of this appropriation will be applied to that work.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It is not unlikely that a part of this money will be expended for that purpose. It will be useful in connection with the larger work.

Mr. CROCKET. I would like to know exactly where the work was done last season.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Part of it was done in removing a sharp bend in the channel at the approach to the public wharf and increasing the depth in the berth at the public wharf. Then there was a quantity of material removed to give passage for logs at low water near the Bathurst Lumber Company's mill. A quantity of material was removed from the ballast bar and also a quantity of mud from what is known as the Tetegouche bar at a point in the channel leading to Bathurst harbour. Of course, all that will be useful work in connection with the carrying out of the larger scheme.

Mr. DANIEL. Is this amount to be expended under contract or does it include any amount to be expended on government dredges as well?

Mr. PUGSLEY. We will require about $250,000 to operate the government dredges and that will leave available $425,000 for contract work.

Mr. DANIEL. I was not here when this item was first called up, but as a matter of fact, most of the principal items in dredging are looked after in the Estimates by special appropriations. This vote, I suppose, is to place in the hands of the government a sum sufficient to dredge where appropriations have not been made?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Where there is no special vote.

Mr. DANIEL. It appears to me, when asking for such a large amount as $675,000, that the minister must have some knowledge as to where this amount will be expended.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I gave that when the hon. gentleman was not here. I gave the list of a large number of places where dredging was urgently required.

Mr. DANIEL. Has the minister given the places where this amount is to be expended?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I gave the names of a large number of places in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island where dredging was urgently required but I stated that we could not do all the dredging at these places this year, and I also mentioned the fact that there were quite a number of other places which I had not mentioned in the three provinces where dredging was urgently required, and that we will not have enough money to do all the dredging work at these places during the coming season, but we will have to use our best judgment to pick out those places where dredging has been urgently required, and do dredging at the other places after the next session of parliament, coming for a further appropriation. But, we have not yet decided as to the different places. We have to go through, and it is a very great labour requiring a great deal of care, all the reports, we have to look into the question of the necessity of the work, the depth of the water, the size of vessels frequenting the port, and then exercise our best judgment and pick out the places where we think the work of dredging should go on. In regard to Bathurst harbour, that work will either be done by a government dredge. or public tenders will be invited when we decide to go on with it.

Mr. CROCKET. That is for the larger work?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes.

Mr. CROCKET. Is it intended to expend any of this money in dredging the Oromocto shoals on the St. John river during the coming season?

Mr. PUGSLEY. It has not been positively decided, but I recognize the necessity for the work, and I think it is not unlikely that a portion of the money will be expended there.

Mr. CROCKET. Has the minister any requests for that work?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, we have had requests from the board of trade at Fredericton and, I think, from the council.

Mr. CROCKET. I understand that there was a contract let for the work in the summer of 1908 to the Maritime Dredging and Construction Company. Was any work done under that contract?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes.

Mr. CROCKET. How much was paid under the contract?

Mr. PUGSLEY. That was in 1908. I have not that here, but my hon. friend can find it in the Auditor General's Report. If the work is continued there public tenders will be invited during this season for it.

Mr. CROCKET. That is information that I would like to have. It is a portion of the St. John river in which the people of my constituency are very much interested inasmuch as the depth of water on the shoals governs the size of vessels that are able to get up to Fredericton, and we understand that these shoals have been filling up, and that navigation has been very considerably interfered with during the last year or two. I would like to know just what work was done under the contract let in 1908, how much was paid to the contractors under it, and if any work was done during the past year.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Of course, my hon. friend can find out from the report of 1908.

Mr. CROCKET. The minister surely has that.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not keep everything in my pocket or in my head. There must be 1,250 of 1,500 works going on in different parts of Canada, and I do not keep all the details in my head.

Mr. CROCKET. The minister, or his officers should have that information.

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, my officers should not either. We are asking for an appropriation for 1910-11. It does not follow that when we come here we will have information as to all the work which was done two years ago.

Mr. CROCKET. I think I am entitled as a member of the committee to ask the minister for it, and the minister is entitled to give it to me.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I will be very glad to get it for the hon. gentleman, and furnish it to him at a convenient time, but I will not go down to my office to-night, and unlock the office to get it. I am not going to send the chief engineer, and I am not going, unless by the desire of this committee, to stay my estimates until it can be hunted up.

Mr. CROCKET. It is for the minister to exercise his own judgment.

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend wanted to know about the work at Oromocto. Last year a channel 18,400 feet long, 225 feet wide, and with a depth of 11 feet was dredged. That was quite an important portion of the work.

Mr. CROCKET. What was the depth?

Mr. PUGSLEY. If my hon. friend does not, by the exercise of his abundant ingenuity, keep my estimates from passing, I propose to go on with the work on the Oromocto shoals during the coming year.

Mr. CROCKET. I do not think that the minister seriously supposes the House would believe that I could prevent him, by asking a few questions, from going on with a work which he says is necessary in the public interest. If that is the thing that influences the minister in the appropriation and expenditure of public moneys the sooner members of this House, and the people of the country know it the better. Is it possible that a little personal feeling which may animate him in reference to an hon. member would influence him in the expenditure of the public moneys of the country? I have asked the minister only for information which I am entitled to receive. All of the questions that I have asked the minister have been pertinent questions, and I propose to continue asking pertinent questions about any public work in New Brunswick or any other part of the Dominion that the people's representatives are interested in, and that we have a right to ask him about. I made a very reasonable request of the Minister of Public Works to allow this item to stand, because he mentioned a long list of places in the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick in which he said that he proposed to do dredging during the coming year; or rather, he mentioned a long list of places from which he had urgent requests for dredging. I wanted to ascertain at which of the places mentioned it has been decided that dredging shall be done during the coming year.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I can say to my hon. friend that if the matter stood for a fortnight, I could give no more information as to where the dredging will be done in the coming year than I have given to-night, because it has not yet been decided. I did not mean that the course taken by the hon. gentleman would at all influence me so far as the dredging at Oromocto is concerned, but if the hon. gentleman is sincerely desirous of having dredging done there or anywhere else, he does not take the best means of showing his sympathy for the work by obstructing the passing of the estimates.

Mr. CROCKET. I leave it to members on both sides of this House if I have attempted to obstruct the estimates, or if the questions which I have put to the minister are not reasonable questions respecting items of expenditure to which we are all entitled to the fullest information, or if I have asked for information which hon. members of this House ought not to have before voting away such a large amount of money as this. I told the minister some time ago that I did not propose to discuss any of those matters on which criticism might be made. I wanted to get information as to the different places in the maritime provinces where dredging is proposed to be done, and I suggested to the minister, I thought very courteously, that the item had better stand, because there was information which the minister has admitted that he is not in a position to give to-night; and I advance the additional reason that there were matters which I wished to discuss under the head of dredging for the maritime provinces, but which are not ripe for discussion at the present time because some of those matters are under investigation by the Public Accounts Committee. I cannot conceive of any good reason that the minister can have for dredging contracts of the Department of Public Works. Surely he does not hope, by forcing this item through at this late hour, in a very slim house, to escape the discussion of these matters.

Mr. PUGSLEY. There will be the fullest opportunity for discussion that the hon. gentleman desires.

Mr. CROCKET. I have been in this House for six sessions, and this is the first time I have heard a minister refuse to allow an item to stand so that a matter may be discussed which a member desires to discuss.

Mr. PUGSLEY. If my hon. friend will permit me, the proper time to discuss matters which are under investigation by the Public Accounts Committee is when the report of the committee is presented. Then it may be fully and completely discussed; my hon. friend may take all the time he wishes. We shall have the report of the committee and the evidence, and everything can be gone into. But surely my hon. friend will not suggest that it is reasonable that important items of supply should be delayed until the Public Accounts Committee makes its report. Therefore, I must urge that we proceed with the business before the committee.

Mr. BLAIN. I wish to renew the suggestion I have made to the leader of the House. It is now twelve o'clock, and whatever may be said of the opposition, I am sure that to-day and on other days when the hon. Minister of Public Works has had his estimates before the committee, there has been no suggestion of obstruction. I am sure that the leader of the House will recognize that this request is a reasonable one.

Mr. FIELDING. I think the Minister of Public Works has given as much information on this subject as can reasonably be expected. There are certain classes of information which a minister should give; there is other information which a member has a right to obtain but it is not reasonable to expect it from the minister in this off-hand way. For instance, the minister was asked to give the expenditure of two years ago at Bathurst. Th's information is really in the possession of the House. We never like to tell hon. members that they should look up the information in the blue-books, because we are glad to look it up and give it to them; but I do not think it is reasonable to ask a minister to withold his estimates until information of that character is obtained. My hon. frend wanted information because he wanted to discuss the question of dredging broadly, and because it is before the Public Accounts Committee. The assurance of the minister that there would be the fullest opportunity to discuss the question when the report of that committee is presented to the House should satisfy the hon. gentleman. This is a general vote and it has been dealt with exactly as in former years. On a general vote of this kind it has never been possible to give in advance information as to the places where dredging will be done. I have had to undergo precisely the same experience as my hon. friend from York in that respect, and after the assurance of the minister that we will have abundant opportunity to discuss the matter when the report of the Public Accounts Committee comes up, I hope he will let the item pass.

Mr. BLAIN. I was not appealing as to whether more information should be forthcoming or not. I was appealing because of the lateness of the hour.

Mr. LENNOX. We have made a good deal of progress to-night, and without considering whether more information should be forthcoming or not, when it comes to twelve o'clock on Friday night, I think we all feel that it is time to adjourn.

Mr. DANIEL. I may say that the Minister of Public Works has had over $1,000,000 voted to-day.

Mr. CROCKET. I am not seeking at all to delay the passage of the estimates. If an hour ago, when the members of this committee shouted carried, the item had been forced through, I would not have had from the minister the information that over 70,000 cubic yards of dredging was done at Bathurst last year, information which I was glad to receive. The minister was not able to complete that information, he could not say under what arrangement that money had been spent, whether it was a continuation of the expenditure——

Mr. PUGSLEY. I said it was by public tender.

Mr. CROCKET. He stated he had not the information, and promised he would get it. This is all information to which members are entitled. I would like to know something about the dredging in the Miramichi river, whether it is at Chatham, the necessity for it, the depth of water, and all that.

Mr. FIELDING. My hon. friend says he could not give you that because it has not been determined.

Mr. CROCKET. It is remarkable if the minister asks $675,000 and has no report in reference to any particular locality as to how much is to be expended here or there. There must be some data on which an estimate is prepared. It will be a revelation to the House if estimates are prepared in that way and votes asked without reference to places or to reports.

Mr. FIELDING. That is hardly a fair argument. The minister read a list of places, and spoke of many others from which he had applications for dredging, all, or most of them meritorious. He simply says: We cannot possibly do all this, but we ask an appropriation of a certain amount, and when expending it we will try to meet the various applications, but we cannot say what particular ones we will grant. That is not unreasonable. If it is unreasonable, we have been unreasonable for many years since I have been here, for that vote has always been dealt with in the same way.

Mr. BLAIN. I think our request is reasonable, and I am sure the minister will not press the item. I have never seen a session when there were so few requests for information, or such short criticism in Supply as we have had this session. We are not open to the charge of obstructing the estimates.

Mr. CROCKET. I want the minister's statement in reference to the dredging proposed in the Miramichi river.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I thought I had mentioned it. I have nothing to complain of about the hon. member for Peel, nor have I anything to complain of so far as the hon. member for York is concerned. I do not complain of his course; he can take any course that commends itself to his judgment, but if other hon. members took the same course as he is taking we could not get through the Public Works estimates alone before next August. I am willing to afford and always afford the fullest opportunity to every hon. gentleman in regard to items in my estimates. The member for York has chosen to take up the entire time of the Committee on Public Accounts for three months with matters connected with my department.

Mr. CROCKET. I rise to a point of order. Neither the Minister of Public Works or any other member has any right to refer to proceedings before a committee of the House.

Mr. FIELDING. There has been an occasional reference to it to-night.

Mr. CROCKET.

Mr. PUGSLEY. When the report of that committee is submitted to the House hon. gentlemen can discuss dredging on the St. John river, upon the Miramichi, at Bathurst, and every where else. If he will give me a memorandum of what information he wants in regard to dredging at any place I will get it for him from the accountant of the department, and furnish it to him before the matter comes up for discussion.

Mr. CROCKET. If the minister had adopted the simple suggestion I made, that this item should stand until we had another meeting of the committee, I do not think any more time would have been lost. There are items before the Public Accounts Committee that one would not want to make a matter of discussion before the House, and which could be dealt with more satisfactorily in Committee of Supply. Some matters will be discussed, but there are others that could be more briefly and advantageously discussed in Supply. All I desire is an opportunity to discuss these matters, and to give the minister an opportunity to bring down the information, which he admitted he had not, and which he promised to bring down. I think the usual practice in such cases is to let the item stand. A discussion on the item cannot regularly take place once it is passed. The hon. minister could object to these matters being discussed on any other item. I have no desire to discuss a New Brunswick contract when an Ontario item is up.

Mr. FIELDING. Surely my hon. friend will accept the assurances of the minister that not only will he furnish the information, but put the hon. gentleman in possession of it in advance of any discussion he may require.

Mr. CROCKET. So far as the information is concerned, that is satisfactory, but there are a few matters that perhaps could not properly be made the subject of debate on a substantive motion before the House. Their discussion would take up very little time in the committee, and that is the only object I have in asking that this item be allowed to stand. Apparently the object of the minister is to take advantage of his position to shut off discussion from matters which he knows can only be discussed in Committee of Supply.

Mr. LENNOX. Cannot we have some understanding about this? Can we not have it understood that the hon. member for York will be given an opportunity to have all the discussion he wants?

Mr. PUGSLEY. He will have the fullest opportunity of discussing anything he wants in this committee.

Mr. CROCKET. In Supply?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Certainly.

Mr. CROCKET. The minister should have said that half an hour ago.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I thought that was the better time, but on any item of supply, the hon. gentleman can discuss this or any other matter.

Quebec and Ontario dredging, $675,000.

Mr. LENNOX. I think we ought now to adjourn.

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson) has been waiting here all evening for this item, and I would not like the committee to rise unless he desires it.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is very kind of the Minister of Public Works to leave the matter with myself, but I would not pretend to govern the procedure of the House. I have waited here patiently during the whole evening for the purpose of referring to a particular matter with which I know the hon. minister is quite familiar. He was good enough, during the course of the evening, to refer to a considerable number of dredging appropriations throughout the province of Ontario, more particularly the larger places, such as Port Arthur, Tiffin, Midland, Goderich and down on the Lake Erie shore, and in the city of Toronto, but did not make any reference to the smaller ports. I was afraid he was going to overlook them. I very much desire that the minister shall pay some attention to the smaller harbours that require immediate attention if they are to be of use to the public. I refer particularly to Oakville. This is not new to the minister, because during the month of February I had the pleasure of drawing his attention to the great need, the urgent need, of dredging that harbour as well as of making improvements also to the wharf. The minister kindly suggested that when this item was up for discussion, I might draw attention to it, and this I now do. I do not know that the minister has ever visited Oakville. If not, I would cordially invite him to come there at the first opportunity. I think that should he visit that beautiful town and note its surroundings and its great need of harbour improvements, it would not be necessary for me, particularly at this hour of the morning, to urge upon him to make a small appropriation for those improvements. Oakville is about midway between Toronto and Hamilton, on the north shore of Lake Ontario. It is a town of considerable importance. In the past there has been considerable shipping at that port, but as nothing has been done for the last six or seven years to keep the harbour in good shape there is no means of vessels getting in except those of very light draft. The result is that very little trade is carried on in comparison with what was done in former years. And unless the government takes action I am afraid that the prospect for the future is not very bright. The difficulty with the harbour is a lack of depth of water due to the fact that the dredging has been neglected. I not merely ask the minister, but I urge him, urge him as strongly as I can, to do something for this harbour. Nothing has been expended there since 1902-3—almost seven years. During that time, the harbour has been so filled up that only vessels of the lightest draft are able to go in. The result is that the trade in flour, grain, apples and small fruits that was carried on there has not been carried on through the harbour of recent years, nor can it be unless some improvement is made. Nor can the passenger boats between Toronto and Hamilton call there as they formerly did. I would remind the minister that Oakville is practically a Toronto suburb so far as residents are concerned. Many Toronto people come out to Oakville to live. They come out in the evening and return to their work in Toronto in the morning. Had we communication by water, Oakville could be made a summer resort of much greater importance than it is. The water communication would be more agreeable to many than the railway. I understand the minister has an estimate from his district engineer of the probable cost of this dredging; I have been led by the district engineer to understand that he forwarded a report or survey to the minister showing the amount that would probably be required. I do not know the contents of that report. I should be very glad if the minister would give us an idea about how much would be required to put the harbour of Oakville in proper shape.

Now, I leave the matter to the minister's own judgment. I think he will be disposed to treat the town of Oakville fairly and do what little is necessary—I do not say too little, for I do not want him to be niggardly in the appropriation. I want him to do what is necessary to put the harbour in good shape, both with regard to depth of water and to the improvement of the wharf where necessary. I am told that some stone filling is required, and also that there are some projecting timbers that interfere with vessels coming to the dock. I am sure that if the minister undertakes the work, he will see to it that it is properly done. I make the appeal to him to do this work, and I trust I may meet with a favourable response.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The claims of Oakville have been very strongly urged upon my attention by residents of the locality as well as by my hon. friend (Mr. Henderson) who has very properly presented the matter, not only once but two or three times to my attention. I am impressed with the desirability of doing dredging work at Oakville so as to allow steamers to enter the harbour. At present they are obliged to lie outside of the wharf or breakwater, and, when storms arise, this is not a safe place for them to lie. If we had some such improvements as are suggested by my hon. friend, it would be greatly to the advantage of the people of Oakville. The report of the engineer has been received. I have not it here at the moment, but my recollection is that about $10,000 was estimated to make very effective improvements. In making the division of the amount we are asking for Ontario and Quebec, the claims of Oakville will receive careful consideration. While I cannot say positively that the work will be done, yet I can assure my hon. friend that I shall be disappointed if I do not find myself able to do this work at Oakville during the coming year.

Some resolutions reported.

Mr. FIELDING moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. BLAIN. What business will be taken up on Monday?

Mr. FIELDING. The naval debate will be continued.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12.35 a.m. Saturday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, March 7, 1910.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

DUTY ON FISH.

Mr. JAMESON. I wish to call attention to the following despatch which appears in the Ottawa 'Citizen,' under date of March 5:

A rather interesting state of affairs, showing the working of the tariff on fish as between the United States and Canada, is reported from Sault Ste. Marie, Ontario. Citizens of the town are now importing fish from Sault Ste. Marie, Michigan. These fish were caught in Canadian waters last season by the Dominion Fish Company, a branch of the so-called Booth Fish trust, and put into cold storage by the A. Booth Company at the Michigan Soo.

A quarter of a cent per pound duty is paid on Canadian fish entering the United States and one cent per pound on fish coming from the United States into Canada. The unique part of the transaction is that Canadian consumers at the Soo are paying one and one-quarter cents per pound in duties on fish caught in their own waters.

The duty on Canadian fresh fish going into the United States is not a quarter of a cent as stated, but one cent per pound, but owing to some elasticity in the regulations or in the consciences of those responsible for their enforcements, this duty is not, I am informed, imposed on Canadian fish which are purchased in Canada by Americans and imported into the United States in American bottoms. I wish to ask if the government are aware of this alleged condition of affairs, if they recognize it as a serious condition and what, if any, measures they propose to take to remedy it?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The attention of the government has not been called to this matter, but I shall have it looked into. On first blush I see nothing extraordinary in it. If fish caught in Canadian waters is imported into the United States it pays duty, and then if it comes back to Canada it had to pay duty. If that is the extent of the trouble I do not know that there is anything wrong, but I will have the matter looked into.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I wish to inquire about two returns, one ordered on December 15, with reference to the appointment of a government weigher at Montreal, and the other of November 24, showing the total amounts paid for printing and advertising.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. If my hon. friend (Mr. Armstrong) will send a note of these returns, I will have the matter looked into.

Mr. STANFIELD. I desire to ask the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) when I may expect the return moved for on November 22, with regard to passes on the Intercolonial Railway?

Mr. GRAHAM. I thought the return had been brought down. I will make a note of it and will have the matter looked into.

EXPORT OF HORSES FROM ONTARIO TO WESTERN CANADA.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I desire to ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) what has been done with reference to disinfecting the stock yards at the feeding points between here and Manitoba. I understood the minister to say that he would attend to it at once. I am informed that nothing has been done so far. I would like to know what the Department of Agriculture is for, if it is not to serve the interests of the farmers in such matters as this?

Mr. FISHER. Immediately after the hon. member's (Mr. Campbell's) remarks on the subject, I spoke to the director general of health on the subject. He said that the question was before him and would see to it that all necessary precautions were taken. I have not asked him further about it, but I think probably that everything has been done.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I may tell the minister that nothing has been done up to date with reference to disinfecting the yards at feeding points between here and Manitoba. It ought to be done at once.

ALIEN LABOUR LAW—ALLEGED INFRACTION.

Mr. THOBURN. I desire to draw the attention of the House and of the minister to whose department the matter pertains, to an item which appears in the 'Central Canadian' published in Carleton Place in the county I have the honour to represent:

Twelve men took breakfast at the Queen's hotel on Tuesday morning. They were all bound from Buffalo to Braeside to build a steamer for the river traffic.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member can only put a question at this stage. Any other discussion will be out of order.

Mr. THOBURN. That is all I wish to do, Mr. Speaker. I wish to draw the attention of the House and of the minister to whose department this relates to the statement here made. This newspaper, with the item marked, was sent to me by the Trades and Labour Council of Carleton Place. I wish that the minister would investigate this case. For it does seem to me hard that, at this season of the year, when a great many of our Canadian mechanics have been idle all winter—especially that class of workmen who are engaged in building ships—they should be deprived of their employment by a horde of mechanics coming in from the United States.

Mr. FIELDING. I had difficulty in understanding the purpose of the hon. member's (Mr. Thoburn's) question. What is the information he desires?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. He wants to know why the Alien Labour Act is not enforced.

Mr. THOBURN. A letter accompanies this newspaper in which the Trades and Labour Council of Carleton Place ask that the minister should take action under the Alien Labour Law to prevent these men coming into the country. They want to know if it is the intention of the government to take any action in the matter.

Mr. KING. If there has been a violation of the Alien Labour Act, it is open to any person to take action to have it enforced. Under the law, there is no need for the government to take action.

Mr. THOBURN. I thought this was a matter that would come under the supervision of the Minister of Labour (Mr. King).

PRIVATE BILLS.

NELSON RIVER RAILWAY COMPANY.

House in committee on Bill (No. 52) to incorporate the Nelson River Railway Company.—Mr. Rutan.

Mr. LENNOX. On Friday evening, in the absence of the Minister of Railways, I asked that this Bill be allowed to stand over. As the minister is now present I desire to direct his attention to the matter involved. This Bill passed the committee the other day with some amendments. Since that time, we have had several Bills of the same character. Notably we had one the other day that was very much pressed, but after a good deal of discussion it was decided that the matter should stand over until the Minister of Railways could have an opportunity to consider the question, not piecemeal but as a whole. The point involved is covered by the 13th section:

13. The company may acquire, utilize and develop lands, water-powers, rights, easements and privileges on the Saskatchewan and Nelson rivers or in the vicinity of its railway, and construct, maintain and operate dams, reservoirs, buildings and works for the general transmission and distribution of electricity for light, heat, power or any other purpose in connection with its railway, vessels and other properties and works, and may supply, sell or otherwise dispose of any surplus water, electricity, electric or other power not required for the purposes of the company, and may enter into agreements with any company or person for any of the purposes aforesaid.

This section has been slightly amended. But the point is this: we are authorizing companies, nominally railway companies—and sometimes, perhaps, bona fide railway companies, but often railway companies in name only—to acquire and develop valuable water privileges throughout Canada, sometimes to the impeding of navigation, at any rate, to acquire most valuable franchises that would be otherwise available for the benefit of the people of Canada, going to lessen their taxation and so decreasing the burden that they would otherwise have to bear. This is a somewhat new departure. But some Bills involving the principle have passed the committee, as in the present case. But there was one we struck upon the other day that is still before the committee. I urged, and for the time being successfully, that the committee should stay its hand until the Minister of Railways had an opportunity to consider the whole matter. Now, it is a very serious question. I admit that it is a very difficult problem to deal with. The companies can put forward the argument that they want water-power to a greater extent than was formerly necessary in the case of a railway because they are going to use electricity, generated by water, as a motive power, and in every case they ask that they shall have the right to sell their surplus power. The result is that if they build a mile of railway, even with the amendments and safeguards we put in, if they build a mile of railway they acquire the right to develop whatever water-power can be developed to the utmost extent and to sell the surplus power. They interfere with the distribution of wealth in that locality, and they interfere—as in the case of the province of Ontario—with the control the provincial government is exercising over water-powers for the benefit of the people. They accumulate in this way, and will continue to accumulate, large unearned fortunes in many cases, and there is every reason to believe that many of these schemes are only railway companies in name. The minister can see that if this came in as a power Bill, it would not go before the Railway Committee at all. In many respects it is a power Bill and nothing else. I would ask the hon. minister to stay progress of this and all Bills of a like character until to-morrow, when the Railway Committee holds its session, or until he can enunciate some scheme which will safeguard the interests of the public. The onus is upon the minister. The matter is not an easy one, but I would ask the minister to allow this Bill to stand over in order that all similar measures may be dealt with alike. We shall have more or less of a contest over it in the Railway Committee to-morrow, and it will be well to allow it and others like it to stand until the minister has stated the policy which the government intend pursuing. If you provide in all these Bills that the railway company shall have the right to develop only such power as they want for their own use, their charters will be shorn of a good deal of danger, but whatever policy the minister may enunciate, I would urge him, in the interests of the public, to see that he does enunciate a policy which will apply to all—some definite, clear policy—and if necessary amend the Railway Act so as to prevent companies, under the garb and name of railway companies, acquiring these valuable franchises and controlling industries. These water-powers will be the cause of great industries springing up at certain points; they will be the producers of trade to be carried over railways, and if railway companies obtain the right to hold up the people in this matter of power, they will have an enormous leverage to exercise.

Mr. GRAHAM. The question raised is very important, and, as my hon. friend admits, not altogether free from difficulty. The problems that confront us in a young country change so rapidly, the conditions surrounding them change so rapidly, that we have something new to solve about every year. My opinion may be an erroneous one, but I do think that tieing up water-powers and preventing their development is not conserving, but wasting them. If we can surround their development with safeguards to the public, and at the same time encourage their development, we shall be doing the best possible in the public interest. It is not in the public interest to tie these water-powers up so that the public cannot get at them, either through themselves or through some company. One of the objections to railway companies being authorized to acquire water-powers is the fear that they might in some way get the rights to expropriate water-powers. But we have a safeguard against this in this measure, and the other Bills. No Bill has gone through the committee which allows any company to expropriate water-powers. As regards the impeding of navigation, the Public Works Department has to approve of every obstruction, of every bridge, or other impediment on a navigable stream, so that way the rights of traffic by water are protected. Some are opopposed to the development of water-powers by railway companies. I cannot see what difference it makes, so long as the people are absolutely protected. My hon. friend had no doubt in mind the case of the coal mines on the other side of the line, which were owned by the railway companies, so that any reduction in the rates on the railway could be added to the price of coal, and the railway company thus escaped the control of rates; but in these Bills the rates to be charged for power as well as the railway rates are to be subject to the board of commissioners, so that if a railway company should have surplus power to sell, the price is controlled by the government. It is difficult to say how far we ought to allow a railway company to go on developing power. Suppose we were to provide that a railway company cannot develop water-power except for the use of its road, and suppose it should develop more water-power than it requires for its operation, how are you going to deprive it from selling its surplus? Who will step in to prevent it? It is well known that a large amount of horse-power can be developed cheaper pro rata than a smaller amount. Now, if a railway company should need only 5,000 horse-power at present, but lays out its plant to provide double that quantity in order to be ready to meet the growth of trade, would it be wise for that company to prevent it developing 10,000 horse-power, although it can do so cheaper pro rata than 5,000, and limit its development to its actual need of 5,000. Would it not be more reasonable to allow the company to develop all it wants, and a little surplus and sell its surplus, so long as we take a proper safeguard to control prices? But even if we should strike it out altogether, the provision giving a railway company the right to sell its surplus water-power, no one, outside some shareholder of the company could prevent its doing so. I have no objection to let the Bill stand until we discuss the other Bill in the Railway Committee, which has a like provision, although several have gone through with that clause in allowing the development and sale of water-power.

Hon. JOHN HAGGART. My hon. friend missed the objection altogether of the hon. member for Simcoe. His argument was that in the case of these valuable water-powers, there should be something for the people, and not have the whole profit go to the individual. In the United States they have a policy by which the people of the United States, and the different states insist that the profits arising from these natural advantages shall redound to the people. What my hon. friend asks is that the government should lay down a clear, well defined policy with regard to this matter so that if an individual or a corporation wants to develop water-power they shall develop it on the policy laid down by the government, under which a certain portion of the profits shall revert to the people. All my hon. friend asks is that this government should have a policy on this matter just as every other country in the world has at present, that the natural advantages of the country shall be for the benefit of the people, and if necessary, that a certain portion shall go to the corporations or individuals who do the developments.

Mr. ALEX. HAGGART. This is not a railway Bill at all. But simply a Bill to acquire some water-powers along the Saskatchewan and Nelson rivers. I would call particular attention to section 7. That provides that the railway may begin—where? At the mouth of the Saskatchewan river, at the mouth of the Nelson river, or at any place between these two points, which are 150 miles apart. It may begin any place along the north shore of Lake Winnipeg between two points 150 miles distant, practically it begins anywhere. It runs neither east, nor west, nor north, nor south. It runs to some place where it may intersect the Hudson Bay railway. The Hudson Bay railway is not located yet. It may run directly west or north, or it may run northeast along the banks of the Nelson river, and with its other powers to construct canals and dams it is placed in a position to grab all the water-powers along that river until the Hudson Bay railway strikes it. It is quite plain that what the promoters are looking for is the acquiring of rights in reference to these water-powers. Another point. Manitoba is interested in this Bill. This territory is all within the limits described by the resolution of the Prime Minister which passed this House about two years ago, whereby the boundaries of Manitoba are set forth. Then there may be another question, the same question that arises in reference to the canal that was projected along the Winnipeg river. There they are developing water-powers under local charters. Here then we may have local jurisdiction in the course of a year, or in a few years, over this stream and the serious question arises as to whether the title that is given to this railway company by this parliament is not paramount to the title which may be given to some other corporation by the local legislature. For these reasons, and for others, I think the matter ought to be seriously considered by the government. As it is to-day the city of Winnipeg is instructing counsel to see that their rights are protected in reference to the Winnipeg river. If you look at the applications that have been made for charters in the unorganized country north and northwest of Manitoba it will appear that there is some concerted action on the part of promoters to secure or grab all the water-powers in that territory.

Mr. RUTAN. Before further action is taken I would like to ask the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Haggart) if he has any petition or objection from the city of Winnipeg to the construction of this railway or a like undertaking. If there are no such objections it seems to me a very peculiar proposition that this particular company which proposes to establish a line of steamships to ply on Lake Winnipeg and then to build a railway from some point on Lake Winnipeg to connect with the proposed Hudson Bay railway should be the one that is subjected to all the objections of hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House. We all know that only a few days ago these hon. gentlemen who are opposing this Bill assembled in a body to put through the Burrard Inlet Bill which contains similar powers.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. RUTAN. And that that Bill went through the committee and also passed this House. I cannot see wherein we can afford to have one policy for one company and another policy for another company. It seems to me that it is a very dangerous principle to go upon. This company are only asking for the ordinary powers. Compared with the powers granted in the Burrard Inlet Bill they were modified, and there is no reason why hon. gentlemen opposite should undertake to obstruct the carrying out of an enterprise which is intended to promote the development of a country which needs development, a country which to-day has no chance of development on account of not having the means of transportation such as this company would provide, and a country which beyond doubt is rich in resources. The people in the northern part of Saskatchewan and the northwest territories, where this enterprise is to be undertaken, are just as anxious for the development of the country as are the people of British Columbia or any other province in the Dominion.

Mr. BRADBURY. In what way will that affect your province?

Mr. RUTAN. It affects my province as well as Manitoba or any other province, for in the future the transportation lines will no doubt extend from the southwest to the northeast, and vice versa, just as the transportation lines of to-day extend from east to west. Natural resources are of no value whatever unless they are developed. What are lands worth to the country if they are not developed? They are not worth anything unless they are developed. Why are we advertising to the world the great opportunities which Canada offers for the investment of capital? It is because this country needs development and we are inviting capital to come and assist in this development. If hon. gentlemen are interested in the conservation of these powers, and if they want to take the attitude which some of their remarks have indicated to-day they had better commence at the beginning of the session and treat all alike. Numbers of these Bills have passed this House during this session, and there is no reason why this should not be passed as well. If we are to adopt that principle let us adopt it at the beginning of the session and treat all alike.

Mr. LENNOX. I quite agree when the hon. gentleman says, treat all alike, and it is because I feel that all ought to be treated alike that I have urged that this matter should stand over.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What about section 11 of Bill 118?

Mr. LENNOX. I think one at a time is pretty good fishing, and I will not bother about anything further at the moment. I am very glad that the minister has decided to leave it over. I recognize, as the minister says, that it is a very difficult question. The promoter of the Bill wishes to leave it until the end of the session, but it seems to me that if we leave it until the end of the session, by the way the thing is going, we will have no more water-powers, because they are going at a very rapid rate. It is a pity that this was not considered at the beginning of the session. To return to what the minister has mentioned, I do not know the Bill to which he refers.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Bill 118, to incorporate the Burrard Inlet Tunnel and Bridge Company, and which gives very much the same powers.

Mr. LENNOX. I was not present when that went through, but I understand that that whole section of country petitioned or urged upon the House that it was very desirable in the public interest. I understand that the circumstances were exceptional, and it may be that we were wrong even then in acceding to their proposal. My position is that every one of these great water-powers, where they are of any considerable extent, should be conserved in the interest of the people, and they should, in some way, if they are granted to private corporations, afford a revenue to the public. I therefore move that the committee report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I think it is hardly fair to put it as the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) has put it, that these water-powers are being grabbed up by private companies. This company, under the Bill which has been passed by the Railway Committee, obtains no power, or right, title or interest in any water-power whatever. It is merely given the right as a corporation to apply for water—the same right which any individual now has.

Mr. JOHN HAGGART. Does it give it any right to expropriate?

Mr. GUTHRIE. No. The right to expropriate is expressly stricken out. I think that we have pretty well safeguarded the public interest. In the first place there is no right to expropriate; in the second place, if they desire water-power they must apply to the Governor in Council to secure it, as any individual has; in the third place, we have placed the tolls which the company may charge under the control of the Board of Railway Commissioners and, in the fourth place, the company cannot use their surplus power in any municipality without the consent of the municipality. I do not know what further safeguards we could impose in the interest of the community. This is hardly the place or hardly the occasion to discuss what the policy of this government or this House should be in regard to the matter. That could be better settled when the company apply to the Governor in Council for water-power and then such conditions as are thought proper may be laid down far better than they could be settled in committee while discussing a private Bill.

Mr. JOHN HAGGART. All these regulations ought to be statutory.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I think that suggestion is a good one.

Mr. BLAIN. I do not agree with the policy laid down by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie). Surely the time to lay down the policy of the government is not when a private corporation makes application to the Governor in Council to be regulated in respect to their Bill. It seems to me that the House and the Railway Committee should be in possession of the policy of the government upon matters of this kind; and that those that are allying themselves together to make applications for such charters shall understand what the policy of the government is.

Mr. NEELY. As this Bill and Bill (No. 69, which follows it on the order paper, were held over on Friday for the same purpose, I want to say a word, as my name is attached to the other Bill. As the members of the Railway Committee are aware, the point raised by the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) was thoroughly discussed in the Railway Committee, and after that discussion this Bill, together with Bill (No. 69) were reported to the House. I must congratulate the hon. member (Mr. Lennox) on constituting himself the watchdog of the natural resources of Canada, and I must also congratulate Canada on having such a faithful watchdog.

Mr. LENNOX. Good.

Mr. NEELY. But there are other members of the Railway Committee and of this House who are just as much interested in conserving the natural resources of Canada for the people of Canada as is this self-constituted watchdog. Now, I may tell the member for South Simcoe that I have absolutely not one cent's worth of interest, directly or indirectly, in the Bill to which my name is attached, and I can tell him also that if there was anything in that Bill which I thought interfered with the rights of the people in the water-powers of Canada, I would not have my name attached to it nor would I seek to promote it in this House. The hon. member (Mr. Lennox) is therefore not necessarily the only hon. gentleman in this House, or in the Railway Committee, who is interested in conserving the people's rights in the water-powers of this Dominion. It has been pointed out by the Minister of Railways that our natural resources can be of value only to the extent to which they are developed, and the clause in this Bill, as in the Bill following it to which some of these gentlemen take exception, is a clause which simply gives these railway companies the power to acquire water rights. It is not a new clause; it is a very ordinary clause to be inserted in such Bills. Every railway company requires the privilege of acquiring water rights for the development of power for the purposes of its railway undertaking, and if a railway company develops more power than it requires for its own undertaking, can the hon. member for South Simcoe or any other hon. member point out wherein the people of Canada are going to be injured if the balance of the power not used by the railway is sold to the municipalities in the immediate vicinity of the railway works. Why, it seems to me, that any reasonable man would consider that such would be for the benefit of the people, provided, of course, that the rates at which the surplus power would be disposed of are properly regulated. Now, in every instance, so far as these two Bills are concerned, these rates and tolls are subject to the approval of the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada. I am perfectly satisfied, and I think the people of Canada are perfectly satisfied, to have such rates placed under the control of that board, because the Railway Board to my knowledge has never shown any undue discrimination or any discrimination of any kind in favour of railway companies or any other monopolies or corporations, as against the interests of the people of Canada. I cannot see where these hon. gentlemen can find any serious objection to these particular clauses of the Bill. Now, I am not prepared to say whether the hon. member for South Simcoe was in the Railway Committee when the Burrard Inlet Bill went through, but if he was not it was his own fault, and it would be at least one instance in which the watchdog failed to be on the job. I think, however, that the member for Winnipeg (Mr. Haggart) was present in the Railway Committee when the Burrard Inlet Bill went through, and strange to say, there is in that Bill, which has passed the Railway Committee and passed the House, a clause identical with the clause contained in this Bill to which these hon. gentlemen now take such strong objection.

Mr. BRADBURY. Was not that clause inserted in the Burrard Inlet Bill after a compromise between those who were interested?

Mr. NEELY. Not at all, so far as I know. Of course, the incident which I have just mentioned may not have any particular significance taken in connection with the fact that it was the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Cowan) who has the task of piloting the Burrard Inlet Bill through the Railway Committee and through the House. That may be merely a coincidence, but it is a very strange thing to me that there are such serious objections raised in the Railway Committee and in the House to some of these Bills, even though the rights of the people are absolutely safeguarded from every standpoint, so far as I am able to judge. Now, when the Canadian Pacific railway or the Canadian Northern railway, or some of the other great companies, have exactly the same kind of legislation before the House, we do not find the same objection taken by these hon. gentlemen. But the moment some others than these larger companies ask for a charter and in that charter ask for these very ordinary powers, the question of the rights of the people is at once raised. Now, Sir, the Bill succeeding this on the order paper has a clause similar to that in this Bill which is objected to. That Bill passed last year, and this year all that is asked for is an extension of time. The Bill at present before us was held over in the Railway Committee, and held over on Friday night last in the Committee of the Whole House, and now the hon. member for South Simcoe asks that it be again held over for a few days until the government expound a policy that will be satisfactory to him. Well, even though the Minister of Railways should, after weeks of consideration, announce a policy to this House, I am very much afraid that that policy would not receive the approval of the hon. member (Mr. Lennox). I do not know why the passing of these Bills ought to be made the occasion for the announcement of a policy, because whatever policy the government announces is absolutely foreign to and has nothing whatever to do with the passing of these Bills. If the government wish to make a statement as to what safeguards there should be placed around the acquisition of the water-powers of this country, well and good, and I shall be as glad to hear it as will the hon. member for South Simcoe, but that has absolutely nothing to do with the passing of this Bill, which simply asks that the company shall have the power to acquire water-powers for the purpose of its railway.

The Minister of Railways intimated that he would be satisfied to have this Bill stand over. I am not the promoter of the Bill, but it seems to me that this matter has been sufficiently discussed, and I would ask the hon. member for South Simcoe to withdraw the objection. In any case, whether he does or not, I think this committee ought to consider this Bill and the Bill following to-day.

Mr. NEELY.

Mr. EMMERSON. This subject has been very fully ventilated in the Railway Committee. In the consideration of two or three of the Bills now on the order paper some three or more days of the committee were occupied. I am quite in agreement with my hon. friend who has just taken his seat in his statement that it is not of material moment in connection with this Bill whether the government announces a policy now or whether it never announces one on the point raised by my hon. friend, because that policy goes beyond these Bills. It is fair to bear in mind that this particular Bill has no powers of expropriation.

Mr. ALEX. HAGGART. Section 14 gives the company the right to build tramway and to expropriate land.

Mr. EMMERSON. That was struck out in the committee, and there was an express reservation that there should be no powers of expropriation. I think it unfortunate that we should take up the time of this House with this question at this moment. I have very strong views with respect to the granting of these powers. I had heard that pretty rigid rules were laid down in some of the state legislatures on the other side of the line with respect to the granting of water powers. In this Bill we simply give the company the right to acquire water-powers for the purposes of its undertaking.

Mr. LENNOX. Is there any reservation of anything to come to the country, or are these companies to have all the profits?

Mr. EMMERSON. My hon. friend has raised quite another point, which I was about to raise myself when I was interrupted by my hon. friend. In some respects our legislation has differed entirely from that on the other side of the line. In the legislation adopted during this session we have been very insistent in limiting the powers of these companies to the purpose of their undertakings; but we have granted them the privilege of selling their surplus power, which I conceive to be in the public interest; but there is this distinction between legislation here and legislation on the other side of the line. There, wherever franchises of this character are granted, there is imposed upon the companies a certain tax. I had heard of this in a general way, and since the committee met and had these Bills under consideration, I have received, on an application which I made some weeks ago, a copy of a Bill passed by the legislature of the State of New York, being 'an Act to incorporate the Long Sault Development Company, and to authorize said company to construct and maintain dams, canals, power-houses and locks at or near Long Sault Island, for the purpose of improving the navigation of the St. Lawrence river and developing power from the waters thereof, and to construct and maintain a bridge and carry on the manufacture of commodities.' Having a copy of that Bill in my hand, I will call the attention of the committee to this fact, that in the very inception the company is required 'to pay into the treasury of the State the fixed sum of $10,000, and in addition to the payment just mentioned, the company shall pay into the treasury of the State for the year 1910 the fixed sum of $15,000, and for the year 1911 the fixed sum of $20,000. For each year after 1911 the said corporation shall pay at the following rates upon the average amount of electrical horse-power generated during such year under the authority of this Act, that is to say: upon all amounts up to 25,000 electrical horse-power, at the rate of 75 cents per horse-power; upon all amounts in excess of 25,000 electrical horse-power and up to 100,000 horse-power, at the rate of 50 cents per horse-power; upon all amounts in excess of 100,000 electrical horse-power, at the rate of 25 cents per horse-power. In case said corporation shall generate or develop water-power as mechanical power without transmuting the same into electrical power, then for so much of said water-power as may be developed payments shall be made at the above mentioned rates per mechanical horse-power.' There are provisions with respect to determining the amount, which I need not read. Now, it occurs to me very forcibly that this is legislation which we might very properly and in the interest of the country imitate in Canada; but in doing so, let us bear in mind that there should not be any discrimination in this regard. I simply invite the attention of the Minister of Public Works to this particular Act, because we all realize that if there is not already, there will be in the near future, an application to the parliament of Canada from this same company for Canadian rights, and in the consideration of that application it will be well to bear in mind just what the gentlemen who come here were obliged to meet when they went to the legislature of the State of New York and to the Congress of the government of the United States to secure powers for the purposes of the company. It is not necessary, of course, that we should incorporate this provision in these several Bills that are now under consideration or those which may have been under consideration by the Committee of the Whole of this House.

Mr. LENNOX. Why?

Mr. EMMERSON. Because there can be general legislation. The only effective way in which that can now be done is for the government to pass legislation. Where would the Burrard Inlet, and other Bills be? We have passed these Bills, and they are now before the Senate, and then we hold up these new Bills, and impose upon their promoters burdens which we have not imposed upon the Burrard Inlet and other companies. That would be manifestly unfair and unjust, and I would say if action is to be taken it should be taken by the Department of Public Works, that there should be legislation in that regard. I see no reason why these particular Bills should be held up or should go back to the committee to have those conditions imposed now. If we take that course it would be necessary in order to be fair that we should ask that these amendments should be made by the Senate to the other Bills or else that they should not receive the assent of the Governor General.

Mr. J. HAGGART. The passage of the Bill may give the power of expropriation, and the power to acquire property. Would it be fair for the government afterwards to pass legislation imposing penalties?

Mr. EMMERSON. It would be fair to do this. If they get the power to use and operate the water highway for purposes of a canal or for electrical power they must go to the Department of Public Works with their plans, and these plans must have the approval of that department through its minister. It would be fair for the government of Canada to-morrow to enact legislation whereby before any such privileges are granted or approvals given there may be imposed on these companies a certain percentage on the amount of the power.

Mr. J. HAGGART. Before they have acquired the right, but not after the right is acquired.

Mr. EMMERSON. The granting of the authority to a company to go to the Public Works Department is one thing, and it is another thing for that company to appear before the Public Works Department in order to get the execution of that right or the right to exercise the privileges which they are authorized to exercise by the particular Act of parliament incorporating them.

Mr. J. HAGGART. But if they can get it without any imposition?

Mr. EMMERSON. They can go there, but it would be a matter of regulation for the government of Canada to impose a charge, and that would be the only way that we could reach these numberless companies that have acquired these privileges, and this authority. You say this policy should have been adopted long ago. Perhaps it should, but it has not been. I am not dealing with this from any political standpoint. I am dealing as a member of this committee with conditions which present themselves, and we realize that other states, and other countries require the payment of such charges. Why should not Canada follow in the same line, and if it is too late for us to amend the Bills, then let us follow these Bills by legislation of a general character, which could not be in any respect looked upon as being invidious. If to-day, we were to hold back this Bill or during this parliament were to refuse to grant the privileges to these gentlemen when we have granted them to so many other gentlemen during this session, it certainly would appear to be an unfair discrimination, and I hold that these Bills should all be treated alike. Members of the Railway Committee will remember that I have taken very strong grounds there against the granting of privileges without restriction, I have endeavoured to hold them all down to have limitations, treat them all fairly, and to give to no set of men privileges which were not accorded to others who appear before us.

Mr. J. HAGGART. Can the Bill not be made to read: Subject to such terms and conditions as the government may from time to time stipulate?

Mr. EMMERSON. That might very well be done, but we want to deal with other Bills, and we want general legislation which will affect the Bills that have already passed the gamut of this committee.

Mr. BRADBURY. Let it be retroactive.

Mr. EMMERSON. It would hardly be retroactive, because after all these gentlemen could not complain without realizing that when they get the authority to do certain things they do not get the right to do them until the Public Works Department gives them that right, and if in the intervening period the Department of Public Works under the authority of this parliament imposes regulations and charges, they could not complain of any enforcement, and it would be retroactive in so far as the action of the Department of Public Works is concerned.

Mr. BRADBURY. I agree with the hon. gentleman's views, the question is, will the government enact this legislation?

Mr. EMMERSON. My hon. friend and I cannot throttle the government, we cannot take the government by the throat, and say what they shall do, and what they shall not do, but I say it would be unfair on our part to hold up these Bills in view of the action which we have taken within the last week. It would be unfair to deal with these gentlemen in any other way than we have dealt with previous applications, and then we should place the responsibility on the government of dealing with the whole question, having regard to the companies which have already been incorporated, and dealing with the companies which may be incorporated during the remainder of this session.

Mr. GOODEVE. As a member from British Columbia, and a member of the Railway Committee I take exception to the statement made by the hon. member for Humbolt (Mr. Neely), and the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Rutan), that the members from British Columbia gather together and act as a body when they have a Bill in which they were interested to pass through the Railway Committee of this House, and then took exception to Bills brought forward on similar lines by members from different parts of Canada. On my own behalf, and on behalf of the members from British Columbia, I say we have never made any attempt of that kind, and neither has such a principle as that guided our action in this House.

Mr. RUTAN. I did not say the members from British Columbia; I said that in relation to a Bill from British Columbia the members of the opposition——

Mr. GOODEVE. I am pleased to accept the explanation of the hon. member, but the hon. member from Humbolt went much further and made the statement to which I took exception. But I wish to say further that the position taken by the minister in allowing this Bill to stand over meets with my approval. He has stated, very fairly I think, the point that we are constantly dealing with varying conditions in matters coming before this House and before the Railway Committee, and that, therefore, careful attention to all matters is necessary. But it seems to me, he does not deal with the crux of this question when he states that if the government, as a government, are not prepared to go ahead and develop these natural resources, we should not prevent their being developed by private individuals. I agree that we want our natural resources developed, and we ought to encourage capital to develop these resources. But this does not touch the point raised by the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox). At this particular time, a large number of Bills are before the House dealing with these matters—and it is for that reason, no doubt, that the question now arises. These Bills deal with water-powers upon many streams, some of them running in more than one province, and thus practically interprovincial streams. Many of these rivers run through little known or comparatively unknown territory. We cannot tell what is the value of the water-powers that may be involved in these Bills. In view of this fact, we see the importance of the point raised by the member for South Simcoe that the government should lay down some policy to regulate the granting of these powers in connection with railway enterprises and otherwise. In that connection, the point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. A Haggart) seems important. In my own province, we have our Water Act, with clauses similar to those of the laws referred to by the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) as being in force in the United States. One of these sections provides as follows:

The Lieutenant Governor in Council may from time to time, by order in council, reserve and fix such rents, royalties, tolls and charges in respect of the water used or taken and used, and of the lands of the Crown used, and of the rights, powers and privileges which may be required by any licensee unler this Act.

The point I wish to make and to call particularly to the attention of the Minister of Railways is that a similar control is being exercised in the province of Ontario, and it is altogether likely that the other provinces, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, feeling that they have a valuable asset in these great water-powers, would like to derive some revenue from their development. This was my strongest objection to the present Bill. This Bill covers no certain, definite territory:

—from a point on Lake Winnipeg, at or near its outlet into the Nelson river, or at or near the discharge of the Saskatchewan river into Lake Winnipeg, or from a place between the said points, to a point of junction with any railway to Hudson bay which may be located by the government of Canada.

This involves several waterways, and deals with water-powers in two provinces, Manitoba and Alberta. I do not think that the members from either of these provinces are prepared to tell the committee—I certainly did not receive the information in the Railway Committee—what particular water-powers there may be on these great waterways. Possibly, in future, both of these provinces will feel that they have a vested right in these powers, that these powers belong to the people, and that this parliament ought not to give a company power to expropriate these natural resources and use them for its own interests. This is not a question as to whether the municipality to which they sell power is charged proper rates or not; the question is whether the people of Canada as a whole are not entitled to some revenue from these water-powers and the privilege of their exclusive use. That is the question at issue as I understand it to be stated by the hon. member for South Simcoe; that is the question that we discussed in the committee. Now, I would like to call the attention of the minister to the point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. A. Haggart). That hon. gentleman speaks as a lawyer, and, though I am a layman, and my opinion on such a matter will not carry great weight, it seems to me that there is something in the point—that, possibly, if we give this power, that fact will make it impossible for the province of Manitoba hereafter to claim this right. Suppose that hereafter, the province of Manitoba were to grant a strictly water-power Bill to develop power in the province of Manitoba within territory covered by this Bill, it is a question whether or not the mere passing of this Bill by this federal parliament would not nullify the rights and prerogatives of the province of Manitoba in the matter. The company could develop, use and sell power for their own profit without regard to the people of the province or the people of the Dominion as a whole. That is the point we are considering at this time, and I am glad the minister has seen fit, in a broad-minded way, to say that he will allow this Bill to stand over, that this great and important question may be considered.

The position taken by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Rutan), I understand to be that we can do that possibly at the end of the session. The difficulty is that we have not only this Bill but other Bills dealing with the great water-powers throughout the west, Bills involving many important rivers upon which are immense powers of incalculable value to the people of Canada. I understand the suggestion of the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) to be that we might let it go through and afterwards pass retroactive legislation imposing conditions. But that might be difficult, and possibly even unfair. For, if the company has invested $1,000,000 or $2,000,000 in good faith in developing a water-power under a charter granted by this parliament, it is a question whether we should place restrictions upon that company afterwards. The right time to deal with this matter is now, before we grant the power, so that each company will know exactly the conditions with which they have to comply before getting their charter. For these reasons, I am glad of the attitude of the Minister of Railways in allowing this Bill to stand over, so that we may consider this Bill in connection with others involving a similar principle and see if we cannot formulate a policy that will be in the interest of all.

Mr. TURRIFF. I am glad this question has been brought up. It is a question that has taken up a good deal of time in the Railway Committee, more especially this session. We had some talk of it last session also. I believe that the time has come when the government should lay down a policy in connection with the granting of special privileges to railway companies applying to this parliament for charters. Possibly, the time may have come when a railway company should be given a charter for the building of a railway only. But I think it would be manifestly unfair if we, at this stage of the game, should say to the member (Mr. Rutan) who has charge of this present Bill simply that it should not go through. It is manifestly unfair because hon. members opposite who are now so keenly opposing this Bill either sat still or supported other Bills even during the present session containing, I believe, the same clauses exactly. There is far less objection to this Bill and to the Bill that follows it on the order paper than to other Bills that hon. gentlemen opposite supported last week. For this reason: The custody of the water-powers affected by this Bill is in the hands of the Dominion government. The same is true of the next Bill on the order paper, respecting the Prince Albert and Hudson Bay Railway Company in the hands of my hon. friend from Humboldt (Mr. Neely). But in the case of the Bills supported by hon. gentlemen opposite, the water-powers were owned by the various provinces. Why did not these hon. gentlemen, who are now so anxious not to have these water-powers granted to railway companies, object to the Bills introduced by some of their friends? It seems rather unfair that, having got their Bill through they should get up now and say that the same powers that have already been granted to another company should not be granted in this case, and the one to which I have referred. Further, nothing in these Bills gives the company any rights in water-powers. This Bill does not give the company a single iota of right that any member of this House does not possess at this moment. All it gives them is the right to go to the minister who has charge of the water-powers in the western provinces and make arrangements with him. It is open to him to impose conditions under the Dominion Lands Act. All the regulations are there providing the terms on which these water-powers may be acquired.

The minister has it in his power now to impose any stipulations or regulations that he likes on those railway companies when they come to apply for water-power. To my mind the most serious aspect of this granting of railway charters is where the railways run through provinces which own their own lands, and I think the time has come when this government should fairly consider whether it is advisable to grant water-power privileges to companies when the water-powers are under the jurisdiction of the different provincial legislatures. I am sure it is no advantage to this government or the Liberal party in any way to have the different provinces sending their lawyers here to oppose in the Railway Committee every one of these Bills, on the ground that we are infringing on provincial rights. If the provinces have certain rights, they should be respected. I think it would be far better to lay down the principle, in connection with railway charters, that power shall be given only to build the railway, and that if the company should want to get hold of water-powers to run the railway, let it go to the province that owns these powers. I quite agree that the time has come when something should be done along these lines, but I cannot agree to my hon. friends opposite getting Bills of their own through and then denying the same rights to others who happen to be opposed to them in politics. I am not saying that we are very much better on this side, but there has been a good deal of wrangling in the Railway Committee pro and con, and I think it would be better for the government to lay down a policy so that we would know exactly what to expect. As regards the particular railway under discussion, and the one following, under the name of my hon. friend from Humbolt (Mr. Neely), there is less objection to these than to any other, because the water-powers belong to this Dominion government, and the Minister of the Interior has the right to place any restriction on their development he likes. We are not giving any power itself, but only the right to go to the Minister of the Interior and acquire a water-power for the purpose of operating the railway and the right to dispose of any surplus. No one can object to that. We all want to see the west develop, and to object now to these two Bills would be eminently unfair. I think that they should be passed and then some definite policy laid down which would govern us during coming sessions.

Mr. NESBITT. As has been pointed out by my hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) all we are doing is to put this company in the same position as a private individual, and it will have to go to other powers for its rights. The Bill which my hon. friend read from an American legislature was probably inspired by the views of President Taft this year, concerning the conservation of natural resources and recommending that a certain charge or revenue should accrue to the state. That is all very fair and right, and probably it would be a good thing for us to adopt, but you must bear in mind that these companies will have to submit their prices to the Railway Commission, and that commission, no doubt, in fixing the rates, would take into consideration any charge or fee which the government might impose. Therefore the consumers would probably have to pay more on that account. The Railway Commission would no doubt make the rates higher than they would if the company had not to pay any federal charge. It is only wise therefore, that we should consider that aspect of the case, and I draw attention to it because, if we do not impose any Dominion charge, the communities served would no doubt get the benefit.

Mr. BRADBURY. There seems to be a general consensus of opinion on the other side that something should be done to conserve the interests of the people in these great water rights. The argument advanced by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) why this Bill should not be made an exception, is a very weak one. The reason he gives is that in the early part of the session we did grant similar rights. But if we have made mistakes in the past, is not that all the more reason why we should stop now? If we have failed to safeguard the interests of the people in one or two other Bills—and I am not prepared at this moment to say that we have—surely it is now time to cease making any further such mistakes. The water-powers covered by this Bill are situated almost on the northern boundary of the province of Manitoba and will come within the limits of that province as soon as the right hon. gentlemen sees fit to extend its boundaries, so that perhaps in the next few months they will be under the control of the Manitoba government, and therefore, we ought to hesitate legislating with regard to them. They are the two greatest water-powers in Canada. My hon. friend from Assiniboia knows something about the water-power at the mouth of the Saskatchewan, that great river which drains the whole western country from the Rocky mountains and empties into Lake Winnipeg, with about 125 feet of a fall into Lake Winnipeg. On the Nelson river there is the Sea falls, which this Bill covers. All the waters from the two Saskatchewans, Red river, Winnipeg river—all the waters that enter into the Hudson bay, run over these falls, thus creating one of the greatest water-powers on the country. These are two great water-powers which by this Bill this company will get control of.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Where is there anything in this Bill which would enable the company to utilize any one of these water-powers without making terms either with the Minister of the Interior or, should they be vested in Manitoba, with the government of Manitoba?

Mr. BRADBURY. That may be all right, but that is not enough to meet the argument which has been put up by the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson), the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff), and by hon. members on this side of the House that the people of this country should have some rights with regard to the conserving of these great water-powers. I think that before this or any other Bill affecting these water-powers is dealt with, the government should be given time to bring down a policy. It should be framed in such a manner that every one of these powers granted should come under it. I do not wish to oppose this Bill because it is coming from our friends here, but with the information that is now before this committee, and realizing that in granting these powers we are not conserving the best interests of the people, I cannot very well see how hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House can ask the committee to pass this Bill.

Mr. RUTAN. I am rather surprised at the inconsistency of the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bradbury). He well remembers that at the beginning of the session, or shortly after, Bill (No. 52) was brought up before the Railway Committee and he remembers the stand that was taken by himself and other hon. gentlemen at that time. He also remembers the stand that was taken on other Bills by these hon. members, that passed the committee and also passed this House. It seems to me that his argument is very inconsistent. If these hon. gentlemen are so critical about the right to acquire extra powers which this company may dispose of, it was just as much harm to confer similar rights on other companies incorporated in other Bills that have passed since then, and in regard to which the hon. member for Selkirk has not opened his mouth. He has either remained neutral or has taken a position the direct opposite of that which he is taking to-day. It seems to me that he cannot have forgotten what has happened in the Railway Committee or on the floor of this House. More than that, I cannot see why it is necessary to attack this particular Bill and the Bill which immediately follows it for the reason that they affect a new and undeveloped territory and which, without enterprise of this kind, has no chance of development. If this were an old country like the state of New York, or like the well settled portions of Ontario, and a large amount of power had been disposed of, a question might perhaps arise as to the wisdom of the measure, but I cannot see why a new country like this where we are looking for development should be the one place to be sought out by hon. gentlemen opposite in order to keep development from going forward. The hon. gentleman is inconsistent in his argument, for he certainly knows that this Bill was held up in the fore part of this session, and that it was kept on the order paper until last Friday when it passed the committee. The hon. gentleman knows very well that during that time several other Bills with exactly the same powers passed the committee and also passed this House.

Mr. OLIVER. The demand has been made that this government should come forward with a policy with regard to water-powers. In so far as the waters of Canada are under the jurisdiction of this government, the government has a very definite policy in regard to water-powers, which has been in force for some time. With regard to the water which exists in the three prairie provinces, by the terms of the Irrigation Act, this water was vested absolutely in the control of the Dominion government. Under the terms of the Dominion Lands Act, passed in 1908, provision was made for the development of power upon these waters. Under the terms of the Act regulations have been passed and have been in force now for something like a year, providing the method by which rights in water-powers are acquired, making provision that a rental may be charged for the use of the water by the power company, which rental may be determined from time to time—that is at periods of 21 years—and making provision for the regulation of the charges which should be made to the consumers of the power generated from the water, such charges to be under the control of the Railway Commission, and to be subject to adjustment at periods of seven years.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I would point out to the Minister of the Interior that this Bill does not affect any of the three prairie provinces; can he tell us what is the law in the Northwest Territories which are affected by this Bill.

Mr. OLIVER. I should have mentioned that I think the Irrigation Act applies to the Northwest Territories as well as to the three prairie provinces, but at any rate the Dominion Lands Act does and under the authority of that Act regulations have been made which would certainly apply to the water-powers that would be affected by either of these Bills. There is no question as to the policy of the government, or as to the administration of the government in regard to water-powers which are unquestionably under the jurisdiction of the Dominion government. The present Bill applies to the Northwest Territories outside the limits of any province and therefore no question of provincial rights is involved.

Mr. BRADBURY. How long will these territories be outside the limits of the province?

Mr. OLIVER. I cannot say that, but I can say that as the Irrigation Act declares the control of water in all the provinces to be in the Dominion government, it will not make any difference, because either the Irrigation Act or the Dominion Lands Act, and the regulations under it will apply whether the territory is inside or outside of the province. As a matter of fact, within the province, to-day we are administering the water-powers under the regulations authorized by the Dominion Lands Act.

Mr. LENNOX. Suppose that this territory is given over to the province of Manitoba, does the minister mean that the Dominion government would still continue to exercise full control over these water-powers, and that the province will have no jurisdiction over them?

Mr. PUGSLEY. He has just said that.

Mr. LENNOX. Let him speak for himself.

Mr. OLIVER. I think what I said in the last few sentences made that quite clear. In the province of Manitoba to-day we are administering the water-powers under the regulation framed by authority of the Dominion Lands Act, and if this territory were added to the province I presume the conditions would be the same.

Mr. GRAHAM. The Minister of the Interior has pointed out quite clearly that what hon. gentlemen have been asking for is the law, and has been the law since 1908. Let us understand exactly the position. There are a large number of gentlemen in this House to-day, and so far as getting water-power is concerned any one of us can obtain all the rights that this Bill gives to the company, by making application to the Interior Department. The terms on which the power should be given would come under the contract or lease so granted, and since the Dominion Lands Act of 1908, the Interior Department has made regulations under which this power is leased for a certain period on terms stipulated, and these rates can be altered at the expiration of the first period mentioned in the lease and an advance rental charged if an increase in value should take place. Therefore everything which hon. gentlemen have asked is already provided for. There is the other point to be considered: That every extra dollar you charge for the lease of a water-power will come out of the consumer of the power at some point, because the companies are not in this business for their health.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I do not quite follow that. If that be the case then it would be entirely in the interest of the public to give all these water-powers away so that those acquiring them might supply power at a very cheap rate.

Mr. GRAHAM. Not exactly. These rates come under the control of the Board of Railway Commissioners, and they will be based on the cost to the company of the production of the power, and every dollar you add to the cost of production will come out of those who use the power.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Quite so.

Mr. GRAHAM. And if we charge a very large rental the people of the locality who use the power will have to pay the interest on that charge. That is another side to the question.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. There is another side also.

Mr. GRAHAM. There is another side, and it is, that all the people of Canada ought to have some benefit from the power that may be developed in a certain locality, although if we apply that to the transmission of power in the province of Ontario perhaps we may not think that the principle which the hon. gentleman has announced, is applied. However, on the Trent canal system we have fixed a rate of, I think, $2 per horse-power, but the rates to be charged by the company to the public are under the Board of Railway Commissioners, and I have taken the ground, whether rightly or wrongly, that if we charge a reasonable rate for power it will enable the commissioners to compel the company to give the people in the locality a reasonable price, so that the greatest good may come to the greatest number by making that power as cheap as possible. I am not at all objecting to the proposal that the Dominion should get some revenue, but do not let us run away with the idea that if we impose a big tax to get revenue for the Dominion, we are not taking it out of the pockets of the people who have to buy that power.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. If the argument of the minister were carried to its legitimate conclusion, then, the city of Montreal, or the city of Toronto, which get a very large revenue from the street railway companies would do much better in the interest of the general public to exact no revenue at all.

Mr. GRAHAM. If the rates were under control perhaps it would be just as well.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I do not agree with the minister there. The interests of the people of Canada who own these water-powers have to be considered on the one hand, and on the other hand the government is bound to consider the interests of those who may be purchasers of that power in the several districts. The minister puts it in a very plausible way when he says that if you give the companies these water-powers for nothing, then the people will get the power very cheaply. I take issue with that. I say it is not the history of corporate action, I say that the advantage gained in that respect is much more apt to go into the pockets of the shareholders in dividends than into the pockets of the consumers. The principle of controlling rates is a proper principle and the government is taking the right course when it invests the Railway Commission with that jurisdiction, but if you exact a reasonable rental for the benefit of the entire people of Canada on the one hand, and if on the other hand you control the rates, the result will be that the Railway Commission in fixing these rates will always look at the rental which must be paid to the people of this country, and the commission will govern its control of rates accordingly. But to say that it is absolutely desirable to give away a public franchise to whomsoever comes and asks for it, and to base that idea upon the proposition that the consumer in every case will get the advantage is an argument which does not commend itself to my mind.

Mr. GRAHAM. I suppose the hon. leader of the opposition will agree that I did not say anything of the kind. I distinctly said that I was agreeable to a reasonable rental.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. So am I.

Mr. GRAHAM. But that is not what I rose to say. I think, perhaps, it would straighten out this matter if we said in these Bills, what is an absolute fact anyway, that these companies are subject to the regulations made by the Minister of the Interior with regard to the leasing of water-powers.

Mr. LENNOX. I wish to point out that at the beginning of this discussion the Minister of Railways intimated that he would allow this Bill to stand over, and in pursuance of that I moved that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again, and that is what is before the Chair at the present time. The minister, like the rest of us, seems to have obtained some light on this subject during the discussion, assuming that the Minister of the Interior is correct in his interpretation of the question as it stands. I do not think it will do any of us any harm to refresh our memories on that matter. I for one would be willing to plead my ignorance to the utmost extent in order that I might look into this legislation and see if the result would be as the Minister of the Interior states. Hon. gentlemen who object to this Bill standing over seem to think that we want to hit this Bill in particular. My understanding is that we shall not necessarily deny the promoters of this Bill the legislation that they ask, but we wish to take time to consider whether or not the matter can be put in better shape while we are considering the other Bills in the Railway Committee, so that all these Bills can be dealt with together, and so that we shall not be handicapped in considering the other Bills. With regard to the argument that because we have allowed some other Bills to go through, either inadvertently or improperly, therefore we should allow this Bill to go through, I entirely dissent from that proposition. Even if we had allowed nine out of ten Bills to go through, that ought not to go through, I would fight against the passage of the tenth. My position is that however often we may have made a mistake, it is always better to remedy the wrong, even at a late day, than not to remedy it at all.

Mr. GRAHAM. We have had a good deal of discussion since I said that I was quite willing that we should let the Bill stand. In doing so, I do not think we shall lose a moment, because this matter has been threshed out for days, in fact, this particular Bill has been held for nearly a month, during which other Bills containing the same power have been put through. I do not think there will be any difficulty in putting through the committee in one form or another the various Bills of the same kind, and I assure the promoters of this Bill that it shall receive the same treatment as the others, and its passage will not be retarded by its being allowed to stand over.

Mr. WRIGHT. With regard to all the charters that have been mentioned as having gone through, I think this is the only one that lies entirely within the jurisdiction of this parliament. I do not remember any other that is in precisely the same geographical position. I think it is very undesirable to include water-power privileges in railway charters, and this purports to be a railway charter. One striking peculiarity of this charter is that the company do not appear to know within 150 miles where they want the railway to start from or where they want it to run to; it is a sort of roving charter. In my opinion, there should be a proper map outlining the proposed railway, and that has not been furnished.

Mr. GRAHAM. That is a question for the committee.

Mr. WRIGHT. It is a question I wish to mention here. There is a map in the Railway Committee, but there might as well not have been any so far as it is any guide to the members considering the question.

Progress reported.

PRINCE ALBERT AND HUDSON BAY RAILWAY.

House in Committee on Bill (No. 69) respecting the Prince Albert and Hudson Bay Railway Company.—Mr. Neely.

Mr. LENNOX.

Mr. LENNOX. This Bill is similar to the other, and I move that it stand over.

Mr. NEELY. The reason for holding over Bill (No. 52) does not apply to this Bill, as the company is not asking for any powers except in extension of time, and power to extend its line of railway from Prince Albert southwest to Calgary. There is no more reason why this Bill should be held over than that the committee should reconsider Bills that have already been passed by the committee and the House this session, because whatever rights this company has were granted last session, and it is not asking for any new rights.

Mr. GRAHAM. This company was chartered last session, and is not asking for any new powers, only for an extension of time and an extension of its line. No objection has been taken to that in any Bill, so far as I know.

Mr. LENNOX. Yes, the objection has been taken in the committee, in this way, that where a company comes for a privilege in the way of an extension of a charter, we have a right, and it is our duty, to consider just what it is we are extending.

Mr. GRAHAM. This charter was only passed last year, and it would not lapse for another year.

Mr. LENNOX. By section 4 of the Bill, the time for construction is extended. We are now considering the question of a policy as to water-powers, and the question arises whether it would be wise to extend the powers conferred by this Bill in respect to water-powers, so this Bill stands on the same principle as the others, and I submit it should remain over pending the consideration of that question. As the minister has said no wrong is done, because we will get them all together, and will consider them as one proposition, all being accorded fair play.

Mr. GRAHAM. Let us be reasonable. Suppose we do not grant this. Then for one year more they have all the rights which they have to-day. Under ordinary circumstances they would not come to this House for another year, but they want to extend their line, and incidentally they follow the usual course of asking the privilege of starting within two years, and completing within five years. We granted a year ago all the powers in that Bill whatever that may be. Their time has not yet expired. Is this House going to pass an amending Act this year taking away the powers we gave last year? This Bill is in a different position from the others. The committee has been liberal in renewing charters year after year, and does not deprive companies of powers already conferred. Here they are asking an extended time to build the line, and the hon. member suggests that we should take advantage of that to deprive them of some of the rights they have under the old Act. I think that is going too far.

Mr. LENNOX. I see it in another light. They ask an extension of time. It may be that we granted them something a year ago that we ought not to have granted. Give them the privilege of extending their line according to our fixed policy, but we should not grant them an extension of time in which to acquire water-powers to which we should never have, perhaps, given them a right, not at least until we determine just what policy we will adopt as regards new charters. Let them have the time they were granted last year, and if they exercise their powers within the time let them keep those powers, but do not to-day extend that time until we have determined on a general policy. Therefore, inasmuch as we may devise some policy within a day or so, let this Bill stand as the other Bills stand.

Mr. GRAHAM. I do not think the positions are equal; I do not see any reason why this Bill should stand.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Miller). Mr. Lennox moves that the committee report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. LENNOX. As the minister is opposed to that course there is no object in putting the motion.

Mr. WRIGHT. By this Bill the company are granted an extension of time, and also the right to extend their line. Will the granting of the extension of the line give them the right to exercise in respect of such extension the powers in relation to water-powers conferred on them in the Bill?

Mr. GRAHAM. I think not, but we can let the Bill stand for third reading in order to have that matter looked up.

Bill reported.

VANCOUVER, VICTORIA & EASTERN RAILWAY & NAVIGATION COMPANY.

House in Committee on Bill (No. 99) respecting the Vancouver and Eastern Railway and Navigation Company.—Mr. Burrell.

Mr. GRAHAM. The hon. member (Mr. Burrell) who is in charge of this Bill, is not present.

Mr. BARNARD. The hon. member asked me to take charge for him.

Mr. GRAHAM. Can the hon. member (Mr. Barnard) tell me, if the original charter—this is an extension, I believe—includes clauses about water-powers?

Mr. BARNARD. I do not know. This is an old incorporation.

Mr. COWAN. It is a provincial charter.

Mr. EMMERSON. I believe that the original charter contains no rights with regard to water-powers. This company was incorporated by the legislature of British Columbia, and, at a later date, came before this parliament. This is a renewal. There were amendments, one particularly, limiting the extension of time to those branches or extensions the termini of which were definitely named. The amendment suggested by the Railway Committee, I think, was accepted by the hon. gentleman in charge of the measure.

Mr. GRAHAM. Let it go to the third reading, but allow it to stand then and we can deal with it later.

Mr. COWAN. I have here the original charter, and it gives no power to acquire water rights.

Bill as amended reported, and read the third time, and passed.

THE RESTIGOUCHE LOG DRIVING AND BOOM COMPANY.

Mr. CARVELL moved second reading of Bill (No. 150) respecting the Restigouche Boom Company and to change its name to the Restigouche Log and Boom Driving Company.

Mr. PERLEY. Before this motion passes, I would like to suggest that this Bill be referred to the Public Works Department and carefully gone over. It is a very complicated Bill with many powers and no doubt intended for a very good purpose, but there are some curious things in it. For instance, there is a provincial charter referred to in section 27, and this section empowers the company to buy up and extinguish the present shares of this provincial company and force the shareholders to take in lieu bonds in the new company. I question whether this parliament has the right to give any such authority. Then there are no names of shareholders mentioned in the Bill.

Mr. CARVELL. This company has been doing business some 25 or 30 years on the Restigouche river both in Quebec and New Brunswick, and its business is increasing very rapidly. A cut of 25,000,000 feet a year was at one time considered fairly good, but last year the cut exceeded 100,000,000 and this year will likely reach 125,000,000. The facilities of the boom company are entirely inadequate to hold the lumber for certain periods, and the only way possible to get additional facilities is to take a portion of the rights on the province of Quebec side. Application was made to this parliament a number of years ago to secure this extension of rights, but because of the opposition of one important bond or stockholder, it was allowed to drop. I am now in a position to assure my hon. friend that every stockholder in the old company has agreed to the proposition and the stockholders are really promoting this Bill. They will be represented by their solicitor who has been here on two occasions, and the Bill has been redrafted by the solicitor of the old company and the law clerk. There will be no objection from any of the old stockholders, and the understanding is that the stockholders shall take the bonds in the new company for their stock.

Mr. J. HAGGART. Is the old company a provincial one?

Mr. CARVELL. Yes.

Mr. J. HAGGART. In that case we should not empower them to sell to this company.

Mr. CARVELL. It would do no harm to give the power. We can create the new company and give it the power to purchase. The matter will be one for the old company to work out at their end if necessary. This is in the interests of the company. I would like to have the Bill pass its second reading to-day because I understand there are some interests opposing the Bill, and I should like to have the Bill go before the Private Bills Committee so as to give every one interested sufficient time to be present.

Mr. WRIGHT. Is it not necessary that those who are promoting the Bill should have their names in the charter?

Mr. CARVELL.—I am not promoting the Bill myself, but am speaking on behalf of my hon. friend from Restigouche (Mr. Reid). I know, however, a great deal about the old corporation and something about the preparation of this Bill. I supposed that the names of the gentlemen applying were in the Bill; but if not, they can be put in the Bill in committee if necessary.

Mr. PERLEY. I have no desire to block the second reading. No doubt the Bill is for a very good purpose, but there is a company on the Ottawa river very similar to this one, all the tolls of which are under the Public Works Department and have every year to be submitted to the government before they become law. There is no provision in this charter in that regard whatever. If there are no shareholders, at the end of 30 years when the bonds run out, who will own these works? There is no provision as to who will own them when that time is over. There are officials in the Public Works Department who have had to do with this kind of work many years and this charter should be submitted to those officials, who understand their business, before it is brought to the committee. The members of the committee necessarily cannot be conversant with the technical details of a Bill of this kind.

Mr. CARVELL. All these matters can be argued before the Private Bills Committee.

This is not a new principle by any means in New Brunswick. There are other companies in which this principle is worked out and in which it has worked very satisfactorily the last 25 or 30 years. The company is mutual and there are no stockholders.

Mr. PERLEY. To whom will the works belong after the bonds are paid?

Mr. CARVELL. To the company.

Mr. PERLEY. But if there are no shareholders, there will be no company.

Mr. CARVELL.—This Bill provides for persons who have the right to vote and the man who has a certain quantity of lumber in the river has a vote. There are other parties who take the place of shareholders, who can vote and decide what to do with the property at the expiration of the charter.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 142) to incorporate the Congregational Union of Canada.—Mr. A. Haggart.

QUESTIONS.

CERTIFICATE OF ARTHUR JOHNSON.

Mr. LANCASTER:

1. Has Arthur Johnson, of Midland, engineer of the barge 'Reliever' during the season of 1909, a third-class engineer's certificate? If so, what is the date of same?

2. By whom was he examined, on whose report of fitness was same granted, and where was such examination held?

3. What certificates were filed with the department as to service, what was the time of service, the name of tug or vessel, by whom owned, and by whom each certificate was given, respectively?

Hon. WM. TEMPLEMAN:

1. Yes, dated July 30, 1909.

2. Examined by J. Dodds, steamboat inspector at Midland, Ontario, July 1, 1909, and recommended for a certificate, which was approved by the chairman of the board of steamboat inspection, and certificate granted.

3. The certificates produced for service, character, ability, and sobriety are as follow:

No. 1, dated Windsor, Ontario, April 3, 1905, as six months second engineer on tug 'Onaping' in 1893. Signed Thomas Conrick, first engineer.

No. 2, dated Midland, Ontario, October 12, 1905, as chief engineer on tug 'Maganetawan' in 1895, six months and 24 days. Signed, Paul Dusome, master.

No. 3, dated Midland, April 18, 1905, as chief engineer tug 'Maganetawan' in 1896, five months and twenty-seven days. Signed A. W. Clark, master.

No. 4, dated Midland, April 18, 1905, as chief engineer on tug 'Beaver' in 1899, five months and six days; also as chief engineer on tug 'Clipper,' 1903, eight months and twenty-six days. Signed, George Kinnee, master.

No. 5, dated Midland, 18th April, 1905, as chief engineer tug 'D. L. White,' 1900 and 1901, eight months and three days. Signed, William White, master.

No. 6, dated Midland, April 18, 1905, as chief engineer on tug 'Lake,' 1902, seven months and nine days. Signed, John Shuman, dredge captain.

No. 7, dated Midland, 18th April, 1905, as chief engineer on tug 'Clipper,' 1904, four months and four days. Signed, T. E. Cook, master.

No. 8, dated Midland, April 10, 1909, as chief engineer tug 'Clipper,' 1905, eight months and fourteen days; also chief engineer tug 'Aubrey C,' season of 1907, nine months and six days. Signed, Manley Chew, owner, Charles Gould, master.

CONSERVATION COMMISSION—COMMITTEE ON FISHERIES.

Mr. JAMESON:

Referring to a question on February 14 last, as to the powers of the Commission for the Conservation of Natural Resources, what are the names, residences and occupations of the Committee on Fisheries, appointed by said commission?

Hon. SYDNEY FISHER:

Hon. Hugh Armstrong, Winnipeg, Man., Provincial Treasurer of Manitoba.

Hon. Price Ellison, Victoria, B.C., Chief Commissioner of Lands, Forests and Works of British Columbia.

Hon. W. C. H. Grimmer, Fredericton, N.B., Surveyor General of New Brunswick.

Hon. A. P. Maclean, Halifax, N.S., Attorney General of Nova Scotia.

Dr. Howard Murray, Dalhousie University, Halifax, N.S., Dean of Dalhousie University.

Hon. Frank Cochrane, Toronto, Ont., Minister of Lands, Forests and Mines of Ontario.

ESTIMATE OF POPULATION.

Mr. MAGRATH:

In the statement giving the population of Canada in various years, which appears in the hon. Finance Minister's last budget speech, what is the exact method employed to estimate the population since the last census?

Mr. FISHER. The last census of each province is taken as the datum, to which is added (1) the yearly immigration into each province as reported by the Immigration Office; and (2) the natural increase per 1,000 per annum according to the last sensus, table IX of volume IV. The total natural increase in each year is computed from the estimated population of the preceding year.

COST OF HEATING RAILWAY COMMISSION BUILDING.

Mr. S. SHARPE:

If the cost of heating the Railway Commission building, Queen street, for the year 1908-9, amounted to $1,164, what are the various items of expense making up this amount, including the amount of coal, cost per ton and other particulars?

Mr. FISHER:

72 tons of coal, at $7	$ 504
Salaries, at $55 per month, for six months, of night and day firemen	660
	$1,164

LIST OF BANK SHAREHOLDERS.

Mr. HENDERSON:

Has the Minister of Finance yet laid before parliament the list of shareholders of banks transmitted to him for the calendar year ending 31st December, 1909, as required by subsection 6 of section 114 of the Bank Act? If not, when does he propose to do so?

Mr. FISHER:

The Act allows the banks some time after the close of the year to send in these returns. The returns have been received, are in course of preparation for parliament, and will be laid on the table in a few days.

JUDGE OF KING'S BENCH.

Mr. A. HAGGART:

1. Is the government aware that the Manitoba Act providing for an additional King's Bench judge has been brought into force?

2. Have representations been made that there are serious arrears in the Court of King's Bench work, and that the appointment of a judge is urgent?

3. Is it the intention of the government to provide at this session for the payment of such judge, and to fill the vacancy without delay?

Hon. A. B. AYLESWORTH:

1. The government has been so informed.

2. The benchers of the Law Society of Manitoba have forwarded to the Department of Justice a resolution in which it is stated that a large number of cases are awaiting trial and cannot in ordinary course be tried for some time to come.

3. The subject is receiving consideration.

SLEEPING CARS ON INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Mr. EMMERSON:

1. Has the Intercolonial Railway Company any sleeping cars now under construction? If so, how many?

2. Are they being built under contract? If so, by whom and at what place?

3. If they are being constructed under contract, were tenders asked for such work? If so, when and in what manner were such tenders asked, and was it by public advertisement in newspapers, or how otherwise?

4. How many tenders were received, what were the figures of each tender, and what was the lowest tender for each car?

5. What was the cost of each car? If the work is not being carried on after tender and contract?

Mr. FISHER:

1. Yes, two sleeping cars.

2. They are being built, under contract, by the Silliker Car Company, at Halifax, Nova Scotia.

3. Tenders were invited by circular letter dated Tuesday, November 9, 1909.

4. Three tenders were received as follows The Dominion Car and Foundry Company, of Montreal, $23,500; the Preston Car and Coach Company, Preston, Ontario, $19,000; the Silliker Car Company, Limited, Halifax, $20,800. The Preston Car and Coach Company, though submitting an offer which was the lowest for the first-class sleeping cars, were unable to make delivery at a date to meet the requirements of the railway, viz., by the 1st of July, 1910. The Silliker Car Company, who made the next lowest offer, undertook to deliver these cars by the 1st of July 1910, as entered in their contract, therefore it was recommended that their offer for two first-class sleeping cars at $20,800 be accepted.

5. The cost of each car, as per tender, is $20,800. The work is being carried on as per tender, contract and specification.

Mr. A. HAGGART.

INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES INVESTIGATION ACT.

Mr. KING moved that the House go into committee to-morrow on the following resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, 1907, by providing for the payment to the chairman and members of a Board of Conciliation and Investigation, of an allowance at the rate of twenty dollars for each day's sitting of the board and for each day necessarily engaged in travelling from or to their place of residence to attend or after attending a meeting of the board.

Motion agreed to.

ZINC AND ZINC PRODUCTS.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN moved that the House go into committee to-morrow on the following resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to enable the Governor in Council to authorize the expenditure of a sum not exceeding fifty thousand dollars for investigating the processes used in the production of zinc, for making experiments, and for any other purpose that may be deemed advisable for the promotion of the production and manufacture in Canada of zinc and zinc products from Canadian ores.

Motion agreed to.

NAVAL SERVICE OF CANADA.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the motion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier for the second reading of Bill (No. 95) respecting the naval service of Canada, the proposed amendment of Mr. Borden thereto, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Monk.

Mr. A. LACHANCE (Quebec Centre). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, it may be boldness on my part to address myself to the subject which has been under discussion for the last month in this House; but I rely on the good will and courtesy of hon. gentlemen, even if only to the length of protesting against the contemptible charges of servility and graft preferred against the Liberal members from the province of Quebec by certain public men of that same province, who at all times, and always out of season, pose as unappreciated and uncompromising patriots, and take occasion of that to slander us in the press and on the hustings; or even if it were only to satisfy the opprobrium mongers that our support of the government and vote, are in no way inspired by venality, but as the result of study, of reflection, of common sense, of true patriotism. Such is my object in addressing the House.

When a few months ago, the question of the defence of Canada was first submitted to the public, many were surprised at it; in some quarters even it resulted in a scare, while elsewhere it was a matter of serious alarm; a few, on the other hand, took occasion of the circumstance to indulge in over-statements. One might have inferred that the matter was a novel one, unheard of until then, suddenly cropping up in the political arena.

It did occur to most people that the defence of Canada was initiated on that very day when Champlain founded Quebec in 1608 and built the 'Abitation,' which was destined to be used both for residential purposes and to be a bulwark against the attacks of aborigines; the fact was lost sight of that, later on at various points, forts had been built which have become famous in our annals, and in the defence of which Frenchmen have distinguished themselves while warring against the Indians, and later in repulsing the British troops sent to conquer Canada. Regiments of French troops and after the conquest, British troops were quartered there. Was not that paving the way for the country's defence?

What numerous stages have we not gone through since the days of those early armaments! In the course of years, and in quick progression, the military equipment of Canada has developed, its organization has been perfected, its efficiency increased. As evidence, I may mention that the militia estimates which at the time of confederation reached about the million mark, aggregate to-day $6,000,000. Nevertheless, it is not to my knowledge that at any time this circumstance has been considered a matter for alarm; nobody has raised his voice to protest against the principle of progressively increasing our military forces, so natural it appears to protect the country against invasion.

What would have become of Canada without troops at the time it was invaded by the American forces in 1812; what would have been its fate, had not the Fenians been repulsed in 1866 and 1870? Who will assert that we would to-day be enjoying that constitutional system under whose protection individual liberty is in full bloom like flowers under the bright June sun?

Nobody will contend that there is no need of an army to ensure the maintenance of peace, to quell serious riots, unwarranted uprisings which might break out among our people, and also to protect our trade and defend the integrity of Canada's possessions.

Up to this day, we have been the object of attacks on the part of the United States only, and the forces on both sides were about on a par. True, these old-time foes have long since become friendly to each other, both engrossed with peaceful pursuits and enjoying the benefits of an 'entente cordiale.' Unfortunately, though there is nothing stable in this world, and if hostilities were to be renewed some day—which God forbid—a possibility which should not be lost sight of, how will we manage to defend our sea coasts if we have only a land force at our disposal?

And what I say in regard to our neighbours in the south, applies just as well in the case of those countries beyond the Pacific ocean, of ancient origin, but new to civilization, a civilization, in some cases at any rate, buoyant, imbued with a spirit of enterprise and even of conquest. Barely had thirty years elapsed since modern progress had dawned over the country of the chrysanthemum, when the empire of the Rising Sun imposed its rule in Corea to the Celestial empire, and then with one prodigious leap struck to the ground, under the walls of Port Arthur, the colossus of the north made torpid by a stifling autocracy. Who can foresee the development in the near future of those other countries bordering on the Pacific, overcast just now with the gloom of ignorance, but which are bound to be overtaken by the light of progress, in accordance with what I might call the law of geography. In the earliest times, civilization developed in the east and made it famous, extending over Asia and Europe, then crossing the seas in the folds of the Spanish and French flags, and after setting foot in America, resuming its flight towards the far east. It seems as though in accordance with a decree of Providence, progress is bound to encircle the whole world, quickening with its rays the minds of men to a better comprehension of liberty and progress.

Should we have a land force? Its desirability has been recognized, as I have already said, and the principle has been long since acted upon and more energetically than ever of recent years. Would there be any sense in doing away with the principle of naval defence and its practical carrying out, now that Canada has two great oceans as its boundaries on the east and west? Would it be in accordance with common sense to take steps for the defence of the interior while leaving our coasts without protection, open to raids, to attacks from the enemy, without even being in a position to keep off the enemy, until we had made preparations or called for reinforcements.

But, say our opponents, is not England there with her powerful war navy to defend us? Yes, thank heaven, England is there; let us hope she will there remain long, I might say for ever, if earthly things were everlasting. Yes, England is there; she may even be said to be everywhere, since, as is sometimes said, the sun never sets on the British empire, so extensive are its possessions, and so widely distributed over the surface of the world. It is precisely because that empire exists and we are part of it, that the duty of the hour is so imperative on us.

Are there very many Canadians who would willingly accept the rule of a foreign nation? I do not believe it. Whoever observes what is the condition of the average citizen of the world, cannot be but proud to live under the protection of the powerful Albion. That is not empty rhetoric, it is my earnest conviction. I am a Frenchman, and I am a Catholic; I am not forgetful of it, and I hope I shall never be. I love France as the home of my ancestors, that is to say, deeply, unalterably, with a filial love. I have reverently learned its history; I was enthused at reading of its glorious past, of its perils, of its misfortunes, and I feel it would be a cruel blow to me were the heart of my dear France to bleed under the stroke of some national catastrophe. But while that attachment remains strong, I am happy to be a British subject. Where would I find such freedom for the individual, where would I find such perfect safety elsewhere than in the folds of the British flag, and of the Canadian flag?

It is customary to say the British subject; that is wrong. In whatever domain, whether in national, private life, in public or business transactions, there is nothing carrying with it the idea of dependence. Loyalty to the king does not imply subjection, but the fulfilment of one's duty towards the head of the nation, whether he be called king, president, or by any other name. That is why I say there are properly speaking no subjects, but only British citizens.

Accordingly there should be only one heart and one voice towards maintaining unimpaired the prodigious power which the empire wields to-day, and supporting that empire at the summit of glory where it shines at present. To neglect that duty is to be one self's enemy. It means that we fail to understand that so long as we are a British possession, so long will Great Britain be strong and great, the more prestige and authority she will have, and the stronger also will Canada be, and the greater will be her prestige and her authority. And what is it that is feared? Some say imperialism, others say militarism, and after crying out these words, to frighten the people, they believe everything has been said, everything has been settled. Words are no proof at all; it is facts that convince.

An imperialist I am not, if to be such I have to sacrifice a modicum of the rights enjoyed by the inhabitants of Canada in matters of language, civil, religious and political liberty; and imperialist I am not, if to be such I have to put up with the least interference with our autonomy, or pave the way for any future restriction of it.

But if it is the part of an imperialist to put our militia in touch with the rest of the British forces, so that in case of a war in which we would be interested, there would be secured unity of action, very well, call me an imperialist. Lastly, if it is the part of an imperialist to wish to see the mother country from day to day more powerful, so that our country, as well, may become from day to day stronger, very well, call me an imperialist, because to be an imperialist in that way is to love one's country, is to be a patriot.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. LACHANCE. (Translation). Mr. Speaker, this afternoon, I stated at the outset that the first expenditure incurred for the defence of the country dated back to the foundation of Quebec, and that it was ordinary common sense to provide for the protection of our coasts just as we had provided for the defence of the rest of the country. And when you left the chair at six o'clock, I was pointing out what are to my mind the distinctive features of the right kind of imperialism as well as of the objectionable kind.

I now wish, Mr. Speaker, with your kind permission, to say a word on another subject. Some public men, some writers, have, in a sarcastic vein, dubbed these first beginnings of the naval defence a 'tin-pot navy.' All great undertakings, no matter how generous the feeling which prompted them, are bound to have their critics. All things have small beginnings. What would those bitter critics say to-day if the government had appropriated, let us say, $40,000,000, at one stroke, and neglected in consequence other branches of the public service? I fancy I hear them complaining bitterly of the government's inefficiency and of the check thus put on the government of Canada for several years to come.

Of course, ten or twelve ships are not sufficient to make the country absolutely secure against attack, at every point along the coasts. But Canada is progressing very rapidly; its revenue is increasing in proportion and will enable us to develop little by little the means of defence, until the day comes when our navy will represent a sufficiently strong unit to provide, in conjuncture with the land forces, full protection against raids, inroads, or interference by nearby or distant foes. Fortunately, for the time being, there is no reason to suspect on the part of any one a desire of invading, dismembering, or conquering Canada. But what assurance have we that such a thing will not be attempted some day?

Up to some twelve years ago, Canada was not very much known, and its population being comparatively small, it had not attracted particularly the attention of the world. But the early years of this century have opened wide for her the gates of fame; she presents herself as a peaceful conqueror, anxious to show, as stated by our illustrious leader, that the twentieth century is really Canada's century.

All eyes are turned towards us; our chances are figured on; our future is, I might say, forecasted; our mineral, agricultural, industrial and forest wealth is estimated; and fifteen or twenty years more of progress at the rapid rate of the last decade, will make of Canada an envied and coveted country, on account of its riches, its great population, its brilliant prospects.

Who will say that at any time Great Britain may not be engaged in a war requiring the concentration of all those naval forces. That day may be remote or it may be closer to us than we expect, the natural tendency being to foresee calamities only in the distant future. Will she then be in a position to give us as much help as she otherwise would have been? Certainly not.

Then, will England always possess the power and prestige which she enjoys today? That is our ardent desire, and our sincere hope. May the British empire for ever rule on land and on sea. All Canadians entertain that fervent hope. The proof lies in the very Bill submitted to the House for the maintenance of that supremacy, inasmuch as it lies within our power.

But nothing is endowed with perpetual stability. What has been the fate of these immense kingdoms to which the British empire might be compared? What has been the fate of the empire of Alexander the Great, of the Greek republics, of the Roman empire, and in more recent times of the empire built up by the lieutenant Bonaparte?

And what then? In such a juncture, inadequately protected by the mother country, without means of defence at home, our only resort would be to run about on the ramparts and witness, desolate and powerless, the landing of the invaders, or the destruction of our own merchant navy.

Let us suppose the case when we would be called to take care altogether of ourselves. Should I not tremble in making such a suggestion, seeing that since the beginning of this debate on the naval question hon. gentlemen on the other side represent as a crime of high treason to forecast, or even suggest, the possibility of independence for Canada at any time. On the part of the members of parliament who are intent on enlightening public opinion, such narrow-mindedness is most regrettable, and warranted the proud reply elicited from my hon. friend for the Yukon, who, to better point out the foolishness of such empty rhetoric, reminded us that Englishmen, not of Canada, but of Great Britain, eminent statesmen, reputable writers, celebrated historians, have spoken of the independence of Canada as of a fact which may and must necessarily come about some time or other, adding that such an event would be in accord with the natural course of history as regards such dominions or colonies.

But that is not all, will hon. gentlemen believe that a Governor General of Canada has been found to echo such sentiments. It is nevertheless a fact. Yes, Sir John Young at an official function at Quebec on July 15, 1869, following on his arrival, expressed feelings which were construed as an invitation to Canadians to proclaim the independence of their country. He spoke as follows:

> At the present moment, Canada is in reality independent. It has its own destinies in its own hands, and its statesmen and people are recognized as competent to judge of their interests as to what course to pursue to conciliate those interests. England looks to them for her guidance, and whatever their decision may be. either to continue the present connection or in due time and in the maturity of their growth to exchange it for some other form of alliance.

The same views are expressed in the London press of the time, as witness the following extracts from the 'Thunderer':

> There is no ground for surprise, still less for indignation, if it be asked whether it would not be better for both Englishmen and Australians if the independence the latter have, in fact, should reveive a name. The Dominion of Canada is in all respects independent. It is fitted to become independent as it has the institutions of a great power. It is surely a fair subject for inquiry whether the emancipation of the adult is not as desirable to complete the manhood of the son as it is necessary from the inability of the father to understand the peculiar circumstances of his son's life.

And the 'Times' said further:—

> Incidents like these (the withdrawal of troops and the speeches of public men) coming too, in quick succession, showed that the executive government of the United Kingdom acting, as must be presumed in harmony with the imperial parliament, had resolved upon abandoning the old policy of tutelage with its pretensions and responsibilities, and urging the colonies by gentle suasion to take up the freedom of their manhood.

May I be allowed to quote another extract from that paper against the colonial system. I fear lest the hon. member for Frontenac and others whose views are not any broader, should have a fainting spell; however, I shall take the risk; there are several medical men occupying seats in this House, and I beg of them to keep their eyes open on these likely patients in case of emergency. I shall then read the wording of the 'Times' onslaught: not only does it advocate independence for the colonies, but it sarcastically discards the expression 'mother country' as applied to England:—

Now said the 'Times,' what is meant by speaking of England as the mother country? What is to be understood by the description of Australia, Canada and the rest of her colonies? If all that is intended is to remind us of the historical fact that the citizens of Canada, New South Wales and Victoria are mainly of English origin and descent, we shall not quarrel with the accuracy of the statement, although we may doubt the pertinence of the phrases. England is in this sense the mother country of Australia, and just in the same way some other land, without committing ourselves to the quarrels of ethnologists, we may say Shleswig-Holstein is the mother country of England. Again, it may be observed that if Australia be the child of England, the United States are elder brethren of the same family. It is evident that considerations like these, though extremely interesting in their proper relations, have no necessary connection with the mutual obligations of communities, that is to say, of societies of individuals banded together for purposes of government in different parts of the world. Let us then, in the interest of truth and right conclusions, discard altogether the phrase 'mother country' in the discussions which are before us, let us even use with deliberation words apparently so innocent as 'England' and 'colony,' and remember that what we are called upon to weigh and determine is the proper relations of Englishmen, Australians and Canadians.

I do not concur in the views expressed by the 'Times' on that point. I believe that the expresion 'mother country,' in a general way, describes the status, the respective positions of England and her dominions. If I recall these facts, it is to show to those who are unacquainted with them or have lost the memory of them to what extent freedom of opinion and speech is granted out there.

If then these British statesmen and newspapers have referred to the independence of Canada in such strong terms, and even induced Canadians to turn to it, and that without even causing the slightest surprise, why should people here get angry or feign anger because the right hon. Prime Minister and the hon. Postmaster General and others have now and then referred to that subject in extremely moderate language, as citizens taking an interest in the future of their country? Why should these gentlemen on the other side take occasion of that to favour the House with some bits of eloquence of very doubtful quality, in regard to our so-called disloyalty. That such whinings should be agreable to them, I do not say the contrary; all tastes are in nature, though it must be admitted some of them are peculiar, but, for the sake of us, let them spare our ears and indulge between ourselves in tht kind of sport.

Moreover, I will tell them very frankly that their unworthy denunciations do not in anv way interfere with our tranquility; our past record is the best answer the turn of mind evidenced by such appeals is almost akin to mania, to a morbid state, the analysis of which may be as much a matter of medical science as of parliamentary debate. Nevertheless, freedom of opinion exists for us as for others; we propose taking largely advantage of it; but we should before all unite with all persons of good will, and broadness of mind towards ensuring the reign of peace in this country. Those whom the spirit of discord torments or that race prejudices distract are free to waste time on the side of the ditch; but we shall continue our progress onwards towards the heights.

So, then, I am quite free to state in this House, that we are perfectly, absolutely, entirely satisfied to live under the present system; but that is not a reason why I should not be at liberty to anticipate a possible condition of independence of Canada, as well as the possible settlement in some way or other of many other problems yet unsolved.

Whom are they expecting to frighten, or alarm, or intimidate, by exclaiming: In your mind, the building of a navy is merely a step towards independence. And supposing it were so, what harm to it? However, that is not a weighty consideration in this debate; the navy is not being organized to-day with a view to conquering independence, but it will be there and will be required, should at any time independence become a reality.

Besides, to be consistent, our opponents should put a stop to all future progress of trade, industry and agriculture, for all these factors help in as great a measure as the navy, and even more so, in developing that degree of wealth, of power and of expansion in Canada which would be required to make independence a possibility.

Accordingly, although this is not the subject just now under discussion, I say it is the part of wisdom to foresee the hour when possibly Canada may separate from the British Crown, and separate without any friction, on friendly terms, owing to circumstances that are still the secret of Providence. That forecast, I repeat it, does not imply any hostility towards the mother country; but since we are discussing a question of national interest, we should consider all its aspects. Events move quickly; what are mere dreams today may be actual facts to-morrow. Some will then advocate annexation to the United States, others independence, and what not? But whatever proposals are made, wisdom demands that we should be ready, so as not to be at the mercy of anybody.

If to-morrow the tie which binds us to the empire was broken, would there be a single Canadian to deny the desirability of equipping at once a navy? But why should we await that emergency? Are we not even now in fact an independent nation? The British Crown does not take umbrage at that designation, so lightly does that Crown weigh on the British possessions. So let us speak, and especially act, as a nation; let us make the best of the present, but let us also make preparations for the future inasmuch as human forecasts enable us with the help of experience and the teachings of history, to see through that mysterious veil.

We have obligations towards the empire as a whole, but that does not mean that we should not mind doing an injury to Canada. Accordingly is it not part of the duty incumbent on representatives of the people to discover a means of being serviceable to both at the same time? To cooperate towards the upholding of the power of the empire, to defend our country, to protect our business interests which already aggregate several hundred millions and give promise of increasing fivefold in the near future; such is the treble task with which we are confronted. How will we succeed in fulfilling it?

Shall we take the advice of these academic thinkers whose only teaching on that question of naval defence, is to have nothing at all to do with it? What is their plan? To delay until danger is at hand? Unless they are gods or demi-gods capable at a moment's notice of providing a well-equipped fleet risen from the deep at the snap of the fingers, what would be the outcome of their procrastination? They should beware lest in waking up they find out it is too late.

Shall we, on the other hand, take the advice of those who favour the idea of a direct contribution? In what way would Canada and her business interests be protected thereby? To a very limited extent, in a most indirect and uncertain fashion, especially should Great Britain be at war, not to speak of the possible emergency of the mother country being crippled by her foes.

The only other alternative is that which meets all emergencies, gives satisfaction to the just claims of the Empire as well to the legitimate aspirations of Canada; that is the plan proposed in the Bill submitted to the House by the government.

Evidently the people prefer it to all others, and justly so. Through it we ensure in a still greater measure, if possible, our political and administrative autonomy. The money required for the building and maintenance of that navy will be spent here; a new field of action will be opened to Canadians; then parliament will have the exclusive control of that force which will be entrusted with the duty of protecting our territory, ensuring the safety of our trade, of our international dealings, and which may, besides, at certain critical times, act in conjunction with the fleet of the mother country, but only when the people of Canada through their representatives will have agreed to it.

True loyalism or patriotism does not consist in giving everything away blindly and rashly; it consists in giving intelligently. Since Canadians henceforth form a separate nation, and since part of its revenue must be appropriated to military purposes in such a way as to meet its requirements and those of the empire as well, let it be in such a way at any rate that Canada may reap from it the greatest benefit possible without interfering with the object in view.

It has been contended—the hon. gentleman from L'Islet (Mr. Paquet) who spoke recently is of that mind, and there are others—that is contrary to the constitution, or rather interfering with our autonomy, to put, under the circumstances laid down in the Bill, our navy under the command of the British Admiralty, and in the same way to take part in the wars of the empire. There can be no greater mistake. We have the right, I presume, to organize our land and sea forces for the defence of Canada. Well our right to put the Canadian navy under the control of the admiralty and to have it take part in the wars of the mother country is quite as evident. To deny it one must be in bad faith, or else be absolutely blind to the spirit or ignorant of the letter of the British North America Act of 1867 and of the militia Acts since passed by this parliament. Not only is that our right but even, under the law now in force, we are liable to be called upon to do so as regards the sea forces; even as regards the land forces, we were in the same position up to 1904, when the statute 4 Edward VII, cap. 23 was passed.

As a matter of fact, all our militia Acts passed since 1867, are based on the following principles:—

1. The King has the command of all the land and sea forces, and of the whole military and naval service of Canada.

2. Since 1867 and until the passing, in 1904, of statute 4 Edward VII, cap. 23, the King had the right, of his own authority, and without the interference or concurrence of the Governor in Council or of parliament, to call out to active service all our land and sea forces, either within or outside of the limits of the Dominion.

3. Since 1904 our land forces can be summoned to active service only through the Governor in Council or through parliament, and solely for the defence of Canada.

4. Our sea forces can even to this day be summoned to active service within or outside the boundaries of the Dominion of Canada, by the King, of his own authority, the interference or consent of the Governor in Council or of parliament.

Section 15 of the British North America Act, 1867, gives the King command of all our militia corps.

The command in chief of the land and naval militia and of all naval and military forces, of and in Canada, is hereby declared to continue and be vested in the Queen.

If these words mean anything at all, it is that the King is commander in chief of the militia, that he has the right to assume command of it, consequently to order it to wherever he pleases and put it under the command of whomsoever he thinks fit. That section 15 is in itself a peremptory answer to those who, earnestly or otherwise, contend that the Confederation Act of 1867, does not in principle allow our forces to take part in Great Britain's wars or to put the Canadian navy under the control of the Admiralty.

That provision is reproduced in all our Militia Acts since 1867. With a view to giving effect to the provisions of that section 15 and of subsection 7 of section 91 of the Confederation Act, which provided for the organization of land and sea forces, parliament passed in 1868, our first Militia Bill, 31 Vict., cap. 40. That Act has been revised several times since then; the provisions as amended will be found under cap. 11, of 46 Vict., in chapter 41 of R.S.C., 1886, in chap. 23 of 4 Edward VII., in chap. 41 of R.S.C., 1906. It is expressly provided in each of these Acts that the command of the militia is vested in the King, who exercises it in person and may delegate such power to the Governor General, not the Governor General in Council, but to the Governor General alone, as representative of the Sovereign. So that, basing myself on that legislation, I have the right to conclude that our militia can, without infringing on the principle of our autonomy, take part in the wars of the empire.

That construction on the other hand, is confirmed by other provisions of the Militia Bill; as a matter of fact, from 1867 up to the time of the passing of 4 Edward VII, chapter 23, the King had the right to call out on his own authority and without the interference or consent of the Governor General in Council or of parliament, the whole of our forces to active service, in or outside the Dominion of Canada.

I quote section 61 of the Act of 1868:

Her Majesty may call out the militia or any part thereof, for active service either within or without Canada, at any time when it appears advisable so to do by reason of war, invasion or insurrection, or danger of any of them, and the militiamen, when so called out for actual service, shall continue to serve for at least one year from the date of their being called out for actual service, if required so to do; or for any longer period which Her Majesty appoints.

46 Victoria and the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1886, also contained that provision. So that ever since confederation the King had the absolute right of calling out on his own authority our military forces to active service, in or outside the Dominion of Canada. On whose behalf and for what object might they be called to do active service outside of Canada, if not to take part in England's wars.

In 1904, the Militia Act is revised in part in 4 Edward VII, chapter 23. Radical amendments are then effected, particularly by vesting in the Governor in Council alone the right of calling out the militia to do active service in or outside of Canada and by providing for the summoning beforehand of parliament. Thus, section 70 reads as follows:

The Governor in council may place the militia or any part thereof, on active service anywhere in Canada, and also beyond Canada, for the defence thereof, at any time when it appears advisable so to do by reason of emergency.

So then it will not be the King alone, acting on his own authority, but the Governor in Council, that is our cabinet ministers, responsible to this House and to the people of the country, who shall henceforth have the right to call out the militia for active service. So that constitutes a radical change in our favour.

Section 70 says: 'for the defence thereof' (Canada). These words and that restriction appear for the first time in our Militia Law. What are we to infer from it, if not that, previously to that, our forces could be called out to do active service for other purposes than the defence of Canada, and for what object then could it be, if not to wage war in the interest of the British flag?

However that statute 4 Edward VII., relates only to land forces, as stated in section 136:

The following Acts of the parliament of Canada are repealed, in so far as the active and reserve militia land force is concerned, to wit, &c.

Statute 4, Edward VII., chapter 23 has been included in the Revised Statutes for 1906; but the latter have not abrogated the acts previous to 1906 in regard to the naval forces. To satisfy one self as to that, a reference to schedule A which gives the list of the acts repealed, will suffice. Accordingly, the naval militia has always been and is till to-day liable to being called out directly by the King to do active service within or outside the boundaries of Canada.

In that regard, the Bill now under consideration is a step further towards a state of more complete autonomy, since, in the future, it will be the ministers in council, or parliament, who will have the right to call out our war navy to do active service.

It has also been contended that there is no need for Canada providing armaments, as it is protected in virtue of the Monroe doctrine. That is indeed a most extraordinary statement. The hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux), has already victoriously answered that contention. However, I may be allowed to add a few remarks. That doctrine was given expression to in 1823 by President James Monroe. It is a theory, nothing more, a theory which has not the force of precedent, if I may so expres myself, because it would be going too far to state that it has received the approval or concurrence, or even the acquiescence, of the diplomatic world, or of the chanceries, and nobody will contend that it is part of the rules and principles of international code.

Besides, even supposing it had these features, a circumstance which I would welcome, that doctrine has reference only to the intercourse of European powers with Americans, but has nothing whatever with the intercourse between one American power and another. That distinction is the essential characteristic of that doctrine; and even if it should be a means of protection for us against the peoples of the old world, it would not be a means of protection against the claims, the encroachments or hostilities of the nations which people the American continent. Therefore, I say that doctrine is not a safeguard for us against all and every one, and does not warrant us in remaining inactive without armaments.

The opposition, which in part recognizes the leadership of the hon. member for Halifax, proposes an amendment while opposition No. 2 led forsooth by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier presents an amendment to the amendment, both demanding a plebiscite but for different reasons in each case. As several hon. gentlemen on this side have pointed out, and justly so, a plebiscite is demanded in regard to an expenditure of $43,000,000, appropriated towards the building of a navy which will be our property and constantly in use by us; but all thought of a plebiscite is rejected when, as per the amendment of the opposition, it is proposed to contribute $25,000,000 to the British exchequer as a free gift. Surely that is a striking example of a breach of logic, no wonder the opposition has not yet been able to explain such inconsistency on their part.

Then, as was stated by the hon. member for Red Deer, if we repeat that contribution two or three times, it will ultimately turn out to be a direct invasion of the principle which the opposition is so prone to invoke: 'No representation, no vote.' Now, there is a matter concerning which the opposition might, with better grace to my mind, have sugggested a referendum, it would have been in regard to that proposal of a gift of $25,000,000.

The hon. member for East Grey answered: 'There will be no more contributions.' How does he know? Has he consulted the augurs, the witches, and put in motion the sacred tripod to be thus in a position to utter an oracle. At the time of the sending of the Canadian contingent in 1899, it was also stated that there would not be any more contributions; barely ten years elapsed and we are called upon to contribute once more.

The question of naval defence, it is contended, is a novel one. It cannot be gainsaid that it is before the public in explicit terms since the conference of 1902, when it was proposed to provide for that defence. General elections have taken place in 1904, a new conference was held in 1907, a further general election took place in 1908, and every time that same Liberal government was kept in power, and, inferentially, its then policy which has not been changed since, may be said to have been approved.

But, to say the truth, it was not in 1902 for the first time that the question came up, it is in 1867, when the British North America Act was up for discussion. As a matter of fact, it recurs in all our militia Acts which have been passed in the meantime, such as the Act of 1868 which provides for the organization of land and sea forces. So then, for 43 years, almost a half century, the naval defence proposal is grafted on our legislation, notwithstanding which a referendum is called for under pretense that the question is a novel one. Evidently, advocates of the plebiscite idea are lacking in information.

But I might submit a further consideration which is very peremptory to my mind. Is not this proposal concerned with the defence of Canada and her most vital interests? Now, is not providing for the defence of the country the primary right of representatives of the people a right undeniably implied in their mandate and its most essential feature? Even more, it is not only their right, it is their duty, the first, most sacred and the most imperative of duties, and if in this respect we were to accede to this plebiscite proposal, I am not very sure that we would not be a subject for wonder, nay for laughter, to the rest of the world.

Like many others, I had hoped that this country would not be called upon to assume the heavy burden of armaments, that when it would have reached its full manhood, warfare would have become a thing of the past. Accordingly, it was not without a feeling of pain, a sort of anguish, that we to-day talk on the floor of this House of the possibility of war for Canada, a land of hope, a land of hospitality; it is not without a pang, without some bitterness, that still close to the cradle out of which our young country has just come to take its place among nations, we should have to evoke scenes of bloody warfare; and we mourn at the thought of adding to these precious jewels with which we had adorned it—civil liberty, religious freedom, political liberty, liberty of trade—the battle axe, not for purposes of attack, but for purposes of defence, direct or indirect. How much more we would have preferred to adorn it with olive and laurel blossoms, as symbols of peace.

But alas, the hour of disarmament, of universal peace has not yet come; and should we not despair at finding that even the most civilized nations have heretofore as a last resort pinned their faith to the effectiveness of their guns. What would be the use of persistently taking refuge in doctrines and theories of a very humanitarian character, and which all accept and admire, if, at a certain moment we are made to decamp at the point of the bayonet. War is abhorrent to all of us, but, if war is declared or waged against us, are we foolishly to let other people take our lives without a move, so as to express our aversion for such a scourge.

For six centuries past, humanity has condemned war, and during all that time nations were waging war on one another under pretense of rights to vindicate, of grievances to avenge. Will ever a means be found to ensure the maintenance of universal peace? We may at least hope so. But before that is found, are we justified in dispensing with means of defence? Would it not be almost equivalent to suicide?

Therefore, I say it is a duty incumbent on us to overcome that aversion, and to consider the present and the future as practical men who love their country. Since it is necessary, let us begin by providing Canada with the means of protection indispensable towards ensuring her safety, her advancement and the respect of foreigners in her national life, as well as in her business transactions; but at the same time, let us express the hope that we shall never be called upon to draw the sword against other peoples; should that be the sole result of armaments, it would be ample compensation for our sacrifices. Yes, God forbid that our immense plains should ever be moistened by anything else but the morning dews! God forbid that in our Canada the roaring of guns should ever be heard, except to proclaim the benefits of peace, to echo the rejoicings of our people and proclaim the glories of our country.

Mr. GEORGE H. PERLEY (Argenteuil). Mr. Speaker, the question before the House is so important that I desire to say a few words on it before the debate closes. This Canadaof ours is the greatest self-governing colony of the British empire, and so far as I have been able to judge we have received in our day and generation at least, just as fair treatment from the motherland as we could reasonably wish. In the course of the debate some hon. gentlemen have referred to incidents that have happened in the days gone by, but such past events have little concern with the issue now before the country. The United States rebelled against Great Britain for grave reasons, and Great Britain learned the lesson how to govern her colonies so as to obtain their love and respect. Now, Sir, there is no one in this House more loyal to British connection than I am. I suppose that the right hon. gentleman who leads the House would possibly refer to me as a dreadful imperialist, but that appellation has many different meanings, and the proper meaning of that word is one who believes in maintaining the British empire by all reasonable means. I am a Canadian first, I am for Canada, but I believe that it is to our interest to stay in the British empire, because to my mind it is thus that we can best ensure our peace, our security, and our happiness as a nation. I need not refer to the present day greatness of the British empire or to the noble part she has played in history. Never has the world seen such a grand empire, and the dearest wish of my heart is to see it perpetuated if that can be accomplished and in a way satisfactory to all the component nations. I believe, Sir, that our race is surely capable of finding some practical solution of imperial problems, among which this one of naval defence is now presented for our consideration. The hon. the leader of the opposition has very closely set forth in his speech my views when he gave utterance to the following language:

> It is not wise to prophesy what the future may bring forth, but I would venture to hope that a defence committee or an imperial conference having special jurisdiction over defence matters, composed of men from both parties in Great Britain itself as well as in the self-governing nations of the empire, would have some control over the organization of imperial defence, and as an outcome of such a committee or such a conference I would expect that in future Great Britain would engage in no great war without knowing before hand that she would have the support and the sympathy of every one of the great self-governing nations of the empire. This would give to these dominions a voice in the control of war, because I thoroughly agree that if we are to take part in the permanent defence of this great empire we must have some control and some voice in such matters.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this prophecy is sure to come true, if the empire is to hold together, and if we should now ask for some representation of that kind in the empire's councils, provided we give regular and effective assistance to the imperial navy, in what way may seem best to us, is it not likely that Great Britain would grant our request. Autonomy is certainly essential to the welfare of a colony, but not absolute autonomy in everything. The whole empire must be greater than any one part of it, greater than Canada or the United Kingdom in themselves, and the voice of the empire so expressed would carry greater weight, and have more power than the voice of any single Dominion. Each part of the empire must have control over its own local affairs, but some means ought to to be found so that in future, if there is to be a war, that war will be declared by the empire, and not by the United Kingdom as at present. And, Sir, if we are to stay in this British empire, as I hope we may, then we must do our share to defend ourselves, for that is the only thing that would satisfy Canadians who are a self-reliant, and a self-respecting people. I think, Sir, that we should do our share of the empire's defence of our own free will. Self-preservation is the first law of nature, and every nation must protect itself. I do not pretend to say that it is easy to declare exactly how this should be done, or how we should do our share in the empire's defence. In my view, Sir, the question has not been long enough before the people. The Prime Minister stated that the people of Canada had the question before them since 1902, but I do not agree with the right hon. gentleman in that. It is true that in 1902 the question was raised at the imperial conference of that year, but until the past year it never came up for consideration before the people as a whole. I think I am safe in saying that not five per cent of the people of Canada ever heard of or knew what resolutions were passed in 1902, and therefore, I submit that our people have not had sufficient time to consider this very serious matter. I believe that it is to the interest of all classes and races in this Dominion that British connection should be maintained, for I think I am safe in saying that no country except Great Britain has ever given to her colonies such civil and religious liberty as Canada enjoys. And, in this connection I may say that it is my belief that the great masses of the people of Canada, not only English Canadians, but French Canadians, are loyal to the British Throne, and appreciate the advantages which we have received from the motherland. In 1870, Sir George Etienne Cartier who is generally acknowledged to be as great a statesman as Canada ever produced was Minister of Militia, and in that year a question arose with regard to Canada providing a permanent militia to replace some of the imperial troops which had been withdrawn from this country.

Through his influence and the influence of others the matter was arranged, and Sir George Cartier prepared a state paper on May 19, 1870, from which I quote as follows:

> The announcement in the former despatch (from Lord Granville) of the 12th February last, that the arrangements therein contemplated are contingent upon time of peace, and are in no way intended to alter or diminish the obligations which exist on both sides in case of foreign war, is very satisfactory to the Canadian government, who receive with gladness the reiteration of the assurance conveyed in the despatch of the 17th June, 1865, that the imperial government fully acknowledged the obligation of defending every portion of the empire, with all the resources at its command, on the reciprocal assurances given by the Canadian ministers, then in London, that Canada was ready to devote all her resources, both in men and money, to the maintenance of her connection with the mother country.

This paper was concurred in unanimously by the Dominion cabinet on May 20, 1870, and it shows the feeling of Sir George Cartier at that time and the feeling of the people whom he represented.

Now, Sir, it seems to me that the first thing we ought to decide in connection with this matter at present is that whatever we do shall be efficient. I do not believe that this country should spend a vast sum of money without giving any real help to the empire. Whatever differences of opinion there may be in this country on this question, we surely all agree in that. The present proposal of the government is one of no real practical value. It seems to me that it is only a farce, and will only result in our having a false sense of security, while we spend vast sums of money, which will go on increasing year by year; and we shall not have any ships which, in case of war, will be of any real benefit to us or to the empire in helping her to defend us. I believe this government has tried to deceive the people in this matter; it has tried to make them believe that it is really proposing some effective measure, that it is doing what the British admiralty wishes it to do. Last summer there was in London a conference of the self-governing colonies. I am not going into the details of this part of the question, because it has already been discussed in this House by many of the speakers who have preceded me. But in general I would say that at that conference the British admiralty stated that as a matter of naval strategy the best thing the colonies could do would be to contribute in money; but at the same time it was recognized that that would not be satisfactory to the colonies. Then the British minister, Mr. McKenna, stated that what the admiralty would really like would be a fleet unit on the Pacific. Australia had promised a fleet unit, New Zealand had promised the principal ship of a fleet unit, Great Britain herself was to give a third, and what the admiralty would like was that Canada should give a fourth. The Canadian representatives demurred at that, and asked that something should be suggested that would not cost so much money. Then the British government suggested that Canada might get an auxiliary Bristol, some cruisers and other vessels, in accordance with the scheme now proposed by this government. The British admiralty did not say that these ships would be of any particular service to them in time of war; yet this government has adopted this scheme and put it before the people of this country as a fulfilment of the wishes of the British admiralty. In the speech from the Throne last November there were the following words:

Two members of my government attended the imperial conference called by His Majesty's government, on the question of defence. A plan was adopted, after consultation with the admiralty, for the organization of a Canadian naval service, on the lines of the resolution of the House of Commons of the 29th of March last.

This clause in the speech from the Throne was drafted for the purpose of making the people believe that the plan suggested by this government was the one proposed by the admiralty. I submit that these words should not have been put into His Excellency's mouth when the government intended to bring down this Bill, which does not provide for any effective assistance. Moreover, the government's plan is not on the lines of the resolution of last March. That resolution has been fully discussed, and I do not propose to quote it now; but I understood it to mean that we Canadians were prepared to render effective assistance in the defence of the empire when it was required. The resolution of last March was passed under special circumstances, and was intended to show to the world that we were a unit in our desire to maintain the British empire, and to do what was reasonable to that end. At the same time, I do not argue that the exact words of that resolution are binding for ever. Circumstances change, and while our intent is the same, we may carry out that intent in a different way from what was proposed at that time. The Prime Minister has attempted in his speech to lead the country to believe that we are not ready to act up to this resolution while the government is. On February 3, at page 3035 of 'Hansard' the right hon. gentleman said:

When this resolution was moved, and accepted by a unanimous vote, we believed that it would be binding upon the other side of the House as it is binding upon this side, but in this we made a mistake. We supposed when this resolution had been voted on, gentlemen on the other side of the House who had given their assent would at least have the small merit of consistency, but in this we were deceived. It never entered our minds that men on the other side of the House would go back on the vote they had solemnly given. In this again we had made a mistake. We paid them too great a compliment.

I submit that the government itself has not carried out this resolution and that this proposal of the government is not in accordance with it. The resolution was passed unanimously by the House, but the government has taken to itself the sole right to interpret it. In that resolution are the words:

Along the lines suggested by the admiralty at the last imperial conference.

This proposal of the government does not follow the lines suggested by the admiralty at the last imperial conference. To establish that I shall read a part of the English report of the 1907 conference contained on page 129 where Lord Tweedmouth says:

We welcome you and we ask you to take some leading part in making more complete than it is at present the naval defence of the empire. I wish to recognize all that our cousins over the sea have done in consequence of decisions of former conferences. I know that you gave to the government and to the admiralty with a free and unstinted hand, the help that you thought you could manage to give. Gentlemen, I have only one reservation to make, and in making it I ask that, as we have proved ourselves successful in the past, you should put your trust in us now. The only reservation that the admiralty desire to make is, that they claim to have the charge of the strategical questions which are necessarily involved in naval defence, to hold the command of the naval forces of the country, and to arrange the distribution of ships in the best possible manner to resist attacks and to defend the empire at large, whether it be our own islands or the dominions beyond the seas. We thoroughly recognize that we are responsible for that defence. We want you to help us in that defence, we want you to give us all the assistance you can, but we do not come to you as beggars; we gladly take all you can give us, but at the same time, if you are not inclined to give us the help that we hope to have from you, we acknowledge our absolute obligation to defend the King's dominions across the seas to the best of our ability.

In other words, the only thing that Lord Tweedmouth asked was that they should have charge of the strategical question of naval defence in case of naval war, and this proposal of the government does not so provide. Therefore I say that when the right hon. gentleman who leads this House undertook to make the country believe that we had gone back on our resolution while the government had stuck to it, he is reversing the true position, because this government has certainly not brought down a Bill or a suggestion of naval defence which accords with the resolution of last March. The right hon. the Prime Minister in his speech on the address in reply to the speech from the Throne on November 15 last, said:

> Need I say to my hon. friend that whether we have such a navy or not, we do not loose our right to self-government; that if we do have a navy, that navy will go to no war unless the parliament of Canada, including the hon. gentleman, choose to send it there.

Clauses 18 and 19 of the Bill provide that the Governor in Council may place at the disposal of His Majesty the Canadian ships which this government proposes to build. Clause 19 provides that if the Governor in Council decides to place our ships at the disposal of the British admiralty then parliament must be called at once to consider it, but if the government decides not to place the ships at the disposal of the admiralty then nothing happens, parliament is not called together, and the ships do not go. It seems to me a curious distinction. If parliament is to decide as to what the ships shall do, then parliament should decide whether it is for or against. I do not see why this distinction has been put in the Bill. In any case the right hon. gentleman and the other members of this government must know that these clauses in the Bill are wholly misleading. In case of a war between Great Britain and some foreign country, that foreign country will be the one to settle whether Canada is at war or not, and if the country which is at war with Great Britain attacks our vessels we must then fight or haul down the Union Jack and practically secede from the empire. So I say to the government that these clauses must have been placed in the Bill to mislead somebody, or other, because it is impossible that Canada should keep out of any war that Great Britain may be in, if the foreign country which is at war with Great Britain chooses to come here and attack us.

This seems to be too important a matter for any government to have the right to decide. I do not think that any Canadian government, I do not care who might be at the head of affairs, should have it in its power to virtually decide in this extraordinary way that Canada should become independent. We know that this Liberal government arrogates to itself great powers in every direction, but surely it is for the people of this country to decide a matter of so vital importance, and not for any government.

I was exceedingly sorry to see that the right hon. the Prime Minister in discussing this question attempted to make party capital out of it. He followed the Liberal party press in trying to make out that this plan of the government had been agreed to by both parties. The Liberal press has in many cases referred to this Naval Bill as the Laurier-Borden programme. For instance I find that the Toronto 'Globe' on January 3, in an editorial says:

> The 'Citizen' virtually says that Mr. Ellis is prepared to swallow the Laurier-Borden naval programme, even to the extent of leaving the control of the fleet to the Canadian people in time of peace.

I claim that this is an unfair way of putting the case as there was no Laurier-Borden programme whatever. There was a resolution passed unanimously by this House in March last, but the difficulty regarding it consists in the interpretation which might be put upon it, and in the way in which it might be thought best to carry it out. If it was intended by the government that this Naval Bill should be a joint arrangement agreed to by both parties, then, I submit, it was the duty of the government to keep the leader of the opposition informed as to what was going on, to consult with him and to arrive at some understanding satisfactory to everybody as to what was best to do. I have always thought that that would have been good statesmanship, and that in a matter of this kind it would have been better for Canada if the government had taken the leader of the opposition into their confidence when this matter was being discussed and tried to have arrived at some programme that would have been satisfactory to both sides. Instead of that, the proceedings of the conference were kept absolutely secret, and even after parliament met it was with the greatest difficulty that we could find out exactly what the government had decided to do. When the proposal of the government in this matter did come down, it was found by our side of the House to be entirely different from what the resolution and the admiralty called for. As an alternative of this plan of the government, the leader of the opposition has suggested another, which will not only be more economical for this country, but will give a great deal more help to Great Britain than the proposal suggested by the government. When the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the second reading of this Bill, it seemed to me that he did not take the dignified course that I should have expected of him on that occasion. This question is, perhaps, the most momentous one that has ever been brought before this parliament, because the consequences which will flow from it will extend over many years and the decision taken at this time must greatly affect the course we shall have to pursue in the future. When the Prime Minister was moving the second reading of such a Bill, it seems to me, he ought to have confined himself to a statesmanlike review of the Bill in order that every person should understand it thoroughly, and that the people of the country might have a chance to consider it carefully. Instead of that, the right hon. gentleman made a campaign speech in this House without discussing very much the merits of the Bill. He began by taunting this side of the House because, he said, we had a divergence of views, we did not all think alike. He spoke of this at some length, attempting to set one part of the opposition against the other, and to have the country know that we had some difference of opinion. The right hon. gentleman, when he discussed the question in that way, forgot that he himself had changed his mind regarding this question, and that in 1907 he had refused to do practically exactly what the government now proposes to do. In the conference of 1907, it was moved by Mr. Smartt:

That this conference, recognizing the vast importance of the services rendered by the navy to the defence of the empire and the protection of its trade, and the paramount importance of continuing to maintain the navy in the highest possible state of efficiency, considers it to be the duty of the dominions beyond the seas to make such contribution towards the up-keep of the navy as may be determined by their local legislatures—the contribution to take the form of a grant of money, the establishment of local naval defence, or such other services, in such manner as may be decided upon after consultation with the admiralty and as would best accord with their varying circumstances.

You will notice that this resolution does not call for any particular form of contribution; it may be given in the form of money, or the establishment of naval defence, or in other service. When that resolution was moved, Sir Wilfrid Laurier said:

I am sorry to say, so far as Canada is concerned, we cannot agree to the resolution. We took the ground many years ago that we had enough to do in our respect in that country before committing ourselves to a general claim.

So, the right hon. gentleman changed his mind since 1907, and it seems to me that, when moving the second reading of this Bill, he might have occupied his time to much better advantage than in talking of any difference of opinion there may be among members of the opposition in this House. We may have our differences of opinion; we acknowledge that frankly. Our friends opposite have as great differences among themselves, but they keep them quiet for fear they may lose control of the reins of power.

I take great pleasure in supporting the amendment of the leader of the opposition on this occasion. It seems to me that in the critical state which exists at present in Europe, we ought to do something to show the mother country and the world where we stand, and that we are willing to help the mother country in case of emergency. As to whether there is an emergency or not, I will quote the words of Sir Edward Grey, the Foreign Secretary of Great Britain, a man better fitted than any other to understand the true position of affairs:

When the German programme is completed Germany will have a fleet of thirty-three Dreadnoughts. That fleet will be the most powerful the world has ever seen. This imposes upon us the necessity of rebuilding the whole of the fleet. That is the situation. If we were to fall into a position of inferiority we should cease to count for anything among the nations of Europe, and we should be fortunate if our liberty were left, and we did not become the conscript appendage of some stronger power. That is a brutal way of stating the case; but it is the truth.

These are not the words of a jingo or a scaremonger, but of Sir Edward Grey, the Foreign Secretary. Under these circumstances, I say, it is our duty to show Great Britain and the world that we are prepared to assist her in an emergency of this kind. This we can do of our own free will, and it would in no wise compromise our autonomy, which we are all as anxious to maintain as the right hon. Prime Minister himself. There would be no promise of an annual contribution, and the question as to what we might do in the future would be left entirely in abeyance. This would enable our people to have time to really understand this question before finally deciding what Canada ought to do. What strikes me, I may say, most forcibly in this matter, after hearing all the discussions in this House and talking it over with many people outside, is how little the people understand it. It has not been before us long enough for us to thoroughly grasp it, and there is no doubt in my mind that the ideas of the people regarding it have not yet been crystallized, although it is generally recognized that Canada should assist in her own naval defence according to her ability. The acute stage of this question has only lasted about a year, and there have been no debates or meetings throughout the country at which this question has been expounded so that the people might have a chance of hearing and understanding all sides before making up their minds. How can we possibly expect that the people should thoroughly understand this question when those of us who have studied it most carefully find it exceedingly difficult to make up our minds what method would be the best for us to follow? It strikes me that the question is one which requires plenty of discussion, and I do not think that a plebiscite would be the best way in which to accomplish this purpose. That would give us no chance for discussion and explanation. The only real way in which the people can reach an understanding on this problem is to have it taken up in a general election. If we had a plebiscite or referendum, there would be no reason why any one should go out on the platform in the cities or the country districts to discuss this question from all sides and enable the people to understand it, whereas if we had it discussed in a general election, the fate of the government would depend on the issue, and we would be all out trying to have the people look at it as we do, and the people would really have a chance of learning something about it.

In conclusion, I would say that I have the honour to represent a county with a mixed population, in almost exactly the same proportions as are to be found in the Dominion. I firmly believe that both the French and the English would vote to protect their own homes and firesides if they only understood this question. I believe that the great majority of the people of all classes are in favour of the British empire and the maintenance of our British connection, but I am sure that they do not want to contribute regularly or annually to the defence of the empire without having some say regarding the questions of war and the methods of using their contributions of ships or money. To my mind, this is the greatest question which has been before this parliament for many a day, and consequently our decision cannot fail to be most important. It will be one which will affect the course ot events, not only in this country but in various parts of the British empire, for many years to come, and it seems to me that the people of Canada should be given ample time to thoroughly understand this question and to give it their cool and calm judgment before it is finally decided.

Mr. O. S. CROCKET (York, N.B.). I do not intend to occupy much of the time of the House at this late stage of the debate. The question has been so exhaustively discussed that it is almost impossible for one to take it up at this time without treading on ground which has already been traversed again and again. I feel, however, that I cannot allow the motion for the second reading to pass without expressing, otherwise than by registering a simple vote, my uncompromising opposition to the measure. I regard the Bill as the most revolutionary proposal, so far as the relations of Canada with the mother country are concerned, which has ever been submitted to this parliament for its approval. I have carefully studied the Bill, and can view it in no other light than that it is a direct blow, deliberately aimed by its authors, at British connection. What proof of this, you ask? I reply that barring clause 4, which nominally, and only nominally, vests the command in chief of the forces in the King, there is not a line or a word from the beginning to the end of the Bill, which, by the remotest implication, acknowledges that any connection whatsoever exists between this country and Great Britain and her other over-seas dominions. On the contrary, the whole Bill studiously ignores the existence of any connection and is framed upon the bold assumption that Canada is an independent nation, owing no allegiance to or interest in the British empire. As I have said, clause 4 of this Bill nominally, and only nominally, vests the command in chief of the proposed naval forces in the King. But for this one clause, the effect of which, as I will show, is completely nullified by subsequent clauses, the Bill is precisely such an one as might be passed by this parliament if it were the parliament of a separate and distinct republic. Clause 4 of the Bill is inserted for the reason that the constitution which the parliament of Great Britain gave this country makes it impossible to omit it. My hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. Cowan), in the very telling and eloquent address which he delivered the other night in opposition to this Bill, quoted section 15 of the British North America Act. Let me quote that section again:

> The command in chief of the land and naval militia and of all naval and military forces of and in Canada is hereby declared to continue and be vested in the Queen.

That provision makes it impossible for this parliament to divest His Majesty of the command in chief of our naval forces reserved to him by the terms of that section; and I firmly believe that were it not for the fact that this parliament is thus restrained by imperial enactment, the name of the King would not have appeared in this Bill from beginning to end. However, it does appear for the reason I have given, and then follow immediately clauses which completely nullify and abrogate clause 4. Let me read clause 5:

> 5. The minister shall have the control and management of all naval affairs, including the purchase, maintenance and repair of the ordnance, ammunition, arms, armouries, stores, munition and habiliments of war intended for the use of the naval service.

And clauses 6, 7 and 8:—

> 6. The minister shall have the control and management, including the construction, purchase, maintenance and repair, of naval establishments and of ships and other vessels for the naval service.

7. There shall be appointed an officer, not lower in rank than rear admiral, to be called the director of the naval service of Canada. If a suitable officer of such rank is not available then an officer of the rank of captain may be appointed, who shall have the rank of commodore of the first class.

2. The director of the naval service of Canada shall, subject to the regulations and under instructions of the minister, be charged with the direction of the naval service.

8. The Governor in Council may appoint a naval board to advise the minister on all matters relating to naval affairs which are referred to the board by the minister.

2. The composition, procedure and powers of the board shall be as prescribed.

Then we have sections 17 and 18:—

17. The Governor in Council may place the naval forces or any part thereof, on active service at any time when it appears advisable so to do by reason of an emergency.

18. In case of an emergency the Governor in Council may place at the disposal of His Majesty, for general service in the Royal Navy, the naval service, or any part thereof, any ships or vessels of the naval service, and the officers and seamen serving in such ships or vessels, or any officers or seamen belonging to the naval service.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it will be seen by every one who carefully examines the language of those particular sections, 17 and 18, that they are absolutely inconsistent with section 4 and with the command in chief of the navy being vested in His Majesty. Take section 18. How absurd it is to say that the command in chief of the navy is vested in the King and then immediately to follow it with the statement which appears in this section that the Governor in Council may place at the disposal of the commander in chief the naval forces of Canada? The Governor in Council may place at the disposal of the King, who is the commander in chief under section 4, the naval forces of Canada and the Governor in Council may not place this navy, of which the King is the nominal commander in chief, at the disposal of His Majesty for service in the imperial navy. The Governor in Council may withhold the navy from its commander in chief, the King, or may refuse to allow the navy which is to be established by his Bill to co-operate with the British navy in any war in which Great Britain may be involved. Under section 17 the Governor in Council, who is the government of this country and at the present time means none other than Sir Wilfrid Laurier, is authorized to send this navy to the assistance of any nation of the world without regard to the intereste of the British government. There is authority given under the terms of that section to place the naval forces, or any part thereof, on active service at any time and in any place. They are given full power, if they dare to exercise it to send this navy to the assistance of France, United States, or even Germany. These, it seems to me are powers which should not be vested in the government of this country—I do not care of whom composed. Under section 17 of this Bill, Sir Wilfrid Laurier may send the navy to the assistance of any nation in the world as he may under section 18 withhold its co-operation with the British navy and prevent its participation in any war in which Great Britain may be engaged. It is very clear to me, and, I think, must be clear to any one who has carefully examined the provisions ot these sections, that they divest His Majesty the King, of the command in chief of the naval forces in Canada, and that they are, therefore, unconstitutional. I believe that if the British government is well advised, if its members have not been duped by the constant dinging into their ears by the Prime Minister and his anti-imperialistic colleagues of this wearisome cry of autonomy, they will advise that the royal assent be withheld from this Bill until at least these two clauses which are clearly in violation of section 15 of the British North America Act are expunged. If these clauses stand and are allowed to become law it is as clear as the noonday sun that the Bill places in the hands of the Goverinor in Council an instrument in the form on an absolutely independent navy the use or non-use of which may be fraught with the most far-reaching consequences to our position as a Dominion of the British empire or as a nation of the world.

Let the right honourable gentleman, who has so often offended the British sentiment of this country, have his way, when it comes to the question of Canada going to the aid of the motherland in any war which may arise, and let him refuse to send the so-called Canadian navy, if he choose or if he dare. What of the consequences?

It is only necessary to ask the question. Beyond all doubt, his ultimatum in such a contingency would be a declaration of independence.

Is this parliament, are the people of this country willing to place such a power in the hands of this or any government or Prime Minister, especially in the hands of the present Prime Minister, who, in this parliament only a few days ago, boastfully stated that he was no imperialist, who has declared, over and over again, on the floors of parliament, in the province of Quebec and even upon the soil of a foreign country, that the goal of his aspiration was 'independence' and the severing of the tie that binds us to the motherland, who, in the imperial conference of 1907 registered the Dominion of Canada—to the shame of every patriotic Canadian—as the only colony of the empire which was not willing to contribute in any way to the maintenance of the naval supremacy of the British empire, and who since this Bill was introduced had had the temerity to state in the loyal city of Toronto, that the King has no rights in this country except what the parliament of Canada has given to him?

Why does the government of Canada want a navy separate from, and independent of the British navy, repudiating, as this Bill does, all connection with the British admiralty? Is it that we know better how to build a navy? Is it that we know better how to man and run a navy? Is it that we can build or maintain it more cheaply or more efficiently than the British admiralty? Is it that a navy constructed under the direction of the government of Canada will be more valuable and effective for the defence of the empire, or for the defence of Canada alone, if you like, than the British navy? Not one of these questions but has to be answered in the negative—no, to every one of them. I do not think that a single hon. gentleman on the other side of the House would contend for one moment that we know better how to build or man a navy than do the British admiralty or that a navy built in this country will be more effective for the defence of the empire or of Canada than a navy co-operating with the British navy and under the direction of the British admiralty. Then, why is it that the government is determined to build and run a navy on its own responsibility? It is because and only because the government is more zealous to defend Canada against even the semblance of British connection than it is to defend Canada or the empire against the ships or guns of a foreign foe.

Autonomy, autonomy, they shout when the shores of Great Britain and the integrity of the British empire are threatened by a grave and imminent peril, and when our autonomy, so-called, has never once in our history been restrained or threatened in the slightest degree so far as the full and plenary powers which have been assigned to this parliament by the British North America Act are concerned.

Then, what do they mean by this cry of autonomy? They mean, in my humble judgment, just precisely what the word in its true signification means—they mean independence, they mean separation; they mean, in short, what Sir Wilfrid Laurier has so repeatedly declared is the goal of his aspiration : Independence and disunion, the severing of the tie that binds Canada to the motherland. That is the reason, and the only reason why the parliament of Canada is asked, when laying down its naval policy, to recognize no association or connection with the greatest navy of the world—the pride of every loyal British subject—and to own no allegiance to the greatest empire in history. This parliament may stand for that, but I venture the prediction that the people of this country will not. Certainly, as one member of this parliament, I do not propose to stand for it. In my judgment this is the paramount objection to this Bill, that it makes for disunion. But it is not by any means the only objection. No matter from what standpoint we regard it —whether we look at it from an imperial standpoint or a Canadian standpoint, or from a purely practical business standpoint—there does not seem to be a single consideration of any kind to commend it, unless indeed the huge expenditure of money for which it provides is its commendation in the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite. It ignores the present threatened danger to the supremacy of the British navy, which is the only reason for our doing anything at all at the present time. It does absolutely nothing to meet this emergency, in as much as the navy for which it provides cannot by any possibility be ready for action for years after the crisis has passed and Britain's supremacy has been decided, probably once and for all. It provides for a navy whose ships will be obsolete before they are ready to be manned; a navy of such puny proportions that even if it were ready for action it would be incapable of attack and incapable of defence; a navy whose only function in the event of war, according to the statement of the government's principal French Canadian newspaper organ in Montreal, will be to elude pursuit; a navy which would not only be useless but positively mischievous and dangerous. But, Sir, a navy which will entail upon the Canadian people an initial capital expenditure estimated by the government at $16,000,000 or $17,000,000, and an annual expenditure for upkeep and maintenance estimated at $6,000,000 or $7,000,000; and, if the past record of this government in the matter of financial estimates affords any criterion, these figures will have to be trebled and even quadrupled. Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, this Bill, as was pointed out by the member for Argenteuil (Mr. Perley), violates all the essential principles of the resolution passed by this parliament on the 29th of March last. It completely ignores, as I have said, the present emergency. It provides for the establishment of a navy absolutely independent of the British navy, contrary to the advice of the British admiralty. It provides for a navy owning no connection or association with the Royal Navy of Great Britain, whereas the resolution of last year distinctly laid it down that if our contribution to imperial defence should take the form of a navy to be built by Canada, it should be in co-operation with and in close relation to the imperial navy along the lines suggested by the admiralty. For these reasons I propose to vote against this Bill.

In respect to the amendment moved by my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) though I fully agree that this parliament should not venture to commit Canada to such a novel and far-reaching policy as the government now proposes, without first obtaining a mandate from the people I cannot support the amendment of the hon. gentleman for the reason that he has moved it as an amendment to the amendment proposed by the hon. leader of the opposition, and if it were carried it would supplant the amendment of the leader of the opposition, which not only provides that the people of the country shall have an opportunity of passing upon the question of a Canadian navy, and in a more regular and constitutional manner, before the country is committed to such a policy, but which at the same time provides for an immediate contribution of two Dreadnoughts to the British admiralty to meet the present crisis. I shall, therefore, vote with the greatest confidence for the amendment proposed by the leader of the opposition, and I shall vote with equal confidence against the second reading of this Bill, which I consider, as I have already stated, is the most revolutionary proposal which has ever been submitted to this parliament so far as the relations of Canada with the British empire are concerned.

Mr. D. H. McALLISTER (Kings and Albert). Mr. Speaker, this debate has now occupied the attention of the House for such a long time that I trust that my contribution to it shall be brief. I must say that a great many of the speeches delivered from both sides of the House have shown a careful study of the subject submitted for our consideration, but I agree that other hon. gentlemen have seen fit to stray very far from the question. When the memorable resolution of March 29 last was passed in this House, it appeared to me from the nature of the speeches delivered on both sides that no political bias would be imported into this very grave matter. Last year the leader of the opposition and his first lieutenant (Mr. Foster) were of the opinion that a Canadian navy would be the best means of imperial defence, and I was one of those who hoped that both political parties could agree on that. Speaking on the 29th of March, 1909, ('Hansard', page 3613) the leader of the opposition said:

In so far as my right hon. friend the Prime Minister to-day outlined the naval defence of this country I am entirely at one with him. I am entirely of opinion, in the first place, that the proper line upon which we should proceed in that regard is the line of having a Canadian naval force of our own. I entirely believe in that. The other experiment has been tried as between Australia and the mother country and it has not worked satisfactorily in every respect. In Great Britain the contribution has perhaps been regarded as rather unsatisfactory. In Australia it, in the end, failed to meet with the approval of the people for the reason that Great Britain felt constrained to ask Australia that the field of operations of the squadron should be extended to the China and Indian seas, and if the operation of that squadron were so extended the Australians felt that the contribution which they had been making for some years past was not really being used to give that protection to Australia which they felt it should have. So that, the policy of Australia at the present time is the policy of the submarine and torpedo boats which, in case of war, would cooperate with the armed cruisers and battleships of the British navy. It was pointed out in discussing this question that although the people of Australia provided a force of that kind they would provide a force which it would be very difficult if not impossible for Great Britain to send across the seas, and that when they were protecting themselves they were providing the best possible force for the protection of the empire.

Now, this certainly was a declaration for a Canadian navy and, backing up this view, the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) used these words:

The first and greatest objection which I have to a fixed money contribution is that it bears the aspect of hiring somebody else to do what we ourselves ought to do; as though a man, the father of a family, in lusty health and strength, should pay his neighbour something per month for looking after the welfare and safety of his home instead of doing that duty himself. That seems to me, when you work it out, to be a basic objection to that form of aid. It goes out further than that. Suppose you contribute this year your sum, and next year your equal sum, and thereafter year after year. After ten or twelve, or twenty, or thirty years, you will have paid out an immense amount of money. You will have been protected in the meantime; but in Canada itself there will be no roots struck, there will be no residue left, there will be no preparation of the soil, or beginning of the growth of the product. Yet some time or other, as true as we live to be a people with a population constantly increasing, we must actually have in this country a naval force of our own for our coast and home defence.

The interest that we take in a contribution spent by another is not the interest that I desire for Canada. I want to see something grafted on the soil of Canada's nationhood, which takes root and grows and develops until it incites the spirit of defence in this country, leads to a participation in the defence, leads to that quick interest in it, its glories, its duties and its accomplished work, which after all the one great thing that compensates a people for great expenditures either on land or on sea in the way of defence and of the maintenance of the rights of the country.

Again, it disjoins what has been joined together from the earliest days of the world's existence—commerce and the protection of commerce. After all, the basic ideal of a naval force is the protection of the commerce of a country. A commerce side by side with its protector, and its protector side by side with the commerce of a country, flourish best together, and are the best helpers to each other. That is the idea which is in my mind —that when we make our contributions in the way of a fixed sum and it goes from us, and we are not responsible for it, we have none of the inspiring of a growth and development and a laying of a basis for future defence in our own country. We are deprived of the larger benefit ourselves, and in the future we do no greater service to the empire of which we form a part, in this matter of defence.

Then again, I think that method ignores the necessities and the aspirations and the prospects of a great people such as the Canadian people are destined to become. We must have beginnings; these must be small; but some time, or other, as I have said, our country will have its naval force for the defence of this country if for nothing else. The point with me is as to whether it is not the greater wisdom to sow the seed at once and cultivate its growth, as best we may, in our circumstances and with our resources, until at last we arrive at that stage of expansion which we have reached in other great lines of our country's progress. You will notice that while I have tried to discuss the pros and cons in connection with this method, while I have stated reasons in favour of and others against it, my own mind tends rather towards the employment of another form than that of an out and out money contribution.

I listened with a great deal of pleasure to the speeches of both the hon. leader of the opposition and the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster). The hon. member for North Toronto made a remark to the effect that a little instrument, I think he said a thumb-screw, had been at work on the Liberal side of the House to bring the supporters of the government into line. Down in my part of the country we use another kind of screw, a jack-screw, for lifting buildings, and I think that must have been the kind of screw used on these two hon. gentlemen.

A great deal has been said on the other side of the House about the loyalty of the right hon. the Prime Minister. The hon. member for St. Anne (Mr. Doherty) compared the Prime Minister to Admiral Sir Joseph Porter in the comic opera 'Pinafore.' Under the circumstances I might compare the hon. member for St. Anne with another character in that same opera —I allude to Dick Deadeye, whose special function was to provide amusement for the rest of the crew. I may point out, moreover, that while Sir Joseph Porter was the master of the ship, Dick Deadeye was only a clown on board. The hon. member for St. Anne followed the example of other hon. gentlemen on the opposition side of the House, notably the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Cowan) in making reflections upon the loyalty of the Prime Minister; but what might be excused in the hon. member for Vancouver cannot be excused in the hon. member for Ste. Anne, who at one time occupied a dignified position on the bench. These two gentlemen set up their opinions against the opinion of His Majesty the King of England, who, on the occasion of the birthday of the Prime Minister last year, sent him a telegram, not only congratulating him on his birthday, but paying a tribute to his loyalty to the Crown and the empire. This is the answer to those two hon. gentlemen, and I would rather accept the assurance of His Majesty the King than the unsubstantiated vapourings of two disgruntled politicians.

Now, some gentlemen have insinuated that the principal object of this Canadian navy was to cause a separation or to make a wide breach between Canada and the empire. I am quite satisfied that these insinuations are very much uncalled for. The plan of the leader of the government is good—he looks farther than the leader of the opposition. The right hon. leader of the government years ago looked forward to the time when Canada would be a great nation within the empire, but he has not forgotten that Canada did not reach her present position without a struggle. Compare the policies of the two great parties. The government has one which has not only been suggested by the admiralty, but which meets the approval of the Liberal party as a whole. The Conservative plan, on the other hand, is to hand over to the British government the money to purchase two Dreadnoughts, and then submit to the people the question whether we should have a Canadian navy or not. I do not think the people will hesitate between these two propositions. The government's policy is a truly Canadian one. It helps to build up the country, it causes money to be circulated, it means that the money will be kept in Canada; because in order to have a Canadian navy we shall require shipyards and drydocks, which will be either at Halifax or at St. John. In these shipyards a large number of men will be employed, which will mean an increase of population, which in turn will help the merchants, the lawyers, the doctors and the farmers. Then these dry-docks will be used, not only for the construction and maintenance of a Canadian navy, but for other ships and steamers of the great transportation lines. As we have now no dry-docks in the maritime provinces, any ships requiring to be repaired have to be taken to New York or elsewhere, and Canadian labour gets no benefit therefrom. After paying out $20,000,000 or $25,000,000, the leader of the opposition proposes to refer the question of a Canadian navy to the people; but he is quite willing himself to spend $25,000,000 of the people's money without asking their consent, and send it out of the country, and give it to the British authorities to spend as they see fit. They might use the money for the erection of a dry-dock in New Zealand, or a coaling station in Honduras or somewhere else, and even though it might be spent within the British empire it would be very unsatisfactory to the people of Canada.

A great deal has been said about the loyalty of the people of the province of Quebec. I think the people of the province of Quebec are as loyal to the British empire as they need to be, and we are proud to have a French Canadian leader, who believes in equal rights and privileges, as the Prime Minister of Canada does. I do not think anybody, English or French, should be condemned or found fault with if he is not altogether in favour of either a direct contribution or the establishment of a Canadian navy. I may say that when this matter was first talked of last year, I myself was rather of the opinion that the movement was a little premature. I did not think that Canada had any need to launch out on such a project, and I believe the great mass of the people I represent were against it, and they are as good British subjects as any of the hon. members on the opposite side of the House. I was of the opinion that if Canada had any money to spend it could be just as well spent in the developing of its farming interests and mining and the encouragement of proper immigration from different parts of Europe to this country. I quite realize now that with the growth of Canada, particularly since this government has come into power, with our magnificent revenue of something over $100,000,000, with our farming lands unexcelled in the world, with our timber lands and our mineral wealth yet unexplored, we have a great heritage that is worth protecting; and as a move has been made to assist the empire either in the form of a direct contribution or a Canadian navy, I am willing to accept and advocate, as my constituents will also, the establishment of a Canadian navy.

Another point that has been dwelt upon is that there is an emergency. For my part I do not believe there is any emergency. A great election campaign has just been fought in the old country, but during its course not a word was said about an emergency, the whole election was fought out on the budget and tariff reform.

The Prime Minister of England, speaking at the Reform Club in Liverpool, a few days before the election, said:

> Let me say then, once for all, and I speak with full deliberation and after careful and prolonged inquiry, that the navy to-day is able to maintain, not only this year, but in the years that lie before us, our supremacy at sea (cheers), and should the necessity arise, which God forbid, to guarantee the integrity of our commerce and the inviolability of our empire. The sister service, the army, is reaping now in full measure the benefit of the foresight and the constructive power and the undefeated energy of Mr. Haldane.

That was his opinion just before the election. We have heard nothing from England about an emergency. We have in London a High Commissioner, a gentleman of wide experience, and with exceptional opportunities for acquiring information, and if any trouble of that kind were brewing our government would have been notified long ago of its existence. There is too much of this militarism in the world anyway; often fanatics get together and work themselves up until they suffer from hallucinations, a form of insanity. I have here a few extracts from a magazine article:

> Tre most virulent and devastating disease now raging on the earth is militarism.

What do you think of that?

> The terror of a patient who is suffering from mental derangement is often pathetic. Surround him with granite walls, ten in number, and every wall ten feet thick, and he will still insist that he is unprotected.

Like a few of our hon. friends opposite, who think we are gone, body and soul.

> So it is with the militarist. Like many another fever, militarism grows by what it feeds on, and unless checked by heroic measures is certain to burn the patient up. Men in a delirium seldom have sense of humour. The world is fearfully grim to them, and life a solemn and tragic thing. They express absurdities with a sober face, and make ridiculous assertions without a smile. It may be that the militarists are in a sort of delirium. All the great nations are to-day facing deficits, caused in every case by the military and naval experts. Into what a tangle the finances of Russia and Japan have been brought by militarists is known to everybody. Germany has, in a single generation, increased her national debt from eighteen million dollars to more than one billion dollars.

I might read more of this article, but this is sufficient to illustrate my idea that this whole thing is exaggerated.

Mr. G. TAYLOR. From what is my hon. friend quoting?

Mr. McALLISTER. The 'Atlantic Monthly.' Would you like to have it? My hon. friend's question reminds me that there has always been a lot of suspicion, I have evidence of it myself, among hon. gentlemen opposite. I do not like to see that. It is the worst thing in the world. I do not like to see any individual member or any group of members too suspicious. You know that the fox is the most suspicious animal, and that that rascal is the first fellow to rob a hen-house.

The defence conference saw the importance of the dominions beyond the seas laying the foundations of future dominion navies of their own, which forces would contribute immediately and materially to the imperial defence if need should occur. The Canadian ministers then in the old country agreed in that, and the next step was to see what the admiralty would suggest. What did the admiralty suggest?

That certain vessels be constructed as a nucleus of a Canadian navy.

To this the Canadian ministers then in England agreed, and the proposals now before the House are exactly in accordance with that suggestion. There seems to be some misapprehension in regard to the admiralty's proposals. Conservative members and the Conservative press speak as if the British admiralty suggested a course that had not been carried out by this government. That is not so. I understand that these objections are based on the fact that the British admiralty asked first a direct contribution or the establishment of a fleet unit consisting of a Dreadnought and auxiliaries. A careful perusal of the blue-book shows how closely the present proposal harmonizes with the admiralty's suggestion. The blue-book says:

As regards Canada, it was considered that her double sea-board rendered the provisions of a fleet unit of the same kind unsuitable for the present.

The reason for this must be obvious. A fleet unit to be any good must remain intact, and how can it remain together if it is to be stationed on the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts? To divide it would destroy the object sought and the British admiralty saw the position we were in. Knowing that to create and maintain two units would be beyond the financial position of Canada, they wisely determined to adopt an alternative course:

It was proposed, according to the amount of money that might be available, that Canada should make a start with cruisers of the 'Bristol' class and destroyers of an improved river class—a part to be stationed on the Atlantic sea-board and a part on the Pacific.

The principle of making a start was here clearly laid down:

Canada and Australia preferred to lay the foundations of fleet units of their own.

The scheme now submitted to the House by the Prime Minister is exactly upon these lines. Canada is making a start, and is making that start not only with the approval of but on the direct lines recommended by the admiralty. I think this reaches the objection raised by the opposition to the non-establishment of a fleet unit. As further evidence that the admiralty approved and recognized Canada's action, I refer to page 24, where it is said:

While laying the foundations of future Dominion navies to be maintained in different parts of the empire, these forces would contribute immediately and materially to the requirements of imperial defence....A simple contribution of money or material may be to one Dominion the most acceptable form in which to assist in imperial defence. Another while ready to provide local naval forces, and to place them at the disposal of the Crown in the event of war, may wish to lay the foundations upon which a future navy of its own could be raised.

I think this should be sufficient to dispose of the suggestion that Canada's action is contrary to the wishes of the admiralty. At page 24 of the report I find:

The main duty of the forthcoming conference as regards naval defence will be, therefore, to determine the form in which the various Dominion governments can best participate in the burden of imperial defence with due regard to varying political and geographical conditions. Looking to the difficulties involved, it is not to be expected that the discussions with the several Defence Ministers will result in a complete and final scheme of naval defence, but it is hoped that it will be found possible to formulate the broad principles upon which the growth of colonial naval forces should be fostered. While laying the foundations of future Dominion navies to be maintained in different parts of the empire, these forces would contribute immediately and materially to the requirements of imperial defence.

In the opinion of the admiralty, a Dominion government desirous of creating a navy should aim at forming a distinct fleet unit; and the smallest unit is one which, while manageable in time of peace, is capable of being used in its component parts in time of war.

Then at page 25 of the conference blue-book, we find:

It has been recognized that in time of war the local naval forces should come under the general direction of the admiralty.

This clearly contemplates that the navy should remain under local control in time of peace.

Great Britain cannot go to war without the consent of the British parliament; Canada cannot go to war without the consent of the Canadian parliament. In both cases they are co-equal. Why not?

Mr. HUGHES. May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. McALLISTER. Oh, yes.

Mr. HUGHES. I won't ask it, if he gives permission in that manner.

Mr. McALLISTER. Well, yes, Sir.

Mr. HUGHES. Can Canada declare war?

Mr. McALLISTER. She can if the cabinet says so. What more do you want?

Mr. HUGHES. She can not.

Mr. McALLISTER. Very good. That's some more information I have got. As was stated by the Prime Minister, and as cannot be denied, when Britain is at war, Canada is at war. It follows as a sequence that parliament would give the necessary authority to pass the Canadian navy into the control of the imperial power should such a misfortune occur—and I must say that I do not see that there is any need of it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I announce myself as supporting the policy of the government because I am convinced that it has the approval of the imperial authorities—that is the principal thing—and also for the reason that the Bill under discussion is made with due regard to our constitutional rights and privileges, which it is our first duty as representatives of the people to maintain and protect.

I have listened, as I said, with a great deal of care and attention to the speakers who have preceded me. I am going to read you a synopsis of what I think the most important speeches made during the debate. The hon. member for St. Anne (Mr Doherty) thought that the time for Canada to establish a navy was when she had a voice in imperial foreign affairs. The hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. McGrath) would make a contribution of ten millions to Britain spread over a few years —whatever that may mean. The hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. S. Sharpe) wanted a Canadian navy as outlined by the government increased to the extent of two Dreadnoughts, and this should be done without delay. The hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) would give two Dreadnoughts at once to Britain and submit the question of establishing a Canadian navy to the people. The hon. member for Huron announced that, in view of the policy of the government, he would support Mr. Borden's amendment, though he might not be in favour of it. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), the alleged leader of the Conservative party in Quebec, advocated no contribution of vessels, money or anything else. The hon. member for Souris (Mr. Schaffner) said he was in favour of one navy, an imperial navy, and Canada should contribute to it but have no control over it. The hon. member for Victoria and Haliburton advocated doing a big thing. Entering into an obligation to provide half a dozen Dreadnoughts would, he said, meet with his approval. The hon. member for Huron would give to England, would pay the interest on a sufficient sum to enable that country to spend $50,000,000 in Dreadoughts, then there would be a navy to lend to Canada in case of emergency.

Mr. T. CHISHOLM. I am sure the hon. member will allow me to correct him. I never suggested hiring Dreadnoughts or anything of that kind. Perhaps the hon. gentleman misunderstood me, or perhaps he was not in the House when I spoke.

Mr. McALLISTER. I may have the wrong constituency down. What constituency does the hon. member (Mr. T. Chisholm represent?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Huron.

Mr. McALLISTER. There are two or three Hurons. Evidently the hon. gentleman does not represent the right Huron. The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Roche) believed that Canada should give two Dreadoughts at once or the equivalent in money. So I could go on and read half a dozen more. But I have read enough, Mr. Speaker, to show you the diversity of opinion on the opposite side of the House. I can assure these hon. gentlemen that there is no diversity of opinion on this side. I would suggest that the hon. gentlemen go into caucus and to sing that good old song:

> Why do we wait, dear brothers?
> Why do we wrangle so long?
> If we don't get together in one policy,
> We'll be hungry ever so long.

But we on this side, join with sweet accord, under the wise and ever-seeing eye of the Prime Minister of the Dominion of Canada, in favour of a Canadian navy built in Canada; we are in favour of a Canadian navy, built in Canada by Canadian people; of a Canadian navy, built in Canada by Canadian people with Canadian money; of a Canadian navy, built in Canada by Canadian people with Canadian money, under local control in time of peace and imperial control in time of war.

Mr. JOHN HERRON (Macleod). The hon. member for Kings and Albert (Mr. McAllister) accused hon. members on this side of favouring a navy for imperialism and protection. I am prepared to admit that hon. members on that side have no desire for protection or they would not put faith in this Canadian tin-pot navy they propose. Rising at this time to address the House on this important question, I feel that I owe the House an apology for taking up time at this stage of the debate. I would not do so but for the fact that the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) alluded to myself, with some other hon. members on this side of the House, in his first speech after the opening of parliament this year as having gone back on our position of last March as expressed by the resolution passed by this House unanimously at that time in regard to helping the British empire in what seemed at that time to be a crisis in naval supremacy. I did not altogether approve of that resolution when it passed the House, but I was present when it was passed and am prepared to take my share of the responsibility for anything that was wrong in that resolution, even of anything I objected to at that time. The reasons why we let that resolution go through unanimously have been very well explained by previous speakers. This matter has been dealt with very thoroughly by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), and several other hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. So I will not take up time to discuss that phase of the question. But, having been present, I am prepared, as I have said, to take my share of responsibility. I would have stood by that resolution, and intended to stand by it, and did stand by it until after our delegates returned from the imperial conference last summer. But at a reception tendered to them on their return to this country the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) gave a synopsis of what had been done in the old country, and expressed great faith in this idea of political autonomy. In stating what had been done at the conference he said they had agreed upon a Canadian navy. I gathered from reading his address that it was either by extraordinary strategy or else by threats or force that Canada had wrested from Great Britain her political autonomy. This idea of political autonomy seems to me a mania with hon. members on the other side. They talk about it, and how we have practically wrested it from Great Britain by force or otherwise. I have never heard of Britain trying to prevent us from exercising the full powers vested in us under our constitution, until I heard hon. members on the other side talk as they did. As I have said, I intended to stand by that resolution, and would have done so but for the reasons I have stated. They compare their Naval Bill with the resolution of last March and accuse us of going back on the resolution which we unanimously supported last session. According to that resolution a navy was to be built, but it was to be built immediately, and to act in co-operation with the British navy, whereas the navy proposed by this government is not to be any part or parcel or to have anything to do with the British navy, so that on that score I do not think that this Bill in any way attempts to carry out the resolution unanimously passed last March. The navy then contemplated was to fly the British flag, but I understand there is quite a question to-day as to what flag we are to fly on our navy when built.

As regards employing our own labour and our own material, while I admit that we have the material in this country to build a navy and the brawn and the brains, while we have mechanics and labouring men just as capable, if properly directed, as any in the old country, our experience in the past has not been such as to give our people any confidence in the capability of our Marine and Fisheries Department to build a navy with any efficiency or economy. The report of the investigation into that department has not been assuring in any degree to the people, and consequently we may well hesitate in trusting that same department with the building of a Canadian navy. There is another assertion which I am prepared to make regarding the administration of that department. The other day I listened to a debate on the estimates between my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) and the Minister of Public Works with reference to a dredge which was built last year, in which the Minister of Public Works denied a statement made by the hon. member for East Grey, although I think the minister only cleared himself by a technicality. For my part, I am going to make this statement on a rumour which I believe to be well founded, and if it should turn out to be untrue, I am prepared to apologize to the House and withdraw. Within the last year or year and a half, the Marine and Fisheries Department built a dredge in the docks at Sorel, which cost in the neighbourhood of $200,000. After it was launched, they started putting in machinery and anchors and chains, and the vessel would have sunk to the bottom of the river, before even a pound of coal was put into it, if she had not been taken hold of with grappling irons. She was returned to the dock, and is there now getting a false bottom put into her. I have that statement on good authority, and I would like to have any minister, speaking for the Department of Marine and Fisheries, state whether it is true or not. Things of that kind and the other things we all know of that department are not reassuring to the people and not calculated to give them confidence in entrusting the building of a Canadian navy to that department. Not only would there in all likelihood be a great waste of money, but the lives of the crews, British subjects and Canadian citizens would not be safe in a navy built by these gentlemen.

As regards the cost of construction, that has been estimated all the way from $11,000,000, up to $16,000,000 or $17,000,000, and the cost of maintenance has been estimated at any amount by hon. gentlemen opposite from three to seven million dollars a year, but I doubt very much whether these estimates come any way near the probable cost of this navy. If the estimate of the Prime Minister is not any closer to the actual cost than was his estimate of the cost of the Transcontinental railroad, we may safely say that within the first five years this navy will cost us $100,000,000. In all probability in the first five years it will cost this country as much as would build the Hudson bay railway, and within fifteen years we shall have spent more on it than would build the Hudson Bay railway and the Georgian Bay canal combined. And if we were to spend the money on these two enterprises we will have them completed and doing most useful work for Canada, whereas the Canadian navy, when completed, will be but a very useless piece of machinery.

We have heard a great deal regarding whether there is an emergency or not, especially at present. It is pretty hard for us here to give an accurate estimate of the conditions in the old world, and we have had quotations read to us from speeches made by the British prime minister and members of his cabinet during the recent election. Well, I have not very much faith in statements made at elections in the old country any more than in this country, but the leader of the home government and Sir Edward Grey, the Colonial Secretary, and I think the Chief Lord of the Admiralty, made statements before the colonial conference last June contrary to those made during the recent election campaign. I have far more faith in the statements they made before the imperial conference. They impressed the delegates with the idea that there was an emergency, that Britain was strained to the utmost to meet them, and they called most emphatically on the colonies to give any aid they could to the empire. I would not hesitate to say that it is right for this government to build dockyards.

I know nothing about a situation of that nature, but I believe it to be perfectly right for the government to encourage mercantile ship-building, employ our own labour and use our own materials. In two or three years, say after a general election, after the people have had time to consider the building of this navy, after calm and cool reflection, and after we have the dockyard ready, let us then decide whether we shall have a Canadian navy or not. When the people have had a chance to pronounce upon the question, if their verdict should be favourable, and if we find that we have the men, material and capacity necessary to such an enterprise, I would say: Go on and build the navy. But, by all means, give the people who are going to pay for this navy a chance to express their opinion with regard to it. No one party or government should determine whether we should enter into this enormous expenditure for the building of a navy, but I think that the people who are going to pay for it should have the right to a voice in the matter and should be given the opportunity of saying whether they are going to have a navy or not. If this navy that we are proposing to build was going to be part of the British navy and was going to meet an emergency, I would be prepared to make any sacrifice and take the responsibility upon myself of voting for it, but at the present time I do not feel like doing so. With reference to the cost, I mentioned what the government figures are in connection with the navy that they propose to build. I noticed that the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat said that what is proposed by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition in his amendment is to contribute $25,000,000 or $30,000,000 to Great Britain as the price of two Dreadnoughts. I listened with a great deal of interest to the statements of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House who went to a great deal of trouble to establish the correct figures, and their estimate was that the price of two Dreadnoughts would be about $19,000,000. I would be prepared to say that if we could build them for $19,000,000 or $20,000,000, or even $25,000,000, I would be in favour of the proposition, because I would like that whatever we do for the British navy may be well done, and that if we build Dreadnoughts for Britain we will build ships that are able to go into the front of the fighting line. With reference to the question as to whether an emergency exists or not, I would like to read to the House a portion of a letter received by me from one of my constituents last November, just after the House met. If the House will allow me, I would like to read the extract from this letter and to withhold the name of the man who wrote it. If any one on the other side of the House wishes to see the letter, I will be pleased to hand it over to him. The writer of this letter is a German by birth and served as an officer in the German army. He says:

Now, as you know, I came from that nation which has caused that justifiable scare in England, and, therefore, I know something of my old Fatherland, its spirit of patriotism and also its coasts along the North Sea. Should the time ever come when the German people felt strong enough and felt that they had a justifiable cause to attack England at sea, the attack will be so swift and so sudden and the results so decisive, either one way or the other that it would be childish to think of sending for the 'political fleet' of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. You must be aware that owing to the natural conditions around England, should she lose this first battle, and her ports blockaded, starvation and surrender would be the end of this war, while on the other hand, Germany is far more favourably situated. So in face of these facts it is the merest hypocrisy for any honest Canadian to talk of having a navy of our own for the purpose of helping England. The Monroe doctrine up to now has been the fighting asset to which the Liberal government has pointed with pride to defend our shores. Why now a Canadian navy? Time and again in the past Britain has sent her cruisers to protect single individuals in foreign countries, and we, up to now, have not paid one cent for this protection (more shame to us). We should now make a start to maintain this fleet. If the utterances of our public men, of loyalty and devotion to the flag are not a screen behind which they pick the rate-payer's pockets, then by all means let us send our contribution in cash. Then we will know our money is spent in an honest and efficient manner, which we could never expect under the government proposal.

These are the views of a naturalized German. How much more strongly should a born Briton feel on the subject.

I would commend this opinion to those hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House who have been so emphatic in the declaration that there is no naval scare and no need of Canada doing anything at the present time. I promised that I would only speak for a few moments and I am about done. I would like to see the amendment proposed by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition put through, the Navy Bill thrown on the scrap heap for the present, and an appeal made to the people, whom you will find British to the core. 'One King, one flag and one British navy,' is good enough for me.

Mr. JOSEPH TURCOTTE (Quebec County). (Translation). Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to participate at any length in the debate that is now in progress and I intend to be as clear and methodical as possible in the few remarks I have to make. When the time comes, after the speeches have been delivered, to read the resolutions or the motions which are before the House, you will first take up, Sir, the resolution brought down by the government and then the amendments moved by the two factions which sit at the left. This will bring us back to the sitting of February 3rd last, over a month ago. You will then read No. 43 of the Votes and Proceedings, which contains the following:

Sir Wilfrid Laurier moved, That the Bill No. 95, An Act respecting the Naval Service of Canada, be now read the second time.

Mr. Borden moved in amendment thereto, That all the words after the word 'That' be left out, and the following substituted therefor:—'the proposals of the government do not follow the suggestions and recommendations of the admiralty and in so far as they empower the government to withhold the naval forces of Canada from of the empire in time of war are ill-advised and dangerous.

'That no such proposals can safely be accepted unless they thoroughly ensure unity of organization and of action without which there can be no effective co-operation in any common scheme of empire defence.

'That the said proposals while necessitating heavy outlay for construction and maintenance will give no immediate or effective aid to the empire, and no adequate or satisfactory results to Canada.

'That in the meantime the immediate duty of Canada and the impending necessities of the empire can best be discharged and met by placing without delay at the disposal of the imperial authorities as a free and loyal contribution from the people of Canada such an amount as may be sufficient to purchase or construct two battleships or armoured cruisers of the latest Dreadnought type, giving to the admiralty full discretion to expend the said sum at such time and for such purposes of naval defence as in their judgment may best serve to increase the united strength of the empire and thus assure its peace and security.'

And a Debate arising thereon;

Mr. Monk moved in amendment to the proposed amendment, That all the words after the word 'That' be struck out and the following substituted therefor: 'this House, while declaring its unalterable devotion to the British Crown, is of opinion that the Bill now submitted for its consideration, changes the relations of Canada with the empire, and ought, in consequence, to be submitted to the Canadian people, in order to obtain at one the Nation's opinion by means of a plebiscite.'

And the Debate continuing;

As will be seen, there is first the main motion in connection with the second reading of the Bill and then the two amendments. As under the parliamentary rule, the vote has to be first taken on the amendment to the amendments, I am going to consider it first.

The hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) says in his amendment that the Bill now under consideration changes the relations of Canada with the empire and that is the reason why he is of the opinion that the question ought to be submitted to the people.

Sir, there is in that phraseology something incomprehensible. It is stated that this Bill changes the relations of Canada with the empire. What is the empire referred to by my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier, and how could you submit in such a shape to the Canadian people a question so imperfectly worded? Canada is part of the empire and how could the relations of Canada with herself be changed? After the resolution of the 29th of March last had been adopted, the public press took hold of the question and discussed it, not from the standpoint of the Bill now under consideration, which is of purely administrative order, but in order to determine the course which the government should adopt as to future armaments with regard to their naval forces. I conceive that, strictly speaking, a question worded could be submitted to the people for consideration. But the Bill under discussion contains no clause which suggests more orders remotely, that the government has the intention of modifying the existing order of things with regard to Great Britain; or if there exists any change, it tends not to increase the responsibilities of Canada to England, but on the contrary, to restrict them. This is precisely what I wish to point out in a few words, by comparing in a summary way the proposed Act with the Act now in force.

Before going to the bottom of the question, I wish to remind the House that after the resolution of the 29th of March, 1909, had been adopted, the public press started an agitation in a small way and criticisms came out gradually. A series of articles on the question have appeared on the matter in a magazine called 'Revue Franco-Américane.' Those articles were later on published in pamphlet form under the title of 'The naval defence of the British empire. The gentleman who wrote that phamplet is the founder, the creator of the so-called nationalist party, a party whose field of action does not extend over the whole of Canada, but is restricted to the province of Quebec. His name is Oliver Asselin. That gentleman is now campaigning with my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk). They share the same ideas and are identified with the same work, their aim being to compel the government, if possible, to grant a plebiscite. Sir, that pamphlet, dated May, 1909, I find (page 10) the following:

I know very well that newspapers of different political shades disagree or pretend to disagree on the true bearing of the vote in the House of Commons. According to some, Canada would have once more evaded her duty as a British colony, owing to the attitude taken by the French Canadian who is now at the head of affairs. Others pretend that with the agreement and practically on the invitation of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the Canadian parliament has completely changed the directing principle of our relations with the mother country.

The same writer adds this commentary, after having expressed the latter view.

The second interpretation is not absolutely fair either. As early as 1884, Sir John Macdonald made, in London, in the name of the Canadian people similar declarations to those just adhered to by our parliament. He said:

I vouch for the loyalty of Canada. I believe that her best interests depend on her union with the greatest empire in the world. I think that the policy of Great Britain is opposed to any offensive war, and I am satisfied that the people of Canada are ready to assume their share of the responsibility and of expenditure in any other war.

The writer quotes also another opinion advanced in 1886 by the same statesman, Sir John A. Macdonald, as follows:—

As to imperial federation, says the 'Times' he agrees that it is necessary.

He believes that, owing to the growth of the sister-nations of Australia, Canada and South Africa, the present relations, however smooth and agreeable they may be, could not continue indefinitely. As these auxiliary nations grow in the wealth and population, they will have to assume heavier responsibilities. In the name of the Canadian conferation, he may state that Canada is ready to join with the mother country in an offensive and defensive league; that she is ready to sacrifice her last man and her last shilling, for the defence of the empire and of the British flag.

When it is known that in any quarrel or conflict with England, ten million Australians and ten million Canadians will have to be reckoned with, who increased every year in number, the other nations will think twice before declaring war.

As will be seen, this is no new policy. It was already in vogue under the Conservative régime. It was the doctrine preached by the leader of the Conservative party over a quarter of a century ago. Consequently, there is very little change.

Let me now substantiate those statements by comparing the provisions of the Act now in force and those of Bill* (No. 95) which we are asked to adopt and which is destined to be substituted to the former.

Here is in brief the history of this Bill. The first Militia and Defence Act passed in 1868, deals with the organization and control of the land forces and the naval forces. That legislation was revised in 1883 and now forms chapter 41 of the Revised Statutes of Canada of 1886. In 1904, they extracted from chapter 41 of the Revised Statutes all the provisions relating to the land forces and the Department of Militia and Defence was created. The moment that such portion of the provisions concerning the land forces has been abstracted from the Revised Statutes of 1886, chapter 41, this Act and the economy of this measure tend to create the constitutional order of things, as concerns the naval forces exclusively. But there is this strange anomaly, that in order to find out anything relating to the organization of our naval forces, you have to look for it in that Act which deals mostly with the organization of our land militia. That accounts for this fact, that after the imperial conferences of 1902 and 1907, when the question of naval defence was brought under discussion, the Canadian government deemed it their duty to themselves and to the public as well as to the representatives of the sister-nations gathered in London and to the mother country itself to pass a new law, applying exclusively to the navy. Consequently, one of the hon. ministers who was then taking part in that conference and whose absence we all deplore to-day, the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) was authorized to prepare a Bill which is the very one we are discussing. When I say that we regret the absence of the hon. Mr. Brodeur, I do not mean simply to refer to the illness which, through a decree of Providence, removes him from our midst, but I say so, in the interest of the House itself and of the whole country. I sincerely believe that it is a misfortune in the debate that is now going on, that we should be deprived of the presence of the man who, by his clear sightedness, his science and his experience could have enlightened and guided us in the discussion of a measure which he had himself prepared and on which he had bestowed the best of his intelligence and of his soul.

Compelled as we are by circumstances, we have to do ourselves the work which the minister himself, no doubt, would have done. Therefore, I have tried to compare the two Acts in order to find out anything that might be new, from the standpoint of principles, and even of the letter of the law, between the Act existing in the Revised Statutes which is in force to-day and the Bill under discussion. I may say that, to my mind, there is no difference, except as to the form, and there is none as to the substance itself. I think I may prove it in this way

Of course, the title of the Act is changed. It was formerly the Militia and Defence Act; it will be in the future the Naval Service Act.

Clause 2 contains the definition of 'emergency' is but the reproduction of clause 79 of the Revised Statutes, the terms are absolutely similar; 'emergency' in this Bill, meaning war, invasion or insurrection, real or apprehended. The word 'deputy minister' in the Bill, section 2 (c) is but the clause of the old Act.

The expression 'active service' or 'duty' is used in the same sense as in clause 79 already quoted. And so forth.

Clause 3 is the same as paragraph 2 of clause 2 of the old Act. In short, under the heading 'definitions' in this Bill the terms used are similar to those of the old Act, except that the word 'navy' is to be substituted to the word 'militia,' as may be seen by comparing the clauses of both Acts.

Interpretation.

2. In this Act, and in any regulations made hereunder, unless the context otherwise requires,—

(a) 'Active service,' as applied to a person in the naval forces, means service or duty during an emergency;

(b) 'Department' means the Department of Marine and Fisheries;

(c) 'Deputy Minister" means the Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries;

(d) 'emergency' means war, invasion or insurrection, real or apprehended;

(e) 'general orders' means orders and instructions issued to the naval forces by the authority of the Minister;

(f) 'Minister' means the Minister of Marine and Fisheries;

(g) 'naval establishment' includes officers' quarters, barracks, dockyards, victualling yards, naval yards, factories, rifle and gun ranges, naval colleges, and all other buildings, works and premises under the control of the minister, constructed or set apart for the naval service;

(h) 'naval forces' means those naval forces organized for the defence and protection of the Canadian coasts and trade, or engaged as the Governor in Council may from time to time direct;

(i) 'naval service' includes His Majesty's service in respect of all naval affairs of which by this act the minister is given the control and management, and also the fisheries protection service, hydrographic survey and wireless telegraph service;

(j) 'officer' includes commissioned, warrant and subordinate officers serving in the naval service of Canada, but not petty officers so serving;

(k) 'prescribed' means prescribed by this act or by regulations made thereunder;

(l) 'regulations' means regulations made by the Governor in Council under the authority of this act;

(m) 'seaman' includes petty officers, seamen and all other persons engaged in the naval service of Canada, other than officers;

(n) 'on service' means when called upon for the performance of any duties other than those specified as active service.

3. The interpretation act and section 2 of this act shall apply to all regulations, orders and articles of engagement made or entered into under this act.

Clause 4 differs from clause 3 of the old Act in this that to-day it is the King who, by the force of circumstances, has the supreme command, instead of the Queen, as under the old Act.

The word 'minister' in sections 5 and 6 of the new Act, means the Minister of Marine, instead of the Minister of Militia, as formerly.

Section 7 provides that there should be appointed an officer, not lower in rank than rear-admiral, to be called the director of the naval service of Canada. A similar provision is found in section 37 of the old Act.

Secton 8 provides for the appointment of a naval board. This is a new provision.

Section 9 is similar to clause 28 of the Act of 1886, and provides for the appointment of a permanent naval force.

Section 10 is a reproduction of clause 22.

Section 11, concerning the rank and authority of officers of the naval force is similar to clauses 48 and 49 of the old Act.

Section 12 relates to the commissions of officers. It is similar to article 42.

Section 13 refers to relief from duty and retirement from the naval force. It is clause 15 of the old Act.

Section 14 relates to conditions of discharge from the service at the expiration of the time of service. Similar provisions are to be found in clauses 79 and 80.

Sections 15 and 16 deal with the uniforms and equipment of officers of the naval service. This section is similar to clauses 51 and 52 of the old Act.

Section 17 is a reproduction of clause 78, while section 18 is similar to clause 79 of the old Act.

In connection with this section 78, which provides that in case of an emergency, the Governor in Council may place at the disposal of His Majesty for general service in the Royal Navy, the naval service or any part thereof, it is proper to remark that the new section restricts and lessens the obligations and responsibilities which devolved on Canada under the old Act.

Although under the Milltia Act of 1904, the land militia is not to be called out to serve beyond Canada, section 70, which is now the law in force, enacts that the Governor General may place the militia on active service anywhere in Canada and also beyond Canada, at any time when it appears advisable so to do by reason of emergency, in case of war, invasion or insurrection, real or apprehended, and the militiamen called out for active service are required to serve at least during a period of one year. Doubtless the present law, in empowering the Governor in Council to place at the disposal of His Majesty the naval forces or any part thereof, improves considerably the nature of our obligations; for, according to the theory developed by my hon. friend from Quebec Centre (Mr. Lachance), who has thoroughly mastered this question, the Act of 1886 clearly gives to the King, without the participation of the Canadian ministers, the right of directly, commanding the Governor General, his representative, to place the navy at the disposal of the admiralty, while the proposed Act requires the intervention of the Governor in Council and the ratification of parliament. Such is the essential difference between the old Act and the proposed legislation. Therefore, there is no change in the relations between Canada and the mother country, or rather I should say that the proposed legislation constitutes a material improvement.

Section 19 is new. It provides that if parliament is not in session, a proclamation shall issue for the meeting of parliament within the fifteen days following the action taken by the Governor in Council, should he, in case of an emergency, place the Canadian fleet at the disposal of the admiralty.

The other night, as the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) was not in his seat, I asked the hon. member for l'Islet (Mr. Paquet) what he meant to do, should the people be called upon to express their opinion by a plebiscite, approve of the proposed legislation including section 18. He told me, not without some hesitation, that he would consult his conscience and that if he could not make up his mind to vote in favour of this Act, he would bid adieu to public life.

I may here remark that the very same gentlemen who in this House and outside of it, advocate a plebiscite, have already decided, as shown by their statements and their acts, to undertake a campaign in the rural centres in order to inflame public prejudices and induce the electors to vote against this legislation. They are acting very unfairly and they remind me of those misers who, when you ask them to contribute to some good work, plead as an excuse that they have nothing to do with such work and then they refer you to their wives. But before the solicitor has had time to see the wife of the miser, he has already directed her to give nothing. Such is the rather mean position taken by the advocates of a plebiscite. They only aim at embarrassing the government, in order to climb into power.

Sections 20, 21 and 22 of this Bill, concerning the naval reserve, are an exact copy of clauses 12, 116, and 80 of the old Act.

Section 23 is a modification of clause 69.

As to section 24, it is declaratory, in so far as it enacts a principle of common law, namely, that the King is the owner of everything that is appropriated to the use of the navy.

Sections 25, which provides for the notice of all general orders issued to the naval forces in a copy of clauses 119 and 120.

Section 26 is textually clause 121.

Section 27 gives the Governor General the discretionary power to transfer to and from the naval service, any vessel belonging to His Majesty. The old Act contained no similar provision, as there were no fighting ships.

The provision of section 28 is taken from the Revised Statutes of Canada of 1906, chapter 111, which was itself borrowed from chapter 71 of the Revised Statutes of 1886.

Sections 29 and 30 provide for the creation of a naval volunteer force. It is a condensation of sections 12, 26, 27 and 30 of the Act of 1886, with this improvement, that enrolment or drafting by ballot, that scarecrow of Canadian families, is done away with.

Section 31 enacts that the Governor General may make regulations. It is a copy of clauses 116 and 117.

Section 32 which is a condensation of clauses 13 and 14 of the Act of 1886, provides for the engagement and discharge of naval volunteers.

Section 33 contains a provision analagous to the provisions of clauses 56, 60 and 81. This section 60 of the Act of 1886 calls for special consideration. It reads as follows:

Her Majesty may order officers and men of the naval militia, or of any detachment of such militia, to drill or train for a period of not more than sixteen days and not less than eight days in each year.

That is proof conclusive that the fathers of confederation, since that clause is found in the Militia Act of 1868, had already in contemplation the organization of a naval department for military purposes.

Section 34 is a reproduction of clause 79 in its first part, and a copy of clauses 80 and 81 for the second part. It refers to active service in the case of an emergency.

Section 35 should be read in conjunction with clause 13 of this Act. By comparing both clauses, one finds that the Governor in Council, under section 13, may at any time relieve from duty any officer or seaman, and that under section 35, the minister is given a similar power. It may be supposed that, under certain circumstances, it would be desirable that the minister should exercise that right, in a case of emergency.

Sections 36, 37, 38 and 39 are new enactments. They are printed in italics and show that the government is anxious to reward the brave servants of the state, the maimed soldiers, the old seamen, the invalids who are entitled to the protection of the state which they have faithfully served. I do not suppose that our hon. friends opposite would feel like insisting on a plebiscite before voting such pensions.

Sections 40, 41, 42, 43 and 44 provide for the establishment of a naval college, with similar provisions to those governing the military college of Kingston.

Sections 45, 46 and 47 are almost an exact copy of clauses 116, 117 and 126.

Sections 48 enacts that the provisions of the Acts of the United Kingdom shall apply. Its wording is similar to that of section 82 of the Act of 1806.

Section 49 enacts certain penalties for desertion. It is the old article 109.

Sections 50, 51 and 52 provide for the execution of warrants and sentences and for the incarceration of prisoners sentenced to imprisonment in the common jail, in the penitentiary or any other prison or place of confinement, as the case may be.

Finally, section 53, which is the last, repeats chapter 41 of the Revised Statutes of 1886.

Such is the analysis which I deemed it my duty to undertake, to show that there is nothing new in this Bill 95 which is but copy, with slight changes, of the Militia Act now in force; whence I infer that the statement made by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier that this Act aimed at changing the relations of Canada with the empire is not grounded on facts and exists only in his imagination.

But this Act, we are told, you are not going to be content with placing it on the statute-book; you are going to enforce it by creating a navy. True, we are going to create that navy, in spite of the criticisms of the hon. gentlemen opposite. But let us see what is to be the immediate effect of that lgislation. If I look at the estimates for 1910-1911, what do I see as the outcome of this legislation? I find that we are invited to vote a sum of $3,000,000 for the naval service, including the purchase, construction and maintenance and upkeep of dockyards at Esquimault and Halifax and the establishment and maintenance of training schools.

Granting that the proposed legislation which hon. gentlemen wish to submit to the electorate entails this immediate consequence provided for in the estimates a vote of $3,000,000 for the naval service, I confess that I do not understand the objections raised by those who oppose the Bill. I should like to know where is the man of common sense who could pretend that this legislation, even with the consequence I have just pointed out is going to modify the relations of Canada with England? I do not think that any man endowed with an average intelligence would find that even the practical enforcement of this Bill could warrant such a statement as the one I have just referred to, namely, that our relations with the mother country would undergo a change.

I have shown beyond the shadow of a doubt that those three million dollars could be voted and spent for the same purposes, even should we not pass this legislation. All we should have to do would be to invoke the provisions of the Revised Statutes of 1886, chapter 41, which is the law in force. Both Acts produce the same effects; the Act in force and the proposed legislation are identical as to the power conferred.

Hon. gentlemen opposite are no doubt going to say that they do not oppose the passing of this Bill, seeing that it is, with a few slight changes, similar to the Militia Act, but that they are opposed to voting these estimates. Well, my answer is: that 'Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof.' Wait till the estimates are voted and then you may urge objections as you see fit, and so each question will be settled in the proper time.

They will urge all the same, that the people is entitled to have a voice in the matter, although we have the power to pass this Bill and these estimates. In my opinion, Sir, we should not at this moment, hold such popular consultation as suggested. It is neither our right nor our duty, as representatives of the people who are here, not as holders of an imperative mandate, but of a general mandate.

I say that we have neither the right nor the duty to try to elude, so to say, our responsibility and our oath of office and to saddle with such responsibility the electors of this country who are not in a position to investigate those questions. If, as representatives of the people, we have not the power to legislate, even when we are satisfied that we are acting in the interest of the people, then I say that, in many circumstances, we should have to abdicate our rights and privileges and what is the very essence of constitutional government, and all that, in the sole view of creating an agitation in the popular mind.

In this connection, I may say that other important issues have come under discussion in the past, but the most considerable debate was the one that took place, at the time of confederation. If I trace this question back to its origin, in 1865, I am but quoting a page of history well worth reading and which affords as good food for thought as the one we are now writing. To-day, we have the honour and the privilege of being called upon to solve a question of vital importance, which was already foreshadowed at the time of confederation.

When they met together in view of bringing about the federation of the province, the fathers of confederation aimed at remiting those scattered provinces, so as to create a common entity and a great empire, a powerful nation on this American continent; they foresaw that such an agglomeration under one government, would result in developing the wealth and all the resources of the country, in increasing the nucleous of population and in making the people contented, happy and respected not only in America but in the whole world.

It was on the 3rd February, 1865—and there is here a coincidence of dates, since this debate was opened on the 3rd of February—that the debate on confederation began. Consulting the 'Debates on Confederation' I find that Sir Ettiene Pascal Taché, who was then prime minister, proposed that great union of the British provinces and colonies. There was an amendment moved by Mr. James S. Currie. But let us first read the resolution moved by Sir Etienne Pascal Taché, who was also Minister of Militia and a French Canadian prime minister, as the present leader of this House. It was Taché who moved in the legislative council the motion I am going to read:

That an humble address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She may be graciously pleased to cause a measure to be submitted to the imperial parliament for the purpose of uniting the colonies of Canada, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island in one government, with provisions based on the following resolutions, which were adopted at a conference of delegates from the said colonies, held at the city of Quebec, on the 10th of October, 1864.

On the 17th of February, Mr. Currie moved the following amendment:

That upon a matter of such great importance as the purposed confederation of this and certain other British colonies, this House is unwilling to assume the responsibility of assenting to a measure involving so many important considerations, without further manifestation of the public will than has yet been declared.

Here then, we have our legislative councillors of 1865, under United Canada, moving on such an important issue, an amendment involving an appeal to the people, as to-day, and what was the result? The House divided on the amendment, which was negatived by thirty-two against nineteen.

On the same day, the 3rd February, in the legislative assembly, the Hon. John A. Macdonald, attorney general, moved the following:

That an address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She may be graciously pleased to cause a measure to be submitted to the imperial parliament, at its next sesion, for the purpose of uniting the colonies in one government, with provisions based on the resolutions which were adopted at the conference held in the city of Quebec, on the 10th of October last.

There was an amendment moved by J. H. Cameron as follows:

That all the words after 'That' be left out, and the following inserted instead thereof: 'an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General praying that His Excellency, in view of the magnitude of the interests involved in the resolutions for the union of the colonies of British North America, and the entire change of the constitution of this province, will be pleased to direct that a constitutional appeal shall be made to the people, before these resolutions are submitted for final action thereon to the consideration of the imperial parliament.

The House again divided on the above amendment asking for an appeal to the people and the result was: 35 for and 84 against.

Let me quote the opinion of Sir John A. Macdonald, who was then attorney general for Upper Canada, stating the grounds on which he was opposed to such an appeal to the people. He said:

> And no man who values representative government would consent to sit here under a less extensive commission—no man will get up and disclaim the possession of such powers. But my honourable friend says we can only pass resolutions, and cannot change our constitution, except by addressing the Sovereign, praying Her to give them effect through the imperial parliament; and he argues from this that we ought to go to the people and have a new parliament to do it. A new parliament can, however, do nothing more than we can do. Sir, I believe in my conscience that this House, more than any House since 1841, represents truly and faithfully the people of Canada. If the members of this House do not represent the country—all its interests, classes, and communities—it never has been represented. I believe that all classes and interests are represented here; but if the House votes for this motion, it declares that it does not represent them. If we represent the people of Canada, then, in the words of constitutional Act, we are here to pass laws for the peace, welfare and good government of the country. But if we do not represent the people of Canada—if we declare so by passing this resolution—then what great criminals have we been in the past! If we do not represent them, then we have no power to pass one single Bill and declare it to be law, even although it be a Bill to establish a saw-mill. If we do not represent them, we have a right to see for them, to think for them, to act for them; we have a right to go to the foot of the Throne and declare that we believe it to be for the peace, welfare and good government of the people of Canada to form of these provinces one empire, presenting an unbroken and undaunted front to every foe; and if we do not think we have this right, we are unworthy of the commission we have received from the people of Canada.

Such was the opinion of a man who has played an important part in our political world.

I think that upon that occasion, as on every other occasion, the principle which was laid down, agreed to the members of the day, and ratified at the subsequent elections, was the true principle of constitutional government under which we live.

Mr. Speaker, I have but a few words to add. As to the appeal to the people, I say that it is uncalled for, because the proposed policy is not new; because there is no change in the relations of Canada with the empire; because an appeal to the people is at variance with the principle of representative government. And I say further that this motion lacks sincerity.

When you read the debates on confederation, you find that several legislative councillors and members of parliament made it clear that they were favourable to the principle of confederation, but that they deemed it their duty to have their opinion ratified by the people itself, and that is the reason why they were in favour of an appeal to the people.

I think I know sufficiently, by their deeds and their words, the intention of the hon. gentlemen who have made up their minds to vote for an appeal to the people, to say that there is not a single one among them who is favourable to this legislation. Not a single one has stood up here and stated that, while approving of this measure, he would vote in favour of a plebiscite. If a single one of these gentlemen have declared, as was done by several members in 1865, that he was in favour of this legislation, there would be consistency in his conduct. But by asking for an appeal to the people, their only aim is to prejudice and excite the people against the government, in order to climb again into power, after having been expelled by the people a few years ago.

I now come to the main amendment moved by the leader of the opposition, and I have only a few observations to make. It is stated in that amendment that the proposals of the government do not tally with the suggestions of the admiralty. Well, I have in my hand the reports of the imperial conference, and here is what I find at page 24, which is a summary of the result of meetings:

> It was represented on the part of the admiralty that it would be difficult to make any suggestion or to formulate any plans, without knowing approximately the sum of money which Canada would spend. The Canadian representatives then suggested that two plans might be presented:—one incurring an annual expenditure of £400,000, and the other an expenditure of £600,000, omitting in both cases the cost of the present fishery service and hydrographic surveys, but including the maintenance of Halifax and Esquimalt dockyards, and wireless telegraph service, estimated at some £50,000 a year.
> Taking, first, the plan for the expenditure of £600,000, after discussion, the admiralty suggested that the Canadian government might provide a force of cruisers and destroyers comprising four cruisers of improved 'Bristol' class, one cruiser of the 'Boadicea' class, and six destroyers of improved river class. As regards submarines, it would be advisable to defer their construction because they required a highly trained and specialized complement.

Well, in view of this summary of the result of the meetings, a summary adhered to by the admiralty and by the Canadian delegates, it seems to me that this first part of the Borden amendment in which it is stated that the government propositions do not follow the suggestions of the admiralty, contains an unwarrantable error in point of fact on the part of a jurisconsult like the hon. gentleman. And he continues:

The proposals of the government do not follow the suggestions and recommendations of the admiralty, and so far as they empower the government to withhold the naval forces of Canada from those of the empire, in time of war are ill-advised and dangerous.

I have to say right here that this is a false statement of facts, the more so as the proposition made by the government tallies with what I read at page 38 of the report of the proceedings of the imperial conferences.

Let us read the statement made in the sub-report of the conference on military defence:

The representatives of the self-governing Dominions at the Imperial Defence Conference having signified their general concurrence in the proposition—'That each part of the empire is willing to make its preparations on such lines as will enable it, should it so desire, to take its share in the general defence of the empire.'

It is expressly said, granted and agreed to by all the interested parties, by the representatives of the various sister nations that participation in the wars of the empire is to take place only in so far as each party should so desire. Therefore, the participation of each colony and particularly that of Canada, will be determined and defined by the competent authorities, by parliament, prior to such participation.

In view of those facts, how can the leader of the opposition assert that this Bill empowers the government to withhold the naval forces of Canada from those of the empire in time of war.

The third paragraph of the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition reads as follows:

That no such proposals can safely be accepted, unless they thoroughly ensure unity of organization and of action, without which there can be no effective co-operation in any common scheme of empire defence.

Well, I think that the resolution of the 29th of March last fully answers that objection when it states that parliament cordially approves of any expenditure designed to promote the speedy organization of a Canadian naval service in co-operation with the imperial navy, whenever the need arises.

Paragraph 4 reads:

That the said proposals, while necessitating heavy outlay for construction and maintenance, will give no immediate or effective aid to the empire and no adequate or satisfactory results to Canada.

Mr. TURCOTTE.

Such is the opinion of the leader of the opposition, but the admiralty is of a different mind and I think the people of this country will share the latter opinion.

Paragraph 5 reads:

That no permanent policy should be entered upon, involving large future expenditures of this character, until it has been submitted to the people and has received their approval.

The leader of the opposition also favours an appeal to the people, but not on the same grounds as advanced by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier and his small group of followers. These gentlemen clamour for a plebiscite, in the hope of smothering this Bill and preventing the passing of any legislation concerning the navy. The leader of the opposition is also trying to kill the Bill, but with another object in view, he aims at coming into power, in order to saddle the people with much heavier expenditure. That is what he says in paragraph 6, which reads:

That, in the meantime, the immediate duty of Canada and the impending necessities of the empire can best be discharged and met by placing without delay at the disposal of the imperial authorities, as a free and loyal contribution from the people of Canada, such an amount as may be sufficient to purchase or construct two battleships or armoured cruisers of the latest Dreadnought type, giving to the admiralty full discretion to expend the said sum at such time and for such purpose of naval defence as, in their judgment, may best serve to increase the united strength of the empire and thus assure its peace and security.

That is what we should have, Sir, were the leader of the opposition to change sides —which is altogether impossible—and sit at your right, Mr. Speaker, in order to shape the future policy of the Canadian government concerning the creation of a naval service.

I have now to point out a somewhat extraordinary statement in the first part of his amendment. He says that the proposals of the government do not tally with the suggestions of the admiralty. It would be quite easy to retort the argument and say that his offer of two Dreadnoughts is absolutely at variance with the suggestions of the admiralty. In fact, the following statement is found at page 24 of the report of the imperial conference:—

The fleet unit to be aimed at should, therefore, in the opinion of the admiralty, consist at least of the following:—

1 armoured cruiser (new 'Indomitable' class, which is of the 'Dreadnought' type.)
3 unarmoured cruisers ('Bristol' class.)
6 destroyers.
3 submarines.

With the necessary auxiliaries, such as depot and store ships, &c., which are not here specified.

The admiralty wants an armoured cruiser and the leader of the opposition offers two Dreadnoughts. Why should he try to substitute his opinion to the wisdom and experience of the British admiralty?

The hon. member for Ste. Anne's, Montreal (Mr. Doherty), after having carefully weighed and computed everything, told us that the cost of two Dreadnoughts would not exced $20,000,000. Now, $20,000,000, that's a pretty round sum of money, and before voting such a sum methinks we should first consult the people. That money is not going to come out of the pocket of the leader of the opposition, but out of the people's pocket. It is the ratepayer who would have to pay those $20,000,000, an expenditure by no means extraordinary, in the opinion of the leader of the oposition, but which will prove absolutely useless, as it is expressly stated in his resolution that the admiralty is given full discretion to spend the said sum as they think best, and without consulting us, even without defending our territory. For, supposing that such an emergency should arise in England and in Canada, and that our two Dreadnoughts should be in English waters, do you believe that the admiralty would detach a squadron to come to our rescue.

All this, in my opinion, is altogether irrational and illegal. There is in the position taken by the leader of the opposition and by his assistant leader, a concatenation of contradictions and of absolutely illogical statements which one is astonished to find simultaneously in the speeches of a jurist and those of a professor of constitutional law in one of our great universities.

I think we had better abide by what we have now, namely, the proposition moved by the leader of the government. As circumstances would have it, the Minister of Marine was denied that honour and the leader of the government was called upon to introduce this Bill. Now, the Prime Minister has the assistance of the Finance Minister, who, for the last fifteen years, has held that important portfolio which he has always found well filled with money to supply the needs of the country. Do you believe that previously to submitting this Bill to the House, there have not been held many contradictory meetings of the cabinet and that the Prime Minister did not ask the Finance Minister how we were going to meet those responsibilities? We have the guaranty that the new liabilities will be met without a single cent being added to our public debt and without our taxation being increased. The experience of the last fifteen years shows that the Prime Minister and the Finance Minister, as well as their colleagues in the cabinet, made no mistake in the past. In my opinion, that is a guaranty for the future, and we who represent here the people, relying upon the experience of those fifteen years, may loyally and honestly discharge our mandate in the interest of the people and of the greatest good of the country.

Mr. DAVID MARSHALL (East Elgin). Mr. Speaker, two questions in this discussion are being confused. The question of beginning the foundation of a Canadian navy, and the question of rendering immediate and effective aid to Great Britain are not the same. It is with the latter that we are called upon at this juncture to deal. The government declares its readiness to assist the mother country, but the proposal contained in the Bill outlined by the right hon. the First Minister provides for the creation of a war instrument which cannot be made effective for many years to come, until the present emergency has been met by Great Britain, and its consequence to Canada as part of the empire already determined. This is not a question which should be decided one way or another for party political profit. The question is a simple one, a question of determining what is our clear duty to the empire and of our readiness to do that duty. We must look first of all to the question: Is there an emergency? That question has been answered. I am within the mark in saying that were it not that a crisis was known to be impending the government of Canada would not have considered itself compelled to take even such meagre action as is contemplated in this Bill. The right hon. Prime Minister has given good evidence that he appreciates the futility of this navy scheme as an instrument of immediate and effective aid. That proof is to be found in a speech made to his own political followers only a short time ago in the city of Toronto, in which to make this project if possible more acceptable, he declared his conviction that no such thing as a German peril existed.

Is there in the great German preparations now being carried on, a menace to the naval supremacy of Great Britain. We are told that within two years Germany as a sea power may have caught up to Great Britain or surpassed her. The London ' Times ' a few days ago declared that if the present way of construction resulted in a German triumph, no blood need be shed, that Germany would simply impose her will upon Great Britain as she has done it upon various European countries within the past decade. German preparations are unquestionably directed against Great Britain. We cannot read the preamble of the German Naval Bill of 1900 without reaching that conclusion. It says:

> Germany must possess a battle fleet so strong that a war with her would, even for the greatest naval power, be accompanied with such dangers as would render that power's position doubtful.

The 'greatest naval power' is Great Britain, the British empire, of which Canada is a part.

Why did the British admiralty's whole plan of defence change a few years ago? Why were the most powerful of her fleets concentrated in home waters? What compelled the withdrawal of the British fleet from the Pacific? It was not because no fleet was needed there. The British admiralty to-day is anxious to see a fleet upon the Pacific flying the British flag. Why then were these ships withdrawn? The answer is already history. They were placed in waters adjacent to Great Britain to guard the shores of England from a threatened descent by a hostile European army, a German army. The statement that we cannot have a navy in commission for many years to come even if we start to-morrow, is one that cannot be attacked. We have not the yards in which to build the ships, nor the men to build them. Moreover when you have built your ships you have only begun the work. The task of arming them is still before you, and this cannot be done in Canada. The creation of a navy, however small, involves years of building and years of training, and an outlay of which no man can see the end. We are told that the fleet will cost eleven millions. We were told that the Grand Trunk Pacific would cost thirteen millions, and it has already passed the hundred million mark. We may take it then that the creation of a Canadian navy is not intended as an aid to the mother country in a crisis present or immediate. I say then that this navy scheme stands by itself and must be decided without regard to the question of immediate peril to the empire, with which question it has nothing to do. There is no hurry then, about it. That being so, I believe that no action should now be taken in regard to it, but that it should be submitted to the people of Canada to be decided by them.

What, in view of these things, is the best for Canada to do? The duty of Canada, I take it is to render such aid to the mother country as will meet the demands of naval strategy, because upon this the safety of the empire and the supremacy of Great Britain at sea must depend. What that aid should be is set out within the four corners of a short paragraph in the memorandum of the First Lord of the admiralty, submitted to the naval and military defence conference in August of last year. That paragraph reads:

> If the problem of imperial naval defence were considered merely as a problem of naval strategy, it would be found that the greatest output of strength for a given expenditure is obtained by the maintenance of a single navy, with the unity of training and unity of command. In furtherance, then, of the simple strategical ideal, the maximum of power would be gained if all parts of the empire contributed, according to their needs and resources, to the maintenance of the British navy.

The principle is laid down by a man whose business it is to know. If that is generally a sound principle, it is equally sound as applied to the emergency which undoubtedly exists. It is 'the maximum of power' upon which the safety of the empire depends, and that 'maximum of power' would be best obtained, so far as the Dominion of Canada is concerned, by a cash contribution for immediate use in augmenting the strength of the British navy. This is the new view taken, I believe, by a majority of the people of Canada. It is the view held by a great majority of the people of the constituency which I represent.

I may say, Mr. Speaker, that I mailed to every voter in East Elgin, a circular letter inclosing a slip covering three questions. asking the electors to indicate their views by answering these questions. Between five and six thousand was the number of these sent out, and I had replies from about 75 per cent. I would like to give the House an idea of the result of this work.

In answer to the first question, which was:

> Are you in favour of the establishment of a Canadian navy, to be under the control of the government at Ottawa?

To this question 269, or six and one half per cent, of the replies were in favour of a Canadian navy; 3,836, or ninety-three per cent, were strongly opposed to it, and twenty, or one half per cent, were quite different.

The second question was:

> Are you in favour, as a Canadian, of taking any part in the naval defence of Canada and the empire?

To this question 430 answered they were not in favour of taking any part in the defence of Canada or the empire, while 3,570 were willing to do their share.

The third question was:

> Do you believe that the time has come when Canada, should, in answer to the call of the motherland, and in answer to the threats of the enemies of the British empire, perform her share toward ensuring the continuance of British naval supremacy, by the direct contribution of a Dreadnought or its equivalent in money?

The result of this is that: 430 were not willing to take any part; six and one half per cent or 269 were in favour of a Canadian navy; one per cent or 41 were in favour of a Dreadnought being contributed; one and one half or 61 per cent were indifferent as to what means were adopted, though they were opposed to a navy being established; 91 per cent or 3,754 were in favour of a money contribution.

These replies come from a people who are in a position to give voice to sensible ideas, for with the present improved rural mail facilities, they are in receipt of the daily papers and the vast majority of them keep in touch with the doings of the outside world, and know as much of what is going on as do people residing in our large cities, and in that way, they are quite capable of judging and giving opinions on matters of this kind.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would consider this a fair criterion of the sentiment of the Canadian people. Judging from the results which I have laid before you, it is my opinion that were the entire electorate of Canada called upon to answer questions similar to the above, the result would be very much the same, and, therefore, I am strongly of the opinion that a national question of such wide importance, involving as it does such large expenditure of money, should, before being undertaken by the government, be submitted to the people and, therefore, I will support the resolution moved by the hon. leader of the opposition.

Mr. J. P. MOLLOY (Provencher). Mr. Speaker, I have no hope that I shall be able to add anything new to what has been said in this debate, which is now worn threadbare. I might remark that it appears to me strange that on a subject so well threshed out, some hon. members should see fit to speak for two hours, three hours, and three and a half hours, covering ground which has already been well covered, adding nothing to the debate but adding something to the expense of the country. In view of what has occurred here, I believe that whenever the question of the amendment of the rules may come before us, I will vote for closure; I will vote for what may be called the gag; I believe I would vote for a chloroform chamber for some of the hon. members of this House. One reason why I speak at all is that it appears to be fashionable, but whether that be so or not, I believe that every hon. member has a right to speak his thoughts briefly on this question. I would not for a moment advocate that hon. members should not be at liberty to express their opinions on every subject that comes before the House, but I believe that something should be done in some way to shorten the debates, even on such momentous a question as that which we are now considering. As a Manitoba man I desire to say a few words on this question also, because when the local government will have time to act on the Bill sent to them by this government about a year ago, and the boundaries of the provincce are extended, Manitoba will become a maritime province; and then it will have more interest in the question of a Canadian navy than it can have, so long as it remains an inland province, for it will be on the line of a new and shorter route to the motherland.

Another reason why I speak on this question is that we have in the province of Manitoba the greatest naval experts to be found on the continent of America, at least in their own opinion. They care nothing for the opinions of the British government, the admiralty, Lord Charles Beresford, or any of the other British naval authorities. A year ago they put forth their policy, which was simply a policy of direct contribution. This is as near as I can see the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite; and I compliment my province on having in the Conservative party men strong enough to practically force their policy on the opposition in this House. At the same time, in putting forward their policy, they have taken every opportunity, in the belief that they were making it stronger, to attack the loyalty of the leader of this government and the loyalty of everybody who sees fit to support a policy different from theirs.

On the whole, Mr. Speaker, the issue between gentlemen on this side of the House and the bulk of the gentlemen on the other side of the House is one merely of terms. I am willing to give credit to those on the other side who honestly believe that the policy of a contribution would better answer the situation, so far as Great Britain is concerned at the present time, than the policy of a Canadian navy. I am always willing to give to those who honestly believe, even if they are wrong, credit for the opinions that they hold. I am also aware that there is in the ranks of the party opposite a third party, or a separate party; I refer to the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), and those who support him; and I wish to say this for the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, that, judging by some of the press reports, he, as well as the leader of the government, and the members of his cabinet, and his followers, have been charged with disloyalty. I hold that the hon. member for Jacques Cartier is just as much within his rights, and is just as loyal in expressing his opinion, whatever that may be, so long as he believes that he is putting forth a policy in the best interests of Canada, as any other member of this House. Therefore, I for one, will never charge the hon member for Jacques Cartier with disloyalty.

On this question the Canadian people are handicapped through lack of experience. We have never been called upon to have anything to do with a navy, in spite of our enormous sea-board, bounded as we are by the ocean on three sides. The only experience Canadians have had with a navy has been in the war of 1812, and that was so long ago, and was fought so entirely by British ships that from that we gained nothing in the way of experience —only this, that from that time the American people and the Canadian people have been at peace, and I believe that it is the hope of the whole Anglo-Saxon race that they shall for ever remain at peace. There are some who say that we are building a tin-pot navy for the purpose of fighting the United States; but I believe that nobody expects that that will ever happen, while the people of both countries hope that we shall never settle by force any differences between the two branches of the Anglo-Saxon race.

It is not necessary for me to deal with the origin of the so-called German scare. About a year ago the premier of England made the announcement that Germany was outstripping Great Britain in building battleships. That was before the British elections. I do not charge that that statement was made for the purpose of influencing the elections. But since that time the British elections have been held, and the same man and his party have been returned to power. The same peril that faced England then is facing her now, but we do not hear anything since the election in regard to the German scare. In fact, one would judge by the reports that the scare has completely disappeared. Allow me to quote in this connection the following despatch:

Berlin, March 6.—Chancellor Von Bethmann-Hollweg made a strikingly pacific speech on international relations, during the course of a debate on the naval estimates in the Reichstag yesterday. Replying to the arguments of Herr Sudekums, the Socialist member, that Germany's great fleet was not called for by commerce or the colonies, and that Great Britain was justified in the belief that it was directed against her, the chancellor spoke shortly, but vigorously, saying:—

Our relations with Great Britain lie clear and open before everybody's eyes. It is not necessary to repeat that our fleet is not for aggressive purposes, but for the protection of our coasts and commerce. The limits of our naval programme are known to every one, with the dates for the completion of our ships. Nothing is secret about the programme and nothing is done in such a way as to arouse suspicion or belief that a threat is intended against anybody.

Finally, it is our wish to cultivate unprejudiced, straightforward and friendly relations with Great Britain. (Cries of hear, hear.) I do not see why the existing friendly relations should be disturbed between Germany and Great Britain, with whom we are so closely connected, both economically and in culture. No nation on earth can divert or suppress free competition of other nations. We must all proceed on the same lines as an honest merchant, and on this foundation I am convinced that the relation of confidence existing between Germany and Great Britain will develop favourably, and that public opinion of both countries will be influenced in the same way.

Hon. gentlemen opposite say there is an emergency. Perhaps they may say it for political reasons, in their desire to force their policy upon this government. We on this side have just as much right to say there is not an emergency. It is now a year since we first heard of it, and we are no nearer to a crisis to-day than we were then. For my part I do not believe that an emergency exists, and if it did, Great Britain would be as well able now as she has been in the past to take care of herself and defend her sea-board against all comers.

With regard to the question of control, I wish to quote the London 'Times,' a good Conservative paper, and surely hon. gentlemen opposite will not charge it with disloyalty. The London 'Times' says the Canadian government is taking the proper course in keeping control of the Canadian navy, and adds:

In principle the proposition is indisputable. It applies to all and every form of co-operation of contribution towards imperial defence.

Now, allow me to quote Mr. Balfour, the leader of the Unionist party in the British House of Commons. In speaking last year, before the Imperial Press Conference, he said:

I think it was one of the speakers from Canada yesterday who said in my hearing that there was a certain jealousy existing—I am not sure I have got the exact words—a certain jealous anxiety amongst sections of the population in Canada lest there should be any attempt on the part of this country to accept any organization which would interfere with the complete control by Canada of everything that Canada desires to do. Well, in the earlier days of the colonial empire that fear might have been justifiable. There was a time when the relations between this country and the offshoots of this country were like the relations between parent and child. But let every man who hears me, who comes from any colony, understand that no politician of any party in this country holds that view any longer. (Cheers.) On that let there be neither doubt nor hesitation. Everybody recognizes, so far as I know, that the parental stage is over. We have now reached the stage of formal equality, and nobody desires to disturb it.

What did Mr. Haldane say on the same matter:

If the empire is to become one it will not be by the imposition of any outside will or of any one part of the empire; it will be with the evolution of the will of the empire as a whole under these unwritten constitutions which represent one and the same spirit, which took their origin in the mother country, but which mean absolute freedom for every constituent part of the empire.

Mr. Balfour spoke of the difficulties of the old war-office notion of controlling the forces of the Crown overseas, of the self-governing dominions. I agree with him that that is an absolutely impossible enterprise, although one quite sees the reason why from the military point of view it was desirable.

This policy was the policy of the opposition as well as of the Liberal party. From the opposition we first heard it argued that Canada should in some way assist the empire, from the resolution passed unanimously in this House last year it is evident that the intention was to establish a Canadian navy. It is well for the opposition that this is their policy, for 15 or 20 years from now, when these gentlemen will be entrusted for a time with administration of the affairs of Canada, this policy will have been initiated and developed by this government and yet these gentlemen, having supported that policy in the first place, will be able to carry it out without prejudice, justly, and in the interests of Canada and to the credit of their party.

I view this policy from two standpoints, from an imperial standpoint and a Canadian standpoint. It must be a good policy from the imperial point of view because it has the support of all parties in Great Britain. There are grave practical difficulties in the way of giving Dreadnoughts. For instance, we are told to-day that Britain experiences great difficulty in manning the ships she is building, that there is a shortage of experienced A.B.'s. Therefore if we should accept the policy of the opposition, the policy of money contribution, and should send that money to England, could she to-day build and man those Dreadnoughts? I rather think not. We know that the British shipyards are now working overtime and no matter how many ships you might order or contribute to the main battle fleet of Great Britain, they would be of little assistance to the imperial navy if they could not be properly manned. Therefore the manning question itself is of great importance in considering this matter. Each Dreadnought takes from 800 to 1,000 men, who are taken in as youths and trained up. In that way the British seamen have become the most proficient in the world to-day.

Again, the British navy must be at all times strong enough to seek out the enemy in his own harbours or waters and crush him by sheer weight and strength. To do that it is well that the main battle fleet should be as strong as possible, and that is a problem that has never been solved by the British admiralty. In other words, the main battle fleet has always been short of cruisers that would guard the trade routes. The immense strain, the financial burden of keeping up the main battle fleet, and the demands of the moment has always caused the fleet to be short of cruisers or river craft to protect the trade routes and commerce of Great Britain. Therefore by the establishment of a Canadian navy, the interests of Canadians in time of war in place of being protected by ships from the British navy, we will in time have ships to protect our own trade routes and our commerce in our own waters without in the least weakening the main battle fleet of Great Britain. From the Canadian point of view the mere giving of a sum of money, $20,000,000 or $25,000,000 and that borrowed money, would not be relieving the Canadian people of their responsibility to the empire. Would it not be the vain-glorious, the easy, the selfish way of doing our part as Canadians towards the defence of the British empire? Would it not be only a temporary gift, the gift of a Dreadnought, no matter what it cost, because the life of a Dreadnought is only a certain number of years, 12 or 15, and then the Canadian part of the British navy would disappear. What is to be done then? As far as I have followed, no member of the opposition has answered the question of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Lake). How many Dreadnoughts are you going to give, how often are you going to give them? On the other hand, will any man argue that the giving of two Dreadnoughts, if we are going to take part in the building up and strengthening of the British navy, is all that we should do? I say no. Then, let us give something as soon as we have built it, as we must pay for it, something which we will control, which will become stronger year by year, and will increase in cost year by year, at the same time becoming of greater importance to the British empire.

I say that the policy of the government in building a Canadian fleet is the one that I believe will be most acceptable to the Canadian people, and to the British people, and in the years to come will certainly be more acceptable than the policy of simply giving one or two Dreadnoughts. As time goes on, as our commerce increases as it will increase, hundreds of fold in the next score or two of years we would be taxing the British navy for its protection, adding to the burdens of the British taxpayer, and doing nothing to protect ourselves. As the country grows and cities of wealth and importance spring up along our coasts, it will be a greater burden to the British people than it is now to protect us, if war takes place either between England and Germany or England and any alliance Germany may form with any other power. Therefore we will have our navy, a Canadian navy on the ground to protect our own coasts, our own commerce, because it is bound to increase, and whether the navy is built now or later, the Canadian people would in time be compelled, as I believe they are now compelled, to do something in that direction. We know what can be done by one ship. For instance, in the war between the north and the south the 'Alabama' destroyed untold millions of commerce. The same thing might happen to Canadian commerce, and no doubt would be attempted in the effort to starve out the British people in the British Isles. In that case who would suffer? The Canadian people generally, the farmers of Saskatchewan and Manitoba, the farmers of eastern Canada. Wheat would be seized, and destroyed, beef, butter, cheese, eggs, hogs, the products of east and west alike, would meet the same fate, so it becomes the duty of all of us to defend our own commerce in our own waters, and England in time of war would have enough to do without convoying Canadian ships. Therefore I say as every man says, although we differ as to the means, that Canadians must do their part—so long as Canada is under the British flag, and I hope it will always be under the British flag, Canadians must do their part, and must do it manfully. That I believe is a patriotic, a sentimental, and at the same time a sensible view of this question.

Any contribution in money is so much money sent out of the country that will be expended in England employing labour there. If the money is expended here on a Canadian navy it will mean that in a short time we will be employing ship-wrights, joiners, fitters, platers, plumbers, boiler makers, electrical workers, and other mechanics, and in that way tend to the prosperity of the Canadian people. It will mean the building of docks, and the maintenance of shipbuilding yards. It will mean that the men who build our ships will be Canadians. If the Canadian people are contributing to the British navy, let us be represented by Canadian flesh and blood, and not by money contributions towards our own defence. It means that in time we shall build our own guns and projectiles. This will not be in the beginning —nobody expects that it will. This is a great undertaking, and a national question. It is bound to enlarge, and, as time goes on, the Canadian people expect that this parliament will decide upon a policy that will mean that ultimately Canadians shall build, equip and man the Canadian navy. This will give opportunity to Canadian brains and muscle. It will bring into use our own coal, our own steel, the minerals and metals with which we have been so bountifully supplied, and in that way it will develop the resources of our own country, and tend to the prosperitv of our own people. Let me give briefly seven reasons why this policy of the government should be supported:

1. Because the imperial authorities approve it, and they are the best judges.

2. Because for imperial reasons the protection of trade routes is the most difficult part of the British navy's work, and it can better be done by home squadrons in home waters.

3. Because as Canadians we should be proud to bear our own burdens and not pay others to bear them.

4. Because though we may never seek war ourselves we incur dangers all the while we are under the flag, and we want to prepare to defend the flag.

5. Because it is true that much of the money spent on warlike equipment is wasted in times of peace, but if we have to spend this money we might as well be utilizing Canadian resources, and building up Canadian industries with it.

6. Because in this work of protecting our own commerce and our own coasts we need only the light, small and speedy craft which are known as third-class cruisers and river craft, and we can in a short time put ourselves in a position both to build these and train our own men to man them.

7. Because we Britishers beyond the seas should feel ashamed to think that the Britishers at home have to worry about the protection of our thousands of miles of coast line when we can do it ourselves.

I cannot speak of this matter from first knowledge. But I believe that, in spite of the expressions of the more fanatical party organs, no man doubts the loyalty of the Prime Minister or of any member of his government, no man doubts the loyalty of any man on this side, no man doubts the loyalty of any hon. member on that side of this House. Future generations will say that the men of our day and time builded wisely and well when they decided upon this policy, a policy which I believe will be of great benefit to Great Britain and a policy worthy of Canada.

Now, I desire to say a few words with regard to certain remarks made by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) when speaking on this question. As usual, he was unkind and ungenerous. He tried to lead the country and hon. members of this House to understand that every man on this side had to do simply what he was told—in other words, that he was a slave. Mr. Speaker, I would have the hon. member understand this, that there flows in my veins the blood of the Irish Canadian, and I will not submit to the 'composing room,' the thumb-screw or the rack. The hon. member should let charity begin at home. When this question was before the Canadian people, as it has been since last March, it happened that the hon. member was in Winnipeg, where was moulded the policy which I believe hon. gentlemen opposite have accepted, because it is one and the same. There was held what might be called a political powwow. The hon. member (Mr. Foster) was to be the chief speaker. Did he utter one word in defence or advocacy of the policy which he himself advocated on the floor of this House last March? Not one word did he say, though everybody expected it from him. Why did he not speak in the way expected? As we understand the situation, those of us living in Manitoba, explain it in this way: The premier of Manitoba and the gentleman who is now acting premier of that province, saw fit to tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) that, in the city of Winnipeg at least, no matter what his leader might say and no matter what he himself might say in other parts of the country, they would not submit to his putting forth the policy accepted by this House a year ago this month. Instead of the 'composing room,' instead of the thumb-screw and the rack, it seems to me the hon. gentleman was introduced to the garrotte, and that he got the Spanish twist, so that he dared not say a word because these men were in absolute control. They believed and he believed, and I believe, that they were strong enough and powerful enough to make him accept, so far as they were concerned at least, the policy that they had promulgated, and that their organ, the Winnipeg 'Telegram,' has advocated since its introduction a year ago.

I should be remiss, as representing the greatest number of French electors in any constituency west of the great lakes if I did not say a word with regard to the remarks of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards). I would have that hon. gentleman understand that, from what I have seen and what I know, the French Canadians do not have to go to him or his seed, breed or generation, for lessons in loyalty. The French Canadians are a loyal people. It is but a short time ago, in the province of Manitoba, when the Tory party was catering to the French electorate in that country, that orator after orator—they had some then and they have some yet—declared that we should not forget that, in the war of 1812, four hundred French Canadians saved to the British empire this Canada, the brightest jewel in the British Crown. So, I resent the remarks of the hon. member for Frontenac, and I was pleased to hear the hon. member for Ste. Anne (Mr. Doherty) practically repudiate everything he said. If the hon. member (Mr. Edwards) thinks, or any other gentleman thinks, such remarks as he made are in the interests of the Canadian people, they are welcome to their opinion so far as I am concerned. The French Canadians are loyal; they are loyal to their families, they are loyal to their country, they are loyal to their church, they are loyal to the sovereign and they are loyal to their God; they are a brave, proud and brilliant people, and do not need to make apologies to anybody or to any section of the country.

Mr. LENNOX. On behalf of the hon. member for South Waterloo (Mr. Clare), I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Mr. FIELDING moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. BLAIN. Shall we continue the Navy Bill debate to-morrow?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12.40 a.m., Tuesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, March 8, 1910.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

FIRST READINGS

Bill (No. 157) for the relief of Cecelia Marie Pringle.—Mr. Price.

Bill (No. 155) to amend the Government Annuities Act, 1908.—Mr. Fielding.

Bill (No. 156) to incorporate the Weyburn Security Bank.—Mr. Turriff.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 69) respecting the Prince Albert and Hudson Bay Railway Company.—Mr. Neely.

NAVAL SERVICE OF CANADA.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the motion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier for the second reading of Bill (No. 95) respecting the naval service of Canada, the proposed amendment of Mr Borden thereto, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Monk.

Mr. GEORGE A. CLARE (South Waterloo). Mr. Speaker, for reasons known to you and to many members of this House I have not for some time taken part in the discussion of any of the important questions which have come before us; I have contented myself on each occasion with giving a silent vote, so that at least I would be on record in reference to the various matters dealt with by this House. I would prefer to do this even now, but the question before the House is so momentous, and so far reaching in its effect that I consider it a duty to myself, to my constituents and to Canada to say a few words in it. I beg of you to bear with me for a few moments while I explain my position.

Before doing so I would like to say a few words of the people whom I have the honour to represent in this House, the people of South Waterloo. They are composed of many different nationalities, the English, the Scotch, the Irish, the German, the Hollander, the Russian, the Austrian, the Swiss, and many other different classes of Europeans. We have in the southern part of my riding, the intelligent and sturdy Scotchman, who has settled the township of North Dumfries, and made of that township a veritable garden of beautiful homes and beautiful farms. We have the tenacious, enterprising Englishman, we have the brave and open-hearted Irishman, we have the peace-loving, honest, and thrifty people who speak the German language, whether they be German proper, Pennsylvania Dutch, Amish, Mennonite, Hollander, or Bohemian, people who have asked no special privileges from the legislature of this country, who have adapted themselves to the conditions in this country, and who obey its laws. Besides all these people, we have the admirable young Canadian who can hold his own anywhere in the world. Through the assimilation of all these nationalities, there are to be found in the county of Waterloo—and I hope the Minister of Labour (Mr. King) will pardon me if I speak of the county as a whole—a population unexcelled, yes, I believe, unequalled, in this Canada of ours. They work together, they are friendly with one another, they assist one another, and they have made Waterloo county a hive of industry. Their manufactured goods are to be found throughout the length and breadth of Canada, so that the name Waterloo is a household word with the people throughout this country. There are no better farmers, and no better tilled farms. But, above all, these people of different nationalities, who have made this country their home, are loyal Canadians, and, as such, proud of the great empire to which they owe allegiance.

Mr. Speaker, my parents were born in Germany. They were proud of the country from which they came, but I believe they were prouder of the country which they made their home. They instilled into me a feeling of love, affection and attachment for the great country of their birth. Forty years ago the German empire was a number of scattered provinces. By uniting, these became a great nation. Through its educational system, through its technical schools and through the policy of protection inaugurated years ago, Germany has become a great manufacturing country. They are a business people and in their state-owned utilities they have shown what a nation can do. The state-owned utilities of Germany, run and managed by the civil service there, have brought in immense revenues to the country and have reduced taxation accordingly. The imperial government of Germany and the governments of the several states of that empire, through their various state-owned business, cleared for the people in 1908 no less a sum than $277,385,095. Here are some of the items:

The leased lands of Germany are worth $198,122,725, and they produced an income for the people of $7,925,309.

The forests of Germany, worth $730,898,200, brought in, over and above all expenses, $29,235,938.

The mines of Germany, worth $128,907,725 brought in $5,116,309.

The German state-owned railways, worth $4,706,904,750, have shown the enormous profit for the people of $189,916,190.

The state-owned telephones, telegraphs and express and mail services within the German empire worth $694,816,650, earned for the people $27,792,666.

Other state-owned utilities worth $435,184,900, showed profits of $17,407,476.

Bavaria, one of the provinces of the German empire, pays 39 per cent of the cost of administration from the profits of its state-owned utilities; Saxony, in the same way, pays 31 per cent; Wurtemburg pays 38·7 per cent; Prussia, which forms five-eights of the empire, pays 47·36 per cent of its public expenses from the profits of state-owned utilities. The state of Prussia enjoys an income from its state-owned utilities of no less than $176,000,000, which is more than twice the amount of all taxes of that state, amounting to only $85,000,000.

The German empire and its people, in the management of their public utilities, are an example to the people of Canada. They are, above all, an example to the Minister of Railways of this government who is managing a state-owned railway at an enormous loss. The German people excel in literature, in art and in science. The population of Germany is over 65,000,000, and, as has been stated before in this debate, it is increasing at the rate of over 1,000,000 people a year. They have a large and growing foreign trade. Their merchant vessels are seen on every sea. And, like the people of Great Britain—for they are in exactly the same position—the German people with this immense foreign trade must have a navy to protect that trade. As the trade increases, the number of merchant vessels must increase, and as the merchant vessels grow in number so must the war vessels grow in number. But do the people of Germany want war? Do the people of England want war? I say, no. For these great business and manufacturing countries, these peoples who compete in the foreign market there is no danger of war except it be a commercial war, a war which might occur through competition. This might lead to actual conflict. In the past, these two great nations, Germany and England, have never warred against each other; they have been firm allies in many wars for the upbuilding of humanity.

I have had the pleasure of visiting both Germany and England several times. As a public man I have tried to find out the views of those people upon the question of war between these two great countries. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, and I can assure the people of this country that as far as the educated and working classes go in Germany, they have a perfect respect and love for the English nation. This may not be universal, there may perhaps be exceptions in their army and navy of which I do not know. I say again and I cannot help it, I have a feeling of attachment to the great empire of my forefathers. If you do not love your country either you, or your country, are no good. You, Mr. Speaker, and your compatriots, have a feeling of love and veneration for the great country of your forefathers. You are interested in the traditions of France, you are proud of its marvellous people and the wonderful good that they have done in the world, but being proud of that country, being proud of the country of your forefathers, does not prevent you from being proud of your adopted country; in fact, I believe it makes you feel prouder of Canada, the country that you have made your home. The French and the Germans will always stand for Canada and its interests. The majority of the people of this country will do their duty to Canada, to the empire and to His Majesty King Edward VII. We are one people and one people only, and the only way in which we can differ is as to how we can best do our duty to the great empire to which we belong. The Prime Minister, when introducing this Bill, charged the opposition, and I was sorry to hear it, with having differences of opinion on this great question. He charged that in the ranks of the opposition there are differences of opinion. I want to say to him that there are. No great question has ever come before the two great parties in this country without differences of opinion. I am rather proud of the fact that in the Conservative party, amongst eighty loyal citizens of this country, there were differences of opinion as to how best we could serve our empire. On the other side of the House they have differences of opinion too. But they must do as they are told, and I believe that when the vote is taken every hon. gentleman opposite will support the government in its policy.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CLARE. Yes, you can cheer, but I believe what I tell you. While the Prime Minister can make you vote as he pleases, he cannot make you think as he pleases. There have been no two speeches delivered on the government side of the House which have not shown greater differences than have been shown on this side of the House. The hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McLean) has told the Prime Minister and his supporters what he thinks of England. He said that we owe them some respect, but we owe them nothing else, because they have not paid us more for our grain or our produce than they have paid to the people of the United States. So, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for South Huron says that we owe nothing to England. There is no loyalty in him. He says: I must say nothing for England, and then he turns around and says to the people of Canada: I will vote for a large expenditure for a navy which will be no good to this country, which will be no protection to this country and no protection to the British empire. What is this navy going to be for? Is it going to protect us against Patagonia or Uruguay? This navy will never protect us against any self-respecting nation. I have stated, Mr. Speaker, that I believe the majority of the people of this country are loyal citizens of Canada and the empire. I want to say the same thing about the members of this House. I believe as a whole that the members of this House are loyal Canadians and if there is a doubt on this question, if there is a doubt that there may be a single man who may be disloyal to his country, that doubt has been forced upon me by the Prime Minister himself, in speeches in the United States in which he said he preferred the American dollar to the English shilling. I do not like to talk of these things and in spite of these statements I am ready to believe the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) is an honest man, is loyal to this country and is loyal to the empire. While I admit that he is loyal, I claim that he has made many, many mistakes in his public career, and I wish to recite a few of them so that we can afterwards decide whether we are right in accepting his judgment on the Navy Bill. When the great statesman, Sir John Macdonald, introduced a Bill for the construction of the Canadian Pacific railway, providing for the building of a road from the Atlantic to the Pacific, where did we find the present Prime Minister? Why, Mr. Speaker, he was opposed to the policy, he did not believe in it. He and his party said the road was going through a sea of mountains. The Conservative party and Sir John Macdonald lived in hope and they believed that this enterprise would be a good thing for this country. They carried it in spite of the opposition of the then Where do we find the Prime Minister now? He is following in the footsteps of that great Conservative leader, and he is imitating him in the building of a railway across the continent. The right hon. gentleman had no opposition from this side of the House on the question of building that railway, but we differed with him as to the manner in which it should be built, and events have proved that the Prime Minister was all wrong, because we have all seen how woefully he was mistaken in his prophecy as to what that railway would cost. Then, there was the movement for commercial union, and the right hon. the Prime Minister persuaded the greater part of his followers to support a policy of commercial union as between the United States and Canada and against the empire. I do not know whether that was disloyalty or not, but I do know that it was sailing mighty close to disloyalty. But, I thank God and I believe the Prime Minister to-day thanks God, that his policy did not prevail.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I can assure you that I am very sorry to have to point out any defects in the great leader of the Liberal party in this country, for no one admires him as a man more than I do. But, Sir, I feel it my duty to point out these defects and I cannot help saying further, that in this naval policy of his he has made the greatest error of all the errors in his political life. The navy which this government is going to build will not be effective, it will not protect our Canadian shores, and much less will it be of any assistance to the British empire. This navy will be no protection to Canada; it will be an expensive luxury. We have no guarantee from the right hon. gentleman and his government as to what the navy will cost, because, judging by past experience, any estimate they may give is not reliable. In addition to all other defects in the policy, this navy may lead us into difficulties with countries nearer home in a way which we now do not foresee. I read in the newspapers since this Bill was introduced that an application had been made to the government by some of the states bordering on the great lakes to have the privilege of building warships, and the probability is that this is suggested by the example of Canada. I believe, Sir, that if the greatest care is not taken there may be danger of complications between these two nations, and in that way the navy proposed by the government is a menace to us. As to the cost of the navy, we have the statement of the government that in the initial stage it will amount to $15,000,000 for construction, and that the up-keep will cost us $7,000,000 each year. Of course, this cost must increase enormously; Canada will have to keep on building ships and opening shipyards, and there is no knowing where our financial liability is going to end. We know that some fourteen years ago we expended on the militia of this country only one and a half million dollars a year, but to-day we are spending seven million dollars annually, so that for the up-keep of our militia and onr navy we will have an annual charge at the lowest calculation of $14,000,000, which, of course, is bound to increase as the years go on. I do not think there is any man on the government side of the House who will deny that in a very few years the expenditure of Canada for warfare will be at least $25,000,000 per annum. And, Mr. Speaker, what does $25,000,000 mean? It means that if we placed $25,000,000 per annum at the disposal of the Minister of Finance he could go to the money markets of England and borrow between $800,000,000 and $1,000,000,000, which would represent enough money to rebuild the whole British navy. That is what we are going to expend in this country. It would mean that the Minister of Finance could take that money and build the Georgian Bay canal, and deepen and extend the Welland canal, and build the Hudson Bay railway, and two or three transcontinental railways, and still have some money left in the treasury. I am opposed to this navy. As I have said, it will be no protection to Canada and no protection to the empire. And, Sir, the people of Canada, the voters of this country, the people who make and unmake governments, should be treated fairly in this matter and should be consulted. I appeal to the Prime Minister of this country that he should in all fairness withdraw this Bill and consult the people of Canada first, and if the people say: we want a navy——

Mr. M. Y. McLEAN. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CLARE. Yes.

Mr. M. Y. McLEAN. Does the hon. gentleman propose to transmit $25,000,000 to Great Britain——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. CLARE. The hon. gentleman cannot put words in my mouth that I did not utter.

Mr. M. Y. McLEAN. I did not put words in the hon. member's mouth; I simply asked him a question.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. M. Y. McLEAN. Will the hon. gentleman answer my question?

Mr. CLARE. Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am entirely opposed to that enormous expenditure. Is that what the hon. gentleman wants to know; I could not hear his question?

Mr. M. Y. McLEAN. Did I understand——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, sit down.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Clare) has the floor and cannot be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. M. Y. McLEAN. I am simply asking a question.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member for Waterloo cannot be interrupted when he has the floor.

Mr. M. Y. McLEAN. I simply wish to ask——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Sit down.

Mr. CONMEE. The hon. member for Waterloo——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, sit down.

Mr. CLARE. Mr. Speaker, I would have been pleased to answer the question put by the hon. member for South Huron if I could hear it, especially as it comes from a man who says that he knows of no duty that we owe to the empire, and who is prepared, Mr. Speaker, to vote $15,000,000 now and $7,000,000 a year for all time to come for a navy which is no good to the empire, but that does not matter much to him.

Mr. M. Y. McLEAN. Mr. Speaker——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, sit down.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. The hon. member for Waterloo cannot be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. M. Y. McLEAN. Well, I am asking for his consent.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Sit down.

Mr. M. Y. McLEAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have already told the hon. member that the hon. member for Waterloo has the floor and cannot be interrupted.

Mr. M. Y. McLEAN. Mr. Speaker——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. CLARE. I have never yet, during the ten years that I have occupied a seat in this House, interrupted any gentleman, and if an hon. gentleman was not in good health, I would do my utmost to assist him. Mr. Speaker, how can we best do our duty to our empire? You know my position now with regard to the navy which is to be constructed in Canada. You know that I do not believe in it. You know that I do not believe that it will be a protection to Canada, or of any assistance to the people of this country. But we should consider and weigh carefully every step that we take in this important matter. The first step is to consult the people of our country; but there may be another duty that we owe before that, and I believe there is. A great many of the people from Europe who have come to this country appreciate the freedom they enjoy in this country from military restrictions and burdens which they experienced in their own countries, and their anxiety is that their adopted country may not repeat the mistakes that those European countries have made. This does not mean that they are not prepared to defend their homes and their country.

Now, is there a way to help the British empire, and do what she asks us to do without committing this country at this time to battleships and to war? I believe there is such a possibility. The Finance Minister of this country should put into the estimates at once a sum sufficient to build on the Atlantic and on the Pacific, dry-docks for the accommodation of our own shipping trade and large enough to accommodate the largest warships of the British empire. That is what Lord Tweedmouth at the colonial conference in 1907 asked the colonies to do. He spoke as follows:

> Then I would like to say a single word on the further point of the provision of docks and coaling facilities in the colonies. The enormous development of the modern warship entails important consequences. These great modern warships require large docks to contain them. I think we are getting on well with the provision of docks. At this moment in our own country and abroad, we have, I think, thirteen government docks which will take in our largest ship, the Dreadnought. I think in the course of the next two years, we shall have four more, which will make about seventeen altogether. But it is very desirable that we should have, in all parts of the world, docks which could take such great ships, supposing they were to meet with an accident or were to receive damage in war.

I ask this government to provide sufficient funds to commence immediately the construction of these great docks, which will no doubt cost a good deal of money, but which will do more for the defence of the empire than the money which the government to-day propose to expend and will at the same time develop our own material resources.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would direct our energies in such a way as to secure for ourselves a foremost position amongst the nations of the world and build upon this half of the continent an active, manly, industrious, intelligent and progressive people, ready to protect their homes, and ready and willing to join with Britain in the defence of the empire. I believe that the best way of preparing for our defence is by steadily, and rapidly, developing the arts of peace—by peopling the almost boundless virgin lands of Canada with a teeming population, of the best agricultural classes, ready at all times to defend their altars, their institutions, and their homes; to encourage and to build up immense manufacturing industries, which will not only supply the wants of our agricultural population, and afford them a profitable home market, but which will also use up our rich resources of raw material, and export abundant quantities of fully manufactured goods to every quarter of the globe. To this end would bring the wide borders of Canada into closer communication with each other, and with the world, by improving and multiplying our avenues of intercourse—our transportation facilities —by land and water, internally, and by the sea until we should have not only an unrivalled internal transportation system (for which nature has in such generous measure endowed us) but a merchant marine, as well, carrying the products of our farms, our fisheries, our mines, and manufactures, to the markets of the nations, and successfully competing for a share, and a large share, of the carrying trade of the oceans. To this end, I would especially encourage the development of our mines and the industries incidental to mining, increase harbour and transhipment facilities, build dry-docks, and restore to Canada again in ships of steel, the ship-building industry she enjoyed in the days of wooden vessels. In a word, I would develop the material resources of Canada all along the line, maintaining as far as may be, peace within her borders, and food, and raiment, and contentment, within all her homes. Canada within the empire, and of the empire, pursuing peace and giving no ground of offence, but still ready to protect our homes, our country, and our empire.

Mr. D. B. NEELY (Humboldt). I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that the House has listened with interest, if not with considerable surprise, to the new doctrine just laid down by the hon. member for South Waterloo (Mr. Clare). That hon. gentleman seems to consider it a crime for members on this side to express their united approval of the Naval Bill proposed by the right hon. the leader of the government. My hon. friend seems to consider the opposition position a most happy and fortunate one—a position in which every man thinks as he pleases, in which every one has a policy of his own, and the conclusion of which is anarchy. Well, if the position of members on this side, who are unanimous in their support of the government proposition, be slavery, then, I say, give me slavery.

Mr. CLARE.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. NEELY. And if the position in which hon. gentlemen on the opposite side find themselves be freedom, then, I say, I want no such freedom. It is rather singular to hear from hon. gentlemen opposite expressions of approval of their divided position on this question. They seem to think there is some merit in it. That certainly was not the stand they took a year ago when this matter was discussed on the motion of the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster). It certainly was not the position held by the hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden) at that time, for I have his words here as reported in 'Hansard' of March 29 last:

> I come now to a consideration of the resolution moved by the right hon. gentleman, and I will say that with many portions of it I am in entire sympathy. But I would like to make one or two suggestions to the right hon. gentleman, and I do not make them in any party or carping spirit, because if there is one thing more than another I would desire, it is that the policy of Canada on this great question and the resolution announcing it should meet with the absolute and unanimous approval of this parliament and country.

That is the position which the leader of the opposition took with reference to the necessity for unanimity, and that expressed apparently the general desire of the House last year when the question of defence was first introduced. The general opinion then appeared to be that the parliament of Canada should present a solid front on this question, not only to the people of Canada, but to all the nations of the world which might be interested in what Canada should do in this matter of imperial defence. I want to ask a question—and I think it is one we have the right to ask and demand an answer to—who is responsible for the receding from the position which the members of this House took last year on the resolution of March 29? Who is responsible for the receding from the position of unanimity, which then seemed to be the desire of hon. members on both sides? I am sure that I am stating what cannot well be gainsaid, when I say that among hon. members on this side, when the House prorogued last year, as we wended our ways to our several homes, there was in our hearts a feeling of contentment and satisfaction that on this great national question, this question as to what Canada should do in the way of assisting in imperial defence and towards maintaining her own integrity as a nation and defending her own coasts, both sides of the House had been unanimous in supporting the resolution we had adopted. Have the Liberal party in this House, have the members of the government receded from the position they took last year on this question? I say they have not. The right hon. the leader of the government has introduced a Bill exactly along the lines suggested by that resolution.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. NEELY. And exactly in harmony with the conclusions arrived at by the delegates of this government who were sent to consult with the imperial authorities as a result of the passing of the resolution of March 29 last. Why, then, do we find this change of attitude on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite? What is the reason? Some of them tell us that the proposals of the government are not in harmony with the resolution passed on the 29th March of last year. But, Sir, the insurrection had begun, the defection from the resolution of March 29 had been completed, before the government brought down its Naval Bill.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. NEELY. This House had hardly risen last year when from various political quarters there were murmurs of dissent, which gradually rose to clamour and then became a storm of disapproval on the part of certain political gentlemen who occupy seats opposite, against the resolution they had agreed to unanimously last year.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. NEELY. Then, to crown it all, there came the announcement from the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) that, so far from continuing to support that resolution, he was opposed to Canada doing anything whatever towards the defence of Canada or the empire. That is the situation to-day, and it is one these hon. gentlemen cannot get out of. As I have listened to the debates in this House from day to day, I have not yet heard any good or valid reason advanced for this political somersault which these hon. gentlemen have performed. So that, so far as unanimity is concerned, I think that we on this side have decidedly the best of the argument. What was the position when this House rose last year? We had passed a resolution calling for the speedy construction of a naval service for the defence of Canada and to aid in the defence of the empire; but certain gentlemen opposite, after they had taken a little further time to consider, evidently came to the conclusion that they had made a political mistake, or a mistake of some kind, and revised their views, and came out in favour of another policy—the policy of a direct contribution to the British admiralty. It is useless for hon. gentlemen opposite to try to mislead the public as to what they understood by the terms of the resolution of March 29, 1909, because we have the statement of the hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) after the House rose, not on one, but on many occasions, as to what he understood the terms of that resolution to be. On July 1, in London, the hon. the leader of the opposition, addressing the Colonial Club, used the following language:

> Some feeling was created in the British islands owing to the fact that Canada had not by resolution or by speech from the Prime Minister vouchsafed the offer of one, two or three Dreadnoughts. He (Mr. Borden) thought the resolution in the form in which it was passed, while its terms might not upon their surface seem as significant at the moment as the offer of one or two Dreadnoughts would have been, laid down a permanent policy for the Dominion of Canada, upon which both parties united, and which would serve a more practical purpose than any such offer of Dreadnoughts.

That is the position taken after the House had risen last year by the leader of the opposition. But this was not the only occasion. Speaking at different places throughout this country the hon. gentleman, and also the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) took exactly the same stand. So I say that these hon. gentlemen must not attempt to lead the country to believe that they did not understand the effect or the intention of the terms of the resolution of 1909.

We all know the history of the question of defence in its relation to the resolution passed by this House last year. The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) introduced a resolution relating to the defence of Canada. This was on the order paper month after month, and was finally brought to the point of discussion, amended in a form that was finally agreed upon by the Prime Minister, and the leader of the opposition, and adopted by the members of this House unanimously. That is, briefly, the history of the introduction of the question to this House. There can be no question, but that the members of this House understood the purpose and intent of the resolution passed on March 29, last year. What is the position taken by these hon. gentlemen to-day? It was of great interest to members on this side of the House, and I am sure to the people of Canada generally, to watch the movement in the various political quarters, after the House adjourned last year, that movement which was ultimately to lead to an absolute reversal of policy on the part of the opposition. My personal sympathies were very largely with the leader of the opposition, because I could see the enormous pressure that was being brought to bear on him from various sections of his own political camp. The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Molloy) in his speech last night, gave us an indication of where this insurrection in the ranks of the opposition party commenced, and the position of the leader of the opposition in this political crisis in the history of his party was one that certainly commanded, I believe, the sympathy of every member on this side of the House. He was something like the leader of the Israelites in the days of old when he brought his people up to the banks of the Red Sea, hedged in by the terms of the resolution of 1909, confronted by a cold sea of dissent as represented by the attitude of his political allies in Quebec, and behind him, Sir, an insurrectionist horde, who shouted out at the tops of their voices: Give us Dreadnoughts, or, as patriots, we die. That was the position in which the leader of the opposition found himself a few months after the close of this House last year. That was a crucial moment in the political career of the hon. the leader of the opposition. The eyes of all Canada were attracted towards the hon. gentleman to see whether or not he had the strength and the stamina of the statesman, the strength necessary to resist this tide of insurrection. Sir, it seems apparent from the attitude he has taken on this question that those instruments of torture so feelingly and lovingly referred to by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), the rack, and the thumb-screw, and the composing-room were too much for the strength of the hon. gentleman, and I say it advisedly he was compelled to strike his colours. The result to-day is that we have two policies—shall I say two, more likely two dozen—because while we have on this side of the House one policy, and one policy alone, a Canadian navy, to be constructed in Canada, to be operated by Canadians as far as possible, to be under the control, and jurisdiction of the Canadian parliament, we have on the opposite side of the House almost as many different policies as there are members on that side. Is it a crime to be unanimous in support of the policy of the government on this question? Just consider what the position of the Dominion of Canada would be to-day with a great question of such vital moment to this country before the government for their decision if, instead of the present government, we had on the treasury benches the hon. gentlemen who are now sitting, to their very great regret, in the cold shades of opposition. Where would the country be, where would this House be on this great question of national defence? One policy by the leader of the opposition, another by his chief lieutenant in the province of Quebec, and still other policies from his other lieutenants from the other provinces of Canada. I say, Sir, it would surely not be a happy position for this country or for this House if these gentlemen had the settling of the question of Canada's policy on this great subject of national and imperial defence.

The policy laid down by the House and the government last year was intended to be the permanent policy of the Dominion of Canada on the question of her contribution to her own and to the imperial defence. I submit that this new departure, the doctrine of a plebiscite, the doctrine of submitting this question to the people of Canada as to what shall be done, has no bearing whatever on the question now under our consideration. We did not hear a word about a plebiscite in March of last year—not a single word. Hon. members who spoke from the opposition benches seemed to consider it a national duty, seemed to consider it a responsibility of which we, as the parliament of Canada could not divest ourselves—namely, the duty of policing the seas for the protection of our own marine, our sea commerce and the coast line of this Dominion. They then represented not a question for reference to the people but a question lying wholly within the authority and competency and responsibility of this parliament. In view of the attitude of the two parties on this question, in view of the attitude taken by the leader of the opposition and his followers, and the attitude of the government in support of the Bill which has been introduced let me ask the question: What good do hon. gentlemen opposite expect to result even supposing the question of defence were submitted to the people? Hon. gentlemen opposite have a policy of their own, a policy of contributing $20,000,000 or $25,000,000 at once to the British admiralty to be used in strengthening the British fleet. Surely, they do not expect us to take the position that, if the peope are not willing to support the proposition of a Canadian navy they are willing to support the proposition of a direct contribution. For, in one case, we are interpreting the national duty, or what this House last year unanimously declared to be the national duty. These hon. gentlemen propose to take $20,000,000 or $25,000,000 of Canada's money and send it across the sea where it shall be spent absolutely regardless of the voice of the people who sent it. I say that is a new proposition—that there should be a plebiscite on the question of a Canadian navy and no plebiscite on the question of a contribution. Now, if it be conceded that, if there is a plebiscite it should cover the whole ground of the question of what course this parliament should pursue on the question of defence, the ballot paper presented to the people of Canada would certainly be a very complex document. We should have a series of questions:

1. Are you in favour of a Canadian navy, or are you opposed to a Canadian navy?

2. Are you in favour of a direct contribution to the British admiralty for the strengthening of the British fleet, or are you opposed to such a direct contribution?

3. Are you in favour, or are you against, both the establishment of a Canadian navy and the giving of a direct contribution?

4. If in favour of a direct contribution, how often should we give it?

Then, we might throw in a question for the benefit of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) who seems to have grave doubts as to the loyalty of a large section of the people of Canada:

5. Are you in favour of the empire, or are you against the empire?

That would settle in that hon. gentleman's mind the question whether a large section of the people of Canada are or are not loyal to the British flag and the British Crown.

Mr. EDWARDS. The hon. member might submit that to the leaders of the Liberal party. That would answer my purpose.

Mr. NEELY. I have not heard the leaders of the Liberal party ever express any sentiments similar to those expressed by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards). And I want to say, as a Liberal, that I resent the imputation made in this House in a speech of that hon. member when he undertook to insinuate that the followers of the Prime Minister in this country in the province of Quebec were not loyal to the British Crown.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker,—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Sit down.

Mr. SPEAKER. The rule of the House is well known. No hon. member can be required to answer any question. Nor can he be interrupted except to order, or for a personal explanation by his consent. Otherwise, he has the floor.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. member (Mr. Neely) consents to a question being put to him—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, I am addressing myself to you.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Edwards) raises a question of order, he should be heard.

Mr. EDWARDS. I am rising to a question of privilege. The hon. gentleman has said that—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member (Mr. Edwards) must be allowed to state his point of order.

Mr. CARVELL. He does not say it is a point of order, but a question of privilege.

Mr. SPEAKER. He must be allowed to speak.

Mr. EDWARDS. The hon. member (Mr. Neely) has misrepresented me as stating that the people of a large section of this country are disloyal. There is nothing in my speech to justify that statement, and I have the right to ask the hon. member either to substantiate this charge by quoting the words I used, or else withdraw his charge.

Mr. NEELY. I think I have a fair understanding of the ordinary words of the English language. I have listened to the hon. member's words, and I have read and re-read his words in 'Hansard,' and I cannot come to any other conclusion than that I have stated. If the hon. member states that he did not mean that, that he was not trying to cast a reflection on the loyalty of a large section of our French Canadian people, I shall be compelled by the rules of the House to accept his explanation.

Mr. EDWARDS. I would simply refer the hon. gentleman (Mr. Neely) to my own remarks in answer to the statement he has made—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. member (Mr. Edwards) refers to his own words, he must be allowed to state his own interpretation of them. If he wishes to give his words a meaning, he must state what that meaning is.

Mr. EDWARDS. I emphatically declare ——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. Speaker——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) has risen to a point of order.

Mr. EDWARDS. I have asked the hon. member (Mr. Neely) to withdraw his statement to the effect that I charged the people of a large section of this country with disloyalty. I never made such a charge, and I ask the hon. member to withdraw it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member (Mr. Edwards) says that he has made no such statement. His statement must be accepted

Mr. NEELY. I said, before the hon. gentleman rose, on this question of privilege, that if he repented of the apparent meaning of his words—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. NEELY. I was perfectly willing to accept his statement.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, I appeal to you. I contend that the hon. gentleman must withdraw his statement, and I ask your ruling.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. NEELY. Well, when I was interrupted——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. NEELY. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. Withdraw first.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask your ruling?

Mr. SPEAKER. I presume the House wishes the rules to be observed. I have tried this afternoon to have them enforced. When a statement is made by an hon. member that a certain meaning was attached to his words, his statement must be accepted. The hon. member for Humboldt will have to submit to the rule.

Mr. NEELY. With all deference to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, I do not see in what respect or particular I came under the rule of the House which you have quoted.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. NEELY. As far as the hon. gentleman is concerned, I made the statement that if I understand the ordinary meaning of the English language, and I think I do, my interpretation of the hon. member's words, and the hon. gentleman's words as recorded in 'Hansard,' is that they impute disloyalty to a large section of the people of this country.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Withdraw.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask your ruling again.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. I have stated what the rule of the House is, and I presume the House wants the rule observed. The moment an hon. member states that he meant or did not mean a certain thing, the interpretation placed upon his own words by himself must be accepted. That is the rule of the House. The moment the hon. member for Frontenac has made that statement, his statement must be accepted.

Mr. NEELY. I stated before——

Mr. SPEAKER. The only thing is to accept the statement.

Mr. NEELY. I stated I was quite willing to accept the hon. gentleman's interpretation. I am still free to take the position that the hon. gentleman chose the wrong words and the wrong phraseology altogether to express his intention.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. Speaker, I submit that I have the floor.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member for Humboldt has accepted the hon. gentleman's statement, I understand.

Mr. EDWARDS. I did not so understand it.

Mr. SPEAKER. He certainly can proceed to discuss the speech of the hon. member.

Mr. EDWARDS. I did not so understand him.

Mr. SPEAKER. I understand the hon. member for Humboldt to accept the statement made by the hon. member for Frontenac.

Mr. EDWARDS. Very well, if you so understand it, I will accept your interpretation.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I do not think that the hon. gentleman has accepted it. He accepted it in the first place and then immediately afterwards reiterated his first statement. I do not regard that as——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I was stating——

Mr. NEELY. Mr. Speaker has decided the question.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. If the hon. gentleman will take his seat until the point of order has been discussed and settled——

Mr. NEELY. It has been discussed and settled.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. No, it has not. I was raising a point of order to this effect, that although the hon. gentleman did make a pretense of accepting, he, nevertheless, immediately afterwards reiterated his first statement, and I do not think, with all deference, that that is the way in which an hon. member's statement in this House with regard to the meaning of his words ought to be accepted.

Mr. NEELY. Where is the point of order? The hon. leader of the opposition insinuates that I made a pretense of accepting the statement of the hon. member for Frontenac. I submit that his words are out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER. There is no use of trying to evade the rule of the House. A statement of the meaning or intent of his own words made by an hon. gentleman must be accepted.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. Speaker, having got round this somewhat difficult point of order—

Mr. EDWARDS. Will the hon. member permit me a question?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. NEELY. If the hon. member for Frontenac expects me to make any further statement on this question he has my statement now, and that is the only one that I shall make with respect to the matter. I have told him that I am perfectly willing to accept his interpretation of his own remarks. I also make the statement that that was not the interpretation put upon his words by myself and a large majority of the members of this House.

Mr. EDWARDS. You dare not quote my remarks.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. NEELY. When I was interrupted by the hon. member, I was referring to the complex situation that would be brought about in this country, if we submit the many policies which have been propounded in this House to the people of Canada for their decision, and I was proceeding to mention that one of the questions that would have to be inserted would be the question as to whether or not we were against the empire, to meet the point raised in this discussion as to the interpretation to be placed upon the speech of the hon. member for Frontenac. I submit that it is a fair proposition that if anything is to be submitted to the people of Canada every phase of this question ought to be submitted, and how much further ahead would this House or this country be by a referendum of the whole question of imperial defence? The only reason at all that I have heard from the benches of the opposition as to their complete reversal of policy on this question was the somewhat novel statement made by the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Nantel) who told the House, as his speech was interpreted to me, as I unfortunately do not understand French, that he voted last year for the resolution passed by the House because the Prime Minister said that there was a German peril. But this year he would vote against the establishment of a Canadian navy because he understood that the German peril was over. While that may be a very novel explanation for the hon. gentleman to make to this House, it does not meet the case as far as other hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House are concerned, because the only reason that has been advanced by the opposition why they have made this right about face on the question of Canada's defence is that they claim there is an emergency in the affairs of the empire, and that Great Britain is subject to imminent peril by the construction of an enormous fleet of battleships by the people of Germany. Suppose we take the position of the hon. gentleman for granted, that there is an emergency, that there is a crisis in the affairs of the empire? Do these hon. gentlemen undertake to tell us that a contribution of $20,000,000 is going to materially affect that crisis or that emergency? Do they mean to tell us that a single gift of $20,000,000 is the margin of safety between the British empire and the power of the German navy? It seems to be the position taken by these hon. gentlemen that the margin of safety for the empire is a gift by Canada of $20,000,000.

If they do not hold to that position they must take the other, viz.: that if $20,000,000 is not a margin of safety we must continue this contribution periodically. I submit that not a single member of the opposition has answered the question asked by the member for Red Deer early in this debate: What is their future policy on the question of Canada's part in the defence of the empire? The other day the member for St. Anne (Mr. Doherty) told us that we on this side were raising a fictitious objection to a contribution when we said that a contribution savoured of tribute to Great Britain. Now, I want to press home this question to hon. gentlemen opposite: if the policy of a direct contribution is adopted as the permanent policy of this country, then these contributions must become periodic, and in that light I do say that they become a tribute on the people of Canada for the support of the British navy. We will either make this contribution as a duty, or as a matter of charity, and I do not think any man in this House will say we are doing it as a matter of charity. Then, if we do it as a matter of duty it certainly becomes a tribute from the people of Canada, and as such it is a case of taxation without representation. Now, suppose for argument sake we take it for granted there is an emergency as hon. gentlemen opposite have told us, where was that emergency in March, 1909? Were there not the same conditions existing in the affairs of the empire in March, 1909, as at the present time? And, if there is a peril, or a menace from the growth of the German navy, and if that peril becomes greater as the years go by shall Canada be called upon next year, and the year after to furnish further sums of $20,000,000 or $25,000,000 by way of contribution to the British fleet? My very strong objection to the policy laid down by the leader of the opposition is that in order to be effective—and these hon. gentlemen are very handy with the word 'effective' in declaring that the Canadian navy cannot be made effective—my objection to the policy of the leader of the opposition is that if a contribution is to be made effective it must become the permanent policy of the country to contribute periodically a certain sum. Mr. Speaker, my very strongest objections to the policy of direct contribution have already been stated and restated to the House, but I may say that the very strongest arguments advanced against the policy of contribution have come from hon. gentlemen opposite themselves. When the member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) introduced his resolution last year he took very strong ground against the policy of direct contribution by Canada to Great Britain, and I shall quote from his speech one or two brief sentences merely to emphasize the position I now take. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) in discussing the policy of a contribution said:

> The first and greatest objection which I have to a fixed money contribution is that it bears the aspect of hiring somebody else to do what we ourselves ought to do; as though a man, the father of a family, in lusty health and strength, should pay his neighbour something per month for looking after the welfare and safety of his home instead of doing that duty himself.

Further on he said:

> The interest that we take in a contribution spent by another is not the interest that I desire for Canada.

And Sir, I want to say that the last objection taken by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) against the policy of contribution appeals very strongly to me. The member for East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) at the conclusion of an able address on this question expressed very eloquently his feelings of loyalty and patriotism towards the motherland, and he said:

> I have unbounded faith in my King and country, and undying belief in the empire to which I belong. Let the British navy continue to be the floating bulwark of our land and her parliament our guiding star. The most effective contribution we could make, and one which may never need to be repeated, would be to give to England's navy two Dreadnoughts. Then if you must build a navy, submit the whole question to the Canadian people. I am prepared to assist in maintaining the splendid inheritance received from our forefathers. I love my country, I believe in her, I honour her, I am prepared to work for her, to live for her, and, if needs be, die for her.

And yet, Mr. Speaker, that hon. gentleman advocates a policy which would absolutely prevent himself or any other Canadian dying for his country. His policy is: give your money to Great Britain, have no Canadian navy, give the young men of Canada no opportunity to take up this life on the sea. And yet he would die for his country. I submit, Sir, that the only dying the hon. gentleman could do under the policy he lays down would be to die by proxy. But, that is not the kind of sacrifice which we as loyal Canadians and British subjects owe to the empire which is the protector of our liberties. The objection taken by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) to a contribution is that it does not foster in the hearts of our Canadian people sentiments of patriotism and loyalty as would the establishment of a Canadian navy in which the young men of Canada could enter on a career which might ultimately lead them to lay down their lives for the defence of Canada, and for the defence of the empire. That is the position which I also hold on the policy of a direct contribution.

On the other hand, Sir, hon. gentlemen opposite have very serious objections to the proposal for the establishment of a Canadian navy, and they attack that policy on various grounds. The member for Ste. Anne (Mr. Doherty) spent three mortal hours in an evident effort to convince himself that it was his duty to vote against the Naval Bill proposed by this government. And his final conclusion of the whole matter was that because Canada had no voice in the foreign policy of the empire, therefore, the Naval Bill as proposed by the government was subversive of the rights of autonomy and self-government possessed by the Canadian people. Is that the position taken by the ultra-loyalists from the city of Toronto or other parts of the province of Ontario? No, Sir. They attack us from another quarter. They call the navy proposed by this Bill a separatist navy. I do not know who coined that word. I think probably it was coined in the columns of that apostle of yellow journalism, the Toronto 'Mail and Empire,' which is making extensive use of it—which calls the Prime Minister of Canada a separatist and the proposed navy a separatist navy, simply because the control of that navy is to be in the hands of the Canadian parliament. And yet the hon. member for Ste. Anne comes along with another story, that the establishment of that navy is subversive of the autonomy of Canada. Why, Sir, it is just the old thing over again—one story for the French-speaking people of the province of Quebec and another story for the English-speaking people of the province of Ontario. That is the old game; we are used to it; we had lots to do with it in the last election. I came across an interesting pamphlet during that election. I represent a constituency one part of which is inhabited by a large Roman Catholic population and another part by a number of staunch and influential Orange lodges. One day when I was visiting in the neighbourhood of these Orange lodges, a friend of mine passed me a pamphlet which I had not come across before. On its back was printed in large letters, 'Pass this to a friend,' and on the front was printed the name of the pamphlet, 'The Duty of the Hour.' I did not find that pamphlet in the other part of my constituency; but I am free to tell my hon. friends opposite that I had a couple of thousand copies of it struck off and sent all over the constituency. I will not say that it did me any good or any harm. My view is that on all these great public questions there should be but one policy: it should be a Canadian policy, and it should be adaptable to the people of the English-speaking provinces and equally adaptable to the people of the province of Quebec. Sir, I am always a little suspicious when I see hon. gentlemen on the opposition benches beginning to wave the flag. There has been a lot of waving of the flag in this debate; there has been a great deal of talk about loyalty and disloyalty. Now, loyalty is one of those virtues that do not need to be proclaimed from the housetops in order to convince people that it reposes in our breasts. I think loyalty is evidenced far more by deeds than by words; and while these hon. gentlemen waved the flag and talked about loyalty so much, I failed to find any sufficient evidence to lead me to believe that there is any more loyalty in their ranks than there is on this side of the House, even among my friends from the province of Quebec.

Now, Sir, it is not my intention to discuss at any great length my reasons for supporting the Bill before the House. I am a Canadian, and love my country. I believe that as Canada has reached her present status in wealth, in material resources, and in population, the time has come when we should contribute something towards the defence of our coasts, and towards maintaining the integrity of the empire. But I believe in doing what we do in our own way. I think that is a fair, and a right position, I think that is in accordance with the great body of sentiment on the other side of the Atlantic. I read the other day a clipping from the London 'Times,' a good Tory newspaper, one of the most influential in Great Britain, and that paper strongly endorsed the measure of this government now before this House. It claimed that the principle laid down in this measure, that the Canadian navy should be subject to the control of the Canadian parliament, was the right principle in every particular. But our friends on the opposition benches must out-Tory the Tories; they must be stronger in their expressions of loyalty to the British Crown than even the people across the water, who ought to know more about questions of defence than we in this country, who have had so little experience in matters of this kind.

In conclusion, I wish to say that I am strongly in favour of the proposition of the government, representing as I do a constituency of western Canada. We have in Canada a cosmopolitan population. In my own constituency, while there are a great many English-speaking people, there are also many people from various countries all over the world. These people have come to our shores to become Canadian citizens, and I am firmly convinced that the great majority of those who have come from foreign countries, and have taken the oath of allegiance to the British Crown, after three or four years of residence under British institutions, are as loyal to those institutions as are the people who are born and bred under them; because by contrast they have been led to see the great superiority of British institutions to the institutions of many of the countries of continental Europe. I tell you, Sir, that I would not like to go back to my constituency and face these people on this question of naval defence, and have to admit to them that the parliament of Canada, who the people of Canada have elected to do their duty, came to the conclusion that Canada was not big enough, had not brains or resources enough, to work out for herself the question of her own national defence. I say that, particularly in the case of our American cousins who have crossed the borders, and become Canadian citizens, it would be perfect folly to tell them that we had adopted the policy of sending Canadian money out of the country simply because we had not the confidence in ourselves to carry through this project on our own behalf. In the west we are just at the beginning of our prosperity. Thanks to the policy of this government, thanks to its transportation and immigration policy, the last few years have certainly witnessed very great developments in our western territories, and we are glad to know that this government proposes to do a great deal more. We are glad to know that it proposes, in the very early future, to construct a railway to Hudson bay. That in itself will be a great contribution to imperial defence, because it will shorten the route from our western grain fields to the markets of the world, and provide a route which will, from its northern situation, be one of the safest by which the products of western Canada can be shipped to the British market. On behalf of the people I represent, I shall support the policy of the government, which means the development of Canada's own resources by Canadian money, and the giving of an opportunity to the young men of this country to follow a career on the sea in the defence of Canada and the empire.

Mr. J. D. REID (Grenville). I shall only take up a few minutes of the time of the House, and I would not do so except for the reason that I do not care to give a silent vote on this great question. But, although this debate has taken some time, that time has been well spent, in my opinion, because it has brought the question before the people in a way in which it never would have been brought to their attention had this discussion not taken place. I believe the question should be discussed on a broad principle. So far as the question of loyalty is concerned, I do not think that should be brought into the debate at all. I believe that our people, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, are all loyal and anxious to do what is best in the interest of Canada and the empire as a whole; and for that reason I would have liked to have seen a Bill brought down which would have secured the unanimous support of both sides. I think, myself, that it would have been much better had the right hon. the Prime Minister submitted his Bill to my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition, in which case they might possibly have come to an agreement on some measure, and thus have secured its unanimous approval. However, as that has not been done, we must discuss the matter as we have it before us.

A great deal has been said about the resolution of March, 1909. My hon. friend who has just spoken (Mr. Neely) claims that we on this side are not carrying out the policy which was enunciated in that resolution. Well, so far as I am concerned, if circumstances have changed since then, I can see no reason why we should not meet them as they exist. At that time, an emergency was believed to exist, or to be on the verge of existing in the empire, and we were unanimous in the opinion that something should be done. The Prime Minister, and every hon. gentleman on that side, agreed that something should be done, and so did we on this side, and to-day we are here with two propositions as to what should be done—that of the Prime Minister and that of the leader of the opposition. In these propositions we differ, but so far as the resolution is concerned which was passed in March last, we all agreed that there was an emergency and that something should be done. But at that time also, there were differences of opinion concerning that resolution. The Toronto 'Globe' then took a different position from the one it takes to-day, so that the Toronto 'Globe' has changed its front on this question. The right hon. the Prime Minister has also undergone a change of view, because at that time, in March last, he had no intention or expectation that a Canadian navy would ever be built. He simply wished us to pass a resolution but did not intend to build a Canadian navy. It was only when he found that the sentiment in this country was such that something had to be done, that he brought down this Bill. My hon. friend (Mr. Neely), who has just spoken, has told us that great pressure was brought on the leader of the opposition in order to induce him to submit the policy he has laid before us. Sir, it was not necessary to bring any pressure on the leader of the opposition, because the policy he has submitted is the one that he always advocated. But what about the Prime Minister? Pressure was brought on the right hon. gentleman to bring down the present measure. I am convinced that had he consulted his own wishes, he would not have proposed to build a Canadian navy or even offered a Dreadnought.

We may take it for granted that England is not building these Dreadnoughts or increasing her navy simply for her own gratification, but because she feels bound to do so in order to maintain the position on the high seas which she has had for hundreds of years. It is because other nations are building Dreadnoughts and threatening her supremacy that England has to follow suit. Her people have to pay the extra expenditure to maintain this increased navy, and surely it is time that Canada should do something to assist the mother country in the great strain which has been put upon her?

The right hon. the Prime Minister has told us that this proposition which he has brought down has been before the people since 1902. Well, so far as I am concerned, I never heard of it until this session, and I cannot recall any speech, either by the right hon. gentleman or those behind him, in any part of this Dominion, in which any intention to build a Canadian navy was expressed. The first time I heard of this policy was when the proposition was submitted to this House, and I certainly think that, in deference to the people, they should be given an opportunity to pronounce upon this great change in the future of Canada before we undertake to put them in the position in which they will be placed once this navy is built.

So far as the protection of this great British empire is concerned, let me ask this question. Of what use has the British navy been to Canada in the past, and what use may it be to us in the future? Have we had any profit or benefit as Canadians from this great navy? Let me give two or three instances, and I could mention many, to show what use this British navy has been to us in the past. A few years ago, in 1886 or 1887, the Canadian sealing vessels with their cargoes, were seized and confiscated by the United States government. The people of British Columbia immediately reported the matter to the Prime Minister of Canada, who at once sent word to England that our Canadians were being injured in British Columbia, that their sealing vessels had been taken and the catch of seals confiscated. England at once notified the United States that they were doing wrong and, on account of the protection of the British navy to Canadians, the poor men in British Columbia were paid $465,000 for the goods that had been taken, the vessels were returned, and $49,500 compensation given to their crews. Had it not been for the protection of the British navy does any hon. gentleman suppose that the people in British Columbia would have got a dollar? The United States knew that we had the protection not only of the British navy, but of every British soldier, that every soldier of the king was prepared to shed his blood and die for these men, Canadians as they were, on the coast of British Columbia.

Two years ago an illustration was afforded from the Atlantic coast. The hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) and Mr. Roche, then member for Halifax, informed the House that three Nova Scotia fishermen had been arrested in Uruguay, that they were in prison, and that something should be done by this government to secure justice for them. The Prime Minister at once cabled to England, and without another word a British Dreadnought was sent to Uruguay, the men were released and publicly apologized to, and were recompensed for the wrong done to them. Remember that that Dreadnought was sent there at the expense of the British taxpayer.

Then we remember that a man named McGee, of Montreal, was arrested in Guatemala. The question was brought to the attention of the Prime Minister, and it was with delight that our Prime Minister immediately cabled to England, saying: One of our British subjects, a subject of your king, has been arrested in Guatemala, and justice should be done. A British war vessel was sent to San José, in Guatemala, and the man was released at once. The British commander had him apologized to, and on asking the man what had been done to him, he was informed that the prisoner had been given fifty stripes. The commander said: Pay $500 for every stripe, or off go the guns—and they paid $125,000. These are instances where the navy has been of use to Canada in the past. Then what about our Canadian missionaries in China, when they were threatened with murder? The very fact that they were under the British flag was enough to save them from being murdered. We have had many such cases in the past. What use will this navy be in the future? It may indeed happen that some other Canadian may get into trouble. Will it not be with delight that the Prime Minister can stand up and say: I shall cable to England and say: Send another Dreadnought to protect this Canadian. There is no danger of his sending our Canadian navy because if he sends a vessel from our navy the chances are that any war vessel of any other country will destroy it before it reaches its port of destination. Thus, so far as I am concerned, I say that in the future this Canadian navy will not be of any benefit or assistance in protecting Canadians abroad, and we must appeal to our great British navy in order to obtain protection.

Supposing we were to send to England an amount sufficient to build two Dreadnoughts, call them Ontario and Quebec if you like. Then we would feel under no obligation whatever if anything should happen to Canadians, and we should cable over to England asking that a Dreadnought be sent to protect Canadians, who might get into trouble because, if they could not send one of those Dreadnoughts we had built ourselves, any other would do. Would we not also feel proud in case of war to know that Ontario and Quebec were at the head of the great navy and would probably be the ones that would destroy or assist to destroy any enemy that might attack the British empire? The last speaker (Mr. Neely) laid great stress on taxation without representation. We have had many cases since I have been in this House of the payment of contribution, but we never heard the question of taxation without representation raised. This session we cheerfully remitted an amount to help those who suffered from the floods of France; we sent that aid with delight and pride, but we did not ask to have representation in France because we had sent that contribution. We did the same thing in the Crimea, and there have been other instances in which we sent contributions. We sent money to San Francisco, but we did not ask representation in the United States.

Canada is going to be a great country. We have great resources, we have great minerals, we have a great agricultural country, and we are advancing very, very fast. Surely it is time that we were doing something in order to do our part in the defence of the great British empire. If we intend remaining in the empire, we should not stultify ourselves by remaining there at the expense of those in England, and ask them to protect us. I am, therefore, proud to be able to support the amendment of the hon. the leader of the opposition, because that resolution states that we are willing to do something right now, we are willing to say that we will have in that great navy two Dreadnoughts, and that as soon as we can get the young men trained we will man those Dreadnoughts with Canadians who will take their place in the front ranks of the great battle, should war occur. It is my hope and wish, as it is that of every Canadian and of every man in the British empire, that war should not come. But the very fact of having a great navy will preserve peace in the future as the navy has preserved peace in the past. I shall not take up more time; I simply rose to make these few remarks and to explain why I did not wish to give a silent vote on this question.

Mr. HONORE GERVAIS (St. James, Montreal). Mr. Speaker, with regard to the many services which have been rendered to Canada by Great Britain, some of which have been mentioned by the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. J. D. Reid), I shall not say much, as I agree with that member on that point. I agree also that Canada owes a debt of gratitude to England for these services that have been rendered her in the last hundred years. With regard to the third question which has been raised by the hon. member, the question of the kind of contribution that Canada should give to England, I ask the hon. member for Grenville to agree with me in the position I take and which I shall explain as I proceed. Canada, as I shall show, is ready to grant to England the kind of aid that has been agreed upon between Canada and England. With these few remarks, I proceed to explain the vote that I intend to give on this Bill (No. 95).

Mr. Speaker. I took a great deal of interest, in the debate which took place in this House in March last, upon the resolution concerning the aid to be given to Great Britain for the strengthening of the British navy. It is now proposed that Canada should take a step further in that direction, and the government asks parliament to crystallize that resolution, and give it effect by the passage of this legislation entitled 'an Act respecting the Naval Service of Canada'; and a subsequent resolution providing for the expenditure necessary for the establishment of that service. By the 53rd clause of this Bill, the government will be empowered to organize a permanent volunteer naval force, at its expense, the ships to be built in Canada, manned and commanded by Canadians, or commanded by officers appointed by Canada, to defend Canada, first, and assist England in its defence, in case of need, under the command in chief of the King, as is required by the political status of this Dominion.

Sir, let me explain some of the many reasons for which this Bill should be passed:

During the recess of parliament a rather lengthy conference between the representatives of the British government, and of the self-governing colonies was held in London to determine the kind of aid that should be given to England. This conference was the natural outcome of previous meetings held between some of the British ministers and the representatives of the most important of the three classes which we find amongst the 80 colonies or possessions under the sovereignty of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. The universal policy of the world is shaping itself towards the supplanting of territorial, or local, or internal trade, by a general or universal trade, or in other words a maritime commerce.

The government is to-day, asking the representatives of this country in this House assembled, to declare themselves on the programme which they are presenting for the creation of a naval defence in connection with the large maritime trade which Canadian merchants are building up. As a representative of the most important city of Canada, the commercial metropolis, and the greatest national port of the Dominion, I cannot give a silent vote upon this great issue.

I owe it to my constituents of the city of Montreal, and I owe it to myself to explain, through what process of personal reflection, through what conception and reasoning, I have, freely, independently from all passing pressure and unlinked to any superior influence, formed my opinion upon the plan which the government has submitted to us.

I do not expect to satisfy the expectations of everybody with my declarations and my vote, but, I at least, hope that, those who after mature reasoning, while not thinking as I do, will feel bound to admit that, in so doing, I have nothing in view but the welfare and greatness of my country.

Allow me then, Sir, to indulge in a brief retrospect of the work and progress of some of the great empires of the past, and the greatness of which was based on their maritime trade. Some of my hon. friends have already quoted from the lessons of the past, and I have listened to their statements with great pleasure; because the past will always be for mankind the best teacher. In anything we do, whatever may be our differences, divisions and strifes, we are nevertheless bound to seek, in the past, for our safest methods to solve the problems of the present. History there teaches us that the greatest and the richest and the happiest nations have been those which gave the best of their energies and wealth to the building and maintenance of a great maritime commerce, through the equipment of both a merchant fleet and a war fleet. Allow me to remind you briefly of the best illustrations, which occur to me, of the soundness of my views. Athens, Lacedaemon, Crete, Lesbos, Chios, and all the Greek cities and colonies, were nonentities in the political world until, through a skilful and costly combination of forces, money and ships, and under the guidance of an Athenian admiral (if I am permitted to use a modern term to designate its commander) they put to sea a fleet, powerful enough to repulse Asiatic barbarians and other foes. So long as, but not one minute longer, than they had the most powerful fleet, the Greeks were the governing political leaders of the ancient world. Greece was at its political zenith between the time of the battle of Salamis, and that of Aegos-Potamos, which are the Alpha and Omega of their political and commercial pre-eminence. Rome was a second-class power before the battle of Antium, or, so long as the Romans could not send vessels to conquer Carthage and Asia Minor, and could not rule on the sea as they did on land. During the feudal ages, Venice and Genoa were the supreme arbiters of politics in Europe, just because they were the undisputed masters of the Mediterranean. The most prosperous cities of Europe, during the 400 years from the 12th to the 16th century, were the eighty free towns, holding meetings of their delegates, every three years, either at Lubeck, or Cologne, or Hamburg, for the purpose of assessing the contribution of each town, of securing new trading privileges, and of better defending both old and new ones. Neither a monarchial state, nor a polyarchial state ever enjoyed a greater amount of respect, of prestige from the other monarchies or republics, than those eighty cities composing that quasi-state known, as the Hanseatic League. I contemplate with wonder the enormous waste of human energies and wealth which went to create, upon the ruins of the empire of Venice, that other great Portuguese empire, which was the ruler of the world during the 15th century, just after the discovery of the route to the orient via the Cape of the Tempests, to use the description of Camoens. And then, upon the partition of the unknown world by Pope Nicholas V, in 1454, and Alexander VI in 1493, Spain reached out for America, and astonished Europe by the vastness and richness of her new discoveries. Spain reigned supreme in Europe, during the 16th century. The Netherlands got the monopoly of the trade of the world, during the 17th century, through the audacity, activity and devotion of its mariners. France, during the 18th century, was the arbiter of the maritime destinies of the world, and it was not until then that she was recognized as the dominating political power in Europe.

England came, after Trafalgar, to become as she remains to-day, the ruling state of the world, just because of the indisputable supremacy of her fleet. But, to-day, other states are organizing merchant fleets, and as a direct consequence, war fleets. Our age will witness the competition of a number of maritime states for the trade supremacy of the world. There are to-day thirty states out of forty-eight going into the maritime trade, and the destinies of the world can no longer rest under the power of a single state. The world's richness is no more to be the easy field of exploitation by a nation having a few thousand daring mariners protecting a great many more thousands of thrifty factors, merchants, traders and shippers. Every state seems ready to send its young men and even its older citizens to conquer the wealth of the unexplored, or undeveloped countries. A universal thirst for business and its profits, for gold, is manifest in every quarter. And in every state there is—and it is quite natural—a tendency to equip on the seas, a fleet of both merchantmen and warships to defend its interests; the one cannot go without the other. States of to-day are getting more and more commercialized and are preparing themselves to compete for the partition of the universal wealth of the world. But such competition, while it may be friendly at the start, must prove eventually hostile. After the tariff wars, one may easily foresee the wars in which predominance is to be determined by the guns of warships. England is confronted to-day with such a condition of affairs, and Canada cannot longer ignore the situation. The so-called German war scare is but one of them, though I must remind you, Sir, that amongst German officers to-day it is customary to offer a toast to ' The Next Meeting,' meaning on board of the first captured English battleship.

It is at this turning point in the life of England and Canada, that we are invited to consider the possibility of future political difficulties. To make Canada ready for any emergency, several policies are proposed. What are they? The first is: the presentation of two Dreadnoughts now, and then, resting on our oars to await adequate results from an unknown policy of defence. The exponent of the policy is the honourable the leader of the opposition. The second is: Canada is to play the 'manly part,' and very naturally its sponsor is the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster). The third proposed is to do nothing until a plebiscite is had, with a declaration of unalterable devotion to the British Crown as an assurance policy; and, according to the words of that official publication of the late Mr. Hansard, its father is the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), who, after a six months' canvass, has found a few thousand persons, mostly youths, out of 2,000,000 in the province of Quebec, to support his views. Under the fourth head may be classified ten or twelve other varied and variable policies, that I beg leave not to expound, as they are mostly founded upon newspaper quotations, poetical recitations, and historical misapplication. Are all those plans as clear and terse and patriotic as that of the government? I venture to say, Sir, they are not. The first two policies are undefinable, impractical and, therefore, negligible. The third one is illogical and illegal, as it is a denial to this House, acting upon a five-years' mandate, of the right to spend one-thirtieth of the revenues of Canada for its defence, when this House might if it chose waste the whole revenue in buying peanuts. The cabinet, in order to meet the wishes of England, now proposes to this parliament to vote an expenditure of $12,000,000 to build ships once and for all, and to pay for their maintenance yearly, something less than $4,500,000. This, therefore, means a yearly expenditure of one and one third million dollars for maintaining and manning ships, the construction of which has cost $4,000,000.

The purpose of the government plan is obviously to provide a plan of defence for Canada and of help to England, according to the wishes, amounting almost to demands of the latter, which I take to be expressed, conclusively, in the reports of the Naval Defence Conference of 1909, and the circumstances surrounding the same.

Now, Sir, should we resist these desires of England? I have waited, a long time, before giving my very modest view about the solution of this problem, for a great political and economical problem it undeniably is. I say at once, that it is a question to be decided, not according to race, nor religion, nor historical prejudices, but according purely and simply to the teaching of reason, of law, and of devotion to the best interests of our dear country. To begin with, I must, according to my mind, explain the political status of Canada, in relation to the foreign states of the world, and to England, and the definition of that status will go a great way to show that Canada is not free to reject the requests of England. I must say, that I do not agree with most of the speeches, writings and editorials, which have been written, during the last half century about the great amount of independence enjoyed by Canada. I admit that England has been good enough, during that long period, to let our authors, newspapermen, and orators, tell the people of Canada that they were perfectly free and independent of England, and that they were their own masters, both in regard to England, and the other states. This, according to my mind, has been a rather equivocal statement of the position which Canada occupies to-day, both in relation to England, and to the other states. I know it is rather hard and humiliating to say those things to my fellow-citizens, but just the same I feel bound to say it for the purpose of pointing out what is the duty of Canada to-day with regard to the request which is being made upon her by England to assist her in the coming commercial battle. I venture to state that Canada, in this year of 1910, according to the teaching of international law, is simply a province of the British empire, having no status whatever with regard to foreign states. Our country does not possess any of the characteristics (which number eight or ten altogether), of what is called state, and which make an aggregation of people irresponsible to any human power, but—to use a phrase of the fifteenth century—' Responsible only to God.' If I examine the classification of states, I am forced to admit that our country is neither a sovereign state, like England; nor a semi-sovereign state, like Bulgaria was; nor a neutral state, like Belgium, nor a state under protectorate like Tunis; nor even a tributary state like Egypt. Comparison of conditions is here of a great benefit to teach our citizens the truth about their reduced political rank in the eyes of the world. With a political organism subject to the caprices of the parliament at Westminster; without power to make its territories productive by foreign trade; without jurisdiction to pass undefeasible laws; unable to protect its citizens abroad before judicial or administrative authorities; unable to ask for marks of respect; unable to send diplomatic agents; unentitled to foreign recognition; incapable of making treaties, unable, unless authorized to do so, to issue letters patent of command either to army officers or to navy officers even to defend her own territory; here stands Canada to-day, calling herself a nation. By telling my fellow-citizens what we really are, I hope I may convey to them the aspiration of being what they might be. While I am making a rather poor picture of the personality of Canada to-day, I am bound to think that this naval move will tend to increase tremendously the importance of our country, and that is why I am in favour of the passing of this Bill.

Canada to-day has not even the right to speak to a minister of foreign affairs, even through her Prime Minister, unless the latter has been clothed with a letter patent issued by the British Minister of Foreign Affairs. So much so, is this, that during the negotiations of the Franco-Canadian treaty, the Hon. Mr. Fielding, and the Hon. Mr. Brodeur, had to be authorized very minutely by England to speak to the Minister of Trade and Commerce of France, and had to be introduced to the latter by the British Ambassador, in Paris. Let me cite, as the only fact which gives to Canada, what may be styled a recognition by a foreign power, that clause of the Franco-Canadian treaty which allows an employee appointed by Canada to certify bills of lading, or certificates of origin of goods, which may have a legal value. That is about the limit of the action of our country in relation to foreign countries.

I apologize for reminding the House that but a few weeks ago, the Canadian agent in Antwerp had to haul down his sign marked 'Canadian Agency' at the request of the British consul in that city, under the pretense that such action on behalf of the Canadian agent would create possible confusion in the minds of the citizens of Belgium as to the political status of Canada. Canada has no flag, if we do not accept as such the emblem which our merchantmen were some years ago empowered to unfurl at their mastheads. And I do not need to argue very long to show that of international status Canada has none, because the very name of our country 'Dominion,' which our French translators have very proudly, but improperly, translated into the word 'puissance,' should remind us that we are but a domain of the Crown; to use the language of the Act of 1834, defining the powers of the Privy Council of England, and giving to that final tribunal an unlimited jurisdiction over any judgment given by any court in any colony, 'Dominion,' or plantation of His Majesty. In a general way, I could point out many other cases of deception arising out of our political and administrative terminology.

If we examine now the status of Canada under the light of the public law of England, what do we discover? One finds that, though a delegation of powers, a federal legislative body, and nine provincial legislatures are supervising private intercourse between our citizens, the application of the civil laws of France, or the common law of England, the appointment of judges to decide litigations arising out of about 20 contracts, and finally looking over the administration of municipal affairs. No constitutional guarantee, in the constitutional Act of 1867, is to be found limiting the power of Great Britain to impose taxes upon its citizens in Canada. If we look at sections 91 and 92 of that Act, we find that even our power to naturalize British subjects is very limited, because our naturalized British subjects are considered as such exclusively within the territory of Canada, and they are not British subjects within the British Isles, nor even in any British colony outside of Canada. If we examine the statutes of England, we find quite a number of Acts applicable to Canada, and no concern is taken whether they be repugnant or not to the wording of our Canadian statutes. Let me quote, for example, the Colonial Prison Act, the Colonial Offenders' Act, the Colonial Marriage Act, the Colonial Fortification Act, the Colonial Courts Act, the Colonial Clergy Act, the Colonial Attorney' Act, the Colonial Laws Act, the Naturalization Act, the Merchant Shipping Act, the Bills of Exchange Act, and last but not least, the Colonial Laws Validity Act, 1865, 28-29 Victoria, chapter 63, which declares that any law passed by any legislature which is repugnant to the interests of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland is ipso facto, null and void. It is to comply with the requirements of that Act, that clause 18 of the Bill before the House has been inserted. Our fleet must remain at the disposal of England in case of emergency or otherwise this Bill will be ultra vires and null and void. Let me quote from the Act of 1865:

> The term 'colony' shall in this Act include all of Her Majesty's possessions abroad in which there shall exist a legislature. . . . The term 'legislature' and 'colonial legislature' shall severally signify the authority other than the imperial parliament on His Majesty in Council, competent to make laws for any colony. Any colonial law which is or shall lie in any respect repugnant to the provisions of any Act of parliament extending to the colony to which such law may relate, or repugnant to any law, order or regulation made under authority of such Act of parliament, or having in the colony the force and effect of such Act, shall be read subject to such Act, order or regulation, and shall to the extent of such repugnancy, but not otherwise, be and remain absolutely null and void.

Let me quote section 15 of the British North America Act:

> The command in chief of the land and naval militia and of all naval and military forces, of and in Canada, is hereby declared to continue and be vested in the Queen.

After reading this Bill and the Acts of 1867 and 1661, every one must admit that this extends rather than restricts the autonomy of Canada. The famous question about the meaning of 'shall' or 'may' in this legislative enactment is reduced to naught.

Let me quote also clause 18 of Bill (No. 95) in which the interpretation of the word 'may' has given rise to such debate:

> 18. In case of an emergency the Governor in Council may place at the disposal of His Majesty, for general service in the Royal navy, the naval service or any part thereof, any ships or vessels of the naval service, and the officers and seamen serving in such ships or vessels, or any officers or seamen belonging to the naval service.

Should this Bill now before us be passed without clause 18 it would be repugnant to section 15 of that imperial statute, the British North America Act, 1867, conforming to chapter 6, statute 1, Charles II, 1661, intituled, 'An Act declaring the sole right of the militia to be in the King and for the present ordering and disposing the same,' and also to the regulations made thereunder, and for that very reason our Bill would be null and void. It is not also the proper time to remind this House that nobody but a pirate, and with all the due consequences thereof, can run a warship unless her commander is the bearer of a state patent since the declaration of Paris in 1856. Bill (No. 95) without its clause 18 would be enacted in violation of international law.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. GERVAIS. Mr. Speaker, in continuing my remarks before recess, I may say that many other facts and Acts of parliament could be quoted to show that Canada, after all, and in spite of the Act of 1867, is still, in the eyes of England, one of its 80 provinces. I say this, although Canada has a responsible government, having the right to spend the money of its citizens for their benefit generally without too much interference on behalf of the sovereign authority. I say this although Canada is a British colony of the first class, and is not in consequence a Crown colony, which later is ruled by a governor and a council appointed by England. I say this, although Canada is not a privileged chartered colony, that is, a colony governed by a commercial company. I say all this, Sir, though I am ready to applaud our distinguished leader when he proclaims that Canada is a nation.

While helping England, I prefer to see Canada doing so as a British dominion, realizing thoroughly her present status, than to see Canada rendering such service as a so-called member of an empire, composed of one state and a great number of conquered but statuteless provinces having no representatives in the imperial parliament. It is only by knowing what his present condition is that one may think of reaching a higher condition. I like the idea of Canada entering into a maritime league with England, such as would be in process of creation through this Bill, and which would tend to bring to Canada a larger amount of true autonomy, which would redound to the benefit of England and of Canada.

By the passing of this Bill, Canada is promoting herself to a higher place in the eyes of the world, and that is a very good reason for me to give it my cordial support.

I admit that the status of Canada as a British colony is far better than that of any colony of France, Germany, Portugal, Holland, or even of the United States of America, for in the case of all of those colonies the sovereign state deals with their municipal or local affairs from its legislature without consulting the people of the colony. England alone allowed her colonists to tax her exported goods; to produce goods similar to her own; to sell goods to foreigners or buy from them; to ship them even in non-English bottoms; to be governed by the rules of metropolitan justice. But, it is true, just the same, that Canada is bound, whether it pleases her or not, to do what England may require her to do. Should England wish to tax Canada there is nothing in the public law of England to prevent her. I may be reminded that we have the precedent of the Boston merchants; but let me tell you, Sir, that those merchants, at that time, were probably equipped to accept the inevitable consequences of resisting the new tax on their tea. Such is not the condition of Canada to-day. Are we to follow the teaching of a certain portion of the press and the speeches of certain of our orators who have been preaching that Canada should have no army and no navy, but should remain as it has been for 150 years, completely without defence, and exclusively inhabited by farmers, merchants, lawyers, and ward heelers, depending solely for protection on the application, for the benefit, of that fiction or hallucination known as the Munroe doctrine.

I know that Canada is not, to-day, governed, as she was upon the arrival of Lord Durham at Quebec. It would be rather difficult for the colonial office of to-day to send to our Governor General instructions similar to those which they sent to Sir Poulett Thompson, and to tell him to govern his country against, or without the advice of his responsible ministers. I know that a radical change has taken place. I know that now the Prime Minister is much more than a sub-officer of Downing street. I know that Canada, since 1791, or to be more accurate, since 1840, has passed from the status of 'Crown' colony to that of responsibly governed colony. I admit, also, that this has been done in consequence of the new policy adopted by England, by which she feels herself in duty bound to grant her colonies autonomy in matters municipal. I am ready to proclaim, that England alone has stood the first, and perhaps will stand the last, in the history of the colonial regimes of the world, for the establishment of such colonial autonomy as our own, but on the other hand, if I scrutinize the text of our constitution, without taking into account our de facto position towards England, but exclusively our de jure relations with her, I venture to affirm that I make no misstatement of law when I declare that Canada is, legally, but a British colony, and not a nation, in the sense implied by the authors of international law. Sir, we know the meaning of the word 'race', of the word 'people', of the word 'nation', of the word 'state'. Too often, have we in this country lost sight of the true definition of each of those words. Let me define a nation: A nation, Sir, is the union into a society of the inhabitants of one country, having the same language, governed by the same laws, banded together by identity of origin, of physical conformation and of moral propensities, by a community of interests and of feelings and by a merger of existences brought about by the passing of centuries.

I am mentioning all this to show that though England has not been pressing hard upon us to give her help, and has been trying to veil the exercise of her rights upon Canada, she has without any question authority to command Canada to come to her rescue, willingly or unwillingly. But, Sir, not only our status forces us to build up a navy, but own own interests, both political and commercial, impel us to do so, as I will try to show later on.

Sir, are there any real reasons for Canada not doing anything to comply with the wishes of England? A few of our citizens are trying to raise, or rather, to invoke the question of neutrality. Let me explain what is neutrality, as defined by Martens, Kluber, Heffter, Wheaton, Hubner, Hautefeuille and Ortolan. Neutrality is for a state the right or the duty not to take any part in a war. Under internationl law, neutrality is permissible in favour of any state. One of the most celebrated cases of neutrality was that urged by the United States of America in 1795 when, France being assailed by quite a number of European powers, the United States answering Mr. Genest, the French minister, told him that they were not bound to do anything for France, which had been very recently the most potent instrument in bringing them into the society of states. That resort to neutrality has been invoked, for 150 years, quite a number of times. But let me say, Mr .Speaker, that behind the most of the instances of optional neutrality, you find national suicide, or national cowardice.

If we look at the relations between Britain and one of her provinces, there cannot be any question of neutrality, and the reason for this statement is rather obvious. Every law student knows it. Every one knows that so soon as war is declared between England and any of the 48 foreign states of the world, composing the society of states, any inch of the British territory, whether within the British Isles, or in any of the British provinces, is on a war footing. Therefore Canada is at war whether she wishes to be at war or not. England's war is Canada's war, so much so that the minute war is declared all our goods and vessels and citizens become hostile in the estimation of the country at war with England, and all things Canadian become ipso facto seizable by the belligerents against England. Is it not by applying those well-known doctrines, that during the eighteenth century, England saw her way clear to destroy the colonial dominions of France in every part of the world, and to conquer even Nouvelle-France? Those same doctrines stand just as good to-day as in the past, Sir, and it is against the revival of this doctrine to our detriment, that I wish to have my Canadian fellow citizens keep themselves prepared. A state may be neutral; a British province cannot. More especially do I not wish to see Canada standing neutral towards England for the sake of not building a navy. Neutrality is a word which only states can use, but never a colony when addressing its metropolis. But if such a condition of affairs from the point of view of international law and of the public law of England exists, is it not better that Canada should willingly aid England, and do it in the happiest way?

After all, what is asked from Canadians? If we take for granted that the total population of Canada is about 8,000,000 we figure that the contribution of each citizen for the maintenance of our fleet (an accomplishment which will satisfy our national pride, and at the same time please England), will not exceed 60 cents per head annually, plus one dollar and a half per head for the building of the same. If we take into consideration the population of the province of Quebec, and make certain allowances for contributions made more especially for creating banks, insurance companies, loan companies, railway companies, all of them mostly organized and kept in existence by British capital, we have to conclude that, estimating the population of that province at about 2,000,000, each inhabitant of Quebec would not pay more than one shilling per year for the maintenance of that fleet, though so useful both to Canada and England, as well for defence as for commercial purposes.

But, some one may say that this creation of a war fleet will tend to diminish our rank both amongst the colonies of Great Britain, and in the esteem of foreign countries. Nothing can be more fallacious.

I do not see in what way the status of Canada will suffer depreciation because she enters into somewhat of a maritime league with other colonies, and the parent state. No one can imagine for a moment that Canada can alone protect her vast seashores. Let me give you an illustration. I will once more go to the ancient world to get my example. You know that it was the fundamental maxim of Athens that she should remain the ruler of the seas. Athens was the greatest sea power of the 300 cities of Greece. Sparta was the largest military power on land. Nevertheless, Athens, with its 30,000 soldiers, its 30,000 mariners, and its total male and female population of 200,000 inhabitants, managed to form a confederation which was called the confederation of Delos, composed of 300 cities, each one of them sending its delegates, furnishing ships, money or men, and later on paying a fixed sum of money, the whole to equip and maintain a fleet strong enough to secure the supremacy of Greece over all other powers, at any time. The federal treasury which was established first, at Delos, where the delegates met, was later on transferred to Athens, and set up in the Temple of the Acropolis. This is, I think, a shining example to our citizens. Imagine a city like Athens, with a total population of but 200,000 citizens, having its two ports of Piraeus and Phalerum, and its shipbuilding yard of Munychia, and contributing half of the thousand talents, that is $5,000,000 for the equipment and manning of the confederation fleet. And, you know, Athens did the right thing in regard to that; as long as the maritime league was maintained, her glory was unbounded, as soon as it was disrupted all her power vanished. Neither Athens nor Lacedaemon felt depreciated by going into the confederation of Delos. For Athens had not then forgotten the teaching of Themistocles and Aristides, realizing that their country needed not only magistrates and leaders, but also, instruments of defence such as an army, a fleet of war, and a revenue. Athens has given to the world of to-day the most vivid example of national energy. With a small territory, and a limited budget, through the efforts and ability of its public spirited citizens (the greatest lovers of liberty known to history) Athens was able to make first class harbours, build the strongest navy of the day, erect the most marvellous temples and palaces that art can inspire and architecture construct, and through its fleet, and its naval defence demonstrate her capabilities in repulsing invasions much more terrible for her than would be an invasion to-day of England by the Germans.

After this short glimpse of the past, let us come to the question of the protection of our thousands of miles of seashore and territorial boundary. First of all, we have to consider the proposal of those who wish a Canada unarmed, both on sea and land, but who hope to substitute for them the British protection which it has enjoyed for years; the protection which is called by those who are not farsighted, the Monroe doctrine, and which is in a concrete form the recognition of the United States of America as the protector, the tutor, and the guardian of the twenty-one states of North, Central, and South America. The establishment of that Monroe doctrine, as a settled fact is contrary to the best interests of the world, as well as to the teaching of the society of states. There is but one, there can be but one, universal society of states. The Monroe doctrine has not proved itself, as you know, Sir, very useful to the lesser states of America. Mexico, which sought for the application of the Monroe doctrine to dethrone the Emperor Maximilian, lost through it, the best part of its territory. The application of the Monroe doctrine too, in the case of Cuba, has proved very detrimental to the richest island of the West Indies. The secret conspiracy to destroy the sugar crops and the tobacco crops of Cuba and to create revolution against Spain, all things inspired by Monroe doctrine advocates, has brought, as its natural consequence the reduction of Cuba to a state of humiliating protection, and Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands to a still more inferior condition.

The intervention of our neighbours in the private affairs of the states of both central and south America, is not of a nature to encourage our country to place its future national aspirations under the protection of the Monroe doctrine. We are suffering enough just now, from the use by our neighbours of a name, though chosen by them at a Paris banquet, given in the honour of Franklin, which goes to show that our friends of the United States of America are arrogating to themselves the sole right to the name of Americans which should really designate all the groups of inhabitants of the whole continent. American invasion under a peaceful name has already set in, I regret to say. Very fortunately the other states have not yet recognized that abusive use of a name by the United States of America, which after all is but one of the forty-eight states of the world. Surely it is a most absurd dream to believe in the protection of the Monroe doctrine rather than in British protection.

Anything which will tend to loosen or to destroy our ties with the parent state is, in my opinion, an act of high treason towards our country, because it would mean for her a Diminutio Capitis, that is to say, a reduction of rank in the eyes of the world. Canada left to herself, without any more British protection, would be open to be annexed to our neighbours, or to be sold to them, by her sovereign. We have to speak plainly; do you imagine, for a moment, that England, not receiving even the moral support or any co-operation in its defence from Canada, would do anything to protect the latter from an American or other foreign invasion? I have taken for granted, at this moment, that England would not try to coerce its colony of Canada. But it is within, as we have said, the power of England to resort to such coercion by way of taxation, threats of sale or exchange of territory, as in the case of Heligoland for Samoa, and the purchase of our territory would have an easy job to get possession of it. For, if those who do not wish our parliament to put up any defence should succeed in convincing our people of the correctness of their foolish opinions, Canada would be utterly unprotected both on sea and on land, and liable to be conquered by a border invasion. What are words of mouth worth against the bullet of the fusileer or the baton of the constable? I beg some of my Quebec friends to remember the days of 1837, when words, newspaper articles, and epistles from those having brought about the resort to arms, and who were keeping themselves in hiding in foreign lands, proved unequal to prevent my fellow-men from dying either on the battlefield or on the scaffold. Sir, I do not like to speak of those dire possibilities, should the opinion of those in my province who want an undefended Canada, prevail. Suppose that England inflicting chastisement, should disinterest herself of Canada; then in the case of annexation, for example, what would be the result for our church, our laws, and our language. Has any one thought of such a possibility? The treaty guarantees of 1763 would exist no more with regard to the use of our language, or the enjoyment of our civil laws, or with regard to the Catholic church, which would surely lose the privileges so long enjoyed by her. Surely, those institutions of ours, which are so dear to us all, would be in imminent danger, since say two senators, and four congressmen would represent the province of Quebec, provided—which is not certain—that the American states would accord the dignity of statehood to each of the provinces of Canada. However, it is quite possible that no such recognition of existing political divisions would take place, and that Canada would be governed by laws passed in Washington, without our having adequate representation there. I do not see why, if Canada, being either abandoned, or even sold or exchanged by England to the United States, the latter should not consider our country in the very same light as Porto Rico, and the Philippine Islands. Would the United States of America give any consideration to a defenceless, and a friendless Canada? Sir, no power would give consideration to a country defended by hustling trumpeters, pamphleteers, and self-styled newspaper-office peers. Surely no Canadian patriot will admit for a moment that such a change in the political life of Canada, that is to say annexation, would not be tantamount to political slavery.

I pray my fellow-citizens, not to trust our great hustings trumpeters, our pamphleteers, or our self-constituted editorial peers, for either defence or diplomacy. I refrain from dwelling upon the possible realization of such a nightmare, for I am too thoroughly convinced that our citizens would prefer death to the consequence of refusing to part with 25 cents a year each for the construction and maintenance of our navy as is proposed by the government. Sir, I prefer to be the son of a conquered freeman than the son of a self-constituted slave; for, as I look at it, I consider that for Canada to seek protection in the Monroe doctrine, is to constitute herself the slave of a power whose rule is getting more and more unbearable to all. The idea of moving towards providing for the defence of Canada, combined with effort towards the extension of her commerce, is surely an inspiration. Let the building of a navy proceed if only to prevent annexation.

Let us now examine the question of Britain's neglect of our interests, which was raised the other night, by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk). He charges England with having given away to the United States a strip of land which is equal to the territory of many states; he also charges England with having sacrificed our interests in the Alaska boundary arbitration case. I will not discuss, at any great length, the correctness of the statement of the hon. member. There is, no doubt, a great deal of truth in it, but I must remind the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, that Canada has in this, a great deal of blame to take upon her own shoulders. Even in the case of the Ashburton treaty negotiations, Canada did not say much, when she should at least have raised her voice to keep her own territory. In the Alaska arbitration dispute, perhaps Canada could have better looked to the settlement of that case through the channel of diplomacy. We must also admit that in 1834, and later on, in 1852, Canada did not do much to prevent Newfoundland from taking possession, in spite of statutes and treaties; and the possessory rights of the province of Quebec, of that long seashore, which is known to-day as the Newfoundland Labrador.

On the other hand, we are bound to admit, to the credit of England, that the undisputed possession by Canada of the Gulf of St. Lawrence and other gulfs and bays, with their fisheries, as well as the exclusive possession of the St. Lawrence river, as well as the right of navigation in common of the Mississippi river, are some of the great victories secured by England for Canada through the treaties or correspondence of 1784, 1818, 1826, 1854, and subsequent treaties or agreements. Is it not England who brought the United States to consider all the bays, straits and gulfs of Canada's King's Chambers, bounded in accordance with the head line doctrine; thus securing for Canada millions of miles of rich maritime territory. Sir, if England has neglected the interests of Canada, I do believe that Canada has not done all she should have done to protect her own interests.

A very good way for Canada to protect herself now, as she has not done much in that direction, in the past, is to build up what may be styled the beginning of a navy; to make the appointment of commercial agents; to look herself after her own commercial affairs; to do all that is necessary to satisfy England; and to try to get in return a freer hand in the management of her own business. The argument is advanced by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk)) that because England has given away some portion of our territory, we should do nothing for England, and, remaining passive allow the balance of the assets of Canada to be taken by anybody wishing the possession of them. This is, after all, the conclusion we have to come to if we follow the advice of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk). I do not see any patriotism in holding such a view. Smaller states, with less population, have performed marvels in defending themselves and have spent a great deal more to defend their country than Canada would do by voting a yearly expenditure of four and a half million dollars.

Without looking at the eight first-rank maritime powers, we find that some small states, like Uruguay, with a population not exceeding 2,000,000, has five warships. Chili, with a population of about 4,000,000 has nevertheless 15 warships. The Argentine Republic, with a population of about 6,000,000, has about 40 warships, some of them of the latest type.

Take the case of Sweden and Norway; take the case of Italy which is doing a smaller amount of trade than Canada—all these states, because they know that there is wealth in the maritime trade, and that there cannot be any maritime trade without vessels of war to defend it, are ready to spend generous portions of their income to build the means of protection of their money-making instrument, their merchant shipping.

According to certain newspaper men, and a few platform speakers in our country, because Canada has boasted herself the fifth commercial country and the sixth maritime trader of the world, and all this through the protection and prestige of England without paying anything for that protection, she finds herself, to-day, in a terriffic condition of mind, because England proposes to her to spend a little portion of her wealth for the maintenance of that profitable condition of affairs. That reminds me of the case of a son who had been doing business for his own benefit with the money and through the prestige of his father, and who, upon the death of the latter, wanted to sue his estate for damages caused by the loss of said prestige. Sir, no group of men can call themselves a nation without assuming responsibilities and risking sacrifices. This is the gist of the reason why the idea of a state implies such a degree of prestige and admiration everywhere and in all times. It is because it means that a number of men, more or less great, have worked, suffered and died for the creation, the final establishment, of a common national ideal. A group of men, who are fond of calling themselves a nation, must be also ready to build a navy for defence. Now, coming to the question of the pecuniary advantages to Canada of standing by Great Britain, we must admit that such advantages are rather important. Let us consider the interest our country is paying on its public loans—just 3½ per cent. But if we examine the public loans made to foreign countries, we discover at once that the German empire was paying last week four and a fraction per cent on a very important loan. Brazil has just made an issue of debentures, redeemable in gold, sold at 94, with interest at 5 per cent. The Argentine republic borrowed very lately $50,619,000 at 5 per cent, its bonds being sold at 97. The divers loans of Brazil aggregating $867,432,500 bear interest at 4 per cent, 4½ per cent and 5 per cent. Uruguay for its loans of 1891, 1895 and 1901, has paid as high as 5 per cent and 8 per cent. If we look up the rate of interest payable by Sweden, Norway, Austria, Spain, Portugal, Italy, we are bound to admit that most, if not all, those foreign states are paying about 1½ per cent more upon their loans than is Canada upon its $400,000,000 of funded debt.

This means that our country, through the permanency, the stability, the security of its institutions, its political and social conditions, together with its natural resources, and above all, the prestige of our British connection, is gaining 1½ per cent upon its loans, which means a saving of about $6,000,000. Is it not proper to take half of that saving to build up a fleet which will at the same time help England to some extent, at any rate, and to organize for our own country a system of defence which may be of very great use in time to come?

Then, if we come to examine the conditions of trade and finance generally in Canada, we discover that our country and its business men, its shippers, its merchants and even its farmers, are deriving great benefit from the good relations existing between England and Canada. Take, for example, the rate of interest on loans to individuals, the rate of insurance, the rate of transportation, the steamer fares, railway fares, and what do you find? The fact is that all those rates are cheaper than in most foreign countries. What is the cause of all this? No one can deny that it is due to the permanency of our commercial and social conditions; but that permanency is in turn due to the permanency and stability of the parent state, and, lastly, the stability and permanency of the parent state are no doubt the consequences of the undisputed and indisputable supremacy of the British fleet.

And what are we paying for the maintenance of that navy which means so great a benefit to Canada? In the past, and until to-day, we have paid nothing. England is asking my fellow countrymen to contribute in the future to the extent of one quarter of a dollar per head. No one, I venture to say, in the province of Quebec, will object to such a little contribution which will prove so beneficial to our country. The credit of Canada is nailed to the topmast of the British navy, I may say. Let this belief be dissipated and within one year the public loan rate of interest will rise from 3½ per cent to 8 per cent; and private loan rates of interest will double. When speaking of that feature of our political condition let me dwell upon two topics very pertinent to it.

One may think, and very naturally, that by complying with the requests of the British admiralty, which have been thoroughly explained in previous speeches, Canada will derive some other advantages, especially political advantages. As I said before, our country is enjoying none of the rights which make a country independent or sovereign. One of those rights is that of making treaties. Even during the negotiations of the last Franco-Canadian treaty the conferences practically were held in the name and under the authority of England, this being required because of our condition, from the point of view of international law.

But if Canada wishes to be something in the world she must have conceded to her by England that very important power of negotiating treaties with foreign countries. Is there any better way of getting that favour than to convince England that Canada is ready to do all she can for the maintenance of British prestige throughout the world? The treaty-making power is worth the cost of even a navy. Another very important concession which our country should perhaps seek to obtain would be the concession by England of the right to appoint Anglo-Canadian consuls, that is, men born in Canada or the appointment of such men by England herself upon the special request of Canada. As I said in 1904 in this House, the British consular service is inefficient, according to the statements of the newspapers, and of the greatest parliamentarians of England, such as Sir Edward Grey, Mr. James Bryce, Sir Charles Dilke and Mr. Sinclair, and according also to the general consensus of opinion. Canada is in great need of new openings of trade throughout the world. Those trade openings are still to be found and established; but who are the agents to secure for us these immense benefits? Some one naturally will say that the Minister of Trade and Commerce is always there, that is, in Ottawa. But business men will answer that good commercial agents in the field are, to-day, the only men to bring to our shores the many millions of dollars' worth of trade we need. As a matter of fact, we have no trade relations to speak of with South America, we have no line of steamers between Canada and the divers states of South America, we have no commercial agents either in Brazil or the Argentine Republic, nor in most of the twelve or fifteen states of South America, though with each of those states Canada could build up a prosperous trade by direct representation. Our apples, potatoes, butter, cheese, and even our ice, could sell at a very high price in Brazil, where you find a population of over 20,000,000. Our cod, which is caught just off our shores, is not shipped direct to South America, but is sent to Lisbon, where it is cured, and thence reshipped to Brazil under the slang name of bacalia. We could sell South America any amount of vehicles, agricultural implements, wooden structures, and building materials, because the timber of those countries, though precious and for some purposes more valuable than ours, is unfit for constructing wagons, and for most building purposes. There would be no end to the list of profits which could be made through a proper system of commercial agencies of consular status established by Canada in South America and in many other foreign states. As I pointed out in 1904, smaller countries than ours are spending, on an everage, half a million of dollars for maintaining consular service, while Canada is doing practically nothing for that purpose. A sum of at least $1,000,000 should be spent yearly to pay the salaries and expenses of a hundred commercial agents and Anglo-Canadian consuls either appointed from amongst Canadian born, by England herself, or by Canada, upon some special concession granted to the latter. I am ready to say that should our help towards England to-day go to secure for us the appointment of Anglo-Canadian consuls, I would be ready to ask this House to vote per year, not ten, or twenty cents, but $10 per head, for the establishment of such a system as would undoubtedly improve the commercial relations of Canada, and I would venture to state that as a result the trade of Canada would be three times larger than it is to-day. I speak of this important question of Anglo-Canadian consuls because it is very closely linked to that other question of extension of our external or maritime trade, which will be a new impetus under the escort of our fleet.

But there are many other advantages to Canada in the building of a fleet. It is undeniable that at one time Canada was the greatest ship-building country of America. The maritime trade spirit was alive and progressive. It was natural, because most of its inhabitants are descendants of mariners, they are the offspring of those marvellous sailors, the Norsemen, who discovered America, and started establishments on this continent about sixty years before Christopher Columbus secured for Spain the official paraphernalia necessary to grant her so-called discovery rights. We all come, the most of us at least, from those Norsemen, from the stock of Normandy or the British Isles, who have braved the perils of the sea for at least ten centuries. Most of our immediate forefathers have been farming and trading in small towns for a couple of centuries, but, without claiming to be a prophet, I may assure the House that it will not take many years before the sons of farmers and traders and professional men can qualify for the re-conquest of the great seas, the legacy one may say, by the law of nature, of the brave Norsemen of yore. Let us revive the industries of our ancestors.

Let me remind hon. gentlemen of somo of the many other advantages to be derived from the building of a fleet. Marine engineering, and the art of navigation, will receive a very great impetus from the adoption of the proposed plan.

Let me say, Sir, a few words to our students about the advantages they will reap from the building of our navy. The art and science of ship-building will go to a great extent to open new callings in life for the students in our special schools. With regard to those schools, allow me to give a few words of explanation. Let me open a very short chapter about the school system of Quebec that will have some direct connection with the execution of the plan of the government. The students of our schools will have much to do with the construction, the manning, and the maintenance of our merchant and war fleet, for both will have to develop simultaneously.

And what about our academy of marine, or naval college, to complete the system of our special schools? Montreal, with its two universities, would be the ideal place to locate a naval college. In no place else in Canada can there be found a better place for a naval college, better professors, more modern laboratories, more valuable libraries and general educational equipment. I must tell the Quebec students, even those who have signed petitions against the passing of this Bill, just four things: That marine engineers occupy the first rank in the engineering world; that marine officers are the most learned and cultured men; that amongst their many intellectual gifts, they must speak many languages, and in every case the French language, which is the language of diplomacy, is that which is spoken by the marine officers of every state of the five continents, so that the building of our navy is a good means of making our French language honoured. While speaking of our Quebec students protesting against the passing of Bill 95, let me ask the hon. member for Jacques Cartier to present to them a few copies of that new book of Mr. Emile Foguet, ' Le Culte de l'Incompétence,' or lecture them about experimental superiority of older men over young men. It is one of the many good maxims of Mietzche which he expresses in saying very properly:

> A sign of nobility, a sign of aristocracy, such is the respect of youths for older men.

The other day I listened to a lengthy debate in this House about technical schools in Canada. Many things were said about foreign technical schools, but not one word to explain the tremendous progress which has been made in the province of Quebec for the establishment, side by side with its classical schools with their three degrees of efficiency, of a whole set of special schools, which I style a higher commercial school, where the science and art of foreign languages, of precis writing, commercial geography, state finance and industrial chemistry, and physics, are taught for the purpose of making men able to manage commercial houses, and to promote commerical relations abroad. We have, in the province of Quebec, also established colleges of technology, or technical schools, where the theory of every art, from that of the plumber to that of the jeweller, will be taught by book and laboratory, and where also the practice of each such art will be impressed on the minds of the students by designs, tools, and hand work. Alongside of these, schools of agriculture are already established. At St. Ann's, and at Oka, agricultural experts will be very shortly graduated for the purpose of establishing in nearly every county of the province of Quebec, agricultural laboratories where inspection, examination and analysis of grain can be taught to the farmers; all of which must eventually conduce to the benefit of our export trade. A school of forestry has also been established. The graduates of the school of forestry of Nancy, France, and Harvard, will teach the people of the province of Quebec how to preserve their natural resources and reafforest their woodland, thus securing the proper amount of moisture necessary to successful agriculture. In addition to these, McGill College and the Polytechnic school, in the teaching of civil engineering and the art of architecture, are ready to provide for our country, skilful engineers of all kinds, to wrest honourable profit from Canada's natural resources. I say this, in passing, for the purpose of showing our students that something is in store for them out of the building of our navy; and also for the purpose of telling the Minister of Labour and the members of the Technical School Commission when they come to inquire into the conditions of technical schools, that if they wish to be properly informed, they would do well to go to Quebec and stop there for a little while, before going elsewhere. It is to the everlasting glory of Sir Lomer Gouin, the Prime Minister of the province of Quebec, that he has built up a complete system of special schools alongside of the classical schools of that province, which will make of it before twenty years, one of the most learned centres in America.

I have been calling the attention of the House to our educational system, just to show that our would-be gunless and shipless defenders in Quebec are, after all, very neglectful of the interests of our students when they fail to see for all of them numerous advantages in the realization of the shipbuilding programme. Our graduates are perhaps the best equipped to benefit from the new policy. The construction of a fleet should also be approved of for the sake of our many special school students, who will therein find many and varied employments and callings. Quite a number of good positions surely will be secured for those students by the establishment of the new marine equipment. Our special school graduates will contribute in some way or other to the construction of the new fleet, and thereby contribute to the enhanced prosperity and greatness of Canada.

There are many other reasons for which I am ready to vote for the passing of this Bill. I will vote for the Bill, because:

1. It will cost but a trifle per head of our population to build a few ships which will help England, satisfy our obligations towards her, and gratify our national pride;

2. The expenditure of a few cents per year may go to secure for Canada the concession from England of the power of making treaties, of the power to appoint Anglo-Canadian consuls, thereby securing for us benefits which will be a hundredfold greater to Canada than the total of our expenditure today;

3. I would rather stand by our parent state than depend upon American protection, I prefer British protection.

4. The building of a fleet will to a great extent help our classical and special school graduates;

5. It is in acordance with the dictum of the public law of England towards Canada, for it is not within the province of the latter to refuse any contribution to help England;

6. The creation of a Canadian navy will to a large extent tend to create for Canada new openings of trade, the establishment of new commercial agencies and negotiations of commercial treaties—three keys to the treasuries of the world;

7. This possession of a fleet is the best and only way to secure progress in peace for our country and to assure its everlasting prosperity.

For all these reasons, and many others, I appeal to this House, and to my constituents of St. James, not to begrudge a shilling a year for the maintenance of the prestige of England, and the enlargement of our national life.

And now, to those unthoughtful enough to close their eyes and stop their ears to the great lessons of history; to those who shout aloud that nothing should be done to defend Canada, to those who are continuously, dangerously, creating agitation, to all those who do not wish to give any kind of aid to England, whether they be representatives of the western grain growers, or agriculturists of Quebec, I would say this: You do not want any naval defence for Canada, you prefer to remain in statu quo, you are afraid of military and naval expenditure, let me remind you of a past which is still the present for us. If Canada, when she was a weak colony under the French monarchy, had followed the advice, the admonitions and prayers of that incomparable and immortal American statesman of the seventeenth century (though not born in America) Governor Frontenac, who implored France not to reconstruct the marvellous palace of Versailles, but to build a navy, to send soldiers to Nouvelle France, and to equip an army to protect its territory and the entrance of its Gulf of St. Lawrence, never would Wolfe have defeated Montcalm on the Plains of Abraham, and never would it have been possible for England to conquer Canada.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, should we have no navy, what Wolfe was able to do, one Von der Goltz or one Henri de Hohenzollhern, may try to repeat. Canada, being without naval defence, without coast protection, should ever a European conflict hold back the English fleet in the North sea, the entrance of the St. Lawrence would be left undefended against a hostile fleet which would be able to anchor before Montreal with much less risk than in the Baltic sea. Sir, such a possibility should awake in the people of Canada, and more especially in my fellow citizens of Quebec, a strong desire to grant what is asked from them to secure both a defence of our coasts, and a compliance with the wishes of England. My fellow citizens of Quebec, I am sure—and here, I believe, I am expressing their inner sentiments—are ready to stand by England to-day, for we are indebted to England for the fairness with which England has treated us. Should I speak tonight in my own mother language, it would be due to the liberality of England. The French and English languages were for hundreds of years spoken in the mother parliament on the banks of the Thames, in the same way that Greek and Latin had been the official languages of the parliament of Rome. I beg leave to convey to the English speaking citizens of Canada tonight, the assurance that their French speaking friends will stand shoulder to shoulder with them for the maintenance of British institutions in Canada, as did, twenty centuries ago, our ancestors, the Gaelic senators when they joined the Roman senators in the defence of the state of Rome.

While I am saying all this, I cannot forbear from denouncing as infamous, the veiled charges of disloyalty which have been and are still being hurled against my compatriots. Sir, Quebec will always remember that beautiful sentiment enunciated by the distinguished Prime Minister of Canada at a Paris banquet in 1905: 'To France, we owe our origin; to England, our liberty.'

Mr. WILLIAM R. SMYTH (East Algoma). Mr. Speaker, I am sure you must be wearied of this debate, and I am sure that this afternoon must have made you more wearied still. The hon. member for St. James, Montreal, (Mr. Gervais), has taken up nearly three hours of the time of this House, and I am sure that very few members of the House are much enlightened by what he has said. He started in with an argument against the Bill from a legal standpoint. But, like an old steeple-chase horse, when he comes to the bank he is afraid to go over, and so he turns and supports the Bill after all, though it is not just to his mind from a legal point of view. Some of the remarks of the hon. gentleman call to my memory something that happened in connection with our first attempt —I think it was our first—at what might be called Canadian diplomacy. The hon. member (Mr. Gervais) scored British diplomats in their efforts to settle the great questions between Canada, and the United States, and other countries. We all remember the commission that was appointed by this government, composed of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Aylesworth), Sir Louis Jetté, and another whose name I have at the moment forgotten. These gentlemen did not bring such great results to Canada in connection with the Alaska boundary question with which they had to deal. Did not they allow a great deal of our territory to be taken away and given to the United States? So, I do not think we have much to complain of in British diplomacy in view of what our own representatives have done.

I do not purpose taking up much time, in fact, I should like to confine myself to within ten minutes. But, before entering into the question as to what my views are on the navy question, I must first express my regret that the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), took occasion to prove his loyalty to the British Crown —in fact, about three-quarters of the time of his speech was devoted to that purpose. If I ever felt proud of my leader (Mr. R. L. Borden) it was when he spoke in answer to the Prime Minister. It was not necessary for him to waste one minute in proving that he was loyal to the British Crown; every one knew where he stood.

I must also say something on behalf of my French Canadian friends, of whom I have a great many in my riding. In fact, I think that perhaps one-third of the electors in my riding are of French Canadian origin. I have no hesitation in saying that every one of them, so far as I know, is true and loyal to the core. But I think if the right hon. Prime Minister should go up into that country, and say some of the things he has said in this House, and on many an occasion outside, he would not be very welcome for those utterances. But the French Canadians of my constituency are true Canadians, and true British subjects. I almost wonder that they are in view of the statements made by the leaders of the French Canadian people in this Canada of ours. We have heard the Prime Minister himself declare his independence, and we have heard other hon. members giving us lectures on independence. I wish to call attention to some of the utterances of certain leaders of the French Canadian people in this respect. I am proud to say that notwithstanding all that the leaders in this House can say, the French Canadian settler in the northern part of New Ontario—and, I think, all over the Dominion of Canada—are true and loyal. But one would wonder why gentlemen who occupy seats in this House, from the First Minister to the lowest back bencher among his followers, should endeavour to mislead the ideas and views of the French Canadian people. We find, Sir, the hon. member for Nicolet (Mr. Turcotte), saying something in connection with independence. This is part of what he said, and I take it that this is a proper translation of the hon. gentleman's statement:

Independence appears in certain quarters to be a monster and a nightmare to those whose interest in Canada is small and secondary, and who have only the love and loyalty of the empire in their hearts. But I ask of these men, shall not Canada sooner or later have to choose between annexation and independence? Are we destined to remain a colony, and are not true Canadians who love their country before all others to have in their hearts a very legitimate ambition to see it free and independent? It suits badly those politicians who have a great many years' experience, who have seen unrolled great events and political changes which are to-day included in the history of our country, who have seen the nation grow, and who realize its possibilities and its resources. It is neither patriotic nor loyal on the part of these men to put obstacles in the way of the complete development of our political organization and to pretend that we ought always to dwell under the protection of the British flag. But, thank God, I am convinced that this will not be the case, and the creation of this naval fleet in my humble opinion is the last step towards independence.

Is that not preaching independence? Is that not a true expression of the opinions of many hon. gentlemen who sit on the other side of the House? I take it that this voices the opinion of a great many hon. gentlemen opposite. He was greatly applauded when he made this statement. Further he says:

It is from this point of view particularly, and I might say exclusively, that I at the present time give my adhesion to the Liberal policy. I speak from a Canadian point of view, and I believe this view of the question is that of the majority of the electors of my county; indeed, I do not believe that it would be too much to affirm that it is that of the majority of the people of the province of Quebec.

There is something which is addressed to the French Canadian electors, and I——

Mr. G. A. TURCOTTE. Will my hon. friend allow me to ask him a question? Did he remark in my speech a sentence in which I said that I would never consent to independence unless England would consent to it and that it would come through good will and not otherwise?

Mr. SMYTH. I will answer by asking my hon. friend another question—if he denies that he made the statement that I have just read.

Mr. G. A. TURCOTTE. I do not deny it at all.

Mr. SMYTH. Well, that is the answer. We have another hon. gentleman who has, during his life time, spoken of independence. The hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) once gave utterance to something of this nature. I must confess that he is very eloquent and ready to do as he is bidden. I do not know whether he has been whipped into line or not. I am going to read an extract from a paper called 'L'Evenement,' published at Quebec. It states that:

Postmaster General Lemieux moved at the Club Nationale, some years ago, the following resolution:—

That while admiring the English constitutional system the members of this club are in favour of obtaining by constitutional means the independence of our country and its complete emancipation from all European alliances.

I would like to ask the Postmaster General if that is correct?

Mr. LEMIEUX. I am glad that my hon. friend has put that question straight to me. I read that statement this morning in 'L'Evenement' of Quebec. I never moved that resolution, and 'L'Evenement' does not say that I moved it. Once in my life I did speak on that question. That was, I think, in 1893. I am surprised that that fact was not mentioned during this debate. In 1893, there was in Montreal a gentleman who was connected with the construction of the Monument National, where the meetings of the St. Jean Baptiste Society, the national society of French Canadians, take place every week. In order to obtain the necessary funds to build that monument he organized a large meeting at Sohmer park, Montreal. There was to be an academic debate on the four following questions: Annexation to the United States, the statu quo, imperial federation and the independence of Canada. I was then a young, budding lawyer, and I was asked by the organizers of the meeting to take part in the debate. I was assigned the role of advocate of the independence of Canada, which I accepted.

Mr. BARKER. And you accepted it?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes. A gentleman from the province of Ontario—I forget his name, but I think it was Mr. Elgin Myers—spoke in favour of annexation to the United States. A friend of mine, Mr. McGoun, a very distinguished lawyer of Montreal and a Liberal, spoke in favour of imperial federation, and a young friend of mine who was a very active member of the Conservative party, Mr. Cardinal, now dead, I am sorry to say, spoke in favour of the statu quo. There was a vote taken and there was an entrance fee of, I think, 25 cents paid by all those who were present. It was an academic debate. I do not deny that I took part in that debate, stood to my guns and advocated the independence of Canada, but it was a purely academic subject. I am surprised that the fact was not mentioned in this debate. But as to the resolution, I never moved it, and this is the first time I heard of it. That is my explanation.

Mr. SMYTH. All I can say to the hon. gentleman is that chickens come home to roost sometimes. Always be sure that your sins will be found out.

Mr. LEMIEUX. The Club Nationale ex-chicken now.

Mr. SMYTH. I am sure you are not. Do you still belong to that club?

Mr. LEMIEUX. The Independence club?

Mr. SMYTH. The Club Nationale?

Mr. LEMIEUX. The Club Nationale exists, but I never moved that resolution.

Mr. SMYTH. I accept the hon. gentleman's denial. I was just going to remark that I have the utmost confidence that the great mass of the French Canadian people take no stock in any such utterances as that anyway. They are too intelligent, notwithstanding that sometimes around election time especially some of their leaders would like to agitate them and ask them to do things that are not perhaps quite along the lines that they otherwise would follow on those occasions. I know that I have suffered a great deal from that myself; I know that while my French Canadian friends in my riding stood loyally and true by me when I was their candidate for the local legislature, they deserted me and deserted me very greatly indeed during the campaign of 1908. And, Sir, that was because of the pamphlets and the literature that were sent out——

An hon. MEMBER. 'The duty of the hour.'

Mr. SMYTH. Yes, 'The duty of the hour,' that was published and paid for by the Liberal party and circulated by the Liberal party in wagon loads all over the northern part of Ontario. We on this side of the House have been twitted by gentlemen opposite who claim that we are very much divided on this question; but when it comes to the vote perhaps they will better understand just how much divided we are. But let me say, Mr. Speaker, that it is a sign of life in any political party when its members do take issue one with the other on such a great question as this, and when they think for themselves and are not led by the nose by any leader or any number of leaders. Sir, we stand each thinking for himself and each acting for himself, and I am doubtful whether hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House can say the same thing. Indeed I have been astonished at the utterances of some of the Liberal members who have spoken in this House, because I have heard these very same gentlemen speaking outside on this same Bill and they played a very different tune. I am inclined to think that the 'composing room' and the gag and the thumb-screw and the offers of graft——

An hon. MEMBER. And straight jackets.

Mr. SMYTH. Yes, and straight jackets and everything else have been applied to some members on the other side of the House. The hon. member for Laval (Mr. Wilson) also said something about independence, and he told us that the navy is a preparation for the change in our national condition for which we ought to be ready. Well, were the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wilson) in his seat I would like him to explain what he meant when he said we had to be prepared for a change, because I hope, Mr. Speaker, the day will never come when there will be any change or any attempt at a change which will sever Canada from the British empire. But all the sentiments in connection with independence and ingratitude to England do not come from the French Canadian members on the other side of the House. I was sorry indeed to hear the other day a member of the great family of Scotchmen to which I belong giving utterances to certain statements, and I recommend that hon. gentleman to read the statements made by the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Gervais) to-night, who told us that we did owe a debt of gratitude to the motherland. But my Scotch friend from South Huron (Mr. McLean) thinks we do not owe the motherland anything. Well, Mr. Speaker, there was a different song sung by his forefathers when the British empire required assistance and help. In those days the McLeans went not only with a wave of enthusiasm, but they took off their coats and buckled on their swords and fought for the empire. And, Sir, it amazed me to hear the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McLean) declare that instead of taking off his coat and putting on his kilts and buckling on his sword for the empire he would send over his love, for that was all he could afford to give them. Well, I don't think that this is very Scotchlike. As I have said, Mr. Speaker, some members on this side of the House have been twitted with having accused the French Canadian people of disloyalty, and the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Neely) this afternoon made certain statements which I was very pleased to see that you, Mr. Speaker, made him withdraw. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Neely) told us over and over again that he had read the speech of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) from end to end and backwards and forwards and crosswise, and he could not find any other meaning in it than that which he gave to the House. Well, Mr. Speaker, I would like to read what the member for Frontenac did say, because I must confess that when I heard the construction that was put on his utterances I was very much grieved to think he would so far forget himself as to cast any reflection on our French Canadian people, which, of course, as a matter of fact he did not do. I did not have to read the speech of the hon. member for Frontenac very far to find him using this language:

I am not charging, and I have not said one word to charge the mass of the people of the province of Quebec with disloyalty; I have not said anything that could be construed into such a charge. On the contrary, I have said that the people of the province of Quebec have shown a more than ordinary intelligence in resisting the political leaders who for political purposes essayed to lead them from their allegiance.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Neely) dwelt a long time on this incident, but I would ask any fair minded man: Where can you find anything said by the member for Frontenac that any French Canadian or any one else could take offence at?

Mr. MOLLOY. Read further.

Mr. SMYTH. You can read it yourself; you have more time than I have. Now, Mr. Speaker, I come to the question of the navy, and I must say that I was very much disappointed at the lack of information which the right hon. Prime Minister had when he presented this Bill. I have been a business man the greater part of my life, and as a business man I have never entered into anything that I did not first study out what it was going to cost as nearly as I possibly could. If I were building a house I would first get an estimate from a man properly qualified to give it, and although it might cost a little more than the estimate, I would know approximately what my responsibility was. But, when the right hon. the Prime Minister was asked several questions in regard to the cost of this navy he could not answer them when he introduced the Bill, and he said he would give the details when the Bill got into committee. Well, Sir, I do not believe in going into it blind, and I would like to know here and now before committing my constituents, and the people of the Dominion to the principle of this Bill, what will this Canadian navy approximately cost? That information we are entitled to have from the Ministers of the Crown, who are supposed to know it. The ministers who have charge of this Bill should have been able to announce to the House as nearly as possible what will be the cost of this tin-pot navy of theirs which they are going to construct. I may say in the first place that I do not think that the navy which the right hon. gentleman is going to build is any good as a fighting force, or of any value whatever in the defence of the empire. I am certain that no sane being at this present date would build such a class of ships for defensive or offensive purposes in any part of the British empire or any other empire except the party that is in power to-day in Canada. I am not willing to entrust the building of even this tin-pot navy to the gentlemen who occupy the treasury benches. In the face of the charges against them more than ten—yes, more than twenty—that I have heard since I have come to this House, and that we have been trying to investigate—charges of the misappropriation of moneys, the spending of moneys foolishly, the wasting of the people's resources in various ways—they should not be allowed to enter into this great work which is going to entail such enormous expense on the country. For that reason alone, if for no other, I would be inclined to vote against the building of this navy. I am not opposed to our Canadian people getting all the benefits that might accrue from the building of a navy in Canada; but such a navy is not going to be built in three years or five years, or even in ten years, if it is to be efficient; and before the last ship is completed, the first will probably be out of commission, and in the bottom of the sea or on the scrap-heap. The right hon. the First Minister should have laid before this House an approximate estimate at least of what this navy was going to cost Canada. Now, I want to say that during all the campaigns in which I have taken part in the last ten or twelve years, I have never heard the question of a Canadian navy, or a navy of any sort, brought before the electors, and I am not going to commit the people that I have the honour to represent to any such scheme without first having their authority to do so. I am not going to commit them to anything that I have not myself some idea of the cost of; and I am not going to commit them to any such expenditure especially when it is to be handled by the gentlemen who occupy the treasury benches at the present time. I feel that there is a responsibility on me to ask the people of the district I have the honour to represent whether they are in favour of a Canadian navy or not. That is one of the reasons why I will vote against the proposal of a Canadian navy at the present stage. By giving a direct contribution, even if it is $20,000,000, or $25,000,000, I know that it is no more, and no less, and I know that it is not going to be called for year after year, but that is the end of it. We are told by the First Minister that the government purpose building the Georgian Bay canal, which is a much more important project than a Canadian navy. They are going to build the Hudson Bay railway. They have now under construction the Grand Trunk Pacific. All these are about as much as Canada can bear at the present time. I have taken up more time than I should, Mr. Speaker, but I felt that it was my duty to my constituents to place myself on record as against the construction of a Canadian navy at the present time. I also wish to place myself right as not being in sympathy with any sentiment that might lead our French Canadian people to believe that we accuse them of disloyalty; but we do accuse some of the leaders of the French Canadian people in this House of making statements that I would very much rather they had not made, in the interests of this great Canada of ours. I hope the gentlemen on the other side of the House will all balk when they come to the fence, and will not go over.

Mr. J. E. O. GLADU. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, the Tories, I say it with all due respect——

Some hon. MEMBERS. (Text.) Speak English.

Mr. GLADU. (Text.) I shall speak in French, as it is my own language and, as you are aware, I have a right to do so.

(Translation.) Mr. Speaker, the Tories, I say it will all due respect, are the same the whole world over, and are not capable of improvement, not any more in Canada than elsewhere. When a few years ago the hon. Finance Minister was about negotiating an important loan in England, these same Tories of Canada thought the best they could do was to depreciate Canada's financial standing, and thereby endeavour to prevent the floatation of the loan.

While the British Tories were engaged in the last general election, they thought similarly that the best they could do would be to discredit the King's navy, with the object of forwarding their political aims, caring very little what would be the results, or whether their country would suffer from it or not, exactly in the same way that the Canadian Tories had shown that they did not care a snap for the good name of Canada.

I do not propose speaking at great length, but before taking up the main question, there are several statements made in the course of this debate by hon. gentlemen on the other side who have preceded me, to which I would like to refer. I will not take up any of the time of the House answering the taunts which have been directed at the right hon. Prime Minister. Thank heaven, that mud, as we all know, has been slung from depths too great to ever reach the man at whom it was aimed. Thank heaven, I repeat it, the right hon. gentleman's loftiness of mind, loyalty, and force of character are too well known, and such insults cannot possibly sully his good name even in the slightest degree.

Let me call the attention of the House to some of the charges made by hon. gentlemen on the other side in the course of their remarks of recent date. The hon. member from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) found fault with us for being too docile, for blindly following, and with servility—to use an expression of the Nationalist leader of the province of Quebec—the leader of the government, in a word for not having sufficient individuality. The member for North Toronto, of course, is an authority on questions of breach of discipline. He will need to go back only a few years, in company with some of his friends who still occupy seats not far distant from his own, to live again those glorious days when he was charged with being a traitor, with being one of the nest of traitors, by the then leader of the government. Thereby will he realize what is meant by a lack of discipline.

In that same speech he characterized us as silent dogs. I regret that, for his own sake, he did not hold his tongue when that Naval Bill was up for discussion, and that he allowed to go forth—the expression I am about to use may not be parliamentary—the infamous words which he thrust at the heads of the Prime Minister, the Catholics and the French Canadians of this country.

The hon. member stated also that there were in our midst a few dogs which were beginning to bark. If I may be allowed to refresh his memory, he also has on previous occasions given proof of his ability to bark, and if he will only come with me to the Senate with six of his friends—he knows who I mean—to offer a fair shake hand to Sir Mackenzie Bowell, the latter will let him know what is meant by 'a dog who can bark.'

The hon. member stated also that the Prime Minister had a policy for the province of Quebec and another for the province of Ontario. I take such charges to be not only an insult, but an imputation of dishonesty against the Prime Minister. And remember that the hon. member for North Toronto bears on his forehead a stigma impressed on it two or three years ago by the hand of the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Aylsworth), who, in the course of a terrific denunciation, dealing with that question of the Union Trust, compared him to the unfortunate McGill, defaulting manager of the Bank of Ontario, and declared, after looking into the matter of the Independent Order of Foresters, that he might not have fared any better.

Mr. G. M. CAMPBELL (Dauphin). (Text.) Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman has no right to discus that question until after the findings of the judges in Toronto.

Mr. GLADU. (Text.) I have the right to recall a speech that was made two years ago in this House by the Minister of Justice.

Mr. H. LENNOX (Simcoe South). (Text.) It is true, as the hon. gentleman says, that the hon. Minister of Justice, upon the floor of this House, did most ungenerously and improperly impute criminal conduct to the hon. member for North Toronto, but does not the hon. gentleman know that Mr. Justice Magee, in dismissing the action for slander, utterly refute and overturn the statements of the Minister of Justice to that regard.

Mr. GLADU. (Translation.) I say that there is a man occupying a seat here who has not been acquitted of a charge laid against him in this House, and of which he has not cleared himself. I say I have the right to refer to these facts, though the case may still be before the courts. Besides, we are acquainted with the recent findings of the courts.

The hon. member has also taunted the right hon. leader of the government for having two policies, and for being disloyal to the empire. Let me, Mr. Speaker, recall a fact which seems to have slipped from the minds of a great many people here. Who is prouder of the friendship of France than the British people and their Sovereign? The latter has shown himself greater even than the British empire, by securing to that same empire the noble and beneficient friendship of France through the 'entente cordiale.' Well, at that time the President of the French Republic, Mr. Loubet, stated that it was in the course of a conversation he had had with the right hon. the Prime Minister of Canada that the idea had been suggested to him of negotiating an 'entente cordiale' between the two countries, in the same way that it existed betwen the two races in Canada.

Now, let us concern ourselves with another very interesting bird, which I am sorry not to see in his seat just now. I refer to the member for Victoria and Haliburton (Mr. Hughes). That hon. gentleman has thought fit in a speech which he delivered on the question of the Naval Bill to state that the leaders of the rebellion of 1837 were nothing but cowards. I shall quote the very words which he used on that occasion:

> In the speeches of the First Minister, and of the Postmaster General, and of the member for Pictou—I do not see how the member for the Yukon happend to miss it— they all eulogized the heroes of 1837, and by heroes they mean the cowardly men who went in for misleading the poor innocent habitant in the province of Quebec, and the innocent men in Ontario, and inciting them to commit crimes which led to loss of life and destruction of property.

I have only one word to say in answer to that: These men died in defending a cause which was dear and sacred to them, and I say that a soldier, or one parading as such, like the hon. member for Victoria and Haliburton, who insults the memory of those who died in defending a cause which was dear to them, is only a plumed bully, and cannot be anything else but the hero of a striking hovel——

Mr. SPEAKER. I think that expression is not parliamentary.

Mr. GLADU. (Translation). I withdraw anything that is not parliamentary, but if you allow what is parliamentary to remain there will still be enough of it left.

I shall now deal with a man who cannot be said to be in sympathy with the French Canadians and the Catholics, but who, nevertheless, solemnly quotes the writings of Father Hamon, a Jesuit, who is not known to him, but with whom I have the honour of being acquainted. I give you my word of honour that this gentleman has always had enough dignity and discrimination to avoid the expressions which are attributed to him in a translation, the exactness of which is doubtful.

The House I hope will pardon me this rather long preamble, but I was anxious to point out these insults which may not have the importance I attach to them. The hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) has thought proper to speak with contempt of the memory of a man whom the province of Quebec honours and respects; whom she has represented in his lifetime, and whom she has honoured for years and years by an annual pilgrimage to his tomb. I refer to Honoré Mercier.

I shall not say anything of the aspersions he has deemed proper to cast on the Prime Minister of this country. But I shall tell him as well as to the hon. members for Victoria and North Toronto that to my regret, I will have to recall what I said last year: that in every grave there is room only for the corpse; there is no place for anything else, not even for the poisonous breath of the serpent. In the province of Quebec, we are disgusted with those desecrators of tombs, these gnawers of the dead; we are disgusted with those who thus take pleasure in wrenching open the lid of our great men's coffins and turn over their ashes in the hope of securing thereby some political capital. I read in the memoirs of Mr. Claude, chief of police of Paris, that human vampires repaired at night to the Père Lachaise cementry and desecrated the graves of virgins who had been inhumed in the course of the day. I say that such men play the part of vampires as regards political celebrities in the same way as these others are the ravishers of dead virgins.

I now come to the question of the Naval Bill. I shall not dilate very long on the proposal emanating from the hon. member for Jacques Cartier. I regret to say that in all earnestness it looks to be as a deliberate attempt at stirring up sectional feeling. I cannot admit that there should be a distinct policy for the Conservative party in the province of Quebec, and still another for the Conservative party in the province of Ontario and the English-speaking provinces, and the province of Quebec will not be misled by such a ludicrous farce.

Now let us take up the proposal of the hon. leader of the opposition. I am forced to the conclusion that it is unfair as regards a large section of our people. What right have you, ask, in a country such as ours, made up of heterogenous groups of population, of various nationalities, of Italians, Germans, Frenchmen, Russians, &c., what right have you, I say, of taking the money contributed by these taxpayers and producers and make a free gift of it to Great Britain, who will apply it to building Dreadnoughts, with which she may start out to cripple the navies of the mother countries of these people, sweep over their sea coasts and send broadsides furrowing those lands still moist with the sweat and blood of their forefathers?

I now take up the plan submitted by the right hon. Prime Minister, and I find it acceptable to those who make up the people of Canada, to those who supply the funds, who pay the taxes, towards our progress and our development. They cannot take exception to the building of a fleet which will remain our property. I find it acceptable, because under it our money will not be handed over to a nation who, though at peace to-day, may at any time be at war with the mother country of any of the peoples I have just mentioned. The moneys appropriated by us towards that object, will be spent right here, and since we are entitled to make whatever use we think proper of the public revenue, nobody will have reason to complain. These moneys will be spent in Canada and for the benefit of Canadians.

There is a matter, Mr. Speaker, which seems to have made a vivid impression on the minds of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, it is the question of loyalty. There is no need for me of referring to it once more; the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Béland) dealt with it the other day in a masterly way, pointing out the various circumstances in our history when that loyalty asserted itself. I shall be content with recalling what Fréchette said one day; appealing to the English speaking population of this country and pointing to the British flag which floated over the citadel of Quebec, in a stanza which will live forever, he exclaimed:

'Had it not been for us, it would be there no more.' Should I recall also the memorable dates of 1775 and 1812. If Salaberry and his three hundred Canadian voltigeurs had not fought at Chateauguay, what would have become of the British flag? In 1870, have we not also generously contributed our share to the defence of the country? And what shall I say of 1885? The hon. member for Victoria stated the other day that we had approved of the rebellion of 1885. Does he not know that in 1885 the 65th battation, under the command of the French Canadians, ex-Justice Ouimet, vigorously took a hand in the defence of that same flag and in quelling the Northwest uprising. The same may be said of the 9th battalion of Quebec. Has the hon. member for Victoria forgotten that in 1899 my countrymen have generously given of their blood for the defence of that same British flag on the African veldt? I challenge him to mention a single instance in which our people refused to generously fight and work for the upholding of the British flag. We are taunted with being disloyal because the Prime Minister of Canada, on a certain occasion, stated, it appears, that possibly some day independence might be our lot. Well, in this connection, I shall quote the opinion of a man whom nobody, I am satisfied, will think of charging with disloyalty. Lord Milner, in the course of a speech at a banquet in Montreal, stated that fifty years hence, Canada would have to choose between imperial federation and independence.

We are taunted with being disloyal; but should not such a charge be brought forward rather against those who, in England, from day to day, add to our political freedom, who of their own accord, sever the ties binding us to Great Britain. Disloyal you say? Who can be more disloyal than the men who, occupying seats on the other side of the House, make it their special duty to sow discord and strife between the various races, by charging us with fanaticism and disloyalty, and most unfairly, as we have shown in the past.

There is all the difference in the world between the line of conduct of these men and that followed by the builder of this country, the peace-maker between its various races, of that man who appealing to the good will of Canadians of all origins, urges them to work in harmony, at any rate whenever the interests of Canada are at stake? What marked contrast there is between the policy of the man who made this country what it is to-day, great and prosperous, and those who in order to subserve their political aims, have been content purely and simply with running down the country, injuring its good name and doing their best to nullify it in the eyes of the world. I shall not delay the House any longer, since I promised to be short. For the reasons I have mentioned I shall vote with pleasure in favour of the government's proposal; I shall do so without fear, without weakness, and I even say, without hesitation.

Mr. THOMAS BEATTIE (London). I shall not, Mr. Speaker, offer any apology for taking up the time of the House for a short while because I believe that every member of this House should pronounce himself on this most important question; and in giving expression to my views, I trust that I shall not utter one word which may offend any hon. gentleman. The question of loyalty, I am sorry to say, has been brought up several times in this debate. To my mind it would have been better for this Dominion had that question not been raised, but, of course, I am simply giving my opinion and others may differ. But, it seems to me that after the generous manner in which Canada has been treated by Great Britain during the past half century there ought not to be one man in this House or out of it—be he Scotch, French, Irish, English, or born Canadian—who would stand up and say that he would be anything else than a good, loyal, British Canadian.

Were it not for the remarks that fell from the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McLean), I would not have taken part in this debate. In his speech that hon. gentleman said that we owe nothing to Great Britain but good-will and respect. I can only compare my hon. friend with that celebrated old character, Rip Van Winkle—I hope, Mr. Speaker, this remark is not unparliamentary. I am very much afraid that he has been asleep during the past half century, unconscious who was protecting him, or he would not have made the statement he did. Or he must have forgotten that there is such a place as Great Britain. But, of course, we all know that the clan McLean, during the flood, was said to have been quite independent of Noah and the ark, because they had a boat of their own; and by a similar flight of the imagination my hon. friend probably convinced himself that he was perfectly safe under the protection of the old family shot gun. I would like to tell the hon. gentleman that our forefathers were not driven from Great Britain. They had not to leave Great Britain, because the people who had to leave were generally sent to Botany bay. They did not come to Canada for Canada's good, but because they were under the impression that by so doing they could improve their position, both socially and financially, and in my opinion ninety-five per cent of them did so benefit. But had Great Britain not sent her army and navy to Canada and planted the Union Jack on our shores, our people would not have had this Dominion to come to; and for that alone we owe more than good-will and respect to the mother country.

If Canada expects to continue within the British empire—and I believe that we all do wish and intend to remain under her benign sway—we should not expect to live like drones in the bee hive, receiving all the protection, honour and benefit the empire can give us while refusing to assist in adding any honey to the hive. The question before this country and parliament is: Shall we give Great Britain for the British navy a present of two of the best battleships that can be built, or shall Canada build a so-called navy, which has been very aptly described by my hon. friend from Montreal (Mr. Doherty) as a stay at home navy? Two battleships would cost about $18,000,000, and not $25,000,000, as stated by hon. members opposite. But what would the contemplated government navy cost? I am informed that the annual expenditure on the maintenance of that navy would be about $7,000,000 and that amount would be expended on a navy which would have nothing to do, and would be compelled to remain idle in our harbours of Esquimalt and Halifax and others. The crews would have no other occupation but to paint the ships, scrub the decks and eat three good meals a day, to which they would, of course, be entitled. And the officers, no doubt, would fill in their time giving pink teas occasionally to their friends on shore at the expense of the people of this country.

Let me now recall some of the many favours which Great Britain has bestowed on Canada in the past few years, and I shall only mention those which are fresh in our memory and for which we have never paid or were asked to pay one dollar. Take the first trouble that occurred in our great northwest—that great heritage of which we are all so proud and boast so much. Did Great Britain not send us out General Wolesley, one of her best generals, who took charge of the Red River expedition, restored that country to peace and quietness, and handed it over to this Dominion. Then look back to the civil war in the United States, what did Great Britain do when there was danger of trouble along our borders? What did she then do for Canada? Did she not send us 10,000 of her best troops, composed of her best regiments, and several of her most efficient batteries of artillery, landing them at Halifax and marching them a thousand miles overland through ice and snow to the western part of Ontario? Well do I remember, as a small lad, the arrival of the 63rd regiment in London one midwinter midnight in the sixties. After that came the 53rd regiment and the 47th and the 60th rifles, one of the best rifle regiments in England. There also came Major Balfour's Grey battery of artillery—one of the best in the service. These troops were kept in Canada many years, at the imperial expense. until all danger of trouble was over. That expedition alone must have cost Great Britain much more than the price of the two Dreadnoughts we propose to give. And yet, although those troops were all stationed within gunshot of the door of my hon. friend from South Huron (Mr. McLean) that hon. gentleman says we owe Britain nothing but respect and good will. Did we ever pay one cent for that expedition? No, we did not. Were we ever asked to pay a cent for it? No.

Hon. gentlemen opposite keep telling us, over and over again, that two Dreadnoughts would cost $25,000,000, but I have it on the best authority that two of the best battleships can be built at a cost of $18,000,000 at the outside. Would it not be better to pay that amount and be done with the matter than to go on with the proposed navy, the cost of which, when completed, no one can foresee, and which, when completed, will be of no earthly use to Canada, but be simply a stay-in-the-harbour navy. And I am informed on undoubted authority that the upkeep of that navy will amount to $7,000,000 per year. Our militia, which in 1896 cost us but $1,000,000 per year, is now, thanks to the right hon. the Prime Minister and his sunny ways, costing us over $7,000,000 annually. Add these two annual expenditures, and you have $14,000,000 for the yearly upkeep of the navy and militia, or $2 per head for every man, woman and child in this country, babies included.

During this debate I have heard some hon. gentlemen describe Canada as a nation within the empire. Would not the terms 'Dominion within the empire' sound just as well? For my part, I do not care for that word nation. To me, it has a tingle of separation, and I trust that we shall continue, as I believe we shall, to remain under the good old Union Jack, because I believe that five years of separation would inevitably land us under the wing of the American eagle. Let me say in conclusion, that I trust no member sitting in this House to-day will live to see this Dominion separated from the British empire.

Mr. P. A. SEGUIN (L'Assomption.) (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, in order not to take too much of the precious time of this hon. House, I intend to offer but a few remarks. Still, I deem it my duty to express my views on the important question which has been under discussion for several weeks, namely, the creation of a navy for our national defence.

I have carefully listened to the speeches delivered from the very inception of this debate, and with a few exceptions I have found that most of the violent objections raised against the proposed navy are based on the fact that the measure introduced by the government does not go far enough..

Even the disloyalty of the French Canadians has been referred to, and the Prime Minister himself has not been spared the most outrageous attacks, on account of his attitude on this question. I am surprised that neither the leader of the opposition nor the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, who know how to wave, each to his own way, the opposition flag, have deemed it their duty to protest against those violent expressions directed against the government by hon. members opposite.

But violent as the debate has been, it has served a useful purpose in enlightening the minds, and I am free to say, Sir, that I am satisfied from what I heard of this debate that the government, in seizing the House with this Bill for the creation of a navy, has thoroughly mastered the question, having considered it from every standpoint, and that they have viewed it from the standpoint of the general interest of the country, irrespective of any party or racial consideration, or any local or private interest.

I may say that at first glance, prior to the debate and before I had examined the matter, the statu quo seemed to me an ideal state of things, and along with others, I was inclined to think that, the country having so far done without a navy. might very well do without it for a good many years, but I have since found out that it was a falacy.

The nations are groups of individuals, therefore, like the individuals, they grow in order to reach adolescence and then mature age.

Canada is still in its period of adolescense but without being disloyal to the mother country, we are quite free to think, in looking into a more or less remote future, that the time will come when our country will have to shape its own course; in short, Canada will do like the grown up boy who leaves the paternal roof in order to create a home for himself..

If we may have an insight into the future of our country, is it not desirable that we should, from this moment, begin to prepare ourselves for the struggle for life in the future?

There is not a single country, however small it may be, in Europe and in the rest of the civilized world, anxious for its future destiny, which has not its nucleus of a navy for national defence.

Although a mere colony, Canada, owing to the vast extent of her territory, her immense natural resources, her population growing yearly by leaps and bounds, is much ahead of those countries I have just referred to, and yet, she would remain indifferent to the fate which the future keeps in store for her. That would be, to say the least, imprudent.

Looking at the question from the standpoint of our relations with the mother country, I find also that it is but fair that we should contribute in some way and help to preserve the supremacy of the empire. The other colonies have responded to that very natural feeling; will Canada alone lag and stay behind? No, Sir, the political genius of the Prime Minister has devised the means of saving our autonomy and has succeeded in making the best of that scheme of national defence.

While allowing us to freely discharge our duties as colonists towards England, the government Bill provides first for our national defence, and it may well be said once more, on the present occasion, that the Liberal party has adopted the policy of 'Canada for the Canadians.'

The creation of a navy is calculated not only to give satisfaction to the just pride of a whole people, but moreover, to give the country the benefit of a new industry; the establishment of several navy yards for the construction of those warships will materially contribute to the prosperity of a portion of the population, and then, the building of those warships will be followed by the construction of merchant ships; now, everybody knows that for a country like Canada a merchant marine is the thermometer of its prosperity. Moreover, as we have in Canada the advantage over other countries of possessing enormous deposits of iron and nickel and everything that enters into the construction of ships, we may hope that this new industry will take an enormous development and even allow us to build ships for other countries, to the great benefit of our country. This new ship-building industry in Canada is going to procure work to thousands of heads of families and secure an inexhaustible source of revenue for them. Besides, this national navy will open to our young men an honourable career well worthy of their best aspirations. In short, Mr. Speaker, I consider that we have in that policy a new and considerable element of national prosperity.

As against the policy enunciated by the government, the hon. gentlemen opposite present two policies, quite indefinite and diametrically opposed; first, the hon. leader of the opposition wishes to place at the disposal of the Imperial authorities two Dreadnoughts, that is to say, all at once a sum of from twenty to twenty-five million dollars, even if we have later on to decide whether it is desirable or not to build a navy. I should not like to use here any offensive language, for I am loath to follow the hon. gentlemen opposite on that ground, but I wonder if the leader of the opposition, in formulating his proposal, has duly taken into consideration the interests of our country and its future destiny? Should it become urgent, in a more or less remote future, to build a navy for the defence of our country and the experience of other countries shows that such urgency will soon be felt—of what use will those twenty-five million dollars have been which Canada, at one blow, would have given to the mother country? Would not that void produced all at once in the public exchequer be calculated to retard the creation of our navy, and who knows what would result from such delay? It seems to me that the policy of the leader of the opposition on that point is disastrous, and it does not require much musings on the matter to come to such a conclusion.

Then comes the proposal of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), who says that the question ought to be submitted to the people to obtain at once the nation's opinion; but I ask, what is the use of an expenditure of two or three hundred thousand dollars when the nature of the result of that plebiscite is known beforehand?

I consider that the newspapers of Canada reflect public opinion; then, all you have to is to consult them, if you want to be well posted in that regard. I did very carefully consult those papers and I find that for the most part they are in favour of a contribution of Canada for the defence of the empire, and I infer therefrom, Sir, that the project of contribution devised by the Canadian government is the one which tallies best with the aspirations of our people. A few newspapers are more noisy than serious in their opposition to the government measure; but in their case it is easily seen that they aim more at stirring up popular prejudices against the government, the creator of this marine scheme, than against the scheme itself: in short, it is but a pretext and nothing else. I should not like to insinuate that the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, in advocating a plebiscite, is only aiming at setting up for a champion of the rights of the people. I am quite ready to believe in his sincerity, but undoubtedly one of the reproaches he will incur later on will be that of having used a subterfuge in order to avoid pronouncing himself, by his vote, on the merit of the policy of both parties on the issue now under discussion.

To my mind, Mr. Speaker, the attitude assumed by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier and some of his friends seems to show that the policy of the government, in this matter is absolutely fair and in full accord with the best interests of the country. Having realized the extravagant character of the policy advocated by the leader of the opposition and by his supporters, they cannot give it their support; but as they should think they were failing in their duty of blindly approving, in any and every case, the measures brought down by the government, they fall back upon a policy of plebiscite which, after all, means nothing and would have no results.

Personally, Sir, exclusive of the powerful voice of the press, I find that the opinion of nearly all the representatives of the Canadian people assembled in this legislative hall, with a view to working in the best interests of this country, is unquestionably the sound opinion of the whole people of Canada. Now, the nature of this opinion is well known, and with the exception of a small group of seven or eight members, the whole deputation—even should there eixst some difference of opinion as to the mode of contributing to the defence of the empire—none the less admits that it is desirable to do something in that direction.

Therefore, Sir, I infer therefrom that the well-understood interest of the country, our trade relations with the mother country and our future destiny are so many reasons which militate in favour of the creation of a navy for the national defence.

Therefore, I will vote in favour of the Bill, because I am satisfied that the revenues of the country are amply sufficient to meet the expenditure involved in the creation of such navy, without it being necessary to increase taxation; and, moreover, because it cannot affect the national works under construction, as well as the works that are now contemplated. It would be idle, and I should take without any necessity the time of the House were I to give a statement of the revenues of the country and of our national wealth; just as it would be an unnecessary repetition of former statements to give the figures showing the increase in population; and to compare the present position of Canada with what it will be in a few years.

It is quite easy to agitate public opinion, to go through the country as some one is now doing in the county of L'Assomption, which I have the honour of repre-presenting, trying to rouse prejudices by means of sonorious words, more or less devoid of sense. They talk about militarism, they refer to imperialism, they talk of millions of dollars; but, Sir, I should like to know if such verbiage is suggested by a sound and enlightened patriotism. Does that verbiage, on the contrary, not betray an ill-disguised ambition, a certain personal interest which seems, so to say, to silence the voice of reason and of public interest? But the electors of my county, as well as the electorate of the whole country, far from listening to those interested clamours, will realize that their mandatories had something else to do besides playing the part of a demagogue. That mandate, Sir, I did accept with all the responsibilities involved, and the oath I have taken as a representative of the people makes it incumbent upon me, under the circumstances, to give my most loyal support to the Bill providing for the creation of a navy for the national defence, and so doing, I think I have well deserved of my country.

On motion of Mr. Loggie, the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Fielding, the House adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, March 9, 1910.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT AMEMDMENT.

Hon. A. B. AYLESWORTH moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 159) to amend the Exchequer Court Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. AYLESWORTH. I am not able to state with exactness the provisions of this Bill as I have not seen a copy of it, but I understand that the shape in which it finally passed the Senate was an extension of the jurisdiction of the Exchequer Court to include the case of accidents which may happen not merely upon the line of government railways, but, speaking generally, in consequence of the operation of such railways. That is the scope of the enactment as it is now presented to this House.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

VOLUNTEER BOUNTY ACT—AMENDMENT.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 163) to amend the Volunteer Bounty Act, 1908.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. OLIVER. The purpose of the Bill is to extend the time during which the scrip issued under the Volunteer Bounty Act may be located from the end of the year 1910 to the end of the year 1911. There are two minor amendments which do not affect the principle of the Bill, and which can be explained fully in committee.

Mr. HUGHES. Does this extension apply to scrip that is already sold and in the hands of speculators, or does it apply only to scrip in the hands of volunteers?

Mr. OLIVER. There is no distinction in the original Act between scrip that is in the hands of volunteers and scrip that is in the hands of speculators, and neither is there any distinction in the amendment to the Act.

Mr. HUGHES. I might point out to the minister what he very well knows that owing to the very short time that was given a great many of these volunteers to locate their land they found it absolutely impossible to do so. This war was brought to a close in 1902. Year after year this matter was brought to the attention of the government, and year after year we were met with the statement that the government had not decided whether they would retain control of the northwest lands or hand them over to the provinces. Finally, in 1905, the government decided to retain control of these lands, the matter was pressed on their attention again, and it took us three years to get this scrip issued. Meantime, the volunteers had lost heart, they had no notion that they were likely to get this scrip, and when at last the minister did justice in the case, or a certain degree of justice, and decided to issue this scrip, the announcement came upon the volunteers so suddenly that, not having saved up their money, they were not in a position to go out and take up their homesteads. I know many volunteers who, if they had had any notion that they were going to get even one year's extension, would not have sold their scrip. The matter was taken up by a number of speculators, gentlemen who are well known to us, and some of whom are not more than a thousand miles away from this House, they have secured this scrip practically for a song, for a dollar or a dollar and a half per acre, and they retailed it, in many instances, at two and three times what it cost them. I maintain that it is unfair to the volunteer who sold his scrip under the conditions laid down by the old Act that the speculator, who secured that scrip, should have the right to this extension. He will only stand in the way of the honest volunteer who wants to secure a homestead. I maintain that this extension should only be given with respect to scrip already issued to bona fide volunteers who wish to settle on the land themselves. Had they been given the right to take this scrip in 1902, and had they been allowed until 1911 to settle on the land, 95 per cent of the volunteers would have gone upon the land. Had they known that they would have six or eight years to get ready for settlement upon the land they would have gone upon the land, and would to-day as farmers be assisting in the up-building of the Northwest. As it is the scrip has largely fallen into the hands of speculators, and I very much fear that the result of one year's extension—I certainly would have preferred two years—will be to cause this scrip still further to fall into the hands of speculators.

Mr. MACDONELL. I would like to ask the minister whether the class of persons to be benefited by volunteer scrip is to be extended to others. The Imperial South African Volunteer Association, I understand, have applied for a grant. Is it the intention of the government to extend this grant to those persons or to any others who served during the war?

Mr. OLIVER. As I have already explained, the Bill simply provides for an extension of time during which the scrip which was provided for under the Act of 1908 may be located. That is the only important provision of the Bill. It does not provide for any extension of the principles of the Act of 1908, or give the benefit of the Act to any other persons than those provided for in the Act of 1908.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. I understand that one hon. gentleman on the other side of the House introduced a motion or a Bill into the House permitting volunteers who had taken up their land and found the land worthless to exchange it for better land elsewhere. I would like to ask the minister if this Bill covers the point, and if it is the intention to grant such a privilege. I understand that quite a number of the volunteers went to the Northwest in good faith to locate their land. They had very little money, and less time. Immediately they landed there they were in the hands of men who were interested in townsites, and land corporations, and they were led off into desert country, in some cases thirty and forty miles away from the railway, and were induced to locate on this land in order to increase the value of other land held by these corporations. After locating, they discovered that their land was of very little use, and in addition that it would be perhaps years before they would be in a position to take advantage of the market being so far away from the railway. One of the hon. members from the west introduced a measure to correct that, and to permit them to exchange their homesteads for other lands more suitable to their purpose. I would like to know if the minister has included a provision in the Bill to meet cases of that kind.

Mr. OLIVER. Again I have to say that on the introduction of the Bill I stated its provisions. The Bill does not make any provision for the case which my hon. friend has mentioned.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. Will there be another Bill introduced that will?

Mr. OLIVER. I cannot answer that, but I presume there will not.

Mr. HERRON. I am sorry to hear the minister state that there are not going to be any extensions or privileges granted to others than those already mentioned in the old Act. In my opinion, Sir, there should be included in the bounty Act the men who enlisted and started on the journey to South Africa, but who met with misfortune of some kind on the way and had to be invalided. I think these invalided men have just as good a right to the privileges as those who went forward and served in the war.

Mr. HUGHES. Once they were enlisted.

Mr. HERRON. Yes, I refer to the enlisted men. If there are any changes made in the Act these men should be included in it.

Mr. TURRIFF. I am very anxious to see this Bill get before the House for the simple reason that I have already introduced a Bill providing that a volunteer or his substitute who had located a warrant on poor land should be able to exchange it. Owing to the position of my Bill on the order paper I have no hope of its being reached this session, but I expect to be able to submit my proposal to the House in the form of an amendment to the Bill which the minister has now introduced. There are only a limited number of men interested in this, but it is a matter of very great importance to each of them, and I hope nothing will happen to interfere with this Bill being submitted to the House so that I may endeavour to incorporate the provisions of my Bill in it.

Mr. S. SHARPE. The civil surgeons who went to South Africa and participated in the war and went through all the hardships of the campaign, are deserving of recognition from Canada, and yet they have been deprived of the privileges given to the South African veterans. This matter has been drawn to the attention of the Minister of the Interior on a number of occasions, but so far he has refused to include civil surgeons in this legislation. No more deserving class participated in that campaign, and I would urge that the minister should recognize their services under this Bill.

Mr. COWAN. I endorse what the last speaker has said with regard to the civil surgeons who served in South Africa. What I rise specially for is to ask the Minister of the Interior whether those men who are entitled to land under the Act will be allowed to enter for lands in the Dominion railway belt in British Columbia. I understood the minister to say last year that this would be done, and I wish to know if he has provided for it in this Bill. I would also ask the minister whether he considers that men who enlisted and who after the war domiciled in Canada are not almost equally entitled with those who were domiciled in Canada at the time of enlistment. I understood the minister to say last session that one object of the Bill was to reward service in the field, and the other object was to secure desirable settlers, and if the Bill has that double purpose I would ask the minister to say whether or not he has considered the claim upon the Dominion of those who were not domiciled in Canada at the time of enlistment, but who became domiciled in Canada after the war. They, like the others, served their country, and they, like the others, would make desirable settlers.

Mr. OLIVER. Again I have to say that the Bill contains only one provision of importance, and that provision extends the time during which the holders of scrip may locate upon lands in the prairie provinces.

Mr. HUGHES. But the minister is open to conversion with regard to these other matters.

Mr. OLIVER. When the Bill gets into committee that will be the proper time to discuss all these and other suggestions. As to the point raised by the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Cowan) that I promised that provision would be made for the location of these grants within the railway belt, I may say that I have no authority to make such a promise. The limitations of the Act as it passed parliament did not permit of that privilege, and the Bill now before parliament does not in its present form provide for it.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS.

COAL LANDS ALIENATED.

Mr. CAMPBELL:

1. During the time the Hon. Clifford Sifton was Minister of Interior, what was the total acreage of coal lands alienated from the Crown?

2. What was the total acreage of timber lands for which licenses and permits were issued, and what is the total acreage of land sold?

3. During the time Hon. Frank Oliver has been Minister of Interior, what was the total acreage of coal lands alienated from the Crown?

4. What was the total acreage of timber lands for which licenses and permits were issued?

5. What has been the total acreage of lands sold, exclusive of pre-emption?

Mr. OLIVER. Stand.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I would like some explanation of this 'standing business. Is it to stand for ever or only for a day. I have allowed it to stand for ten or twelve days, and I would like to know when I will get an answer.

Mr. OLIVER. There is a very great deal of labour involved in preparing an answer to this question. As soon as the question was asked, measures were taken to have the answer prepared, and I hope to be able to answer my hon. friend at an early date.

Mr. CAMPBELL. That is all I want to know.

Mr. OLIVER. I suppose it is obvious, even to my hon. friend, that it is one thing to ask a question and quite another thing to answer it.

Mr. LENNOX. No doubt about that.

SESSIONAL EMPLOYEES.

Mr. BEST:

1. What are the names of the sessional and temporary employees of the House of Commons who were under pay on the 27th January last?
2. What is the number of the said employees stated in the estimates of 1909-10?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Stands as notice of motion for a return.

BANK DEPOSITS.

Mr. BURRELL:

What was the amount of money on deposit in 1909 in the Post Office Savings Bank, and in the other banking institutions of Canada?

Hon. W. S. FIELDING:

On December 31, 1909, the amount of such deposits were as follows:

Post Office Savings Bank		$43,081,033 76
Dominion Government Savings Bank		14,288,396 35
Quebec Savings Banks (two)—
Government		104,541 86
Special		263,000 00
Public		30,925,654 56
Chartered Banks—
Government	$ 32,796,940
Demand	261,268,387
Time	499,082,024
Elsewhere than in Canada	75,088,499
		868,235,850 00
		$956,898,476 53

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS AT BURLINGTON.

Mr. LAKE:

1. Is the government aware that the collector of customs at the outpost of Burlington, Ont., is said to be also engaged in keeping a licensed hotel in the village of Burlington?
2. Does the government approve of its customs officers being employed in a commercial business while holding his office as collector?
3. Is it the intention of the government to ask for the resignation of this officer if he is found to be running a hotel?

Hon. WM. TEMPLEMAN:

1. The officer employed as acting subcollector of customs at Burlington is not engaged in keeping a licensed hotel in the village of Burlington.
2. The government, as a general rule, does not approve of a customs officer being employed in commercial business while holding the office of collector.

CENTRAL EXPERIMENTAL FARM.

Mr. W. H. SHARPE:

1. What is the number of horses on the experimental farm at Ottawa?
2. How many of them are geldings?
3. What is the number of acres under cultivation on the farm?

Hon. SYDNEY FISHER:

1. 18.
2. 13.
3. 400.

W. R. BARGE, ROSEDALE, B.C.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR:

1. With respect to the application of W. R. Barge, of Rosedale, B.C., dealt with in the Interior Department, correspondence file No. 264,921, May 29, 1909, on what date were the licensees therein referred to notified to the effect that they must remove the merchantable timber on this land within two years from date?
2. Has any extension of time been applied for? If so, what answer has been made?

Hon. FRANK OLIVER:

1. May 19, 1909.
2. The licensees of berths A and 61, in which the lands referred to are situated, have made application to be granted four years within which to remove the timber on the berths, but no special reference is made to the lands in which Mr. Barge is interested. No answer has, as yet, been sent.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. WILLIAM W. RUTAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I notice that I am reported in the newspaper 'Le Canada' of March 9 as having made a speech in this House yesterday on the navy question, and as having announced myself opposed to the government policy. This must be a typographical error, and I am sorry that it occurred, and I am sure that the gentleman whose name should appear instead of mine will feel equally sorry. As this article is in French, I am unable to read it, but I wish to say that I have not yet made a speech on the navy question, nor had I intended to do so; for I had thought that the matter was thoroughly threshed out by men as competent as I am, and perhaps more so. At this point I will only say that I am thoroughly in accord with the government policy. I believe it to be the only policy to be pursued in this young country of ours, to maintain unity amongst all the nationalities that we have in the country, and those that are coming to the country.

Mr. SPEAKER. The navy question is not before the Chair.

Mr. RUTAN. I am perfectly willing to leave it at that.

PORT ARTHUR DRY-DOCK.

Mr. A. C. BOYCE. I wish to ask the Minister of Public Works whether it is true, as announced in the press, that subsidies have been granted for the construction of a dry-dock at Port Arthur, and if so, when it was granted.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It is quite true that the government has decided to grant aid under the Subsidy Act for a dry-dock at Port Arthur. That decision was arrived at a few days ago.

Mr. BOYCE. Will the hon. minister state when the papers relating to that matter will be brought down, for which an order of the House was issued in November last?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I was under the impression that they had been brought down, but I will make inquiry, and if they have not, I will endeavour to have them brought down in a day or two.

ADJUDICATION OF CLAIMS TREATY.

Mr. BOYCE. I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether he has had any word yet as to the ratification by the United States Senate of the treaty between Great Britain and the United States in regard to the adjudication of claims.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I will make a note of it.

THE NAVAL SERVICE OF CANADA.

House resumed adjourned debate on the motion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier for the second reading of Bill (No. 95), respecting the naval service of Canada, the proposed amendment of Mr. Borden thereto, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Monk.

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON (Westmorland). Mr. Speaker, I think any hon. member who has had the privilege of being present here during the past two weeks must have realized that if the country is not tired with the discussion of this navy question, the House is absolutely and wholly tired out with it. Last night I made a good resolution, which I hope I may be able to carry out to the full, that was, that if my remarks had any virtue at all, it would be particularly in the line of brevity. In aproaching the consideration of so great a question as that involved in the motion, and the amendments thereto now under discussion, fraught as it is with such vast possibilities to the future history and destiny of Canada, I do so with a good deal of timidity, and trepidity as well. Having listened carefully to the debate, and having read the speeches when I have not been permitted to hear them, I am conscious that in many respects I do not concur either in the amendment to the amendment, or in the amendment, and that I am not wholly in accord with the original motion itself. Although I think I can fairly say that I am not wholly discordant with the principles and spirit which that notion breathes, but am wholly out of tune with the propositions involved in the amendment to the amendment, and the amendment to the motion. So emphatic is this realization that I begin to be impressed with the conviction that I shall be obliged, like Lord Dundreary's peacock, to flock all by myself alone. For thirty-five years and upwards I have been an active adherent of the Liberal party, I am so today, and I believe that I shall be to the moment of drawing my latest breath. For thirty-five years I have served that party, and I hope that a few years more at least will be permitted me to continue that service. One of the reasons why I have been associated with the Liberal party, and why I hope to be continued with it, is the liberty of conscience that is given to every individual member of the party. That has been the history of the party in the past, and the moment that it deviates from that course, it will have ceased to be a Liberal party.

Now, Sir, I am making these remarks for a very good reason. I have said that I am not in perfect accord with the Bill which is involved in the original motion, and I hope before I take my seat to explain wherein that is the case. It is not pleasant for one who has been a great many years a follower of that party to find himself unable to see eye to eye with it, yet there are occasions in the life of every public man when his convictions must not be suppressed, when they should not be submerged, and I simply propose to state before this House and the country the views which I hold on this great question. I have said that it involves the future destiny and history of this Dominion. I go further and say that it involves the present conditions under which we are living. I go still further and say that it is a momentous question, involving almost every condition of public service, and every idea with respect to the course and administration of government. Holding that view it is but fair that, since I cannot accept all that those with whom I have been associated desire to have adopted, I should explain my position, not only to my friends, but to the House and to the country at large. I have the greatest confidence in the leaders of the Liberal party, and I regret that I have not, perhaps, the same confidence in my own judgment. I may be absolutely and entirely wrong, but I am bound to be true to my own convictions, regardless whether my judgment be good or the reverse. The convictions I hold are honest and sincere, and as such I must stand by them.

No one listening to this debate could fail to be impressed with two prominent features which have characterized it. First, the desire of those who sit on your right, Mr. Speaker, to demonstrate the glorious inconsistency and variableness of those who sit on your left; and I am bound to say that the attempt has been crowned with a measure of success, somewhat startling, if not wholly edifying and comforting to the people of Canada. The second feature is the determined effort of those who sit on your left, Sir, to prove to the world at large that those who sit on your right are absolutely enemies of the empire, traitors to His Majesty the King, his crown and realm and person, and to the flag which heretofore, in our enthusiasm, we have been proud to say has braved the battle and the breeze throughout the lifetime of the British nation. All this is an edifying spectacle indeed. As regards the effort to prove inconsistency, even if inconsistency be proved up to the hilt, and out of the very mouths of the offenders, is it really germane to the problem we are attempting to solve by the agency of this Bill? True it may not be flattering to this country to have it shown that the leaders of a great party, bent on securing the reins of government, are simply playing the role of opportunists, and are as variable and mercurial as an April day, regardless of the country's peril or the people's interest. But that question is one which the party leaders will have to settle with their followers and the country at a later day. Such a spectacle presented in this day and generation may tend to shake public confidence in the men who essay to govern and thereby become the guardians of the political and national conscience of Canada, but it does not greatly illumine the subject to be dealt with. Of one thing it does convince us, and that is that there is room in Canada for a Canadian James Russell Lowell, and a Canadian Hosea Bigelow to illustrate the characteristics of our political conditions at this time.

The other attempt which has been made has been to show that those who sit on your right, Mr. Speaker, are disloyal. That is a very old cry. It is one with which we are all familiar, and is certainly not one upon which I should claim the attention of this House at any length. I have heard that cry from the very beginning of my knowledge of political affairs. I have heard it raised against the Liberal party. In my boyhood days, particularly after the struggle for responsible government in Nova Scotia, I heard that great statesman, Joseph Howe, denounced as disloyal, and as an innovator, not true to his King and country, because he contended for a larger measure of freedom and political control in the affairs of the country in which he lived. This cry has always been the answer to those who were pleading for an enlargement of the people's rights. When there is nothing else to be said against any one or against any political party, the attempt is made to prove disloyalty. Now, while I hold the views I do with respect to this subject, I do not think it is fair to say of the right hon. gentleman who introduced this Bill (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) that he is in any sense disloyal, or that he is not as sincere is his desire for the advancement of the country as any other hon. member in this House. It is not fair to say that one party has a monopoly of loyalty, and of a desire to advance the interests of the country; and I think that we can sweep away as unworthy of our consideration all arguments advanced with a view to show either inconsistency on the part of the Conservative party or disloyalty on the part of the Liberal party, in the consideration of this question.

Now, Sir, I will reverse the order of the motions in my consideration of them. First, I will consider the amendment to the amendment which was moved by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk); then the amendment to the original motion which was moved by the hon. leader of the opposition; and lastly, the original motion involving the adoption of the Bill introduced by the right hon. the Prime Minister. Now, as to the policy involved in the amendment to the amendment, I can best characterize it as a 'do-nothing policy.' We remember that in the United States, many years ago, they had what was called a 'know-nothing policy'—and I suppose my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier is the leader of a third party in this country which advocates a 'do-nothing policy.' I have no sympathy with the ideas involved in that amendment to the amendment; while I have every respect, indeed a profound respect, for the hon. gentleman himself, who stands well in this House and in this country, a man of culture, a man of broad ideas, a man of ability. I respect him as such, but I certainly think that he has not done justice either to himself, or to Canada, which he, in common with the rest of us, I hope, loves, or to Great Britain, to which he gives a great deal of credit.

The next in order for consideration is the amendment moved by the hon. leader of the opposition. That seems to me to be based on two principles, one, that of a contribution called for by an emergency crisis, and the other, the policy of a plebiscite. Now, I shall endeavour to deal with this amendment from the standpoint of a contribution, I do not propose to discuss at any length the question of a crisis, or an emergency. That has been treated so fully that I think we may consider it as having been disposed of, so far as it enters into a discussion of this question. As to that amendment advocating a contribution. it cannot be said that it is anything more than an act of expediency, not one of policy. No hon. gentleman can say that, so far as that amendment relates to the contribution of Dreadnoughts, it lays down a platform or a policy for the people of Canada to follow. It might, under certain circumstances, be considered as a generous act; it might, if you will, be considered as a quid pro quo offered in a moment of magnaminity. But it can never be said that it contains a policy for the people of Canada to build upon, a platform upon which they can start out to erect their superstructure. We must remember that we have to deal with this question, not merely for the present but for the future, and that as we start to build, so will the completion of our structure be. If there is anything in the idea of the amendment, it is in my judgment foreign to the spirit of the government under which we live. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition, in his boyhood days, I know, was wont to pay great attention to the public speeches, lectures and utterances of the late Hon. Joseph Howe; and I fancy there is no gentleman sitting in this Chamber who is more familiar with the utterances of that great statesman. I know that he must have a clear memory of the speeches that gentleman delivered at Southampton, of the letters to Earl Grey, to Sir Francis Hincks, the twelve resolutions which he moved early in the history of colonial government in Nova Scotia, and his great speeches on the organization of the empire. My hon. friend, brought up, as I know he was, and as I was, in a Liberal family, must have been familiar with the principles which the Hon. Joseph Howe enunciated; and I am sure that when my hon. friend came to pen that amendment he must have felt that he was contradicting every principle and all the early teachings concerning responsible government which he had imbibed from that great statesman. For that reason I would dispose, so far as I am individually concerned, of that amendment as unsatisfactory; I could not find it in my heart to vote in favour of it. I repudiate the idea that we are mere colonists, I repudiate the terms 'colony' and 'colonists'. They may have been proper terms to use in the early days when we were a Crown colony, when we were looking to Downing street, when we were mere subjects, subservient to a government beyond the sea; but to-day we stand in an entirely different position.

An hon. MEMBER. How?

Mr. EMMERSON. To-day we have local responsible self-government within Canada and within the provinces of Canada and so we should have a reasonable respect for our surroundings, for our conditions, for our rights, for our dignity as a young nation within the great empire of Great Britain.

As to the second feature, that of the plebiscite, it does not occur to me as necessary that this matter should be submitted to the people of Canada. We must all recognize that this question has not been entirely overlooked. The attitude taken by the government of Canada in 1902 and in 1907, has my fullest and heartiest support. I also support in its entirety the principle contained in the resolution of March 29, 1909, the point where I diverge from it being as to its inclusion of the word speedy, and the meaning of this I shall explain later. I have said that the principles enunciated by the government in 1902, 1907 and 1909 have my approval and concurrence and I shall endeavour to show how these principles can best be turned into effect, having regard to the conditions prevailing in Canada and to the future of this country. I have endeavoured to express the idea that the amendment of the leader of the opposition does not contain a policy but simply a suggestion as to an expedient and it is not I think, worthy of any great party that seeks to administer the affairs of Canada. Its whole foundation, if it has any reason for existence at all, lies in the attempted creation of a German scare, of a menace to the empire of Britain, from the German or some other empire. Such a menace, it seems to me, does not exist. We have had many scares in this country originating under conditions not unlike these. The entrance of New Brunswick to confederation resulted because of a Fenian scare. Later we have had the Russian scare, we have had the French scare. All these were great crises. Later on we have had many election scares, we have had the scare of French domination in our province and all over the Dominion. These scares and these fancied crises originate, I was almost going to say from brains that are sprained in some way, they are not merely the result of brain storms but they are spasms and paroxysms that seem to come to political parties at intervals and at times when there is some great end to serve and some great purpose to achieve. Therefore I say that in so far as the basis for any contribution is concerned, it is gone and absolutely gone, as has been demonstrated to this House time and again in the last few days by the extracts quoted from the speeches of prominent men in Great Britain, of the chancellor of the German empire, and the utterances of a few days ago of the great thunderer of Great Britain, the London 'Times.' It is conceded on all sides that there is no emergency, that there is no crisis, that it simply exists as a conjuring of the brain. Assuming that it does not exist, then where falls this policy of a contribution. England does not want it, she does not ask it. What England wants is some assertion of principle and policy on the part of the Canadian people that will be a moral force in support of the empire and that will be a notification to the nations of the world that if Great Britain is in trouble, if the empire of Britain is menaced or imperilled, the dominions beyond the seas will be at her back and will spend their money, their men and their strength without stint. I believe that if a national crisis existed, Canada would give money and men without stint. But does the emergency exist? There is no one who can say it does exist or that there is a likelihood of its existence and therefore it is simply now a question for this House and this country to consider as to the course that Canada should take in connection with her attitude as a young nation within the great mother nation of the empire.

This leads me to the consideration of the original motion, the one to the effect that we shall have the second reading of this Bill and go into Committee of the Whole to take into consideration what we should do towards helping the empire, not merely in a crisis or in the event of a crisis but as a settled policy, a policy whereby we shall be recognized measureably as a part of the British empire, at least sustaining the burdens and assisting in the protection of ourselves as a portion of the empire and aiding and contributing to the support and the defence of the empire at large. It is simply a question, after all, as to the means to an end. I would like to deal with the practical and economic features of this measure. I would stop to analyse for a moment Canada's position in respect to the empire and with respect to the conditions prevailing within her own bounds. What is expedient for her, using the word expedient with its wide and proper meaning. It is a question of expediency, having regard to our conditions, having regard to our situation, having regard to the problems which we have in hand at this time, and which we anticipate having in hand in the near future. In determining that question of expediency we must not forget that everybody's problem in life is not to fancy what he would like to do but to find out what he has to do and make the very best that he can of it. What is thus true of the individual is true in the larger sense of nationhood. Now, the Bill involved in the motion of the right hon. leader of the government is one that is worthy of consideration. Let me say at the very outset that I have always agreed and do now agree with the principle of that Bill. I question its necessity at this moment. I question the judgment that would conclude that it was necessary to introduce it before the people of Canada at this moment, but that is merely my opinion and I hope always to have the courage of those opinions born of conviction and sincerity.

Now, I want to make a little personal explanation. I have been credited with the coinage of a term that has been freely circulated from one end of this country to the other. I refer to the phrase 'a tin-pot navy.' Let me say that if there is any credit for the coinage of a phrase, I am not entitled to any credit for the coining of that phrase. More than that, I am not aware that I ever made use of such a term I know that I never voiced the words, and yet I am told that this was given free circulation in some of the public newspapers in Canada. If I had used the term, I would stand by it, but as I did not, I must relinquish claim to the credit and repudiate this as an utterance by me. But, Mr. Speaker, we must realize in dealing with this measure the conditions under which we are living to-day. Canada has many great transportation problems. The extension of our canal system and the creation and construction of magnificent railways are necessary to the development of our rapidly expanding country. The deepening and widening of our waterways, the extension of our trade abroad, the establishment, in the interests of the people of this Dominion, of commercial agencies wherever there is trade to be had, the initiation of a policy which would have, as representatives of this Dominion in every country where Canada has trade, agents of our Customs Department in order that they might spy out the opportunities and report the conditions affecting the internal affairs of Canada, our tariff conditions and our trade, to our government, which reports could be disseminated through the country to the advantage of the commercial world and the business element which are becoming so prominent within our borders—these are all great problems that must be solved. We must also recognize that we have assumed immense burdens, that we have taken hold of difficulties that to greater countries, and countries of greater wealth, would be recognized as almost insurmountable. We have one great transcontinental railway, and we have two others in course of construction, and both nearing completion. The people of the country to the south of us, although they have a population of upwards of eighty millions, although they have been in advance of us in the business and industrial world, have not one single transcontinental line of railway spanning their country from the shores of the Atlantic to the shores of the Pacific. That is a startling fact, but it is one that is true, nevertheless. They possess railways connecting one with the other whereby you can start from the Pacific ocean and reach the Atlantic, but they have never assumed the burdens in connection with transcontinental railways which the people of Canada have had the courage to undertake. We want, in addition to that, to bring about the development of our transportation facilities. We want population. Canada wants more steamship services from the St. Lawrence and the maritime ports, to every port in the world. She wants to enlarge and deepen her canals and improve her river channels so as to accommodate the largest ships. She requires the construction of new canals, new railways and branch lines for those railways. Then, these branch lines must connect sections wherever population is to be found with the centres of population. She wants these lines projected into every section where a mining or agricultural population can be maintained. She demands large expenditures, not only in furthering a great national policy of transportation, but also in promoting the increase of her population. The people want a live, up-to-date and intelligent grasp of the necessities of the hour, with hustling action on the part of governments and those charged with the responsibility of the development of the country. They do not want timid hesitancy in respect to these matters. The prophecy of the right hon. leader of the government that the twentieth century would be Canada's will be realized if we are but measureably active and alert with regard to the illimitable and rich natural resources of our country.

These are some of the wants of Canada. We are face to face with meeting those wants, and in that connection comes up the question of the advisability of the construction of a navy at the present time. Well, Sir, I do not take very great exception to the initial cost, either of the commencement or the completion of a navy in itself. But, one must bear in mind that we are embarking on a wider sea than these limitations would indicate. There is the question of the maintenance of that navy, and as to that I shall not refer particularly. What I want this parliament to remember is that in the adoption of this Bill we must be careful not to overlook the fact that if you have a navy to defend your coasts you must have in conjunction with it modern fortifications in every sea-port, and harbour on the Atlantic and the Pacific oceans, and so, when we embark on the construction of a navy we are of necessity launched into immense expenditure for these fortifications. The question then comes for our consideration, are we in a position to assume the burden in the manner proposed? As an incident of a navy we must have dockyards, we must have dry-docks, and I suppose we must have admiralty boards and councils. I am no pessimist with respect to the strength, and the willingness, and the power of the Canadian people to accomplish great undertakings. I believe that our people are able to overcome any difficulty that is likely in the ordinary course of events to confront them, but, we are charged with the responsibility of legislating, and we must hesitate before we place burdens upon the people. I am not now speaking of the proposal in this Bill as a contrast to what has been proposed by the hon. leader of the opposition. His proposal means a grant of $20,000,000 or $25,000,000 offhand, and the proposal of the right hon. the Prime Minister means not so many millions at the outset, but it involves great incidental expenditures which may be, and will be in my judgment an obligation upon the Canadian people for all time to come. Then, let us ask ourselves if this navy in one form or other is a necessity at this moment. And, Sir, in considering that question, while I defer to the judgment of the right hon. gentleman, and of those by whom he is surrounded in council, I do say that the spasm and the paroxysm that has seized upon hon. gentlemen opposite in their clamouring for a contribution, and for Dreadnoughts ad libitum to be sent across the water has impregnated the atmosphere to some extent although it seems to have lost some of its power in its passage across the floor. However, there is not a difference as to principle, it is simply a difference as to detail, Now, Mr. Speaker, I may say that the expenditure for maintaining the proposed navy, and for the continuance of admiralty boards and councils is, perhaps, not an obstacle that should frighten the people. But, when we realize that Canada has expended in the last twenty years for the maintenance of our militia upwards of $60,000,000 we can form some estimate of what the establishment of a navy, and naval boards, and naval councils will mean. I may be somewhat radical on these points; it may be that I have not a due appreciation of the requirements of this country, but I have felt that already we have had too much of these military councils; that we have had entirely too much of men going from one end of the country to the other, who toil not and neither do they spin, and yet none are arrayed like one of these, and who have placed in their hands, by the influence of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House as well as on this, thousands and hundreds of thousands, and millions of dollars year after year to sustain this great establishment. And, Sir, when I realize what that expenditure would have done in other directions, I confess that I am sorry it has not been spent in what to me would appear a manner more conducive to the welfare of our country. I am no lover of post mortem examinations into the past, but I feel it my duty to invite the attention of the House to that expenditure in order that we may realize in some degree what may be expected from us in the future if we duplicate these organizations in the form of a navy, and navy boards, and naval councils—Lord high admirals and admirals, and so on. Now, Sir, I can read the condition of Canada to-day in the light of history. When the thirteen colonies declared for independence they had terrible difficulties to surmount in the matter of their maritime power, and the success which attended an earnest sincere, and valiant people was little dreamed of by Lord North, and those who inspired him at the beginning of that struggle. I can come down further in the light of the history of the war of 1812, and realize what an efficient navy meant to the American union at the time of the declaration of that war. Although the union had been preparing for that conflict she had not more than seventeen war vessels, but she had a splendid merchant marine which was found to be an efficient auxiliary to the naval force, and which in a very short time was supplied with 50,000 men. The union did not have more than six warships proper, and these were frigates of no large size, manned by 5,000 sailors. I may be told that conditions have changed, and so they have. But, Sir, although I have spoken longer than I intended, I must continue in order to say that I would have been glad if the government could have presented a Bill containing the very principles which this Bill contains, but also containing suggestions which I shall with all due deference place before the House, and especially submit for the consideration of hon. gentlemen opposite as a restraining influence upon their frenzied brain style of reaching forward towards Dreadnoughts ad libitum.

I would have been glad if the government had introduced a measure providing for training ships in sufficient number to meet the requirements of the Atlantic sea-board, the Pacific sea-board and the inland waters of Canada, the great lakes. Training ships to do what? To furnish the personnel for a navy that must come. If we are to reach out into greater nationhood, if we are to expand and develop, if our population is to increase, it is not so very far in the future where, without regard to any condition that may exist elsewhere, but as a necessity of our internal conditions, our growth and expansion, there will be a necessity for the establishment of a navy suitable to our means and our conditions. That training could provide, first, somewhat on the lines of the Newfoundland naval reserve, a scheme to educate the seamen of the east and of the west and along the lakes, so that they would graduate into a navy almost automatically. We must remember that in the manning of a navy conditions have changed from what they were in 1812 and in 1775. To-day it is not merely able-bodied seamen and men of valour that are required; but you want technically trained men; you want the machinist, the mechanic, the electrical engineer. You want men with trained eyes and trained hands and trained brains, and they cannot be created in a day. They are the condition precedent of a navy; and I would add, and I think the people of Canada would add and demand, that when we have a navy it should be Canadian-built and Canadian-manned. And what is more, I never want to see a ship of the naval force of Canada launched into the waters of our coasts commanded by any other than a Canadian or controlled by any but men of our own Canadian brain and brawn. That would be my idea. Correlative with that I would provide for an emergency. I would have that training fleet in operation, and I would begin to provide for what might be termed a peace fund in Canada—a fund that could be changed into a fund, if necessity arose, for the protection of the empire. Now, why have such a fund? Canada can, it is true, stand, and would be willing to stand, large contributions for her own development and for the defence of the empire. We all recognize and gratefully acknowledge the fact that our trade routes and our commerce are protected by the navy of England. In proportion to our trade and in proportion to the protection given to it, our customs revenues expand and increase; they are expanding and increasing year by year; and the people of Canada would do right, and they would be willing to do it, to set aside year by year a percentage of those customs revenues—it might amount to $3,000,000 or $5,000,000 or more each year; and the fund so formed could be placed, if you will, to the credit of Canada in the bank of England, and named, if it needed a name, 'Canada's peace fund.' It would be a notification to the nations of Europe and to the world that Canada was determined to support the empire in her hour of need, if that hour ever came. That fund would grow. In the meantime, it would cost nothing to maintain. There would be no outgoes in the maintenance of it, and it would be ready at any moment, if the emergency arose, and could be contributed at once to the empire for the benefit of the empire. Is there anything more needed by a nation in stress of conflict than money? Recent history has demonstrated that. The war between Russia and Japan and the war between Spain and the United States are illustrations. Even in the Boer war Great Britain did not find it very easy to provide the funds to enable her to put down the Boers. Votes of money were given, and given generously and freely; but the burden on the people of Great Britain was very great. The additions to the budget were enormous, but they were cheerfully assumed by the people of Great Britain. But if in case of an emergency we were in a position to place at the disposal of the empire $50,000,000, or $40,000,000, or $30,000,000, this would certainly be a contribution that would be of advantage, and would demonstrate to the world that we were doing something in support of the empire, even if we did not send Dreadnoughts. What, Sir, would such legislation mean? After all, what was wanted by Great Britain was a declaration on the part of the overseas dominions that would have a moral effect with the nations of the world; and if it were known by Germany or any other European nation that Canada was preparing a fund primarily for the preservation of peace—because, after all, as I understand it, these armaments are justified because they tend to preserve the peace of the world—consider the moral effect the knowledge of such a fact would have. At least that is how the nations justify the creation of great naval fleets and the establishment of great armaments. They plead that they are incurring these heavy expenditures in order that the peace of the world may be preserved. If an enactment by Canada would not be a notification to all these nations that Great Britain would have our support, I do not know of any other course that could more effectively convey that idea. I shall not touch upon the fact that the United States and Japan have lessened their war appropriations at the very moment when we are proposing to launch out into this heavy expenditure. Japan, in its last estimates, decreased its vote for the navy and army, and so did the United States, whereas we in Canada are going to branch out into an increased expenditure this year and a still greater expenditure next year.

I could not divest myself of my personal responsibility even if I would. I owe a duty to my constituents, and I recognize the fact that I am absolutely and unreservedly opposed to the policy of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden) and also to the do-nothing policy of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk). Then what shall I support? I shall take a course without fear, favour or affection, and I assume that every hon. gentleman will do the same. But I find myself, as I have said, very much in the position of Lord Dundreary's peacock. I am obliged to flock all by myself alone, but there is a bird near me which is more to my own liking. I cannot have what I would. All government is based on compromise. We cannot all have our own way, and I have given this matter great consideration. I am bound to say that there has not been any man on either side who has asked me what my attitude was on this question. My declaration by my vote will be in favour of the principle which I have enunciated—that is a principle which involves a policy which is Canadian, which is for the future, and which means something for the empire. To give a contribution this year or next year to Great Britain would mean perhaps that we would be expected to do that the following year, but there would be no fixed understanding. One government and one parliament might do it, and another might not. But to put it in a form of an enactment, showing what Canada is prepared to do, is a tangible something which governments and parliaments cannot violate, which would go on for the benefit of the empire and the advantage of Canada, particularly as I see it. I did not intend to take up so much of the time of the House. I have given criticisms on the details of the Bill which perhaps would have been more opportune in Committee of the Whole; but its principles are quite in accord with my own and the scheme proposed is in a sense identical with my views except in this respect, that I say the time has not come for us to launch it. My hon. friends say: yes, it has. My hon. friends opposite say send millions and send Dreadnoughts; do that without plebiscites, but do not do the other without going back home and consulting the people.

Mr. E. A. LANCASTER (Lincoln and Niagara). I do not intend to weary the House by following the argument, if it may be so called, of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Emmerson), further than to congratulate him upon being, as he assures us he is, the only member of this House, amongst two hundred odd, who has not gone into paroxisms and spasms on this question. While he was making his plea, one would have thought that his argument would have lead to the very reverse of the conclusion he arrived at. The hon. gentleman compared himself to the historical peacock. I should have thought that he would have added another bird to his aviary and would more fittingly have likened himself to a peacock of canabalistic propensities with a dish of crow before it which it was eating with undoubted enjoyment. The hon. gentleman has given us reason after reason why the Bill of the government should not pass, and he consequently felt impelled to state that no doubt we would be surprised to find that after all he was supporting the government. Well, speaking for myself, I was not at all surprised. I had no idea that he would do anything else except eat crow. I was therefore not at all surprised that, after making a speech bristling with declarations of independence, he should wind up by supporting the government. He still, however, tries to leave the House in some doubt as to what he may do in the end, because he still reserves the right to bring forward in committee a do-nothing policy of his own. He is not going to do this, that, or the other thing. He does not approve of the government policy, he cannot vote for that of the leader of the opposition, and he is very much incensed at the policy introduced by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, which he styles a do-nothing policy, and he winds up by declaring, what no one doubted, that he would support the government, taking care, however, to throw out some obscure intimations as to some other course which he may take during the debate in committee.

The main reason why he opposes the policy of the leader of the opposition is that, first of all, there is no emergency, and secondly, that he wants the people of this country to understand that the proposal of the opposition is not one of policy, but of expediency. Let me ask the hon. gentleman: Can he name to me a wiser, a higher quality of policy for this great country than the declaration to the world at large that any nation which interferes with the mother country will at the same time interfere with Canada? I see that the hon. gentleman has gone out. Will some one kindly ask him to come back before the debate closes, because I would like to put to him this question; and I would use my influence with my party and try to prevail on the leader of the government to allow the rules to be broken and give the hon. gentleman another opportunity to speak on this question, and tell us, if he can, what policy would be grander, nobler or better for the country than one by which Canada would declare, not only to Germany, but the world at large, that, in case of emergency, no matter how many millions were required, Canada would stand by the mother country first, last and all the time. The hon. gentleman, throughout his remarks, indicated that he was in favour of British connection, but if there is anything in his so-called flocking alone policy, it means that Canada should go meandering along, taking the benefit all through the ages of everything that Great Britain has done for this country in the way of constructing a navy for the advantage of the trade of Canada to enable us to produce, as we all want to do, flourishing manufactories, with the means of shipping our wheat to foreign countries, and doing all this while sponging on Great Britain to protect our products while we send them forth into the universe. My hon. friend talked about dignity; my hon. friend talked, I took down his words, about a 'dignified policy for Canada.' Well, now, I would not like to give my boys a lesson upon dignity in the sense that the hon gentleman understands dignity. I would not like a boy of mine, after I had educated him and fitted him for a successful career in life, after I had taught him lessons of manliness, and endeavoured to instil in his heart a love of uprightness and nobility, nationally as well as individually, after I had done all this for him, and after he had grown up to manhood, I would not think it would be dignified for him to say to his father: I am 21 years of age, and the old man is 65, and it is dignified in me to repudiate him if I can save a little money by so doing. The hon. member may consider that dignity in the county of Westmorland, but my constituents would call it gross meanness.

He talks about the meaning of the word 'speedy.' He voted for that resolution, which the leader of the opposition put forward as an amendment in order to save the honour of this country by giving speedy relief; and the hon. gentleman, forsooth, wants to beat around the upper lakes with a few fishing boats, and still he does not make up his mind what kind of a flag they are to sail under. And he does not want to do even this for five, ten or fifteen years. Sir, I must say that his opinion of what is speedy relief is entirely at variance with the idea of an ordinary school boy, let alone a grown up person in the county of Lincoln. But just as the hon. gentleman wants to do his duty to his constituents, so I am bound to say, in doing my duty to my constituents, that that is not my view of what constitutes speedy relief to the motherland.

Now, the hon. gentleman pooh poohed the idea that there was any emergency. The hon. gentleman has a colleague here from his province in the person of the hon. member for Sunbury and Queens (Mr. H. H. McLean) who declared, as he was bound to declare, the other day, in my hearing, and in this same debate, that he did not agree with the contention of the other government supporters that there was no emergency; he made a very powerful argument to show that there is an emergency, and that this country requires something to be done in order that Great Britain may understand our position in that emergency. So, while the hon. member for Westmorland is trying to walk alone, he is up against the arguments of a gentleman on his own side of the House, as well as against the arguments of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. Having said this much in criticism of the hon. gentleman's speech, I need not bother this House any more with him.

Now, as to the Bill itself, what position are we in? The government admits, by the introduction of this Bill, that something has got to be done.

Now, the whole issue between us is: Are we to deal with Canada alone, or with Canada as a part of the British empire? That is the crux of the question, and we must face it. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that you realize that as well as any other hon. member in this House—must we consider Canada as an independent nation, or as a part of the British empire? The hon. gentleman no doubt is sincere in the stand he takes. I do not say that in any sneering manner, because I believe that hon. gentlemen opposite are sincere, although they may forget themselves on occasions. But I apprehend that hon. gentlemen supporting the government are sincere when they say that there is no emergency, and that consequently we should shape our course as though Great Britain did not need our assistance. For my part I believe that there is an emergency, and even the government supporters admit that if there were an emergency it would be the duty of Canada to render effectual assistance to the empire. However, they deny the existence of the emergency and hope that no emeregency will ever occur, although we fear it will. Now, if they are sincere when they argue in this manner, it does seem strange to me that they have not seen a way out of the difficulty. If they are sincere, why do they not adopt the amendment of the leader of the opposition and so relieve themselves from the difficulty? Let them adopt the amendment of the leader of the opposition if they are desirous of maintaining the integrity of the British empire, and every one of their views will be complied with. If there is not an emergency, they will still be showing their adhesion to the view that Canada is an integral part of the British empire, and is bound to do something for imperial defence; while if there is an emergency, they are rendering that speedy assistance to the mother country which the resolution of last March calls for. Sir, it is not the paltry value of the money gift that counts in this matter, but it is the great moral influence which Canada will exert upon the whole world by taking her stand by the side of the mother country. Every hon. gentleman on that side of the House assumes in his argument that if Great Britain were attacked it would be wise and right for Canada to stand at her back.

Now, I appeal, if it is not too late, to the Prime Minister himself. Could he not call his supporters together again in caucus and say to them: Gentlemen, I gather from the arguments of those of you who have spoken on this question that it is very desirable that the parliament of Canada should be united, and as the amendment of the leader of the opposition meets the objections of the member for Westmorland, as it does not propose any permanent tax upon the people of this country, as it does not propose the adoption of a naval policy until the question has been discussed upon the hustings, let us all vote for the amendment of the leader of the opposition. Sir, there can be only one reason why the Prime Minister wont do that, and that reason must be because he is not prepared at all hazards to say that the Canadian fleet, in time of war, must be controlled by the British admiralty. That must be his only reason, because there can be no other. I would not suggest that the right hon. gentleman is not loyal. It is not fair to suggest that hon. gentlemen, his supporters on the other side of the House are not loyal; but it does become fair and right to discuss the question of loyalty when a proposition is made that modifies in any way our constitutional relations to the mother country. It is right to ask whither such a course is tending. Now, I am going at first to discuss this question upon the basis of what is best for us standing alone; and then I will discuss it from the point of view of what we should do as an integral part of the empire.

First of all what have we to gain by having a navy in this country that is not to be controlled by Great Britain, and, again what harm can it do us if our navy is controlled by Great Britain unless, I say again, you are determined to leave the door open for separation instead of locking that door and make sure that you and your descendants for all time will remain British subjects. There is nothing in the amendment of the leader of the opposition that can do the Canadians any harm whatever unless the Canadians are anxious to have the door left open, to have a chance to escape British connection and to become independent. If some hon. gentlemen, as two or three have admitted, are voting for this Bill because it may lead to independence, that of itself seems to me is a reason why the rest of us ought to rise and say: Under the British North America Act we cannot do that, it is not only illegal but absolutely disloyal in the sense of a breaking of the allegiance which, while the British North America Act continues and this country remains under the constitution, cannot be broken except by rebellion. These hon. gentlemen, it seems to me, are not so much to blame as the Prime Minister who has led the way in regard to this Bill. The Prime Minister undertook to say he was neither an imperialist nor an anti-imperialist. With all deference I am bound to say there are some things in this world that must be either yes or no. I cannot believe that I am married to my wife and I am not married to her. I cannot believe that Edward Hamilton Lancaster is my son to-day and reserve the right to say, ten years hence, that he is not my son. I cannot believe that I am free to reserve the right to say I am an imperialist and I am an anti-imperialist. I do not believe that I can owe allegiance to Great Britain unless I am an imperialist, I cannot see any difference between an oath of allegiance and imperialism. What is allegiance? I am speaking only for myself in what I am going to say. I believe that every gentleman has a right to be guided by his own conscience. I have to be guided by mine and many a time my conscience has caused me to refrain from doing things because I thought them wrong while other men felt free to do those things. It is a matter between the man and his Maker. I have three times taken the oath of allegiance to King Edward. There is nothing in that oath permitting you to change your mind ten or fifteen years hence. Before I was allowed to take my seat in this House I had to take that oath. It is absolute and unalterable, a man taking it swears allegiance to King Edward. I do not see how I am to keep that oath and vote for a Bill which would construct a navy not under King Edward's control if we are to remain a part of the empire. The arguments of hon. gentlemen would tend to the belief that we have reached something which we have not reached. They argue that it is just as well to have an independent Canadian navy. And why? So that they may or may not interfere in wars in which Great Britain may become engaged. The very minute that you establish the principle that a navy built by Canada may or may not, as it sees fit at the time, join the motherland in its wars, that very moment you are proposing a rebelion if that policy is insisted on. Why do I say that? There is the navy constructed, there is the navy ready to fight. An order comes from Ottawa saying whether or not our navy is to join in that war. Suppose it does not join in the war. What is that navy? It is not an imperialist, it is an anti-imperialist. The imperial navy is at war with Germany or Austria, or Russia or some other country and where is the Canadian navy under those circumstances, what condition is it in? How can any one say that Canada can remain part of the empire and take such a stand as that, it is an absolute contradiction in terms? It is claimed sometimes that a man has a right to fence. I have never thought it wise to fence. Although I have a close constituency which at the time I first ran was supposed to be strongly hostile to my party I have never thought it would pay, I have never dared to insult my constituents, my wife or my children, by undertaking to say both yes and no on any question. A man is no good in my opinion if he cannot find what his duty is under such circumstances. The Prime Minister is in an impossible position when he says he is neither an imperialist nor an anti-imperialist, just as Edward Hamilton Lancaster, must be my son or must not be; it is impossible to say that he may be one day and may not be another day.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. LANCASTER. The right hon. gentleman thinks this is very funny, that it is quite a joke. I am trying to illustrate in a practical way what I understand by my oath of allegiance and by allegiance to any country. It may appear to be very clever to take this double position. Just as it may appear to be clever to denounce the Manitoba school question in Ontario and uphold it in Quebec, so it may appear to be clever to say in some parts of the country: Sir Wilfrid said in the House that he was not an imperialist, and to have 'Hansard' scored out with pencil or with scissors, and to say in another province: The Prime Minister said in the House that he was an imperialist. Thus I say the Prime Minister has set a bad example to his followers and we see the fruits of that example, when he says that he is not an imperialist and not an anti-imperialist.

The right hon. gentleman made a quotation which I think was an unfortunate one for him. He quoted Kipling:

> Daughter am I in my mother's house,
> But mistress in my own.

Daughter in his mother's house? What kind of a daughter? What kind of a good-looking little Canadian girl, I do not care about the English or the Scotch or the Irish girl, but what kind of a little Canadian girl? What about my daughter? —for I have got one—I wish I had a dozen. After her father educates her and teaches her all he can and after her mother teaches her and brings her up to honourable womanhood, suppose that she is given a magnificent fruit farm and is allowed to use it without rent or taxes; suppose some one comes to her and says: Do you know that your mother and father are being beset by barn burners and others? What kind of a daughter in her mother's house, would she be if she would not give up everything she had to protect the old gentleman and the old lady? Daughter am I in my mother's house—yes, a most unworthy daughter who would have the contempt of the whole world, if under the circumstances of this Bill he did not do what we are advocating. Kipling said both things, daughter in my mother's house and mistress in my own. Mistress in my own? Yes, mistress in Canada, in the autonomy of Canada, in dealing with great transportation questions, in making protective or free trade policies for her farmers, her manufacturers and all her people. Absolute autonomy is what I fight for, absolute autonomy in Canada. Let Canada attend to its own affairs absolutely. Let Great Britain keep its hands off the British North America Act. But the same British North America Act which gives us autonomy in Canada to deal with our domestic affairs has given us no right when we get outside of Canada to interfere with imperial affairs. Daughter in my mother's house, is not Canada's autonomy. 'Daughter in our mother's house' is outside of Canada, it has relation to imperial affairs. Mistress in our own house is dealing with Canada's affairs and this Naval Bill is going beyond Canada's affairs and interfering with imperial affairs. Under those circumstances I cannot but regret that a gentleman like the hon. gentleman from South Huron is induced to ask in this House: What did Great Britain ever do for us? The poison, so to speak, which was sown upon the second reading of the Bill has reached him. He is a Scotchman, or a gentleman of Scotch descent, and he is a man above all others, perhaps, except an Englishman which I am myself, who would be expected to suggest that these imperial rights should exist in this country. As I am referring to what he said, it is fair to quote his exact language and therefore I would refer the House to page 4520 of 'Hansard'. After saying that Great Britain had done nothing for us, that she never gave us any more for our lard, our oats, our wheat, our cabbage, or something of that kind, than any other country, that she did not give us more than our goods were worth—and I do not know of any Canadian who would be undignified enough to want to get more than his goods were worth—he proceeds to say:

> It is quite proper that I should say that our love for and devotion to the mother country is only commencing. Filial affection, I am sure, is one of the noblest traits of human nature; but filial affection divorced from self-preservation does not amount to a very great deal. It is the boy, the young man, which makes the best use of his opportunity and the gifts with which he has been endowed, and who shows a disposition to carve out his own future and to paddle his own canoe who is always dearest to the mother's heart.

Yes, because she expects that if some burglar or horse thief waylays her, this young man, because he is her son, will come to her relief. This love is just commencing according to the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McLean). What kind of love is the boy to have for his mother? When it has arrived at its completion? Because he is twenty-one years of age does that mean that in spite of her love, and her up-bringing he is going to murder or assassinate her when his affection is complete? Is that the kind of love he is commencing to have for his mother?

Mr. M. Y. McLEAN. The words used were not 'only commencing,' but were 'highly commendable.'

Mr. LANCASTER. I am sorry if 'Hansard' has done the hon. gentleman an injustice.

Mr. M. Y. McLEAN. These words do not appear in the original, but in the corrected 'Hansard' it is all right.

Mr. LANCASTER. I am bound to accept the hon. gentleman's statement, but it is fair to 'Hansard,' that I should say that the words appearing there are:

> It is quite proper that I should say that our love is only commencing.

I am not sure that the context would bear out the suggestion of the hon. gentleman. However, the hon. gentleman thought that there was some necessity of the boy, at some time, loving his mother, but that when he had become a big fellow, twenty-one years of age, thick in the chest, and doing well, and all this because of his mother's kindness, the mother's love and affection for her boy should only commence to bear fruition. To go a step further, we want to see our boys and girls manifesting always an affection for their mothers and fathers, and the more there are of these the more strength we will have as a nation. You cannot disassociate the character of the nation from that of the individual. What the individuals are, so is the nation. It is absolutely impossible to be otherwise.

I wish to commend what the hon. member for Queens and Sunbury (Mr. H. H. McLean) said, although he has not said that he is going to flock alone. Although he has not taken a position very much different from that of the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson), although he has not said that we should give aid in paroxysms and spasms, and although he has not said that this is necessary, he has said that there is an emergency existing and that something should be done. I appeal to that hon. gentleman under these circumstances, before this vote is taken, and I ask him if he does not think that he could carry out his views better by voting for the amendment of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition. How can he, consistently with what he said, vote for this Bill? He has also said that he believes that this navy should be controlled by the mother country, and in that respect he is at daggers drawn with the government. Under those circumstances, I say that there can be no question in the mind of any intelligent, and fair minded member of this House, that the policy of the government is utterly impossible from a practical point of view. It is not practicable. If you are going to be in unison with the mother country, you cannot for five or ten years at least expect to give relief to any body. Hon. gentlemen opposite, in their emergency, as I say, and I think that they are in more of an emergency than Great Britain is, in one way, are considering how they can square their views with the necessity of voting for the government. We cannot help but laugh at the remarks of the right hon. leader of the government in introducing, and in moving the second reading of this Bill, in which he undertook to rail at the opposition, because they did not all express the same views upon this question. He forgot that the opposition, no matter what views they expressed, had not the ear of the Governor General, and could not bring in a Bill of this kind. He forgot that no matter what policy we proposed we could not, under the rules of the House, because we are not the advisers of His Excellency, introduce a Bill. But the right hon. gentleman has his own language coming back upon him because his supporters behind him are more at sea upon this question than we are, and there is more disunion among them than there is upon this side of the House. One hon. gentleman says that he would have to vote that the navy shall be controlled by Great Britain. That is my hon. friend from Queens and Sunbury (Mr. H. H. McLean). Another, the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson), does not want a navy Bill at all, because he wants to give more grants to subsidize railways or dig a few canals. The hon. member for Nicolet (Mr. Turcotte), says he ought to vote for this Bill, because it is going to bring independence. So we find that all these gentlemen are going to support the measure of the Prime Minister although they are not at one upon it. If the right hon. gentleman were well advised, if he were not determined to try and get in the thin edge of the wedge of independence for Canada by placing this Bill before the people, he would withdraw it. As an imperialist, because I refuse to call him an anti-imperialist at the present time, although he says he is neither one nor the other, as a loyal citizen, and as the Prime Minister of Canada for the time being, I think he would be well advised if he withdrew this Bill, and go on with the domestic affairs of the country in parliament instead of interfering with the rights of Great Britain, as this measure must do. This measure must lead to independence, and for that reason, if for no other reason, my constituency would require me to vote against it. I am not talking about the Conservatives only of Lincoln and Niagara. Every intelligent Liberal as well as every intelligent Conservative in the constituency of Lincoln and Niagara would insist upon this being done if he really believed that it was going to lead to independence. When we find an hon. gentleman who is in the caucus of the right hon. Prime Minister, who knows what is going on, standing up here, and saying that that is the reason for his voting for this Bill, I think we are right in concluding that this measure is not one which this parliament should accept. An independent navy means an independent Canada. What else could it mean? The existence of Canada as a part of the British nation cannot be consistent with an independent navy. If you do not want an independent Canada, you do not want an independent navy because if you are to give Great Britain protection as it may be required you must put this navy under the control of the British authorities. We have heard a great deal about the pride and duty of Canada, and all that sort of thing, and there has been a great deal said about what we owe to Great Britain. In addition to what I have touched upon let us see what we owe to Great Britain. We owe everything we have here to Great Britain. Great Britain made us what we are. True we developed ourselves when we had the chance, true having got a start, we have gone ahead and expanded. Neither would the Prime Minister be sitting here nor would I be standing where I am if it were not for Great Britain. Great Britain made this country, Great Britain gave us our rights, her parliament passed the British North America Act, and said that we should do as we liked in respect to matters purely Canadian.

Great Britain's army and navy have protected us as they have protected our forefathers, and they have taught the world to know that if any hostile nation should interfere with Canada in her pursuit of the arts of peace, that nation would have to reckon with Great Britain. And what more has Great Britain done for us? For more than a century her navy has protected our commerce and enabled us to pursue in peace a policy which has tended so greatly to our development. We have not paid a dollar for that army or for that navy of Great Britain, but that great strength has been behind us to warn pirates, confiscators and grabbers of territory to keep their hands off. What has Great Britain done for us? What would we amount to as a people to-day were it not that Great Britain has done for Canada that which she has done for every nation in which she has planted her flag? Great Britain has carried civilization and religion into every country, and proclaimed the doctrine that the weak are entitled to their rights as well as the strong. What would be our state of civilization in Canada to-day were it not that in past years we have lived under the British flag? I shall not now speak of sentiment; I shall put it on a lower plane. I shall speak from the material standpoint, and I will ask: How many of our wheat fields, how many of our factories would exist, how many of our people in all walks of life would have achieved their high stage of civilization under any other flag than the grand old Union Jack? Who protects the commerce of Canada, who guarantees that Canada shall pursue in peace her path of progress? Sir, our protection is to be found in the army and navy of Great Britain, to which we have never contributed one cent as yet, but which, mark you, we might legally under our constitution be to-morrow compelled to contribute to. When a child is not manly enough to contribute to the support of his parent in need, that parent may, under process of law, compel him, and if Canada should persist in the mean policy of not contributing to the defence of the motherland (and her own defence as well), the day may come when we could be told by Great Britain: As you are not manly enough to do this of your own free will, we will impose a tax upon you and make you do it. And, Sir, if Great Britain did that, Great Britain would be acting strictly within her legal rights. But Great Britain has not done it in the past; she has trusted us to do our duty, and shall we fail? What has Great Britain done for Canada? Look around and you will find the answer. Get on board any railway train, go on board any boat, walk through our wheat fields, drive along any country lane, and you will see what Great Britain has done for Canada. Look at the manhood and the womanhood which exists in Canada to-day, and ask yourselves if we would have that civilization, that intelligence and that education in which we pride, under any other flag than the flag of England. The answers of every Canadian, irrespective of party, must be, no. Now, let me point out to hon. gentlemen that this is not the first time that a Prime Minister of Canada has undertaken to say that the British navy is entitled to some support from us. And, to show this, I shall quote an editorial in the Toronto 'Mail and Empire' of December 4, 1909. I shall submit this article to hon. gentlemen opposite to show that when they talk about building a little navy that has got to run away as soon as the enemy approaches, and when they talk about doing something for Great Britain, Great Britain can very well say: Why, you owe us a back debt which you have never paid, and the payment of which we have never pressed you for. Now, this article which I shall quote, because it expresses in better language than I could use, the point I wish to make, says:

AN EARLIER CONTRIBUTION.

That the idea of provision for naval defence is new some people believe. But the statutes of Canada tell a different story. By chapter 37 of the Consolidated Statutes of 1859 several thousand acres of land were vested in the 'commissioners for executing the office of Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland,' for ever in trust for the service of the said department. The lands so vested were described in the schedule to the Act as follows:—

1.—288 acres in the county of Sherbrooke, county of Haldimand.

2.—389 acres in the townships of Tiny and Tay, in the county of Simcoe.

3.—8 acres and 2 roods at Point Frederick, in the township of Pittsburgh, in the county of Frontenac.

4.—4 acres on the west side of Meadow street, in the town plot of Gwillimbury, in the county of Simcoe.

5.—3,000 acres at Point Pelee, in the township of Mersea, in the county of Essex.

6.—200 acres in the township of Vespra, in the county of Simcoe.

7.—500 acres on the Island of St. Joseph, Lake Huron.

8.—106 acres on the said island in Lake Huron.

9.—4 acres and 2 roods in the township of Pittsburgh.

In the Act provision was made authorizing the Governor in Council to grant other lands to the commissioners under a similar trust, and they were also authorized to purchase other lands out of any funds provided for the purpose by the imperial parliament. Sales of lands were to be made by the commissioners, the moneys received therefor to be paid as they should direct. This Act and two other Acts respecting ordnance lands (chaps. 24 and 36) were repealed by the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1886, chap. 55, in which some of the lands were re-described, while parcels 1, 2, 4, 5, 6, 7 and 8 were omitted, and the following new parcels were given in the schedule, intitled 'Naval Reserve transferred to the Dominion of Canada':—

1.—556 acres at Fort Henry, known as the Barriefield Common.

2.—23 acres, Cedar island, tower and glacis.

3.—125 acres, 2 roods and 1 perch in the township of Pittsburgh, purchased 6th July, 1844.

4.—102 acres in the same township acquired 20th March, 1840.

Chapter 58 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, repealed the above Act and gave a schedule, in which some of the old parcels of 1859 appear, namely, 4, 5, 7 and 8, together with the following:—

1.—219 acres, Grand river.

2.—48 acres, 2 roods and 3 perches, Barbet Point.

These are in the schedule, intitled 'Admiralty Lands, or Naval Reserves transferred to the Dominion of Canada.' The total of the three schedules gives 5,674 acres; but, as none of the schedules agree, there is doubt as to the present position of the trust. A statement ought to be laid before parliament showing what lands are still available for naval defence.

That article commended itself to me, and I place it upon 'Hansard' for the benefit of the government and for the benefit of the country. It is important that the people should know that in the early part of the last century there were lands in Canada devoted to the admiralty of Great Britain—not to the Governor General of Canada and his advisers—and that that trust remains in Canada, ignored now as it always has been, and to-day Great Britain could properly ask for an accounting in respect to these lands. And yet, we talk about our magnaminity, and we talk about our charity in contributing a little navy fifteen years from now, when either Great Britain is licked or has licked the whole of the world that attacks her. Now, Mr. Speaker, let me say a word about the legality of this Bill, for I have so far endeavoured to discuss it only from the material and sentimental standpoint, and from the standpoint of Canada irrespective of what the rights of Great Britain may be. As to the legality of the Bill, I am bound to say that if we were to pass it as it has been introduced by the Prime Minister, we would be ultra vires of our rights, and Great Britain would be intra vires of her legal powers in disallowing such a Bill.

For that I have to look at the British North America Act, on which the whole constitution of this country depends. To hear some hon. gentlemen talk, one might suppose that already Canada was an independent country, and that Great Britain was allowed to float the Union Jack over these buildings, and to have a picture of His Majesty the King in this chamber merely as a matter of courtesy, and not as a matter of right. But we must remember that Great Britain still can tax every foot of land, every gold mine, and every thing else in Canada. Great Britain says that we may handle the land of Canada for ourselves, but she might say: 'You are not able to handle it properly,' and take from us the control of it. Great Britain has passed the British North America Act, by which she says that certain things may be done in Canada. She says by one section of that Act:

> The command-in-chief of the land and naval militia, and of all naval and military forces, of and in Canada, is hereby declared to continue and be vested in the King.

It says not only the navy 'in' Canada, but the navy 'of' Canada is to continue and be vested in the King. This Bill undertakes, by three or four sections, to say that the navy of Canada is not to be vested in the King, but that it is to be vested in the Governor General, which means practically in the Prime Minister of this country; and no matter how much we may venerate or respect the personnel of any Prime Minister of Canada, we cannot by any vote of this House oust the King from the control of the navy, and put the Prime Minister of Canada in his place. We would have to get another British North America Act passed before we could do so. There is another section of the British North America Act which provides that the King in imperial council in Great Britain can disallow within two years any legislation passed by this parliament. It has often been said, and the matter has come up in debate as to abolishing the Senate this year, that Great Britain would never think of interferring with any legislation of ours in regard to any domestic affair. I agree with that. Great Britain says in the British North America Act that in our domestic affairs we can do as we like; but she reserves the right, if she sees fit to disallow our legislation within two years; and I cannot conceive of a case in which that right ought to be exercised if it is not such a case as this, where we go outside of our domestic matters and undertake to say what will be done with a navy manned by British subjects and part of the imperial navy, and, according to the British North America Act, under the command of His Majesty the King. This being the condition of affairs, I say advisedly, that even if we thought it wise, which God forbid, to cut loose from the British empire, we could not legally do it; and we cannot by this Bill do what it purports to do, give control of any navy to the Governor General. The words in the Bill to that effect are useless; and in order to prevent a conflict of authority, I would think it wise on the part of Great Britain that the King in Council should disallow this Bill as soon as a certified copy is sent to the Secretary of State (as has to be done with every Bill we pass), and should say to Canada: You have exceeded your jurisdiction; we cannot have one navy to fight against us, and another to fight for us; we never gave you permission to do what you have done; these matters you must leave entirely to the control of the imperial parliament; therefore, under this other section of the British North America Act, we must disallow your Act as improper and illegal.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I must vote against the second reading of this Bill. If hon. gentlemen opposite are anxious to do only what is right, I cannot see why they cannot accept the proposition of the hon. leader of the opposition, which puts no permanent tax, and no permanent policy upon Canada until every body in Canada has a chance to discuss it with their would-be representatives, who will come here in another parliament to vote on the question. They have no mandate from the people for this measure. They had no mandate in 1908 to do this thing, and they have none now. It is practically a breach of faith towards the people of Canada to pass an Act of this kind. When they will not accept the proposition of the hon. leader of the opposition for the sake of unanimity which they pray and beseech us to give them; when they will not see that the way to prevent Germany, or any other nation from attacking Great Britain is for Canada, and all the other colonies to show a united front in supporting Great Britain; and when they reflect that if Germany or any other country thinks that at least half the people of Canada are against always supporting Great Britain, and that it does not necessarily follow that Great Britain will be supported by Canada in a war, then the government supporters are creating the very emergency which they pretend does not exist. When I see them put their political party before the empire, I need make no apology for voting against this Bill. Before sitting down, I will read one stanza of a poem which seems to me to voice the feelings of the intelligent Liberals as well as Conservatives of my county:

There is no flag in all the world save Britain's blood-red cross
That guards pure justice, honour, truth; and keeps the weak from loss.
That gives the poor the righteous law, that lifts the bitter wrong,
And champions in the war of life, the weak against the strong!
What other nation keeps its pact though all its world shall fall?
What other leaves the ease of life to follow
duty's call?
Honour and duty! noble stars! by which our race is led!
God grant their double light may shine forever overhead.

Mr. F. R. LALOR (Haldimand). Mr. Speaker, I feel that I would not be doing my duty to the constituency which I have the honour of representing were I to permit the vote to be taken on the question before the House without giving my reasons for voting against the Bill proposed by the government. We have had a long debate on this question, a debate lasting for several weeks, and I think the House and the country are getting weary of it. I believe in a full and complete discussion of such a very important measure. I think it wise for the leading men on both sides of the House to express their views on a measure of such great importance; but the speeches have been characterized by too great length, there has been a great deal of repetition in them, and many of them have been read from manuscripts. I think the country would have been better satisfied if the speeches had been shorter. I believe that the people send us here to do business and do not care to have us fill pages of 'Hansard' with speech after speech, long and wearisome as many of them are. What they want is that we should do business in a business like way and show more brevity in our discussions. One result of our long sessions is to keep out of parliament men of great prominence in business, and in the professions because they cannot afford the time which our interminable sessions would compel them to devote to parliamentary life. As a business man, I should like very much to have our sessions shortened even though that would necessitate the curtailing of speeches to a very great extent; and I trust that I shall not sin against my own views by making remarks which may be found too long or wearisome.

We had yesterday the pleasure of hearing from the splendid representative of the county of South Waterloo (Mr. Clare). If there is any man in this House who can claim to represent here a special nationality, my hon. friend (Mr. Clare) can claim to represent the German people of the Dominion as well as the splendid county of Waterloo; and I am sure that we were all delighted with the speech he made and the sentiments to which he gave expression. For my part, I reiterate the sentiments so well expressed by my hon. friend because I too have the honour to represent a county in which there are a great many Germans, and I can only say that a more industrious, thrifty and law-abiding people you could not desire. I have lived among them in the county of Haldimand all my life, I have grown up among them, and I know that there are no better citizens to be found in that county or anywhere else. We may bring in immigrants from England, Ireland, Scotland or from anywhere else, but we shall get no better class than the good German element residing in the counties of Haldimand and Waterloo.

We have been told by many of the speakers who have addressed the House on this question that Germany is preparing for war, that she is a great and warlike nation, and is extending her army and increasing her navy. Well, I presume that Germany has a perfect right to indulge in this extension and in carrying out what she deems to be the best policy in her own interest. But if the Germans are a war-like or quarrelsome people, that description certainly does not apply to those who have settled in the counties of Haldimand and Waterloo because they are just the reverse. They are very quiet, inoffensive and industrious, desirous of living at peace with their neighbours, and they are among the best farmers and the best people in the county I have the honour to represent. Should there be trouble between Great Britain and Germany, we would all greatly deplore it because Germany and England are bound together by ties of relationship as well as commerce and business, and we hope that no trouble of that kind may ever come between these two nations but that they will continue to live at peace in the future as they have done in the past.

It is my intention, in the course of a few weeks, to visit that great country of Germany. I am not going there for the purpose of studying their war-like preparations, but to see, if I can learn something from those German people in regard to their industries and ability to manufacture merchandise in a way to surpass any other country. And I am sure that as a Canadian and a representative from this House, I can say to the people of the German empire whom I may meet that the people of Canada have the most kindly feeling for them and hope that the time will never come when there will be any trouble between Great Britain and her colonies and the German empire. But in the speeches delivered in this House I have heard sentiments which I was very sorry indeed to hear. I have never, in any election campaign, made any utterances upon the public platform or elsewhere which would excite racial or creed difficulties. I have been always opposed to that sort of thing. I do not believe that it is for the good of either party that such sentiments should be brought up either in the House or out of it, and I am not in accord with any expressions which call into account the loyalty of any section of our people. We are all good Canadians although we may belong to different nationalities. But I have heard from the lips of gentlemen opposite sentiments which rather surprised me, and I must say that that distinguished gentleman, the right hon. the leader of the government himself, has given utterances to some which are not in accord with the views of the Canadian people. In introducing this measure, the right hon. gentleman told us that the navy he proposed constructing was to be a Canadian navy, that it was not to be in any sense an imperial navy. For my part I think that a Canadian navy, if we are to have one, should be certainly an imperial navy. It should be a navy at the disposal of Great Britain, not by the vote of the Canadian parliament, but automatically. It should be an imperial navy, in every sense of the word, under the command of the King. My hon. friend from Montreal (Mr. Gervais) yesterday told us, in speaking about a Canadian navy, built in Canada of Canadian material, by Canadian workmen and manned by Canadian crews, that it would be under the command of the King but at the direction of the Canadian parliament. The latter condition, I think, was a rider to the imperial character of the navy, which changes entirely its condition. The navy we want is a navy to be under the command of the King and not under the direction of the Canadian government.

The right honourable the Prime Minister told us, when introducing this Bill, that in case of trouble, such as the Crimean war, he would hesitate about the Canadian navy taking any part in it. I think that such an opinion came as a surprise to the members of this House and the people of this country. I do not believe that it was in accord with the sentiments of Canadians, regardless of politics. I can only compare that declaration that he would not allow the Canadian navy, under similar cirumstances, to take part in a British war, with the sentiment expressed by that great Canadian, whose name is revered and loved by the people of Canada, the late Sir John Macdonald. Speaking of the Crimean war, the late Sir John said:

> Who can look back to the time when the Crimean war broke out and not remember with pride how Canada rose as one man to stand by the mother country and by France when the French Tricolor and the Union Jack were joined together fighting the battles of liberty against absolutism on the shores of the Crimea? There was a rush of Canadians to the battlefields, and I had great pleasure—

I notice the contrast.

> —I had great pleasure as a member of the government of Sir Allan McNab, to be instrumental in carrying a vote of twenty thousand pounds sterling given unanimously out of the public treasury in order to show that Canada made common cause with England and with France in the Cremean war.

What a contrast between the sentiments of the present Prime Minister of Canada and the sentiments of Sir John A. Macdonald, the leader of the Conservative party and the head of the government of Canada for so many years. Is it any wonder that the memory of that great statesman is loved so well, and that he is held in such reverence by every loyal and patriotic Canadian? Is it any wonder that we on this side of the House, and I believe the people of Canada generally, feel that there is some little doubt as to the object of the right hon. leader of this government in establishing a Canadian navy? Is it any wonder that the people of Canada, or the great majority of them, are opposed to this proposition for a Canadian navy? I know that in my section of the country the sentiment is growing every day in opposition to this scheme, because the people feel that the sentiments expressed by the Prime Minister himself, in introducing this Bill, did not have the right ring about them. They were not good Canadian sentiments; and consequently, although they are opposed to the idea of the Canadian navy on general principles, they are still more opposed to it when they reflect upon the expressions of the Prime Minister in introducing his Bill. We find that the same sentiment prevails to a considerable extent among the more humble followers of the right hon. gentleman sitting to the right of the Speaker. Only a few days ago we heard an hon. gentleman opposite expressing the idea that the ultimate destiny of this country, if not independence, was annexation to the United States. Sir, this kind of sentiment does not meet with much response in the hearts of the people of this country. Let me quote the words of the hon. gentleman to whom I allude, a member coming from the province of Quebec:

> But I ask of these men, shall not Canada sooner or later have to choose between annexation and independence?

And a little later in his address he says:

> It is neither patriotic nor loyal on the part of these men to put obstacles in the way of the complete development of our political organization and to pretend that we ought always to dwell under the protection of the British flag. But, thank God, I am convinced that this will not be the case, and the creation of this naval fleet in my humble opinion is the last step towards independence.

That was the sentiment expressed by an hon. member of this House from the province of Quebec, sitting on the government side, only a few days ago. And the member for St. James Division, Montreal (Mr. Gervais), in his speech yesterday, made reference to the same subject, but although his language was veiled, there can be no difficulty in understanding his meaning. He referred to the American revolution, and he said that had it not been for the possession of a navy by the thirteen colonies, they would not have been able to resist the imposition of taxes upon them by England; and he stated in his address that England has the power, if she likes, to impose taxes upon Canada. I wonder if he means that a Canadian navy will be the means of protecting Canada against an effort on the part of Great Britain to tax this country against her will. I do not see what other meaning he can have for making such a reference. I do not think, Sir, that the people of this country have much fear that Great Britain will ever impose any taxes upon Canada that are not in the interest of the great empire to which we belong.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. LALOR. At six o'clock I was alluding to some of the remarks made by members from the province of Quebec.

Mr. SPROULE. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me rather unique and strange to open the House without any member of the government being present. A cabinet that has no representative in this House—I am glad the right hon. the Prime Minister has put in an appearance, since the debate was going on without any representative of the cabinet in the House.

Mr. LALOR. I am entirely opposed to any sentiments that may be expressed in this House in favour of independence. The expressions we have heard here not only advocate independence but some of them separation, and, failing that, annexation to the United States. I hope the time will never come, no matter how large a country we may grow to be, when there will be any sentiment in this country in favour of separation from Great Britain, for independence, of course means separation from the British empire. I believe that in expressing those sentiments I express the sentiments of the county I represent as well as of the people of Canada generally. I do not believe that the people of Canada endorse the principle announced by the Prime Minister that parliament would be called together to consider whether the Canadian navy should be used in case England was at war with another country, for I believe that the people of Canada will be at war when the empire is at war, and that no Prime Minister of this country, whether he be a Liberal or a Conservative, no matter from what province he may come, no matter what government might be in power, could hold back the sons of Canada if the British flag were attacked, and to provide in a Bill presented to this House that a Canadian navy built by the Canadian people with Canadian money can only be used with the sanction of the Governor in Council, which means the parliament of Canada, is a course that will not be approved by the people of this country, for I believe our people, regardless of political allegiance, are loyal and prepared to stand by the British flag whenever that flag is attacked, or whoever may attack it. If Great Britain were at war we would have a repetition of what we saw in connection with the South African war where the Canadian boys would rush to the front, and no government or Navy Bill could hold them back. I believe the people of Canada love the British flag and are ready and willing at all times to show their allegiance to that flag and to our King. But, Sir, while I was surprised at the expression I have already mentioned, I was still more surprised that a member representing a great constituency in Ontario, South Huron, a constituency with which I am acquainted and in which I know the people are loyal and patriotic, should tell us that we owe Great Britain nothing save good will. I believe that when he goes back to his constituency and asks his electors to re-elect him for this parliament he will be buried under the ballots of the people of that county, because I do not believe they would support a member who made such a statement in this House.

We are told that there is no unity in the Conservative party. A few days ago I met a leading physician from an Ontario city, a very strong Liberal in politics. He was very much opposed, as I believe the Liberals throughout Ontario generally are, to the present Naval Bill. The only argument he could present in favour of his own party was that the Conservative party were divided on this question. The Conservative party are not divided on this question when it comes to being opposed to the building of a Canadian navy: the Conservative party are as one man all opposed to the building of a Canadian navy. There may be differences of opinion as to what is best for Canada and for the empire, as to the best method to adopt, but there is no question as to the unity of the party so far as their opposition to this Bill is concerned. But, when we are told about differences of opinion on this side of the House, we hear occasionally a discordant note from the opposite side of the House. We heard one to-day from an ex-minister of the Crown, the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) who, in a lengthy and eloquent speech has given us a new policy as emanating from the front benches on the government side. He reminded me of the chipmonk that came out of his hole to find the hole closed up after him when he tried to get in again. But the hon. member for Westmorland was not to be caught in this way and he left a little loophole open that he might crawl back. After denouncing the government Bill and saying that the project was too expensive, that our people could not afford it and that we should expend our money in building railways and canals and other great undertakings—and I felt quite proud of him when he was making these remarks, because I felt he was taking an independent stand.

But I was surprised to find that in the last two sentences he announced that he was going to support a measure that he was so strongly opposed to. I noticed the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) sitting beside him. You know what a kindly feeling exists between the hon. Minister of Public Works and the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals, both coming from the province of New Brunswick and sitting beside each other. The Minister of Public Works applauded his remarks and pounded his desk very gently, of course, when he heard the sentiments uttered by the hon. ex-Minister of Railways and Canals. I wondered if the Minister of Public Works himself had some little independent thought in connection with this navy. It is reported that he has. Rumour says that the Minister of Public Works did not like such an enormous expenditure to take place unless within his own department. It is said that the Minister of Public Works actually advocated that all this expenditure that it is now proposed to be made upon the navy should be made upon dry-docks and in the department over which he has charge. He probably had in his mind at the time the Richibucto wharf, known as the sawdust wharf, that he no doubt thought of making use of in connection with these docks for naval defence. But if we were to know the exact sentiments and feelings that exist among the government supporters in connection with this measure, if we could see the letters that they are receiving from day to day by hundreds from their constituents and the petitions that they are receiving from farmers all over the country in opposition to this measure we would know how much unanimity of feeling there is amongst them. The Prime Minister has a great influence upon his followers. We are free to admit that. They have a very great love and admiration for their leader, and no doubt they are prepared to stand by him and support him in this measure, even though it may be objectionable to them and not to the satisfaction of the constituencies which they represent. But there are other reasons why they support this measure. Some of them have judgeships in view, others have senatorships in view, others have public offices in view which they know they cannot get unless they stand man to man in support of the Prime Minister and in support of any measure that he may bring before this House. I think that some of them perhaps have in view the fate that befell those who expressed independent views in opposition to the government. I refer to the late Hon. Mr. Tarte, the late Hon. Mr. Blair and many others in the same list, who, having some independent sentiments, found themselves landed outside of the party and the party councils as a result. The unanimity that may exist upon this measure and the solid vote that may be given by supporters of the government in connection with it, I do not believe is the result of their own consciences or feelings in the matter, but is the result of party caucuses and party whips, because I believe that throughout the whole country, whether it is in the provinces by the sea, in the provinces of Quebec, Ontario, or in the great provinces of the west, there is one very general sentiment, and that is in opposition to the building of a Canadian navy, which has been styled a tin pot navy. I think that is a very good name for it. You might add a little more to it and call it the Quebec navy, because I think it is designed to try and give the people of the province of Quebec some halfway measure, some resting place, so that hon. gentlemen opposite may feel that they are satisfying Quebec and at the same time meeting the views of the other provinces of the Dominion. But in this they mistake the sentiment of the country, for if they appeal to the country they will find that the people are opposed to them. The measure should not be submitted as it is to the members of this House merely for them to sanction and carry into effect without it first having been discussed before the people of Canada. I think it should be submitted to the people to have their opinion upon it, and if not, for the people to actually vote upon the measure it should be submitted to them at least in a general election, when every man could stand upon a public platform and advocate either the programme of a Canadian navy or manifest his opposition to it according to the views that the candidate might hold, and upon this measure and upon these views the candidates might receive and expect the votes of the electors in the constituencies that they were contesting.

I am opposed to a Canadian navy first, because I believe it will be absolutely useless. I do not believe that the government or anybody in this country take it seriously. I do not believe that the people think that the navy, when built, will be of any use to Canada or the empire. It is practically a do-nothing policy. It means nothing at all. It means, in the first place, according to the statements made on behalf of the government, that for one year at least they will do nothing and that four or five years must elapse before they can turn out any ships. Probably, if we interpret that statement correctly, it will be ten years before this small, worthless, tin pot navy can be launched or be of any service to the country. Then, the enormous cost of it is too great for the people of this country to stand at the present time. I do not say that the time will not come when we should have a Canadian navy under the direction of the British admiralty, because the time may come, when the population of Canada may grow to be much larger than it is to-day. Perhaps then we should have a navy. But, I do not believe that a people numbering six or seven millions can afford to build a navy of their own. The government tell us that this navy will cost $16,000,000 or $17,000,000, but I do not believe they know what it will cost, I believe it is only guess work when they talk about the cost of the navy. The right hon. leader of the government told us when the Bill in connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific was introduced that the road would cost $13,000,000 and not one cent more. If we are to judge of the cost of the Canadian navy according to his estimate of the cost of the Grand Trunk Pacific I think that the people of Canada will have a very heavy burden to stand before they get through with the building of the Canadian navy. In place of it costing $16,000,000 or $17,000,000, in a short time, it will be $25,000,000 and it will soon run up to $50,000,000. For the upkeep it is estimated that it will cost $7,000,000 annually which will almost certainly soon run up to $10,000,000 or even $20,000,000 or $25,000,000 a year and even at ten million dollars of an annual expenditure in twenty years we would spend the enormous sum of $200,000,000. When we consider this question from the point of view of what is most economical for the people of Canada we must come to the conclusion that it would be better to present Great Britain with two Dreadnoughts, even if they cost $20,000,000, because the interest upon $20,000,000 would be about $700,000 per year and the people of the country would know just what they are getting and exactly what it was costing them. But, we enter in the thin end of the wedge of an expense in connection with a Canadian navy as to the cost of which we have no definite idea. When the Prime Minister presented this Bill the other day he told us that it was going to cost $16,000,000 or $17,000,000 and he was asked by the hon. member for South Simcoe if there was included in the expenditure the cost of arms and guns. To my surprise, and I think the surprise of all the hon. members of this House, he hesitated and did not know whether it included the cost of these things or not. We know that the greater part of the cost is for armament, so that we can easily judge how enormous the cost of this Canadian navy is going to be. A few days ago I received a letter from a farmer who has been a very strong Liberal in the county that I have the honor to represent. He and his family lived in my county all their lives and he was always a very active Liberal politician. He has recently moved over to the county of Wentworth and I am sorry the hon. member for that county (Mr. Sealey) is not here in order that he might hear what a gentleman who supported him at the last election and who is a strong Liberal in politics has to say in reference to the Canadian navy.

This gentleman addresses to me an open letter, the last few sentences of which I shall read. He speaks of the representative of the county (Mr. Sealey) as his hired man, and he wants to know what he is doing here, and then he goes on to say:

Who are you going to have for admiral on this fleet. Peary, I presume, or Cook the pole climber. Whoever he is, see that he is a good swimmer and also able to fly for it is my opinion that when this fleet gets into deep water it will either go up or down. No Mr. Member, no Canadian fleet for me but give Great Britain two Dreadnoughts that will be a credit to Canada, something that Britain can depend on in time of war. Tell my hired man to see that this is done and you help him all you can.

These are the sentiments of a good Liberal farmer in the county of Wentworth whom I have known for a good many years.

An hon. MEMBER. What is his name?

Mr. LALOR. I would be very glad to show the hon. member the letter and give him the name, but I do not think I should give it in public.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name.

Mr. LALOR. I will be glad to show this letter to hon. gentlemen opposite and give them the name if they come over to this side of the House. I believe, Sir, that this farmer and strong Liberal represents the feelings of the farmers of this country about the navy. We find the 'Farmers' Sun,' the leading farmers organ of this country, opposed to the Canadian navy; we find the farmers throughout the country regardless of politics petitioning parliament in opposition to the Canadian navy, and I want to tell the Prime Minister and his followers that there never was a more unpopular measure presented to the parliament of Canada than the proposal to build this navy. I believe, Sir, that when this government appeals to the people—and I only wish it were at once—they will go down and out on this policy. I believe that it is much better for us to give Great Britain a sum sufficient to buy two first-class battleships or two Dreadnoughts than to adopt the Bill submitted by the government. I believe the proposal of the leader of the opposition would be less expensive by far to us, and at the same time it would be more satisfactory to the British admiralty and more satisfactory to the Canadian people. I am opposed to the measure submitted by the government, and I shall have great pleasure in supporting the resolution moved by my leader (Mr. R. L. Borden) which reads as follows:

That the proposals of the government do not follow the suggestions and recommendations of the admiralty and in so far as they empower the government to withhold the naval forces of Canada from those of the empire in time of war are ill-advised and dangerous.

That no such proposals can safely be accepted unless they thoroughly ensure unity of organization and of action without which there can be no effective co-operation in any common scheme of empire defence.

That the said proposals while necessitating heavy outlay for construction and maintenance will give no immediate or effective aid to the empire, and no adequate or satisfactory results to Canada.

That in the meantime the immediate duty of Canada and the impending necessities of the empire can best be discharged and met by placing without delay at the disposal of the imperial authorities as a free and loyal contribution from the people of Canada, such an amount as may be sufficient to purchase or construct two battleships or armoured cruisers of the latest Dreadnought type, giving to the admiralty full discretion to expend the said sum at such time and for such purpose of naval defence as in their judgment may best serve to increase the united strength of the empire and thus assure its peace and security.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE (North Simcoe). Mr. Speaker, I begin with the prayer that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who, were he able to be here, would have presented this Bill to the House, may speedily be restored in health and to his accustomed seat. I have listened with a great deal of attention to the speech of the right hon. the leader of the government; I have listened to the Japanned oratory of my hon. friend the Postmaster General; I have also studied the cryptic formulas on this great mystery of a Canadian navy which were submitted to us by the hon. the Minister for War, and I have listened to the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite in which they have lauded the leader of the government and his ministers. I have also listened to the speech which my hon. leader (Mr. Borden) delivered in this House when the measure was presented; a speech which in strength of reasoning and sustained eloquence will bear close comparison with any speech ever delivered within these walls. After listening to all these speeches, after reading the newspapers every morning and considering the various policies that have been dished up to us daily for our consumption; after having taken counsel with my friends as well, I have come to the conclusion that the question now before us is one of the greatest moment and one which should not be trifled with. It is a question that should not be discussed from the point of view of the Conservative, or the Liberal, or the nationalist, or the imperialist; it is a question which, to my mind, should be discussed entirely from the standpoint of the Canadian. It is a question which requires sound statesmanship, for, by this Bill, we propose to change the policy followed by this country for a great many years, and to embark upon a new career. And, Sir, it is my view that a question of that great importance should be approached in a non-partisan spirit and that we should deal with it on the principles of broadest statesmanship. Statesmanship is not a matter of instinct; it means a close study of present events in the light of past experience and future contingencies. That light of experience is not given to us, so far as I can see, by a study of the life of Peter the Hermit, or of the career of Isabelle of Croye, and neither do I think that we can find much help in the solution of this problem in the life of Lord Durham or the story of his famous report, to all of which the Prime Minister directed our attention.

A good deal of water has gone over the Chaudiere falls since March last when this question was first raised in parliament. The resolution then unanimously passed in this House has been quoted often, and it is not necessary for me to cite it again. Let me recall, however, some of the contemporaneous conditions existing a year ago. There was a so called scare passing over the British speaking world. For some years a state of hostility, without actual declaration of war, had been existing between Great Britain and Germany. The German emperor's message to Kruger, which was delivered after some German vessels had been seized in Delagoa bay, had caused the first break in the long friendship which had existed between Germany and England from the time of Frederic the Great and the Seven Years War. There was friction in Morocco, and other trouble between Germany and Great Britain over some railways located in the territory contiguous to the Persian gulf. These diplomatic clashes are the foster children of war, and as a result, for the first time in a great many years, the British fleet was concentrated for decisive action.

That will explain to some extent the real reason for the absence of a large portion of the British fleet from various seaports in Canada. An army scatters to distant continents, and to barracks during peace; but when there is war an army mobilizes or concentrates to fight. It is so with a fleet. This trouble, as I have stated, did not arise yesterday.

In the battle of the Sea of Japan between the fleets of Russia and Japan, naval instructors and strategists learned several important lessons. The first of these was the deadly accuracy of the large guns at long range, the tremendous advantage the larger guns gave; the second was the great advantage the armoured battleship had over the unarmoured cruiser, and the third was the importance of the torpedo boat in night attacks and blockades. The great battle fought in the Sea of Japan was decided in a few moments. The Russian admiral in that battle perpetrated the great mistake of placing his cruiser squadron, consisting largely of unarmoured cruisers, in the first line, and his battleships in the second. The Japanese reversed that order and opened upon the cruiser squadron of the Russian fleet at heretofore unheard of range, and in a few minutes destroyed the cruiser squadron. When panic reigned supreme in the Russian fleet, the Japanese massed their battleships and destroyed the Russians in less than an hour. The lesson learned from that battle I have already described. The first nation to realize that lesson was Great Britain, with the result that the British navy decided to adopt the big type of battleship known as the Dreadnought. For some fifteen years the Germans had been building a commercial fleet. It had grown from nothing to be the second greatest commercial fleet in the world. As long as this fleet was not protected by a navy, it remained merely a hostage in the hands of the British navy in case of war. The British navy had always been, and is to-day the trump card of Great Britain in a diplomatic fight in Europe. The German commercial fleet is the hostage for Germany's good behaviour, while the British fleet has enabled Great Britain, in all these diplomatic struggles, to prevent the balance of power in Europe from being disturbed, and also to a large extent to nullify what is known in Europe as the pan-German movement. Germany could not hope, in a great many years, to equal the pre-Dreadnought navy of Great Britain, in the number of ships or guns; but the moment this lesson had been learned in the Sea of Japan, and the British authorities had decided to build a type of capital ship which meets the conditions, in regard to speed, heavy armour, enormous guns and gun power, that very moment the Germans realized that since they were commencing to build a fleet of their own, they should take advantage of this opportunity, and virtually commence building a new navy on even terms with Great Britain. The advent of the Dreadnought, according to naval writers, and those in authority, marked as great an era in navy building as the ironclad did over the wooden walls. The Germans, therefore, started building their navy virtually on even terms with Great Britain. They provided enormous subsidies, which had been voted unanimously by their parliament. Now, Sir, two courses remained open to Great Britain in that event. One course was to keep pace with the Germans, following them in building capital ships or Dreadnoughts, and instituting a system of conscription in Great Britain similar to that which existed in Germany. That course was virtually endorsed by leading military authorities, such as Lord Roberts, who were agitating at the time for conscription. The other plan was to duplicate the German ship-building programme, and let conscription go for the time being. This has been the plan adopted. Now, Sir, in order to arouse public opinion to the danger that hung over the horizon, it was necessary that a great many public men in England should speak out, and speak out in alarmist tones. A panic ensued, and was not confined alone to Great Britain. It spread to the colonies, as we all remember, and I might say that it spread to Germany also. When this panic was at its height, the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) moved the famous resolution of March last. I would not trouble the House with a recital of these events, known to us all, were it not that we are often prone to forget the events which impel us to act in a certain manner. At that time, if we had offered to the British authorities two Dreadnoughts, following virtually the same lines as the other colonies, we would have saved this House, and this country perhaps a great deal of trouble. But that plan was not adopted. The plan that was adopted by this House was adopted in good faith, for the purpose of preventing any partisan spirit or discussion arising over this question in any manner, shape or form, and I regret very much that the right hon. leader of the House has brought in a Naval Bill which must of necessity cause partisan discussion.

Now, let us follow the events in their chronological order. In that way we may be able, as Mr. Gladstone would say, to sift this matter down to the bran. A few months after the resolution was passed, delegates from this government were sent to London to find out what Canada should do under the terms of that resolution. These delegates went to attend what was known as an Imperial Defence Conference. They were to find out all about the German peril, so that Canada could act in a manner suitable to her position as the premier colony of the empire. I take it that that was the principal business of the commissioners—to ascertain if there was a real ground for a war scare, or whether it was a business transaction of the music halls, and the great warship and gun-building concerns, which are represented in England by Vickers Sons and Maxim, and in Germany by the Krupps.

The resolution of March last declared that 'the naval supremacy of Great Britain is essential to the security of commerce, the safety of the empire, and the peace of the world.'

This commission went to London to ascertain if that supremacy were really threatened, and if so, in the language of the said resolution, to give:

> To the imperial authorities the most loyal and hearty co-operation in every movement for the maintenance of the integrity and honour to the empire.

Was there any peril? Did the commission find there was any cause for alarm, any need for mad haste in armament? Let the Prime Minister answer in his own words, he is supposed to be the chief fountain of knowledge on this point, and the commissioners were his associates in council, and surely would report the facts to him. He gave this House the result of his inquiry, the benefit of his knowledge in his speech on the second reading of this Bill. He said:

> For my part I do not see any cause of danger to Great Britain at the present time.

Again:

> It is true that Germany is creating a navy, but I see no reason whatever for supposing that Germany is creating a navy for the purpose of attack.

Now Sir, if the naval supremacy of the empire is not threatened, if what the Prime Minister says is true, I contend that the proper thing for him to do is to come to this House and courageously separate the question of emergency from the naval policy proposed for the future. In other words, revert to the statu quo, or the policy of 1907, which received the approval of the people at the polls.

I can quite understand why there is such a large element of our people, especially such a large number of Liberals, not only in Quebec, but even more so among the English speaking provinces, who cry out against the proposed navy. The Prime Minister whom they have followed, in whom they believe, has said: 'There is no danger to British naval supremacy.' Then they say: Why indulge in the luxury of an independent navy? Why tear up the tree of peaceful colonial development and expansion by the roots? Why launch this country alone, and not under the aegis of the British navy, on the mad torrent of European militarism, of bankrupting European competition in warship building? The millions that will be spent in useless warships might better be expended in improving transportation facilities, in enlarging our canals, in helping the farmer to build good roads, in aiding him to contend with noxious weeds, in opening up new country to settlement, in developing industrial enterprises, in establishing technical schools, and doing the many things necessary to enable us to take advantage of the great undeveloped natural resources that lay dormant at our very doors.'

These are the men who are going to pay this money for this navy. They are the true empire builders, and they say: 'If there is no danger to the naval supremacy of the empire, then allow us to turn the furrow and throw the shuttle in peace.' If there is no danger, if there is not going to be a war, why not stand pat, follow the old blazed trail, keep in the middle of the road. For many years this country has struggled against adverse circumstances. For years we have had to contend against the ignorance of the world as to our natural resources, our climate, and our opportunities. The republic to the south of us for years offered an asylum to the down-trodden masses of Europe, who sought to escape from grinding, hopeless systems, of terrorism, despotism and militarism. There they could start life anew. There they had equal opportunity irrespective of birth or fortune. There the conscription did not tear them away from their homes and workshops. There they had no grinding tribute to pay to the god of war, who constantly hovers on the European frontiers. The arts of peace, there predominated over the arts of war. Historians and observers of social customs tell us that it is the brightest minds, the most intelligent, courageous and energetic are those who immigrate. These people did not know that within the boundaries of Canada there were equal opportunities, equal freedom. But now we are coming to our own, and what happens? We are about to establish a navy and institute an old-world system which is one of the chief objections of these people against the countries from which they came. They say it is not disloyalty surely to wish to develop the resources of this country in peace. It is not disloyalty to desire to keep as long as possible free from the terrible financial drains, the grinding taxation, the economic waste, that follows in the train of a standing army or its collateral, a navy. Ten millions per year this toy navy will cost, and we will forfeit forever the right to say to the prospective immigrant, Canada offers you an asylum free from the terrors of old-world militarism, free from the domination of the sword.'

If the Prime Minister is right, and we will rest the responsibility upon him, that there is no danger to the naval supremacy of the empire, then those who believe in standing pat, are quite justified in opposing this Bill and denouncing the government which has forsworn Liberal principles and traditions.

I wish to say a word on behalf of the old Reformers. The right hon. leader of the government and the Postmaster General called upon the spirits of Papineau, Lafontaine, Baldwin, Mackenzie and all the old Reformers to witness that they were the true descendants of those old Reformers, and that in foisting an independent navy upon the people of this country, they were doing just what these heroes would have done under similar circumstances. I never realized more fully that famous chapter of Macaulay, where he recalls the scene in Danté, in which is described the transformation of the woman and the serpent, and he says that parties change, that the Tory of yesterday is the Radical of to-day, and the Radical of to-day the Tory of to-morrow. The Prime Minister and the Postmaster General are not the only students of history in this House. I confess that I have read a little of the history of those stirring times, the days of the men of 1837. If I have judged the characters of these men right, they would have been found fighting on this side of the House, before they would have permitted any government of this country to tie this country up to any standing army or navy.

These men fought their fights for principles, for new world freedom, against old world ideas. They would not have swallowed in 1910 what they deemed as right in 1907. In this debate some aspirations have been cast upon the actions of these men of '37. It is too late in the day to revive old partisan feeling. I am a Tory, and whilst I cherish the traditions of my party, if I found that those traditions clashed with what I considered the true interests of my countrymen of to-day my voice and my arms would be with my country, Had I lived in '37, who knows I too might have come linking down the forest trail with Lount, and the men from Simcoe who followed him, with their old iron pikes and rusty scythes, seeking what? Not victory, for I have spoken to many of these old heroes, and they never expected victory, not wealth and power for there was neither to be had in the country at that time. Not even immortality, but they took arms in their hands and marched away bravely. They said 'Morituri morituros salutant,' in order that if some of them should die, the attention of the whole world would be called to their grievances and these righted. It requires courage to die for one's country in this way. To die, on the gallows with the stigma of traitor sounding in one's ears, in order that one's country may be delivered from tyranny. But it is from such sacrifices that we have obtained what liberties we possess, even our civilization.

Our brothers in Quebec have never been behind, in opposing wrong in seeking to destroy the tyranny of the placemen, who were then as now ruling this country after old world methods. That was then the real issue. Carpet baggers was the name given to this class of men in the United States, after the civil war. This government has a similar system in vogue in Canada to-day. A government despotic, irresponsible, retained in office by placemen. Knowing the lives of these men as I think I do, I can imagine how the hero of Montebello, would have rallied his followers against this Naval Bill, how Lafontaine would have thundered his burning periods against the administration. How the calm analytical Baldwin would have criticised the fallacy of the measure. How the fiery Highlander Mackenzie would have indulged in fierce invective against such a Bill. They would have insisted strenuously upon the statu quo. They would not seek to lay violent hands upon the policy of free democracy which by their sacrifices they had succeeded in establishing in this country. It is well in studying the lives and actions of these men to glance at contemporary history. If we do, we will find that similar struggles were taking place in the mother country. These were the days of the Chartists, of riots and blood shed when men there also fought for representative government. The right hon. gentleman cannot read Papineau, or Baldwin, Lafontaine, or Mackenzie, neither can they read Lord Durham into supporting this measure. If they read and studied the lives of these men more closely; if we all who seek to legislate for this country did so, we would take a more statesmanlike view of things. The lives of these old Reformers will shine brightly from the pages of our history, let us give them credit. They and the men who consistently opposed them in maintaining British connection would on a question such as this be found fighting on the same side. For this independent Canadian navy is a new departure, a complete reversal of our old colonial policy.

Now at the time of the Imperial Defence Conference where did our ambassadors stand? The old question of participation in naval defence had been discussed in 1902, and in 1907 it came up again. Australia and New Zealand agreed to accept the proposals of the admirality, in other words, they agreed to join in a great naval league of defence of the empire. The Canadian ambassadors refused. They pleaded the peculiar situation of this country. That was an obscure term. They agreed, however, that they would carry out a modified programme. They would not accept the fleet unit idea, because they had ideas of naval strategy of their own. Australia accepted the programme, and let us see what the Australian government did. Instead of bringing down a naval Bill, such as this government has brought down and is endeavoring to force upon parliament, they went to work by way of presenting a resolution. Here is the resolution which was moved by Mr. Joseph Cook, Minister of Defence for Australia, in the House of Representatives, on the 14th of November, and remember this was before any Bill was introduced:

> That this House approves the new scheme of naval defence adopted at the recent imperial conference, and it is of opinion that immediate steps should be taken to provide the proposed Australian unit of the eastern fleet of the empire.

In introducing this resolution he said that he asked the approval of the House for the scheme in simple form leaving ways and means for further consideration. He said:

> Should the motion which I am moving be carried we shall turn over a new leaf in the book of our evolution. Our tutelary stages are past, our time of maturity is here. Let us hope that with it has come a deepening and increasing conviction of the immensity of the debt which we owe the mother country for sheltering us while we grew. In passing the motion we shall enter what has been called the Great Sea League of the empire. The Pacific will be allotted to us as the worthiest and most adequate contribution to the defence of the empire that the highest naval authorities can devise.

Having dodged that issue, this government are introducing the principle of a Canadian independent navy by a Naval Bill and endeavouring, with much casuistry and loud professions of loyalty, to carry it through this House. It would have been fairer to this House, and better for this country had the Australian plan been adopted.

The hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) the other day charged some of the Liberal leaders in Quebec with voicing the idea of the separation of Canada from the mother country. But the separation issue is not confined, Mr. Speaker, to Quebec alone. I am assured that it was in Ontario that this idea first took root. The hon. the Postmaster General acknowledged that he was associated with a gentleman by the name of Elgin Myers, on the platform a few years ago in Montreal. The idea of the independence of Canada has been prevalent for a number of years, and I may say that I have here with me to-night a book which has been published by a gentleman who is a resident of this city, a Mr. John Ewart.

Mr. Ewart has pubished a great many speeches which he has delivered at Canadian club banquets, and the study of this book shows that it was written largely for Ontario consumption. In this book the virus of autonomy, or so-called independence is strongest, and in it he suggests that the vast majority of his compariots in Ontario are in favour of his ideas. I understand he is one of the leading counsellors and friends of the right hon. the First Minister. In his book he rails against imperial federation, against the imperial conference, against the British people. Anything that has ever happened in this country, from the Quebec Act down to the fall of the Quebec bridge, is described by Mr. Ewart to our British connection, or to Downing street. On the matter of imperial defence, Mr. Ewart, by innuendo and those petty-fogging methods which are adopted by lawyers of his kind, lays down the doctrine that in case the empire should be at war, Canada's policy should be: Not a man, not a gun, not a dollar. His idea is separation, he does not call it autonomy. He calls it separation, independence. The only thing he would retain is the King. No doubt he does not wish to lose the initials after his name, the K.C. He made converts among the English speaking people of this country, so did Dowie, and the chiefs of Holy Rollers. In this book he immortalizes the Prime Minister. The Minister of Marine, and the Minister of War, also find a place in this temple of fame. The Prime Minister apparently believes that Mr. Ewart voices the aspirations of the young English speaking Canadians, because they listened to his trash at the Canadian club dinners without dousing him in the horse trough. Mr. Ewart calls this separation; the premier calls it autonomy. Mr. Ewart is his ideal. He had to be honoured. Instead of incarcerating him in a mad-house, because I consider any man a mad man who talks separation, which spells revolution, and the shedding of fratricidal blood among Canadians, instead of putting this sensation-monger in a straight jacket he was given employment by the government. On him is bestowed one of the highest honours that could be bestowed upon a member of his profession in this country. He was selected as counsel for this country before the Hague tribunal, and that was the endorsation given to him and his book by the right hon. Prime Minister, and the Minister of Justice. Thus they approved of the book, of the man. He was in London, I understand, while this imperial conference was going on. He had to have more time for the preparation of his brief for the Hague. He was no doubt too busy pulling wires behind the scene for this beautiful separatist navy. This policy bears the marks of his hands. Even the flag incident. He is strong on a Canadian flag in his book. Any ship in the world might be proud to fly the white ensign of the British navy for many brave deeds have been performed under its folds. Deeds for humanity, as well as for freedom and country. But he wants a Canadian flag. He says we must have separation—or you may call it complete separation, and a King. The King of England, or the King of Canada.

A Canadian King would mean a Canadian court, with Canadian lords and dukes and counts and viscounts. They call this autonomy. Are we to have the folly of the Maximillian Mexican empire duplicated here? Mexico had separation first. Then there was an attempt to set up an empire with an emperor and a court. It did not last long. The irate Mexicans took their emperor out one fine morning and shot him. Brazil had separation or autonomy, also an emperor, and he had to flee to escape the fate of Maximillian. The atmosphere on this side of the world is not healthy for local kings or home made emperors.

This government, as I have already said, endorsed Mr. Ewart and any one who reads his book will come to the conclusion that the idea underlying this policy and this Naval Bill is undoubtedly the same idea as is enunciated by Mr. Ewart. The trouble with a country of this kind, in fact one of the troubles of the British empire, is the plague of cranks who want to turn everything upside down and provide new constitutions. It is assumed by the Prime Minister in nearly all his speeches that there has been a constant struggle for liberty or so-called autonomy in this country. The policy of Great Britain has always been to allow the colonies to develop and thrive as free self-governing democracies. That was the old colonial policy ended with the American revolution. It is also the new colonial policy, which was inaugurated in this country by the Quebec Act, and which ante-dated Lord Durham by 200 years, the policy of Great Britain giving to her colonies absolute freedom. That was the principle always. Petty oligarchies set themselves up, they surrounded the governors, got the ears of the governors and endeavoured to stifle the will of the people. Any one who reads Canadian history, will find that in all the struggles in this country the British government had never departed from their policy. Let any one read the despatch sent by Lord Goderich on this principle, dated November 8, 1832, to Sir John Colborne, which has frequently been quoted. That despatch says that the people must not be interfered with in having a free election of their representatives or in having free government.

The hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) some time ago, at Montreal, said that the time might come when we might elect our governor. He took to cover when some one questioned this. He would not need to, it would not be the first time. In 1756 the British empire was far greater than it is to-day. The colonies of all the European countries had fallen by conquest to Great Britain. Canada, Cape of Good Hope, India, every desirable spot in the world was ours. The United States were then happy and flourishing colonies. The glory of the British empire was on every tongue. If we talk of autonomy, why they had more then than we have now. They wrote their own charters or constitutions. They had free, representative self-government. They were free democracies. Rhode Island and Connecticut elected their own governors. Rhode Island, Massachusetts and Connecticut could pass laws that were not even subject to revision or the imperial veto. The Navigation Laws gave absolute inter-imperial preference. This preference went so far as to confine colonial trade to British bottoms; colonial built ships, of course, being included. A monopoly in the manufacture of wool and bar iron (1719), felt hats (1732), molasses (1733), and steel furnaces was conceded to Great Britain. It was the trade and the wealth which this system gave which enabled Britain to face single-handed and overthrow the combined navies of the world, and which brought the empire triumphant through the seven years war. The policy of a self-sufficing empire dominated both Great Britain and the colonies. The colonies were not a bit behind in contributing to imperial defence. In 1741, 3,000 colonials shared the glorious victory of Carthagena under Vernon. During the seven years war, 25,000 men from the colonies were in the field. The colonial contribution to the navy at that time was over 400 ships of war. Pennsylvania and the other colonies spent millions of dollars in this war. In 1756 the loyalty of the colonies was unquestioned. In 1776 this great imperial federation which had reached a more advanced stage than the empire of to-day, was torn asunder, shattered to fragments. Students of history will tell you that the reason was that there was no statesman of the time with sufficient power and influence to evolve a form of government whereby a strong representative executive of the empire could reconcile the particularist or provincial tendency of the individual parts. No great constructive statesman appeared. I am of the opinion that had he been permitted, had not legislation, human ignorance and passion hurried a climax, Franklin would have worked out a constructive solution of the problem. But the false stigma of a colonial prevented the British people from giving proper heed to his counsel, and when the crash came he, of necessity, joined his own colonial brethren and showed the world by his constructive work on the American constitution, what might have been done had Britain only called in the colonials for advice and counsel in the crisis. The same crisis is bound to arise again in the empire; I doubt but it is here. The theory of taxation without representation is bound to clash with too ardent patriotism and imperialism. And we, Sir, into whose hands in a measure the destinies of the empire are confided, should study the history of the empire in the period preceding the American revolution, to equip us the better to work out our own future destiny, looking to a united and greater empire. The true light of past experience is to be found in those musty, torn, and tear bedimmed pages that tell the story of the saddest days of the empire.

Sir, you ask me why I refer to that unfortunate period. It is because I am opposed to this Naval Bill. The Prime Minister of Australia said the time had come to turn a fresh page in history, we, too, have turned a fresh page, and on it what do we propose to write?—the fatal word 'separation,' for this independent navy spells separation. Better contribute four, yes and ten times four, Dreadnoughts than place a Bill on our statute-book that means ultimate separation. Better do nothing at all than involve this country in a quarrel with the motherland over the fatal principle of no taxation without representation. Why not tell the mother country the truth? Why not tell this government of England. which is now tottering to its fall, that before any scheme for contribution to imperial defence can be safely considered other and greater questions must be settled, that when the time comes to consider an adjustment of the relations of the colonies to the empire, while kindred blood and common ideas can bind two peoples together as strongly as links of steel, each must feel that its material advantages and privileges are associated in that union.

The empire is not lost, far from it. Thanks to the efforts of the greatest constructive statesman the British empire has yet seen, Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, one of the great parties in Britain to-day is formulating a plan for further solidarity along material and business lines, and in full sympathy with the colonies. The future of the empire must rest upon a business foundation. Let us not repeat the errors of 1776 by adopting this naval policy, this Naval Bill, which is turning the hands back on the clock.

Sir, one of the excuses for this Bill is that we are doing something for ourselves and at the same time for the empire, that we can no longer be charged with sponging upon the mother country. Let us examine this argument. Let us treat it in a business way. Let us cast up the accounts. It is very derogatory to our self respect that we remain open to this charge of not paying our proper share. Let us avoid sentiment when the business argument is advanced.

I have here in my hand a copy of the Navy League Annual, which contains the platform of the Navy League. Plank 2, which places the appeal for naval support on business grounds, says that the object of the league is:

To convince every taxpayer and every politician that judicious expenditure upon the navy is for the nation only, the ordinary insurance which no sane person grudges in private affairs, applied to risks appalling in nature and extent.

Let us see what the risks are. I have here a table taken from Lloyd's shipping register, which gives the tonnage of the merchant ships of the nations of the world of over 100 tons burden. Here is the steam tonnage, as the sailing vessel tonnage is now insignificant:

Table of steamers of one hundred tons registry or over from Lloyds registry, 1909.

German	3,889,046
United States (lake and ocean)	3,662,332

Japanese	1,150,858
Italian	961,132
Dutch	904,536

Chilean	106,857
Portuguese	69,878
Total	35,478,872

Now, Sir, of this total steamship tonnage of 35,478,878 tons, Great Britain owns approximately about 50 per cent. Various authorities give our Canadian steam tonnage classification on the same basis as 200,000 tons and deducting our lake tonnage we have 100,000 tons on the ocean. In other words our tonnage is in proportion to British tonnage as 1 to 177. If we take an estimate of the value of British commercial ships and their earnings, we will get at the reason of the huge expenditure on the British navy from the business standpoint of insurance, and we will find that this is one of the greatest revenue producing industries of Great Britain, and the greatest contributor to the enormous wealth and revenues of that country. Great Britain takes toll as a carrier on every second ton of freight that is moved on the ocean. The value of the commercial fleet of Great Britain would figure about approximately as follows; 17,702,714 tons at $50 a ton or a total value of $885,135,700. Mr. Lloyd George in a recent speech stated that the net earnings of Britain's commercial fleet was £500,000,000 annually, but according to the figures I have taken his estimate may be considered low. The gross earnings will therefore be easily £1,000,000,000 or $5,000,000,000. The revenue from this British commercial fleet is 50 times greater than the total revenue of the Canadian Pacific railway and the total revenues received by the Dominion government. The cost of the British navy last year was approximately £35,000,000 or £2 for every ton of commercial tonnage. This Naval Bill of the government proposes to expend $16,000,000 to start with and virtually $7,000,000 per annum which to my mind is a pretty high rate for this insurance. It might also be pointed out that one half our foreign trade is carried in foreign bottoms, and in making this statement I am only speaking from a business point of view and of course I am casting no reflection on Britain's splendid supremacy on the sea. The year book gives a total of 3,504 ships entering inward and clearing outward from our harbours last year and of these 3,504 only 969 were British, so that all our foreign tonnage is not carried in British ships. The above figures speak eloquently in favour of encouraging a great commercial fleet for Canada. They also tell us that our share for the navy should be, from a business standpoint, $1,000,000 per year. I submit, Sir, that from a business standpoint it would be good business for us in view of the danger to our foreign commerce and on the ground of prepaying our insurance, to invest in two Dreadnoughts as proposed by my hon. leader, costing approximately from $18,000,000 to $20,000,000. The life of a Dreadnought is from 20 years to 25 years so that by this contribution we would have our insurance prepaid for the next 20 years. I can see no harm in this case in giving such a gift from a business standpoint. It would be good business for us, and the insurance would not be nearly so high as the government asks us to pay under their proposal. It would be an honourable way for us to pay for the great national service rendered by Great Britain and what is more it would prevent us from interfering with the possible development of our own nation along industrial lines, and it would also prevent us from interfering in any way with Britain's world policy. The navy proposed by the government will cost $15,000,000 or with interest charges added $20,000,000 and it will cost us annually $7,000,000 for maintenance and will have to be renewed every ten years, because the life of the cruisers, and torpedo boats, averages only seven years. Their machinery is so complicated that each year they cost half their price for upkeep. In addition to all that, a large number of Canadians will be taken from their peaceful industrial employment. Where are we going to get these men when we cannot find men for our militia, in which the rates of pay are higher than in any army in the world. A recent return to this House showed that only 20 per cent of the men in our active militia are Canadians. Certainly the voice of reason says to us: Keep out of the navy business. And apart from sentiment altogether, it would be cheaper and far better and more honourable for us to pay our debts by contributing at this time two Dreadnoughts to the British empire. In that I heartily agree with the resolution of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition.

It has been urged in favour of this Bill that it will encourage ship-building in Canada, and the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. E. M. Macdonald), has quoted my speech of last session to say that I favoured this proposal of the government so as to encourage ship-building. What I did say, was that we should begin with the building of the carrier or merchant ship, and that perhaps we could continue that further and go on with the construction of torpedo boats and naval ships of the smaller class. Nothing has occurred since then to change my view in this respect. I must say, however, that we can never become a great commercial maritime nation by adopting the policy which the government proposes to us. The truth is that they are going about it in the wrong way. The path they ask us to follow is not the path that will lead to success.

Let us for example look at the history of Japan in this respect, and we will see that the Canadian government to-day proposes to do not what Japan did, but exactly what the Americans did; they propose to begin building the pyramid at the top. Why is Germany second in merchant tonnage to Great Britain; why is the United States at the bottom of the list and why is Japan a good fourth. I shall endeavour to give the reasons to the House. The United States is at the bottom of the list because they began their fleets both commercial, and naval, by building the naval fleet first, and the reason why Japan is now not only a great commercial shipowning nation, but also a great war fleet owning nation is because they commenced building their commercial fleet first. The ocean tonnage of the United States to-day —deducting the lake and river tonnage—is approximately 939,000 tons, while in 1810 the ocean borne tonnage of the United States was 981,000 tons, a very small decrease during the past 100 years. In 1861 the American tonnage was 2,500,000 tons, and surely something must have happened in the meantime to injure the commercial ship-building industry of the United States. What is the history of Japan in this respect? In 1894 the Japanese tonnage was only 200,000 tons the same as ours is to-day, but the merchant fleet of Japan has grown rapidly, and it now amounts to 1,486,000 tons, and to-day the Japanese merchant ships control the trade of the Pacific. This result was brought about by giving a tonnage subsidy, and a ship-building bounty to ships built at home, the subsidies being given for the building of merchant ships, and also for the operation of these ships at sea. Last year the Japanese government paid $6,500,000 in subsidies to their merchant fleet, and to ship-building. Their policy is to give so much a ton for building the ship in Japan, and to give also an annual subsidy to the ship if she is built in Japan, and is operated between Japan, and some foreign country. Last year, as I have said Japan spent $6,500,000 in these subsidies and, last year Canada paid over $2,000,000 in shipping subsidies, which, with the $6,000,000 annually we propose putting into this navy will amount to $8,000,000 a year that we will spend in subsidies, and still we will only have a poor navy and no commerical fleet. It has only taken the Japanese people about fifteen years to build up the great navy which they have to-day.

They first established ship-building yards in a small way. They began building merchant ships, and gradually as time went on they began to build torpedo boats and cruisers, and to-day Japan is capable of building her own Dreadnoughts, making the plates, the beams, the angles, the armour plates, the machinery, and the guns. The reason of that is that the Japanese have gone about the ship-building business in a sensible, business way. One shipyard alone employs no less than 9,000 men, which will give you an idea of the enormous extent of this industry in that country. The same thing happened in Germany. In 1885 Germany had neither a commercial fleet, nor a war fleet. A system of subsidies was adopted, the result of which is that the German tonnage, which was then 300,000 tons, is to-day second only to that of Great Britain. We all know that since 1885 the Germans have succeeded not only in establishing shipbuilding in a substantial way, but in building these great capital ships equal to Great Britain as far as their resources in material and supplies are concerned. They can build their own ships, make their own steel, and manufacture the armour plate, and the guns. The Japanese, by the wise policy they have adopted, have not control of the Pacific. The Germans have also risen to such greatness in this respect that they challenge the attention of Great Britain. It is for us to consider, if we are going to spend so much of the money of this country on a navy, whether we should not adopt a policy which has been so successfully followed by these two nations, rather than the policy adopted by the United States, which experience has shown to be wrong. On various occasions the Americans have endeavoured to secure the adoption of a policy along the German and Japanese lines; but their tremendous expenditures on the navy, which a great many of their people consider useless, have prevented the adoption of such a policy. France also has adopted a policy of subsidizing ship-building and operating ships. In 1891 the French mercantile fleet amounted to only 300,000 tons, whereas to-day it amounts to 1,300,000 tons. Norway also has recently adopted the subsidy system. A ship subsidy Bill has been before the United States Congress on numerous occasions, and has been defeated because the people have had such enormous sums to pay for their navy. The result is that the United States tonnage in 1810 was virtually just as great as that of to-day. There is at the present time a Bill before Congress for the purpose of fixing a subsidy for the building of these ships, which proposes that they shall be fast merchant ships, with a speed about equal to that of our Canadian cruisers, and with considerable freight tonnage capacity, and when subsidized, they are expected to establish lines of communication between the United States, Brazil, Argentina, China, and New Zealand. These ships will carry freight, and will have gun platforms, on which guns of as great power as those of the Canadian cruisers can be mounted. They will thus be not only merchant ships of the latest class, but cruisers equal in speed and armament to ours. I think it would be wise for this government to consider the advisability of adopting a policy of that kind. The Canadian farmer, when he gives up his ox-team, goes and buys a good team of general purpose horses—he does not start a racing stable. In carrying out their naval policy, that is what this government should do, because cruisers built under these specifications would be able to carry our produce to the mother country in time of peace, and, in case of war, they would do the same thing, and at the same time have guns to fight the enemy's cruisers. The hon. members of this House know that I am deeply interested in ship-building, and I realize that it would be of great advantage to the maritime provinces to be able to regain once more the great industry of ship-building which they possessed twenty-five years ago, when Canada stood fourth in the great ocean-tonnage countries of the world. The policy proposed by this government is not founded on business principles, and if adopted will involve such a great expenditure that this country will never have the ship-building industry established along sound commercial lines like other nations. In order to build a fleet you may establish shipyards and dry-docks, but after you have built three or four ships, what will you do? You will have nothing further to go on with, and the men who have come here from Glasgow, Belfast, and the Tyne, and have built these ships with foreign material, will have nothing to do. The beams will come from Great Britain, the plate from Germany and the United States, the machinery from Glasgow, the guns from Birmingham, and when you are through, what will happen? Your yards will have nothing more to do. The guns and machinery will represent about one-half the cost, and the armour about twenty-five per cent, which will leave about twenty-five per cent to be divided between the material for the hull, and the labour of assembly.

And I say that all the Canadian people will get out of the building of this fleet will be about 15 per cent. I do not think that is good business. The proper way to establish ship-building is to establish it on commercial lines. If you establish it by giving a subsidy, say of $8 per ton, on ships built in Canada and in addition confine your mail and shipping subsidies to ships built in Canada, you will soon find Canadians ready to put their money into the enterprise and make it a success. You will soon find that business established on a sound basis and your ship-building yards will always have plenty of work for the artisans. Then, if necessary, to build say torpedo boats and small destroyers, you will have workmen trained to do the work rapidly and efficiently. When we have that industry established on a sound basis, you will also find establishments in this country willing to go into the manufacture of the material required. The Dominion Iron and Steel Company have a large mill for the rolling of plates, but they have it housed up in a shanty because, under existing conditions, they could roll in a month all the plates used in Canada for a year, But, if you can show a substantial policy of this kind, they would soon erect their mill, and in a short time we would not only be rolling our own plates but be able to furnish all the machinery required, and the time would not be far distant when we will make our armour plate because the nickel that goes into the armour plate of the world comes from this country. We will also be able to make our own guns and even tender for the building of warships for the British navy. The government should seriously consider this. If they should adopt the policy they now advocate the door would be closed for the next 25 years in Canada as far as ship-building is concerned and as far as the hopes of the maritime provinces in that respect are concerned for the next generation. That is a consummation which no patriotic Canadian desires. What every one wishes is to see a ship-building industry established in the maritime provinces because such an industry will give an impetus to agriculture and every other development in this country. It will also bring a large influx of population which, instead of coming here from Glasgow and other ship-building centres and going back as soon as the ship is built—because it is only a few days journey back home, will make their homes here since they will have plenty of work all the year round and will thus form an important adjunct to our population. But, instead of doing this, the government are proposing to establish the navy on such unsound lines that no member from the maritime provinces would be justified in supporting it.

I now come to another point and that is the command of this navy. As this House knows the command in chief has been taken out of the hands of the King and placed in the hands of the Prime Minister of this country, because that is what an order in council means. When this question came up at the conference the Minister of War (Sir Frederick Borden) quoted the Militia Act. I would like to deal with that Act, and point out what has been done with it. It is said that the Militia Act did not permit our Canadian forces to be employed in the defence of the empire outside Canada. That statement has been made on many occasions. Let me say that the old Act did permit our military forces to be used outside Canada and so does the new Act.

Let me tell the House something about our militia and military affairs before going further. Let us for a moment glance at history and perhaps obtain some idea of what is at the bottom of this Navy Bill and what the results are likely to be. The militia was originally, in England, a parliamentary force. It was established previous to the time of Cromwell, but the army was reorganized in 1660 when Charles II. come to the throne. He was allowed a small standing army, and the same Act which established a standing army, established a militia, and placed the command of that militia in the hands of the sovereign. Two years later, with the dread of the standing army in their minds, the parliament of Great Britain declared that the King was the supreme officer of the militia, and by another clause gave the command of that militia over to the lord lieutenants of counties. While the King was declared to be the commander in chief in substance, he was not in fact, because the command of the British militia was in the hands of the lord lieutenants of the counties, who took their orders from parliament. That existed until the reign of Queen Victoria, when an Act was passed which gave the command in chief of the militia and standing army personally into the hands of the Queen. That was the Act in force when confederation was enacted. If any one will take the trouble to go back to the time when the Conservative party was in power in this country and will look up the Revised Statutes of 1884, he will find that the command in chief was personally in the hands of the sovereign. The member for Jacques Cartier, in his speech, touching the relations of the sovereign to the militia, expressed the ideas of the old Act. He was mistaken, there has been a great change in the relation of the militia of this country to the Crown. Clause 3 of this Act, of the Act of 1886, says:

> The command in chief of the land and naval militia and of all the military and naval forces of and in Canada is vested in the Queen and shall be exercised and administered by her personally, or by the Governor General as her representative.

The House will observe the term 'naval forces' in that clause, and also that the command is personal, not legislative. Now clause 4 of the Consolidated Statutes of 1906 says:

> The command in chief of the militia is declared to continue vested in the King and shall be exercised and administered by His Majesty or by the Governor General as his representative.

One clause enacts positively, the other is purely declaratory, and what is more, the command of the naval forces is cut out entirely. Why? Was this independent navy anticipated when the Militia Act was amended in 1904? Was this amendment prepared in anticipation of what we now have? It looks like design. The King so far has certainly been written out. Let us now take up the clause dealing with calling out the militia, for that is really the enacting clause of the statute. Clause 79 of the old Act says:

> Her Majesty may call out the militia or any part thereof for active service either within or without Canada, at any time when it appears advisable so to do by reason of war, invasion or insurrection or danger of any of them, and the militiamen when so called out for actual service shall continue to serve for at least one year, from the date of their being called out, for active service, if required so to do, or for any longer period which His Majesty approves.

That, Sir, was the Act that was in force when our soldiers went to South Africa. The King notwithstanding anything said to the contrary had the power then to order militia regiments for foreign service in the cause of imperial defence. The Crown could call out the militia at any time for service anywhere. The new Act is different. The present government, not a Tory government, made the charge also an English minister. Let us examine the new Act and see what it says on this point, and we will begin to locate the thin edge of this separation wedge.

Clause 69, R.S.C., 1906, says:

The Governor in Council may place the militia or any part thereof on active service anywhere in Canada, and also beyond Canada, for the defence thereof, at any time when it appears advisable so to do by reason of emergency.

Sir, you will see that the Act of 1904, and the revision of the same of 1906, has not only taken the command of the militia away from the King, but further it has taken away the authority of the Crown, to order the militia on active service. It does exactly what the Act of 1662, did to Charles II. in another way. Whilst the King is normally the head of our militia the only authority to order that force on active service is an order in council. In other words the Prime Minister has usurped the functions and prerogatives of His Majesty. The same idea is carried out in this Naval Bill. Was there any necessity for taking the personal command of the militia away from the King? Is there any necessity for depriving the King of the personal command of this navy? His Majesty has not shown any signs of seeking to become an absolute rather than a constitutional monarch. There is no indication, that the people of this country are to be deprived by the Crown of those British laws, and institutions, that freedom greater than any other country which we possess and which is given to them under the British North America Act. Let us see there may be something else. Has this separatist policy gone further? We found in the old Militia Act, the following provision:

Clause 78, says:

The officer commanding any military district or division or the officer commanding any corps of active militia, may upon any sudden emergency of invasion, or unsurrection or imminent danger of either, call out the whole or any part of the militia within his command until the pleasure of Her Majesty is known, and the militia so called out by the commanding officer, shall immediately obey all such orders as he gives, and march to such place within or without the district or division as he directs.

Now, Sir, that was a wise provision which enabled a commanding officer to call out his men in case of invasion or insurrection to take the initiative in preserving the statu quo and await his sovereign's commands. But, Sir, I search the new Act in vain for a similar provision. It is not there and why was it removed? Was its removal another step in the policy of separation when there could be established by civilians, and political clubs, a new constitution, free from that tyrannical British justice, and British guarantees? What is the result of this tampering with the Militia Act, with the King's executive authority? Let us see. The only authority to call out the militia now in Canada, is an order in council. Commanding officers can no longer oppose insurrection in the King's name. Five hundred resolute men with arms in their hands, under a bold leader could seize the person of the Governor General and the loyal members of the cabinet in this city, and they could easily overturn our constitution, and proclaim a separate kingdom or a republic or dictatorship. That is a startling fact, but nevertheless true. The old Act provided that the King or the officers commanding corps could call out the troops in such an emergency. to protect parliament, and the Crown's authority. If the council were prisoners, if they refused by collusion or otherwise, in such a case to call out the militia to defend the constitution what would happen? Nothing. The revolutionists would be in absolute control. If a commanding officer called out his militia men to oppose separation now, he could be treated as a rebel, and shot, and the law as it now stands would not give him the rights of a belligerent, in maintaining the statu quo, or the dignity of the Crown. Everything has been arranged so as to make a possible coup d'etat. Why? Honourable gentlemen may make professions of loyalty. They may pull up big red herrings out of the sea, and clothe them in the British lion skins, and roar themselves hoarse. But the country has a reason to ask then, why has the authority of the British Crown, the guarantee of our constitution, been eliminated from the Militia Act, and now from the naval force? That is a question that will need a lot of answering. It is a question which every peaceful Canadian should ask—Why have such great changes been made in the relation of the British Crown to the militia and armed forces been made without a discussion, and a full disclosure? That should in itself be sufficient to kill this Bill. Why has the authority of the King been usurped by the order in council or in other words by the Prime Minister? Is this navy going to be a royal navy, or another instrument under the absolute control of the Prime Minister? Where is this ambition going to end? We have a Laurier militia. Now we are going to have a Laurier navy. Let me warn the Prime Minister that there is but a step from the Capitol to the Tarpeian rock.

Now, during this debate reference has been made to the question of guarantees.

There is no doubt in the world but that some guarantees were made in the British North America Act. Consider the condition of the country at that time. It was torn by dissension and agitation, it was threatened with invasion from the south. All parts of the country had reached that state of political agitation when business was suspended and something had to be done. On the 10th of October, 1864, the Quebec conference met and lasted eight days. At that conference was written out the charter of our liberties. At that conference the various provinces represented exchanged guarantees, guarantees respecting the rights of religious minorities, guarantees with respect to language, guarantees with respect to property and with respect to commerce. All these guarantees were included in the constitution agreed upon in 1864. Now, Sir, after these guarantees had been agreed upon, it was necessary to ascertain whether the British government would assent to them, and at a meeting in Great Britain guarantees were also exchanged between the representatives of Canada and the representatives of the British Crown. I have before me a report made by the great men of that day, men whose names stand high, not only in the councils of the Reform party, but also in the councils of the Conservative party. The men who signed that report were the Hon. George Brown, a well known Reformer; Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir George E. Cartier and A. T. Galt. Now, the question of defence was discussed in London at that conference, and they stated in this report what Canada would guarantee so far as defence was concerned. I will trouble the House by reading one or two sentences of that report:

> On the part of Canada, we expressed the desire that this plan for the defence of all parts of the province should be taken as the basis of arrangement; and that a full and candid discussion should be had as to the share of the cost that ought to be borne respectively by the imperial and provincial exchequers.
> We expressed the earnest wish of the people of Canada to perpetuate the happy existing connection with Great Britain, and their entire willingness to contribute to the defence of the empire their full quota, according to their ability, of men and money.

That was the pledge given by Canada to Great Britain at the time of confederation, when Great Britain agreed to pass the Act of Confederation. Sir, what did Great Britain do? Great Britain gave to Canada the following pledge:

> It will be gratifying to many devoted subjects of Her Majesty throughout British America, whose fears have been excited by the language too often heard of late years, on the subject of colonial connection, that we received from Her Majesty's ministers the assurance that the British government acknowledge the obligation of defending every portion of Canada with all the resources at its command.

I feel very strongly on the matter of these guarantees, and I think when any question arises in this country involving any change in the guarantees exchanged between the provinces or between Canada and the British Crown, we should go very slowly and not rock the boat too much. It is much better for us to maintain the statu quo in matters of this kind than to rashly enter upon changes. The guarantees are sacred. The ministers of the Crown will not grant an appeal to the people. They have not had a mandate from the people on this naval question, which certainly to my mind involves a reversal of our own policy, the adoption of a new policy, the possession of an independent navy. If they refuse us the privilege of going to the people ourselves to discuss this question then the least they can do would be to follow the suggestion of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier and submit this very important and serious question to the people. My leader has made the same suggestion. The guarantees which were exchanged at the time of confederation should not be lightly set aside. I am sure the people of Ontario are just as eager to maintain the constitution established as the result of the Quebec conference, that is the British North America Act, as any other portion of Canada, and if the rights of my province were threatened I would be the first man to raise my voice. While this navy may not perhaps involve a question affecting any province directly, it certainly involves the question of the separation of this country from the motherland. To that question, as far as I am concerned, there is only one answer, that is the word, no.

While the resolution of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier does not enter into any discussion of the greater issues involved, such as a contribution, it deals directly with this Bill, and, for the benefit of this House, I shall read and examine that resolution so that we may better judge whether we should vote for it or not. This resolution, as I have already said, deals only with this Bill, which after all, is the only thing that is actually before the House. The resolution of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) was proposed by him as a sub-amendment or substitutional amendment. Every one who understands the rules of proceeding from a school meeting up to parliament, knows that every amendment to the amendment is an amendment to the main motion. It involves three principles. Let us examine them.

This House, while declaring its unalterable devotion to the British Crown, is of opinion that the Bill now submitted for its consideration changes the relations of Canada with the empire, and ought, in consequence, to be submitted to the Canadian people in order to obtain at once the nation's opinion by means of a plebiscite.

In the first place the hon. member recites the unalterable devotion of this House to the British Crown. I cannot feel in my heart that I can vote against that. In the second place he states that in his opinion the Bill submitted for the consideration of the House changes the relation of Canada with the empire. Every body who has followed the debate, especially in the last two weeks will realize that that is the direction in which this debate has tended, and that hon. gentlemen opposite have not been afraid to rise and state that it is the ultimate object of such legislation as this to bring about separation from the British Crown. Therefore, I say as a sound constitutionalist, and as a believer in the British North America Act that I cannot find it in my heart to vote 'no' for that proposition, because I firmly believe that this Bill does endeavour to change our relations to the British Crown, and ultimately lead us to separation. He says it ought in consequence to be submitted to the Canadian people in order to obtain at once the nation's opinion by means of a plebiscite. Many people will take the ground that it is not British nor constitutional to have a plebiscite. We have heard some professors of constitutional history recite their views in this House, and some of those views to my mind were very misty and hazy, but it seems to me that any one who knows any thing about constitutional history knows that this our constitution was based largely on the American constitution. I have stated that the fathers of confederation at that time met and wrote our constitution at the Quebec conference. These men understood constitutions and constitutional history a thousand times better than we do and why? At that time they had written constitutions in other countries, some of which had failed, and some had succeeded. France had a written constitution. A few years before that the constitution was torn to pieces by Napoleon the Third. Italy had just been united as a limited monarchy under Cavour a few years before. Spain had been in the toils and struggles of revolution, and to the south of us the United States was fighting out the principle of the rights of states as against federal authority, which involved very serious constitutional changes. The fathers of confederation were seized of all these facts, they realized the importance of the work they had in hand, and the British North America Act which they prepared is, to my mind, one of the soundest and ablest state papers that ever emanated from any people. They knew all about these matters. They established in that Act the principle that we, the members of parliament, represent the people, the principle of representative government. In the United States they believe in representative government, and there is no man in this House who will say he does not represent his riding. The principle in England is the reverse, as far as representative government is concerned, prerogative comes from above; our prerogative comes from the people, we believe in representation by population. The United States government has a written charter, we have a written charter, and when any change is involved in the American constitution what happens? They put the amendment to the constitution before the people in a plebiscite. I believe it would be wise for us to adopt that principle in this case, especially as this is a matter which involves a very great change in our relation to the empire. We have a change here involving the setting up of a new empire, or a new King? One would think that we had no rights at all, that we had less liberties than they have in Great Britain. I would ask any hon. gentleman if we have not greater liberties than the people of Scotland have? They do not make their own laws, or impose their own taxation.

An hon. MEMBER. Or Ireland.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. Yes, poor Ireland. What about poor England or Wales? We have greater liberties than they have in any of these countries and we find that this Naval Bill challenges these liberties. As far as my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) is concerned I cannot find it in my heart to vote against his amendment. I will vote for it because it involves a great principle and a principle that I think every one ought to vote for. As far as the principle involved in the amendment of my hon. leader (Mr. R. L. Borden) is concerned, I shall vote for his motion because it meets with my heartiest approval. Because two good things are presented to us and because the lesser is included in the greater it is no reason why we should reject either one or the other. From the purely business standpoint and the sentimental standpoint the amendment of my hon. leader is one that should be adopted by us and that is that we should contribute to the cost of our insurance like men and be done with it. If a policeman guards my property I pay taxes for his protection. If you have ships to carry your trade away you establish the principle that you pay subsidies to those ships. If you do not wish to establish a navy of your own, if you feel that the burden is great in opening up and developing the resources of the country, you do not need to go to that expense because there is one of the largest nations of the world that has had a long experience in the construction and management of battleships which is ready to do it for you which has guaranteed under the British North America Act that she will aid you. For that reason, as far as I am personally concerned, I intend to vote for both these resolutions. To every one who has read the pages of history it must be apparent that there are other very grave questions involved. We should adopt the soundest and wisest policy and move as slowly along this line at the present time as we can. We have Scylla on one side and Charybdis on the other and unless we have the wisest statesman to guide us we may get into very serious trouble with the old country or with some other nation. A year or two previous to the trouble between the mother country and the American colonies one of the greatest statesmen of the time—Franklin—wrote the following:

I am of the opinion that the foundation of the future greatness and stability of the British empire lie in America, and though like other foundations they may be low and little now, they are nevertheless broad and strong enough to support the greatest political structure that human wisdom ever yet erected.

These foundations are being laid in this country by us. It will be time enough when we have twenty or thirty million to take into consideration the question of any changes in our constitution. Let us remain a free and happy people and let it not be said that for over a hundred years the people who have lived in this country have been trying in an humble way to realize that prophecy of Franklin's and they have failed. For forty years we have lived a united people working out our salvation along those lines. Let us make haste slowly with regard to this stupendous question. Those questions that form the basis for debates in the schools and colleges as to whether Canada should be independent or annexed to the United States are all childish questions and the men who bring them up in this House or try to voice them throughout the country simply show that they are acting in a childish way. We have a constitution the equal of which cannot be found and we cannot hope to improve upon it at present. Let us maintain our constitution and in future years let it not be said in time of emergency that a great empire and little minds go together.

Mr. J. A. LORTIE (Soulanges). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, before this debate is closed, I deem it my duty to express an opinion on this burning issue, on this intricate question which is now before us, the creation of a marine, an issue which, for several months past, has agitated all minds, either in this House or outside of it. The note I am going to strike is likely to sound harshly and to grate upon the ears of many people, while it will be in accord and in tally with the feelings of all true patriots who endeavour to preserve in their integrity the rights and privileges guaranteed by our constitution; rights and privileges secured to us by the indefatigable and incessant efforts of our great statesmen and faithfully adhered to by Sir George Etienne Cartier, Sir John Macdonald, Tupper, Angers and Monk.

As remarked by the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Ecrément) in his speech, in seconding the address: 'We are at the parting of the ways in our history; we are entering upon one of those history-makers, one of those epoch-making periods in the history of Canada.' Are not such words, Sir, calculated to cause us to ponder, and do they not warn us to deeply think over the responsibilities we are going to assume and the action we are about to take?

The Bill providing for the establishment of a navy is, to my mind, the most important piece of legislation the Canadian government has been called upon to deal with since confederation. The creation of a fleet, the control of which passes automatically into the hands of the British admiralty in time of war, destroys our autonomy and effects our constitution, of which all Canadians are justly proud.

I notice that in the report of the imperial conference (page 24), there are three conditions mentioned as means of assisting in imperial defence.

The first form in which to assist in imperial government from expenses which bution of money or material.

A second form would be to provide local naval forces and place them at the disposal of the Crown, in the event of war.

A third one would be in undertaking certain local services not directly of a naval character, but which may relieve the imperial government from expenses which would otherwise fall on the British exchequer.

Tihs last condition is the one that has been so far carried out, it is the one, I say, that this country should stick to, while putting forth greater efforts for the development of our territory.

Look at the thousands of miles of railway we have built so far! We shall soon have three transcontinental railways which will cross the country in every direction. Besides, we have improved our waterways, by dredging our rivers, by making canals and providing better accommodation and facilities at our ports. There are so many efficacious means of abridging distances from ocean to ocean and facilitating, in the event of war, the transportation of British troops and goods. Besides, are we not responsible for the protection and defence of our territory? Have we not undertaken to protect our coasts, our ports and our fisheries, so many ways of relieving the British government from expenses they would have to face otherwise?

We are a colony, but a colony with a territory as vast and as immense as that of Russia. When we assumed the responsibility of developing, protecting and defending a territory which is five or six times larger than the British isles, with a population of six or seven millions, did we not give an extraordinary proof of our gratitude and loyalty towards England? Could she now require anything more from us, for the present. Therefore we are wrongly charged with disloyalty when we ask to remain in the statu quo.

I want to remain in the statu quo: first, because the creation of a navy which will be part of the imperial fleet, involves too large and expenditure of public money, which will result in considerably retarding the development and progress of the country.

Secondly, because it completely changes our relations with the empire.

Thirdly, because the people have never been consulted on that point.

Are we now in such a financial position as to be able to build a navy? If I open the blue-books and examine our financial position, I find that the country is saddled with a debt of 472 millions. In his budget speech, did not the Finance Minister tell us that the public expenditure had exceeded the revenue by 45 millions? What will happen, when we are fairly embarked upon this scheme of militarism? Is not the example of all countries launched into militarism a sufficient warning to make us shudder with fear. With the construction of that navy, I have no hesitation in saying, without fear of misleading public opinion, that as early as next year, the deficit of our budget will be considerably increased and even doubled.

That debt of 472 millions shows that we are poor; we are a mere population of seven millions to meet such a large debt and provide for the new expenditures we shall have to incur for the development of the resources of Canada. Would it not be far better to devote our money, our revenue, our energies and our labours to the development of the country, instead of building a navy which will probably prove a source of danger for Canada in the future?

We have duties to discharge towards the empire under the British flag; we have faithfully fulfilled those duties in the past, and we are quite ready to continue so doing in the future. But, on the other hand, we cling to our flag; and we think that to impoverish Canada in order to indulge in sentimentalism and pseudo-marine, is far from being a practical and patriotic policy.

If we now turn our attention towards the great public works which are an absolute necessity, in order that our country may keep pace with its development and the increase of population, we find that we shall need fabulous sums of money. What will be the cost of the Grand Trunk Pacific? Two hundred million dollars will hardly be sufficient to complete the work; an amount quite different from the estimated cost given by the Prime Minister and his followers. I still remember the pompous and emphatic tone assumed by the speakers when haranguing the people on the pubic platforms, when they exclaimed: 'We are going to build a transcontinental railway, from ocean to ocean, at the cost of $13,000,000. The public domain will not be sacrificed, as under the Conservative rule, in the building of the Canadian Pacific railway. We won't see a repetition of the famous plunders of the boodlers of those days. If our public lands have not been sacrificed so far, I may say that the public exchequer has been looted. So far, the cost of that undertaking exceeds 160 million dollars.

After such contradictions on the part of the hon. gentlemen opposite, could I not say, without fear of leading public opinion astray, that the government is going to spend three times more than is necessary for the building of the navy, which would increase that exenditure to 45 millions.

Here is the proof of my assertions. In January last, when introducing the Naval Service Bill, the right hon. the Prime Minister said: 'The estimated annual cost of maintenance is $3,000,000.' Now, upon the occasion of the second reading of the Bill, three weeks later, he stated that the cost of maintenance would reach $4,150,000. On January 10, the prime minister's right arm, the Minister of Militia, said that the estimated cost of maintenance would be $4,680,000; and he continued: 'I have here a paper prepared by Admiral Kingsmill. It reads as follows: Estimated annual cost by Admiral Kingsmill for maintenance, interest on the cost of the navy, $468,000; of the cost of the navy to provide for replacement, $1,560,000; maintenance of college, barracks, &c., $1,030,000; maintenance of training ships, $1,244,000; maintenance of Bristols and torpedo boats, $1,885,000; total of annual cost, $7,157,000.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we are all agreed that the construction of the Georgian bay canal is a necessity. According to the reports of experts, the cost of that undertaking will be $100,000,000. The consensus of opinion in this country is that this is a matter of urgency. Should the building of that canal be delayed a few years longer, the western trade will be diverted from Canada to the United States. Why have we not started building that waterway? I leave the answer to the hon. Minister of Marine, who, at a banquet tendered by the Reform Club to the Secretary of State, said: 'The causes are want of money and the insufficiency of our resources.'

If our resources are insufficient for urgent works of paramount importance, if we find it impossible, for lack of means, to construct works which would yield us enormous revenues, is it not ridiculous, not to say absurd, to build a navy the pressing necessity of which for the country has not yet been shown, and which may, in the future, prove adverse to our interests?

Would it not be preferable and more logical, Sir, to devote those millions to the building of the Georgian bay canal, which would be an important step taken in the right direction for the development of our commerce and the progress of the country?

Besides those great works, those undertakings of first magnitude, are these not works of secondary importance which are more pressing than the building of a navy?

Are not the harbours of Quebec and Montreal in need of better accommodation and of more modern equipment, in order that they should be on a footing of equality with the neighbouring harbours? Halifax and St. John are far from having the requisite equipment to become national ports. The needs of the harbours on the Pacific ocean should not be ignored either. I am quite satisfied that the majority of the inhabitants of this country realize that there is a more urgent need of undertaking, improving and completing those works than building a navy? I do not think I am very far from the mark in estimating at 400 millions the cost of those works. In my opinion, therefore, from the financial standpoint alone, irrespective of other considerations, it is impossible for Canada to undertake the building of a navy.

What will be the cost of that navy? We have, it is true, the statements made by the Prime Minister, who says that it will not exceed $15,000,000. If the right hon. gentleman had never led public opinion into error, I would most willingly accept his word. But the history of the past is calculated to cast some doubt in our minds. I need no other proof than the history of the building of the transcontinental, in regard to which the people of Canada were led into error and completely deceived.

The creation of a navy involves other expenditures besides the building of the warships. There are many necessary expenditures. Besides the cost of the dockyards, equipment, uniforms, stores, ammunition and coal, have we not also to provide for fortified revictualling harbours, offering an armed refuge in case of damage suffered by ships. Those ports will be for repair of ships, with dry docks and floating docks. Moreover, in the memorandum of the admiralty, is not a pension for seamen mentioned?

What is the life or term of service of those warships going to be? Their lease of life is very short, according to the statistics in connection with such navy. Owing to the fact of keeping those ships on the open sea, as stated by shipbuilders, their life is about twenty years. On the other hand, owing to the rapid development of the naval science and of mechanics, the existence of these ships becomes still shorter. After ten or twelve years' service, they become obsolete, out-of-date, and ships of a more modern type and more up-to-date are required.

The creation of a navy, according to the scheme submitted by the Prime Minister, changes for the future our relations with the mother country. Our autonomous constitution, the Militia Act, and particularly section 69, militate against such a scheme. Section 69 reads:

> The Governor in Council may place the militia, or any part thereof, on active service anywhere in Canada and also beyond Canada, for the defence thereof, at any time when it appears advisable so to do by reason of emergency.

Emergency means war, invasion or insurrection, real or apprehended!

It is clearly enacted in the above section that the militia may be called out on active service only for the defence of our territory. Therefore by that section we are not bound to take part in the wars of the empire.

Therefore, our soldiers, our militia men are trained and maintained only for the protection of Canada, wherever those interests may be.

Did not the Minister of Militia collaborate in the framing of the Act of 1904, and did he not approve of it?

Listen to what he said then:

> The very fundamental idea of a militia force has always been and is now home defence. In every portion of the British empire, without any exception, the same principle is laid down which is found in the Bill before the House—that the militia of that part of the British empire shall be limited in their service to the particular part of the empire in which they live. I have taken the trouble to examine the old militia laws of the different provinces which made up the Dominion of Canada, and in every one of those provinces, we find the same limitations.

It has always been so, and it is foolish to talk about serving outside of Canada.

These words have been added 'for the defence of the country,' to indicate clearly that the militia cannot be taken outside Canada unless it be for the defence thereof.

Now, let us compare the following provisions with those contained in sections 17 and 18 of the Naval Bill:

17. The Governor in Council may place the naval force or part thereof on active service at any time when it appears advisable so to do by reason of an emergency.

18. In case of an emergency the Governor in Council may place at the disposal of His Majesty, for general service in the royal navy, the naval service or any part thereof, any ships or vessels of the naval service, and the officers and seamen serving in such ships and vessels, or any officers of seamen belonging to the naval service.

Mr. Speaker, more than once, since this discussion has been started, I have heard speakers favourable to this Bill, ask in this House : 'Why should there be any opposition to this proposal which is nothing but the continuation of the work of Sir George Etienne Cartier, the extension to the navy of the provisions of the Militia Bill:

Whoever has taken the pains of reading over the various provisions, even in a cursory way, will have noticed great differences between them. Our militia is a Canadian institution provided for the defence of our territory. The navy, on the contrary, is a British institution, inspired by England for the defence of the empire. That naval service has been initiated as the result of three imperial conferences; it is the outcome of the British scare of 1909 in regard to German pretensions, and which, to my mind, was imagined at the right time. So then, that navy is not a requirement of Canada; it is built to meet a wish of the mother country. The necessary inference to my mind, is that in time of war, it will automatically pass under the control of the British admiralty. So then, there will be no war remote enough going on in the world, whether just or unjust, whether in the interest of Canada or not, in which we shall be dispensed from taking part. In support of my statement, I may quote an extract from the speech delivered by the Minister of Militia on February 10th, page 3405 of Hansard:

Clause 18 or 19 does not mean that no action can be taken until parliament can be called—15 days hence. On the contrary, such action as the Governor in Council might think it their duty to take would be taken at once, but parliament would be called to approve or disapprove. That is responsible government, the principles of which I am beginning to think my hon. friends opposite do not entirely comprehend. It seems to me that no proper exception can be taken to that part of the Bill.

According to that statement, the section providing that parliament shall be called within fifteen days, does not mean that parliament will be called to decide whether the fleet should take part in the hostilities; when the House meets, the fleet will already have gone to the front, or possibly have been sunk. That provision of the Bill is only a sham, a deception to facilitate the taking of the pill 'navy' by the people. That deception has been incorporated in the Bill, not to provide for the retention of the fleet in the country, but in order to ensure the voting of the moneys required to defray all expenses incurred or to come.

The providing of that war navy for the safety of the empire, effects, to my mind, a radical departure in our country's policy. It amounts to the abandonment of our traditions as a nation, the disavowal of our past, the sacrifice of our autonomy. Now, Mr. Speaker, note what complete somersault has been effected in this connection by the hon. Minister of Marine, one of the fathers of this Naval Bill. What did the hon. member for Rouville (Hon. Mr. Brodeur) say on matters of this kind when the Conservatives were in power? At the time relations between Great Britain and the United States were rather strained over the Venezuelan question. At a certain moment the outlook was very threatening. If war had broken out, Canada, a British possession, would have been attacked from the first. Our government resolved on taking means to at any rate provide suitable arms for the militia, and purchased a million dollars worth of rifles of the latest pattern. When we were called upon to pay for these, the hon. member could not conceal his surprise, and expressed himself in the following terms:

There is one thing which seems strange in this connection; I have always heard it stated that if—though it would be most extraordinary—Canada should be engaged in war, we might rely on the protection of Great Britain; that the sole justification for maintaining the colonial tie was that should international entanglements occur, we might rely with certainty on Great Britain helping us. Well, Mr. Chairman, I regret to learn that in this case the government have bought rifles from England, not from a private party, but from the British government, and that the latter is now requesting payment. Is that the protection promised by Great Britain to Canada? Is that the position in which we are put as a colony? I think we might have expected an altogether different treatment from Great Britain. Now, I think all that can be done under the circumstances is to withhold from the government authority to incur such expenditure.

Parliament is requested to appropriate that amount of a million dollars when our debt already exceeds three millions. I take it that our indebtedness is large enough as it is and that there is no sense in our taking up a jingo policy and increasing thereby the public debt to the extent of a few millions, without being able to justify in any way such expenditure. I do not think that expenditure necessary in the meantime and, as far as I am concerned, I am strongly opposed to the voting of an amount such as we are called upon to contribute just now.

In my humble opinion, it is not in 1896 that the hon. Minister of Marine should have delivered such a speech. It is not at a time when we were called upon to defend our country that such words should have fallen from his lips; it is at the imperial conference of August, 1909. In 1896, the occasion was a critical one, the integrity of our territory was threatened; a powerful foe was at our doors; the United States. In 1909, there existed no such emergency. Now that universal peace is secured, that the German scare is over, according to eminent statesmen, now that Mr. Asquith, Mr. Lloyd-George, and above all the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada, loudly proclaim that the German scare is a delusion, such denunciations would be in season. They might have the effect of preventing us from committing the blunder which we are about to make.

As a result of Britain's scare of the existence of that German peril of last year, members on both sides of the House abstained from all protest when the proposal of the 29th March was submitted. Was not that attitude on our part, that moral support, an evidence of loyalty to the mother country? Does it not go to show that whenever England satisfies us that there actually exists an emergency, that her supremacy is really imperilled, we shall as in the past be ready to fly to her aid.

Mr. Speaker, what I oppose and what I protest against, is, in the first place, the voting of a provision which binds Canada for ever to take part in imperial wars; it is the laying down of that principle which is implied in the creation of a war navy, as per sections 18 and 19 of this Bill; it is that free gift of 18 or 20 million dollars before it has been shown that the supremacy of Great Britain is actually and urgently threatened.

On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, I protest against that independence cry proferred by hon. gentlemen on the other side, among others the hon. member for Nicolet (Mr. Turcotte), who, I think, was anxious to make amends for his famous speech against the resolution of March 29, 1909. I protest against insinuations to the same effect on the part of hon. members who have not had the courage of speaking out in this House like the hon. member for Nicolet, but who propose doing so when in the presence of their constituents in order to make up for voting against their convictions as they are about to do.

We Liberal-Conservatives who occupy seats on your left, Mr. Speaker, unanimously and in harmony with the great majority of the French Canadian voters of Quebec and Ontario, loudly proclaim that our country is not yet ready for independence, and that we are in duty bound to remain a British colony for many years to come, as long as our population will not have reached the 25 or 30 million mark.

Why should we launch out into an expenditure towards the building of a fleet destined to defend foreign territory, when even in recent years, exception was taken to our providing for the legitimate defence of Canada? Canada has not an enemy, neither on land or on sea. We should not provoke our neighbours by going in for armament; we should maintain that neutrality which has enabled us to make rapid strides on the way to progress. By taking up that proposal for the building of a war navy, we are embroiling ourselves in all England's wars. We are binding ourselves to participate in all her wars, just or unjust, without, on the other hand, having any voice in the councils of the empire. The principle 'No taxation without representation,' is forever discarded. The future of Canada, its relation to the empire, are thereby completely altered, and henceforth will evolve in a totally different direction from what we had hoped.

Before incurring any expenditure tying us down to imperialism or militarism, it would be very desirable, to my mind, that the people should be consulted. Who will have to meet that expenditure, who will be called upon to carry the burden of a war navy? Who will contribute those millions which the government intend spending uselessly? Is it not the people, particularly the needy classes, who will carry the burden of that undertaking? Wealthy business men will not bear the burden of such an impost; they will always be in a position to increase prices in such a way as to avoid contributing anything. Neither will big contractors, whose profits are always large enough to meet all emergencies and enable them to make money over the bargain. Who then will bear that burden? It is an easy matter to draw the conclusion. It will weigh exclusively on the working classes and the farming community.

Why should not these people be consulted? Does not the Liberal party who claim to be the sponsors of democracy, realize that imposing a burden of several millions on the people without consulting them is the part of despotism or bureaucracy?

The plebiscite is not a new departure in our country; it is not even a new departure for this government. Has not the right hon. Prime Minister and his colleagues had recourse to a consultation of the people on the question of prohibition, a matter of very little importance in comparison with this.

This Naval Defence Bill is really a turning point in Canadian politics. In my humble opinion, Mr. Speaker, that 221 members should take on themselves to bind the country to militarism, that scourge which has brought about financial embarrassments in all countries affected by it, and that without obtaining the approval of the people who are the supreme judges in the matter, such action, I say, cannot be justified.

We representatives of the people hold from our constituents no mandate either direct or indirect authorizing us to add to our obligations, which are already burdensome, contributions in money and men towards forwarding the ambitious aims of the mother country. And since no recourse is had to a plebiscite, is not the inference that the people have nothing to do with settlement of such questions? Must it then be admitted that the people's part consists in meekly bearing as best they can the burden of imperialism which the government is about to lay on their shoulders. Of course, hon. gentlemen on the other side are opposed to the plebiscite idea lest, impelled by legitimate indignation, the people should condemn that imperialistic measure and forever prevent its adoption.

Mr. Speaker, in closing I wish to state that I cannot vote for the Bill, because it will lead us to imperialism. Neither can I vote for the amendment of the hon. leader of the opposition, because it has not yet been clearly proven that Great Britain is actually and urgently in danger of losing her supremacy on the seas. Accordingly, I shall vote for the sub-amendment proposed by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), because I take it to be in harmony with our principles of self-government and likely to safeguard us against imperialistic tendencies.

Mr. C. L. OWEN (Northumberland, Ontario). Mr. Speaker, I have the very greatest sympathy for you, because, I notice that since the beginning of this debate, you seem to have grown older, and I am not much surprised at that. You look weary, Mr. Speaker, and sympathizing with you as I do, I shall not trespass on your patience for any length of time tonight. I have listened to most of the speeches that have been delivered in this House during the past five weeks on the Naval Defence Bill, which I consider one of the most important questions which has ever come before this parliament. I have heard a great deal about loyalty and disloyalty, and I would hate to believe that any minister of the Crown or any supporter of the government is disloyal. I do not believe it, Sir. I believe that every member of this House is a loyal man, and that our difference is after all only a difference of opinion. I give to every man the right to hold his opinions, and I claim that right for myself. We have listened to long speeches and to the reading of essays on this important question; speeches and essays that have taken us back almost to the time of the flood. No wonder, Sir, that you look weary. A good many hon. gentlemen have spoken of what took place 150 years ago, but I fail to see what that has to do with the issue before us, because I take it that we have been sent here to legislate for the present and the future, and not to bother about the past. Many mistakes have been made in the past, and we cannot remedy them now; let us do what we can in the interest of this great Dominion at the present time. I regret that the Prime Minister did not bring down a Naval Defence Bill so framed that every member of this House could have supported it. The right hon. gentleman did not choose to do that, and so I have to express my dissent to his proposal to build a Canadian navy. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the building of a Canadian navy for several reasons. I am satisfied, in my own mind, that Canada does not want a navy, and if Canada did want a navy, I would not approve of laying the foundation of it by building third-class cruisers, which will be out of date in ten years, and which will then have to be replaced at an additional expense of millions of dollars. In building this navy we are opening up an avenue for an expenditure of millions of dollars per annum, and I claim that the country cannot afford that at the present time. I believe that from the financial point of view we are not able at this juncture to lay the foundation for a Canadian navy. We are the banner colony of the great British empire, a fact of which every member of this House is proud. I hope we will always remain part of the British empire, and my hope is that this great Dominion shall become part and parcel of that empire with representation at Westminster. Now, Sir, I do not believe that any man who talks about separation from the mother country is sincere, because it would be the height of folly for us to dream of such a thing. The question has been asked often during this debate if we are not under an obligation to the mother country? Why, certainly we are. We have enjoyed peace and prosperity for many years; true, we had a little civil war which has passed into his tory, but we have been at peace with our neighbours, and that peace is due to the fact that we have been protected by the royal navy. The mother country has protected us in the past, she is protecting us now, and she is prepared to protect us in the future. And, Mr. Speaker, as Britain protected us while we were young and weak, now that we are older and stronger, it is our duty to in some way show our appreciation. We have heard a great deal of talk about the German navy, and you will remember that in 1900, when the German naval programme was submitted to the German parliament the preamble of the Bill set out that Germany was going to build a navy stronger than the strongest. We all know that Britain to-day possesses the strongest navy in the world, and when Germany announces that she is giong to build a navy stronger than the strongest, we may assume that she is not going to build it as a mere toy to look upon. I believe, Sir, that the designs of Germany are upon Great Britain, and I believe that if a naval battle does take place, the scene of it will be in the North Sea. Germany is not going to divide her fleet; she will keep it in active service in the North Sea, and as Great Britain must keep a stronger navy in the North Sea than Germany has, the contribution of two Dreadnoughts to the royal navy is most important. I think that every Canadian here to-night should be proud to do something to show his appreciation of the good old mother country and what she has done for us in the past, and I think that every member of this House who has the welfare of the British empire at heart should vote for the amendment moved by Mr. R. L. Borden, the honoured leader of the Conservative party, which proposes to send the equivalent of two Dreadnoughts to the royal navy, and to send it at once. Now, Sir, I have referred to the matter from the financial point of view, and I want to point out what this country has set out for itself to do for the future. We have pledged ourselves to complete the National Transcontinental railway, which will cost millions of dollars; we have to deepen and widen the Welland canal, which will cost many more millions; we have to complete the Trent canal, which will cost other millions, and we have also to build the Quebec bridge.

An hon. MEMBER. And the Newmarket canal.

Mr. OWEN. Yes, and the Newmarket canal. Then, we are also committed to build the Hudson Bay railway, which will cost many more millions, and I notice that the Prime Minister stated the other day to a deputation that he would build the Georgian Bay canal as soon as the Minister of Finance could see his way clear to provide the funds. In face of all these obligations, I do not think we are financially strong enough to lay the foundation of a Canadian navy. Indeed, I do not see that we have any use for such a navy, because if we build the third-class cruisers which the Bill calls for, I cannot conceive of what value they will be after they are put into commission. For these reasons, I shall support the amendment proposed by my leader (Mr. Borden).

Mr. E. PROULX (Prescott). Mr. Speaker, if the subject before the House were not of such vast importance I would content myself with giving a silent vote, but I believe I owe it to my constituents on this occasion to state my reasons for the vote which I shall give to-night. We have before the House three policies: the one proposed by the government in the present Bill, to build a Canadian navy; the one proposed by the leader of the opposition, which I may call the Dreadnought policy; and the one proposed by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) which I may call the do-nothing policy, at least for the present and until the people have pronounced upon it by means of a plebiscite. The government's position is based on a resolution which was adopted unanimously by this House on the 29th of March last. It is also based upon the view that there is no great crisis, and that Canadian loyalty is best shown by forming the nucleus of a Canadian navy, which will eventually place Canada in a position to protect herself properly and be a strong arm of defence in time of imperial peril. Singularly enough, this policy was approved of by the hon. leader of the opposition, and in fact by all the members of the opposition last March and up to the opening of this session. When the leader of the opposition was in London last summer he attended on the first of July the Dominion Day banquet, at which he is reported to have said:

> Some feeling was created in the British Isles owing to the fact that Canada did not, by resolution or by speech from the Prime Minister, vouchsafe the offer of one, two, or three Dreadnoughts. He (Mr. Borden) thought the resolution in the form in which it was passed, whilst its terms might not upon their surface seem as significant at the moment as the offer of one or two Dreadnoughts would have been, laid down a permanent policy for the Dominion of Canada upon which both parties united and which would serve a more practical purpose than any such offer of Dreadnoughts.

So we may conclude that the hon. leader of the opposition last July believed that the building of a Canadian navy would be a more permanent policy for this government to adopt than the giving of two or three Dreadnoughts. After he came back from England he spoke in his constituency in Halifax, affirming the same opinion. He also affirmed it in Toronto last October. But when the session opened he appeared to have modified his views. I do not know whether the instruments of which the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) spoke some time ago in this House, as having been used on this side of the House, were used by his own supporters in the memorable caucus at the opening of the session. At all events, the hon. leader of the opposition has come now to this position, that he wants to offer to Great Britain the cost of two Dreadnoughts at present, and wait until the people have had an opportunity to pronounce upon a Canadian navy. So the opposition now preach another policy, which is called present and practical aid to the mother country. The gift of two Dreadnoughts, they claim, can alone meet the emergency. The opposition seem to believe firmly in Germany's hostile intentions towards England. They also claim for themselves the sole interest in Canada in the diffusion of loyal principles, and some of them declare that the policy adopted by the government will lead to the separation of Canada from the empire and the dissolution of the empire. It seems to me that the policy of the opposition depends on whether or not there is a great crisis in Britain's foreign relations. It has been proved many times in this House since the beginning of the debate that there is no great crisis and that the German peril does not in fact exist. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) has quoted high authorities, and the Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) has quoted the authority of the First Lord of the Admiralty, and some important newspapers in England, disclaiming any real cause for the German scare. The authorities of Germany have also spoken. The other day the Chancellor of the German empire, discussing the budget, said that Germany had no hostile intentions towards Great Britain, and was building a navy only for the purpose of protecting her shores and her commerce. We have also important German newspapers disclaiming any hostile intentions on the part of Germany towards Great Britain. Some of these expressions have been translated by the 'Literary Digest' of New York, as follows:

Germany's Denial of Evil Intent.

Words can scarcely convey the indignation felt by many German periodicals as they grasp the purport of Robert Blatchford's warning to England against the German navy, recently quoted in these columns. 'A flagrant attempt to appeal to the worst nature in both countries at the very moment when the official leaders of both nations are holding out the hand of good fellowship.' Such is the characterization, for instance, of a German resident merchant, Mr. Charles Huchmann, writing 'The Nineteenth Century' (London). The sentiment is echoed in many of the leading German dailies. They agree that no motive in the new imperial chancellor is stronger than that of friendship with the English government and people. The letters of Robert Blatchford have prodigiously impressed the people of England.' to quote the 'Vossische Zeitung' (Berlin), which adds:

Blatchford is a sensational socialist journalist who has the ear of the English proletariat. In England the naval crusade has always been somewhat aristocratic in its temper, but to-day we have evidence of a determination to make the anti German agitation a working-class movement. It is likely to succeed. It is highly probable that every British workman will, before many years, imbibe the idea that the German Emperor is eager to conquer England.

The cunning of the agitation is thus evident. The English are not taught to hate the Germans. They are all the time assured that it is the German Emperor who has resolved to force his conquering fist upon the English. It seems idle to repudiate any such intentions. As long as a battleship on the high seas floats the German flag, this English agitation will continue. We can afford to ignore it, but it is calculated to be a source of peril to international peace for many years to some.

The socialist German dailies, on the other hand, tend to confirm, more or less indirectly, what Blatchford says. The 'Berlin Vorwaerts' is perpetually referring to 'mad schemes of conquest beyond the seas' which it attributes to 'exalted personages.' For this it is taken to task by that faithful organ of German imperial policy, the Berlin 'Kreuz Zeitung.' Germans never dream of invading England,' it says, 'and we feel sure that this latest scare is merely a rehash, for popular consumption, of the one that has done duty so many times before. It urges Germans everywhere to avoid any conduct calculated to irritate the English and to assist the German chancellor in his effort to cultivate the good opinion of the British government. The Berlin 'Tageblatt' quite despairs of ever disabusing the mind of the English of its inveterate suspicions. It reminds us that the English, 'being crowded closely together upon a small island,' are prone to panic 'because of their delicate geographical position and the resulting nervousness it produces.' The Berlin 'Post' observes:

It is fortunate for us that the English are willing to let us use flying machines in our tactical manœuvres. Should they take it into their heads that we contemplate an invasion of their coast by means of the aeroplane, we can think of no way of calming their agitation. Lord Cromer says Blatchford has obtained material for his latest panic from socialists in Germany. How true is that statement? It ought not to be forgotton that no German socialist is in a position to obtain information which is out of the reach of the German chancellor, and, in fact, which the chancellor says has no existence.

The real explanation of the latest English scare is the desire of many influential interests in London to prevent all understandings between the two powers. The attempt will unquestionably meet with some measure of success. The English distrusts us and they are likely to distrust us for a long time. That need not discourage us in our efforts to cultivate friendly relations with them. But we must be prepared for exasperations.

The government of Canada, in coming to a commercial understanding only the other day with Germany, has also tended to remove any friction which may exist between England and Germany. As my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) has said, there have been many scares before. Russia was at one time a chronic bogey and there have also been French scares. Before the entente cordiale, England was very suspicious of the intentions of France. Canada, in building a navy, is simply carrying out the traditional policy laid down by Great Britain as far back as 1862. In that year, a resolution was passed by the imperial parliament enunciating the principle that the colonies exercising the rights of self-government ought to undertake the responsibility of providing for their own internal order and security and assisting in their own internal defence. This principle was embodied in the Naval Defence Act of 1865, which empowered colonial governments to provide men and vessels of war, the same to be available for service in the royal navy when an offer is made by the government of a colony to place them at the disposal of the imperial government.

The main objection of those who favour the attitude taken by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) is that the building of a Canadian navy will involve a heavy expenditure. This was the main argument of the hon. member for Soulanges (Mr. Lortie) who spoke to-night. Well, it is true that a Canadian navy will cost something. It is calculated that it will cost about three per cent of our revenue. But is that too heavy a price to pay for the protection of Canadian commerce and the maintaining of our position in the British empire? Should the policy advocated by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) prevail, that would in all likelihood involve separation from the empire; and then, if Canada were independent or became part of the United States, the burden of the Canadian people for the purposes of naval defence would be much heavier than if she remained a part of the British empire.

In my opinion, if a consultation of the people were had on this Bill, the great majority in Quebec, as in the other provinces, would vote for doing something—either build a Canadian navy or give a contribution. The people throughout Canada understand their duty, and I do not think we need resort to a plebiscite to inform ourselves as to their views. The Canadian press is almost unanimous in advocating the building of a Canadian navy or doing something to help the mother country by way of gift or contribution; and the representatives of the people in this House have duties to perform, the most important of which is to provide for the safety, peace and good government of this country. We do not need to ask people for advice in these matters. Great questions have been decided before and important steps taken in the political history of our country without any resort to a plebiscite. When the Canadian militia was established in 1868, there was no plebiscite. Before the various Canadian provinces went into confederation, there was no plebiscite to ascertain whether the people in each province were in favour of that change.

We also have the objection raised that in this country we are not able to build a navy; and those who raise that objection are not the ones who are in favour of the statu quo but are those who want to make a gift or contribution to the mother country. For my part I think that the hon. members who raise that objection cannot have much pride or confidence in their own country or the capabilities of our own people. To decide whether our people have the ability to organize a Canadian navy, we need only study history. Take the great works which have been built in this country. Take the building of the Canadian Pacific railway, the Grand Trunk railway, the Intercolonial, the Canadian Northern and the Transcontinental, take our Canadian banking and insurance systems and the development of our other great enterprises—all these bear testimony to the ability of Canadians to manage their own affairs and build their own industries. The hon. member from North Ontario (Mr. Sharpe) said he would be in favour of the government policy if two Dreadnoughts were added to the ships to be built. Well, in that respect I differ from him; but if there are other ships to be built than those proposed by the government, I would like these to be merchant ships. I believe that these should be built as a corollary to our war vessels. They would carry food to the British navy in time of war, free of cost, and have in this way real commercial value. They would afford also training to our seamen in the art of peaceful trade; and if we should build these ships to carry Canadian cereals, meats and dairy products for the consumption of the imperial navy, we would relieve Great Britain's burden, build up a mercantile marine, and remove competition from Canadian farmers in the markets of the world. Canada's reputation and self-respect would best be maintained, so long as she remains within the empire, by continuing to control her own national politics. Australia and New Zealand are doing this, South Africa is also doing it, each part of the empire is doing it in its own way, and is thereby best promoting its own national strength. Mr. Goldwin Smith is reported to have said:

If Canada has a navy, it will be necessary to determine very clearly with whom rests the declaration of war.

This is what seems to worry the hon. member for St. Anne, Montreal, who spoke the other day. The existence of a Canadian navy will not in any way affect Canada's liability to be involved in British wars. Whether we have a navy of our own, or pay the British government for our protection, or continue to pay nothing for naval purposes, so long as Canada is part of the British empire it will be liable to attack by any nation with which Great Britain is at war, and we may be sure that the enemy would not hesitate to strike that part of the empire which was most vulnerable and least prepared for war. But when Canada shows its willingness to bear a fair share of the defence of the empire, the King will not, if he wishes to secure the co-operation of Canada, agree to a declaration of war without consulting the government of Canada. Mr. Speaker, I will not delay the House any longer. I will conclude by stating that I am opposed, both to the amendment of the leader of the opposition, and to the amendment to the amendment of the member for Jacques Cartier; I shall have much pleasure in voting for the policy of the government and in doing so I think I am acting in the best interests of my constituents.

Mr. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Portage la Prairie). In rising to address the House at this hour it is not my intention to discuss the motion of the Prime Minister, nor yet the amendment offered by the leader of the opposition. Out of deference to the wishes of hon. gentlemen present, I shall refrain from offering any reason, and shall give a silent vote to-night in respect to these two propositions. However, circumstances have convinced me that I should not give a silent vote in respect of the amendment to the amendment offered by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk). That hon. gentleman proposes that the Bill before the House should be referred to the people by a plebiscite and that their judgment on the naval policy of the government should first be obtained. There are some who think that a proposal couched in terms similar to the terms of that amendment ought to be supported by those who favour the principle of responsible government, and of keeping close to the people in all matters of legislation, and there may be some who will argue that those who vote against that proposal are not in favour of trusting implicitly the electors of this country. From both propositions I dissent. There is no one who values more highly than I do the necessity of this House standing in all matters of legislation close to the people. I am not one on the other hand who would say that there are not times, and perhaps the present is such a time, when matters of fundamental importance should before going into effect be referred to the people to ascertain their will. I cannot agree with those who have argued on the other side of the House, that at the proper time, and under proper circumstances it is not incumbent on us, before launching legislation of this character, first to appeal to the people in a constitutional way. Particularly I cannot agree with the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence when he argued strenuously sometime ago that there was absolutely no precedent for referring to the people a proposition such as is embodied in the amendment of the leader of the opposition. Permit me to quote a few sentences from the speech of the Minister of War, from which I must dissent. He first quoted these words of the leader of the opposition:

No permanent policy should be entered upon involving a future expenditure of this character until it has been submitted to the people, and has received their approval.

Commenting upon these words of the leader of the opposition, the Minister of Militia used the following language:

I will venture to say that no such misconstruction of responsible government was ever heard in a British parliament. The people sent us here for the purpose of dealing with all important public questions. Is it to be said that every time an important question comes up we shall go back to the people, particularly after parliament has unanimously agreed to a certain line of policy?

Those words were uttered by the Minister of War on the 10th of February last. Now, Sir, I contend, in contravention of that position, that this parliament has already sanctioned that principle, and that particularly the Minister of War has affirmed the very principle that he now so loudly denounces. I refer to a motion which was offered in this House in 1881 on behalf of the party which now sits opposite to us, which was couched almost in the same language as that of the resolution of the leader of the opposition. Speaking in the House of Commons in 1881, Sir Frederick Borden himself stated that in his opinion before the Canadian Pacific Railway Bill passed this House, it would be well for the government to appeal to the people. Mr. Béchard, then a member of this House, and a supporter of the Liberal party, moved the following resolution, to be found on page 712 of the 'Hansard' of 1881:

The contract should not be ratified until after the people have had an opportunity of expressing their opinion through the medium of a general election.

This very principle is embodied in the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition in this debate. Not only was that principle so embodied at that time, and made a part of the policy of the Liberal party, but the very members of the government who to-day denounce this principle as unprecedented, as a monstrosity on responsible government, spoke in favour of it, and supported it by their votes. Mr. Béchard, whose words must be taken to represent the sentiment of all those who favoured his motion, used the following language:

I contend this whole subject should be laid before the people for their decision at the polls. The ground on which I base my contention is that in a question of such great consequence for the weal or woe of the country, the people should have an opportunity of pronouncing on this new policy and scheme submitted by the government. True, this Pacific railway question has been before the people for years, and that it has been the settled policy of the country to build a road connecting the eastern with the western provinces, and that this road should be continued to the Pacific coast; but it is equally true that the policy now before us to attain that end is completely new to the people.

Those were the words expressed by Mr. Bechard in which every member of the government who was then in the House concurred. He went on to say:

We do not know what is the real sentiment of the people at present with reference to this scheme. . . . I believe it is difficult for any one of us to say what is the real sentiment of the people with regard to the question, and I think that the only way of ascertaining it would be an appeal to the judgment of the people.

And, Sir, with those words, with the resolution that those words supported, the hon. the Minister of Militia in this House concurred, he voted in favour of that resolution, and so did the following gentlemen who are now members of the government: Sir Frederick Borden, Sir Richard Cartwright, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and the hon. William Paterson. So that when these gentlemen now come before us, and vote against the amendment offered by the leader of the opposition they vote not only that they have changed their policy, but that they have fundamently altered the whole principle of policy on which they act.

Having said that much, I have affirmed that at the proper time, and place it is not only right, but the bounden duty of this House before fundamentally altering the constitution of this country at all events first to give to the people an opportunity of expressing their views. Notwithstanding I find it impossible for me viewing the situation as I do to support the amendment offered by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk). In the first place, I must decline to vote for that amendment, because I conceive that before we appeal to the people on any question we must first assert our own position on that question. I believe that we have a delegated duty, and the responsibility is on us to say, yes or no, on every proposition that comes before this House. Having said that the situation may be changed, but we cannot until we vote unload that responsibility on our constituents or on the people of this country. That is the principle of responsible government as I understand it. I say that with all deference and respect to those who view the situation differently. If that reason stood alone, if I conceived that I must first cast my vote or I refuse to discharge the sacred responsibility that is on me, and if, on that ground alone, I had to stake my position, and my vote, I should have to decide to vote against the amendment offered by the member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk). But, I have other grounds to offer. In the second place, viewing as I do the usage of parliament, conceiving an amendment to an amendment, to a motion to mean a negativing of the amendment itself, I cannot on that ground support the amendment to the amendment. I may be wrong in that view, but, inasmuch as I find, and I believe it to be my duty to my constituents in order to represent their views to support the amendment offered by the leader of the opposition, I feel that I cannot vote for any amendment to that amendment, because in doing so, in my view, I offer a prefernce over the amendment of the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden). That I refuse to do to-night. If those two stood alone, I conceive I would be well fortified in the position I take in voting against the amendment of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk). But there is an additional reason. I do not conceive it to be so powerful or so controlling as either of those I have advanced. The member for Jacques Cartier advanced reasons which led him to make that amendment, and he uttered sentiments which not only can I not endorse, but from which I must dissociate myself as clearly, distinctly and firmly as I can. I do not contend that those who feel it their duty to support that amendment necessarily associate themselves and necessarily affirm the principles, and sentiments uttered by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, but so utterly diverse were they from those which I conceive on subjects that to me are of more than ordinary consequence that I cannot divorce myself too far from, or too strongly state, and too clearly indicate to my constituency, and to this country that I disaffirm his position utterly. I refer not to all that was said by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, but chiefly to the sentiment wherein he called in question, and in my view laid at the door of British diplomacy a charge of treachery to this country. In so far as his utterances on that subject were concerned, I must do everything in my power to dissociate myself from any sympathy with them. Therefore, on the main ground that it would be in my mind placing myself in the position of truant to the trust which a great constituency has reposed in me, I refuse to vote for the amendment to the amendment offered by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk). I refuse to place myself in a position which I conceive to be rebellion to a great trust imposed so.

Having disposed of my own position, having without fear, and without hesitation, and after such careful consideration as in my view the serious consequences, the great import of this question demands of every member, having discharged to the best of my ability the duty that I believe rests on me, then, Sir, the situation is changed, but for the present I cannot believe under our form of government, under the plainest rules, at all events, rules that are more than plain to me, I cannot conscientiously or fairly or consistently support the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. THOS. MACNUTT (Saltcoats). There is little new that I can add to this debate, and I intend to be very brief. I believe we are safe in assuming that the empire will be threatened with war at some time or other. The natives are arming and the millennium has not yet arrived. Great Britain has been in the past, and is at the present time, well prepared to defend herself. While her colonies were growing, she in effect, said to them: Go on and get strong, we will protect you, and when you do get strong we expect you to do a little to assist in the general defence of the empire. The question is: What is Canada going to do? I do not think that Canadians intend to take the stand of sheltering themselves behind the guns of Great Britain or the Monroe doctrine any longer. I think they realize that it is up to them to do something to assist in the defence of the empire. What line should they take? There are three propositions before the House. The first is that we build a Canadian navy. Some hon. gentlemen opposite describe this as a tin-pot navy, but if it is there are many units of navies connected with other nations that might be so described. It will be, as I understand, allied with the British navy, and prepared to take its part in co-operation with the British admiralty. I am no naval expert. Although this debate has developed a great many naval experts, I do not pretend to be one of them. But, I have the opinion of some who are experts. I believe that the wars of the future will not be fought entirely with Dreadnoughts. There must be other war vessels as well. Trade routes, coaling stations, transportation and lines of communication must be protected. This will be done, not by Dreadnoughts, but by fast sailing cruisers, and the government of Canada intends by this Bill, which will no doubt be carried by this House, to create a navy of that description. It should be a proud day for Canada, if a war should unfortunately occur, when she is able to protect with her own fleet, the numerous vessels laden with Canadian wheat, flour and cattle, en route to the seat of war, without which England's Dreadnoughts would avail little, and thus maintain her identity as a self-supporting unit in the British empire.

Had the Canadian contingents been drafted amongst the British troops in the South African war, Canada would have lost much of the prestige which was the result of the contingents being known as distinctly Canadian, and thus getting credit as Canadians for the good work done by them.

Taking the purely commercial side, the estimated cost per head of the present population would be about sixty cents per year, becoming less as the population increased, and the impetus that would be given to the ship-building industry alone should in itself commend the project to the people.

It has been said that some of the people of this country are not loyal. I believe that Canadians are more loyal in a way than the English people themselves. Their loyalty is in their bones. They may not give any reason particularly for it, but they feel it, they have shown their loyalty and they are prepared to continue to show it, and to sacrifice themselves, and even sacrifice their lives for their country if need be. I desire to call the attention of the House to a couple of clauses taken from the summary of the result of the Imperial Conference, and I think that the opinion here set forth is one which should impress the House:

> Taking, first, the plan for the expenditure of £600,000; after discussion the admiralty suggested that the Canadian government might provide a force of cruisers and destroyers comprising four cruisers of improved 'Bristol' class, one cruiser of the 'Boadicea' class, and six destroyers of improved river class. As regards sub-marines, it would be advisable to defer their construction because they required a highly-trained and specialized complement.
> The 'Boadicea' and destroyers might be placed on the Atlantic side, and the 'Bristol' cruisers divided between the Atlantic and Pacific ocean. The number of officers and men for this force of 11 ships would be 2,194, and the cost of the vessels suggested, including repairs and maintenance, interest and sinking fund on capital expenditure, and pay, &c., of personnel, at Canadian rates, would not, it was anticipated, exceed £600,000 a year.

That was the suggestion of the admiralty, and that is exactly what this government proposes. I understand that it met with the support of the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden), the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), and many others. I am a western man, and I do not know very much about what is going on in the east, but the first shot in the west that was fired with regard to this question was by the Hon. Robert Rogers, of Manitoba, in opposition to this plan, and it looks as if he had been able to force his views upon hon. gentlemen opposite, who have certainly reversed their policy in the last few weeks. There is something else that I would ask the permission of the House to read. It is the opinion of a gentleman who is a prominent Conservative, who was provincial treasurer of Quebec, and is president of the Montreal Conservative Club, Mr. Atwater, who says:

What the Englishman admires is a fellow who can stand up for himself, and what I found they admire in Canada is the effort she is making to build up a fleet of her own. They admire and respect the capacity of Canada and any nation or dependency to look after itself. Hitherto there has been a patronizing air about the English with regard to Canada, because they knew that if we got into trouble they would have to look after us, but if Canada gets her own navy and can look after herself that will all change. The sooner we get our own navy the better—it is a necessity that must come, and there is no use delaying it. We must look after ourselves in a naval way just as we do in military matters. There is no doubt that is the feeling amongst the English people, and they regard it as a matter quite outside the domain of party politics, as it should be.

So, said Mr. A. W. Atwater, K.C., ex-Provincial Treasurer, who returned on Monday evening from a two months' stay in England, during which he witnessed the general elections, and had ample opportunity to gauge public feeling on this and other important matters.

'The general opinion I got during my stay in England,' said Mr. Atwater, 'was that we should earn the respect of the people of the mother country more by showing our ability to defend ourselves than we could by any mere money contribution, unless it was to a very large amount and a permanent contribution. And that would not commend itself to many Canadians, nor could it be advocated by any party here. The opinion of all observers of imperial affairs was that they would have more respect for any portion of the empire which prepared to defend itself than for one which proposed to give a more or less—probably less—adequate sum towards the upkeep of the imperial navy.'

'And with this I quite agree,' said Mr. Atwater. 'As a matter of keeping our own self-respect, as well as the respect of the mother country, we should secure our own navy, and the sooner we get it in good working order the better. It will take a long time to do this, even with the assistance of England's enormous experience in naval affairs. And it seems to me that Canadians should join in this work irrespective of all party affiliations.'

This naval project, said Mr. Atwater, was attracting much attention in England, and the people there were struck with the idea of the overseas dominions building ships and manning them with their own crews for imperial defence. In just the same way the mother country was deeply impressed with the manner in which Canada and the other dominions sent their soldiers to fight in South Africa, where a mere money contribution would either have gone unnoticed, or been regarded as a pusillanimous manner of accepting the duty of defending the empire. Great Britain was very wealthy, and a contribution of even ten million pounds would be a mere matter of empire bookkeeping, and would not tend to reduce their taxation. But actual physical participation in the empire burden fired the British imagination, and excited their admiration.

I think, Sir, that the foregoing sizes up public opinion in the old country. There is one part of this Bill which strikes me as being of great importance and that is the provision for training ships and a naval college. We all know that the old time Jack Tar has to some extent lost his mission at the present day, when vessels are propelled by steam. There is no climbing aloft, the engineers and the stokers look after the propulsion of the vessels, and the sailors have simply to be fighting men who can handle the heavy artillery. The establishment of these training ships will enable a great many of our splendid sea-faring population to learn the duties on board a modern man of war, and in this way Canada ought to be able to provide a large and efficient body of men to man these ships. I should judge that in the old country they are not so anxious for vessels as they are for men, and in support of this opinion I quote from 'The Navy', the organ of the British Navy League, which in a recent issue says:

The shortage of men is very serious. Although nucleus crews are within the smallest possible limit, there were at the end of November but 1,600 men in Portsmouth naval barracks, including stokers under training. This is about one-third the requisite number. As the position of Portsmouth is in no way exceptional, and a similar scarcity of men prevails at Chatham and Devonport, it is obvious that even the 15,000 extra men spoken of would be scarcely adequate to the requirements of the moment.

This would indicate that the mother country would prefer men to a grant of money or even the buying of ships for the royal navy. What we want is to have the facilities for training our young Canadians on sea as well as on land, and the proposal of the government certainly gives an opportunity for this. The amendment of the leader of the opposition calls for a contribution to the old country which evidently the old country does not want very badly, and it also provides for a referendum to the people with regard to the navy. The amendment to the amendment calls for a straight referendum. Now, last election in my constituency I was in a peculiar position. I had two opponents, one a Conservative and one an independent. The policy of the independent candidate, who was a very respectable man, and who was endorsed by a newspaper edited by a clever writer, was in favour of the referendum, and although his party was well organized in the district, yet he received only 347 votes and lost his deposit several times over. In view of this I think I am free to say that the people whom I represent do not want a referendum, and if we are to accept that as a fair sample of public opinion in the other constituencies of the Dominion, the people of Canada generally are not in favour of the referendum. It stands to reason that if every time the government had constructive legislation before the House it was to be referred to the people there would be nothing but referendums, and as we have elections to the House of Commons about every four years, I think the people generally are pretty well satisfied with the constitutional machinery at their disposal. I feel that in voting for the Naval Bill as presented by the government I shall express the feelings of the people whom I was sent here to represent.

House divided on the amendment to the amendment (Mr. Monk).

Amendment to amendment negatived.

On the amendment of Mr. R. L. Borden,

Mr. WILLIAM THOBURN (North Lanark). Mr. Speaker, with your permission and the permission of the members of this House, I would like to offer a few remarks on this most important question. You will agree with me that the air of this chamber has been surcharged for the last two or three weeks with rumours of war, Dreadnoughts to the right of us, Dreadnoughts to the left of us, Dreadnoughts volleyed and thundered—that is, as far as the speeches of hon. members of this House are concerned. I have been much interested in what I have heard on both sides of this House. From some of the speeches made by hon. gentlemen opposite it is very difficult to understand just where they stand on this question. The hon. member for South Huron (Mr. M. Y. McLean) the other day spoke as follows:

I notice that in nearly every speech hon. gentlemen opposite profess disappointment with the provisions of the Bill now before the House, on the ground that it is not comprehensive enough, that it does not go far enough. I, too, am disappointed, but I am agreeably disappointed; for, I am free to confess, I did have a lingering fear, if I might so express it, that the government would ask this House to commit the country to an elaborate scheme requiring an immediate expenditure of millions of money which, I think, could be more profitably devoted to developing the latent resources of the country.

Now, how is it possible for the government to carry out their policy of expending five millions of money to build the navy they propose to build when the hon. gentlemen lives in constant dread of their spending any amount of money for such a purpose? The hon. gentleman went on to say:

I also believe that whatever we do should be done entirely in the interest and for the benefit of Canada, and not in a payment of any supposed debt which we owe the mother country.

Members on this side of the House have been accused of disloyalty. I fail to see where the loyalty of the hon. member comes in when he says that everything that is done should be done, not for the benefit of the mother country, but for the benefit of Canada. A few weeks ago, when one of the hon. members on the opposite side of the House was referring to the great benefit which Canada had received under the preferential tariff, I asked him what great benefit Canada had received from that. I thought the question was a proper one, to which I should have received a fair answer; but the answer I received was a story which the hon. gentleman told about a school house, where there was a hole in the wall and a flag was put up to hide the hole. I could not imagine why the hon. gentleman referred to that unless he felt like crawling into the hole instead of giving a straight answer to my question. But the hon. member for South Huron has answered that question better than I ever heard it answered in this House:

Now, Sir, I would like to bring the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite down from the realm of pure sentiment in which some of them so much delight to dwell, to plain facts, every day facts. If I can do this, they will find that Canada has never received one dollar from Great Britain for which she has not given a good big dollar's worth in return. It may be said, and it has been said in this House, that Great Britain furnishes us our best market for our surplus products. That is quite true, but it is equally true that this is a mutual obligation, because Great Britain requires our products just as much as we require her market. And she has never given us the fraction of a cent more for our products, for our apples, our cheese, our butter, our bacon, our bullocks, our cereals, than she could get them for elsewhere, or because they were Canadian. On the contrary, she has persistently, for years, maintained against this country a barrier to our live stock going into her markets. Now remember I do not blame her for this. If she considers such a policy in the interest of her own people she has a perfect right to pursue that policy, and we have no reason to complain. But what I want to point out is this, that Great Britain adopts the policy which she considers in the interest of her own people, irrespective of the results which it may have upon Canada; and so I say in that respect, as well as in every other respect we should follow her example.

I am glad to have such a frank statement from the hon. member for South Huron. When I think of the millions of dollars of textile machinery standing idle in this country and the thousands of people out of employment as the result of that preferential clause in our tariff, I say that the government should remedy this state of affairs in the interests of the workingmen of Canada, especially in view of the statement of one of their own loyal supporters that Britain has never given us a fraction of a cent more for our products than she has given any other country.

Some hon. members opposite have tried to lead the people of this country and Great Britain to believe that we on this side are opposed to granting any aid to the mother country in time of war. Such is not the case. The members of the loyal Conservative party in Canada are ready and willing to grant aid to Great Britain and grant it immediately if needed. I cannot understand why hon. members opposite should accuse hon. members on this side of not wishing to grant aid to Great Britain in time of need. I hold in my hand the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden) and I fail to see in it one word which would lead any one to accuse members on this side of not wanting to support the mother country in time of stress. I shall not take up time reading the whole of that amendment, but will just read one clause:

In the meantime the immediate duty of Canada and the impending necessities of the empire can best be discharged and met by placing without delay at the disposal of the imperial authorities, as a free and loyal contribution from the people of Canada, such an amount as may be sufficient to purchase or construct two battleships or armoured cruisers of the latest Dreadnought type, giving to the admiralty full discretion to expend the said sum at such time and for such purposes of naval defence as in their judgment may best serve to increase the united strength of the empire and thus assure its peace and security.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question.

Mr. THOBURN. I am not going to detain the House much longer, but hon. members opposite should remember that some of them have occupied the time of this House for three long hours, and for all the information they furnished this House or country they might have taken only a very few minutes. I hold in my hand a photograph of the latest war vessel added to the British fleet, and my blood warmed when I saw that photograph and compared that vessel with the type of vessel which hon. gentlemen opposite propose to build; and I thought it would be a credit to Canada if such a vessel were being built by this government instead of the little river boats they propose to construct. Let me give a description of this vessel in a very few words. Recently the new battleship of Dreadnought type, His Majesty's ship 'Vanguard', left Barrow amid a scene of great enthusiasm to go to Devonport. Her dimensions are: Length 500 feet; displacement, 19,250 tons, indicated horse-power, 24,500; speed 22 knots per hour, and she was built in a little over 19 months; and the thought occurred to me what a grand thing it would have been for Canada if that were Canada's tribute to the motherland, and if, instead of reading 'His Majesty's ship Vanguard', we could have read 'His Majesty's ship Canada'.

With the amendment of the hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden) I cordially agree. I stand by my leader on this great question. The great Conservative party of Canada stand by our leader on this question. More than that, I believe that the vast majority of the Canadian people stand by him.

My hon. friend from Haldimand (Mr. Lalor) expressed his sincere desire for peace between Great Britain and other nations. That desire I cordially endorse, and I do not know that I could do better on this occasion than repeat the statement made by His Most Gracious Majesty the King regarding peace throughout the world. I find in the English press, dated March 3rd, that at a reception to the Archbishops of York and Canterbury and the members of the convocation of each diocese, King Edward made some noteworthy comments on peace, in reply to the address presented to him.

Mr. NESBITT. I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman has no right to quote the King.

Mr. SPEAKER. It has already been ruled in the British House and in this House the other night that the name of His Majesty the King, or His Excellency the Governor General cannot be used in debate.

Mr. THOBURN. I can read the item without referring to the King.

Mr. SPEAKER. That would be an evasion. The practice has been not to allow any reference to any remarks by His Majesty.

Mr. THOBURN. Then I can express my own sentiments with reference to the matter. Your recognition of my efforts to maintain the peace of the world gives me pleasure.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. NESBITT. My point of order is that the hon. gentleman cannot refer to the King in the way he is trying to do.

Mr. THOBURN (reading):

Upon peace the health, happiness and material progress of all nations depend. It is my constant prayer that our country may be spared the perils and miseries of war, which, in this modern age, must involve the ruin of millions.

Mr. NESBITT. Mr. Speaker, I want a decision on my point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I understand the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) raises a point of order.

Mr. NESBITT. The hon. gentleman is still disobeying the rules, he is still referring to what the King has said.

Mr. SPEAKER. I understand the hon. member for Lanark to acquiesce in my ruling that the name of the King or his representative cannot be used in debate before this House, and therefore cannot be quoted. Any evasion of that rule is out of order.

Mr. THOBURN. I will accept your ruling. I did not know that it was out of order to quote what His Majesty had said at a meeting in reference to the peace of the world. I did not think that it would be objected to by any hon. member in this House.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

House divided on amendment (Mr. Borden).

Amendment negatived.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question is now on the main motion.

Mr. NORTHRUP. I rise to move an amendment to the motion before the Chair, but as the hour is so very late, and we have already had two votes, perhaps the leader of the House will consent to my moving the adjournment of the debate.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I had understood that it had been arranged between the whips that we would conclude this debate this evening, but if my hon. friend thinks he cannot do justice to his amendment to-night, we on this side of the House do not wish to curtail the freedom of debate and will consent to an adjournment.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On motion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier the House adjourned at 12.55 a.m. Thursday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, March 10, 1910.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 153) for the relief of James Albert Green.—Mr. Prowse.

Bill (No. 164) respecting the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada.—Mr. A. H. Clarke.

Bill (No. 158) for the relief of Ada Ann Green.—Mr. Nesbitt.

REPORT PRESENTED.

Report of the Hydrographic Survey in connection with irrigation works.—Mr. Oliver.

QUESTIONS.

LACHINE CANAL.

Mr. VERVILLE:

1. Is the government aware that on or about May 30, 1909, the alleged damages on the electric machinery at the Mill Street station on the Lachine canal, are said to have been caused by the incompetency of those in attendance, amounting from $500 to $600? If so, have many reports been made to that effect, and what is the intention of the government in respect of the responsible parties?

2. Is the government aware that the lights on the Lachine Canal have, it is alleged, in many instances, been put out on account of neglect of duty on the part of those in attendance?

3. Is the government aware that the men in charge of the dynamos in the same station are said to leave their work for hours during the nights when in charge?

4. What are the duties of Mr. Fitzpatrick, employed on the Lachine canal, how many hours overtime has he made during the fiscal year 1908-9, and what was the nature of his work?

5. How much money was spent by Dennis O'Brien for his transportation during the same fiscal year, and for what purpose?

Mr. NORTHRUP.

6. What is the salary of Cousineau and Brennan on the Lachine canal, their allowances, and what kind of work do they perform?

Hon. GEO. P. GRAHAM:

1. The engineer reported that two armatures of the old Thompson and Houston arc light dynamos had been burnt out during the past season of navigation, and the amount expended for repairing them was about $500. The accident was not due to the incompetency of Daley and Macey, but owing to the old and out of date system in use on the eastern section of the canal. It is contemplated, in the near future, to adopt the 3-phase alternating current system, which is now in use on the western end of the canal.

2. On some occasions the lights were out, but on every such occasion the engineer endeavoured to fix the responsibility upon the guilty party.

3. No, but a man named Lynch has been dismissed from the service for having left his post during the day time and allowing his generator to run without any one being in charge of it.

4. Mr. Fitzpatrick is employed on the Lachine canal as diver, but when not engaged in that capacity, he is called upon to assist other employees on the canal, viz.: storemen, carpenters, machinists. During the fiscal year 1908-9, he made 564 hours of overtime removing submerged obstructions from weir, gates, sluices, mitre sills, &c.

5. During the fiscal year 1908-9, Mr. Dennis O'Brien received the sum of $665.75 for visiting the different works on the canal, whenever necessary, at least twice weekly.

6. J. Brennan is employed as carbonman at $45 a month, and receives an allowance of $10 for transportation along the electric light line. J. Cousineau is employed as assistant lineman at the rate of $45 a month.

COMPANY PROMOTERS.

Mr. LEWIS:

1. Has the attention of the Minister of Justice been called to the recent revelations in the columns of 'Saturday Night,' of Toronto, regarding the manner in which the investing public has been victimized by company promoters?

2. Is it the intention of the government to introduce legislation which will safeguard the interests of the public as against the class of promoters referred to?

3. Will the government introduce legislation to prohibit the use of public subscriptions for promotion expenses, or in some other form put an end to the system by which the moneys of innocent investors are allowed to be gathered in by unscrupulous promoters, and expended without benefit to the subscribers?

4. With whom lies the responsibility for the prosecution of such individuals as have been exposed by 'Saturday Night,' as in the reported case of G. H. Munroe and other individuals of the same class?

Hon. A. B. AYLESWORTH:

1. Not otherwise than by seeing some of the articles referred to.

2 and 3. Some amendments to the Companies Act have been under consideration, but it is scarcely probable that legislation on the subject can be dealt with during the present session.

4. The responsibility for the prosecution of offences against the criminal law rests upon the authorities of the province, who are charged with the duty of seeing to the administration of justice in the province.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY SLEEPING CARS.

Mr. STANFIELD:

1. Are the two sleeping cars now in course of construction for the Intercolonial railway, under the contract with the Silliker Car Company of Halifax, to be paid for out of capital account or out of current revenue account?

2. If these cars are renewals and payable out of the revenue, why are they not being built by the railway authorities in the new shops equipped for construction work in Moncton?

Mr. GRAHAM:

1. Out of revenue equipment account, provided for out of revenue.

2. Owing to the fact that repair work accumulated somewhat, awaiting the completion and equipment of the new shops, it was thought advisable to devote all the energy of the staff for the present to placing the existing rolling stock in first-class condition.

MAILS IN COUNTY OF FRONTENAC.

Mr. EDWARDS:

1. Who has the contract for carrying the mail to and from Whitmount post office in the county of Frontenac?

2. What other post offices are on his route?

3. Is the service to Whitmount and the other post offices on the route a daily, triweekly or semi-weekly service?

4. What is the annual revenue of each post office on this route and what is the remuneration of the mail carrier?

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX:

1 and 2. Whitmount post office is served on Tuesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays by Howard M. Wenborn, contractor for the mail service between Kingston and Willetsholme. The other offices served by this contractor are: Willetsholme, Pittsferry, Eric and Barriefield. The contractor is paid $400 per annum. Whitmount is also served on Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays, by Thomas Driscoll, contractor for the mail service between D'Arcy and Kingston, during the time the ferry is in operation between Howe island and the main shore. The other offices served by this contractor are: D'Arcy, Howe Island, Eric and Barriefield. The contractor is paid $580 per annum.

3. The service of Whitmount is daily when the ferry is in operation and triweekly the balance of the year. Eric and Barriefield receive a daily service and D'Arcy, Howe Island, Pittsferry, and Willetsholme three times a week.

4. (a) D'Arcy, $12 revenue; Howe Island, $35 revenue; Whitmount, $36.08 revenue (11 months); Eric, $44 revenue; Barriefield, $251 revenue; Pittsferry, $53.70 revenue; Willetsholme, $61 revenue. (b) Included in answer to questions 1 and 2.

RAILWAY MAIL CLERKS.

Mr. SPROULE:

Referring to the report of the Civil Service Royal Commission, composed of J. M. Courtney, C.M.G., of Ottawa, Thos. Fyshe, Esq., of Montreal, and P. G. Bazin, Esq., of Quebec, which contains the following statement:—'Your commission have now to draw attention to a deserving body of men who carry on their work at great hazard to themeslves, namely, the railway mail clerks. A railway mail clerk suffers many hardships in his daily avocation. He is placed in a car next to the engine, although the vibration may be greater than it would be if the car were otherwise placed, yet the ceaseless strain in his daily work tends to the shattering of his nerves and leads to other physical defects. The commissioners recommend the the Railway Commissioners be authorized and requested to have plans prepared for proper standard mail cars to be placed on the several lines of railways in Canada,' has the government provided for carrying out that recommendation? If not, is it their intention to do so?

Mr. LEMIEUX:

The department, at a time considerably previous to the recommendation made by the commission in reference to mail cars, had approached the different railways in regard to improving the character and size of the cars in which the railway mail work is performed. All new cars are now built under the supervision of a departmental officer, who is thoroughly conversant with the requirements of the service both as regards size and equipment. No car is built by the railway without first notifying the department, so that they may receive the services of the above officer, and when finished, before being placed on the road, are inspected by such officer, and the department notified as to whether such cars are suitable or not.

NEW DEPARTMENTAL BUILDING.

Mr. MARSHALL:

1. Does the government intend to use Canadian stone in the construction of the new government departmental building on Sussex street?

2. Have the architects been instructed by the minister to specify Canadian stone?

3. If so, what kind of stone will be specified, sandstone, limestone or granite?

4. Will the plans be prepared by the government architects, or others chosen outside the government service?

5. When will tenders be called for the said departmental building on Sussex street?

Hon. WM. PUGSLEY. All these matters are under consideration.

THE NAVAL SERVICE OF CANADA.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the motion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier for the second reading of Bill (No. 95) respecting the naval service of Canada.

Mr. W. B. NORTHRUP (East Hastings). Mr. Speaker, any one who has observed the evolution of this Bill now before the House and has watched its history since it first saw the light on the 3rd of February last, must, I am sure, be convinced that at its conception some irate goddess was present to throw the apple of discord into Canadian politics. We have spent a considerable time in the discussion of the amendment, and of the amendment to the amendment, on the motion for the second reading of this Bill, and now that the decks have been cleared and both amendments disposed of, we are face to face with the Bill itself. I have no hesitation, Sir, in expressing my frank opinion that the measure at present before the House is one quite beyond the competency of this House to pass, and, I believe that if this House presumes to pass the present measure, and if the humblest township council in my constituency should the following day pass a by-law to repeal it, one enactment would be just as valid as the other, and each equally ridiculous. Of course it must be admitted that there are two views as to the position occupied by this House. On the one hand there is the view of the right hon. gentleman who leads the government, as laid down by him in addressing the Ontario Club in Toronto on the 5th of January last, and quoting from the 'Globe' of the 6th of January, I find that the right hon. gentleman stated his views with regard to the powers of this parliament in the following language:

> We are under the suzerainty of the King of England; we are his loyal subjects; we bow the knee to him, but the King of England has no more rights over us than are allowed him by our own Canadian parliament.

I quite admit, Sir, that if that view of the law is correct, then this Act is beyond question within the competency of this parliament. But, there is another view of the law, and I venture to say that this other view is held by every judge, every lawyer, every statesman in the empire with the single exception of the Prime Minister of Canada. It would be idle for me to occupy time here to-day to try to convince the members of this House that we are legislating here exclusively under the powers conferred on us by an imperial enactment passed by the parliament of the motherland. That which gives can take away, and however improbable it may be and however unfortunate the results might be if the imperial parliament were to repeal the British North America Act, still it is idle for any of us to pretend for a moment that the imperial parliament has not that power. If there were any doubt on the subject, it would surely be settled by the history of such questions as our Copyright Act, with regard to which it was held that this House had no power to pass legislation which was repugnant to legislation passed by the imperial parliament. Our courts in Canada have again and again held to the same effect. While some hon. gentlemen may think there is magic in the words 'exclusive right' in the British North America Act with regard to certain subjects of legislation conferred on this parliament, the courts of the land have held, and their decision has never been contested that when the word 'exclusive' is used in the British North America Act, it merely means exclusive as between this Dominion and the provinces. A certain amount of power is given to the Dominion exclusively, and certain other powers are given to the provinces exclusively, but over and above the exclusive powers of both this Dominion and the provinces of Canada is the paramount power of the imperial parliament to legislate on any question on which it sees fit to legislate. If there were any shadow of a doubt on this point, it would be set at rest by the Imperial Act of 29 Victoria, the Colonial Laws Validity Act, which provides:

> Any colonial law which is or shall be in any respect repugnant to the provisions of any Act of parliament extending to the colony to which such law may relate, or repugnant to any order or regulation made under authority of such Act of parliament, or having in the colony the force and effect of such Act, shall be read subject to such Act, order, or regulation, and shall, to the extent of such repugnancy, but not otherwise, be and remain absolutely void and inoperative.

Without occupying further time on this point, I submit that it is perfectly clear that the position taken by the right hon. the First Minister at Toronto on the fifth of January last is one that he would hardly care to defend on the floor of this House.

Then, if the other view be taken, that we are subject to the legislative powers of the imperial parliament, we are subject and bound in the same way that it is bound, with regard to one of the great sources of power, and that is the royal prerogative. There is sometimes a great deal said about the royal prerogative by those who, one is inclined to suspect, do not quite understand what it means. Those who have studied the subject know that the royal prerogative is not a matter of to-day nor of yesterday, but that in the dim and distant days of the past, before parliament was ever dreamed of, there was a mass of law, which, with the subsequent accretions, makes the common law of England to-day; and the executive officer who administered that law was the King, who thus acquired prerogatives; and to-day the King possesses every prerogative possessed by any King of England for the last thousand years, save and except so far as that has been limited by statutory legislation.

It may be said by some hon. gentlemen that we in this country have from time to time limited the royal prerogative, and so we have. We have limited it in the past and we can limit it in the future; but it depends altogether on what branch of the royal prerogative we propose to touch. The standard works on the royal prerogative point out that among the subjects to which it extends there are some which are local in England—for example, the power to pardon an offence. Similarly the exercise of the power of pardon in Canada is local, attached only to this country, and we have a right in the proper way to regulate the exercise of that prerogative—not by this House, but by the constitutional advisers of His Excellency in a manner with which this House has nothing to do. All that this House can do is to punish the constitutional advisers of His Excellency if they do wrong; but the power of pardon is altogether outside of the legislative branch of our system.

Then, there is another branch of the royal prerogative which extends throughout the whole empire, which is the basis of the empire, upon which it may be said that the empire rests. Surely it cannot be contended that this parliament has any power under the British North America Act to interefere with a prerogative which extends throughout the empire and is one of the foundation stones on which the empire itself rests. One has only to remember the situation of the King in olden days to see how this prerogative arose. The King lead his people to war, fought at the head of his people, often stained the battlefield with his blood, and consequently as the warchief of the people acquired certain prerogatives, such as the right to make war, the right to make peace, the right to make treaties, the right to send ambassadors to other countries; and there is nothing in the statute-book of Great Britain, and there can be nothing in the statute-books of this country, giving us the right to interfere with any of these prerogatives of the King.

Then, the king had other prerogatives acquired as the great landlord of the country. Among these was the right of forfeiture and escheat. An escheat arising within the bounds of Canada might be held, as it has been held by our courts, to be a colonial matter, and the Crown, as represented by the Lieutenant Governor of a province, might exercise that right. But it has been held, in a case in which an estate in England, belonging to a man residing in New South Wales, who had committed a felony, was forfeited to the Crown, that the Crown, as represented by the authorities in England, was entitled to a portion of the estate. The man went to New South Wales, and while there committed a crime, and the question was, how was his estate to be escheated, if at all? But the courts held, that inasmuch as the royal prerogative was not confined to the soil of England, but extended to wherever the flag of England floated, forfeiture in New South Wales was as complete as it was in England. So that unless we take the position that this parliament has a right to deal with matters which appertain to the royal prerogative applied to imperial matters we have a right to say that this Bill is ultra vires.

How am I justified in saying that this Bill deals with matters which can only be dealt with by the royal prerogative? Simply because if you look at the statute-book of England, you will fail to find one word that limits or fetters the royal prerogative with regard to control of the navy. The army and navy formerly stood on the same footing. The people of England for centuries have had such an inherent dread of the danger of a standing army to their permanent liberties, that they have always kept control of the army by legislation, so that even the Mutiny Act had to be passed every year. But the navy has always been the idol of the people of England, for they have felt that they owe their supremacy on the seas to the navy, and they have been willing to leave the control of it in the hands of the sovereign. A thousand years ago the king's prerogative extended to the navy to such an extent that he could levy a tax for its support. The old Saxon 'Chronicle' of 1008 tells us that Ethelred taxed every 300 miles of land with the cost of a ship. Later, in the days of the Plantagenets, when a navy was required by Richard, we find that some of the vessels were built and paid for out of the royal purse, which in those days was practically for the public, though they had no control over it. Many of the vessels of the royal navy, in those days, were mercenaries, hired and paid for out of the royal purse alone, and parliament never pretended in any way to interfere.

In the reign of Edward III., the Lord

High Admiral of England was appointed, and he continued until 1708, until the death of Prince George of Denmark, the last High Admiral. But his place was taken by the board of commissioners with the same power, so that practically, with only the difference of a change of name, the Lord High Admiral continued from Edward III., 1700, until the present day. Even in the days of the Spanish Armada, when the Crown rallied the ships to protect the land, it was the royal power that acted, and although there were 170 ships in the royal fleet at that time, only some 34 were actually vessels of the royal navy. The others were hired and paid for out of the royal purse. Thus the royal prerogative continued all down the line.

Coming to modern days, we find that the Board of Admiralty in England controls the navy. Whatever the Lord High Admiral did in days gone by, he does still, and parliament in no way interferes, except to furnish the funds for maintaining the navy, and leaves the control of the navy, as it always has been, in the hands of the sovereign. If there were any doubt about that, an Act was passed, 28 Victoria, to make better provision for the naval defence of the empire, and any pretense which this Bill has to validity at all must be based on the Act, 29 Victoria, and the Act of 1909 of the imperial parliament, which recognizes and is founded upon this Defence Act of 1865. What is the imperial statute of 1865 with regard to navies being founded by colonies? It is provided in the third section as follows:

> In any colony it shall be lawful for the proper legislative authority, with the approval of Her Majesty in Council, from time to time, to make provision for effecting at the expense of the colonies all or any of the purposes following:—First, for providing, maintaining and using a vessel or vessels of war——

That seems to be the object of this Bill.

> —subject to such conditions and for such purposes as Her Majesty in Council from time to time approves.

In this statute we have thus a clear and unmistakable expression of the opinion of the imperial parliament as to the rights which the colonies had regarding the founding of a navy. Then, in 1909, another Act was passed to amend the Act I have just read, entitled the Colonial Naval Defence Act of 1865, and I presume it is a fair conclusion to draw that, if after the excitement of last year, if after all the imperial conferences on the subject of defence, if after the famous resolution of the 29th March, 1909, had been submitted to the imperial authorities—if after all these the imperial parliament saw fit to pass an Act to give certain powers to the colonies, it is a fair presumption that the colonies would not have those powers if that Act had not passed. Otherwise, we must assume that the imperial parliament was ignorant of the laws they had adopted, and had passed a Colonial Defence Act for the purpose of giving the colonies powers they already possessed.

This Act of last year gives the colonies the power to provide that volunteers raised in the colonies shall form part of the royal naval volunteer reserve, so that the most important part of this Bill is clearly based on the imperial legislation of last session. I have contended that all along the line the sovereign, by his prerogative power is the commander of the navy. If we look at the British North America Act, clause 15, we find a significant expression used. The British North America Act does not profess to give any new powers to the King. It seems to follow in the footsteps of the famous statute of Charles II., which recognized the power the King already had; and so this section 15 of the British North America Act provides that the command of the navy shall continue in and be vested in the King. The clause is as follows:

> The command in chief of the land and naval militia and of all naval and militia forces of and in Canada is hereby declared to continue and be vested in the Queen.

There is no pretense that when the Act was passed the imperial parliament conferred on her Majesty any powers she did not at that time possess, and therefore, by the careful choice of language, instead of declaring that the power is vested in the Queen, the clause expressly says that it is hereby declared to continue, and be vested in the Queen. But perhaps more significant language in connection with that legislation is this. If we look at the preliminary draft of the union of the British North America Act colonies, in which practically everything was provided for with a few minor exceptions, we find the following:

> The command in chief of all armed forces raised in the united colony, or in any province, for service by land or by water, shall be vested in Her Majesty, Her heirs and successors.

So that this country apparently, in the first instance, had made a provision to give Her Majesty the command in chief of all our forces. But when the Bill came before the statesmen of the motherland, they struck out the clause conveying the idea that any new powers were conferred on Her Majesty, and they determined on a clause which said that the command shall continue to be, and is vested in the Queen. I do not wish to elaborate on that subject, but it does seem to me that when we find in England a total absence from legislation—because the only statute that will be found relating to the navy along this line at all is the famous statute of Charles

II., but that does not profess to confer any powers, because it is merely a declaratory statute declaring what the land of England always has been, and what I submit, it has been from that day to this—when we find a total absence of any legislation conferring new powers on the King, we may take it for granted that the command in chief of the navy was always vested in him. Perhaps a little light may be shed on this, if we look at the proceedings in a neighbouring colony. In Australia there was a movement to found a navy just as in this country. Without taking up time in going through the preliminary steps up to 1902, I may say that hon. members in this House are aware that in the imperial conference of 1902 the proposal was made that Australia should, as it were, go into partnership with the motherland in founding a navy, and the first step taken was this. An agreement was made between the office of the Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom, and the Commonwealth of Australia, and New Zealand, and that agreement was subject to ratification by the Commonwealth parliament, and it came before the Commonwealth parliament, and is embodied in the statute which I hold in my hand—a statute passed subsequent to the Colonial Conference Act, which provides that a colony can build, equip and maintain vessels subject to such conditions as Her Majesty in Council might approve. What did the Australian parliament do? I shall only read the preamble of their Act:

Having recognized the importance of sea power in the control which it gives over-sea communications, the necessity of a single navy under one authority, by which alone concerted action can be assured, and the advantages which will be derived from developing the sea power of Australia and New Zealand, have resolved to conclude for this purpose an agreement as follows:—

And that is the agreement under which Australia proceeded to found her navy.

The Australian Naval Defence Act was passed in the same session—statute 20 of 1903. There is a clause in that Act which has been referred to several times as showing that what the Australians have done is the same as we have proposed to do under this Bill—that is, in case of war, parliament has control of the vessels. Why, Sir, the clause in that Act does not relate to vessels at all, but relates to the forces. It provides that when the forces are called out, parliament must be notified. Here is the section:

53. In time of war, the Governor General may, subject to the provisions of this Act, place the defence force or any part thereof under the orders of the commander of any portion of the King's regular forces or the King's regular naval forces as the case may be.

The interpretation clause of the Act provides that the defence forces do not include vessels at all, but only men who have been enlisted, and who are serving in the Australian forces—not in reference to the navy itself, but merely a provision as to what they can do with the forces they have enlisted. Then, last session, the session of 1909, the parliament of Australia passed another defence Act, which is in addition to the one I have read which was amended in 1904. The defence Act of last session contains no provision of any kind about the ships, but only explains the powers of the government with regard to enlistment, training and discipline, after the men are enlisted. In that Bill, relating to naval and military defence, there is not a word about the navy. But another Bill was brought before the House, the Colonial Loan Bill, and that provides for the raising of a large sum of money—if I remember rightly $17,000,000. Under this Bill it is provided that the money is to be expended along the line of an agreement made last year between Australia and the imperial authorities. Now, if we look at the blue-book of last year, we shall find what the line taken there was as to the agreement between the colonies, and the motherland. After providing for the fleet unit, and other matters it says:

Further, as it is a sine qua non that successful action in time of war depends upon the unity of command and direction, the general discipline must be the same throughout the whole imperial service, and without this it would not be possible to arrange for that mutual co-operation and assistance which would be indispensable in the building up and establishing of a local naval force in close connection with the Royal navy. It has been recognized by the colonial governments——

That would include Canada, I presume.

—that in time of war the loyal naval forces should come under the general directions of the admiralty.

And so, Sir, the money which the Australian government has asked the people to borrow to establish their navy is to be spent along the lines of an agreement with the admiralty the words of which I have just read. Thus we find no authority from the sister colony to justify us in our contention that it is right and proper for Canada to have a navy of her own, which will help the imperial authorities in time of war, or which may decline to fight or run away and hide as parliament may decide.

I think I have shown that there is grave doubt as to the power of this parliament to pass this legislation. And if there is a shadow of doubt, I submit, it is the duty of the government to refer the matter to the Supreme Court, that there may be no possibility of conflict between us, and the motherland on so important a question. It is well known that the unfortunate rebellion which led to the loss of the thirteen colonies of America arose over the subject of defence. I can understand how delicate a position the home authorities would be placed in, if the navy which is provided for in this Bill were to be called into use for the purposes of the empire. I can understand the tremendous sensibility there would be on the part of the imperial authorities if they had to consider the veto-ing of such an Act, even if they thought it improperly passed, for fear they might in that way weaken the ties which exist between us, and the motherland. Therefore, I think I am justified in asking the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to submit the matter to the Supreme Court of this country, that it may be decided beyond peradventure that we have the right to do what no other colony has attempted to do, and what, unless this Bill is saved by some agreement between the government and the King in Council of which this House has no knowledge, is in contravention of the terms of the Colonial Defence Act of 1865.

Having said so much on the question of jurisdiction, another question naturally arises when one considers this Act—and I am, in the first place, looking at it as it presents itself to a person at first blush on the arguments used in its support when it was presented. So far as I am aware, none of the hon. members who have spoken on the Bill have touched the point I now wish to raise. On that point we in this country are in a position which is not altogether pleasant or satisfactory—the question of naturalization. I have here the Naturalization Act and also the Imperial Naturalization Act of 1870. But I suppose there is no doubt in the mind of anybody that the law is as I am about to state it—that Canada has no more power to naturalize a man and make him a British subject, except within the bounds of Canada itself, than has the city council of Ottawa. That is a serious matter, and yet the fact is beyond peradventure. A German comes here bringing his son with him and settles in the county of my hon. friend (Mr. Clare), who spoke so well yesterday, a county represented in part also by the Minister of Labour (Mr. King). Father and son become attached to this land and fulfil the conditions of our naturalization laws. If, in an unhappy hour, that which we hope may never occur, should occur and war should break out between Great Britain and Germany, then should these men volunteer in the Canadian navy and be unhappily captured by the German fleet, what would be their position—when put upon trial for their lives, not as belligerents, but as traitors? There is no question about it. They may come to Canada and be naturalized so far as men can be naturalized under our laws, but the only rights given under our laws are such as can be conferred within the bounds of Canada. It is true, the imperial authorities, as a matter of courtesy, of grace—purely a matter of courtesy and grace—are in the habit of issuing passports to Canadian citizens, whether they be such by birth or naturalization, under which they have the support of Great Britain in every part of the world—except, so far as foreign-born citizens are concerned, the land of their birth. That is, the very place where the man who comes here wants to be protected is the place where he cannot be protected. Would it be fair to have a Canadian navy under such conditions that, if we were at war and any man of foreign birth—for the same would apply in the case of the United States as I have just suggested in the case of Germany—were to serve in that navy, it would be under the conditions I have stated? Are we prepared to have a navy under such conditions that when the proclamation is issued for men to serve in it, we must say 'except Germans,' 'except Frenchmen,' except American'—in fact, limiting it to Canadians born? Yet, unless we are prepared to do that, is it right for the government to propose to set afloat a navy under such conditions that a man of foreign birth desiring to enlist and do his duty to the country of his adoption, must fight not as a belligerent, but as a traitor with the rope around his neck? I think that if one-tenth of the assiduity applied to other things had been applied by the government to obtaining for us in Canada the same rights that they have in Great Britain with regard to these foreigners we should have obtained those rights before now. For it is well known that every country the world over considers that when a subject is born in that land he is a subject to the day of his death, and his son after him also; and the reason for the difference in the rights of a German, for instance settling in Canada or England, is that the status of a German coming to England, and being naturalized, possessing all the rights of a British subject, and protected in those rights by the British government, is wholly owing to treaty. Are we to expect foreigners coming to this country to have a love for this country, to have an affection for this country and a respect for this country, when we ask them to fight on our navy in the position of felons with a rope about their necks? I believe that at this moment the people of this country recognize that the greatest problem we have before us is to assimilate the great population flowing into our northwest. We all recognize that no other country has ever had to face so difficult a problem as to take these immense hordes of people from different countries, born under different flags, coming into Canada and to assimilate them and make true Canadians of them; and I venture to say that the best way to make true Canadians of them is to raise their respect for Canadian citizenship and make them desire to possess it. But if we must admit that the Canadian naturalized foreigner is on a distinctly inferior position to the United States naturalized foreigner, then I am afraid we can hardly expect from these new-comers that respect for our country, that respect for Canadian citizenship, and that respect for the privileges of a British subject of this great empire, that we would love to instill into him. I hope the government will take this matter into consideration and impress it on the imperial authorities. If I understand aright Germany has given the same right to Great Britain that she has accorded to the United States, and the only trouble is that the power which extends this right of naturalizing subjects requires a residence of five years, in the adopted country, and we have not been willing to extend the term of residence in Canada to five years, and until we do that we shall be deprived of this boon. I think that even if the appalling result were reached that at the next election we should find that some of these aliens were unable to vote, even that would be compensated for by the fact that by the next election they would be full fledged British subjects with all the rights of any other British subject who lives under the flag.

Now, I will proceed to make a few remarks on the Bill introduced by the right hon. gentleman. I listened carefully to the right hon. gentleman's speech, I have since studied it very carefully, and while I admire its eloquence, while I could even be moved in some passages by its pathos, I must confess that even if I take a little more time of the House than some hon. gentlemen might be willing to accord me, I am only following in the foot-steps of the right hon. gentleman who in 26 columns of the Hansard', had only nine and a quarter that even remotely referred to any subject that could relate to the Canadian Naval Bill. What were the reasons given by the government for this Bill? Only three reasons can be found. I challenge any hon. gentleman to read the speech and find more than three reasons why this House should support the Bill. The first reason was that this House is already committed to the principle of the Bill by the resolution passed on the 29th of March, 1909. The second is that this Bill is carrying out the reform policy which has been laid before the people of this country in the last eight years and that this Reform government has been carrying out ever since; and the third is that the spirit of autonomy, which in some way floats about and appears to harass some of our members, compels us to pass this Bill. Beyond these three reasons, I challenge any hon. gentleman to find a reason advanced by the right hon. gentleman in moving this Bill, or any mandate from the people suddenly to plunge this country, not merely into an enormous expense—though that is the least objection—but to put this country in the position of entirely altering its relationship with the motherland and with the rest of the empire. And when we find gentlemen standing up in this House and deliberately telling this House that they support this Bill because it is the last step towards independence, I think we who are opposed to the Bill are justified in regarding it with very grave suspicion.

Now, as to the resolution of the 29th of March, of which we have heard so much, I am afraid that in what I have to say I may be standing alone, differing from both sides of the House. But I wish to speak impartially, I wish to speak intelligently, and I hope that hon. gentlemen will do me the justice of listening carefully to the point I wish to make. In this famous resolution there are four clauses. As to three of them I will say nothing, because I am not aware that any member of this House to-day differs from the sentiments expressed in three of the clauses. But the one which the government relies upon as a justification for this Naval Bill is the one to which I would like to call attention, and I would ask members of this House to consider, not as a matter of politics at all, for there are no politics in the view I am taking of it now, but merely as a matter of the intelligent use of the English language. I would like to ask hon. gentlemen to read that clause and tell me what it means. It evidently is not perfectly clear, it is not a lucid clause, because the right hon. gentleman considers it means one thing, and the leader of the opposition considers it means an entirely different thing; and when we find two gentlemen of their ability agreeing that it is at all events susceptible of two meanings, there is some justification for going a step further and saying that if it does not mean what the right hon. gentleman says, nor what the leader of the opposition says, then it does not mean anything under heaven that anybody can see. That may seem a preposterous statement, but it is the simplest thing to prove, if people would only come down from the consideration of matters beyond the jurisdiction of this House to a few words in an English sentence. We will try and see what it does mean. This is the clause:

This House will cordially approve of any necessary expenditure designed to promote the organization of a Canadian naval service.

I will stop there for a moment. Now, is there any doubt about the meaning of that? This House will cordially approve of any necessary expenditure designed to promote the organization of a Canadian naval service. That might have two meanings. The words 'Canadian naval service' might refer only to this naval militia, which is to be a part of this Bill, or it might include vessels as well as militia. But when we go further in the clause and find that it is to be along the lines of the admiralty plan, then these words must mean that the House will approve of the necessary expenditure to promote the speedy organization of a Canadian navy; and I think that is a fair rendering of these words. Now let us read further:

A Canadian naval service in co-operation with and in close relation to the imperial navy.

These words are clear enough, surely 'In co-operation with and in close relation to the imperial navy.' Now, no navy can co-operate with itself, no navy can be in close relationship to itself; therefore it is clear that these words signify a Canadian navy as distinct from the imperial navy. I think there is no question that is the fair meaning of the words; inasmuch as no navy can co-operate with itself, there must be two navies. We have two navies, one imperial, under imperial control, and the other under Canadian control. What comes next?

In co-operation with and in close relation to the imperial navy, along the lines suggested by the admiralty at the last imperial conference.

Let us see what were the lines suggested by the admiralty at the last imperial conference. If we look at the blue-book of the imperial conference held in 1907, which was the last one when this resolution was passed, at pages 129 and 130, we will find what the idea of the imperial conference was. Lord Tweedmouth laid down his views:

I have here drawn up a short statement of what may be called the general principle with which the admiralty desire to meet the representatives of the self-governing dominions of the King beyond the seas.

His Majesty's government recognize the natural desire of the self-governing colonies to have a more particular share in providing the naval defence force of the empire—

And observe this:

—and, so long as the condition of unity of command and direction of the fleet is maintained, they are ready to consider a modification of the existing arrangements to meet the views of the various colonies.

So long as the condition of unity of command and direction of the fleet is maintained. We have our two navies provided for, the imperial navy and the Canadian navy along the lines laid down by the admiralty, and the admiralty lines are that there must be one navy, because there must be unity of command and a common direction. So, we have the navy carefully provided for, and in order that it might have meant something, I think it would have been well if the resolution had gone a little farther and said that the navy should always sail due north by due south. It would have been just as reasonable as the kind of language that appears there, because those two clauses are absolutely contradictory of each other, and it will be absolutely impossible to carry them into effect. There are a few more words which will perhaps help us. I have not the slightest doubt that they had a great deal of weight with hon. gentlemen opposite and with the country. In the resolution of the 29th March, 1909, there are the concluding words. This is a navy which was to be under Canadian control and subject to unity of command and the direction of the admiralty, and in addition we find in the resolution which was passed last year that it is to be:

In full sympathy with the view that the naval supremacy of Great Britain is essential to the security of commerce, the safety of the empire and the peace of the world.

Are not these words enough to bring tears to one's eyes? They would, if they meant anything, but like the rest of the clause they do not mean anything. Suppose His Imperial Majesty the Kaiser of Germany were reading this resolution of the 29th March, would he not be quite willing to subscribe to it? He might say that he was in full sympathy with the declaration that the naval supremacy of Great Britain is essential to the security of commerce. He might not want the commerce of Great Britain to be secure, but he could assent to the proposition that the supremacy of the navy of Great Britain is essential to the security of her commerce. He would agree as every one does that the navy is essential to the safety of the empire. If he did not want the peace of the world, if the peace of the world that he wanted, was a peace spelled in a little different way, he might take the words in this general high-flown proposition to mean just as much, and no more, as those which are to be found in the rest of this clause. So, we find the government in this position: They have this resolution passed by this House, and they go over to the old country and tell the authorities there that they are going to have a navy based upon that resolution, which being an absolutely meaningless resolution, leaves them in a position to do nothing or to do anything as they see fit.

One word more as to this resolution of the 29th March. I was one of those who were not present in the House on that night, and I have never considered myself bound by that resolution, not that I care particularly, because the other three clauses are absolutely unobjectionable. I do not think anybody would dissent from them, while this clause I have just quoted is absolutely meaningless. If it had undertaken to endorse the principle of A, B, C, D, and so on to the end of the alphabet, it would have been just as effective. This resolution was brought up on the 29th March, which was a private members' day. The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) introduced this resolution on a private members' day, at a time which many hon. members of this House did not think was altogether the proper time for that debate. It was within his rights as a private member to introduce it if he saw fit. But, in introducing it, he was careful to explain that this was a subject which should be kept outside of party politics. The right hon. leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) assented to that proposition. He, too, was quite willing that this question should be kept outside of party politics, as was said to be the case in England. Those who differed from him, those who wished to see a different kind of resolution adopted by the Canadian parliament, thought it would be a most unfortunate time to divide the opinion of this House, the German scare being then on the horizon, and when individuals were discussing a motion brought in by individuals upon a subject which was declared not to be political, but outside of party politics, it was thought wiser to allow those gentlemen to settle their motion in any way they liked, and those gentlemen only who were in the House when that motion was passed would be bound by it. To show the soundness of that position, let me give you this illustration. Would any hon. gentleman sitting behind the right hon. leader of the government, or sitting behind my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, be prepared to put his conscience into the hands of his leader and say to his leader: I agree to any proposition that you may agree to in the absence either of a convention or a caucus? Would any hon. gentleman place his conscience so fully in his leader's hands that he would accept and vote for any proposition no matter what it was about, that his leader should assent to? There would be very few members of this House who would be prepared to go as far as that. Unless a member is prepared to go to that length he could not possibly have any justification for saying that any member who was not present when that resolution was assented to should be bound by it. Late that evening the hon. gentleman who spoke last on the other side of the House, in the exercise of his legal rights, and I am finding no fault with him, addressed the House in the French language. Without the least disrespect to the hon. gentleman who so spoke, because he had a perfectly legal right to take the course that he did take, it is hardly reasonable to expect that an hon. gentleman who did not understand that language which was spoken after eleven o'clock at night should be listening to words that were wholly foreign to his ears. Therefore, as a matter of fact, on this occasion, practically all the members were outside of the Chamber believing that they could do no possible good if they were in the House. Suddenly the bell sounds, the House is adjourned and it is announced that the resolution is agreed to. The fact is that a large number of the members of this House had no more to do with that resolution than the Shah of Persia, because they neither discussed nor assented to it. So much for the first ground taken by the government that this Bill should be carried because it is in pursuance of the resolution of the 29th March. Then, the next ground taken by the right hon. leader of the government was that this Bill was in pursuance of the policy which was laid down by the present government eight years ago and faithfully adhered to ever since. Not only had it been adhered to for some years, but the suggestion was made to the House that Robert Baldwin. and Louis Hippolyte Lafontaine were in some way or other interested in this policy, as it had been the policy of the party ever since its formation, and those who followed then were bound to assist in carrying through this Bill. As a matter of fact this has not been the policy of the government for eight years. Eight years ago these conferences commenced by the invitation which came from Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, then colonial secretary, to Lord Minto at that time Governor General of Canada. Similar invitations were sent to the other colonial dominions beyond the seas and they were cheerfully assented to by all these dominions except Canada. Canada sent a reply, which I shall not take the time to read unless my version of it is disputed, that Canada was getting along very comfortably, that there were no questions to discuss except trade questions, and it would be idle to spend time in discussing the problem of defence, as the colonies could not possibly agree. Then. again in 1902, the right hon. the leader of the government undertook to send a Canadian representative to England to discuss the question, but this certainly did not commit the government to anything like the policy we have before the House now, because all Canada said at that time was that she had been doing about all she could afford to do. This was contained in the paper read before the conference of 1902:

At present Canadian expenditures for defence services are confined to the military side. The Canadian government are prepared to consider the naval side of defence as well. On the sea coasts of Canada there is a large number of men admirably qualified to form a naval reserve, and it is hoped that at an early day a system may be devised which will lead to the training of these men and to the making of their services available for defence in time of need.

There is another clause, but it really goes very little farther. The whole point was that Canada had some good material in the way of men which might be utilized in the navy, and that Canada was perfectly willing to assist in developing this raw material. This was in 1902, but nothing was done until 1907. The government had consistently shown their unwillingness to do anything from 1902 to 1907. Now, we have the conference of 1907 and what was done there?

I do not wish to occupy the time of the House reading; every one who has read the blue-book will remember the rather humiliating spectacle Canada presented at that time. There they had the statesmen from all parts of the empire, they had statesmen from the land under the southern cross and from the South African veldt, from the ancient colony of Newfoundland and from little New Zealand, and they were all anxious to contribute and to add to their contributions. At that time Australia was giving £200,000 a year to assist the empire, little New Zealand was giving £40,000, Cape Colony was giving £40,000, Natal was giving £35,000, and tiny Newfoundland, £3,000; in all £328,000 per annum was being paid by other colonies for the upkeep of the navy, and Canada was contributing not one copper. But it would seem that our Minister of Marine was a little ashamed of that, for he made a speech in which he explained that Canada had been doing a great deal. Why, he said: we have been looking after the fisheries—which is perfectly true, of course; we have been looking after the fisheries for our own benefit, because it paid us to look after the fisheries, and we would be foolish spendthrifts if we did not do so. And our Minister of Marine said: We have been doing some hydrographic work, and incurring expenditure in wireless telegraphy, and he told them we had an armed vessel on the lakes; a one-armed vessel I should imagine. And our Minister of Marine gave these expenditures as a justification why Canada should not do anything at that time. And, after these men from all parts of the empire, burning with zeal for the empire, all inspired with the same idea of doing something to maintain the supremacy of the empire, every colony but Canada recognizing its obligations and wishing to fulfil them; after that conference had discussed this question day after day, then at last in utter despair, when no motion could be passed to meet the approval of Canada, one was brought up by Dr. Smartt, and I will read it, and I will ask any gentleman on the other side of the House who is prepared to support this Bill: how he can look any one in the face and say that the government of Canada was right in opposing Dr. Smartt's motion, and at the same time is right in to-day bringing down the Bill which we have before us. This is Dr. Smartt's motion, and I suppose a more inoffensive motion was never moved in any deliberative body:

That this conference, recognizing the vast importance of the services rendered by the navy to the defence of the empire and the protection of its trade, and the paramount importance of continuing to maintain the navy in the highest possible state of efficiency, considers it to be the duty of the dominions beyond the seas to make such contribution towards the up-keep of the navy as may be determined by their local legislatures—the contribution to take the form of a grant of money, the establishment of local naval defence, or such other services, in such manner as may be decided upon after consultation with the admiralty and as would best accord with their varying circumstances.

Could any body ask for a more inoffensive motion than that? It was greeted with applause by all the representatives from all parts of His Majesty's dominions except the Dominion of Canada, and the Prime Minister of Canada replied:

I am sorry to say, so far as Canada is concerned we cannot agree to the resolution.

There was some discussion, and at last Dr. Smartt said:

Dr. SMARTT. I think it is a great pity we do not pass something. We have done so much in the way of pious affirmation, that I am anxious we should do something of a practical character.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. It can be passed if there is a majority. For my part I must vote against it.

Sir JOSEPH WARD. To do any good we would require to be unanimous about it.

Dr. SMARTT. Yes, I suppose so.

Mr. WINSTON CHURCHILL. It is not much good to have a resolution at all if we cannot be unanimous.

The CHAIRMAN. I think we had better not proceed any further just now.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. We, of the different dominions beyond the seas, have tried to be unanimous up to the present time. I am sorry to say this is a question upon which we could not be unanimous. Therefore, Dr. Smartt can move it if he chooses or withdraw it, but if he presses it I should have to vote against it.

And so this government comes before this House to-day with a naval defence scheme which they say is the honest, faithful policy they have adopted and carried out for eight years, is the very government that in the year 1907 voted against any contribution even in a form that would be agreed upon by the local legislatures. And, Mr. Speaker, if we go back a little further we will find the impression made on the authorities of the motherland by the representatives of the Dominion of Canada. I submit it to the members of this House, who, however we may differ in our political opinions, should at least be equally possessed of self respect and pride, and I would like to ask the members of this House if there is a man on either side of the House who can feel his cheek flushed with honest, loyal, just pride when he hears the opinion of the Dominion of Canada expressed by Lord Tweedmouth at page 420 of the conference report, 1907. Lord Tweedmouth said:

> There is at present no proposition from Canada to make any change at all.

We were not doing anything, we never had done anything, we were the only one of all the over-seas dominions that had not done anything, and strange to say all these that had been doing something were ready to add to what they had been doing, even down to little Newfoundland, but Canada was the only colony which wished to do nothing in the future, just as she had done in the past. Lord Tweedmouth continued:

> But I think it is proposed that matters shall go on very much as they have gone on—

And here is where Canada shines:

> —except that the Canadian representatives announce that they are anxious to do all that they can to expand the interests of the navy throughout the dominion, and in that way think that they will be really giving a great help to the empire as a whole.

That was to be the contribution of Canada to the upkeep of the navy; that was to be the contribution of Canada towards the supremacy of the greatest empire the world has ever seen and which every one recognizes depends for its existence on the navy. The contribution of the largest and the richest and up to late days the proudest of all the over seas dominions was that we were anxious to do all we could to expand the interest of the navy throughout the Dominion. I sincerely hope that the right hon. gentleman will not any longer continue the policy which he says he has followed for the last eight years. If this which I have just read is to be the result of the impression as to his policy made on the minds of statesmen in other parts of the empire, then the sooner the right hon. gentleman changes his policy the better. In 1909, another conference was held, but I shall say nothing about that further than to mention that in this conference the delegates from the various parts of the empire found that the same difficulty existed which then existed in 1902. The papers are not as voluminous concerning this conference, for instead of giving us a shorthand report of the conference of 1909 as in 1907 and 1902, only a summary is given, and one can quite understand that the statesmen at the head of the empire, knowing that countless millions of youths were growing up in different parts of the empire whose minds they wished to be filled with patriotic loyal sentiments as they grew up, prefered that no more literature of the stamp of the report of the 1907 conference should be put in the hands of these British youths. But this does appear from the 1909 conference: that while all the other dominions were all willing to do something, and Australia was taking steps to furnish the unit that was desired by the British admiralty, there were two things agreed upon by the admiralty and insisted on again and again and again, viz.: if you are going to build a navy start with your Dreadnought and Indomitable, because they are the only ships that by themselves are of any use, the others being to support them, and for a different purpose altogether—while the admiralty insisted on a Dreadnought or an Indomitable being the nucleus of a navy, and while they insisted on unity of command, and that the admiralty must have control, Canada refused both of the essentials that the admiralty requested. And so to-day we stand, with this Bill, in the humilating position of being compelled to admit that the admiralty has not asked us for one single thing along the lines of naval development which we have given them, and that as a matter of fact we have given them the very things they do not want. The right hon. gentleman will hardly claim it, I think, as a faithful honest following out of the policy he says he has pursued for the last eight years, and if it is, in view of what we have seen I would be inclined to think that the sooner we drop that policy and adopt a new one the better.

But, the right hon. gentleman seemed to enthuse his supporters with the recollection that the spirits of Robert Baldwin and Louis Lafontaine were looking down upon them. And who were Robert Baldwin and Louis Lafontaine? They were, I should have thought about the last men in this world or the world beyond that the right hon. gentleman would refer to. The memory of these two statesmen, in the opinion of gentlemen on this side of the House, is held in reverence, and I cannot do better than to quote the opinion of Robert Baldwin given by Sir John A. Macdonald who certainly was head of the Conservative party in his day, and who, when Robert Baldwin retired from public life—and there could be no question that he was trying to get rid of an opponent—offered him the chief justiceship of the Court of Common Pleas in the province of Ontario, and spoke of him as 'that loyal honest-minded soul Robert Baldwin, of whom I always love to speak'. That is the opinion held of Robert Baldwin by Sir John A. Macdonald, and Louis Lafontaine was a worthy colleague of Robert Baldwin. And what became of them? They were the leaders of the Reform party of that day, and the grandfather of the hon. gentleman who fills the position of Minister of Labour, having returned from a temporary, but I believe necessary sojourn in the adjoining republic, and being elected to the legislature, one of his first acts was to bring in a measure to abolish the Court of Chancery, which had been founded by Robert Baldwin, and, which was the apple of his eye. That resolution was supported by twenty-seven out of thirty votes from Upper Canada, with the result that Robert Baldwin seeing his own friends would not support him resigned his office before the next election, and was followed by Lafontaine, and when at the next election Baldwin went back to the very constituency of North York, which is apparently a preserve of the government, because the present Minister of Justice, and the late Postmaster General both sat for it, Robert Baldwin was ignominously defeated by the electors of North York, and a man named Wartman, an ignorant Grit who could hardly sign his own name was elected. The right hon. gentleman has reason to be proud of Baldwin and Lafontaine, because two nobler men than they never lived in this Dominion; but, Sir, it comes with ill grace from the head of the party which drove Baldwin and Lafontaine from public life to appeal to his supporters to endorse such a measure as this on the ground that it is an honest carrying out of the policy of Baldwin and Lafontaine.

Then the right hon. gentleman spoke on the subject of autonomy. I do not intend to occupy much time on that subject, because it has been pretty well threshed out by other speakers. But there is one view of the subject which, as far as I am aware, has not yet been presented, and it is this. The right hon. gentleman asked what is the spirit that inspires the Liberal party? He even referred to the rebellion of 1837, and asked what was it that quelled it? He said it was the spirit of autonomy. Practically everything good that has ever come to this country ever since has come by means of autonomy. It did not seem to enter his mind that if autonomy is such a vast good to this country, there ought to be a little gratitude to the source from which it came. Did the right hon. gentleman consider who gave us autonomy? We did not win it for ourselves. We did not discover this country and capture it. We merely came and enjoyed what others had worked for and won; and all this boasted autonomy comes from the head of the empire. If the boon of autonomy is so great, surely there ought to be a little gratitude on the part of the recipients of so great a boon to the source from which it came.

At this time the question is not a question of fear of war, for war is actually raging between Great Britain and Germany. When we find by to-day's telegrams that the imperial expenditure for the navy this year will be $203,000,000, an increase of $27,000,000 over last year, and that 2,000 more men will be added to the navy. When we find the Germans with feverish haste building warships; it is idle to talk about an emergency or a crisis or a war that is coming. The war is on at the present time. I do not know that the case can be put in better words than these:

> War is deprecated. But as a matter of fact war is in progress. The conflict in ship-building is war. If the mother country were engaged in a deadly conflict, Canadians could not get across the ocean fast enough to the aid of the motherland. But we must remember that our aid is needed now just as much as if a physical instead of a ship-building war were on. It is Canada's duty from every point of view, from our affection for the land of our fathers, and for our own self-interest, to take prompt and practical action.

And that language, which I am sure will receive the approval of every hon. member of this House, is from the Toronto 'Globe,' of the 24th of March, 1909. It is just as well that we should consider the exact situation at the present time. I for one have the most profound respect for the ruler of Germany. I regard him as one of the ablest statesmen in the world to-day, and I do not believe that a truer patriot lives than the Kaiser. I respect him for his love of his country, and his determination to do all he can for it. But Germany is circumscribed on every hand. When we realize that her population is increasing by about a million a year, while the greater part of the world is to-day in the occupation of other nations, that Great Britain controls most of the desirable parts of the world, that the United States by its Monroe doctrine excludes Germany from the whole of South America, you can depend upon it that sooner or later Germany, the greatest land power in the world—and we cannot blame her for it—must have overseas outlet for her surplus population, and markets for her enlarging trade, and that means that she must have a navy. If at the time of the Boer war the German navy had been as great as Britain's, does any one suppose that the result of that war would have been what it was? But she had not the control of the sea, and could not send an army to South Africa. Germany knows that as a matter of self-preservation she must have so strong a navy that no other navy in the world can control it; and everybody knows that little Britain owes her ascendency to her supremacy on the seas, and that the day she loses that supremacy she becomes a second-class power, and that day Canada will be obliged to leave her, whether she wishes it or not, for either independence or annexation to the United States. When we find that Great Britain is straining every nerve in the present existing war, and that Germany is straining every nerve in the present existing war, when we know that if a conflict began to-morrow, and we had not done something already to assist the empire, we could do nothing; when we know that the vessels that we propose to build would be useless at such a time, should not every Canadian recognize that, whether we believe this or that to be the wiser policy, the authorities in the old land who are on the spot are surely better judges than we? And would it not be better, even if we erred, for us to do what at all times to come would be a source of pride, and satisfaction to us, even if the money were wasted, than to do something now that under any circumstances can be of no possible benefit either to ourselves or to the motherland? The right hon. gentleman has spoken of the proper conception of the empire. He described it in his speech as 'vessels from all parts of the empire rushing on a common foe.' That description appeals to every one; but when you descend from poetry to prose, from theory to fact, what is the meaning of this phrase? What is the meaning of a Canadian navy rushing on a common foe? Your torpedo boats cannot leave the coasts which they are intended to defend, your unarmoured cruisers could not fight, because no civilized country fights with them. They can only be used either as scouts for Dreadnoughts, and you have no Dreadnoughts, or to prey on the undefended merchantmen of the enemy. Is it not a proud reflection that we are building a navy that cannot be called on to fight, and that must either run to cover or go abroad as pirates, cruise up and down the trade routes, and when they find some unprotected merchantman of the enemy, seize it and bring it in as a prize? Surely Canada is not so needy that she has to build her railways and her canals with money obtained in any such way. The right hon. gentleman made one reference that amused me at the time, although it had nothing to do with the question before the House.

The right hon. gentleman went back to the days of Peter the Hermit to find an illustration of the disorganization in which he says His Majesty's loyal opposition exists in this country to-day. He depicted the followers of Peter the Hermit as having been in a disorganized state, and consequently mowed down by the enemy. But who were the followers of Peter the Hermit? Every one who has read history knows that they were honest, sincere men, who set out with the most laudable object of wresting the sacred sepulchre from the hands of the infidels. They were honest, sincere men, animated by a most praiseworthy motive, but they were overthrown and defeated because they came in contact with organized troops of bandits who plundered and slaughtered them. That is the historical fact, and it is not my simile but that of the right hon. gentleman, when he compared his followers to those organized bandits.

The right hon. gentleman said that he was neither an imperialist nor an anti-imperialist, but a Canadian first and last and all the time; and in that sentiment, I am entirely in accord with my right hon. friend. I am a Canadian, too, first and last and all the time; but I cannot forget the fact that Canada is a part of the British empire, so that it is impossible for me to be a Canadian without being a British subject. Therefore, when I say that I am a Canadian, I declare at the same time that I am a British subject; and one of the greatest grounds of my pride in being a Canadian is that at the same time I am a subject of Britain. The right hon. gentleman says he is not an imperialist nor is he an anti-imperialist. But is it possible for any Canadian to be neither the one nor the other? If you are a Canadian, you must surely wish that Canada should either continue to be a part of the British empire or not. If you wish to continue a part of the empire and to contribute to its growth and success, you are an imperialist; but if you do not wish that empire to grow and prosper, and if you do not wish to continue a part of it, you are an anti-imperialist. You must be either the one or the other, and no amount of high flown sentiment will alter that fact. I am not finding fault with any man who believes that the destiny of this country is annexation or independence, or anything else; but I do say that no man can be a Canadian and not be an imperialist or an anti-imperialist. He must wish either to remain in the empire or to be out of it. It is just as well to remember that when Great Britain lost her American colonies, the whole difficulty arose over the question of defence. History is philosophy teaching by experience; and although some hon. gentlemen in this House have spoken about matters of history and British diplomacy from the standpoints of books published a number of years ago, it must be remembered that history has been entirely re-written within the last ten or fifteen years, and to-day we have the strongest proofs that at the time of the American revolution nine-tenths of the wrongs were committed by the revolting colonies. It is proved that although the motherland was not always wise, careful and prudent, she was a long-suffering, patient mother after all. And on the other hand, American historians, in their later books, admit that the difficulties with the American colonies took their rise when Britain became the owner of Canada. When Canada was owned by France, the American colonies were afraid of the French power and aggression, but the day that Canada became a part of Britain they at once prepared to secure their own independence. So that it was eventually to the removal of this dread of French aggression that the American revolt was due.

A similar misconception has heretofore existed with regard to diplomatic questions, and any hon. member who will read the latest works on the subject will find, as the Minister of Justice (Mr. Aylesworth) said in Toronto a week or ten days ago, that British diplomacy has been, if not invariably, on the whole most successful. On the whole, British diplomacy has been exercised with wisdom and success for the benefit of Canada. Any one who will take the trouble to study history cannot fail to recognize that Canada would have been thousands of miles from the Pacific ocean to-day had it not been for the might of Great Britain and the dread of its war power.

Without occupying the time of the House longer, I would like to say that it seems to me that when a Bill such as this comes before us, and there is doubt as to its constitutionality, it would be wise to defer action until the opinion of the highest court in the land is taken. Can there be any doubt that before many years this difficulty between Great Britain and Germany must be settled. Germany must conquer Britain or Britain must conquer Germany, or a truce must be had between the two. No one wants to go on grinding the people indefinitely by taxation for war purposes. When the proper time comes we can decide intelligently what is best to do in the interests both of Canada and the empire. But of all times this is the most inopportune, when the plans of war vessels are changing more rapidly and more frequently than ever before. We had better wait a few years until a definite policy has been arrived at in these matters, and we will be in a position to take a course which will have some character of permanency. We could do our duty much more effectively both to this country and to the motherland if our government would be willing to consult the imperial authorities and see if some plan cannot be discovered which would meet the views and exigencies of both countries. We are told that it would not be wise for us to send our money to the old country to be spent there on a navy over which we would have no control. I sympathize deeply with that view, but it seems to me that the best course would be for this government to meet the imperial authorities who are anxious for the co-operation of the colonies—for they well know that the future of Britain depends on the colonies—and try to agree on some plan. I am not prepared to suggest any plan, but if the statesmen whose duty it is to overcome difficulties—the statesmen of the Australian colonies, and Canada, and the British Isles, and wherever the Union Jack floats—if they would sit down at a common board, determined to devise some scheme by which all parts of the empire would share in the burden, and not impose the whole burden on the motherland, I am satisfied that a practical result would follow.

I say, Sir, that I have that respect for the statesmen of this country, and for the statesmen of the colonies in general, and of the motherland, to believe that such a scheme could soon be worked out. And I venture to say that if such a scheme could be worked out even now with this emergency before us, an object lesson would be given to the world that the nation that strikes Britain must reckon with the forces of the greatest empire the world has ever seen. It will be worth while to have it known that, not only the men and treasures of the British islands, but the men and treasures of this Canada, which is one of the most richly endowed countries on the face of the earth, and the men and treasures of the other parts of the empire, are also at the service of the empire—not the British empire in the narrow sense but the empire of all of us, an empire in which all are joint partners, and in whose affairs all take part—to maintain the security that is essential to progress. I have confidence in the right hon. Prime Minister that, sitting at the board with other representatives of the empire, such a scheme could be worked out before they rose.

Mr. Speaker, in amendment to the motion that the Bill be now read the second time, I move:

That the word 'now' be struck out, and the words be added at the end of the motion, 'this day six months.'

Mr. W. D. STAPLES (Macdonald). In rising to second the motion of the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup), I desire to explain briefly my reason for doing so. I have no intention of prolonging the debate unduly, but I feel that I should not be doing my duty if I did not at least speak a word to voice the opinion of the constituency I have the honour to represent in this House. The question of national naval defence came before this House in the form of a resolution placed on the order paper on the opening day of last session by the hon. member for North Toronto, (Mr. Foster), which resolution was, later, debated in this House, when the discussion took a wider range, and included the greater question of imperial naval defence. Since that question was brought to our attention, I have given it some thought, consideration and study. Let me confess that when the question first came before us, I did not grasp its gravity, its magnitude, its far-reaching importance to Canada, and to the empire. But I listened to the debate in this House on the 29th of March, last. I followed that debate with great admiration, for the effect of the speeches were to lift the question out of the field of petty politics, and place it on that wider field within which questions of national defence should be discussed. I was glad to note that throughout the debate it was the desire of the House to treat this question in the wider way. There are some questions that we can afford to bring down to the field of party politics, and discuss them along party lines, and, in dividing the House, to divide according to party affiliations. But, when it comes to the question of the defence of our country, then, so far as possible, the question should be kept entirely outside the field of party politics.

But, there are times when it is necessary to take sides even on questions of national or imperial defence. I regret that the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) came to this House at the beginning of this debate, armed with a speech to be used for the purpose of creating party differences on this question. He came here with a speech which, I believe, he wished to use as an attack upon the leader of the opposition, but, finding no provocation in that quarter, he looked for some person to attack, and struck at the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk). At that moment he created a discussion along party lines that might well have been avoided. But there are other reasons why it is necessary sometimes to divide on party lines, even on defence matters. From what I have read and from what I have listened to in this House, I believe that other nations than our empire have found it necessary at times to take partisan sides on questions of defence. But they never found it necessary until their government failed to do its duty. So, we come to the point: Has this government done its duty in the matter of the defence of our country, and of the empire? If so, I say, we on this side have no right to make this a party question or to propose to the people a distinct and separate policy and divide the House. In order to arrive at a conclusion as to whether or not this government has done its duty in this matter, it will be necessary to make a short review of the history of the question. I shall endeavour to be as brief as possible. I will not go back to the days of Peter the Hermit as the Prime Minister did; I will go back only to the conference of 1902. That conference, as we all know, was called by the Colonial Secretary of that day, Rt. Hon. Joseph Chamberlain. It was made up of representatives of the various portions of the empire, and the object was to take steps for the inauguration of a defence policy. We sent as our representative to that conference the right hon. Prime Minister. When he arrived, he was, no doubt, received with kindness, as were all the other statesmen from the various parts of the empire. When the members of the conference were called together, Rt. Hon. Joseph Chamberlain set out what the object was, telling the representatives that, in order that the British fleet might continue to be supreme upon the high seas, it was necessary to work out some policy whereby all the colonies of the empire should participate in the maintenance of that fleet. He stated to the conference how gladly and willingly the British taxpayers had borne the cost of maintaining that fleet, but in a gentle way, in a manner that could not be called beggery by any means, he presented the idea that they would be glad to receive any financial support which the various colonies might see fit to give. The first paper read at that conference was by Sir John Forrest, Minister of Defence for Australia. It was a splendid paper. If time permitted, I would read it, but I greatly desire to make my remarks as brief as possible. Lord Selborne then presented the views of the admiralty. The conference then broke up into small conferences, and, after the delegates had discussed matters along these lines, the whole body was reassembled and Lord Selborne brought in the report of the council. Did we find Canada at that time doing its duty? Let us see. We find that Cape Colony came forward and said: We have been giving you £30,000 a year; we will make it £50,000.

Australia said: We have been giving you £106,000 a year, we will make it £200,000. Natal had been giving £12,000, she made it £35,000. Newfoundland had been giving £3,000, she raised it to £4,800. New Zealand had been giving £20,000, she raised it to £40,000. Now, Mr. Speaker, did Canada do her duty? What do we find? Do we find our Prime Minister rising and saying: I have the honour to represent the greatest colony of the empire, and I am not going to sit back and let these other colonies get ahead of Canada in assisting towards the maintenance of the British navy. It has protected our trade and commerce, our peace and liberty. I am going to make an offer commensurate with the wealth and population of Canada? But did he do it? Did he offer one cent? Not one cent, Mr. Speaker. But he put up all kinds of excuses, and time and again hon. members of this House have placed on 'Hansard' his excuses. He said that Canada had in mind the building of a navy. I wonder if he told them that Canada or he wanted an independent Canada navy. I do not believe that Canada had in mind the building of an independent Canadian navy. He put up the argument that we were developing our public works, he said we were developing the militia of this country, and he even went so far as to say that he had sent some brave boys from Canada to fight for the empire in South Africa. I wonder did he tell the whole facts in that case? Did he tell the conference that these boys did not get away when they wanted to go, that he would not permit them to go when they wanted to go? Did he tell the conference that it was only after he was forced by public opinion and sentiment that he and his government permitted these boys to go to South Africa? The result was that the Canadian soldiers, through the dilatory acts of this government, were the last to arrive on the battlefields of South Africa.

Now, I come to the conference of 1907, and again I ask you: Did Canada do her duty in that conference? Every one who sat in this House during the session of 1907 will remember how exceedingly averse the premier was to going to that conference. It was only after the leader of the opposition, and the opposition generally, in this House agreed not to put any obstacle in the way of the government legislation, nor to bring up any contentious matter, that the Prime Minister consented to go. But he did not go alone, he took with him his Minister of Marine and Fisheries. The first question that came up at that conference was the formation of an imperial conference to meet every five years, and what do we find? We find the Prime Minister of Canada fighting against such an arrangement, he did not want a conference called every five years. I can well realize his feeling. He did not want to go to that conference and sit with those loyal statesmen from the other parts of the empire; he would find such a conference uncongenial to him. On that occasion, Lord Tweedmouth set out the position. He told them that they were called together for the purpose of trying to do something in support of the imperial navy. But did we find the Prime Minister of Canada offering to do anything on the part of this country? No, but we find him sitting there listening to all the other colonies offering to increase their contributions, while he sat silent and did not offer one cent. When we find that even little New Zealand, with a population of only 900,000, was willing to contribute so freely, we would naturally suppose that when it came to the turn of Canada, our country, through her representatives, would be willing to do even better, but she did not even do as well. We would have expected that Canada, in view of what the British fleet had been doing to maintain the peace of the world, had been doing to protect our trade and commerce, had been doing to extend civilization all over the world, we would have expected, I say, that Canada would come forward and offer at least to do something. But she did nothing. We know the enormous sums of money that Great Britain has spent in this country, notwithstanding that the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McLean) stated in this House, and I was sorry to hear him say it, that Canada owed nothing to England. I would ask him, as he has already been asked across the floor of this House: Did not England establish a great naval station in Halifax? Did she not establish another on the Pacific coast at Esquimalt? Did she not establish another at Quebec? Has she not expended immense sums of money freely to extend civilization and Christianity throughout this Canada of ours, which, along with other contributions, amount in the aggregate to something like a billion of dollars? But our delegates at the conference were apparently entirely oblivious of all these facts, and were unwilling to do anything for the upkeep of the imperial navy. When Australia increased her contribution the Prime Minister sat silent, saying not a word, but he called upon his Minister of Marine and Fisheries to explain the position of Canada.

The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries explained what Canada had been doing. He had got it into his head that we had to fight off our friends to the south, that we had to look after the American fleet—all of which was not founded upon fact. Now, we come to the resolution of March last. Did the right hon. leader of the government do his duty to Canada when he brought in the amendment? We all remember that when he brought in his amendment it was in no way agreeable to this side of the House. It was ungrateful. It did not recognize what Britain had done for Canada, and we resented it. We would have refused to accept it, but in order to keep it out of politics the hon. leader of the opposition endeavoured with the Prime Minister to get something that we could all agree to and we acceded to the amendment on this side of the House. Clause after clause was pared out of the resolution. It was amended in such a form that we felt that we might for the time being accept it, because we realized that if we divided the House upon that question at that particular time, it would have a bad moral effect with other nations and throughout this country. Therefore, the resolution was allowed to pass in its amended form. But that resolution clothed the Prime Minister with authority to go to the conference of 1909 and do somehing that would be a credit to Canada. Did the right hon. gentleman go? No. I suppose he did not have the courage to go. He did not desire to repeat the experiences that he had had in previous conferences. He called council together, I presume, and he said: The opposition has forced upon us a resolution which compels us to send some person over to the defence conference that is to take place. So he called for volunteers, and he said to the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Frederick Borden), an hon. gentleman who is courageous, who has never failed to get out of a tight position: You will be a desirable representative. The Minister of Militia said: Yes, but I do not desire to go alone. The Prime Minister, I presume, had told him to look around and choose out such ministers as he thought should go with him. In looking around, he said: There is my man, that man who presides over a department in regard to which the Royal Commission stated that organization, discipline, zeal for the public service and all sense of economy were conspicuous by their absence. He concluded that he would be a proper person to represent Canada at that conference. When they arrived there they found that the other colonies were willing to continue in the support of the empire, but we find that these gentlemen, after putting up almost all kinds of excuses, failed to do anything more than suggest that they might establish a navy of their own in Canada. The representatives of the admiralty stated what he desired should be done. He laid before that conference what would be the best in the interests of the empire. He stated first that a contribution would be the best. Canada did not see fit to make a contribution. Then he stated that a fleet unit would be acceptable. Did Canada undertake to build a fleet unit? No, they said: We can afford to give only £400,000 or £600,000, and if you can suggest anything that we can build that will be of any use to you, we may begin. Has the Prime Minister done his duty in bringing to parliament the Bill which is now before us? If he had done his duty in the conference of 1902, in the conference of 1907, and now by the presentation of this Bill to parliament I claim that we on this side of the House would have no right to oppose the Bill, but I am willing to leave it to the judgment of Canada and of the House as to whether the Prime Minister has done his duty up to the time he presented this Bill. When he presented this Bill to the House did we find him carrying out the suggestions of the admiralty or the provisions set out in the resolution of March 29 last? Not at all. Therefore, I claim that we would fall short of doing our duty if we did not offer to this House a policy whereby we may be able to do something that will be of material assistance to the great empire to which we belong. It appears that the government have determined to go on with the construction of this navy, and apparently they have set their hearts upon it being a Canadian navy. It must be an independent Canadian navy. It must be constructed in Canada, out of Canadian material, by Canadian people, and manned by Canadians. That is the whole argument, and when they make that argument that is all the argument they possibly can make. They do not stop to consider what effect this navy would have in a naval contest. They do not stop to consider whether or not it would be of any assistance to the British navy. When the right hon. gentleman was making his speech on the second reading of this Bill he was asked from this side of the House what would be the cost of this navy. He answered $11,000,000 or $12,000,000. He was asked also how long it would take to construct the dock-yards and install the necessary machinery to go ahead with the building of this navy. He said about a year. Who, for one moment, can give any credence to that statement that they can develop dock-yards and install the necessary machinery to construct the navy in one year? He also stated that it would be four or five years before they could construct the vessels that they purpose to construct.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to make a calculation as to what the cost of this navy will be. We have the statement of the right hon. gentleman that it will cost $11,000,000 or $12,000,000. I have no doubt that when he made that statement, if he had been asked from this side of the House what information he had to base his calculation on, he would have answered, as he did when the Transcontinental railway debate was going on, that he had mountains of information. The right hon. gentleman states that it will cost $11,000,000 for this navy, with 33⅓ per cent added if it is constructed in Canada, but the people of this country have learned to place very little faith in estimates which he may give. The right hon. gentleman told this House in 1903 that the Transcontinental railway would not cost us more than $13,000,000, although his Minister of Finance stated that it would cost $28,000,000, and in order that he might mislead the people of Canada he prepared campaign literature stating that it would only take $13,000,000 of the peoples' money to construct that railway. This pamphlet which I have in my hand was circulated in every home throughout the Dominion, my own home amongst others, and if you will look at page ten you will find $13,000,000 given as the right hon. gentleman's estimates of the cost of this National Transcontinental railway. But, Sir, we find to-day that this railway will cost $250,000,000, and if we take the right hon. gentleman's guess that the navy will cost $11,000,000 and work it out on the same basis as his estimate for the Transcontinental railway, then the people of Canada may expect that the navy will cost about $220,000,000, exclusive of maintenance. And, as to the time it will take to build the navy, we know that it will take ten years to build the Transcontinental instead of the five years which the Prime Minister said it would take, and therefore on the same basis it will take 12 years to construct the navy. And, Sir, before that navy is constructed it will be obsolete, utterly worthless as an instrument of offence or defence; and fit only for consignment to the scrap heap. Then, the right hon. gentleman told the people of Toronto recently that it was easy to criticise a government but it was hard to construct, and that although the Tories criticised his government it was a government of construction. Well, I need not go into the history of the two political parties in this country, but I may say there is just about as much sense in that statement as there is in the other celebrated statement of the Prime Minister who told us the other day that when England is at war Canada will be at war, but it does not follow that when England is at war Canada is at war. Let me point out briefly the record of this government so far as constructive ability is concerned. They undertook the construction of a great Transcontinental railway, and we all know what scandals have surrounded that; they undertook the construction of the Quebec bridge and after they expended over $6,000,000 of the people's money on it it fell into the St. Lawrence. What great constructors they are? They have constructed other things.

Mr. LENNOX. The Laurier tower.

Mr. STAPLES. Yes, they constructed the Laurier tower and a gentle zephyr from the south blew the whole thing away, and it tumbled down. What a great constructive government this is? Now, Sir, this government has decided to go its own way irrespective of the other colonies of the empire, and to take its own time to work out a scheme of naval defence. They have decided to construct two navies, one on the Atlantic and one on the Pacific, and it will be no more possible for those navies to unite than it was for the Russian navy to unite before the days of their humiliation when they had one fleet on the Baltic and another on the Pacific. At all events, this government has decided to construct two navies, and I have no doubt they will adopt the suggestion of the Toronto 'Globe' and call the Pacific coast navy the 'Hornet' and the Atlantic coast navy the 'Wasp'. And having their navies constructed let us consider for a moment what their fighting power will be. I question very much if the 'Wasp' would be capable of capturing Captain Bernier on the Arctic. I am inclined to think that if Captain Bernier had his fleet well armed and manned with Esquimaux males and females that the Minister of War with his fleet would not be able to capture them. Does any one suppose that the sting of the 'Wasp' would be sufficient to penetrate the armour of Captain Bernier's ship? The fact is that this navy will be an enormously costly affair and will be of no use to Canada or to the empire. Now, Mr. Speaker, we have heard a good deal about loyalty in this debate, and while it has been hinted that some of the leaders of the government are disloyal, the only way I can judge of that is by their utterances, and having read the speeches of the Prime Minister and some of his supporters I certainly think there is a note of disloyalty in them. The hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) stated that the mass of the people of the province of Quebec are not disloyal, but hon. gentlemen on the other side have endeavoured to misconstrue his words and they have alleged, wrongfully I submit, that the hon. member (Mr. Edwards) has stated that the people of Quebec were disloyal.

I have never had the pleasure or honour of living in the province of Quebec, but I have met many of the people of that province, and I have yet to find from one of them one disloyal utterance, outside of the expressions of the leaders who sit on the other side of the House. In the constituency, which I have the honour of representing there are many good French Canadians, who are good and loyal citizens. There are also French men and women who have come direct from France, and they have made good and loyal citizens of that western country. Let me give you an instance of the loyalty of these people. A couple of years ago they were holding a celebration in a town, I think on the 14th day of June, and at that celebration the French flag was flown. I had no objection to that, because at the same time the Union Jack was flying, and in its proper place. One of the young Frenchmen who had not yet learned what the Union Jack meant, who had not learned that it stood for liberty of language, and liberty of conscience undertook to haul it down. What was the result? No sooner had he laid hands on it than the presiding priest of the parish took it from him, put it in its proper place again and challenged him or any other person to lay hands upon it again. I have no doubt that the right hon. gentleman, when it becomes necessary for him again to appeal to the people of this country, will, as he always does, in opening his campaign, go down to the province of Quebec. He loves to go there and speak to his own people. I do not find fault with him for that, even if he goes so far as to remind them that the same blood that flows in their veins runs in his. Perhaps he will appeal to them in similar language to what he did when he opened the last campaign, when he told them that he was anxious to be returned to power in order that he might have a chance to complete his great work, when he would be content to say with the prophet of old : 'Lord, now let thy servant depart in peace'. That was an appeal that might melt any heart of stone. But when the time comes—and I hope it may be long distant—when the right hon. gentleman will be called from this wicked world to soar aloft and enjoy that peace which passes all understanding, but I fear that when he climbs the golden stairs and knocks on the door of St. Peter, there will be a little detention. I fear that when the great book is opened, which contains a record of the sins of omission and the sins of commission of all men, there will be some pointed questions put to the right hon. gentleman. He will no doubt be told that he was the Prime Minister of Canada who told the people of Canada that he would build them a Transcontinental railway for $13,000,000, whereas it cost them $250,000,000. He will be told that he was the Prime Minister of Canada who promised the people that if he were elected to power in 1896, he would wipe off the statute books the protective tariff which was bleeding the people white. He will be asked, are you the late Prime Minister of Canada who undertook to construct a great public utility, which, after $6,000,000 of the people's money was put into it, fell with a crash to the bottom of the St. Lawrence, taking with it not only the people's money, but some 128 souls. I fear he will be also asked the question: Are you the Prime Minister of Canada who undertook to put the capstone on the great works you were so anxious to finish, in the shape of an independent and separate navy which would probably be the means of breaking up the greatest empire of the world, which has done more to extend civilization and Christianity than any other empire that ever existed? He may also be asked: Are you the Prime Minister of Canada who thought of changing the design of the flag that would float over that fleet—the flag that has given liberty to all parts of the world? But, Mr. Speaker, is it not too late. I say to the Prime Minister that there is yet time for absolution, there is yet time for repentance. Let him begin now by taking this iniquitous and dangerous Bill and tearing it asunder. Let him not be contented with giving it a six months' hoist, but let him hoist it to the four winds of the earth. I have heard in this debate that there is some doubt as to which flag shall float over the navy which this government intends to construct. I for one, a Canadian born, and a son of Canadian-born parents, will stand for the Union Jack—no other flag will do. The right hon. gentleman may have in his mind a flag of more modern design; he may have in his mind a flag with stars and bars, which as beautiful maybe; but the flag that has waved a thousand years is good enough for me. These are not my words, Mr. Speaker, but they express my sentiments, and they are good enough for me.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York). Mr. Speaker, I should have spoken earlier in this debate; but as I am only now recovering from a somewhat prolonged cold, I have had to defer what I had to say. Moreover, what I have to say may not be acceptable to either side of this House. I cannot approve of the amendment which has just been submitted to the House for giving the Bill the six months' hoist, nor could I have voted for the amendments that were voted on yesterday proposing to send this question to the people. I believe absolutely in the responsibility of parliament, and it is up to this parliament and to the government to make the fullest and amplest provision for the defence of the country. The question of the safety of the nation or of the empire is of the first importance, and cannot in any sense be removed from parliament and sent to the people. The men who made the parliament of England as we know it, men like Pitt, Fox, Canning, were seized of this principle, that the responsibility for the defence of the country and the empire rested on parliament and could not be taken from parliament and sent to any other quarter. I believe in such a thing as a referendum on a constitutional issue, but never yet in British history has the proposition been made that parliament should abandon the defence of the country to the opinion of the people. Holding this view, I must say that parliament is seized of this question, and, under the circumstances, must act. And, for the same reason, I cannot vote for the amendment which has just been submitted. The responsibility is on this parliament to deal with the defence of the country now—not at a future time.

I believe that the foundation of national greatness, the permanence of any nation and the influence its people may have upon the history of the world, absolutely depend, and have through the ages depended upon sea power. Pericles and Themistocles, who were the two first and greatest statesmen of Athens, more than four hundred years before Christ, saw this solution of the problem of national greatness. When that little city of Athens was emerging into influence throughout the then world, and its spirit of democracy spreading, these great men realized that nations became great as they became strong in regard to sea power. They had only small ships, the little triremes of those days, but these statesmen saw that sea power was the basis of national greatness. Themistocles said: 'Give me a navy, and I can be in any place to-morrow, but with an army I can only be in one place'. And so we find it in the course of history. This was true of the Italian cities of the middle ages, it was true of the Dutch republic, it was true of Great Britain, and, coming down to our own day, the rise of Germany is absolutely based on the possession and development of sea power. The nation that neglects the development of sea power makes a great mistake and soon must crumble and decay. If Canada is ever to become a community of first class importance, if she is to hold her own on this North American continent, she must develop sea power And we are especially fitted for that development. Not for a moment do I, as a Canadian, propose that we should give up our right to develop our own sea power, or ask, or subsidize some one else to defend us, or to supply for our benefit power at sea. This we must do for ourselves. We have the opportunity before us to dominate this great North American continent, but, if we hope to do it, it must be because we develop our sea power. We occupy what I call the intercontinental way between Europe and Asia. The great track of commerce to-day is across the Atlantic, across America, and across the Pacific, and the maintenance of sea power on both oceans is essential. The possession of sea power is a national necessity to the people of the United States, and they are now spending millions upon it. But the United States is mainly concerned in the maintenance of sea power on the Pacific as against Japan. We are all beginning to see now, especially as the construction of the Panama canal goes on, and a great new route of trade is about to open, that sea power is an essential thing to any nation. I have especially contended that the Canadian people, who have aspirations as high and far-reaching as any other people, will never realize these aspirations unless they develop and maintain power on the sea. We come of peoples who have been identified with sea power. I have heard that a good deal of objection has been raised in the province of Quebec to the proposal to build a navy. But my observation leads me to believe that, if the people of Quebec are strong in certain directions, it is because they are descendants of those Breton fishermen and sailors who first discovered Canada, and are prepared to-day to maintain their integrity as Canadians on this continent by exercising that sea power that they inherited from their fathers. Not only is sea power, as I said, an essential, but it is growing and more and more a necessity in connection with a nation. As I pointed out, that which makes Germany a menace to the English speaking empire is that Germany has at last recognized the importance of sea power and intends to have it. And I do not see how Germany can be denied the exercise of the greatest power in this respect that she can attain. She knows that she cannot expand otherwise, and following the example of other great nations, especially the example of England, she is developing sea power, until to-day she is the greatest force in the world. And she has developed her sea power within a dozen years. Germany amounted to nothing as a naval power twelve years ago, but in twelve short years she has become a great sea power, and in three years more she expects to be equal to England in this respect, and then to assert her right to expansion. I pointed out how rapidly Japan had come to the front because she had developed sea power. To-day she has practically told the people of America, and especially the people of the United States—and is ready to tell the countries of Europe: If you, especially the people of America, intend to assert the principle that America is a white man's country, then you must recognize the supremacy of the yellow man, and especially of the Japanese, in Asia, and this we are able to assert because we made up a navy, we have trained our sailors, we have built up our country, and we rely upon sea power before anything else.

Now, if this is the teaching of history, how does it affect us? Simply in this way: If we wish to succeed in America, if we wish to be in the empire, and to assist in holding that great fabric together for what it can do for humanity, we must join with England in maintaining sea-power and sea-power of the highest kind, and sea-power at home. I believe that is the verdict and determination of the Canadian people. Give them an intelligent leadership, and they will respond and assert the doctrine of sea-power, and will be prepared to make any sacrifice to maintain it in connection with the empire. Not only do I believe in sea-power in connection with the empire, but I believe that an essential part in the development of sea-power consists in building ships in your own country; and I take the credit of having been one of the very first in this House to assert the idea that it was time Canada should begin to build her own ships. I went so far as to say that I believed in bounties on shipbuilding. We want to build ships for our great trade on the Atlantic, and the Pacific. If we can build great transcontinental railways, we can provide great fleets to operate in connection with them on both seas, and what we require is to build those ships in our own country, and thus develop our sea-power. But we must make a start, we require dockyards, and other adjuncts to that business, and it is because the proposition before the House is a move in this direction that I cannot support the motion to give it a six months' hoist or to say that it is a question which should be submitted to the people. It is high time that we should start a shipbuilding industry, and in some way work it out. If you want to become a sea-power, you must not only find a way to build your own ships, and provide your own docks, but you must also train your own people to become seamen; and thank God, we have the best supply of material to man a fleet that can be found any where on the globe. And if we can build the ships—and I lay the responsibility on the government—we can begin to train our sailors to man them. We can, and we could furnish seamen to man a portion of the British fleet. As Canadians it is our duty not to talk so much about constitutional issues, whatever they may be, and not to evade our responsibility as a parliament, but to begin to train and develop our seafaring population so that, if need should arise, we could turn over to England at least 5,000 men competent to assist in manning the British fleet, and if necessary, furnish 10,000 to 20,000 men in the hour of danger. Let us take our share of responsibility; let us do our part in developing our possibilities as a sea-power.

I want to refer for a moment to the real situation in England. I believe that peril does more or less exist to-day, and I believe that the best remedy to the present situation in England is reflected in an article in the London 'Saturday Review' of three or four weeks ago. The German admiral, who has been attending the German Navy League, delivered an address before one of the meetings of that league, and in that address he tried to draw the sting out of what was a legitimate inference to be drawn from one of the speaker's claim. He claimed that—here is what the 'Spectator' says:

> Grand Admiral Von Koster ended his speech by declaring that the Germans did not think of having a navy equal in size to the English. What they wanted was a force sufficient to protect them against all conceivable attacks. Their programme was to carry out the navy law in all its parts.
> The true significance of this remark is very pertinently set forth by the correspondent of the 'Times.' He points out that the president of the navy league and his colleagues have repeatedly explained that this means a great deal more than appears in the ordinary words of the German naval programme. If the minimizing speech of the president of the navy league is construed without sentiment, it appears to us that what the navy league in reality means by a navy strong enough to protect Germany from all attacks is a navy challenging our command of the sea, and if necessary of winning it from us in a naval conflict.

That is what Germany is after to-day. She is bent on the creation and development of a navy able to challenge and wrest from Britain the supremacy of the sea. That is the German policy, but that, they are not able yet to accomplish, as the 'Spectator' points out. The 'Spectator' further points out that if England were to adopt what is called the Bismarckian policy, if she were to take advantage of Germany's present weakness, and not wait until she has, in three or four years, perfected her navy, she would strike at once. The 'Spectator' says that is what the Germans would do in a similar case. I am going to read two more paragraphs which really give the situation:

> In raising the question which, as we have said, haunts a certain number of German minds, i.e., that we may do the so-called common sense thing and not wait for German naval preparations to be complete—we admit that we are touching delicate, nay, dangerous ground. We should, therefore, like to take this opportunity of stating once more that we are certain that the British people would never be induced to adopt what we may call the Bismarckian plan of insisting that the struggle for sea-power shall take place while the Germans are notoriously so much weaker than we are. But even if we thought it would be possible to induce the British public, which we are sure it is not, to change their minds in this respect, and to attack the Germans before their navy is complete, we should refuse absolutely to advocate that course. The best proof we can give of the sincerity of our words is the fact that we, and what is far more important, all other responsible advocates of a supreme navy in this country are pledged to the alternative policy—the policy of so greatly increasing our own armaments that Germany will not be able to catch us up.

What is the policy which Englishmen are trying to carry out, and which I want to see our country adopt? This is the policy which England has in view:

The policy of so greatly increasing our own armaments that Germany will not be able to catch us up, and that our present relative supremacy will be maintained. If that is done there can never be any valid reason for precipitating a war.

Here is something for the peace at any price men to consider:

If, however, we advocate a Bismarckian policy for Britain, it would not be necessary to ask for more Dreadnoughts to be laid down. We should have a far shorter and easier, and apparently cheaper, way of dealing with the German navy. It is because we are one and all determined to have nothing to do with a Bismarckian policy that we insist that our shipbuilding programme must be greatly enlarged. We want to deal with the German competition, not by the short way, the war way, the way of attacking her while she is relatively weak, but by the longer way and the peaceful way of so greatly increasing our own armaments that she will have to abandon the struggle and a conflict will be avoided.

To summarize the matter again, and it cannot be summarized too often, there are two ways of securing that command of the sea which all Britons are agreed must be secured to us. One is by destroying the German fleet before it has attained dimensions sufficiently great to put our sea-power in jeopardy. The other way, and the way all sane British imperialists and defenders of our sea-power advocate, is a scheme of naval construction so large as to neutralize, and more than neutralize, German competition, and to maintain our present relative position of supremacy. All friends of peace and of the maintenance of existing relations with Germany should rally, then, to the cause of a supreme navy, and should make it clear that it is in this way, and in this way only, that we intend to deal with and defeat German rivalry. The policy of disarmament by agreement, as Admiral Von Koester shows, is purely chimerical.

That is the policy Englishmen are working out to-day, to keep ahead of Germany and maintain and increase their sea power. When Germany comes to see that this is the determination of England, and when she comes to see that Canada, and the other dominions of the empire, are one with her in maintaining that position, and in keeping ahead, Germany will finally have to abandon her design of competing with Great Britain for naval supremacy; and nothing will have such an effect on the German nation as a clear cut declaration from the Canadian people, and from the Australian people, that they are with the empire, and for the maintenance of the empire, and that in Canada at least we believe in sea-power, that we intend to develop sea-power, and in that way to strengthen the empire, and make German competition for supremacy hopeless. In that way only I believe will British supremacy be maintained and war averted. It is because I believe in Canada being able to assist in the defence of the empire by developing her sea-power, that I cannot afford to take the position that we ought to do nothing. We ought to do everything, and my only contention is that we are not doing enough. I would like to see a Canadian Dreadnought, or two Canadian Dreadnoughts on our coasts. But, if that is not to be, then let us make a start to-morrow, or next day, on something. But I do wish to see a start made. I wish to see a declaration going out to the world that the Canadian parliament assumes to the full its responsibility for the defence of the empire, and, without consulting the people by a plebiscite, that we in this House intend to lead our people in the maintenance of British supremacy. Therefore my regret that the Bill is so weak. I say that we are not spending enough money, that we are not building Dreadnoughts. But we are asserting that Canada is willing and ready to make sacrifices. As has been stated in the House here to-day, we see that the British war budget now amounts to over $200,000,000, an enormous increase on only the last year. That is a heavy expense; but people who wish to maintain their position have got to spend their money, and we might as well spend our money in strengthening the naval force of our country, in making sailors of our Canadian boys, in having a naval college, in training seamen for the British navy.

Now, a word or two in connection with this German scare. After hearing what the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) said this afternoon, I do not see how Great Britain can continue to restrain Germany in her desire to expand. A way must be found in Europe to allow the German people to expand without coming into conflict with other nations. I hope that way will be found, and if it is found the situation will be eased considerably. But in the meantime it is our duty to develop some kind of a navy in this country to develop Canadian sea-power, to school our sailors so that they may be of use, almost immediately, to the British navy, to organize a navy of our own, to have a shipbuilding establishment of our own, to have a naval college of our own. Above all, let us say that we not only believe in the empire, but we are determined to remain associated with the empire, and to that end, that we are determined to develop sea-power of our own on this continent, that we are determined to consecrate all our energies to maintain British supremacy, to keep Britain ahead of every competitor, so that she may remain what she is to-day, the guardian and the protecting influence of civilization in its onward march throughout the world.

At six o'clock House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. T. G. WALLACE (Centre York). Mr. Speaker, while this question of such great importance to the Dominion of Canada is under discussion I wish to take this opportunity of voicing my sentiments on behalf of the county which I represent. I was sent here as the representative of the people of Centre York, probably one of the most important counties in Canada, to voice their sentiments on every question that comes before parliament. During the progress of the debate I have listened attentively to nearly every hon. member on both sides of the House who has spoken upon the naval question. I agree to a certain extent with the sentiments expressed by members on both sides of the House. I do not wish to make a claim that I represent the only loyal constituency in Canada, because I certainly do not, but I represent a constituency which, I think, is as loyal, and patriotic, and as devoted to the British empire as any other portion of this Dominion. Elected on these principles, and as I had not the opportunity of expressing my views on the amendment to the motion for the second reading of the Navy Bill brought down by the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), I desire to avail myself of the present opportunity of placing my views upon this question before the House. I listened to the speech of the hon. member for South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) this afternoon, and I regret to say that I think it is my duty to differ from him on this question. On a good many questions I entirely agree with him, but, as I understand his sentiments, he would vote against the six months' hoist proposed by my hon. friend from East Hastings (Mr. Northrup), and I feel it is my duty, as a representative of one of the great agricultural constituencies of Canada, to dissent from the position which he has taken. I understood the hon. member for South York to say that he would vote against the amendment of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden). In voting for that amendment I feel that I represent the views of my constituents. While I have no mandate from the people to express my views on the navy question, because at the time of my election there was no navy question before the people, I feel that when any question comes before parliament I should be prepared to take the full responsibility of such action as I consider the circumstances warrant. I believe that there is an emergency at the present time, and that Canada should endeavour to do something to safeguard the interests of the British empire. This will not be done by the creation of a Canadian navy. The Bill introduced by the Prime Minister is entitled an Act respecting the Naval Service of Canada. This force is divided, as the Prime Minister said, into the permanent corps, reserve force, and volunteer force. The Militia Act, in a general way, was followed except in this particular that the Militia Act provides that every man between eighteen and sixty years of age, is liable to military service. while under the Naval Bill, as I understand it, no person is liable to service on sea. It provides for entirely voluntary enrolment. The Bill, though a very important measure, is very meagre with respect to information. We got very little information from the Prime Minister as to what the government really intend to do on this question. He told us that the terms of engagement would be determined by the Governor in Council, and that commissions would be issued in the name of His Majesty. The Bill declares that:

(a) 'Active service,' as applied to a person in the naval forces, means service or duty during an emergency;

(d) 'emergency' means war, invasion or insurrection, real or apprehended.

That is one clause that I wish to direct the attention of the House to. Emergency means war, real or apprehended. I think that is right, but I remember very distinctly that in October, 1899, it was brought very forcibly to the knowledge of the government, during the South African crisis, that there was war real or apprehended. I remember distinctly the sentiment expressed at that time by the Prime Minister. I remember the Prime Minister, as quoted in the Toronto 'Globe,' saying: That the government had nothing to do with Britain's wars. The government did not intend to do anything in regard to the South African war, a very few days before the soldiers were enrolled in Canada. But the sentiment of the people at that time was entirely with Great Britain, as it is to-day, and it was in favour of Canada sending a contingent to South Africa. I did not wish to bring this matter before the House, but it was brought up by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald). He quoted the opinion of a gentleman on the navy question who was in the first contingent. In October, 1899, I had the honour of applying for a commission in the militia force of Canada. I was one of the first men to apply for a commission in the Canadian contingent to South Africa. Unfortunately more men applied for commissions than could be taken with the force, and there was no room for me. I went to South Africa as a private for which I claim no credit, because I only did what any loyal Canadian would do. But, I take second place to no man in regard to my loyalty to the British empire, and in saying that I do not say that any other man is disloyal. I went there and tried to do my duty.

The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) quoted a very eminent authority as to why we should have a defence force for Canada, and while that authority may be very competent from a military point of view, I do not think it would be held to be equally so from a naval standpoint. Canada can turn out probably as good soldiers as there are in the world, but I doubt very much if our sailors can equal those of the British Isles who, I may say, are sailors by instinct. I have no mandate from my constituency to vote in favour of a Canadian navy, but I do think that I would be acting according to their wishes if on an occasion like this, when as I believe there is an emergency, I should support an effort by Canada to render some substantial assistance to the navy of Britain. I believe that if the government, at the present juncture, decided to send over two Dreadnoughts, which would be of some real assistance to the British empire, they would be supported by the people of every province in Canada. I would do anything in my power for the maintenance of British connection, but I honestly believe that the Bill introduced by the Prime Minister for the creation of a Canadian navy, as we have been told by the member for Nicolet and other hon. gentlemen on the other side, is solely with the object, not of helping the British navy, but of building up a fleet in Canada which would be useful to us whenever we should become independent. I believe that the creation of this navy is the first attempt since 1867 to sever the ties which bind us to the British empire, and in that view I am absolutely opposed to it. We all should be loyal to Canada, and any man who is loyal to Canada is loyal to the British empire. Believing as I do, and as gentlemen on the other side of the House have informed us, that this Canadian navy is a step in the direction of separation from the empire, I shall have nothing to do with it. I have no mandate from my people to vote for an enormous expenditure such as is here proposed. I have seen hon. gentlemen opposite vote for huge expenditures regardless of the returns which the country will receive from them, but I do not believe it to be the duty of a member of parliament to take such a course unless with the endorsation of his constituents. We have seen members on the other side of the House vote for the Newmarket canal, a useless undertaking which will entail a large outlay; we have seen them vote for the National Transcontinental railway, the expenditure on which will be millions more than the government said it would be, and we see them now ready to vote away millions for a Canadian navy which will be absolutely of no use to Great Britain in time of trouble. I certainly know that my strong desire is to represent British sentiment, and feeling as I do on that score, I believe that the best way to help the British empire in the present crisis is for Canada to send an immediate gift in cash, or its equivalent in effective fighting ships. I believe, Sir, that the sentiment of this country demands that we shall assist Britain in her hour of need. I believe that if this Canadian navy is not built now, the sentiment of the people of Canada will demand that something more beneficial to the empire shall be done, and I, therefore, have much pleasure in supporting the amendment of the hon. member for East Hastings.

Mr. WM. WRIGHT (Muskoka). This debate has been dragging its weary length so long that I feel it would be unpardonable for me to take up the time of the House at any great length. I will put my views, and as far as I understand them the views of my constituents, in as few words as possible, and let it go at that. I would not speak at all were it not that I consider this a very serious step which is being taken by the representatives of the Canadian people assembled in this parliament. We are now establishing a precedent which will be referred to in years to come, and looking at it from that standpoint, I believe it to be the important duty that any member in this House who has strong feelings on the question should put them on record. Having considered the question very carefully, I find that I cannot support the Bill before the House. A great deal has been said on the government side of the House as to some change of sentiment that has taken place among members of the opposition, and charges have been made on the other hand that the government have not carried out the policy laid down by the House in the resolution of last March. Well, I do not attach a great deal of importance to such arguments, because, if the government, with the increased opportunities that have been theirs during the year that has passed, have thought it better to change from the resolution of last March, and if they think that the Bill they have introduced is more expressive of public sentiment in this country than the resolution, then they would be justified in changing. If, on the other hand, the opposition should have the opportunity of ascertaining the public sentiment of the country, would they not be justified in bringing their views up to date, and crystallizing them in a resolution of the House? I find that the government have changed from the resolution of last March in some very important particulars. That resolution made particular provision for Canada coming to the assistance of the empire in the case of an emergency, and, if I understand aright the Bill before the Chair, that has been eliminated. I think there was nothing in the resolution of last March that would lead the members of this House to believe that there was to be any removal from British control of whatever naval arrangements we might make. But by the Bill now before us the control is to be entirely vested in the government of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. WRIGHT. Hon. gentlemen say, 'hear, hear.' They are very pleased, apparently to have removed from the Canadian navy British control or the power of the British people to have anything to say. In that I do not find myself in very hearty accord with hon. gentlemen opposite. Some of them have gone so far as to express the conviction that this is the last step in the separation of Canada from the empire, and they make no bones of expressing their satisfaction that we have reached that stage.

Now, Sir, this question naturally divides itself into two propositions: our duty to the empire as a permanent policy, and our duty to the empire in case of emergency. If there is no emergency, we are not called upon at the present time to do anything along that line. If there is no emergency, then there is no need of our being in a hurry to adopt a naval policy. We should take a year or two, and that would not be too long for any government, to take the matter up thoroughly, to go into every phase of the question, to ascertain Canada's capabilities in building a navy, to look thoroughly into the cost, to ascertain the kind of ships we ought to build, and, having a well thought out scheme, have it put in the form of a Bill and brought before this House. Then the government might appeal to the country on that, and, if sustained, they would be perfectly justified in going on with the measure. That to my mind would be the proper constitutional procedure. But I am thoroughly convinced, as thoroughly convinced as I have ever been in regard to anything in my life, that there is an emergency at the present time. I believe Germany means mischief to the British empire. Hon. gentlemen opposite have seen fit to belittle our anxiety in this matter. They have quoted statements of British statesmen uttered in the heat of an election, when they were trying to placate the electors of Great Britain and to keep them quiet until the elections were over. We on this side of the House in turn have quoted the utterances of these very same men, uttered a few months previous, when there was no election on, and when they would be much more likely to express their real opinions. Now, we know that there has been a great deal of talk back and forth with regard to the attitude of Germany; but out of all the fog and mist of words, there is one outstanding reality, terrible in its reality, towering up above like the peaks of the Rockies, something that cannot be gainsaid; that is, the fact of the terrible anxiety of the German people to outbuild Great Britain in naval construction. There is no man who has been able to gainsay that, and no member of this House has been able to give any reasonable explanation of this attitude on the part of Germany unless it means a purpose to go to war with Great Britain. We have had various explanations given in this House. One ingenious gentleman tells us that it is to overawe the United States into abrogating the Monroe doctrine in order that Germany may establish a colony in Brazil. In regard to that, I want to point to this fact, that if that is the end Germany has in view, she already has a navy sufficient for the purpose. So that there is no necessity for Germany enlarging her navy for any of the purposes that have been mentioned in this House, except that of going to war with Great Britain. I would point, too, to the fact that Great Britain approached Germany not very long ago with a proposition aimed at stopping this mad waste of public money in the race for naval supremacy; but Germany, I will not say contemptuously, but at any rate very abruptly, turned that proposition down with the statement that Germany was able to mind her own business. There is no shadow of doubt that we can escape war by only one method, that is by Great Britain maintaining her supremacy in naval construction. If that is true —and I believe from the bottom of my heart that it is true—what is the duty of Canada in the premises? Is it to commence building a little navy, which will take ten or fifteen years to attain sufficient importance to be of any effect, even in protecting our own commerce? Have the government gone thoroughly into the question of what it means to build a navy—of all the machinery that is requisite, of all the time that it will take to build and equip and man the ships, to put the guns and everything else that appertains to a navy in such order as to be of any practical use? In my humble judgment it will take twenty years at least to do that, and by that time it will be a matter of indifference to Great Britain whether Canada has a navy or not. If we are to view this question only from the standpoint of Canada, with the evident intention of cutting the tie that binds us to the motherland, then of what use will this navy be to Canada? If we sever our connection with the motherland, what would we do in attempting to protect Canada from any first class nation, such as the United States or Germany? We could not for a moment hope to compete with people of that kind. We might just as well be without a navy if we are going to rely upon our own resources. If I felt that we could build a navy in the next two or three years that would be of practical benefit and assistance to the British navy I would hold up both hands in favour of doing so. But I do not believe we can, nor do I think that hon. gentlemen in this House believe that is possible.

I would point out further that Germany, in her position, has no need of a navy. She has the strongest army in the world to-day, she is almost entirely inland, perfectly immune from attack from the sea, so that all the navies of the earth could not attack her with any success. The navy which she is building, therefore, since it is not required for defence, must be for the purpose of aggression. I would further point out that Great Britain is absolutely dependent upon her navy for her very existence. She is dependent upon it for the food supplies of her people, as, in case of war, those supplies could be cut off, if by any chance her naval power suffered a reverse. That being the case we have this condition of things. We have Germany strong enough to protect her own country against attack from any power in the world, and Great Britain all powerful by sea to protect her own coasts and her own people. In my judgment that is an admirable condition of affairs. That gives a counterpoise in the world power which makes for peace; but the moment you see the greatest strength of both the army and navy in one power, I care not what power, that nation will become arrogant and try to dictate to other nations, and thus inevitably bring on war. Looking at the question from every standpoint, it seems to me that there is only one way in which we can preserve peace, and that is by maintaining the supremacy of the British navy. But whatever step may be taken by Canada, none should be taken which would divest the King and his representatives of the full control of the navy. But what position would we be in under the policy of this government? The right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) told us that when England was at war Canada was at war, and in the next breath he said that when England was at war Canada might not be at war. Let me point out that the late wars of Great Britain, such as the South African war, were entirely upon land. In the South African war, the British navy took no part and we were consequently immune from attack. But on account of the British navy not being called into play, the opinion prevails among some people in Canada that we are entirely immune, and that it is a matter of indifference to us whether Great Britain goes to war or not. But should Great Britain go to war with Germany, and should Germany send over one of her great battleships to attack Halifax, how would we meet that attack? Would we nail a copy of 'Hansard' to the coast line and order the German vessels back to sea on the ground that we had nothing to do with Great Britain's wars? Or would the right hon. the Prime Minister go down there, and bring into play that great eloquence of his in order to induce the German commander to sail away because Canada was no part of the British empire? I can safely say that such a proceeding would be highly ludicrous. When Great Britain is at war Canada is at war in the real sense and subject to attack by any foe of Great Britain; and no fine strung theories of the government can alter that fact.

We find some people apparently assuming that we are under no obligation to the motherland. Let me point out that for hundreds of years Great Britain had been laying the foundations for the peace of Canada, as well as other parts of her empire. There is not a privilege which the Canadian people enjoy to-day which has not been secured to us by the expenditure of the blood and treasure of the motherland, and we would be ingrate, indeed, to refuse to-day to give practical assistance to the parent state, and her other oversea dominions. In my opinion we ought to come to her assistance in some practical way. Hon. gentlemen opposite have asked of what practical use would two Dreadnoughts be to the empire. But will any man say that they might not save the situation in the case of war between Germany and Britain? We are told that there is no danger, that Great Britain has a larger number of boats afloat than Germany, that she has a larger tonnage in her navy; but these things count for very little when we consider the fact that a great amount of the tonnage is absolutely obsolete for war purposes to-day, and that we can only depend on such vessels as are up to date when we consider the question of our supremacy as a world-power. I think it would be cheaper for the people of Canada, considered from every standpoint, to do our duty as a people in the existing crisis. If we want to bring about peace, we could do nothing better than give a notification to any possible enemy of Britain that all of her colonies, without exception, stand on all fours in their desire to go to her assistance. We have had no practical answer from the government as to what could be possibly accomplished by the navy they propose to build. As regards the protection of our trade and commerce, it would be absolutely valueless against attack. Such being the case, does it not look like an absolute waste of money to launch an enterprise of this kind?

If, as I have said, there is no emergency, what would be wrong in consulting the people of this Dominion? I want to point out that when this resolution was discussed in this House in March, 1909, the people of Canada had no opportunity of making themselves heard in regard to the matter. And even the people's representatives here in Canada had very little opportunity to consider the question in all its bearings. And I say again that if the government intend to go on with the construction of a navy, two or three years would not be too much time to allow for the thorough discussion of the question, with a view to preparing a well digested scheme in keeping with our needs and capabilities. If it is going to cost Canada two dollars to build here what would cost one dollar if built in the motherland, it seems to me it would be better to order our battleships. If this expenditure upon a navy is going to help our merchant marine, if the government have some scheme by which these vessels would carry our commerce throughout the world, yet be so constructed that they could be speedily converted into war vessels, something might be done in that direction. But, apparently, the government have not the slightest idea of what they are going to do in regard to that matter. They have very little idea of the cost. They make a guess, but it is a mere guess—and we have had some experience in the past as to the accuracy of forecasts that these hon. gentlemen make of the cost of enterprises they launch in this House. Thus, we are absolutely at sea in regard to the cost of the navy we are to construct. That being the case, it seems to me it would be no harm to take a little more time, to go into the matter more thoroughly and make sure that our plan is in accordance with public opinion.

Now, I have taken up the time I had set for myself. There were some other phases of the question I thought I might well discuss, but I feel that it would be unpardonable to do so, therefore I close my remarks. It seems to be the motto of the government to have one suzerain, as they call it, to have one or two flags (two seems to be the favourite idea) to float over the navy, and a divided people. We on this side of the House stand for one King, one country, one navy, one people—united we stand, divided we fall.

Mr. R. S. LAKE (Qu'Appelle). Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to offer an apology for dealing with this important subject even at this stage of the debate. I have no sympathy with the attempt made by members opposite and also by the Liberal press to cut short the discussion of this most important question. The government delayed the introduction of the Bill for more than two months after the opening of the session, and practically no information as to details in connection with the Bill was given for yet another month. As this discussion proceeds, it becomes more and more apparent that the whole question is fraught with consequences of the greatest moment to the whole future of Canada and the empire. This House will not be doing its duty if it attempts to stifle full discussion of the question. Nearly every day's speeches have brought valuable suggestions or have thrown some light upon the sentiment of the country, and everything points to the correctness of the stand which the opposition have taken, that more time should be given to the country to study the question, and no permanent policy developed until the people thoroughly understand it. Meantime, to save Canadian honour, an emergency contribution should be offered to the British government for the immediate construction of ships. I am rising to support this amendment for the following reasons:

1. The essential features of the Bill provide for an independent Canadian navy which shall take no part in, nor rally to, the defence of other parts of the empire, unless specially authorized to do so by the government of the day.

2. That, even if authorized to fight by the government in power, it can render no assistance to the empire in a fleet engagement, and would have to confine its energy to protecting commerce, close to Canadian shores and then only when no superior ship of the enemy was in the neighbourhood.

3. It provides for defence from a thoroughly local standpoint which Lord Selborne, when First Lord of the Admiralty, declared to be a policy which simply invited disaster.

4. That the power given to the government of the day to remain neutral in case of Great Britain being engaged in a naval war includes necessarily the power to haul down the flag and declare the independence of Canada without giving parliament the chance to pronounce upon the subject.

As I do not wish to appear as simply condemning these proposals, poor as they are, to take a step in the direction of naval defence without having an alternative policy to propose, let me say that what I would suggest by way of permanent policy is that negotiations should at once be entered into with the mother country and other parts of the empire looking to the establishment of an imperial council, having under its control foreign policy and imperial defence, in which the various parts of the empire should have representation according to their means and contributions towards imperial defence and diplomacy.

I need say little in regard to my first proposition. The government have made it thoroughly clear that the navy is to be independent of the imperial authorities and absolutely at the disposal of the Dominion government who may or may not, in their discretion, place it on duty during war or invasion. The Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) told us it shall go to no war unless sent by the Governor in Council, but the Bill seems to provide that it shall not even defend itself unless authorized by that body. The hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McLean) tried to explain it the other day. Perhaps he is right as to the intention of the Bill. This is what he said:

> We should keep Canada in this position, that if ever Great Britain should engage in a war of which we did not approve, the justice and righteousness of which we were not convinced of, this country should stand aloof as we have done on other occasions, and act the part of a looker-on.

I will not waste time in asking what kind of inquiry will be made by the government into the justice of the war—whether evidence will be taken, or whether they will decide without knowing all the facts. What I will point out is the responsibility of the position in which they will be placed. Some parallels have been drawn with regard to the militia and the navy. There is no real parallel.

Mr. NESBITT. I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Lake) is reading his speech, and that is against the rules.

Mr. FIELDING. I hope my hon. friend (Mr. Nesbitt) will not press the point, because many members on both sides have done the same.

Mr. NESBITT. If the leader of the House does not wish the point pressed, I have no desire to press it. At the same time, it is against the rules.

Mr. LAKE. The hon. gentleman evidently does not want the discussion cut dwon. I am willing to speak from notes, but if I do so I shall probably take double the time I otherwise would in putting my case before the House. Nearly every hon. member I have seen speaking on the other side, has practically read his speech, and in that way he has contributed to a certain extent to the curtailment of the debate. However, I am under the rules of the House.

If Great Britain is at war then, and the government, under the Militia Act, decides not to send troops, they simply do nothing, conditions remain as they were, except, of course, in the case of an invasion of Canadian soil. On the other hand, if the government decides that the navy shall not participate in a war, they cannot sit still and do nothing, because the navy is on the high seas and flying the British flag, and liable to attack by an enemy wherever it is found. They must take action. What action can they possibly take? Shall they haul up the ships and disband the crews? That will not save them. There can be only one possible way of evading war, and that would be to haul down the British flag and substitute a neutral one. That is the only way to evade participation in war with a naval power. Our great commercial marine, too, would have to haul down the Union Jack and fly a neutral flag. There is this essential difference between the two cases. If the cabinet decides not to participate in hostilities outside Canada, under the Militia Act, they do nothing; if they make the decision under the Naval Bill, they have to do something, they have to take action, they have to haul down the flag. But curiously enough this latter action is not subject to the summoning of parliament. On the other hand, if, under the Naval Bill, they decide to leave things as they are and automatically to adopt the theory that if Britain is at war we are at war, then they have to summon parliament to endorse their action, even for allowing the naval forces of the Dominion to defend the country from invasion.

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe in this cold blooded idea of holding an inquiry into the justice of Britain's action. Great Britain has treated us far differently. Let me read a few words spoken by Lord Tweedmouth in 1907, as to the attitude of Great Britain towards her colonies.

> We want you to give us all the assistance that you can, but we do not come to you as beggars; we gladly take all that you can give us, but at the same time if you are not inclined to give us the help that we hope to have from you, we acknowledge our absolute obligation to defend the King's dominions across the seas to the best of our ability.

Let me quote also from some remarks of the Duke of Newcastle on the 10th of December, 1862:

> The fact known to all the world that war with Canada means war with England—not in Canada only, but upon every sea and upon the shores wherever situated, of the aggressive power itself.

Those are very generous words, Mr. Speaker. Can we afford to be less generous to the mother country than the mother country has been to us? If we will not help the empire will the empire help us? We have received the assistance of the empire on many occasions, the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Reid) mentioned a few, and there would have been many more when we should have been in trouble but for the fact known to the world that the Britsh fleet was behind us. I believe in the policy announced by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Magrath) in the House on the 28th of February, when he said:

My policy as a British subject is to jump into the breach and go to the aid of my fellow British subject wherever on this earth he is, and discuss the righteousness of his cause afterwards.

That is an honest and manly policy, which I believe will appeal to the great mass of the people of this country. When it ceases to be the policy of the British empire, then the empire will shortly cease to exist.

Let me now deal for a few moments with my second point, that is, the adequacy of the government's programme. What do they propose to do? To provide for the completion in five years' time of four unarmoured cruisers and six torpedo boat destroyers, and in the meantime to commence the education of officers and men in training ships to be purchased from the admiralty, and in a naval college which is to be erected in the future. In support of these proposals the government pretend that they are acting in accordance with the wishes of the admiralty, and along the lines suggested at the last imperial conference. This is true in neither case, Mr. Speaker. Fortunately, we now have the report of the defence conference, which was withheld from us in November last when the Prime Minister was so anxious to discuss this question, and we can demonstrate from that report that the wishes of the admiralty were far from being followed, while from previous blue-books we know that a system of purely local defence has always been condemned by them. The views of the admiralty are set forth in a carefully prepared memo dated the 20th July, 1909. In that memo it was stated in the most explicit manner that a direct contribution to the British navy would be the most effectual aid to the problem of naval defence, and that the best results would be obtained by all parts of the empire contributing according to their needs and resources to the maintenance of a single navy, with unity of command and unity of training. Recognizing that this might not be acceptable to all the dominions, they suggested that the next best measure to be taken was that any dominion government desirous of creating a navy should form a distinct fleet unit which, while under local control in time of peace, would be capable of being used in its component parts in time of war. The admiralty then set forth in detail what the unit should consist of, and what its subsidiary services were to be, and they made no other suggestion at all except in regard to matters of detail. This fleet unit was to be headed by an armoured cruiser of the Indomitable class and of the Dreadnought type. They further positively stated that the Dreadnought cruiser was the essential part of a fleet unit, and should be the first vessel to be built. But the Canadian representatives positively refused to meet the wishes of the admiralty in regard to either of these suggestions. Subsequently, on the Canadians stating that they were only prepared to spend a sum of money less than that required to build a fleet unit, the admiralty were good enough to advise them as to how they could spend the money to the best advantage, and that was the only proposal of the admiralty which the government has carried out. This is what has been christened the tin-pot navy, a term which has become widely known throughout Canada. The government have already departed from the advice of the admiralty even with regard to this tin-pot navy—I call it so to distinguish it from that proposed by the admiralty—they have departed even from the policy which they agreed to adopt in connection with it, and have purchased a 13-year old cruiser instead of building a new one of the Boadicea class, and in making this announcement to the House they proudly told us that they had effected a saving of $475,000. If they begin with savings of this nature how are they likely to go on and build the rest even of the fleet they have proposed? The situation then stands thus: The admiralty made two alternative proposals, the acceptance of either of which would have given a substantial addition to the fighting strength of the empire within two years, and our government has refused both proposals, and propose to construct in five years time a small group of ships designed only for commerce protection, should Great Britain retain command of the sea, and of no value whatever to the fighting strength of the empire, and valueless to Canada if the command of the sea passes from British hands. This is quite clear from the utterances of successive lords of the admiralty since 1902. We are proposing to do the very thing they have specifically warned us against as likely to entail disastrous consequences, treating naval defence as a local question.

I believe it to be one of the first principles of war, both on sea and land, to seek out the main force of the enemy wherever it is to be found and beat it. Once this is done, the rest is merely a matter of time; one by one the smaller squadrons and ships will fall into your hands. The advent of the Dreadnought type of warship has made it practically certain that the naval supremacy of the future will be determined by superiority in these ships. Canada is to have none of them. The government proposals still leave her dependent for her protection upon the bounty of the mother country, the bounty of Australia and New Zealand. Is this an enviable position, and can it be acceptable to a self-respecting people like the Canadians? I repeat the navy to be created under this Bill will be of no effective service to the empire and of no use to Canada without the backing of the imperial fleet. To meet our immediate obligations in regard to some contribution to the fleet upon which we in common with all other parts of the empire rely for the protection of our commerce, the safety of our country from invasion, and the peaceful development of the country, the leader of the opposition proposed that we should place at the disposal of the imperial authorities a sum nearly equal to the cost of the fleet unit and its first year's maintenance, to be used by them in the purchase of Dreadnought cruisers, or in such a way as would add most to the efficiency of the impeial navy. That proposition has been rejected by this House, and I earnestly trust now that the provinces may take the matter up and individually offer contributions. I believe they would if this Bill is out of the way.

There is no question whatever as to the reality of the nervousness of the British government in regard to the present situation. Acts speak louder than words. As pointed out in a 'Times' article, read the other day by the Minister of Militia, the British fleet during the last four years has been drawn in from all quarters of the world and concentrated in home waters. And now that the elections are over and the government returned, they are laying down the contingent Dreadnoughts sanctioned last year and asking for a large increase in the navy estimates. I noticed in to-day's paper that the naval estimates brought down in the British House of Commons are $27,000,000 more than they were last year, and the estimates last year were higher than they had ever been before. Even the papers which support the government in the old country, even the 'Morning Chronicle,' the strongest Liberal paper in the old country, predicts that next year's estimates will be even larger as the inevitable price of British freedom. Sir, we see that the mother country is being absolutely ruined by the necessary preparations for the maintenance of the freedom of the British empire. Are we to sit down and do absolutely nothing in this country for the next five years? It is a disgrace to this Dominion if we do so. I do not wish to disparage in the least the magnificent array of warships in the British navy or the splendid men who man them, and I believe the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Lewis) is wrong in saying they are short of men. I believe that there is no difficulty in getting men, but that it is ships that they are short of. The building of Dreadnoughts has revolutionized naval warfare, and times are changing. Not much more than a year ago the premier of Great Britain declared that his naval programme would make Britain ten per cent more powerful than any two other naval powers combined. Within six months, he was compelled to own that it would be all she could do to keep ahead of Germany alone, while within two or three years, she will be inferior to more than one possible combination of powers against her.

Mr. Speaker, if the British empire is true to itself there is no danger. If the dependencies of the empire will contribute to naval defence proportionately to their wealth, or as they would have to do if they were independent states, we should be invincible and could pursue our progress and development in peace and security. I believe this is an insurance we must and should take in the interest of Canadian producers and Canadian commerce.

And now, let me take up the essential features of the Bill that provide for an independent Canadian navy—a navy which is to take part in no war unless the government of the day allow it to do so by order in council. It is these features that I am unalterably opposed to and on account of which I propose to vote against the second reading on the ground that they are ill-advised and dangerous, and that any permanent policy of this nature should first be submitted to the people for their approval or otherwise. As has been said over and over again during this debate the refusal of the government to allow our navy to take part in any naval war in which the empire was engaged would be tantamount to a declaration of independence. The flag would have to be hauled down and neutrality declared, the empire deserted.

It means that this Act is to give the government which happens to be in power at the moment the right to declare the independence of Canada and the people would have no power through their representatives to prevent them. For while power is given and indeed the obligation imposed by the Bill that if the navy is allowed to take part in the war parliament must be summoned. There is no provision on the other hand for the summoning of parliament, if the government of the day declares the neutrality of the fleet. I have already pointed out that government speakers have drawn a parallel between the provisions of the Militia Act and this Bill in regard to the power of the Governor in Council to place the militia on active service either in Canada or out of Canada—and the similar power of the Governor in Council over the fleet. Of course the status of a militia force and a navy are absolutely and entirely different from each other. But, I would like to point out in addition that the fine hand of the premier is to be seen in this provision of the Militia Act just the same as it is in the Navy Act. The hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) stated this provision had been in the statute-book for 40 years and was placed there by the Conservatives. I am surprised that an hon. member who thought it necessary to keep assuring the House how accurate he always is, should have made such a misstatement.

If he had looked up the Acts he would have seen that in the old Militia Acts of 1868 and 1883 this power was absolutely vested in Her Majesty. It was only when this government amended the Act in 1904 that they took the power away from the King and usurped it themselves, just as they now propose to do with the navy which is an infinitely more dangerous matter.

Let me quote the two Acts so as to make it absolutely certain. Militia Act 1904, clause 70:

> The Governor in Council may place the militia, or any part thereof, on active service anywhere in Canada, and also beyond Canada, for the defence thereof, at any time when it appears advisable so to do by reason of emergency.

Clause 72:

> In time of war, when the militia is called out for active service to serve conjointly with His Majesty's regular forces, His Majesty may place in command thereof a senior general officer of his regular army.

Then let us take the Militia Acts of 1868 and 1883. They are practically the same word for word. I think one insignificant word only is altered. Clause 61:

> Her Majesty may call out the militia or any part thereof for active service either within or without the Dominion, at any time, when it appears advisable so to do by reason of war, invasion or insurrection, or danger of any of them.

That Act did not even say that it was to be done for the defence of Canada. These words were inserted in 1904. The clause goes on:

> And the militiamen when so called out for actual service, shall continue to serve for at least one year from the date of their being called out for actual service, if required to do so, or for any longer period which Her Majesty may appoint.

Again:

> Whenever the militia or any part thereof are called out for actual service by reason of war, invasion, or insurrection, Her Majesty may place them under the orders of the commander of her regular forces in Canada.

So, while there is very little difference between this Bill and the Milita Act of 1904 in this regard, it should be remembered that it was this government who set the precedent and interfered with the prerogative, as far as they were able to do so, of His Majesty in 1904. I may mention also that, by some gentlemen who spoke upon the other side of the House, this very fact was actually pointed to as a considerable step towards separation from the empire. Now, Sir, I am prepared to hold the Prime Minister responsible for the difficulty in getting the approval of the people in so many quarters to a proposal to grant assistance to the empire. If the right hon. gentleman has an affection for the empire he has taken a very curious way of showing it. He has never repudiated his advocacy of separation from the empire which he preached in and out of Canada, he has always tried to convey the impression that he is engaged in a constant struggle to maintain our autonomy, and he has never ceased to criticise and vilify most unjustly British diplomacy. I was much struck by the remarks of the member for West Elgin (Mr. Crothers) as to the Prime Minister's connection with the Alaskan Boundary Commission, and that hon. member pointed out that the Prime Minister, acting for the governmnet, actually himself nominated all the members of that tribunal; but he did not say, which is a fact, that the Prime Minister nominated these members against the positive advice of the British foreign office, who advised him that he ought to nominate another class of representatives, and not jurists of repute, as these gentlemen were supposed to be. under the treaty. So that the Prime Minister himself was responsible for the finding of that commission, because there is no doubt whatever that the tribunal would not have made any finding if the right hon. gentleman had followed the advice which was given to him by the British foreign office. Therefore I feel that it is —I do not know that I can use a strong enough word and be within the rules of this House—I was going to say it is contemptible on the part of any man who is responsible for such a condition as that to come back afterwards and throw the whole blame upon the British government. Now, Sir, the Prime Minister's teaching in regard to imperialism has made it most difficult to get some of his compatriots to provide for any naval defence at all. He has told them that imperialism would involve us in the vortex of European militarism. Now, what is the meaning of imperialism. I think, the Prime Minister himself, in moving the resolution on the 29th of March last, gave about as good a definition of imperialism as you could find anywhere, when he used these words:

The Canadian people will be found ready and willing to make any sacrifice that is required to give to the imperial authorities the most loyal and hearty co-operation in every movement for the maintenance of the integrity and the honour of the empire.

That, Sir, is my idea of imperialism. The member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) expressed the same idea a few days ago, when he said:

The imperialist is a man who while doing all his duty to his own country always remembers that his country is part of an empire into which it was born and in which he desires it to remain.

I have consulted a number of authorities in regard to imperialism, and I find that all of them come down to pretty well the same idea as to what imperialism means. Now, why, after moving such a resolution, does the Prime Minister say that he does not intend to be an imperialist, nor does he pretend to be an anti-imperialist. Has he gone back upon that part of the resolution as he has gone back upon all the amendments which he agreed to incorporate in that resolution when he got the members of the opposition to agree to it on the 29th of March last? That is what he has done. That part of the resolution is all so many vain words so far as he is concerned. It is always difficult to understand what the Prime Minister's real intentions are, because he makes so many contradictory statements as to his actual position. Can this mean that after all his protests, he takes no interest whatever in the British empire? It seems to me that is the only meaning that can be attached to his words. Many years ago in this House, the right hon. gentleman condemned the idea, to use his own words, 'of welding together a gigantic British empire on the face of the earth,' and on that occasion he stated that he thought the conception of individual British communities was a grander idea. Is this still his idea, and is he still at the bottom of his heart in favour of separation from the British empire and of independence as he was in 1892? I have no doubt whatever in my own mind that the difficulties which exist to-day in doing anything effective for the common defence of Canada and the empire is due mainly to the influence of the Prime Minister in the province of Quebec. The right hon. gentleman has lately gone a step further in his independence ideas, and he has tried to propagate the gospel even in Ontario. Some attention has been given to his speech in Toronto on the 5th of January last, and I propose to put on 'Hansard' his own version of what he said, and which will be found in answer to a question on the 24th of January last ('Hansard,' page 2357).

We are under the suzerainty of the King of England. We are his loyal subjects. We bow the knee to him, but the King of England has no more rights over us than are allowed him by our Canadian parliament.

I do not intend to discuss the statement that the King has no more power in Canada than the parliament chooses to give him, because that point was most effectually dealt with by the member for West Elgin. I do intend, however, to refer for a moment to the use of the word 'suzerain,' because I believe the Prime Minister used it advisedly and deliberately and with an ulterior motive. It is, of course, in its original meaning a word signifying the relation of a fedual lord to his vassals, and we constantly come across it in books which deal with the old fedual system. It is a word, however, that since the year 1891 has had a special significance in English ears. It was used by Mr. Gladstone to describe the special relationship for which he was responsible between the Queen of England and the Transvaal when peace was concluded after the Boer victory at Majuba Hill. I can well remember the discussion which took place in the English newspapers as to the meaning of the new relationship under which the Transvaal republic recognized the suzerainty of the Queen. Mr. Gladstone explained it on the 25th of July, 1881, as follows:

After all that had occurred it became necessary that there should be some plan fixed and agreed upon between us, so that they (the Transvaal) should know what obligations they were under to us, and that we should have no powers except such as were well understood by them. That is the plan which we have actually adopted. I apprehend that the term which has been adopted, 'suzerainty of the Queen,' is intended to signify that certain portions of sovereignty are reserved, and are expressly reserved; but that all that is not reserved is given up. That is the meaning which, I think, we ourselves should attach to the term. What are those portions of sovereignty? The portions of sovereignty that we desire to reserve are, first, those which relate to the relations between the Transvaal community and foreign countries—the whole care of the foreign relations of the Boers. Those foreign relations are not altogether unknown to the Boers in their brief independent existence. They had communications with various countries of Europe, with various considerable countries of Europe; but the whole of these relations in the future will remain in the hands of the Queen. But what was still more important was that we should reserve sufficient power to make provision for the interests of the natives, and this reservation of foreign relations was a most important one as regards the interests of the natives, because a very large portion of the native interests of the country involve the natives beyond the frontier of the Transvaal, &c.

Those are the only two reservations of sovereignty which Mr. Gladstone declared were retained in the condition of suzerainty which the Transvaal agreed to, so that there having been a considerable discussion on the subject I am surprised that the Prime Minister—a man who takes an interest in everything that is going on in the empire—did not remember that discussion when he used the word 'suzerainty.' It will be remembered that under these conditions which I have just quoted in Mr. Gladstone's words, the Transvaal was an independent republic, flew an independent flag, and British subjects within its borders were aliens. The Prime Minister, on the 3rd of February in this House made an explanation of his use of the word 'suzerainty,' and he said:

I do not pretend to be a master of the English language, but I think I know something of it, and I have always understood that if there is any difference between 'sovereignty' and 'suzerainty' it is merely a shadow, and that it is used by men of great eminence indifferently as applying to the same condition of things.

The Prime Minister is much too modest. I should imagine that there are few men in the House who are such masters of the English language as he is; there are few men more careful to use the exact word to convey the idea than the Prime Minister. According to his statement on the 3rd of February, after the matter had been discussed and the word criticised the Prime Minister still professed and believed that there is only a shade of difference between the two words. He might have satisfied himself by looking up the interpretation of the term by legal authorities, or even by looking at the ordinary dictionaries. I have a suspicion that he did look at the dictionaries for I find in the Century Dictionary the reference to the lady in Quentin Durward. Would it not have been more candid if he had given us the definition which immediately preceded the quotation which gave the meaning as 'Sovereign but not supreme.'

But would you be surprised, Mr. Speaker, to learn that the Prime Minister once discussed in this very House the question of 'suzerainty,' as applied to the Transvaal republic? Let me quote what he said on the 31st of July, 1899, 'Hansard,' page 8992:—

The Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) with the unanimous consent of the House, Mr. Speaker, I beg to interrupt the regular course of the business, in order to offer certain resolutions which I believe the state of things now existing in a distant country under the suzerainty of Her Majesty seems to render appropriate. Every one will agree with me that the development of the British empire has now reached such a condition and degree of consolidation that no part of it can affect to be indifferent to anything that may be going on in any other part, and, assuredly, we cannot be indifferent to the condition of things existing in the Transvaal state, which, it must be remembered, though an independent and self-governing country, is under the suzerainty of Her Majesty. Some 80,000 of Her Majesty's subjects have been allowed to become residents of that country, to purchase lands there, to open mines, to develop trade, to establish industries and to build up cities, yet are denied almost every kind of participation in its administration. They are subjected to discriminating and heavy taxation, and yet are denied any kind of representation, and although forced to bear their full share of citizenship, are denied the rights and privileges and liberties of citizens.

Later on, he said:—

It must not be forgotten either, when we come to deal with this question, that Her Majesty is the suzerain of the Transvaal republic, and became so with the full consent of the people of the Transvaal. It must not be forgotten that, at a time when the Dutch population of the Transvaal was in dire distress, when they were threatened almost with annihilation by their neighbours, when they were threatened with something like civil war among themselves, they appealed for British interference, and, after a series of events, which there is no use going into at this moment, a treaty of peace was concluded between the people of the Transvaal and Her Majesty, by which, on the one hand, while the independence of the Transvaal was recognized, on the other hand the suzerain power of Her Majesty was fully recognized and admitted. The least, then, that can be expected is that the subject of the suzerain power should not only be not subjected to any kind of oppression, but be given also rights equal to those enjoyed by the citizens of the Transvaal republic.

I desire you to note the distinction between His Majesty's subjects and the citizens of the republic. I might perhaps also quote the resolution moved by the right hon. gentleman, as follows:—

1. Resolved, that this House has viewed with regret the complications which have arisen in the Transvaal republic, of which Her Majesty is suzerain, from the refusal to accord to Her Majesty's subjects now settled in that region any adequate participation in its government.

2. Resolved, that this House has learned with still greater regret that the conditions of things there existing has resulted in intolerable oppression, and has produced great and dangerous excitement among several classes of Her Majesty's subjects in her South African possessions.

3. Resolved, that this House, representing a people which has largely succeeded, by the adoption of the principle of conceding equal political rights to every portion of the population, in harmonizing estrangements and in producing general content with the existing system of government, desires to express its sympathy with the efforts of Her Majesty's imperial authorities to obtain for the subjects of Her Majesty who have taken up their abode in the Transvaal, such measure of justice and political recognization as may be found necessary to secure them in the full possession of equal rights and liberties.

And yet the Prime Minister told us the other day that: 'I have always understood that if there is any difference between sovereignty and suzerainty, it is merely a shadow. I leave it to the House to decide between the two statements, and to say whether the Prime Minister used the word suzerainty designedly or not. There is this further point to be remembered: that the Transvaal was independent, and had its own flag. If we are under the suzerainty rather than the sovereignty of the King, we would have to have our own flag. I believe this was in the mind of the Prime Minister. It is the logical sequence of the position taken in regard to the proposed navy. The Prime Minister says it is to remain neutral until the government decide whether it is to take part in any war in which Great Britain is engaged. How can any ships on the high seas, flying the Union Jack remain neutral in the presence of a power at war with His Britannic Majesty? It is impossible. The next proposal we shall undoubtedly have from the Prime Minister is that to carry out the intention of this Bill it is necessary that some other flag than the Union Jack should fly over the proposed navy. I have already seen the proposal in a paper supporting the government naval policy. It says:

This is another stride forward in the development of our nationality. A Canadian army, a Canadian navy, a Canadian gold coinage. This is an admirable trio. Shortly we will have a real Canadian flag, which will be more suitable than the plain Union Jack and more acceptable to the much-speaking people.

I wonder whether the new Canadian flag will have the same talismanic influence in Europe to which the Prime Minister referred as the Union Jack! I fear not! The first war in which the empire is engaged in which the Canadian navy refuses to take a part in, inevitably means the hauling down of the Union Jack from our ships, and the declaration of our neutrality, or independence. It means the same thing. But let me say to the Prime Minister, you may legislate a man out of his civil rights, you may legislate him out of his personal liberty, but you cannot by Act of parliament deprive him of his allegiance. You cannot take his flag from him. That is a personal matter, a matter of his conscience. If you try to take that from him by force, he will fight, and he has a right to fight.

In the earlier part of the debate the opinion, expressed on this side of the House, that the Prime Minister still desired ultimate separation from the empire, and the independence of Canada, and that his naval proposals were based on this desire, caused much excitement among his supporters. They expressed great indignation because his speeches on the subject were quoted and commented on. The continuation of the debate, however, has proved that he has a considerable following of Liberals in this House who advocate candidly separation. Most of the references to the subject have been more or less veiled, but there have been some very frank expressions of opinion. The member for Nicolet (Mr. Turcotte) was the chief spokesman, and I shall endeavour to offer a somewhat free translation of the words used by him last week:

It ill-becomes politicians of many years' experience, who have seen unfold before them the great events and the political changes which are now relegated to the history of our country, who have seen the nation grow, and who know its vigour and its immense resources, it is neither patriotic nor loyal on the part of these men to clog the full development of our political organization, and to pretend that we should always remain under the protection of the English flag. But, thank God, I am convinced it will not be thus, and the creation of a military fleet is, in my humble opinion, the last step towards independence.

It is this point of view especially, and I should say exclusively, that I take in giving my adhesion to the Liberal policy of the moment. I speak from the Canadian point of view, and I think that this manner of regarding (facing) the question is also that of the voters in my county, and I do not think I exaggerate in saying that it is that of the great majority in the province of Quebec.

Later on, he said:

In concluding, I wish to clearly declare the motives which urge me to vote in favour of the present measure; they are, first of all, the great confidence which I have in the policy so surely directed by my right honourable chief; secondly, the constitutional conditions in which our country is placed in regard to England; and thirdly, and above all, the interest which I bear to my country, and my conviction that the establishment of a war-navy will be the last step towards a political state more perfect and more in conformity with our national aspirations—independence. But I desire this independence only inasmuch as we could attain it with the good-will and

'entente cordiale' of England, to whom, I am happy to acknowledge, we owe that which we are to-day, and in whose favour I am proud to proclaim myself a loyal and devoted subject.

I call special attention to the statement made that he believed the majority of the people of Quebec were in accord with his point of view, and also that he gave as his reason for supporting the Bill that he considered it the final step towards independence. I presume from what has been said in the House that the doctrine of separation from the empire and independence for Canada is being widely preached. Moreover, the fact that perhaps the best known and ablest advocate of separation, Mr. J. S. Ewart, is employed in a most prominent position in the conduct of our fisheries case before the Hague tribunal gives him the endorsation of the Liberal party, and gives weight to his propaganda. I propose, therefore, to offer a few comments on the probable effects of independence, following the lines taken in the earliest part of this debate by the Postmaster General. The Postmaster General, the other evening, gave a list of independent countries with a population of less than 10,000,000, who have navies of their own. It was headed by the Argentine Republic—a country much the same size as the organized portion of Canada, but with a slightly smaller population. There they have a naval programme calling for an expenditure—I am using the Postmaster General's figures—of $35,000,000, with three Dreadnoughts under construction and universal military service imposed on the population. In every one of the countries in that list, with the exception of the Negro republics of Hayti and St. Domingo, and possibly Peru, they have universal military service or conscription. Roughly speaking, it may be said that it is only in the British empire and the United States that universal military service or conscrpition has not to be enforced as the price of independence. If Canada were to become independent to-morrow, the only possible guarantee of its liberties would be the immediate enforcement of universal military service upon our population. Independence would undoubtedly carry militarism with it. That is the experience of all other states—why not with us?

Let me mention another price that would have to be paid for independence. During the South African war, it will be remembered that Canadian securities were placed on the trustee list in England. In moving for the requisite legislation in this House the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) made the statement that the enhanced value of Canadian securities that would accrue thereby would more than cover the whole cost to Canada of that war. I would like to impress that fact on the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McLean), who said that Great Britain had done nothing for Canada for which she had not received full value. If, instead of being an integral portion of the British empire, Canada was to become a republic, her securities would undoubtedly at once have to be removed from the British trustee list, and as a weak and struggling republic, her credit would undoubtedly drop, and I do not think I should be far astray in saying the annual cost to this country on that score alone would amount to four or five millions a year. But the Postmaster General did not confine himself to a comparison of independent countries, he devoted some time to an argument against dependence on the Monroe doctrine and its inevitable result—absorption into the United States. I don't think any one can doubt but that union with the United States would mean for Quebec just what the Postmaster General suggested—the loss of their language, their laws, their schools, their usages and customs. It would also mean that Canada would have to contribute its share to the naval and military and pension expenditure of the union. In 1908 that share would have amounted to $37,000,000. In 1909, a large reduction was made in the vote, but even then our contribution, according to population, would have amounted to about $29,000,000. Surely it would be better if only from this point of view alone, to do our share towards the maintenance of an imperial navy? It would not cost us one-third as much as absorption into the union.

I have already spoken at far greater length than I had intended, but I wish to say one thing more in support of my contention for an imperial council. In my opinion the time has come when some definite action should be taken for the closer knitting together in a political union of the different parts of the empire. The policy of each over-sea dominion providing their own navies and keeping them, even in peace time, under their own control, is unsatisfactory, while in war time, if such provisions as those in this Bill are enacted, it becomes dangerous. If we had one imperial council upon which all the dependencies of the empire had a due share of representation, and which controlled the two subjects of foreign policy and defence, it would be possible for all the dominions to contribute to one imperial navy without in any way infringing upon any rights of self-government. This is no new matter. It was put in definite form by Mr. Chamberlain at the imperial conference of 1902, as follows:

His Majesty's government while they could welcome any approval which might be made to a more definite and a closer union, feel that it is not for them to press this upon you. The demand if it comes and when it comes, must come from the colonies. If it comes, it will be enthusiastically received in this country. . . .

I would refer to an expression in an eloquent speech of—the Premier of the Dominion of Canada—an expression which has called forth much appreciation in this country, although I believe that Sir Wilfrid Laurier has himself explained that it was not quite correctly understood. But the expression was 'If you want our aid call us to your councils.'

'We do want your aid,' 'whenever you make the request to us be assured we shall gladly call you to our councils. If you are prepared at any time to take any share, any proportionate share in the burdens of the empire, we are prepared to meet you with any proposal for giving to you a corresponding voice in the policy of the empire.'

Three years ago an article appeared in the London 'Standard,' at the time of the imperial conference, which I would like to quote. It is as follows:

We, of the old country, to put the matter quite plainly, have not the smallest desire to keep the distant shires of the empire in leading strings; we do not wish to hinder—we would rather help—their advance to nationhood. But we will not attempt to force them to take their places as fully-grown members of the family until they demonstrate, of their own free-will, their desire to do so. We wish to see an Imperial Witan created; we wish to see an imperial navy ride the seas; but, until the five nations offer willingly, we will bear cheerfully the burden of their defence and the exacting task of endeavouring to adjust foreign relations with regard at once to the interests of the imperial whole and the susceptibilities of its component parts.

And let me also point to the fact that when the United States brought in their dependencies they gave them representation in congress. There are representatives sitting in the congress of the United States to-day from Porto Rico, the Philippines and Hawaii. Why should it not be possible for our statesmen to devise some similar arrangement for the component parts of the British empire? These difficulties about the Navy Bill convince me that the time has come when we should make a step forward and act on Mr. Chamberlain's suggestion. And Canada, the premier colony of the empire, should lead the way.

Mr. GLEN CAMPBELL (Dauphin). Mr. Speaker, there is an old saying which, I presume, you have heard. 'Whom to know is to love.' If there is any man in this House who awakens that feeling in the hearts of hon. members on either side it is our good friend the hon. member for South Waterloo (Mr. Clare). He is frail in body at present, but he is in this House the lone German representing a Canadian constituency, and loyal to the core. When he was speaking last night, I know, your sympathies were with him as were those of all his other fellow-members. You could see, Sir, that he was labouring against the frailities of his body, labouring to voice in this House his opinions against the policy brought forward by this government, and also, in some measure, against the policy of his party and voiced by his political leader. You could not help, no hon. member of this House could help, but feel strong sympathy for him. Frail in body, great in courage, he stood here declaring his opinions. And you could not but feel, as every member felt, when an hon. member of this House got up and offered factious interruption, that he was doing something that was not right for any member of this House to do. For the first time in my life I felt ashamed of the fact that Scotch blood runs in my veins when I heard that 2 x 4 Scotch proposition get up and abuse my hon. friend from South Waterloo. It reminded me of the fact that some of the Scotch are the descendants of sheep stealers and cattle lifters. But when I heard the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. M. Y. McLean) I could not help but think that even at that he was a degenerate son of the race.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think that expression is beyond the limits of debate.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, there is no man in this House who is so ready and willing to abide by your decision as I am, and I will at once absolutely take back the word, if you will permit me the pleasure of the reminiscence of having said it.

To come to the subject that is before the House. I am afraid that, to some extent, I shall have to infringe on the rules, the infraction of which was so strongly objected to by the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) for the reason that I have not taken the time to properly get my views on this subject into shape to present to the House. In saying that, I want to say, further, that if there is any hon. gentlemen in this House who ought to speak by the book and read his speeches to do his common sense justice, it is the hon. member for North Oxford. In offering a few remarks on the subject before the House, I shall have to do what many Liberals in this House have not done—take the same stand to-night that I took this time last year. To emphasize that, I ask your permission to refer to what I said in this House on April 26 last, as reported in 'Hansard':

I listened to the splendid logical argument laid before this House on the matter of imperial defence or aid to imperial defence delivered by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster). It was found fault with by the hon. gentleman who leads the House.

Why? Because it was not concrete. That is the fault he found with it and what did he give us? He gave us verbiage, which means nothing. Why, Sir, it is time for this House to realize that the whole world is looking to Canada in this particular matter. I say the whole world and I mean it. Why these little Japanese, with their civilization 4,000 years older than ours in some matters of esthetics and the arts, have come to realize in the last few years that painting and ornamental work of that kind does not bring them anything, they have become ambitious to take a position in the world, and have taken a position by defeating great Russia. The fact that they defeated Russia has stimulated them to further aspirations, there is no doubt about that, they are looking around for fresh worlds to conquer, they are watching to see what Canada is going to do, when the motherland is calling. Then there is Russia, she is watching as we all know, to see if anything will befall the navy of Great Britain. If anything occurs to the navy of Great Britain, I am of the opinion that the next day Russia will be marching across the borders into northern India. Germany is watching to see what Canada will do. Why? Because she has an idea that if she can only beat England on the sea she has the supremacy of the world. She is watching to see if Great Britain has her colonies at her back, she is watching to see whether the Germans, who have come out here by thousands, are ready to support loyally the country of their choice and their adoption.

France is watching for the same reason that all the minor powers in Europe are watching, watching on account of her commerce for one reason, because she knows that the naval power of Great Britain has stood for the safe commerce of the world, has stood for the safe commerce of all the smaller countries, knows that the navy of Great Britain has not been maintained and brought to its present standard because Great Britain desired to go out to conquer new worlds, but simply because Great Britain believed that as long as she held the supremacy of the seas, the commerce of all kinds from the smallest nation to the greatest nation was safe. France is looking to this colony to see what it will do. France does not forget that on this side of the Atlantic are the descendants of Frenchmen in their thousands, she looks to them to see whether the old French chivalry, the loyalty to the flag which protects them, is dead in the descendants of the men who came over from beauteous France. She is looking to see if chivalry died in this country when fell Montcalm.

I think further that we ought to remember that in Great Britain there are hundreds of thousands, nay millions of people, who for all those decades have been paying 'with a smile' for the protection of Canada as well as other colonies, they have been paying their taxes, and it has been hard to pay them, with a smile, because they know it is Great Britain's colony, it was the daughter of the great mother, whom they were helping to protect. Those people are looking to us to see whether we are going to respond to the call, if we are not going to show that we were ready to help our brothers across the seas in bearing the burden they have to bear on our account. All through Canada, the people have been looking to see if anything definite is going to be done. Every board of trade from the Atlantic to the Pacific has been passing resolutions to that end, to have Canada show herself, show her hand, show her willingness to come out in the open and say: We are with the mother country. Send the message to Great Britain, 'you can call on us for what you want and we are behind you.'

I was more than surprised to hear the hon. gentleman from Nanaimo (Mr. Ralph Smith)—

But I wont say here what I said of him then, because he has made two somersaults since then. I referred also to the hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Congdon), and went on to say:

Knowing the people of the north country as I do, I declare that his sentiments as expressed in this House are not the sentiments of the men who have gone into that north country and taken their lives in their hands from day to day. I hope the First Minister will reconsider his reply of two or three days ago with regard to aid in the matter of Dreadnoughts. I hope he will consider that even although he cannot trust me to back him up in many of the things he does, there is one thing in which I and every Conservative would support him, loyally and enthusiastically, that is, if he would come to this House and give us a part in saying what we will do for the mother country and for the empire. Had he been here, I would have taken pleasure in telling him that it is my opinion that this is the hour and he is the man, and all Canada is looking to him.

Those were my sentiments expressed in this House last year, and I regret exceedingly that I must take back the last sentence in which I stated that this was the hour and he was the man. The hour is here, but the man is not. While I am only a humble member of the Conservative party and a follower of the hon. the leader of the opposition, I feel now as I felt then, that I was voicing the opinion of the Conservatives in this House. They would have been glad Sir, to have a part in doing something substantial for the empire at that time. If the First Minister would bring forward a policy now that would be in the slightest degree an available help to the empire, he would not have a stauncher supporter in this House than myself. But last night, when the exigencies of the occasion demanded that I should vote with him, I have to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that never in my life did I do anything that so grated against my feelings as to support him in any respect whatever, pertaining to his naval policy. He has brought down a little old naval scheme, and an abortion at that, and not only an abortion, but an abortion tainted, to my mind, with disloyalty and separation from the empire. I never will support it in any manner, shape or form; and if I knew my efforts would avail anything, I would stay here till Christmas fighting that Bill. The Bill is absolutely inadequate in every way, it is absolutely useless in case an emergency should arise, it is not a fighting force in any shape or form. In saying this, I am not saying anything original by any means, because I have only to refer to the way it has been characterized by some hon. gentleman on the other side of the House, beginning with the First Minister himself. Let me quote a few of their expressions: 'Built to elude pursuit'. That is a nice kind of fighting force. 'For policing our own waters and patrolling our trade routes'. That is another one of the arguments they bring forward. Now the First Minister is not present, and I regret it, because there are one or two questions I would like to ask him. What ships have been policing our grain routes and taking care of our trade for the last 150 years? None at all, Sir. What ships are going to protect our trade routes and our commerce and look after our ports for the next five or six years until his little navy is built? None. I will tell him the answer to those questions, I will tell him what has protected our trade routes: The great, old, grand, old, Union Jack, the flag that has been flying over all our towns and our cities, over our commerce, over our merchant service boats. But, Mr. Speaker, there is something behind it. That flag in itself could not protect anything were it not for the fact that it represents the supremacy of the great British empire's fleet in the North sea and the English channel. Our protection has been something invisible, but none the less has it been absolutely equal to all occasions. They talk about a little dinky tin-pot navy that is going to patrol our shores and protect our trade routes. Why, Sir, I am surprised to hear hon. gentlemen opposite talk that way. They have lots of sense in other things. These are things they know as well as I do. They know them, because I have heard hon. gentlemen opposite saying these things last year, and all through the session. Until this year they were the most independent bunch I ever heard speak in my life, until they came in here and were up against it.

The supremacy of the sea, when held by Great Britain, is what protects our trade, our commerce and the commerce of the world. It stands for the safety of all the world. The flag is emblematic of that supremacy. Break that supremacy and what will happen? Our grand old Union Jack will only be a reminiscence of past glory, it will not be able to protect anything, not even itself, and the nations that wrest from the great British empire that supremacy that she now holds for the welfare of the world, will be our masters and we will have to dance to their tune. You cannot get over that. I have heard a great many eminently selfish speeches on this question, but if the hon. gentlemen who made these selfish speeches would go one little step further, or open their minds one little tiny bit, they would realize the selfishness of their position, and they would agree with me when I tell them that it is up to them to do something to help the mother country to hold the supremacy that protect them, even from the point of selfish self interest. We hear from the other side of the House various opinions—independence, building up Canada, separation—every kind of opinion you can think of, but at the same time every hon. gentleman who speaks on the other side of the House congratulates himself and throws a stone at us on this side because we are not in the same box as they are in, in that they are a united party and we are not. For sure they are a united party! I like that kind of union! They are united—I admit it—on one point and I will tell hon. gentlemen what that point is, and it is the only point of union amongst them; it is because Sir Wilfrid Laurier says so. That is why they are united, and there is no other reason. Last year half the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, as well as the 'Globe,' which is the accredited official organ of the government, were in favour of doing something at once. The 'Globe' wrote editorials, and some of these editorials I have to believe—I do not believe them all but I am, perforce, compelled to believe some, because I understand they were written by a gentleman who wears, or used to wear, the clerical garb—and these editorials advocated giving at once to the old country at least three Dreadnoughts. I need not weary the House by reading those editorials because they have already been introduced by the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Crothers). I, myself, heard half of the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, or perhaps not quite that per cent, after the resolution was passed in March last, telling their whip from Quebec that they would not vote for anything that would help the old country—no contribution, no Dreadnoughts, nothing—but they are all ready now, behind the right hon. First Minister, to jump when he calls. They all hurrah for Laurier, a united party and navy—tin pot at that. I do not believe that there is more than five per cent of them who are not ashamed of themselves for having to take this stand. I will tell you another reason why they are going to vote for this Bill. No vote means no patronage.

Mr. E. ROY. You know your side of the House better than our side.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I will speak to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Roy), who has just spoken.

Mr. E. ROY. I may say to the hon. gentleman that I have no patronage at all in my constituency.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I presume the hon. gentleman is representing a constituency up where the 'Arctic' went among the Esquimaux.

Mr. E. ROY. My constituency has been represented here for twelve years by a Conservative.

Mr. CAMPBELL. No public buildings, and no barrel to carry them through the next elections, because without a barrel, none of them would come back here on such policies as Lumsden charges of over-classification, saw-dust piles that are called wharfs, Newmarket canals without any water in them, pot-boy palaces at Kingston, an expenditure of $112,000 for eight little cottages for the bung-starters who are to occupy them. And yet, they call upon this House to support a naval policy like that, a naval policy that they do not dare to submit to the people. If it is possible to say 'and worse still,' I will say it; and, worse still, they propose to put this navy under the management of a department of this government that under a very superficial investigation at the hands of Judge Cassels, not very long ago, was adjudged to be reeking with graft, crookedness and lack of conscience. That is where they are going to put this navy. It is scandalous. I am surprised that even a Liberal would stand for it—a department that has been in charge of the buoys that were set out at various places along our coast. After a buoy broke loose at the Old Proprietor reef on the Bay of Fundy it took this department that you are going to give your navy to, ten months to get that buoy back in place, and during that time, owing to their absolute criminal negligence—and it was nothing else—forty valuable lives were lost, as was so realistically depicted in this House by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Daniel) last year. Shame on your department. What will a department do with a navy that cannot manage a little old buoy? You have heard the slogan on the other side of the line. 'Remember the "Maine."' You know what that text meant on the other side of the line. But, Sir, I would say to the decent Liberals, and there are lots of them——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BARKER. They are not here tonight.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes, they are; they are warped politically, but they are decent if you can ever get at their consciences. There is the trouble. I want the decent Liberals in this House when they are asked to vote for this navy to remember that it is going to cost millions and millions of dollars, not only to them, but to their children and their grand children, for all time and eternity. There is not get away from that. And, I will give them a slogan to remember it by—instead of 'Remember the "Maine"', let the cry be: 'Remember the "Minnie M."' with its stories of ballot boxes, and debauchery, and blackguardism; 'remember the "Arctic"', another of your fleet with its stores of booze, drugs of all kinds unmentionable, and ladies spring hats for the Esquimo four hundred. Remember these things boys. Remember the 'Montcalm' with its stores of cut glass and silverware bought from party friends at prices, three and four and five and six times more than they were worth. Remember these things when you go to vote, and remembering them beware of the navy. It seems to give gentlemen on the other side of the House a kind of nightmare when any one says 'emergency'. And I do not wonder at that because the First Minister for example, and the Minister of Militia and Defence must remember when they hear that word the emergency rations that they sent to our boys in South Africa, and that is a sore spot with them. The hon. member for Pictou in his speech the other day gave to this House the sentiments of a South African veteran, and I do not think I can do better than quote from a friend of mine who was right at the front in South Africa, and who knows what he was talking about. He says:

I think the arrangement with the Dominion was, but I am not sure that they supplied the rations and clothing that went with the men and horses, and the imperial government was to pay the Dominion the amount they charged, but you can find out, for sure, yourself.

The 2nd, 3rd 4th, 5th and 6th Regiments C. M. Rifles, and 10th Field Hospital were organized, paid, equipped and maintained throughout at the sole expense of the imperial government. It did not cost Canada one iota, not even the price of a bottle of ink for the orderly room. Wickwire was Sir Frederick Borden's purchasing agent at Halifax for these, charging the whole to the imperial government, and Oh, my, poor imperial government, they ought to give her four Dreadnoughts, and they would still owe her money.

Now in the case of the 1st C.M.R., we were to receive three shillings a day for a private soldier (and pay went up according to rank), but deducted from that was one shilling and two pence we received from the imperial purse, making a private get the handsome allowance of one shilling and ten pence a day from Canada. In comparison our comrades, the New Zealanders and Australians, received for a private five shillings a day from their respective colonies, to which was added the one and two pence from the imperial government. Our clothing was the merest shoddy, just about as poor as is made, it wearing out in the matter of a few weeks. Our underclothing was so poor that General Hutton had to buy us some out of his own pocket, the issue being considered an imperial issue. The clothes were so frightfully poor he managed to get us some imperial clothes to wear. In contrast, the New Zealanders and Australians had the very best of underclothes, including real Bedford cord riding breeches, and serges made of as good a material as our officers.

Our rations.—First, the emergency ration. You must know this is a ration which a soldier can only use in case of being cut off from the supply column to keep body and soul together. Now, the ration we got, on being analyzed was found to be made of pure Indian corn. Laurier and Sir Frederick Borden must have thought of the pure food law in this case, as it was the only pure food we got. The size of the tin, as near as my memory carries me, was about the size of a two-ounce tin of Capstain tobacco, with about enough corn to keep a hen alive about five minutes, and an ordinarily healthy man about five seconds. We were paraded at Bloomfontein just before we started on Roberts's advance and had the ration taken away from every officer and man, and an English emergency given us in its place. Can you imagine our feelings, just arriving in a strange land, standing there before all the imperial troops, subjected to such an indignity, and the blessings we asked to be showered down on Laurier and Sir Frederick. It was said, and I have every reason to believe it was true, that the English officers who made the exchange said that the men who sent us out with that ration ought to be hung, and that they would like to pull the rope. There were about fifteen hundred of us in South Africa then, and this ration of pure Indian corn cost the Dominion, for which the imperial government cheerfully paid, I think, $50,000, but you can find out for sure. These are the same men who begrudge giving money to England for a navy. This philanthropic Laurier and this patriotic Borden just sent us out there to die like rabbits, should circumstances have necessitated the use of this ration; for you must understand that so much was thought of it that we were liable to a field general court martial (which has the power of awarding a death sentence) if we used it except to save starvation. In Laurier and Borden's case I wonder how fat they would get if, already in a half-starved condition, they had about an ounce of this pure food to live on. You can quite realize the indignation of the English officers when they had a ration themselves taking up very little more room that would make a pail of first class soup and a jug of the finest chocolate. Laurier and Borden, why their names were spoken of in the merest contempt, and there were many true Christian men who wished them both in a hotter place than South Africa, to which place they sent us out to starve. Their canned meats—you should have seen them, or rather smelt them. Why, they smelt nearly as bad as that box would if they lifted the lid where they hide their colossal steals. Their jam—put it all in a row, peach, marmalade, apricots, plum, apple and strawberry, and open the lot up, and you will find the same thing in all—one blue glucose, all the same colour but with different names. Their hay, musty and dusty, and so rotten that it could not be used for bedding. Oats, same quality. Why, I saw where that righteous Laurier denied they were pulling it out and throwing it into the ocean, but it is a fact, as we all saw it, to our shame. The only mistake the Boers made was not to buy this stuff up, because even after the best of this was sorted out all one had to do was to tell the 'Tommies' there was an issue of 'Canadian' rations coming along and they would run like old Harry (oh, the odour). In contrast to this, the Australian and New Zealand colonies, who had the same distance and transportation (practically) sent to the imperial government the very finest beef and mutton, better in fact I am sure than you have tasted in the best restaurant in Ottawa. Jam, hay and oats of the finest that money could buy; and arrived in South Africa in the very best condition; so much so in fact that our quartermaster was only telling me the other day that in drawing supplies from the Army Service Corps, he always tried to get fodder and meat that our sister colonies had supplied. Think what this must have been to a Canadian; and what do you think of our thoughts for that pious Laurier? When talking to an Australian (who had had a draught of seven years in their country) we would say to him, why don't you come to Canada, that is the best country in the world? He would say, oh, it must be, but not for us old boys, for if its anything like your meat, hay, oats, jam or the pay you receive, it must be a peach of a place. The only pure, sweet thing in the food line we have seen from your country is the emergency ration, which we might poison rabbits with except that it would take six tins to find enough corn to mix the poison with to kill one rabbit. Now, this is true, and no fiction about it, and you can imagine our feelings towards that Laurier-Borden combination, and what great colonists these brother colonials of ours would make in our western country, and how if it had not been for the rotten supplies that was sent out from here we could have got a thousand or more of them to come back to the west with us where they would have made ideal citizens, for they are about as fine a race of men as you ever saw.

After discussing the field hospitals, he goes on to say:

Now, imagine such men as Laurier and Borden talking of equipping a navy of our own. Why there is not a man living who was out in South Africa who does not shudder at the idea. It will be a navy so rotten in its structure and its interior economy that the world would shudder if it could see the inside. Just imagine these old contractor friends of Laurier of South African fame, how much rejected jam and clothes and fodder they must have on hand by now to outfit the navy with, and no imperial government to throw them into the sea and pay for fresh supplies out of their own pockets. Talk about the German swindle in armour plate; how much old useless iron Laurier and Borden's friends must have on hand to be made into armour plate? Why, I bet they are figuring it out now, for if this pair have done it once they will do it again. The lives of the men who vote for them (as shown in the South African war, for the officers were good supporters of theirs) were as nought to them, how much more the lives of the men who do not believe in their unscrupulous dealings. No, the people have a right and demand that they go to the country for a vote and have an opportunity to show the imperial government that they appreciate what they have done in shielding the disgraceful ordnance and stores we supplied and that they paid for willingly and threw into the sea. How she praised a small handful of men who fought for her. Why take Diamond Hills, there were only I think 110 Canadians there, out of 72,000 men engaged, who did no more than their share, yet like a mother she would smother her children with praise when they had robbed the parent right and left. How realistic of human life, the worst the child the more the mother loves and cares for him, not but in this case the children as a whole loves the mother and would not rob her, but would give her half they have. It is the black one of the family who tries to misrepresent the rest. Let us, the whole of the children, have a vote and we will show that black one how generous we can be to the mother who fed and educated us without costing us a cent.

So much of my friend's opinion of the emergency rations, and this new naval scheme. Following the example of my hon. friend from Pictou, I will read another letter, even on the off-chance of boring you. This is from a farmer, one of the best farmers in Manitoba, a man who perhaps has not had the chance of getting as much education as some of us, but who has sound common sense, and is in touch with the pulse of the people. I wrote to him last fall asking for his opinion, and in his reply he says:

You ask what my opinion of a Canadian navy is. I cannot tell you all I think about it in this letter; but here are some of the views that occur to my mind over the prospect. It appears to me that the mother country would be pleased to have any assistance that Canada could give along the line of defence; but I cannot see how a Canadian navy would be of any assistance at all in that line. It would only be a source of anxiety and care on the hands of the British imperial navy. You know we, who are older shudder sometimes when we see our little kids floundering around in water that is too deep for them. Of course, we have always had a pretty good idea of the policy that the leaders of our present government would like to adopt in regard to the relations of our country and the motherland. Let me say that as a British subject, there are none more willing that Canada contribute to the defence of our empire than myself; but I would want that contribution to be a real help and not an hindrance. If the government is really taking the matter seriously, and a navy is their solution of the matter, for heaven's sake urge the necessity of placing the little fellow on some of our inland waters where we will have better facilities for looking after it and keeping it out of harms' way. I believe I express the sentiment of nine-tenths of our western people.

I might ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), who is at present leading the House, if this Bill gets through, as I hope it will not, to see that my friend's wishes are carried out with regard to placing this little navy on our inland waters. However, Sir, we have a comfort, or what should be a comfort in this matter. Last year, in speaking in this House, the right hon. the First Minister said that in the event, which at that time seemed to him quite possible, of an emergency suddenly arising, he was prepared to get a move on, and to go into Quebec, and stump the country. That is a great way to meet an emergency, is it not, Mr. Speaker? The only trouble with the right hon. gentleman on that occasion, so far as I could see, was this, that he did not tell us what he would say in stumping the country. All his life he has been too fond of stumping, and too careless of what he says when on the stump. If he were, I will not say an ordinary member, but an ordinary citizen, and expressed the views he has expressed, it would be his own business, and it would not be right to criticise him. But, unfortunately for this country, he is in a position in which we have to criticise his words, because these words do not emanate from him as a private citizen, but as the leader of the great Liberal party. That is why we on this side criticise the speeches he made in Boston where he absolutely declared against Great Britain, and British diplomacy. And in other speeches, even in this House, he put forward, as the goal of his ambition, the independence of Canada. In his speech on the Champs de Mars, Montreal, he declared, speaking of the rebellion in Saskatchewan in 1885, that had he been there he would have shouldered a musket along with those poor unfortunate misguided rebels. Only the right hon. gentleman did not call them misguided rebels. Those were my words. Every Liberal feels sore that we can get up, and make the statements we do without fear of contradiction, because the language, and the sentiments uttered by the Prime Minister he has never repudiated. If he would repudiate to-day the sentiments he voiced in former times, many of us on this side would feel more disposed to support his naval policy. But he has not repudiated them, and I can have no confidence in any Canadian, and especially in the leader of a party, who made such statements. 'Let Laurier finish his work,' was the cry all over Canada at the last elections.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CAMPBELL. What was his work? Are hon. gentlemen crying 'hear, hear', because the right hon. gentleman said that the goal of his ambition was the independence of Canada? If that is his work, I will have none of it, but am against him first, last and all the time. But even if you could confine those idiosyncrasies, as our hon. friends opposite are pleased to term them, to the Prime Minister that would not be quite so bad because you could get rid of him, but the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) has a similar record. In 1886 that hon. gentleman stumped his own province of Nova Scotia with the war cry of separation from the Dominion. When premier of that province he moved a resolution on the 5th May, 1886, declaring for separation, yet hon. gentlemen opposite will get up and say that it is shameful the way in which we decry their ministers. Sir, that is not where the shame belongs. It belongs to the ministers who have said those things which give us an opportunity to show them in their true light, and sorry we are to have such an opportunity. We are ashamed for Canada that we can throw those utterances in the teeth of these men. On that occasion to which I have referred, telegrams were read on the same platform at the Champs de Mars, where the Prime Minister made the statement I have quoted, from the worst enemies of the British empire, the Fenians, attacking the empire. And on that platform, where these telegrams were read, the right hon. gentleman, who now leads this government, and who is the wet nurse of this navy, got up and said that had he been on the plains of Saskatchewan at the time of the rebellion of 1885, he would have shouldered a musket on behalf of the rebels. I was out there with many other hon. gentlemen in this House, not because I blamed so much those poor, ignorant half-breeds, but because I realized that were the rebellion allowed to go on, it would mean that the defenceless women and children of Canada, scattered throughout the northwest, would be at the mercy of the Indians, who would have risen in all their numbers and might. I was out there in the fight for my country, taking my chances with the hon. member for St. Anne (Mr. Doherty) the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Worthington), the hon. member for London (Mr. Beattie), the hon. member for Victoria (Alta.) (Mr. White), and the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Taylor) and others —fighting for what? Fighting for the solidarity of the empire, fighting for our flag, fighting for the women and children of Canada all through that country; and yet we had this hon. gentleman, who is the leader of the Liberal party, getting up among the people of Montreal and saying that had he been out in that country he would have shouldered his rifle and fought against us. The term 'United Empire Loyalist' is one to be proud of, it is one almost too great for us to aspire to, but we were united empire loyalists in heart. What was the right hon. gentleman? What would you call that kind of loyalists who would go out and fight for the rebels? I would give them a new name and call them the E, U, or entirely unique loyalists. That was not the kind of loyalty we had in our minds and hearts. Had the right hon. gentleman been out there he would have been able to carry out his aspirations and join hands with those unfortunate rebels. And if he was a better sharp shooter then than when he made a shot at the cost of the Grand Trunk Pacific, he might have got myself, because I was out there taking chances and I would not now be able to give him my opinion. Or he might have got my hon. from from Victoria (Mr. White) who was there taking chances in upholding the solidarity of the empire. That is the kind of loyalty I like, but the E. U. loyalty is a brand I never will approve.

Down in the east you know the history of that rebellion from the point of view of this part of the country. You know that regiments went out there from Manitoba, Ontario and Quebec, taking their lives in their hands, to fight for the unity of the empire. But there is a chapter of that rebellion which has never been written, and I would recommend the Prime Minister to get busy and write it before the men who can tell the truth about it are all dead. The chapter I refer to is this. As you know, that rebellion started in the neighbourhood of Prince Albert. Prince Albert people were poor in 1885, they had no way of getting money. The poor half breeds in that country had grievances against the government. They made demand after demand to this government and their demands were refused or neglected. The white people—some of the white people—of that district interested themselves with the half breeds, went to their meetings, incited them to rebellion, talked rebellion, talked secession. After a certain time they got up a subscription. What for? The half breeds had no money to subscribe. Some of the white settlers of that country did subscribe to send two delegates down to Milk river, Montana, and ask poor Riel, who was living down there in peace and quietness, teaching school, to come up and agitate for them. He came up. He was a powerful speaker, a born orator, one of the greatest men to address a French audience that I ever heard. He could sway them as I move my hands. Whatever feeling or sentiment he wanted to put into them he put into them. The white people saw that the flames they had kindled were beyond their power to control, and they backed out like the cowards they were, and let the half breeds bear the brunt. There is the story of the half breed rebellion.

Mr. HUGHES. What was the object? Scrip?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Of course. These gentlemen who incited that rebellion, who sent Isbister and Lepine to Milk river, Montana, and brought Riel up, backed out like cowards, I say. And they went scot free; they were able to hide their misdeeds—evidently did hide them—from the ken of the government. But poor Riel had to suffer the brunt of it; he had to die a felon's death on the gallows, the poor tool of men who, perhaps, should have been in his place.

Mr. J. P. TURCOTTE. A time of good government!

Mr. CAMPBELL. I appreciate what the hon. member (Mr. J. P. Turcotte) said. It helps me out. Referring to the First Minister's remarks about shouldering his musket, I want to say further that those remarks had an ulterior meaning even in the right hon. gentleman's own mind, and I will try to show it to you. Some years after he made that statement, he was running an election. He wanted to be certain of a seat—he had a seat, I presume, in Quebec, as he has now, but he wanted to run for two seats, so that he would be sure of being elected—in all the length and breadth of Canada, what seat did he pick out? The very seat I speak of, where that rebellion had been, where many of the French-speaking people were poor, illiterate half breeds, men who had never had the chance of an education, whose form of life did not call for education, for they were hunters, trappers, and engaged in other occupations of that kind. His opponent was James Mackay. He was a native of that part of the country, as I am, and he was one of the best scouts that Canada had in her service fighting for Queen and flag in 1885. He was known to every man in that riding. And he was an able man, for he has now become K. C. and is looked upon by his friends and by everybody as a very able, honest, decent fellow. When the election came on, what literature was sent to those poor people? None whatever, but Grit party heelers went through the country. They would go to a poor half-breed and say: 'Who are you going to vote for, Jim?' The answer naturally was: 'For Jim Mackay.' Then the heeler would say: 'You can't vote for him; he was fighting you; he was killing your people like rabbits in 1885. You can't vote for him. Vote for Laurier, he was the leader of the Liberal party who was not afraid to say in Montreal that he would have come to help you to fight if he could have got there.' And Laurier was elected. United Empire loyalty again, I say. It did not die out even with that in the western country. I have mixed up in elections in that country ever since 1892, and I have never known a campaign yet where there was a French half-breed electorate but the Liberal party heelers have repeated the same thing: 'You can't vote for Campbell; he was fighting against your people; vote for the Laurier candidate, because Laurier would have helped you to fight if he could.' United Empire loyalty—I call it a bad strain of loyalty to teach the poor half-breed in my opinion. Why, the Liberal party in Manitoba even carried that E. U. entirely unique loyalty into the local politics of the province. When Mr. Roblin introduced what is called the 'flag policy,' when, in that country, having a cosmopolitan race of people, he tried to pass legislation to have the flag hung before the door of every school house of Manitoba, every Liberal in the legislature voted against it, and did everything in his power against it. Still, they say that they are loyal. Loyal? Entirely unique loyalty, to my mind.

Now, there is another matter that I will refer to very briefly. The debate is almost over—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear, Oh, oh.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I will not detain the House very long. I regret if I am hurting the feelings of hon. gentlemen opposite. But, though this debate is almost over, we have not had any declaration from the ministry as to the kind of flag is going to fly over this tin-pot navy. I think we should have had such a declaration. I do not know whether it will come with good grace from me to make a suggestion, and I do not know that any suggestion I offer to the minister will be followed. But I suggest that they get a large white flag, with a yellow streak across it. That would signify that it was a fleet, made, as the Prime Minister suggests, to elude pursuit—ready, aye, ready, to fulfil the purpose of the construction of such a navy at all times. I do not know whether the First Minister will accept that suggestion, but I offer it to him in a free spirit.

There is just one more point I would like to mention. I am a farmer, and this question strikes me as to be best illustrated in this way: The father of a large family has an estate of a few thousand acres. He gives his son a holding of 160 acres somewhere in the middle of his property. He has a fence all around this immense property, but there is no fence visible from the son's habitation. The son goes on and improves that land, breaks it up, grows crops upon it, puts money in the bank and is successful; he has no rent and no taxes to pay. He does not assist his old father or the rest of the family in any way whatever. Finally the father gets into difficulties, and he says: 'My boy, I want a little help; what can you do for me? I want to build a seven-foot fence all around this big property.' 'Well, father,' says the son, 'I am entirely willing to help you; I will do so by building a dinky little two-rail fence all around my own lot. Now, Sir, it seems to me that that illustration is apropos of the naval situation. The supremacy of the British navy is this great big fence that has been protecting little Canada. It has not been visible to us, but it has been there, and it has been efficacious. What good is our little tin-pot navy going to do in the defence of the empire? Would it not be a great deal better for that son to say: 'Yes, father, I will do something for you. There are a lot of strange cattle marauding around the farm; there is danger of them jumping over the fence, and if they do jump over the fence, anything I can build around my farm will be no good to me, therefore I will help you to put two more strands upon the fence, and make it a little stronger and a little higher. I think that illustration puts the situation in a nutshell, so that any man in Canada can understand it. Sir, those are my opinions. I give them to you as the result of my careful deliberation, and the way they are received on this side of the House shows that there is a lot of united empire loyalty in us yet.

House divided on amendment. — Mr. Northrup.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What business will be taken up to-morrowæ

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Committee of Supply on the Estimates of the Minister of Railways.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 11.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, March 11, 1910.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

NAVAL SERVICE OF CANADA.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER moved that the House go into committee on Monday next to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient, in connection with Bill No. 95, now under consideration by this House, respecting the naval service of Canada, to provide for the establishment, under regulations in that behalf, to be made by the Governor General in Council, of pensions and gratuities for the permanent naval service; such pensions or gratuities not to be larger in amount or granted upon more favourable terms than the pensions and gratuities authorized under the Militia Act.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON. Before the orders of the day are called, I desire to rise to a question of privilege. In the Votes and Proceedings of yesterday, while my name appears as having voted against the amendment of the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Northrup), it is omitted in the record of the vote on the main motion. This omission occurs both in the Votes and Proceedings and 'Hansard.' It is obvious that some error has been made, because it will be remembered distinctly that the vote on the main motion was exactly as was the vote on the amendment, but the total in the main motion, as recorded in the Votes and Proceedings and 'Hansard,' is put down at 118, whereas it was announced by the clerk of the House as 119. I think all hon. members will recollect the fact that I was present at both divisions, that I voted against the amendment to the main motion and in favour of the main motion, and I would ask that both 'Hansard' and Votes and Proceedings be corrected in that regard, so as to conform with what actually took place.

Mr. CAMPBELL.

THE LUMSDEN INVESTIGATION.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Before the orders of the day are called, I would like to direct the attention of the right hon. the Prime Minister to an extraordinary mistake which seems to have been made by the chairman of the committee now engaged in making an investigation into the charges preferred by Mr. Lumsden. On looking at the proceedings of the committee, it will be seen, at page 3, that the following resolution was passed:

Mr. Lennox moved that the committee recommend that the proceedings and evidence taken by them be printed and reported to the House from day to day.

This was agreed to, but for some reason which I cannot understand, the chairman of the committee, in reporting that to the House, left out the very important words and reported to the House so that the committee is represented to have recommended only that the proceedings and evidence taken by them should be printed. That seems to be an extraordinary step for the chairman of the committee to have taken, and I think we should have an explanation from him why such an omission was made, and have that omission immediately rectified.

Mr. GEOFFRION. The report was prepared by the clerk of the committee and submitted to the committee, and nobody objected. I do not know what the hon. gentleman means by saying that the chairman omitted any words at all. I submitted the report which was prepared by the clerk, according to the order of the House, which says that the committee shall report to the House from time to time.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I regret that either I seem to have a very imperfect realization of what took place, or else the hon. gentleman has. I am not talking about the order of the House, but about the recommendation of the committee, which it was the duty of the hon. gentleman to report to this House in the terms in which it passed the committee. The motion which passed the committee was as follows:

Mr. Lennox moved that the committee recommend that their proceedings and the evidence taken by them be printed and reported to the House from day to day, which was agreed to.

That is plain, is it not? But here is the way in which the chairman of the committee reported that resolution:

Your committee recommends that their proceedings and any evidence taken by them be printed from day to day.

Carefully leaving out the important words 'and reported to the House.' What has the order of this House to do with the matter? The hon. gentleman had nothing to do with the order of this House, but only with the recommendation of the committee, words which were essential to it, omit from the recommendation of the commitee, words which were essential to it, and he has given no explanation for that omission which can be regarded as satisfactory.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Has my hon. friend taken the trouble to compare the printed report with the printed record of the motion?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I have taken the trouble to ask members of the committee who were present when that motion passed. I asked the hon. gentleman who moved that motion, and moved it in writing, and he tells me that the printed report is exactly in the terms in which he put his motion.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I have not the slightest wish to reflect on my hon. friend, but errors sometimes do occur in the printing. He may recollect that some days ago the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Lake) put a question on the paper containing an extract from a speech delivered by me in Toronto. It happened that the printed extract was not a correct printing of the hon. gentleman's question, and I thought that possibly a similar error might have taken place in this instance. The chairman of the committee, taken by surprise, does not know that there was a discrepancy, but his attention being drawn to it, he will see that it is rectified

Mr. MACDONALD. The hon. the leader of the opposition knows very well that the chairman of a committee usually presents to the House the report prepared by the clerk of that committee and does not himself draft that report. I would suggest that the supporters of my hon. friend, who were appointed to that committee, should go there and settle these matters before hand.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. It is not a matter to be dealt with in the committee at all, but in this House, which has the right to have the recommendation of a committee reported to it in the terms in which the motion passed that committee.

Mr. MACDONALD. My hon. friend's remarks are out of order because they relate to a proceeding before a committee which that committee has not reported to this House. He has not taken the trouble to ascertain whether the printed record agrees with his version.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I have done so. I have gone to the hon. gentleman who moved the motion and he says the printed document is exactly as he moved it. He is as certain of that as any one can be of any fact. The hon. member for Pictou has a very extraordinary idea of what we should do. First, he suggests that when the recommendation of a committee is brought before this House in terms other than those in which they passed, the matter cannot be raised in this House. In other words when a committee recommends that its proceedings shall be reported to the House from day to day, and when that recommendation has been omitted from the report without a word of explanation, we cannot raise the question in this House because the committee has not reported, and it has not so reported because that recommendation has been omitted for some mysterious reason. Is that my hon. friend's argument? If so, I do not think it would commend itself to any one.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My hon. friend is too hasty in presuming that there is something mysterious in this. What is much more likely is that an error has occurred, as often happens. There is a disparity between the report as moved in the House and the resolution of the committee. But, my hon. friend knows that the chairman does not draw the report. That is drawn by the clerk, and it is very likely that the chairman signed it without looking at it carefully. Now that his attention is drawn to the matter, he will look into it.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The proceedings of the committee, as recommeneded by the committee should have been reported to the House day by day. But the fact that that recommendation has been altered by some person—I do not say who is responsible—before being brought to the House, and that the report has been confirmed by this House should prove that any explanation of that alteration—

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No person noticed the alteration.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. That is what I was about to remark. The House had no explanation; the House was misled. The matter should have been corrected at once, and, for the reason suggested by my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. E. M. Macdonald), the fact of these proceedings not having been reported day by day, prevented hon. members from making reference to the proceedings of the committee. One might think there was a certain connection between the alteration and the result of the alteration as argued by my hon. friend from Pictou. That hon. gentleman took the point at once: there is no report of the proceedings of this committee, and, therefore, the matter cannot be referred to. Why is there no report of the proceedings of the committee? Because the recommendation of the committee was altered. The hon. member for Pictou is very quick to take the point, and gives us a clue, perhaps as to why the alteration was made. It is a very astute point, but rather an obvious one; I think it must have occurred to almost every member of the House before my hon. friend (Mr. Macdonald) had the remarkable candour and frankness to raise it.

Mr. MACDONALD. May I permitted, though perhaps out of order—

Mr. SPEAKER. The matter cannot be discussed—

Mr. MACDONALD. The hon. member (Mr. R. L. Borden) has made reference to me.

Mr. SPEAKER. There is nothing before the Chair.

Mr. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman (Mr. R. L. Borden) has made three speeches—

Mr. SPEAKER. I wish the hon. gentleman to understand that there is nothing before the Chair.

Mr. MACDONALD. I agree with that; but Mr. Speaker, if you will hear me—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member has taken a very bad precedent—

Mr. MACDONALD. I rise to a point of order—

Mr. SPEAKER. The custom of the House here and in England is, when the Speaker rises, for the member who claims the floor to be seated.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. SPEAKER. This remark applies to both sides. The same thing occurred yesterday. I say, there is nothing before the Chair. I cannot allow this discussion to go on.

Mr. MACDONALD. When the discussion is wholly out of order, as it admittedly is and was, and when my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) spoke three times out of order, and made a personal reference to myself, I submit that it is quite in order for me to reply to it.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member (Mr. Macdonald) cannot raise a discussion on that.

Mr. MACDONALD. It seems hardly fair for—

Mr. SPEAKER. I understand that a point of order was to be raised—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Sit down.

Mr. SPEAKER. I understood that a point of order was to be raised.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN.

Mr. MACDONALD. Yes. When, in a debate is admittedly out of order, the hon. gentleman discussing the matter makes a personal reference to another hon. member, I think that other hon. member should have a right to reply. That is the point of order I make. But if you rule that my hon. friend the leader of the opposition Mr. R. L. Borden) can make three speeches out of order and I cannot make one, I accept the ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER. Government orders.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. M. Y. McLEAN. Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are entered upon, I ask the permission of the House to say a few words on a question of privilege.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Louder. Come forward.

Mr. M. Y. McLEAN. If it is not out of order, I would say that the acoustic properties of this chamber are so defective that it is impossible for any one at the back of the chamber to hear what is going on at the front, and for any one at the front to know what is said at the back. However, as I said, I wish to ask the indulgence of the House for a few moments while I say a word on a question of privilege. I received from a friend this morning a clipping from a newspaper, a report of a special Ottawa correspondent, and I may say that a similar statement has appeared in several other Conservative papers. Before proceeding to read the statement itself, I may say that the statement is headed with a large scare head as follows:

An M.P. Rebuked by his own Party—M. Y. McLean (S. Huron) stirs up an unpleasant scene by interrupting Geo. Clare and declining to be shut up.

The despatch proceeds:

George A. Clare, the German-Canadian representative of South Waterloo, was interrupted by Mr. McLean while in the course of an amiable speech, which was being listened to by the largest attendance seen during the naval debate, since the premier and Mr. Borden addressed the House.

Mr. Clare, who has been in bad health for some time, was obviously speaking under difficulties, and the Conservatives resented the sneer with which Mr. McLean accompanied his interjected question, 'Would you favour sending $25,000,000 to England for Dreadnoughts?'

They shouted 'Oh, oh' and 'Sit down.' Mr. McLean refused to sit down, and the hubbub grew boisterous. The Speaker intimated that Mr. McLean couldn't break into the debate without Mr. Clare's permission, but McLean refused to take the hint. He said something which was inaudible, owing to shouts of 'Order, order,' and 'Put him down.'

The premier nodded to the Speaker and gave McLean a warning look. Mr. Fielding also turned round and signed with his hand to McLean to sit down, but the member for South Huron wouldn't.

The Speaker: I have already told the hon. member to sit down. The hon. member for South Waterloo has the floor and cannot be interrupted.

Mr. McLean still endeavoured to proceed, and, amid cries of 'Name him,' the Speaker formally ordered him to sit down.

Mr. Clare then remarked that never in his years in the House had he interrupted any one, and when a gentleman was in poor health, he had always endeavoured to assist him. General applause, in which Mr. Fielding joined, greeted this, and the incident closed.

I am not in the habit of taking very seriously to heart any statements that the Conservative papers or the Conservative politicians may make about or against me, because I know that if I did not say something that was worth while and something that hit hard, they would not pay attention to me. And, Sir, I have been fighting them nearly all my life and I have learned to take hard knocks as well as soft knocks with the greatest equanimity and to return them with interest when I could. But this statement goes beyond what is fair. It accuses me——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. M. Y. McLEAN. If you will wait for a moment—that is one of the things that creates difficulties. I say that, if not by direct statement, at least by insinuation, this accuses me of taking advantage of the hon. member for South Waterloo (Mr. Clare) in order to interrupt and annoy him. Now, I have to say this: that, although the hon. member for South Waterloo represents my native constituency, I have not the pleasure of his acquaintance. I really did not know who he was until he got up to continue the discussion, nor had I the least idea that he was suffering from ill health. Had I known that it is quite possible that I should not have interrupted him, because I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, and my hon. friend himself, that no one could have more sympathy with a gentleman under such circumstances than I would have. But while he was suffering from ill health he was not so ill but that he could pay his attentions to myself as he went along, and not do it in a very becoming or generous manner. However, I will allow that to pass. As the hon. gentleman was proceeding with his argument, an argument which I thought very involved and difficult to understand, I desired, for my own information, to find out just where he was at. I got up, as I think I had a right to do, at least to do what has been done a hundred times in this House, I got up and asked the hon. gentleman if he would permit me to ask him a question, and he replied: Yes, certainly. I submitted that question, but instead of answering it he proceeded with his argument, entirely ignoring the question. Under these circumstances I again asked him the question, and still he did not reply. My statement of the case is borne out by the official report of the debates which I have on my desk. Now, I think that under the circumstances, if there was any discourtesy it was not on my part, but on the part of the hon. gentleman who, having permitted me to ask him a question, saw fit to ignore it and would not answer either, yes or no. If there was any discourtesy it was on the part of some hon. gentlemen opposite who, when I was exercising my right in this House, endeavoured to howl me down; and, Mr. Speaker, with all due deference to your decision on that occasion, I must say that I think I was perfectly in order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman cannot discuss a ruling of the Speaker.

Mr. M. Y. McLEAN. All right, Sir, there is no person more desious of obeying the rules of this House than I am. Although I have no personal acquaintance with the hon. member for South Waterloo, I have heard of him frequently, being as he is the representative of my native county. I have nothing but the greatest respect for that gentleman, and nothing would be further from my desire than to annoy him, or injure him in any way whatever. I have only to say in conclusion that I think I cannot be accused of unduly interrupting hon. members in this House, because, although I have been here for the greater part of three sessions. I think this is only the second time that I have had occasion to do anything of the kind. I may also add this, that if hon. gentlemen opposite have left the hon. member for South Waterloo and myself alone, any difference that had arisen between us would have been settled very amicably.

SUPPLY—RECIPROCAL USE OF CANALS.

Mr. FIELDING moved that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. G. H. PERLEY (Argenteuil). On the 24th of February last I asked this question:

Have Canadian vessels carrying freight the right to use the canals of the state of New York? If so, what statute authorizes it? If not, what statute or regulation prevents it?

The Minister of Justice replied:

By the treaty of Washington the government of the United States engaged to urge upon the state governments to secure to British subjects the use of the several state canals connected with the navigation of the lakes or rivers traversed by, or contiguous to the boundary line, on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States, but this government is not aware that such urgency has, up to the present time, been productive of any practical result. The matter is, of course, not governed by Canadian legislation, and the government is not in a position to answer as to the legislation on the subject (if any) there may be in the state of New York.

I judge from this reply that the Department of Justice does not think that at the present time Canadians have a right to use the canals in the state of New York on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States, and up to a short time ago that was my own idea on the subject. My reason for bringing this matter up at the present time is that there has been a feeling in this part of Canada, at all events, for a great many years, that the United States did not give us fair play under the treaty of Washington in relation to the canals in the state of New York. It has been generally understood here for many years that we have no right to send a vessel of Canadian register from here to New York city. I remember years ago when I first started business here everybody said that we could not send a vessel of Canadian register through to New York, and I have felt that way about it ever since. However, within the last few months, I have had some talk with the American Consul General here, the Hon. J. G. Foster, on this subject, and he assured me that we were mistaken in our idea, and that a boat of Canadian register could go through all right. I have a letter written by Mr. Denis Murphy, of the city of Ottawa, a gentleman who has been in the transportation business all his life; it is written to the United States Consul General, under date of March 1, 1909:

Dear Sir,—In reference to our conversation of Friday last, I now have much pleasure in giving you what information I have in regard to the stopping of Canadian barges at the Champlain canal.

About the year 1870 or 1871, the late firm of J. W. McRae & Company built six small barges called the A., B., C., D., E. and F., with the intention of running them through to New York with lumber and having them return with cargoes of coal. The first trip they were stopped at Whitehall and after considerable correspondence and much delay to the barges, they were allowed to proceed with the understanding that in future they would not be allowed further than Whitehall. These barges loaded coal in New York and came back to Ottawa and were kept in the trade here.

About this time the forwarders here found this class of barge too small for the trade, and the larger barges then were built. These barges were too large to go through the Champlain canal, so that there was never any further trouble from that source. I might state that this one occasion is the only time I know of Canadian vessels being stopped at any of the American canals.

Trusting this information will be satisfactory,

I am, yours truly,
D. MURPHY.

My impression is that the reason why it was supposed all these years that Canadian vessels could not use the New York state canals on an equality with the inhabitants of the United States, was because of this incident away back in the '70's. I have been unable to find any case of late years where a Canadian boat has been stopped from using the New York canals. The American Consul General in a letter which I received from him a few days ago says:

The present constitution of the state of New York was adopted November 6, 1894, and went into force January 1, 1895. Since the adoption of this constitution it is my understanding that the canals have been absolutely free to vessels of all nations.

I took the opinion of a gentleman from New York who is conversant with the statutes of that state, and he says that he is unable to find any provision of law or Act of the legislature which discriminates against the free use of the state canals by Canadian vessels. That is his very positive statement. It seems that under this constitution of the state of New York which came into force in 1895 it is provided by article 97:

No tolls shall hereafter be imposed on persons or property transported on the canals, but all boats navigating the canals and the owners and masters thereof shall be subject to such laws and regulations as have been, or may hereafter be enacted, concerning the navigation of canals.

This clause in the constitution seems to be a perfectly clear one, and it explicitly abolishes all tolls on persons and property transported on the canals. It seems evident that at least from the adoption of the constitution of 1895 the canals of the state of New York have been free to all comers, including Canadians. The constitution of the state places the management of the canals, and their control and operation as well as their maintenance and repair in the hands of the superintendent of public works in the state of New York.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Are all the canals in question the property of the state or are any of them under private ownership?

Mr. PERLEY. All these canals are the property of the state. Article 100 of the constitution of the state of New York provides as follows:

The legislature shall not sell, lease or otherwise dispose of the Erie canal, the Oswego canal the Champlain canal the Cayuga and Seneca canals or the Black River canal, but they shall remain the property of the state and under its management for ever.

Mr. A. BRODER. There are some private owned canals as well?

Mr. PERLEY. There may be; I am referring only to those owned by the state. I may say that I am not going to find any fault with the government on this subject, I am not asking an answer, I am simply putting on record what I understand to be the exact state of affairs today. It has been my impression for the last thirty-five years that we could not send a Canadian boat through to New York and evidently the Minister of Justice thinks that that is at present the state of affairs, because in his answer of February 24, he says, speaking of the efforts of the United States:

The government is not aware that such urgency has up to the present time been productive of any practical result.

That is in the way of the state of New York agreeing that we should use their canals.

As the superintendent of public works of the state of New York has this matter entirely in charge, and must be cognizant of all the facts concerning it, I wrote him last month, and this is his reply:

State of New York,
Superintendent of Public Works, Albany.
February 16, 1910.

Subject: Discrimination as to boats.

Mr. George H. Perley,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Sir,—Answering your letter of the 9th instant, addressed to the superintendent of Public Works, I beg to say that there has never been any discrimination either by the rules for the management of the canals, or by statute, against Canadian owned boats, nor is there at the present time.

Section 172 of chapter 13, laws of 1909, known as the Canal Law, prescribes rules for the registration of canal boats. This section, after providing that the owner of boats navigating the canals shall deliver to properly designated officials a certificate of registry, containing the name of the owner, his residence, name of the boat and the hailing point, provides that such registry shall be signed by the owner, if a resident of this state; if not, by the master of the boat as the owner thereof.

Yours very truly,
WINSLOW M. MEAD,
Deputy Supt. Public Works.

My object in rising is that I think it is only fair that this evidence and correspondence should be made public in this way, because I believe that if the impression which every one in this section of Canada has had for a great many years that the state of New York does not allow Canadian boats to use the New York canal is a wrong impression, we should disabuse the public mind of it. As I read this correspondence and evidence particularly this letter from the deputy superintendent of public works, unless there is some other evidence to be found of which I know nothing, it seems to me absolutely that the state of New York allows us to use the canals of that state on an equality with the inhabitants of the United States if we wish to do so. If the Minister of Justice finds anything to be said on the other side, and his department thinks that we have not the right to use these canals, I wish he would inform the House of that fact.

Hon. A. B. AYLESWORTH (Minister of Justice). If I say anything with regard to this subject it is not that I think that I can enlighten the hon. gentleman or this House with reference to the very important question he has brought up. I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Perley) who is a keen and acute business man, with the investigation he has made into this subject knows more about it than I do, probably more than any Canadian lawyer, and I have no idea that I can add to his knowledge by anything I can say. I should explain that the circumstance that I made the answer to the question which my hon. friend put upon the order paper some days ago, was merely an accident. Some one had to answer it, and the First Minister asked me to do so. The subject is one not depending in any way upon Canadian legislation, it is not a question of the interpretation of any Canadian statute or Canadian regulations. So far as I am aware, so far as I have ever heard, there is no treaty existing between the United States and Great Britain which would cover this matter except the treaty of Washington, and in making the answer the other day to the question propounded I simply referred to that treaty and stated the substance of its provisions with regard to this matter. I take it that the only way in which the question can be practically determined would be by diplomatic representations to the United States government, and through the federal government to that of the state of New York; or possibly by proceedings before the courts of that state if the right to use the canals on the part of a Canadian vessel was challenged or refused. It would necessarily be a matter in regard to which the only person competent to give advice which would be of any value would be some one acquainted thoroughly with the statutes of the state of New York on the subject, some local practitioner whose opinion would be of value in regard to their legislation, and the regulations under which their canals may be used. No one in this country would I think be competent to do so. I can only say with reference to the whole subject, and especially to the points which my hon. friend has called attention to, that I shall examine with great interest what he has said when it appears in 'Hansard,' and that if there is anything which can be accomplished toward the end which no doubt he desires, by correspondence, diplomatically or otherwise, I am sure that I should be only too happy, and that any other member of the government would be only too well pleased to facilitate the objects which the hon. gentleman has in view.

Mr. BRODER. As a matter of fact, I believe it is without dispute that for the last forty years no Canadian vessel has any privilege of going and coming through these canals. When the Washington treaty was negotiated in 1871 the United States federal government went only so far as to agree to urge the state to give the Canadians that privilege, but they did not succeed, so that we are just in the position we were in before we made a treaty at all. There are not only state owned canals in the state of New York, but there are privately owned canals, and even if they had acceded to the wishes of the federal government under the treaty, they would still have control of these private canals. I believe that as a matter of fact for forty years Canadian vessels have not frequented these canals. What can you do now? The federal authorities cannot oblige the state of New York to give the use of these canals, all they can do is to urge the state to do it and it will end just where it ended before. It is a very awkward position to be in, but if you look up the protocols of the Washington treaty you will see that all they agreed to do was simply to urge on the state the wisdom of giving us the use of these canals, and the state refused to do it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I think my hon. friend (Mr. Broder) is right in saying that according to the treaty of Washington the United States authorities undertook to urge upon the state of New York to give to Canadians the use of their canals just as by that treaty the use of the canals of the St. Lawrence was given to American citizens. It is a long time since I have looked into the matter, but I have a distinct recollection of what took place in this House when my hon. friend from Lanark (Mr. John Haggart) and I were young members, and I believe in that discussion it was assumed that the state of New York had actually passed legislation to give to Canadians the use of these canals, but by subsequent regulations applying to the canals, the object of this legislation was practically defeated. There was discrimination against Canadians, and while the legislature of the state of New York gave the use of the canals, it was made nugatory by subsequent regulations. My recollection is, however, vague as to that, but I have sent to the library, and I think in a few days I will be able to give exact information.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. That may have been brought about by some arrangement of the tolls, but it would seem from the official communication to the hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Perley) from the deputy Superintendent of Public Works of the state of New York, that all tolls have been abolished, that no tolls whatever are charged now, and that the canals are as open to the citizens of Canada as to the citizens of the United States. It would be extremely desirable that the matter should be cleared up officially, as it appears to have been pretty well cleared up in the statement received by the hon. member (Mr. Perley) to whom I think a great deal of credit is due in the matter. The official in charge of these canals has informed him in the most unqualified terms that the canals of the state of New York are as open to the citizens of Canada as they are to the citizens of the United States. It is quite true that a contrary impression has prevailed for a long time, but I presume that is due to the fact that thirty-five years ago when we wanted to use these canals we could not use them by reason of the discrimination which undoubtedly did exist, and having got out of the way of using them, and not being aware of the change in the regulations, no one has attempted to use them in recent years. For that reason the real condition of affairs has not been disclosed to the public. I may be entirely wrong in that conjecture, but surely if we can trust official assurances at all it is perfectly plain that the citizens of Canada can use these canals.

Hon. JOHN HAGGART. I remember the circumstance perfectly well, and the right hon. gentleman, and the hon. member (Mr. Broder) are perfectly correct in what they say. The treaty of Washington gave us the right to use canals belonging to the United States, and the United States promised they would use their influence to get us the use of the state canals on the same terms as the federal canals. There was a correspondence between this government and the government of the United States in reference to the Sault Ste. Marie canal, which at that time belonged to the state of Michigan, and I think the state of Michigan refused us the right to use that canal on the same terms as citizens of the United States. That difficulty was gotten over by the United States government obtaining possession of the Sault Ste. Marie canal, and it became a federal work. I do not think, however, that the United States federal government used their influence except in reference to the Sault Ste. Marie canal which at that time was the only canal in the United States owned by a state government that we were interested in the navigation of, except it be the New York canal system on which lumber was carried from Ottawa to New York. After the effort was made by Mr. Murphy and his friends, McRae & Co., to get their barges down to New York, there was no other effort made to obtain the use of the New York canals.

TRENT VALLEY—CLAIMS FOR FLOODING.

Mr. HAUGHTON LENNOX (South Simcoe). On the 17th of February last I obtained information from the Minister of Railways in reference to lands that are alleged to be flooded in connection with the Trent waterways system, and particularly in reference to payments near the village of Hastings. I asked the minister as to payments to certain people, I asked who acted as valuator for the government, and the minister answered James Dickson. I also asked who acted as solicitor for the government in each case, and what amount the solicitor was paid for his services in each case, and the answer is:

L. F. Clarry. Nothing has yet been paid, but his accounts have been approved by the Department of Justice, and will be paid as soon as the money is available, April 1, 1910.

I may refer to Return No. 83 brought down on the 15th of March, 1909, showing the amount paid property owners for damages caused by holding the water in the Otonabee river between Hastings and Peterborough.' These payments amount to some $24,000. The amounts paid out altogether by the government are very considerable, and if I am instructed correctly the conditions under which they are paid are very unfavourable to the interests of the public. In other words, there is reason to believe that the person who is acting on behalf of the government is also, in some instances, and perhaps in many instances, acting in the interests of the persons who are obtaining payments and upon terms that he will receive compensation in proportion to the amount he obtains from the government, which, of course, is not likely to stimulate him to try and get the best possible bargain on behalf of the government. Now, in this return which has been brought down the names are set forth, and in every case not only is the name of the owner mentioned, but the name of the lawyer as well. The persons to whom the cheques are issued are not the owners of the land alone, but the owner and the government agent, that is the government lawyer. And when I tell you, Mr. Speaker—and refer to some documents that I will read—when I tell you that not only is the lawyer paid by the government, but that he is paid a commission by the owner of the land, you can realize why it is arranged that the cheque is not made payable to the owner alone, but is made jointly payable to the owner and to the solicitor. I have read what the government says in reference to Mr. Clarry in their answer: That Mr. Dickson is the valuator and that Mr. Clarry is the solicitor acting on behalf of the government, that his accounts have been passed and that he will be paid by the first of April. I might also add the further information that Mr. Clarry is a defeated Reform candidate in the last Ontario elections, and I add, so that the government may be on the alert in order to right this matter if possible, that it is reported that Mr. Clarry has sold out his practice and is about to move away within a short time. I will read to the House the method by which Mr. Clarry seeks to advance the public interest on behalf of the government. I have here a copy of a letter—I have also the original here, fortunately—and this letter shows the methods by which he seeks to obtain business for himself and to forward the public interest, I presume. This is a sample of the letter which he sends out:

Hastings, Ont., February 9, 1909.

Mr. Graham, Westwood, Ont.

Dear Sir,—Enclosed you will find retainer which I will ask you to kindly have your brother fill in and sign in your presence. Please then return it with Mr. Dickson.

Mr. Dickson is the valuator:

Please then return it with Mr. Dickson and I will have your brother's claim forwarded to Ottawa without delay. I am glad to advise you that I am having good settlements with nearly all my claims, and I think your brother will be dealt with all right. Have him hang out for 12 or 15 acres, and show where the water flows in the spring, and make the settlement with Mr. Dickson and I will be perfectly satisfied.

Yours truly,
(Sgd.) L. F. CLARRY.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is the gentleman who is acting on behalf of the government. Then, the retainer is made out in this way:

I, , of the township of Asphodel, in the county of Peterborough, farmer, do hereby request and authorize L. F. Clarry, Esq., solicitor, of Hastings, Ontario, to make claim on my behalf against the government of Canada for damages to my lands in the township of Asphodel, caused by the flooding of the waters of Rice lake, and I agree to pay the said L. F. Clarry a commission of 20 per cent of all moneys awarded to me as damages aforesaid for his fees and compensation in the matter.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. The usual rake off.

Mr. LENNOX. It goes on to say:

In case no damages are awarded to me, I am to pay nothing.

Dated the 9th day of January, A.D. 1909.

It does not require any great stretch of imagination to know that Mr. Clarry would be reasonably zealous on behalf of the parties claiming damages, and reasonably anxious to make out as large a claim as possible, seeing that his compensation is dependent upon whether he shall get anything and upon how much he shall get.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. What is the date of that letter?

Mr. LENNOX. The retainer is dated the 9th January, 1909, and the letter is dated the 9th February, 1909. This retainer is, of course, quite in harmony with the statement of the letter: Have him hang out for 12 or 15 acres.

Mr. CROTHERS. Who is Dickson?

Mr. LENNOX. And Mr. Clarry says in this letter: You settle with Mr. Dickson and I will be perfectly satisfied.

Mr. CROTHERS. Who is Dickson?

Mr. LENNOX. Mr. Dickson is the valuator employed by the government. And so, Sir, we have the solicitor and the valuator going hand in hand and we have the fact—for I am told it is a fact—that although these Grahams had never approached this gentleman in any shape or form or suggested to him that they had any claim, this letter is sent out by the hand of whom? By the hand of Mr. Dickson, the government valuator, and sent from the solicitor.

Mr. SPROULE. It is a good way to work up claims.

Mr. LENNOX. It is not surprising under these circumstances that it is asserted in that neighbourhood that people are being paid who ought not to be paid, and who have no claim. This is not an isolated case. There are men in that neighbourhood who have bona fide claims and who have not been paid by the government. Mr. Humphreys, whose declaration I will read, is a wealthy farmer living a little way outside of the village of Hastings, a man of excellent reputation and high standing in the neighbourhood, a man who is 69 years of age, and who has been, I am sorry to say, a Liberal all his life. He tells me that this same Mr. Clarry demanded from him 15 per cent on his claim, and told him that unless it was put into his hands and the 15 per cent was paid to him he could not get anything. Whether that is correct or not I do not know; whether the payment of his claim depended on its passing through Mr. Clarry's hands or not I do not know; but I do know that a year ago Mr. Humphreys came down here and advised the department of the position of things, and the department promised to look into it, but no result has followed, and Mr. Humphreys' claim has not been paid, and he thinks there ought to be a general inquiry into the whole system of payment in that neighbourhood. Under these circumstances, with a lawyer, so zealous, acting on behalf of the government, a valuator acting in harmony with this lawyer in adjusting these claims, and the lawyer depending for his compensation and the amount of it on having the claims recognized, it is not surprising if we find that claims have been paid that should never have been paid at all. Now, I never saw Mr. Humphreys until I was notified that he wanted to have this matter investigated, and I state from actual knowledge that he is a gentleman that the government will not have much hesitation in believing, and I would be glad if the Minister of Railways would have an investigation in the Public Accounts Committee, and have Mr. Humphreys, Mr. Clarry and Mr. Dickson brought down here. There is no reason why the opposition should always do that sort of thing. I ask the government to institute a new departure in this respect, because the blockers will not then be in the way, and ascertain whether these allegations are true or not. This is Mr. Humphreys' declaration:

County of Northumberland.

To wit:

In the matter of lands in the township of Asphodel, in the county of Peterborough, said to be flooded by the damming of the Trent river at Hastings:—

I, Henry Humphries, of the township of Asphodel, in the county of Peterborough, yeoman, do solemnly declare that—

1. I am of the age of sixty-nine years, or thereabouts, and I have always lived in the said township of Asphodel.

2. Ever since I was a schoolboy I have been familiar with history and conditions of the River Trent as it passes through the village of Hastings, and up this river for many miles to the west, and with the history and conditions of the river or stream called the Ouse, emptying into the Trent at its mouth, and up to and beyond the land of G. A. L Humphries, hereinafter mentioned.

3. I am informed and believe that the government of Canada has paid to the following persons the sums hereinafter set forth for lands alleged to be flooded or drowned by reason of the dam maintained by the government on the River Trent, at the said village of Hastings, namely:—John Sayent, for 60 acres, $600; G. A. L. Humphries, for 50 acres, $550; C. M. Birdsall, for .. acres, $550; Charles Faux or Fox, for 80 acres, $720; M. Breckonridge, $380: James Warner, 30 acres, $330; John Breckonridge, jr., for 6 acres, $60; and Thomas Davidson, for 5 acres, $45.

4. Not one of the parties above mentioned has any land whatever drowned or flooded by reason or on account of the dam at Hastings, and I am clearly of opinion that there is no justification whatever for payment of any of the said money.

5. That of the parties above mentioned the lands of G. A. L. Humphries are furthest up stream.

Let me interject just here that the Grahams refused to have anything to do with Mr. Clarry; but they put in their claim through a government representative who was up there on the canal; and although James Warner, farther down the stream, and G. A. L. Humphries, their next neighbour, have been paid, the Grahams have not been paid, which fact lends colour to the allegation that only those who act through Clarry, and others who are on that list, are paid. Mr. Humphreys in his declaration goes on:

6. The stream called the Ouse, upon or in the neighbourhood of the said lands is largely through wooded lands, and any temporary overflow from the said stream that occurs in the spring time is occasioned solely by local conditions along the said stream obstructed by fallen timber, brush and debris, the blockage by snow and ice and the like, and wholly without reference to the condition of the River Trent.

7. The high water on and along the Ouse and affecting the said lands exists only during freshets and is of short duration, and has come and gone on all occasions long before the time of high water on the River Trent, and I make this solemn declaration, conscientiously believing it to be true, and knowing it to be of the same force and effect as if made on oath and by virtue of the Canada Evidence Act.

Solemnly declared before me this 28th day of February, A.D. 1910, at the village of Hastings, in the county of Northumberland.

HENRY HUMPHRIES.

H. W. FOULDS,
A Commissioner.

This is declared to by Henry Humphries before Mr. Foulds, a commissioner. I have also a declaration which I will not take time to read, from a mill man up there, who says that he has cut green timber on some of these lands, and if you find large standing green timber on the lands there can be no more cogent evidence that it is not a case of flooding any more than a temporary flooding that may occur in the springtime. Now, what are the conditions? This valley of the Ouse is mainly timbered land, and in a case of that kind there is always more or less temporary flooding in the spring; but the point Mr. Humphries makes here is that he has known of this since his boyhood days, and that it has always occurred independently of any dam that has been erected on the river, and long before the high water on the Trent, the flooding has subsided. In order to ascertain what induced the government to settle these claims, and whether they have taken any proper step to ascertain whether these parties were entitled to payment or not, I thought the proper course was to get a return of the levels of these lands as compared with the high water level where the Ouse flows into the Trent.

You will hardly imagine that these claims would be settled without levels being taken. But, yet if I understand the meaning of a telegram submitted to me the other day—the minister furnished me a copy of it—no levels were ever taken. It is suggested now that it will cost five hundred or six hundred dollars to take them. But I said I did not want the levels now. Since no levels were taken I am not anxious to add greater injury to what the country has already suffered by insisting on levels being taken now. I have inquired of the minister, and I find that these cheques, in the cases of the several parties mentioned here and those mentioned in the answers obtained on the 17th February, were all paid jointly to the owners and Mr. Clarry, as in the case of the other return brought down. Speaking on behalf of Mr. Humphries he feels—and he says he expresses the opinion of a great many in that neighbourhood—that the government should not settle these claims in a hole and corner way, but should appoint two or three men to investigate the whole question and deal with it on a business basis. I hope that before any other moneys are paid out, the minister will bring this matter up himself in the Public Account Committee and have it investigated, and particularly will examine Mr. Clarry, Mr. Dickson and any other parties who have been acting on behalf of the government.

Hon. G. P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals). If I understand my hon. friend, his chief attack is upon one of his fellow lawyers, Mr. Clarry, for some connection he may have had with some of the men who had claims. As to any connection that Mr. Clarry had with these men, this is the first intimation I have of it. My hon. friend knows well that so long as there are claims to be paid, the men who do not get all they want are convinced that other people got more than they should. They are all inclined to take that view. They think that others get too much and that they do not get enough. That is the foundation of the entire complaints, I am afraid. The department has nothing to fear in this matter. My hon. friend went so far as to say that these settlements were made in a hole and corner manner. He has no ground for any such statement, he insists that the department should have engaged engineers to take levels before making any payments, and he bases his whole argument on the word of one man who never pretended to take a level. What is the method adopted by the department?—a simple business method. A man highly recommended such as Mr. Dickson was asked to make these valuations and he did so under instructions. Here is a quotation from the instructions:

It is necessary for the surveyor to ascertain, first, the area of the property actually submerged, and secondly, the area injuriously affected in consequence of the increased height of water. Claims for land over 3 feet above the level of the water cannot be considered. The valuator should submit a fair price, having regard to special conditions of each case, and he should know or ascertain, the fair value of the lands in the immediate vicinity of the property affected, this being the way that Commissioner Aylesworth always fixed his valuations. It is not of course necessary that an actual measurement and traverse should be made in every case, as any land surveyor can approximately arrive at the several areas affected.

Be pleased to inform Mr. Dickson accordingly.

And Mr. Dickson is a surveyor, although my hon. friend would lead us to believe that he was just an ordinary individual who would not make a fair valuation but would be governed by party proclivities. It was according to these instructions that Mr. Dickson went and made his valuations. Mr. Henry Humphries, an old and respected resident, I understand, and Mr. Dickson did not get along harmoniously. Mr. Dickson, as I am informed, contended that he was asked by Mr. Humphries to put a valuation on some property, which did not belong to him at all. My hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) can easily understand how this might affect the valuation; but after Mr. Humphries had cast some reflection on these valuations, another surveyor was sent out to make a valuation on the same properties, so that no injustice would be done either the public or the department. I have the valuations of most of these properties in the various townships made by Mr. Fitzgerald, and in nearly every case his valuation was higher than Mr. Dickson's, showing that Mr. Dickson's valuation was within the mark. Mr. Fitzgerald did not know Mr. Dickson's valuations on these properties. The valuations of Mr. Fitzgerald were not taken but the claims were settled on the valuations of Mr. Dickson. As a rule members of parliament come to me to urge that we do not pay enough, but my hon. friend urges that we have paid too much.

Mr. LENNOX. I do not know anything about whether the minister has paid too much or not, but I said that, in cases I have mentioned, the minister should not pay anything because no levels were taken and they were not flooded lands.

Mr. GRAHAM. Then we must have paid them too much. But such is not the case. I have pointed out that valuations can be made without a survey. A man who is not a surveyor can go on to a property and easily tell the high water mark in order to have a fair idea of the quantity of land flooded. But a surveyor was engaged as a protection to the public, and then a second surveyor was appointed, and the second surveyor gave in every case a higher value. That this was a proper precaution will be admitted by any reasonable man, and I would not take the responsibility of casting a reflection of two members of the land surveyors association, merely because some one has complained that he did not get as much out of the government as he thought he should, he raises the question of suspicion—and this is the main body of his charge I thought—in connection with Mr. Clarry. The method adopted is that which has been followed for years and years, between the departments. My hon. friend from South Lanark (Mr. J. Haggart) will bear me out. I think that any hon. member who is familiar with the working of the Department of Justice will bear me out. The Department of Railways gets a valuation. We do not settle a single claim until the Department of Justice authorizes the settlement of that claim. They have to look into the title to see that the man owning the land is the one who makes the claim in the first place. For that purpose, the Justice Department engaged a solicitor in the locality to do the work. In this case, Mr. Clarry—though my hon. friend (Mr. Lennox) was careful not to explain that—was the agent of the Department of Justice, and not of the Department of Railways and Canals. When we get the valuation of the lands, that valuation is handed over to the department for them to make a thorough investigation as to the titles, and to see that we are paying the proper parties. I am informed by the Justice Department that the cheques being made out to two parties is the custom between legal firms doing a large business. That is, when a legal firm, say in Toronto, has an agent acting for it in a case on all fours with this, that legal firm invariably makes out its cheque payable to its own agent, and the other party.

Mr. CARVELL. And an insurance company in the case of a mortgage the same.

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes, I understand insurance companies do the same thing. It is a matter of business; it is done every day; my hon. friend (Mr. Lennox) knows that as a lawyer. There is no suspicion attached to such a transaction; it is a clear matter of business, and has been done by this government ever since there was a government. These two names on the cheque make it necessary, in order to have the cheque cashed, that both signatures shall appear upon it, the agent of the department and the person to whom the money is to be paid. It is a safeguard, as I have said, used by large legal firms in dealing with their agents, and which the Department of Justice has adopted for many years, and a proper safeguard in the interests of the public. When both parties must sign the cheque, there is no possibility of the money being paid to other than the proper party. The hon. member says that Mr. Clarry was acting as the agent of other parties. That is a matter between Mr. Clarry and the other parties. I have not heard of it, but it ought not to exist if it does exist. I trust the hon. member will see to it, that Mr. Clarry, if he has been guilty of unprofessional conduct shall be chastised by that other great organization of monopolists, the bar association. There is another law under which you could get at him, I should think. Under the new statute, he has been guilty of taking secret commissions, if what is stated of him be true. I am not sure, but it strikes me as a layman that he would be liable under that statute.

The department is not afraid of investigation, it courts investigation of this or any other transaction, to make clear to all how it manages its business. This matter having been brought to my attention, I will see what there is in the charge that Mr. Clarry has been acting in the double capacity. As to other matters, they are above board, perfectly fair business transactions, that can be defended on business principles.

Mr. JOHN HAGGART. The explanation of the Minister of Railways is the most extraordinary I have ever heard in answer to such charges as have been made by the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox). What are the facts? The agent of the government goes to value lands alleged to have been overflowed by reason of the existence of a government dam. As the minister (Mr. Graham) properly said, his department is, to a certain extent, not liable, because, in the first instance, before they pay out a cent, they get the report of the Justice Department as to the title and the valuation. But, in this case, the agent of the Minister of Justice becomes also agent for the claimant against the government. And the government valuator assists the agent of the Minister of Justice by bringing a request from him to the claimant and saying, in effect: Give me twenty per cent of what you get for your claims and I will see that you are properly looked after. And the minister says there is no harm in that. No harm in the agent of the Minister of Justice looking after the business also of the claimant against the Crown for damages? No harm in the agent of the department taking these documents down to the claimant against the Crown and urging upon him to make the attorney of the Minister of Justice, acting for the Railway Department also, the attorney of the claimant?

Mr. GRAHAM. I do not understand the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) to say that Mr. Dickson urged anybody to engage Mr. Clarry.

Mr. JOHN HAGGART. He carried a letter——

Mr. GRAHAM. I know my hon. friend (Mr. Haggart) wants to be right with me. I did not understand the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) to say that it was charged that Mr. Dickson himself requested that this man appoint Mr. Clarry agent. That would be serious.

Mr. LENNOX. I said that Mr. Clarry is your agent, as you admit——

Mr. GRAHAM. No, agent of the Department of Justice.

Mr. LENNOX. You can separate the departments if you like. He sends a letter and a blank retainer, and sends it with your agent, Mr. Dickson, and says: Settle with Mr. Dickson, and it will be perfectly satisfactory; but put in a good stiff claim.

Mr. GRAHAM. That was, as I understood it, said about Mr. Dickson, not about Mr. Clarry.

Mr. JOHN HAGGART. He carries the document; takes it to the party who has the claim—that is, the party whom you appoint for the purpose of settling takes the document to the claimant and makes an arrangement——

Mr. GRAHAM. No.

Mr. JOHN HAGGART. That is the statement. I am taking the statement of the hon. member for South Simcoe.

Mr. GRAHAM. As I understand it, he did not make that charge. It would be very serious if he did make that charge, but I do not understand him to say that Mr. Dickson made an arrangement with this man. He carried a letter. If he were a party to that, it would be very serious. I will investigate and find out what there is in that. But that is not the charge that has been made. He carried the letter——

Mr. JOHN HAGGART. But what are the contents of the letter? The minister has heard it read. It says: That this solicitor advises the party to make an arrangement with Mr. Dickson and to ask a large price. Mr. Dickson knew what was in the letter.

Mr. EMMERSON. How does that appear?

Mr. JOHN HAGGART. By the affidavit and letters read by the hon. member for South Simcoe. Now, these are very serious charges. An officer who would do anything of the kind ought to be dismissed at once; more than that, he is guilty of a crime against the community, and such an action should be punished as criminal. Of course, the hon. gentleman may say that the administration of the law rests with the provincial authorities, and that their attention ought to be directed to it. If this transaction means anything in the world, it means connivance between officers of the government and the parties they are dealing with, in order to defraud the people of this country; it means nothing more or less than that. When the attention of the minister is drawn to it he says: Inquire into it before the Public Accounts Committee, summons Mr. Humphries and these agents, and if these charges are proved to be true, let them all be punished. No one accuses the minister of being a party to anything of that kind. I suppose this is the first he has heard of it. Of course, he thinks his department is well administered, he takes the report of his officers in reference to these matters. But when the case is so plain as this, when the documents are brought to his attention, with the affidavit, as my hon. friend says, of one of the most respectable farmers in the county, it matters not whether he is a Conservative or not, I suppose he is a good, honest Canadian, and his word is to be taken until it is contradicted—I say that under these circumstances the minister should take prompt action in this matter. We know there are cases in the past where offenders have gone unwhipped of justice; in this case, if the charges are proved, let the offenders be punished as they deserve.

Mr. BOYCE. I must confess to being a little disappointed at the minister's reply to the very serious charges that have been made by my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. Lennox). I would prefer to believe that the minister has not sufficiently grasped the gravity of the situation, rather than to believe that, having grasped it, he is disposed to make light of it. Let us see what the facts are. In connection with the valuation of lands which were supposed to have been injured by flooding, a gentleman was appointed by the department in the capacity of valuator, Mr. James Dickson. As I understand it, there was no dispute as to what his duties were; they were quasi-judicial, he was to ascertain judicially, in a fair, and proper manner, first, as to whether there had been any flooding of certain land; and, secondly, if there had been a flooding, for which the government ought to pay what would be a fair compensation for the government of Canada to pay to the owner for the damage caused. In conjunction with that a gentleman was employed by the government, a solicitor by the name of L. F. Clarry, whose duties, the minister says, were to ascertain the state of the titles and report upon the question of damage.

Mr. GRAHAM. The solicitor had nothing to do with the question of damage, or reporting the amount of damage. The valuator reported the amount of damage, and when we get those reports, the valuation is made by the surveyor. Then to complete it, we hand that over for settlement to the Department of Justice.

Mr. BOYCE. Well, we will consider that the solicitor's duties were merely those of searching the titles, and ascertaining what the conditions were as they affected that land prejudicially.

Mr. GRAHAM. My hon. friend would understand the duties of the solicitor better than I do. But it was to complete the settlement. The amount was agreed on before he touched it. Then he was to get the title of the property, and to get the relief.

Mr. BOYCE. Then necessarily the solicitor was an integral part of the machinery whereby these settlements were carried out. He was appointed for that purpose, and he was to perform his duties to the government and to the public without fear, favour, affection, or hope of reward from any one but the Department of Justice. The minister will concede that. Now, when this man, who was supposed to carry out the details of a settlement made by the valuator, went himself and solicited gentlemen to stir up claims against the government and to send those claims to that valuator, to bring back a message from that valuator to that solicitor, for the Minister of Railways to say that that is not a matter that concerns the government, is an extraordinary position to take. I say it dwarfs into insignificance many of the extraordinary statements that have been made in regard to scandals that have taken place under this government.

Mr. GRAHAM. If I had made the statement, but I did not make it.

Mr. BOYCE. The Minister of Justice said that this was a private transaction. But this man has defrauded the government. This government put him in a position of preying upon the public, and when the matter is brought to the attention of the minister in the House of Commons he says, in effect, 'Let them go on.' Practically that is the only construction to be placed on the minister's words—I do not want to do the hon. gentleman any injustice—'Let him go on,' if there is anything wrong about it, let the hon. gentleman who brings up this matter, himself a lawyer, bring the accused before the Law Society and let him be robbed of his gown. That is the position the Minister of Railways takes. He says the matter might be serious if there could be shown any connivance, any conspiracy between the valuator and the solicitor. Well, that which must necessarily follow from their joint operations, has followed in this matter, if I understand the facts of the case correctly. I cannot get away, and the minister cannot get away, from the irresistible conclusion to be drawn from the letter of this valuator, in the handwriting of the agent of the Department of Justice. When a man acting as solicitor in the settlement of these claims, writes a letter and incloses a retainer to those adverse in interest to his clients. I am driven to the conclusion that this was the result of a conspiracy and an understanding with the valuator whose name is mentioned in it. Again let me read it to the minister, because I think he missed one of the important parts:

Mr. Graham, Westwood, Ont.
Dear Sir,—Inclosed you will find retainer which I will ask you to kindly have your brother fill in and sign in your presence. Please then return it with Mr. Dickson——

With Mr. Dickson, this letter with this retainer from the solicitor to the owner. The person having the claim is retaining privately a percentage of twenty per cent of the damages, his own brother being the owner, and it is to be returned to the solicitor through the valuator. And the minister says that that is a matter to be dealt with by the Law Society.

Mr. GRAHAM. I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. BOYCE. Does the minister not see now the grave complexion put on the matter?

Mr. GRAHAM. I do not want to interrupt the hon. member, but he is putting words in my mouth I did not utter, and has been doing it from the moment he commenced his speech.

Mr. BOYCE. I am not pretending to say that the minister says it in so many words, but I think he fully appreciates——

Mr. GRAHAM. No.

Mr. BOYCE—what I mean. We have nothing to do with that, that is a private matter, and what he says and what he did say, is that this is a matter that should be dealt with by the Law Society. He takes no responsibility whatever, he disclaims responsibility with regard to the dealings by the department with this solicitor. If that be the case, we have a curious and dangerous state of affairs. A man can be retained by this government to perform certain duties, and he can perform those duties in a manner which will result in the public being defrauded, and in injury being committed, as has been done in this case. A man is receiving double fees, and otherwise acting in almost a criminal manner, and the minister says: That is a matter that should be dealt with by the Law Society.

Mr. GRAHAM. Again my hon. friend is saying what I did not say.

Mr. BOYCE. I misunderstood my hon. friend very seriously if he did not say to the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) that this is a matter that should be dealt with by the Law Society, that this man should be reported and disbarred. I shall read the rest of the letter:

Please then return it with Mr. Dickson, and I will have your brother's claim forwarded to Ottawa without delay. I am glad to advise you that I am having very good settlements with nearly all my claims, and I think your brother will be dealt with all right. Have him hang out for 12 or 15 acres, and show where the water flows in the spring, and make the settlement with Mr. Dickson and I will be perfectly satisfied.

No man claiming to possess ordinary reason can read that letter without coming to the conclusion that there was a distinct understanding between the writer of that letter, Mr. Clarry, and Mr. Dickson, valuator of the government, that whatever arrangement was made with Dickson, as valuator, for the settlement of these claims would be satisfactory to the solicitor who was advocating the settlement. The solicitor of the government is distinctly urging the owner of the land to make as large a claim against his clients as he can. Does the minister approve of that? Does he think that is not a matter that should be dealt with in the public interest, and dealt with summarily? He is also saying: Make your settlement with Mr. Dickson, the valuator, who is to return the retainer, and the settlement that you make with Mr. Dickson will be perfectly satisfactory to me, namely, that I shall get my 20 per cent on it under my retainer. Unless I am very much mistaken with regard to the ethics of the situation, that presents about as serious a case for the attention of the government as could possibly be conceived, and if this is not serious enough to invite the minister's immediate and instant action, to summarily proceed and ascertain the truth or falsity of that statement made by the gentleman himself, because he is the man on whose words we are depending, then I know of no condition of affairs which will be suffiicently strong to make the minister realize that there are conditions when even as between political friends, the interests of the public must be safeguarded and drastic action must be taken, even though it be by the prosecution of the offender. I invite the minister's careful consideration of the letter enclosing the retainer. The retainer has been read. It provides that the owner of the land, the brother of the gentleman to whom the accompanying letter was addressed, should authorize the agent, the solicitor of the government employed in the investigation of the claims for the government, to make on his behalf as against the government of Canada, a claim for damages to his lands in the township of Asphodel, caused by the flooding of the waters of Rice lake, and agreeing to pay the agent of the government a commission of 20 per cent on all moneys awarded to him as damages, for his fees and compensation in the matter. The significant part of the retainer lies in the last line:

In case no damages are awarded to me I am to pay nothing.

Read that last line in conjunction with the last line of the accompanying letter:

Make the settlement with Mr. Dickson and I will be perfectly satisfied.

Does it look from the whole nature of the transaction as if this gentleman who showed a rapacity that is almost unequalled, wanting 20 per cent, would be satisfied with nothing? No, if nothing was to be awarded, then he was to get nothing, but he says: Make the settlement with Mr. Dickson, put the land up as high as you can, make the settlement with Dickson, send the retainer back by Dickson, and I will be perfectly satisfied. I say that it is a case in which the minister ought to interfere earnestly and promptly. He ought to get Mr. Dickson and Mr. Clarry, and all the facts before him, and ascertain whether or not that statement is correct with regard to Dickson, or clear Dickson from the very serious suspicion which rests upon him in consequence of that statement. What is the position of Dickson? Dickson is a valuator appointed by the government. He was bound to see that the correct valuation was obtained, that no more was paid by the Department of Railways, as representing the government of Canada, than should be payable for the actual damage which had been done, and for which the government ought properly to pay under its liability. How did Dickson prostitute that position if that statement be correct? He was the means of conveyance of a retainer from the owner of that land to the government solicitor, and he was the means of satisfying the government solicitor that a fee of 20 per cent of the land, upon a valuation which, according to this letter, must be made as large as possible should be paid. I commend the matter to the earnest attention of the Minister of Railways, and I hope he will change the view he expressed with regard to this not being a grave matter. The minister said that if Dickson was a party it would be serious; have I read this letter in vain, that the minister shakes his head and says that if Dickson is not a party, it is not serious?

Mr. BOYCE.

Mr. GRAHAM. I may tell the hon. gentleman that I did not make any such remark, and when he hears my statement, which I will make in a few minutes later I think he will be convinced that he is endeavouring to express thoughts for me which I certainly have not in my mind.

Mr. BOYCE. The inference from the minister's statement was that if Dickson was not a party it would not be serious, but, this letter plainly shows that there was an unquestionable conspiracy to defraud the government, and whether the valuator shared in the ill-gotten gains or not I leave to the minister to inquire into. He should find out how far the valuator was implicated, and in the interest of the people of Canada he should see that every cent that the solicitor has collected from the owners of the land is wrested from him by the most drastic operation of the law, and is restored with interest, and with costs to the owners.

Mr. GRAHAM. The matter brought to my attention by the hon. member (Mr. Lennox) is of course new to me. He had the advantage that he had copies of my documents, and I of course had no copies of his. It is the first I have heard of this letter, and what I was trying to elicit was the connection of Dickson with this letter. If the agent of the Department of Justice has been charging a commission at that end, he has been acting improperly, and all the money he has got in that way ought to be handed back to the people from whom he took it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. GRAHAM. There is no question about that. I would say to my hon. friend (Mr. Boyce) that I never led any one to think that such was not my view, and I was surprised at my hon. friend getting excited as if he thought I was endeavouring to screen somebody.

Mr. BOYCE. The hon. gentleman says that if Dickson was a party it would be serious.

Mr. GRAHAM. I have not dealt with Dickson yet; I was dealing with Mr. Clarry his fellow legal luminary. As to Mr. Dickson, I was trying to elicit the information from the letter, which is all the information I have ever had about this. If it be true that Mr. Dickson was a party in some way in getting a commission or trying to have the amount of a just claim raised, Mr. Dickson can no longer, so far as I am concerned, ever think of acting on behalf of my department for anything.

Mr. LENNOX. When the minister says that this is all he knew about it, I may mention that Mr. Humphries came down here last Easter time, and went to the department, and made his demand, and said that this man Clarry was holding him up and demanding fifteen per cent, and the department then promised they would see about it, but nothing has been done.

Mr. GRAHAM. That is the first I have heard about that either. There is a possibility he may have said to some one, but I never heard of it before.

Mr. LENNOX. He said it to Mr. Butler.

Mr. GRAHAM. I want to say again that the department will immediately investigate this matter.

Mr. LENNOX. That is right.

Mr. GRAHAM. Neither the Department of Railways nor the Department of Justice desires to screen anybody. If men have acted dishonestly with us we will get rid of them as quickly as possible.

Mr. SPROULE. One important feature of this case the Minister of Railways seems to treat with great unconcern, and that is as to the determination of what was, and what was not submerged land. I understood the minister to say that it was not necessary to get an engineer to determine what was high water mark.

Mr. GRAHAM. I said that it was not considered by the chief engineer necessary that a survey should be made in every case. It was quite evident what was high water mark in most cases, and as a matter of fact this valuator was a surveyor himself.

Mr. LENNOX. He took no evidence, and these lands were three miles away.

Mr. SPROULE. I cannot understand how you could divide the land which was not submerged from the land which was submerged without first determining what was high water mark. I remember once hearing a case tried in court with reference to submerged land, and the court demanded that evidence should extend over twenty-one years, and when they did conclude, after a great deal of evidence, as to what was high water mark they were able to decide the case, and not before. We have here a statutory declaration made by Mr. Humphries who has lived there for sixty-nine years, and who must be familiar with the condition of the lands in the spring, and in the fall, and he declares that considerable amounts have been paid in respect of land that is not submerged at all. That evidence of Mr. Humphries is not contradicted, and yet the minister treats it with levity. We have here the charge that this government agent is doing exactly what was done by one of their agents in the Yukon, a man paid $4,000 or $5,000 a year to advise the Yukon council in legal matters, and who then took $700 from a man who was brought before the authorities for violating the customs law. When that was brought to the attention of the government they treated it with levity as the Minister of Railways has done in this case, and made no inquiry. If that is the moral standard that the Minister of Railways is going to set up for his officials, then it is no wonder that we have so many cases of graft, and dishonesty, and improper conduct to ventilate in this parliament. We are getting to a very low ebb in the moral status of our people when the officials know that when wrong-doing is brought to the notice of the government the government will pay no attention to it. I do not think the country will regard the hon. minister having done his duty when he treats this matter with levity, and says that it is not our duty to prosecute a lawyer for taking a double commission, that belongs to the province of Ontario, or that we should bring the case before the bar association, and have his gown taken from him; but he is quite unconcerned whether the lawyer has done the right thing or not. Well, let the country judge. If that is the moral standard set up by any department of this government, then it seems to me that it has got to a very low ebb.

Mr. SMYTH. Looking at the matter from a layman's standpoint, I would like to ask the minister if he intends to pay this man the amount that has been passed, as stated in the question of the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox)? I would also like to know what services the minister thinks this man has rendered. It seems to me that he has been paid at one end, and that the department should not pay him at the other end.

Mr. AYLESWORTH. A good deal has been said during this discussion about a gentleman who has been referred to as the agent of the Department of Justice. I would like to prevent, if I can, any misapprehension on the part of any hon. gentleman as to the meaning of that expression. The Department of Justice, at the present time at any rate, has no standing agent anywhere in this country. When I took charge of the department four years ago, I found that, in some parts of the country at any rate, there were legal gentlemen who considered themselves, and who were possibly entitled to consider themselves, as standing agents of the Department of Justice in their respective localities. I did not think that was a desirable condition of things, and I put an end to it as soon as I could. In the province of Ontario there was nobody in that position at that time, and there has been nobody in that position since. I had the advantage, or disadvantage, of having been in active legal practice in the province of Ontario for some thirty years, and I was personally acquainted with the great majority of the legal practitioners in that province, and the course I adopted, not only in that province, but all over the Dominion, was the course which I think any ordinary business man, or any lawyer, who has business to be done in another part of the country, or in a foreign country, would adopt. It was simply to select for the particular piece of business in hand the man who I thought would be best qualified to do that business satisfactorily; and that particular piece of business being ended, there was an end to that man's employment, unless he were instructed to do some other piece of business at some future time. Of course, the ordinary business man who has any considerable amount of legal business commits each piece of it to the same solicitor, and thus in a sense has a standing solicitor. So long as he has confidence in him, the solicitor does practically all his legal business; and I am quite free to say that at a place where we have, in connection with the Department of Justice, a considerable amount of legal business going on, perhaps practically all through the year, unless there seems to be some reason for making a change, or sending some new piece of business to a different practitioner, the one in whom we have confidence, and who has given satisfaction, gets each new piece of business that goes to that locality. But the usual practice in seeking agents for a particular work is that which I have described. With reference to the particular gentleman whose name has been mentioned in connection with the matter under discussion, I have no personal acquaintance with him, and I do not know that I have ever met him; but I have known him by name and reputation for ten or fifteen, possibly twenty, years. I have never heard his professional honour, or his honesty questioned, until I have been told what has been said to-day. I cannot at the moment recall how it came that this particular piece of work was sent to him. My best recollection is that his name was recommended to me for the work by the late deputy of the Department of Railways and Canals, who, if my recollection is correct, said he had personal acquaintance with him. But the selection of Mr. Clarry to pay over these amounts to the different men whose lands have been damaged in his locality, and to satisfy himself and certify to the department that these men were the legal owners of the land damaged, and the right men to pay, was simply the ordinary piece of business which every lawyer in the carrying on of his office business might have at any time to do. If a client of any practising lawyer has a piece of business at the other end of the country, and tells his lawyer to get it done for him, the lawyer can but go to the law list, if he is not personally acquainted with the legal practitioners in a distant place. He assumes, in the absence of any reason to think the contrary, that a man who appears to be practising in good repute, is a man of ordinary honesty who will do the work with which he is entrusted, and will report the result of whatever he may do. It was precisely in that sense, and in no other that Mr. Clarry was instructed by the Department of Justice to take up these various claims, to look into the titles of each piece of property, and satisfy himself and certify to us that the claimant had the right to be paid for the damage to the particular land which was in question, and then to pay the amount which had been agreed upon as between the owner, and the department interested. The check, as a matter of ordinary business precaution, was made payable to both the land owner and the legal agent, for the very purpose that neither could cash it without the concurrence of the other—in order that the agent could not do it without the land owner getting the money, and in order that the land owner could not do it until the agent was satisfied that the man was entitled to the money.

That was a simple, ordinary business precaution. It is now charged that this legal gentleman was guilty of impropriety by taking money from the land owner with whom he was dealing. If that be so, he not only did something for which he would be liable to discipline by the law society, but something which, if it were in the shape of any secret commission, would render him liable to criminal prosecution. For my part, although I do not know the man, I give him, from the mere circumstance that he is a legal practitioner at the bar of Ontario, apparently in reputable standing, the simple justice of believing that the charge is not true until I see some evidence to the contrary. Let me just mention as an illustration an incident which occurred some time ago. A complaint was made to me regarding a legal practitioner in a different part of the country, who had been entrusted by the Justice Department with the work of searching a title to a piece of land taken for right of way and with the paying over of the money after the title was established. The owner of the property made the very serious charge against this gentleman that he had taken from the cheque, endorsed by both of them and cashed by him, some fifteen or twenty dollars. I inquired at once and the explanation was perfectly clear and simple. The title of the owner of the land was very defective. It required the preparation of several deeds from men who had outstanding claims against it and from women who were the wives of predecessors in title and had never signed to bar their dower, and defects of different characters had to be made right, before the owner was in a position to receive the money. That legal work was an obligation on the land owner. He had to get it done by somebody, and he had it done by our agent. There was no impropriety in our agent doing it and the owner paid our agent the proper legal fees. There was no reason in the world why the man, who was acting as our agent and certifying to the correctness of the title and handing over the money, should not be paid by the owner for making that title right. I merely mention this as an instance where, upon inquiry and explanation, there turned out to have been no irregularity whatever, although a serious charge had been made. With regard to the gentleman whose conduct has been under discussion, I can merely say that what has taken place is quite sufficient to warrant my calling on him for explanation. If he has been guilty of any misfeasance or wrong-doing, or betrayal of confidence, I shall make it my business to see, not merely that no more work is entrusted to him, but that such a course is taken as will likely prevent a repetition of it on the part of any one else.

Mr. SMYTH. Have the fees been paid to Mr. Clarry by the government?

Mr. GRAHAM. No.

Mr. SMYTH. Do you intend to pay him after what you have heard?

Mr. GRAHAM. He is an agent of the Justice Department, to be dealt with by that department. The other man is in my department, and I will look after the investigation in his case.

Mr. LENNOX. Ask the Minister of Justice not to pay until the matter is investigated.

Mr. FIELDING. The Minister of Justice does not pay.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. It is paid by the Department of Railways on an order from the Justice Department.

Mr. LENNOX. Will the minister see that the money is not paid until a proper investigation has been had.

Mr. GRAHAM. I will start the investigation to-morrow, so far as I am concerned.

Motion agreed to, and the House went into Committee of Supply.

Surveys and construction, National Transcontinental railway, $27,000,000.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The minister made a statement showing the cost in 1908. His answer is contained in two memoranda from the Transcontinental Railway Commission that are to be found on pages 12238 to 12242 of the 'Hansard' of 1908. The information given as to cost and estimated cost was pretty full up to that time and was followed by a debate. I would like to have the hon. minister bring that information down to date. Certain matters, which were only estimated then, are matters of actual expenditure at present. Also with respect to matters which were then estimated and still must be estimated, the minister no doubt has fuller information now. If he would give that information, it would be an advantage to the committee.

Mr. GRAHAM. That would take up all the tenders.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I do not mean necessarily all the tenders. My hon. friend brought down information in a very simple form then, in the form of a statement, carefully prepared, which gave the cost up to date and the estimated future cost of the eastern division. He also gave us estimates as to the length and cost of the western division, distinguishing in that regard the Prairie from the Mountain section. What I would like is to have that information brought down to date.

Mr. GRAHAM. The information with reference to the western section, I have brought down. It will all be found in a memo by Mr. Schreiber which I brought down some time ago. Possibly I referred to it in my remarks, but I am not sure.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I looked at the minister's remarks on February 1, but could not find anything about it. I may have overlooked it.

Mr. GRAHAM. Take the eastern division. The total expenditure up to December 31, 1909, was $67,890,697.59. The estimate made by Mr. Lumsden was about $63,500 a mile, and no change has been made in that estimate since. The total grading done to December 31, 1909, was 1,062·1 miles. The total track laying was 727·118 miles, of which 621·003 miles was on the main line and 106·115 on the sidings. The total contracts for steel superstructure in bridges and viaducts awarded to December 31, 1909, amounted to 34,030 tons, of which completed bridges represented 11,800 tons and erected bridges 15,350. I could give a memo showing the total amount on the western section. If I remember the figures, the prairie section as given in the returns is about $33,000 a mile. One hundred miles east of Prince Rupert is under contract and the track is being laid for a portion west of Wolf creek and supplies being taken in. The track is laid from Winnipeg to Wolf creek and trains are running. As to this western section, I cannot now give any nearer figures than I gave some time ago. As I stated, this estimate of $63,500 a mile for the eastern section does not include the terminals at the city of Quebec, the approaches to the terminals or the terminals or shops at Winnipeg.

Mr. JOHN HAGGART. Nor the Quebec bridge.

Mr. GRAHAM. Nor the Quebec bridge which, as I have always contended, is a separate undertaking.

Mr. JOHN HAGGART. Will the hon. minister give us the figures showing a comparison of the estimated quantities with the quantities as actually returned?

Mr. GRAHAM. I have a statement here which I think it would be well to put on 'Hansard.'

Mr. JOHN HAGGART. Before the minister reads that, can he tell us whether the total quantities are exactly the same as the estimates, the differences being only in the kind of classification within that figure, or do the totals of the returns show a difference as compared with the total quantities estimated?

Mr. GRAHAM. The figures will show that?

Mr. LENNOX. For what contract is that?

Mr. GRAHAM. I have here the figures with relation to each contract. There are twenty-one contracts in all.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Will the minister read the classification, so far as returned, on each of the 21 contracts, giving the estimates?

Mr. GRAHAM. I will give the estimates on each contract and what the result has been up to December 31, on each contract:

Ottawa, February 26, 1910.

H. MACPHERSON,
Asst. Chief Engineer.

Mr. J. HAGGART. The estimated cost to complete that will not exceed Mr. Lumsden's last estimate?

Mr. GRAHAM. I could not say that. The last estimate we had on the whole of it was $63,437 per mile.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

KINGSTON, SMITHS FALLS AND OTTAWA RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. NESBITT moved:

That the order for the consideration in Committee of the Whole House of Bill (No. 146), respecting the Kingston, Smiths Falls and Ottawa Railway Company be discharged, and that the said Bill be referred back to the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines for further consideration.

Mr. JOHN HAGGART. What reason is there for that?

Mr. NESBITT. Deputations from Kingston want to be heard on the Bill.

Motion agreed to.

NELSON RIVER RAILWAY COMPANY.

House in committee on Bill (No. 52) to incorporate the Nelson River Railway Company—Mr. Rutan.

Mr. LENNOX. This Bill has been allowed to stand over in order that it may be considered with another similar Bill containing water-powers which is not yet reported.

Mr. GRAHAM. There are some Bills in respect to which the water is international, but they are not similar to this. The Minister of the Interior has full control of the rates for power on a river such as is referred to in this Bill.

Mr. LENNOX. My point is that we should have some policy by which we can protect the public interest in these waterways, and by which some revenue will be secured either to the Dominion or to the province, and some provision made by which we will not conflict with the rights of the provinces. I do not think we ought to take up any time over this to-night, as the Bill can very well stand, and when the policy of the government is declared it will go through swimmingly, I presume.

Mr. GRAHAM. I have no objection to it standing over, because if you are going to talk it out we had better take up some other Bill. So far as this Bill is concerned the government has a policy, because for a year past the Minister of the Interior can issue licenses for a fee which goes to the revenue of the Dominion.

Mr. BRADBURY. I have here the regulations of the Minister of the Interior and there is nothing to indicate in them what that fee is. The fixing of it is entirely in the hands of the minister, and my contention is that there should be some well defined policy, and that the fee should be fixed.

Mr. GRAHAM. You cannot have a fixed fee.

Mr. BRADBURY. No minister should have absolute control in these matters. For instance, if I am a personal friend of the minister I may be able to get a water-power on more favourable terms than could another person, unless there is some well defined policy. The statement of the Minister of the Interior the other night that the regulations cover these two water-powers is not correct because they are situated in the territories, and not in the provinces, and there is no regulation covering the territories. This is a very important question. The Minister of Railways may not know it, but the fact is that the Nelson river contains a number of great water-powers. I do not believe that on any river in all Canada there are more water-powers than on the Nelson river. The Sea Falls alone 250,000 horse-power can be developed. There is a whole series of falls right down to the bay, and I do not think any company ought to be allowed to interfere with them. The government should keep control over them.

Mr. GRAHAM. I know my hon. friend will agree with me when I say that it would be impossible to provide for fixed fees, because a water-power in one place may be worth only $1 per horse-power, while in another place, owing to its proximity to a populous locality, it may be worth $20 per horse-power. Some department must handle the matter, and take into consideration all the circumstances, and grant a lease by order in council after a fair rate has been fixed after full investigation.

Mr. J. HAGGART. The contention of my hon. friend (Mr. Bradbury) is that the power with reference to these matters should not be in the hands of a minister, but should be statutory. You can put these rights up to competition if you like, and in that way you would get over any difficulty as to fixing the fees.

Mr. BARNARD. I think the Minister of Railways is sufficiently broad minded to not being adverse to taking a hint from what has been done in connection with these powers in the province of British Columbia. We have a large number of very valuable water-powers there belonging to the Crown in the right of the province, and we have a very comprehensive code dealing with them and the obtaining of rights by companies to use these water-powers. To a very large extent that province is undeveloped, and no doubt as the minister says, some water-powers are much more valuable than others. But they have, after some years of experience, deemed it wise to provide a scale of fees by order in council according to the number of cubic inches of water taken. The result is that if the power is valuable it is developed; if there is no market for it, it is not developed; but it lies there available to anybody who comes along and complies with the Act; and all are treated equally. Surely it is undesirable that it should be left to the arbitrary decision of any minister, however willing or anxious he may be to do what is right, to say what revenue should be paid by a company for the use of power. We have found the other system to work very satisfactorily, and the province derives considerable revenue from a regular tariff which anybody can ascertain without going to the minister of any department; and I should think that the same system might very profitably be adopted in connection with water-powers belonging to the Dominion.

Mr. RUTAN. I hope that this Bill will not be held up again to-night. The powers asked for are no more than have been granted by the Railway Committee and this House to other companies, not only in past sessions, but even in the present session. The power of expropriation has been omitted from this Bill. The Bill to which the hon. gentleman referred, the Rainy River Company's Bill, is of an entirely different character, because it relates to the province of Ontario, where the province owns all the lands and water-powers. This Bill relates to the Northwest Territories, which belong to the Dominion, and to a portion of those territories which is undeveloped; and the people who live in that part of the country are anxious to see it developed as well as other parts of the Dominion, as they believe that it will prove to be very valuable.

Mr. BRADBURY. Will the hon. gentleman tell me where there any people living within a hundred miles of the proposed railway and water-power?

Mr. RUTAN. The people who live nearest to that country are in my own constituency. My hon. friend seems to be talking of Winnipeg and its vicinity. I ask him if there have been any petitions or communications from the city of Winnipeg against this undertaking? We might say that it is a Winnipeg undertaking. It is for the purpose of giving Winnipeg the cheapest and most direct connection with the Hudson Bay railway. Both the clause in the Bill giving the right of expropriation, and clause 15, with reference to a tramway, have been cut out in the Railway Committee, and it seems to me very unfair now to hold up this Bill when it asks for no more than has been granted with practically no opposition to many other companies. In the Bill that passed the Railway Committee to-day, the power given by clause 11 is practically the same as the power asked for in this Bill, and it passed the committee without any objection.

Mr. BRADBURY. What Bill is that?

Mr. RUTAN. The Bill incorporating the James Bay and Eastern Railway Company. If capital is willing to go into these undeveloped territories and develop them, I do not see why we should not allow it to go there. We who live in that northern country know, from what we have heard from people who have gone into these territories and prospected, that there is untold wealth in them. It seems to me that the hon. gentlemen who are opposing this Bill are only talking against their own interests. People who live in the Northwest and who know what the development of a new country is, should be ready to receive that kindly assistance that other people are willing to give. Though the Bill is in my name, the only interest I have in it is the interest of having the country developed. I do not believe it would be possible for the Minister of the Interior, whether a Liberal or a Conservative, to grant any right or privilege to an individual or a company, that could not bear criticism. I would ask hon. gentlemen to grant this Bill fair play and give this company the same privilege as others. We are not asking for any special privileges; we are not trying to gobble up any water-powers. Neither these or any other powers which are in our rivers, whether provincial or Dominion, are of any good until they are utilized. This company asks the right to acquire water-powers and make whatever arrangement it can, either with the Department of the Interior or with the province, as the case may be.

Mr. JOHN HAGGART. The hon. gentleman mistakes altogether the opposition to this Bill. The Bill is a very simple one. It is only intended to give to a corporation the powers which an individual would have. The hon. gentleman says that they struck out the expropriation clause. They might well do that because you cannot expropriate against the Crown. I am not opposed to the Bill. I would like to see it go through, and I think it will because it is a very simple Bill giving a corporation the same powers as an individual. But what we want is a declaration of policy from the government as to the manner in which they intend disposing of these valuable privileges, either to individuals or to corporations.

Mr. BRADBURY. If this Bill is going to stand over, I have no intention of trying to block it, but I would point out that the matter is a very serious one. These water-powers are nearly 350 miles from Winnipeg, and there is not a white man living within one hundred and fifty or sixty miles of where this company is asking for these water-powers. The power they propose generating would be simply for the piece of railway they intend to build. They do not say where this railway is going to start. It is to start either at the mouth of the Nelson, or at the mouth of the Saskatchewan, which are 150 miles apart. The whole scheme is immature. And outside of all that is the fact that we have no regulations governing these water-powers. They are at the present outside the province, and the regulations provided by the Interior Department affect only water-powers within the different provinces. My hon. friend says that we have been giving these powers to other companies. That may be true, but that is no reason for continuing that policy. What I urge is to stay proceedings until the government investigates this matter thoroughly and brings down some policy regarding the distribution of these great water-powers. There is no question in my mind that this is simply a power scheme. The hon. gentleman talks about reduced rates between Winnipeg and Hudson bay, but every man who knows anything about Lake Winnipeg, knows that it is frozen up six months in the year, and in the other six months we have the water route. This is simply a scheme to control the great water-powers. If the rights of the people are protected, I have no objection to this Bill, but I do want to see their rights safeguarded. Another question is this. Within a very short time these great powers will likely come within the territory of Manitoba. The argument is used that Manitoba has no rights in her waterways; but I hope the day is not far distant when all that will be remedied. Our province should have control of our great water-powers. I believe the time is coming when Manitoba will have the control of its fisheries. That control is essential to her development and the proper protection of our fisheries. That is one of the reasons why this government should stay its hand. I do not think we should give away rights, or any thing that may affect the future of any province. There can be no question that the province of Manitoba will have those rights in years to come, and nothing should be done here to make it impossible or difficult for the province to legislate with regard to her water-powers. I am not holding up the Bill, or objecting to it on personal grounds, but I realize my position, representing a constituency more directly affected than any other, as these powers are at the head of Lake Winnipeg.

Mr. T. CHISHOLM. I see in the Ottawa 'Free Press' to-night that an impassable muskeg on the Hudson Bay railway route, extending many miles, has stopped the survey work. Last year I explained, in a speech I made on the twelfth of March in this House, about this muskeg. I explained that there were miles of that Hudson Bay railway route composed of frozen muskeg, covered with a kind of moss two feet, or three feet thick. This acts like sawdust in an ice house, and keeps the muskeg frozen all the year round. So long as the ground remains frozen underneath, the muskeg is passable, but as soon as it is broken up as it must be in building a railway the heat gets in, and the ground thaws out, and the whole road-bed sinks into the muskeg. If the route of the Hudson Bay railway is to be changed, it would be well to let the Bill before us stand because, the company it proposes to incorporate is to connect with the Hudson Bay road. I think it would be as well, therefore, to let it stand over until the hon. minister gets more particulars.

A trial line should be run at once between Prince Albert city and Hudson bay to see if a better route cannot be obtained for the Hudson Bay railway. The lakes in the Pas country are so nearly on a level with the land that the water backs up, and soaks over an immense territory, and that is what causes the muskeg. I was told in Prince Albert last year that a million muskrat skins had been taken out of that country during last winter, which would indicate that there must be a considerable extent of low land there. If that be the case, I am afraid that any attempt to build a road through that section of country will be a failure, and as the road mentioned in this Bill is to connect with the Hudson Bay railway, it would be well to hold it over for reconsideration. A trial line from Prince Albert should be run at once because there are no high hills, impassable muskegs, big rivers, or other serious obstacles to be met with between northern Prince Albert and Hudson bay.

Mr. ALEX. HAGGART. I must urge that this matter stand over. It seems to me as if there were some concerted action to monopolize this territory. We had a Bill the other day, a canal Bill, but it was really a water-power Bill, to build a canal upon the streams reaching all the way between Lake Superior and Lake Winnipeg. This Bill is a railway Bill in name, but it is really a water-power Bill, as has been set forth by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bradbury). I would call the attention of the House to the part of it which defines the line of railway. Under section 7 the railway is to start at Grand Rapids (at the mouth of the Saskatchewan) or at the outlet of Lake Winnipeg (that is, the Nelson river) or at any point between. One of these points is in the north east of Lake Winnipeg and the other is in the northwest. And there is at least 100 miles, perhaps 150 miles, between them. Does the railway run north, south, east or west? The Bill does not say. It runs to intersect the Hudson Bay railway, wherever it may be located by the government. That road is not located yet. So, as the hon. member for Selkirk has said, it has no starting point and it ends nowhere. That is the railway part of the Bill. It is just possible by giving that a liberal construction that the road may run all the way down the banks of the Nelson river to somewhere near York factory. And, with the powers in the original Bill—I have forgotten just how far the Bill was amended—to build tramways around the rapids—

Mr. GRAHAM. That is cut out.

Mr. A. HAGGART. That is cut out. Well, it can run all along the Nelson river for hundreds of miles. The province of Manitoba looks forward to the time when this territory will be included within its boundaries, and we would like, when this territory comes to Manitoba, that it should come unencumbered by legislation of this kind. We find that already a good deal of the public domain has been alienated. We would not like to acquire this new territory and find a practical, grafting politician—well, that is too strong a word; I will take that back—sitting upon every waterfall that is among the few assets we have left. If there were any immediate necessity for the construction of this road, we should be the last to oppose it. As the hon. member for Selkirk has said, there are not fifty white men between Lake Winnipeg and the proposed terminus of this road at York factory or any other part of that territory. If the gentleman is ready with his friends and their capital to go ahead and develop that territory he will find not only the people of Winnipeg but the people of Manitoba behind him. But they would like to have some more definite scheme than this.

Mr. CARVELL. If the hon. gentleman will allow me to ask him a question? Does he understand the law at present to be such that, if this territory were added to Manitoba under the present conditions, the province of Manitoba would control the water-powers?

Mr. LENNOX. We have the minister—

Mr. CARVELL. I am asking the hon. member for Winnipeg (A. Haggart). If he does not wish to answer, all right.

Mr. A. HAGGART. The law is by no means clear on that point. There are few water-powers in Manitoba as the province exists. It is a 'prairie province,' a level province. The only water-powers of any importance are those on the Winnipeg river in the eastern part of the province. They have been administered in this way: Parties have applied to this government for a license or a lease of the falls, or the right to develop the water-powers upon that river. But what the authority of this government is, I am not very clear.

Mr. CARVELL. One more question, if I may be permitted. In the case of the Winnipeg river, has the province of Manitoba exercised any jurisdiction over these water-powers?

Mr. A. HAGGART. They have to this extent, that they have granted charters to people to develop these powers, and the city of Winnipeg—

Mr. CARVELL. That is the incorporating of a company, but have they exercised any powers or rights of ownership over the water-powers themselves?

Mr. A. HAGGART. I am not aware that they have. A water-power is a peculiar kind of property.

Mr. CARVELL. It is very simple.

Mr. A. HAGGART. With reference to Winnipeg river, if the Dominion owned the land all along that river no doubt the Dominion would own the lands under the river, and would have a sufficient grip upon that water-power to control it.

Mr. CARVELL. It would seem so.

Mr. A. HAGGART. But, if the Dominion had alienated these lands along the river—and they have alienated a lot of them, for some of these lands are what are known as swamp lands and have been conveyed to Manitoba and are Crown lands in the right of the province of Manitoba—or if they had been patented either to the province of Manitoba or to individuals who are now riparian owners, and if these held and own sufficient of the fee simple on both sides of the river, I have no doubt that, as riparian owners, they would have the right, perhaps, to develop that power in so far as that development did not interfere with navigation. But, with reference to navigation, while there are stretches in that river that are navigable for ten or twenty miles, it is not valuable as a navigable river. We do not want to do anything to prevent development, but I would urge upon the government to have this Bill stand over until we know a little more about it.

Mr. RUTAN. It seems to me that the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. A. Haggart) has shown a good deal of feeling in this matter. He speaks of grafting along the river—

Mr. A. HAGGART. I took that back.

Mr. RUTAN. The hon. gentleman makes a point of the fact that Lake Winnipeg is open only part of the year, and infers from that fact that this must be a water-power Bill entirely. But there are many things in this country not operated all the year and that yet pay dividends. Lake Superior is not open all the year. If we go back to our farmers, we find that many of them own binders, costing them up to $200, which they use for only ten days in the year. And one individual, or a number of individuals clubbing together, will buy a threshing machine at a cost of several thousand dollars, for use only about sixty days a year, and still the use of these articles are the foundation of our wealth. There is nothing in this Bill that can authorize any man to state that it is only a power Bill. This is an undertaking to build the railway, and, in connection therewith, making an arrangement to build steamers to ply in connection with it, to acquire power for the undertaking and to dispose of the surplus power. This is a concession which is given to other companies—has been given to other companies since this Bill started through the Railway Committee. I cannot see what will be gained by putting the Bill off. The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bradbury) said that this was hundreds of miles away from settlement; then he turns round and says that it is so valuable that it should be given all the protection possible, and we should wait and see what arrangement can be made with the province of Manitoba. I don't think that is the right stand to take. If we do not carry on works of development in any of the provinces until they have developed all their natural resources, we shall witness continued stagnation.

Mr. BRADBURY. In answer to the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Rutan), I would like to say that when this matter was under discussion the other evening, some question was raised about the authority of the province over these powers. The minister stated, I think, in reply to something I said myself, that even if the boundaries of the province were extended, the province would have no more rights than it has at present. We all understand that. But the point I raised was this: While I recognize the fact that we have at present no authority over our water-powers, I believe the time is coming when Manitoba will have control over its water-powers and over its lands; and in view of that fact, I think the government ought to go very slow in giving control of a power where there is absolutely no necessity. There is nothing urgent, there is no present need of developing that power. If a charter was given to it, I am satisfied that there is nothing to warrant the expenditure this Bill contemplates. By the mere fact of giving that charter we tie up that water-power, which I think is a wrong principle. Now, in the interest of Manitoba, I feel that I must urge the government to defer this Bill. I do not want to be considered as blocking the measure, but I feel that there should first be formulated some well defined policy regulating the powers on the Winnipeg river, as well as at the head of Lake Winnipeg. In answer to a question with regard to the Winnipeg river, I said that the province has some power over that river. It obtained that power largely through the fact that the swamp lands which came under its authority gave it some rights along that river. There was a charter, I think, granted by the Dominion, but although it was granted by the Dominion, they had to seek some powers in the province of Manitoba before they could do anything with that power. Now we have 15 or 16 immense powers on that river, and if the schemes that are before parliament are allowed to go through, it would be a serious matter for that western country. On the Winnipeg river, there is no canal scheme that it is possible to carry out without injuring every water-power along that route. But I do not think myself that there is anything very serious contemplated in regard to a canal scheme. The scheme is to get control of these powers, there is no question about that; and that is one of the reasons why I have taken such strong ground against granting the powers these companies are asking for. If we grant the company in the Bill that is under discussion now, the powers that are asked for, I am satisfied that for years to come nothing could be done there in the way of development.

Mr. RUTAN. That being the case, if there will be nothing done, would not the powers lapse at the end of the two years?

Mr. BRADBURY. My contention is that nothing should be done that would embarras the action of the government in future regarding these powers. That country is developing rapidly, we need all the power we can get in the city of Winnipeg, and the time may come when the power from these very falls would be most essential to the prosperity, not only of Winnipeg, but of other great towns in the west. When that time comes, the government ought to be in a position to handle that power, which it could not do if it were tied up by the legislation that is now proposed. As I have pointed out with regard to the railway scheme, I think every hon. gentleman who has paid any attention to the proceedings of the committee, knows very well that there is no well defined scheme. If it starts south, say at a point on Lake Winnipeg, or at the mouth of the Nelson, the two points are 150 miles apart, and I do not think it is fair to ask this House to grant a railroad charter without some more definite knowledge than we have regarding where it is going to start and where it is going to end. I would, therefore, ask the minister to defer this Bill in order that the government may be in a position to bring down some well defined policy with regard to these water-powers, and especially the powers outside the province. The government at present has no scheme, the legislation they have does not in any way cover the water-powers outside the boundaries of the different provinces. There are three or four water-powers on the Nelson, perhaps as great as the first power at Sea falls, and there is not one of these powers protected by the regulations issued by the Interior Department. I think that is a matter that ought to receive the serious attention of the government before anything further is done.

Mr. S. SHARPE. Looking over the Bill I do not see any limitations within which the company shall start operations or complete them.

Mr. GRAHAM. The general Railway Act will apply.

Mr. S. SHARPE. I understand that the general Railway Act will apply, but if the company fail to commence its operation within the time limited by that Act and they should come back for a renewal of their charter, there would be no difficulty in getting the charter renewed, because the Railway Committee, since I have been in it, has adopted the policy of automatically renewing charters without any question. There has been some spasmodic opposition to the renewal of these charters, but it has practically had no effect at all. I think the time of the members of this House is too much occupied in fighting the aggressions of those private companies. These private companies introduce Bills that purport to be Railway Bills, but in reality they are water-power Bills. Not only this session, but last session, our time was occupied for days and days fighting these private companies who desired to gain control of water-powers that should be left within the jurisdiction of the various provinces. It seems to me an anomaly that matters affecting the province, for instance of British Columbia, should be decided by members from the provinces of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and Quebec.

Mr. GRAHAM. The Burrard Inlet Bridge and Railway Company.

Mr. S. SHARPE. It seems to me an anomaly that members from Quebec can settle the terms upon which a radial railway company shall enter the city of Toronto. I think there should be some declaration of policy on the part of the government, laying down stereotyped rules and regulations upon which every company can get its charter automatically on well defined conditions. I also think that a regulation might be made that all these matters should be referred to a sub-committee from the province affected by these railway companies. For instance, if a private railway Bill is brought in affecting the province of British Columbia, that might be referred to a sub-committee of members from that province.

Mr. CARVELL. What would the hon. gentleman say if it affected the Northwest Territories? Would he refer it to the member for the Yukon? The Bill now under consideration affects the Northwest Territories alone.

Mr. S. SHARPE. In that event I would suggest that the members from the various provinces in the west be a sub-committee. They know the local conditions better than we do.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY.

The hour for private Bills having expired the House resumed in Committee of Supply.

National Transcontinental railway, surveys and construction, $27,000,000.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Would the minister state the character of the work done to ascertain the necessary data with respect to classification for the purpose of tendering?

Mr. GRAHAM. It would be what is known as the preliminary surveys of the country. The estimates were based on the surface indications found by the engineers and some soundings or borings.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I am asking for information because I am in an unhappy state of ignorance in regard to all these matters. I would suppose that where advertisements were sent our for tenders, these tenders to be based on a schedule of prices for each class of work, it would be absolutely essential for the government to know the character of the country and to have some reasonable idea as to how much solid rock, how much loose rock, how much earth excavation would have to be paid for in the final result. I am not able to understand how the government could arrive at the conclusion that one tender was higher or lower than another unless they had that information in their possession, and I cannot understand how they could come to a reasonable conclusion about the relative merits of the different tenders unless that information in their possession was reasonably accurate and reliable. The information which the minister vouchsafed to the House this afternoon shows that there are discrepancies of a most extraordinary character. Let me give you one example. On contract No. 1, the estimate was that there was no solid rock. Ninety-five per cent of that contract has been done and the final result has not yet been ascertained, but so far as 95 per cent is concerned, it shows no less than 42,219 cubic yards of solid rock. The estimate showed 129,379 cubic yards of loose rock. The result, in respect of 95 per cent of the contract shows that no less than 938,728 cubic yards have been returned. The estimates showed of common earth excavation 1,841,152 cubic yards. Ninety-five per cent of the work has been done and in that we find only 520,728 cubic yards. If the information in the possession of the government was so absolutely inaccurate as this seems to have been, how was it possible to come to a conclusion about the tenders. I do not wish to draw any conclusion that is not legitimate, but one can easily see how a tender that was really the highest of all might be accepted as the lowest if the information was no more reliable than it was in this case. What is the minister's explanation?

Mr. GRAHAM. The explanation so far as I can make it is this: I am informed that the usual practice prevailing in Canada was adopted by the engineering staff, the preliminary surveys made and the general contour of the country shown on the profile, with the approximate quantities of each kind of material in each district.

Mr. BARKER. How were the approximate quantities of loose rock and earth ascertained for these estimates?

Mr. GRAHAM. I presume they were obtained as on all railways, but not being an engineer I cannot give a professional explanation.

Mr. BARKER. Judging by the results they were never ascertained at all.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I am inclined to think that any one could have shut his eyes, never gone near the country at all, and made as good a guess.

Mr. GRAHAM. The engineering staff followed the usual practice as I understand it. Mr. Dunn is now in the employ of the Grand Trunk Pacific in a very responsible position, and any engineers that have left us have been picked up by other railways and put in charge of the same kind of work. I believe the engineers were good men. The engineers estimated, and the tenders were based on the approximate quantities given by the engineers, and the contract was given to the lowest tender on that basis.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. If the engineers were good men, and if they followed the practice usual in Canada, I assume it is a practice that must give satisfactory results. I am not prepared to say exactly where the fault lies, but undoubtedly if the original estimates were correct then the charges of over classification must be true. It is utterly impossible to conceive that there is not something radically wrong somewhere. Either the work was done with an incredible degree of incapacity or negligence in the first instance, or else the final classification is not a true classification. Something is inconceivably wrong in the one case or the other. I have had some little experience of this in my profession, and I know that no such absurd results as these were ever obtained where the work was properly done in both cases. It seems to be an outrageous condition of affairs. Here is an estimate of 1,841,152 yards of common earth excavation; the contract has now been completed to the extent of 95 per cent and yet we find that the classification of common earth excavation is only 520,726 yards or not quite 30 per cent of the estimate. There is something outrageously wrong in this. Does the minister pretend to tell me that is the way in which other railways are built in this country. I know a little about these contracts and I never heard of anything like this before. I shall be glad to hear what explanation the minister can give.

Mr. GRAHAM. My hon. friend's point is well taken, but of course, we cannot tell about the entire classification until the board of arbitrators give their report; and then these quantities may possibly be changed in some respects. In reading over some documents the other day it struck me that the engineers in making their preliminary surveys and estimates might not make their estimate of solid rock, or loose rock open to the same interpretation as that put upon it by the engineers making the excavation.

Mr. BARKER. The great distinction is between earth and rock.

Mr. GRAHAM. On the surface there might be no solid rock as would be indicated in the first survey.

Mr. LENNOX. The rock has to be more than a yard in size.

Mr. GRAHAM. There is an interpretation in one clause that any material that it is best to move by blasting is solid rock. Engineers classify these things differently from what we would understand, and I find that sometimes an engineer will call a thing solid rock when a layman would not so describe it. But granting all that, I admit at once that to my mind the estimated quantities are not as close to what the real returns are, as they ought to be. There is no use arguing it any other way. But a difference between the estimate and the cost often happens in other railways. For instance, I believe that the Sudbury branch of the Canadian Pacific railway cost 100 per cent higher than the estimate. I am not saying that was in the classification; I am just taking the cost of the line as a whole. Railway companies in making their estimates often go very far astray but the public do not know about it as they do in the case of a public work like this. To my mind the difficulty is not so much in there being a wrong estimate, except that that might lead parliament astray in any case as to what the cost would be, if the country is not paying for more than it is getting.

Mr. BARKER. That is not the question.

Mr. GRAHAM. It is the question I am talking about, and when the arbitrators make their final examination, I have full faith that the country will pay only for what it has got, and the classification will be properly laid down by the board.

Mr. J. HAGGART. The hon. minister must know that there is a proper way to construct a railway. First, there is a preliminary survey, then there is a location survey. The duty of the engineers in a location survey is to ascertain not only the quantity in the prisms, but the composition. How do they do that? The hon. minister says that they look at the surface. Not at all. They sink test pits on every portion of the road down to grade line, and they ought to know within ten per cent the proper classification. Fifteen per cent, as the minister stated, is an enormous allowance. What do we find on the first section of the road? No rock returned by the engineers, and as a matter of fact 40,000 yards of solid rock; an estimate of 150,000 yards of loose rock, and there is 700,000 yards; an estimate of 18,000 yards of clay or earth excavation, and there is 500,000 yards. How can you have proper tenders when such a state of affairs occurs? The estimates were in such a condition that any one who tendered on the quantities returned by the engineers would have no chance whatever. The minister says the same thing has occurred in several cases. I defy him to show a case in which such manifest errors in the location surveys have occurred in the construction of any railroad, unless there is found a pithole largely in excess of the quantity the engineers estimated. Strange to say, the prism quantities are nearly correct. The only fault is in the classification, the dividing up. If a man who takes out earth is paid for loose rock, and the man who takes out loose rock is paid for rock, it is the fault of the department or of the engineering staff who superintended the location survey. When there is 40,000 yards of rock excavation where none was estimated, and when the earth excavated is changed into loose rock excavation, the result is that the contractor is paid three or four times the amount he would have been entitled to if the location survey had been correct. There is something wrong. We have no explantion as to when or how it occurred. Everybody knows that in the construction of a railroad the original estimates of the location engineers are kept in a book, and that every week, while the work is going on, a certain portion of it is checked off. The department ought to have a similar book so that they would know at any time when anything went wrong. We have no explanation whether, when they found that these things were going wrong, the attention of the engineer in charge of the work was drawn to the improper classification or not. We should have some explanation, but we have none. It seems that this thing has gone on without any supervision whatever. The hon. minister says that a final estimate is not made, that the classification is still under consideration. I would like to know from the minister, with regard to this section of the road which we are considering, to what extent the contractor has been paid on these estimates, and whether it is not largely in excess of the original quantity as estimated by the engineers, and whether it would not be possible, even with the percentage retained by the government, and the deposit made by the contractor, to secure the government against any charges of that kind? What is the classification on which the contractor has been paid, and what is the amount reserved, over and above the usual ten per cent, for the purpose of preserving to the government any right they may have on the final classification?

Mr. BARKER. The hon. minister has spoken as if the great difficulty in these matters were a distinction between loose rock and solid rock. Why, that is a trifle compared with what the real facts are. The great trouble here is the enormous difference between ordinary earth excavation and either solid rock or loose rock. If you reduced this down to a mere question of difference between loose rock and solid rock, there would be a very important difference; but it would be nothing compared to the enormous loss to the country arising from the fact that what was represented as earth work is being paid for as either loose rock or solid rock. The minister says that he has no doubt that the thing was done as it is usually done by railway companies. I hope that it was so, and if it was, the hon. gentleman can show us, yard for yard, from one end of that road to the other, what the engineers did before these contracts were made. It is not a question of guess work. The minister has the papers in his possession; why are they not produced? Why have we not these explanations now when we are asked to vote $27,000,000 for continuing this work? Why does the minister not tell us where, and how these discrepancies occurred? It does not require an engineer to know that if these discrepancies worked against the contractors, and the government attempted to enforce the contracts the courts of the land would relieve the contractors from their obligations because of fraudulent representations made on behalf of the government. That is the case, and the hon. minister knows it.

Mr. CARVELL. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that if the locating engineers estimated that a certain cut contained 75 per cent of rock, and the contractor took the contract under that specification and it turned out only 25 per cent rock, he would have an action against the commissioners for breach of faith?

Mr. BARKER. I say that if you should bring before a court such manifest injustice—in this case it happens to be an injustice to the country—to the contractor, as the result of misrepresentations made, the court would relieve the contractor.

Mr. CARVELL. One other question. Is the hon. gentleman aware that in asking for tenders for this work the contractors were not given any information whatever as to what proportion was solid or loose rock or common earth excavation, in any of these different works.

Mr. J. HAGGART. Is the hon. gentleman certain in his statement?

Mr. CARVELL. Yes.

Mr. BARKER. I have had something to do with letting railway contracts. Before a company lets such a contract as this government did, its engineers go over again and again every mile of the work, and by pits and borings and preliminary surveys, they ascertain, as nearly as possible, what is the nature of the ground?

Mr. BARKER.

Mr. CARVELL. Does the hon. gentleman know that that information was given the contractors when tendering for the work?

Mr. BARKER. If a railway company were undertaking to build a new line through a country such as this—and I have in my mind at this moment a similar work—that company would survey every mile with the utmost care, and they would have, as the government has now, if the minister's statement is correct, they would have a record of the borings and surveys of every mile of that road.

Mr. J. HAGGART. Every 100 yards.

Mr. BARKER. Every mile would be done by sections of 100 yards. They would be able to show the prism measurements, the tests, the pits and borings; and it would be such evident, downright fraud, if the differences were so enormous as they are here represented to be that no court would hold the contractor bound by his contract, because of the evident, wilful, deliberate, intentional misrepresentation and fraud. The hon. gentleman says there are differences about loose and solid rock. Why the great difference is that enormous quantities of earthwork are turned into loose or solid rock—not loose rock turned into solid, or solid into loose. That is where the cost estimated by this government has been so enormously exceeded. No one pretends for a moment that discrepancies or errors of 15 or even 20 per cent difference would be an indication of anything but carelessness on the part of the staff for which we could not hold the government or a company responsible, but to say that the directors of a railway company would not be responsible for such enormous differences as are here shown is absurd. Why, they would dismiss the whole staff if they were an honest board. They would kick every man out as incompetent unless they were afraid to do it because they were a party to the fraud. There is no business man which does not know that to be the case. I have known that in similar cases of difficult railway construction, the company has sent their staff three times over the ground. They sent them first and got their estimate, and then sent them over again, and even a third time before submitting their surveys for tenders. Then the contractors would come in and the company got all the benefit of the money they had had expended on these preliminary surveys. But what have we here? The hon. gentleman is not able to produce those preliminary surveys. He does not know that any are in existence. He can only say vaguely that the government have done what companies usually do. He ought to know whether he has the results of those surveys. If he has, it was his duty to look into them and see who were responsible for this enormous expenditure, wholly unexpected and wholly unauthorized. That is what I complain of. It is no use for the hon. gentleman to ask for $20,000,000 and tell us he has no doubt that what is usually done was done in this case. He ought to know what was done. He ought to have the papers in his office and see whether there are still in the pay of this government men who deliberately falsified the figures or were so negligent that they were even worse than rogues and falsifiers.

Mr. GRAHAM. I would not dare to follow my hon. friend in his sweeping strictures and denunciations of people as rogues and falsifiers. I am always sufficiently charitable to consider every man as honest as myself until I find out that he is not. It does not help our argument on either side to call names. My hon. friend is a good railway man perhaps, but I will venture the assertion that there is not an hon. member in this House who has heard him who would think that he has made this clear, and that is that the contractors do not base their estimates on information as to quantities or classification given them by the government.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Is the government estimate submitted them before they tender?

Mr. GRAHAM No. They know nothing about the quantities which the government engineers have figured out.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The government makes certain tests and borings, and estimate as best they can what the classifications eventually will be—is that information not submitted in any form to the contractors?

Mr. GRAHAM. Partially it is and partially it is not. There is a profile given the contractors and that profile shows the probable findings in different parts of the country.

Mr. BARKER. As the result of your survey?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes. But the engineers of any company are supposed to find out for themselves, they are not given the faintest inkling of what quantity there is of solid rock, no quantities are given at all, there is merely given a profile of what is in the different districts. These are not guaranteed. If the contractors are good business men, they send their own engineers over the territory, and base their tenders on their own information, and not on ours at all, and that is what they nearly always do. The government, or any company, merely gives them the general character of the country on a profile.

Mr. BEST. Is this contract let at so much per yard for solid rock, so much for loose rock, and so on?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes.

Mr. BEST. Then what difference does it make to them how many yards there are. But it does make a difference when it turns out in so many cases that what was first classified as earth has become solid rock.

Mr. GRAHAM. The hon. member (Mr. Best) is not going to get me away from the point though I have answered his question. I am pointing out that the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Barker) perhaps unintentionally, drew a veil over a certain part of the case in presenting it to the House. He would have left the impression upon my mind, had I not understood the matter, and I have no doubt that he left the impression on the minds of those hon. members who have not had experience, that we gave the quantities to the contractors, and that on these the contractors had made their tenders. They had no quantities, but merely a profile, and they figured out their tenders from their own information and from the profile given by the commission. The same is true in the case of contractors for a company. The company does not give its estimates of quantity made out by its own engineer. That is for its own information. The contractors have to get the information, and take the risk. As the hon. member (Mr. Best) has asked the question, our schedule prices and amounts taken out are paid for according to the quantities really found there in cuts, and in many cases these have exceeded the estimates of the engineer, not as to quantity, but on the basis of classification.

Mr. J. HAGGART. What is the difference between giving the quantities, and giving the profile, if, from so much excavation of earth, so much lose rock, and so much solid rock given on the profile——

Mr. LENNOX. The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) shakes his head.

Mr. CARVELL. As the hon. member refers to me, I may say that it is not so. The commission never gave such information to any contractor. That is not among the papers.

Mr. J. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman, then, differs from the minister, who says that the profile is given to the contractor, and on it is marked the classification.

Mr. GRAHAM. Perhaps the hon. gentleman (Mr. J. Haggart) misunderstood me. The difference between us is only of a word. I said that on the profile the word 'probably' is the word used. That is done intentionally.

An hon. MEMBER. Probably what?

Mr. GRAHAM. For instance: 'Probably loose rock'.

Mr. J. HAGGART. That is how the government gets out in this matter. For, if they marked it specifically, they would be bound by the quantity.

Mr. GRAHAM. Certainly.

Mr. J. HAGGART. And, when the contract is made, the government carefully guard themselves against guaranteeing the quantities shown in the profile, or anything else. It is on the probable quantities that the estimate of the contractor is made.

Mr. EMMERSON. It is not even the probable quantity. It only appears: 'Probably loose rock', 'probably earth', and so on.

Mr. J. HAGGART. I did not say, nor had I in mind, the quantities. The quantities are never marked on the profile. But the sections are marked, 'probably rock,' 'probably loose rock', and so on. Is it not just as easy for the contractor as for the engineer of the department to estimate the quantity of loose rock, rock and earth excavation?

Mr. GRAHAM. They take the risk.

Mr. J. HAGGART. They take the risk for this reason—there is a condition imposed in the contract that the government is not responsible for the quantity set forth in the profile or otherwise. That risk the contractor has to take. But the quantities, for all practical purposes, are marked on the profile. The contractor, before he tenders, knows it. The hon. minister says that most of them go over the work. What an absurdity! Nine-tenths of the contractors before undertaking a railway contract never see the work. They find out what the character of the excavation is—earth, clay, hard pan, loose rock or rock; they rely on the profile for their estimate and they make their tender accordingly. I have never seen anything like the exposition here to-night. The hon. minister says—and said in his previous speech: What difference does it make to the country if the country receives value? What we contend is that, either those who originally surveyed and laid out and classified this work were totally incompetent—for which the government is responsible—or there has been fraud in the payment of contracts up to this time. That is what we are trying to unearth, and that is what we have a right to find out. When the government found that the quantities were being largely exceeded, they should have taken action to find out the reason, and of that action we should be informed. No information of this kind has been given to the House. Quantities so greatly in excess of the estimates should have alarmed the government, and they should have stopped the work and made an inquiry as to the competency of the engineers, and they should have been able to give to the House better reasons than they do at present for this large excess in the quantities. This enterprise was initiated by the government and the House was advised by the ministers about what the cost would be. But when they found that cost being nearly doubled, they should have had sufficient reasons to give this House for that increase. However, we are not furnished with a single bit of information in regard to the matter.

Mr. LENNOX. The minister has not been as definite as I could have wished, in reference to the question of survey, as to what was done. But I dare say he has been as definite as his own information enabled him to be. I am sorry he has not ascertained just what was done in order to learn the condition of things before contracts were let. We do not require much information to realize that, if tenders are going to be properly awarded, the department, before it accepts tenders, must have a reasonably accurate estimate of the quantities of material involved in the work. If they do not do this, then what is called the moneying out is not properly based and the profession that they have ascertained which is the lower tender is absolutely false. Either the government did their duty and employed competent engineers who made regular and sufficient surveys, had the ordinary test pits sunk, the ordinary borings made, and the ordinary work of all kinds done to ascertain within reasonable limits the actual quantities of the various materials to be moved and of the various materials to enter into the construction of the work,—either that, or else the government failed in its duty, misled the country and went on with this work without having collected the proper information before proceeding. Though the minister says he had competent engineers from end to end of the 1,800 miles, yet I would still be prepared to find discrepancies in the classification. I would be prepared to find that in some cases they had over-estimated the expensive materials, and in other cases, over-estimated the cheaper materials; but I would not be prepared to find that on one continuous system for 1,804 miles the same thing would occur, that is, that solid rock increased and loose rock increased, multiplied in many cases four or five times, and that in every case without variation, common excavation decreased. But that is what we have in this case. The statement the minister gave this afternoon shows that in every case where any considerable quantity of work has been done, the solid rock has enormously increased, the loose rock has enormously increased, and common excavation has decreased. There are three or four cases where it is different. For instance, on contract No. 7, the estimated quantity of solid rock was 633,000 cubic yards, the actual quantity returned is 533,000; but in this case there is only 46 per cent of the work done. In some other cases it is the same way. For instance, in contract No. 12, the estimated quantity of solid rock was 990,000 cubic yards, the amount returned is only 188,000. Of loose rock the estimate was 633,000 cubic yards, and only 130,000 were returned, but in that case only 8·8 per cent of the work has been done. So it is all down the list. For instance, in contract No. 14, the quantity of solid rock is still below the estimated quantity, but in that case, loose rock has got up from 210,000 cubic yards to 707,000 cubic yards, and only 28 per cent of the work has been done. Now, this is the position, that from end to end of that 1,800 miles there is one invariable system, namely, that the loose rock and solid have grown enormously, while common excavation has slipped out of sight. We can understand an occasional error. It is said by competent engineers that we should allow perhaps 10 per cent for error as regards variations in classification. But you should have the total quantities correct, and there is no competent engineer who will say that you can have these enormous discrepancies and account for them on the double basis of competent engineering in the first place, and competent and honest classification in the second place. Now look at some other of these figures. Take the first two contracts. There it is said there is no solid rock at all, that there is only a small quantity, in the one case 130,000 cubic yards, and in the other case less than 60,000 cubic yards of loose rock. That makes, in the two contracts, a total of 58 miles. What does that indicate? It indicates an agricultural region, there is practically no stone at all. Yet when we come to figure that out, we have loose rock growing from 130,000 cubic yards to 938,000 cubic yards. Then take contract No. 8, a startling case. Here we had an estimated quantity of 918,000 cubic yards of solid rock, that has grown so far as returned into 1,365,625 cubic yards. We had an estimate of 395,000 cubic yards of loose rock, that has grown into 1,382,000 cubic yards. Of common excavation, we had an estimate of 3,091,000 cubic yards, and that has shrunk to 869,000, and we have only 67 per cent of the work done. Now take No. 10. There was an estimate of 776,000 cubic yards of solid rock by competent engineers, and that grows into 2,849,000 cubic yards, and there is only 87 per cent of the work yet done. We had an estimate of 278,000 cubic yards of loose rock, and that has grown into almost a million and a half, and only 87 per cent of the work is done. I have taken some of these other contracts, because they were not dealt with in the complaints of Mr. Woods. Take the last contract, the McArthur contract. There was an estimate by the engineers of 3,696,000 cubic yards of solid rock, it has grown into 6,415,869 cubic yards. There was an estimate of 733,000 cubic yards of loose rock, that has grown into 2,056,000 cubic yards. We had an estimate of 11,000,000 cubic yards of common excavation and that has dwindled away to 2,215,000 cubic yards, and there is only 93 per cent of the work done.

These are startling figures to everybody except that commission who are fighting us to-day, and the government which is backing them, and I am going to appeal to the minister, because he is not yet into it up to the shoulders as some of them are; I am going to appeal to him now and ask him what he is going to do about it? There is no use paltering about this question, there is no use in delaying. The minister has referred this evening to the fact that we have a board of expert engineers at work trying to find out how this is. How much work have they done? Practically none. There is not a syllable for the people, for the government, for the members of this House from that Board of Arbitrators yet. My hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell) was a member of the Hodgins' Committee, and two and a half years ago he and other members of the committee on the government side fought us to prevent us from going on with the Hodgins inquiry, as we were ordered to go on by this House, and as we were ordered by the motion made by the first minister, to go on with that inquiry on all the charges contained in the various papers referred to us. They fought us and by force of numbers prevented us from going on with that inquiry. And why? Because these arbitrators were at work and it would interfere with their work, and we would have a report at once which would be satisfactory and conclusive on all these matters. Two and a half years have gone by and we are not a step closer to a determination of this question, as far as anything practical is concerned. I appeal to the minister and I say on my responsibility as a member of the House, that instead of that commission endeavouring to find out on behalf of the people what is wrong, the action of that commission from first to last, in connection with the appointment of this board, has been consistently and persistently to prevent an inquiry in this matter. In the return which has been brought down on the motion of the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) every page where there is a line written by the commission is a page and a line showing a desire to prevent a full and thorough investigation of this matter. That is the action of that commission, and I say to the minister he is the one more than all others who is responsible, and that if he wants to keep his reputation up, to do justice by the people, to see that this railway does not become a perfect scandal from one end of this country to the other, and before all countries, he should take this matter in hand and take some measures by which the people will be protected and this system will not be continued. I believe every word I say in this matter. I have given a good deal of time to it and I intend to give a good deal more to it if necessary, but I do say that this is becoming one of the most iniquitous works ever carried on on this continent—and some years ago they had some pretty bad ones to the south of us. The minister has not as yet become so deeply immersed in it as some others, but I say to him that he should look at the action of this commission critically and impartially, and if he can believe that this commission is acting in the interests of the public then he should go on; but I have read the records in connection with this investigation, by these arbitrators, these experts, and I can come to no other conclusion, nor can any one who reads the evidence, than that systematically, persistently, and determinedly, the members of this commission—the chairman, perhaps, more persistently than any others—have endeavoured to block this inquiry and to confine it within the narrowest possible limits. I have talked warmly on this, let me come down to calm pleading with the minister. It is up to the minister, it is essentially his duty not to allow this matter to run on any longer, but to take some active, definite action to protect the rights of the people as regards the expenditure of money on the Transcontinental railway.

Mr. GRAHAM. I shall not take up the time of the House following up my hon. friend, and I hope he will not think it discourteous on my part. He said what he said before in discussing this matter and what I would say in reply would be what I said before.

Mr. LENNOX. When did I say it?

Mr. GRAHAM. The hon. member spoke with a good deal of heat some weeks ago and I answered at some length. The situation in short is this: When this Act was being passed, the House unanimously decided on the method by which any differences as to classification would be adjusted and settled for. It was understood, of course, that in all works there would be differences of opinion, or you may call it something else if you like, that there would be differences in the classification as between the commission's engineers and the engineers of the Grand Trunk Pacific who had to take over the work. Parliament understood that would occur, and, without one dissenting voice, appointed a board to settle all these differences, a board of experts, not like my hon. friend or myself who has to take other peoples' word absolutely for it. They named a method by which a tribunal would be appointed.

Mr. BARKER. Meantime you want to spend $20,000,000 more?

Mr. GRAHAM. As a matter of fact there was a great deal of difficulty and a good deal of cross-firing in getting the board finally appointed. Some work has been done but a report has not been made. As soon, however, as the snow is gone this spring this board, fully equipped with authority will go out and do this work, all precautions will be taken. My hon. friend will agree with me that he would not be a good man to judge of this?

Mr. LENNOX. A good man to judge of your commission?

Mr. GRAHAM. Not a good man to judge impartially, he gets too enthusiastic, as I do myself sometimes, in trying to convince people that mine is the only view and that there is no other view that possibly could be right. But the parliament of Canada, including my hon. friend, mapped out the way in which these things should be settled and that is the way they are being settled and will be settled, I hope, to the satisfaction of the country and even of my hon. friend.

Mr. CROCKET. Are payments being made to the contractors on certificates furnished by these engineers who have made the over-classification, who have been objected to?

Mr. GRAHAM. My hon. friend asserts that there has been over-classification. Progress estimates are paid to the contractors on the certificate of the engineers.

Mr. CROCKET. The same engineers who have been objected to?

Mr. GRAHAM. My hon. friend starts out, of course, with the idea that the engineers are guilty.

Mr. CROCKET. The classification has been objected to by the Transcontinental engineers and by the chief engineer of the commission.

Mr. GRAHAM. My hon. friend will understand that engineers are not discharged because some person objects to their classification.

Mr. CROCKET. Is the government continuing to make payment on certificates furnished by these same engineers just as before?

Mr. GRAHAM. Progress estimates are paid to the contractors on the certificates of engineers approved by the chief engineer, and subject to revision.

Mr. BARKER. Are they the same engineers?

Mr. GRAHAM. Some are, and perhaps all. The amount of security held back from each one of these contractors is as follows: On 'A,' $1,133,583.81; on 'B,' $1,701,308.91; on 'C,' $12,942.90; on 'D,' $656,668.07; on 'E,' $193,914; on 'F,' $1,218,143.85, or in round numbers $4,915,742.69.

Mr. J. HAGGART. What form of security?

Mr. GRAHAM. Cash security.

Mr. J. HAGGART. Is not the most of it the 10 per cent retained by the government on the progress estimates?

Mr. GRAHAM. Most of it is. Of course as the work goes on these amounts increase rather than decrease.

Mr. J. HAGGART. I want to know the amount paid out to the contractors, and what the amount of the contract would be on the original estimate?

Mr. GRAHAM. We will take No. 1 as a sample. The chief engineer's estimate on No. 1 was $1,017,051.43; the estimate on the basis of the lowest tender $989,895.96; gross amount of progress estimate to December 31, 1909, $1,664,410.07; less the draw back of 10 per cent.

Mr. J. HAGGART. The original contract was let for $900,000, and the lowest tender taken on the estimated quantities. Your engineer's estimate was $1,000,000, but you have already paid to the contractors $1,600,000. You say that in the revision of the contract it may be corrected, and that it may possibly be not in excess of the original tender. Where is your money to guarantee that?

Mr. GRAHAM. I am frank to confess that I do not think it will ever be reduced on the original estimate.

Mr. BARKER. How much have you held back on that contract now?

Mr. GRAHAM. $166,440.

Mr. BARKER. And when you have pocketed that you are over half a million dollars short.

Mr. GRAHAM. I have not pocketed anything that I ever heard of.

Mr. BARKER. I am speaking of the government, and not you. You have already paid over half a million dollars in advance of your estimate.

Mr. GRAHAM. On that contract there are no objections to the classification.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. On contract No. 1 for example, is the engineer who was responsible for the estimate in the first instance the same engineer who is responsible for the classification in the final payment?

Mr. GRAHAM. No, Mr. Dunn is now with the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. In how many cases and on what contracts is the engineer who made the original estimate of classification the same engineer, who has certified the classification which seems to have been adopted? If that information is not at hand it would be better to produce a statement later.

Mr. GRAHAM. I will take the district engineer, he is responsible for the whole district.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I do not know who is responsible, but the minister will understand exactly what I want. I want to know in respect to every mile from Moncton to Winnipeg, in what cases the same man is responsible for the original estimate, and for the final result which is so absolutely different from it.

Mr. GRAHAM. I will get that for my hon. friend.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. There are some other things I would like to know. I do not know whether this information will be available to-night, but I want to get it some time—I want to know exactly the character of the investigation that is made upon which these estimates of classification were founded; I want to know at what distances these pits were sunk where there was need of sinking pits; I want to know at what distances borings were made; I want full and complete information as to the character of the investigation which was made before this estimate was handed into the government. Then I want to know something more about the engineers. I want to know what steps the commission have taken up to date in the way of seeking information from the engineers who made this original estimate which has been so absolutely falsified in the result. I want that information in respect to every mile of the line from Moncton to Winnipeg. I think the minister will agree, in view of the remarkable situation that has developed that I am not asking any too much.

To put this matter in plain terms, unless there has been the most extraordinary and inconceivable incapacity and negligence in the first instance, then there has been perpetrated on the public treasury of this country one of the most gigantic steals ever heard of. This dilemma the government must face in connection with this matter: the one or the other of these two things must be true.

The minister, then, will be good enough to give us this further information with regard to contract No. 1, contract No. 2, or whichever one first developed this situation. When it became apparent to the commissioners, who, I assume, were attending to their business, either that the estimates presented to the government in the first instance were absolutely worthless, or else that some one was getting money from the government to which he was not entitled, what explanations did the commissioners ask, what investigation did they make, what steps did they take to get to the bottom of this matter? I am not disposed to blame the minister too much, except that I do not think that he has been prompt and vigilant in demanding an explanation from the commission. He has the duties of a great department to attend to outside of this. But these men were there, paid by the people of this country to look carefully into matters of this character, and I would like very much to know, when this situation first developed, what steps they took about it. I have heard some very curious statements made on the authority of reputable men as to what the action, not of all, but of some of the commissioners, was in that regard; and if I should repeat the statements here, which I do not propose to do to-night, or until I verify them a little further, I think every hon. gentleman in this House would be startled by them. But whether these statements, which have been rather free of late, be true or not, certainly this House is entitled to the fullest possible information as to what was the action of the commissioners in this connection—whether they conceived it to be their duty at all to investigate the astonishing condition of affairs which has been disclosed by the information afforded to this committee by the minister. I would like to know further what is the rate for solid rock, the rate for loose rock and the rate for common excavation on every one of these contracts, in respect to every mile of the line from Moncton to Winnipeg.

Mr. GRAHAM. I can give that now. I will give it by the numbers of the contracts, starting at Moncton and going west:

Contract.	Solid rock.	Loose rock.	Common excavation.
No. 1...	$1 50	$0 55	$0 25

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Now, would the minister be good enough to have a statement prepared, showing the cost of the entire line from Moncton to Winnipeg, based upon the estimates of classification which were made in the first instance, for the purpose of comparison with the estimates which have been certified by the engineers in respect of the work done up to the present time?

Mr. GRAHAM. I could give my hon. friend now the estimated cost, and then I could give him exactly what has been paid up to date on each one of these contracts.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The estimated cost of course, is for the whole?

Mr. GRAHAM. The estimated cost of solid rock, loose rock, and common excavation Does my hon. friend want it for the whole?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Yes. you have not got it by contracts I suppose? Has my hon. friend got it distributed by the several contracts, or in one lump sum?

Mr. GRAHAM. I have the different contracts:

(E) The Engineer's estimated quantity of Solid Rock, Loose Rock and Common Excavation in the section of line covered by each contract, and the estimated cost under these headings, based upon the rates of accepted tender, are as follows:—

Contract.	Solid Rock.		Loose Rock.		Common Excavation.

Mr. BARKER. Do those figures show the actual cost, including the work yet to be done?

Mr. GRAHAM. No.

Mr. BARKER. It is no use unless we get that. We want to know what the whole cost will be, and the system you are going on.

Mr. GRAHAM. I have been giving the estimated quantities, and the estimated cost.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Of the work up to date?

Mr. GRAHAM. The original estimates. I am prepared to give the cost up to date.

Mr. J. HAGGART. Could you not add the estimated cost to finish it?

Mr. GRAHAM. I can give my hon. friend the amount estimated to finish each contract.

Mr. J. HAGGART. That will do.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Before the minister goes into that, may I ask whether this statement he has just read covers the entire work of excavation from Moncton to Winnipeg?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes, twenty-one contracts.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. This statement is headed, 'The engineer's estimated quantity of solid rock, loose rock and common excavation in the section of line covered by each contract, and the estimated cost under these headings, based upon the rates of accepted tender.' As I understand, that is not restricted to the work done up to the present time; it is an estimate in respect of all the work from Moncton to Winnipeg under these items.

Mr. GRAHAM. The estimate for the three classifications, solid rock, loose rock and common excavation made at the time the contracts were made.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. We know what has been paid up to the present time in respect of the work done under these contracts. That has been given, I understand?

Mr. GRAHAM. No, I have that in the next statement. I was going to give the amount paid on each of these contracts under each heading.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Does the minister distinguish the amount paid from the amount covered by the progress estimate, because there is a certain reduction?

Mr. GRAHAM. I am going to give the amount actually paid to the contractors.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. And we can add one-ninth to that to get the amount of the progress estimate.

Mr. GRAHAM. I will give both the amount of the progress estimate and the amount paid to the contractor. The statement is as follows:

The actual expenditure under the headings of Solid Rock, Loose Rock and Common Excavation, as shown by progress estimates (December 31, 1909) and the amounts actually paid are as follows:—

Contract No.	—	Solid Rock.	Loose Rock.	Common Excavation.
		$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.
1	Progress estimate	63,328 50	516,300 40	130,182 00
	Actually paid	56,995 65	464,670 36	117,163 80
2	Progress estimate	65,334 00	43,864 00	10,015 95

The next sheet I have here would give the amount, not for these quantities, but the amount to complete the entire contract.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Could we get at it by a system of percentage?

Mr. GRAHAM. The note given me here is that 'the classifications have been found to be considerably different from the original estimates.' That seems to be quite agreed upon.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. There seems to be no fault to find with that.

Mr. GRAHAM. As a matter of fact, the estimate of the work to be done under these headings cannot be given until the proper borings are made and other investigations held as to the line now being built.

Mr. J. HAGGART. How could the minister get at the percentages for work done if he does not know the work to be done?

Mr. GRAHAM. It was taken on a mileage basis, I understand.

Mr. J. HAGGART. But the minister gave a percentage on the basis of quantity, stating that in a certain contract 8 per cent remained to be done, on another 95 per cent of the work had been done, and so on. If he does not know the amounts to be done, how could he get the percentage?

Mr. GRAHAM. It is taken approximately on a mileage basis—the number of miles of track laid, the grading done, the bridges to be built, and so on.

Mr. J. HAGGART. Couldn't you give an approximation of the amount required to finish?

Mr. GRAHAM. I can give the amount required to complete each contract.

Mr. LENNOX. Last year I moved for returns asking for the original estimates of quantities of each class of material throughout the whole 103 items that enter into the construction of the railway. I asked that the engineers' estimated quantity should be set out, with the cost according to the actual accepted tender; also that I should be furnished with the quantity of work done, or the quantity of material supplied, under each of these headings, and the cost; also, the estimated amount of work of each class yet to be done, for instance, the estimated quantity of common excavation, of solid rock and of loose rock under each contract, and the cost thereof throughout the various items. The return was brought down, and in a great majority of the contracts all that information was furnished. We then had a discussion in the House, and I ventured to point out the effect of it. Now, what I am dissatisfied about is this, that I have asked for other information of the same class on other contracts that were not completed at that time—that was only brought down to December, 1908—I have asked for subsequent estimates as to the other contracts where the information had not been furnished, and the answer in every case was that no estimate had been made. I do not understand, if the department is treating me fairly, how they were able to give information as regards so many contracts before the discussion took place, and that since the discussion they have not been able to give any. Has not the department estimates, as a matter of fact, made subsequently to the contract being let, as to the balance yet to be done in every case? If they have, I think it ought to be furnished to the House. On the first return, in the majority of the contracts, the information I asked of that character was furnished, that is, they gave me not only the quantity that had been taken out, but the estimated quantity of each class that was yet to be taken out; the actual quantity of material such as lumber that had been furnished, the estimated quantity yet to be furnished, the amount of clearing that had been done, and the amount yet to be done; the amount of grubbing that had been done, and the amount yet to be done. In probably 75 per cent of the contracts that information was brought down to December, 1908. At this late date, more than a year afterwards, I ask for estimates regarding the other contracts, and they say there has never been any subsequent estimate made. I would like the minister to inquire into that and see if it is correct.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. It does seem singular that estimates should have been made in respect of those asked for up to a particular date, and none made in respect to those asked for subsequent to that date.

Mr. GRAHAM. I do not know what the explanation is, but no doubt there will be one. My hon. friend has had, in the returns brought down to him, all the information I have been given to-night. I think he has had all this for some time.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I wish to call attention to another matter. I do not know anything about this of my own information, it is information that has come to another member of the House, and as I understand it, it amounts to this: On division 6, station 2670 x 25, presidency 23—I am not mentioning the name of the engineer—there have been two estimates given, one to what is called the station gang and another to the contractors, I do not know whether they are the original contractors. But, at all events, the so-called station gang, I understand, are sub-contractors, of other contractors, D. W. Murray & Sons. The information I have is this, and I want to ask the minister as to its accuracy. The station gang are said to have received one estimate as follows:

815 cubic yards loose rock at 45c..	$ 366 75
1,490 cubic yards loose rock, under water, $1.25..	1,862 50
483 cubic yards solid rock at $1.25..	603 75
	$2,833 00

The other contractors obtained an estimate, which is said to have gone in and to form part of the estimates of that portion of the line, to the following effect:

210 cubic yards loose rock, under water, $1.25..	$ 262 50
553 cubic yards solid rock at $1.25..	691 25
940⁶ cubic yards loose rock at 45c..	423 27
1,709³ cubic yards excavation within coffers, $2.25..	3,845 92
	$5,222 94

The letter which accompanies it intimates that these two estimates were given in respect to the same work; one was given to what was called the station gang, and the other was given to the contractors. I do not understand it, it may be capable of explanation, but I think it requires explanation, because there is a difference of about $2,400 between the two estimates. If the minister would be good enough to obtain the necessary information with regard to that, I would be glad to have it.

Mr. GRAHAM. That will have to be investigated, of course, to see what is in it. We will have to instruct the commission to look up the 'Hansard' in the morning and explain it.

Mr. LENNOX. The minister said he could not give the estimates of the amount under the various headings to complete. But I understood he could give the estimates of the total amount required to complete under each contract. I think that would be useful to us. He might put it on the 'Hansard' where we can see it.

Mr. GRAHAM. I will submit the following table:

Contract No.	Amount required to complete.
1	$ 101,189 93
2	200,596 18
3	142,681 32
4	784,893 87
5	835,219 79
6	291,794 07
7	1,736,969 54
8	2,349,383 11
9	641,096 33
10	1,140,687 92
11	1,437,142 91
12	4,193,584 50
13	3,815,279 10
14	3,687,360 72
15	2,502,365 96
16	3,308,048 25
17	2,019,908 25
18	1,121,977 45
19	4,535,603 23
20	180,285 74
21	923,890 26

The above amounts stated as being required to complete are approximate, and are taken from monthly percentage reports of work done, received from district engineers, and are subject to revision; no special estimates having been made for the purpose.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I would like the exact date at which these discrepancies, to which I have referred, first began to manifest themselves. The minister will see that this is important in connection with a question which I also asked, as to what action the commission have at any time taken with regard to it.

Mr. LENNOX. Can the minister tell us what has actually been done by the three engineers who have been appointed recently under the provisions of section 7 of the contract?

Mr. GRAHAM. It is difficult off-hand to say definitely. The Board of Arbitrators began work and certain reductions have been agreed to between the chief engineer of the commission and the chief engineer of the Grand Trunk Pacific. Under the contract if they agree the third arbitrator is not called in.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN.

Mr. LENNOX. Is the minister referring to the McDougal contract?

Mr. GRAHAM. The McArthur contract is one.

Mr. LENNOX. I see some matters have been adjusted with reference to the McDougal contract.

Mr. GRAHAM. That was done by our engineer without reference to the arbitrators. Certain deductions were made by the chief engineer, and under the contract his finding is final.

Mr. LENNOX. Certain matters have been adjusted on the McDougal contract independently of the Arbitration Board. Has anything been adjusted by the arbitrators?

Mr. GRAHAM. I am informed about 70 per cent of the differences in reference to what is called over-break, on the McDougal Bros'. contract, have been settled.

Mr. LENNOX. Has that been reported to the commissioners or the government?

Mr. GRAHAM. They have made no report, they have just started their work, and the chief engineer has made some reductions himself. There are some differences yet before the Board of Arbitrators. They have made some progress and some adjustments have been made between the chief engineers without the third arbitrator. They were acting as members of the board under the Act.

Mr. LENNOX. The Minister could give the information as to the reductions by the chief engineer of the commission.

Mr. GRAHAM. We can get that information; I think I gave a good deal of it in my remarks in the House, although there may be one adjustment since then.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. How much excavation remains to be done on the line between Winnipeg and Lake Superior junction?

Mr. GRAHAM. On the line from Springfield, that is the shops east of St. Boniface, there is no excavation to be done, the grading is done; but on the entrance into Winnipeg there will be some grading.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I notice a reference to three per cent or five per cent of excavation still to be performed on contract 21. I suppose that relates to the locality to which the minister alludes? Is that line being operated?

Mr. GRAHAM. The line from Winnipeg to Superior Junction is in such a position that it could be operated to a certain extent by the contractors. They have offered it to the Grand Trunk Pacific to operate a certain number of trains each week, but the Grand Trunk Pacific does not care to make the arrangement and it is not being operated except as the contractors use it themselves. I am assured by the engineers that trains can be run over the road at a moderate rate with a fair load.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What will be the cost of completing that line from Winnipeg to Lake Superior junction?

Mr. GRAHAM. The amount required to complete McArthur's contract is $923,890.26.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. They have the entire contract from Winnipeg to Lake Superior junction?

Mr. GRAHAM. They have the contract to the east bank of the Red river.

Mr. LENNOX. How far is Lake Superior junction from Winnipeg?

Mr. GRAHAM. 245 miles. I have a note from the engineer on 21.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Then we are to accept the amount as $963,000?

Mr. GRAHAM. The approximate amount is practically $1,000,000.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Is there a bridge over the Red river?

Mr. GRAHAM. That does not include the bridge.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Is the bridge completed?

Mr. GRAHAM. The sub-structure is completed, but not the superstructure. There is a question as to the entrance into St. Boniface, and I have heard the parties interested once or twice, and on account of the level crossings and the crossings of the Canadian Pacific railway there, it is possible we will have to make an overhead entrance through St. Boniface, which will increase the cost.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. When is it expected that the work comprised in that contract of the MacArthurs will be taken over?

Mr. GRAHAM. The chief engineer has reported that the line already constructed —it will hardly include the northern entrance into St. Boniface—will be in condition to take over in time for the handling of next year's crop, probably early in the autumn.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. How does the minister account for this extraordinary statement contained in the speech from the Throne:

> The eastern division is now ready for traffic from Winnipeg to Lake Superior Junction.

Mr. GRAHAM. It was ready for traffic as I have outlined, and traffic could have been carried over that line for the entire season by the contractors had the Grand Trunk Pacific desired to make such an arrangement with them. It could be carried by the Canadian Northern bridge over the Red river, connecting with that Dundee branch and running through. The Grand Trunk Pacific, as I understand it, did not care to make that arrangement with the contractors, but traffic could have been carried as contractors do carry on transportation along many lines before they hand their work over as complete.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The statement of the minister is very different from the statement in the speech from the Throne. The speech from the Throne does not say there is still $1,000,000 to be expended upon it, and that by using the Canadian Northern bridge some trains could be run over it had the Grand Trunk accepted the offer of the contractors. The speech from the Throne is much more direct:

> The eastern division is now open for traffic from Winnipeg to Lake Superior Junction.

Why is it that so absolutely a misleading statement—not to use any harsher term—was placed in the mouth of His Excellency by the government?

Mr. GRAHAM. I think my hon. friend from Marquette would say that the prairie section was open for traffic, although it is being run under the construction company yet. But, it is open for traffic and running through to Wolf creek.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. But this does not even fulfil that condition. I am not concerned with what my hon. friend from Marquette would say, but I am concerned with what His Excellency the Governor General has said, and in this connection the government made him say something that is absolutely untrue. I am inclined to think that His Excellency would be perfectly justified in dismissing all his ministers.

Mr. GRAHAM. He would make a mistake.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I do not think he would make any mistake. This section never was open for traffic, and could not have been open for traffic until the government took it over and leased it to the Grand Trunk Pacific. It never has been operated by the contractors; they offered to operate it, but the offer has not been accepted.

Mr. GRAHAM. It was open for traffic, and the traffic did not come.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. If the Minister of Railways considers that a fair interpretation of the language of His Excellency, I will not argue any more with him. He knows perfectly well that the people of the country who read the speech from the Throne understood that the line was open for traffic in the ordinary course, and in that sense such a statement was absolutely and wholly mendacious and the Governor General has been led into a very unfortunate position. No fault is to be attributed to His Excellency, because I suppose he is obliged to place confidence in the representations of his ministers in matters of this kind. But why the trouble was taken to put these words into the mouth of His Excellency, when it must have been perfectly apparent that the truth would be discovered within a very short time, is more than I can understand.

Mr. LENNOX. When this matter comes up again, I want the minister to give us all the items of expenditure that are not included within these contracts, so that we can add the amount of the contracts together, and these other items, and see what the expenditure, so far as estimated to the present, has been on that 1,800 miles.

Mr. GRAHAM. I think I can give my hon. friend to-night all the information that he can imagine, and his imagination has been working pretty hard. I beg to give him the following information on that point:

Statement of expenditure from September, 1904, to 31st December, 1909.

Mr. LENNOX. It is well to have that statement, but that is not exactly what I wanted to know. I want to get from the minister a statement of the estimated expenditure outside of the contracts, necessary to complete the whole work; for instance, the cost of the Quebec bridge, and the terminals, and everything not embraced in the contracts.

Mr. GRAHAM. I gave the estimated cost of the Quebec bridge several weeks ago. Outside of the information I have given here. I am not clear as to what my hon. friend wants. The contracts include everything along the line except the steel rails and fastenings, and the steel bridges, and I have given all these.

Mr. LENNOX. As far as they have been constructed; but the government has an estimate of what the various items not embraced in the contracts will come to.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What is wanted, in short, seems to be this. We have a statement of what the contractors have already received, and an estimate of what they will receive. Outside of that, some other things are necessary to complete the road, and to put it in running order before it can be handed over to the Grand Trunk Pacific Company. What is their estimated cost, outside of the contracts?

Mr. GRAHAM. It may be a little difficult to get that information very promptly. For instance, take the Quebec terminals—my hon. friend knows that it is not decided yet where they are to be, and it is impossible to say what they will cost.

Mr. LENNOX. Give us as much as you can, and tell us what you are leaving out.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Of course, it would be idle to ask for an estimate of what is not definitely decided on; but, apart from that, the minister might give us an estimate, mentioning what is not included, but what must necessarily be provided. I would like the minister also to let us know when we meet again whether there is any change in his estimate of the cost of the Western Division.

Mr. GRAHAM. The Prairie Section is practically finished at the figures already given, and there is no change in the estimate of the cost of the Mountain Section given to me by Mr. Schreiber.

Progress reported.

Mr. FIELDING moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What business on Monday?

Mr. FIELDING. Some Bills on the Order Paper, and then Supply, Public Works.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, March 14, 1910.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

MESSAGE FROM THE GOVERNOR GENERAL—SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING delivered a message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the message as follows:

GREY:

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons further supplementary estimates of sums required for the service of the Dominion for the year ending on the 31st March, 1910, and in accordance with the provisions of the British North America Act, 1867. The Governor General recommends these estimates to the House of Commons.

Government House,
Ottawa, 14th March, 1910.

Mr. FIELDING moved that His Excellency's message, together with the estimates, be referred to the Committee of Supply.

Motion was agreed to.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 154) respecting the Northern Empire Railway Company.—Mr. W. H. White.

Bill (No. 162) for the relief of Alexander Augustus Barthelmes.—Mr. W. M. Martin.

Bill (No. 160) respecting the Brockville, Ottawa and St. Lawrence Railway Company.—Mr. W. M. Martin.

NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY—CLASSIFICATION OF MATERIAL.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I would like to inquire of the Prime Minister whether or not any investigation has been made into the matter I mentioned on Friday. I brought to the attention of the right hon. gentleman, and the chairman of the committee a certain error in the report of the committee, and should like to know what has been done with the matter.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I found that Mr. Geoffrion had left for Montreal on Friday immediately after my hon. friend brought the matter up. I expect him during the day, and will call his attention to it.

TARIFF NEGOTIATIONS WITH THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I would like to inquire whether there have been any negotiations with the members of the tariff commission of the United States, and whether the government proposes to make any statement regarding the position of the matter.

Mr. FIELDING. There have been negotiations between members of the cabinet, and the gentlemen delegated to come to Ottawa by the President of the United States, but these negotiations were necessarily confidential, and I do not think they have advanced to a point which would justify my making any statement. No doubt at a later stage the importance of this matter will demand some explanation.

Mr. SPROULE. How is it we have explanations given to the world from Washington, and published in the press?

Mr. FIELDING. Both in the United States and Canada we have a very enterprising and sometimes very imaginative press.

SAULT STE. MARIE DRY-DOCKS.

Mr. BOYCE. I would like to ask the Minister of Public Works whether the application for a subsidy to the Sault Ste. Marie dry-docks has been passed upon yet?

Mr. PUGSLEY. It has not.

ADJUDICATION OF CLAIMS TREATY.

Mr. BOYCE. Can the right hon. gentleman give the information I asked the other day with regard to the ratification of a convention, or treaty with the United States?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. It has not been ratified.

TRADE REPRESENTATIVES TO GERMANY.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Has the government appointed trade representatives to Germany, or does it intend doing so?

Mr. FIELDING. No recent appointments have been made. My recollection is that we have no representative in Germany. The matter will no doubt engage the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, under whose department that branch of the service falls.

MILITARY REVIEW AT PETAWAWA.

Mr. GERALD V. WHITE. On the 24th February last I brought to the attention of the House an article which appeared in the Ottawa 'Journal' of February 23, regarding the military review at Petawawa under Sir John French. I am glad to see the Minister of Militia in his seat to-day, and I would like to ask him if that report is correct. I would also like to draw attention to an article in the 'Journal' of March 8, as follows:

London, March 8.

In the House of Commons to-day it was announced that Sir John French would go to Canada this summer to advise on organization of militia forces.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. I am not aware that there is to be any such assemblage of troops at Petawawa during the summer, but there will probably be a larger number there than last year. So far as the visit of Sir John French is concerned, I understand that it is expected he will visit Canada unofficially, or semi-officially, during the present year with the view of seeing as much as he can of the Canadian militia. And I may add that every facility will be afforded him to meet as many officers, and see as much of the militia in camp, and otherwise, as possible, as we are extremely glad to have such a distinguished officer visit this country: and I think it will be in the interests of the militia that we should give him every possible opportunity to see our Candian militia.

PRIVATE BILLS.

NELSON RIVER RAILWAY COMPANY.

House in Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 52) to incorporate the Nelson River Railway Company.—Mr. Rutan.

Mr. BRADBURY. This Bill was under discussion on Friday night, and there seemed to be an understanding that it will be allowed to stand over until other Bills of a similar nature would come before the House. This Bill affects two of the great water-powers at the head of Lake Winnipeg, and is very similar to the International Waterways Bill, and the Rainy River Railway Bill, and I requested that it should stand until the government formulated some policy regarding the disposition of these great water-powers.

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. colleague the Minister of Railways is obliged to be absent to-day, but he desired me to say to the committee that he saw no reason whatever why this Bill should stand over. He called my attention to the fact that it gives no authority whtever to expropriate any water-powers, and gives no control whatever over any water-powers, but simply provides that the moneys of the company may be invested in the acquisition of water-powers, and the development of electricity for the purpose of operating their railways. Section 13, which deals with that subject provides:

In connection with the business and purposes of the undertaking, and subject to provisions of section 247 of the Railway Act, the company may acquire water-powers but not by expropriation.

This is just the same as if the Governor in Council were to incorporate a company by letters patent giving power to develop but no authority whatever to expropriate. There are no compulsory rights, and the only effect of the provision is that it authorizes the company to invest its funds in the development of electric power. The committee will also remember that the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) has already stated the policy of the government regarding water-powers, so that if that be at all material to the consideration of this Bill we have such a declaration. So, if the question were at all material to the consideration of this Bill, we have that declaration of policy on the part of the Minister of the Interior. I think my hon. friend (Mr. Bradbury) is entirely mistaken as to there being any understanding that the Bill is to stand over. Had there been such an understanding, I am sure the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) would have informed me of it, and asked me to inform the committee. On the contrary, he said that he saw no reason why the Bill, as amended and reported by the committee, and now recommended by the committee, should not pass.

Mr. BRADBURY. During the discussion of this Bill a few evenings ago—and, I think, of another Bill—the minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) announced that the government had a well-defined policy with regard to these water-powers. As I understood the Minister of the Interior, he said that the regulations of the government applied to these two water-powers at the head of Lake Winnipeg. But, on looking over the regulations, I find that they apply to water-powers within any of the provinces. But the water-powers affected under these Bills are outside of any province. I take it, therefore, there is no regulation covering them. That is one reason the government should hold this Bill until the regulations are extended so as to cover these water-powers also. I think that on Friday evening last, the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) said very clearly that this Bill was to stand over. I may have misunderstood his attitude. I do not wish to block the Bill or block any Bill; but, this railway charter, as it is called, seeks powers to start from some point at the mouth of the Saskatchewan or at the mouth of the Nelson rivers—points fully 100 miles apart—making it evident that the scheme is immature. The committee never was in possession of proper information to warrant them in passing the Bill, according to my opinion. I took very strong ground in committee on that point. I think it would be a mistake, in advance of the formulation of some policy by the government, to regulate these water-powers outside of the province, to proceed with this Bill. If the regulations gave the Minister of the Interior authority to deal with water-powers outside of the provinces as they do with water-powers inside the provinces, that might remove some of the objections. But I submit that the regulations as they exist do not give that power, and therefore the Bill ought to stand over.

Mr. LENNOX. I have spoken two or three times on this question, and I propose now to let this matter rest with the government. They can take the responsibility of their action. This Bill was up on Tuesday evening, and the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) decided to let it stand over until we had a discussion of another Bill which is coming up in the Railway Committee. It stood until last Friday evening. On that occasion, I called the attention of the Minister of Railways to the fact that the other Bill had not been reached in the meantime, and suggested that it would be advisable not to spend the hour for private Bills in a useless discussion of this Bill. The minister acquiesced in that, and was prepared to let it stand over. Unfortunately, the promoter of the Bill thought it necessary to discuss the Bill and other gentlemen joined in the discussion, and so the hour was wasted. It was distinctly understood that we should delay this Bill until the other Bill to which I have referred had been taken up in the Railway Committee; and I think it was pretty clearly understood that the Minister of Railways or the government would announce some definite general policy as regards dealing with these waterways. It comes up now as a comparatively new question. Until recently, we have had no problems of this kind. But, so anxious are parties who wish to enrich themselves by securing these rights, that, even after Bills were advertised and introduced, attempts were made to amend them so as to give the promoters water-power rights. What I am endeavouring to impress upon the Minister of Railways is that the country should have some return from these franchises belonging to the country, that we should not give them to private parties and allow those parties to have the whole proceeds—preferably, that the province should have the profits, but that either the province or the Dominion should have some revenue from these great water-powers. I have no desire whatever to delay this Bill. I believe it will go through. But I have every desire that the progress of the Bill should be stayed until other Bills of the same nature are brought into the House, and that then we shall have a clear, definite policy from those who are responsible for the management of our national resources. It is a peculiar thing: first I succeed in staying the Rainy River Bill during the absence of the Minister of Railways from the committee. Until this moment, we have had no intimation that the Minister of Railways was disposed to let the present Bill go through until the other Bill to which I have referred was reached. Until this moment, on the contrary, we had as clear an intimation as possible that the minister would acquiesce in the suggestion of delay until the other Bill came before the House, so that we could have one policy applying to all such Bills. That seems a reasonable proposition. Thus, we have this extraordinary position—I think an undesirable position—that the first day the Minister of Railways is absent this matter is to be shoved through. However, it is for the government to say whether they want to have this gone on with or not. If they have decided to push it through, let them do so, so far as I am concerned. I have done what I could to serve the public interest in this matter by having the government come down and declare some policy on which they proposed to protect the public interest in this very important matter. For these waterways are more valuable than coal. This is the propelling power of the future; it is the manufacturing power of the future; and, if the government are prepared to give to these franchises without investigating them and allow railway companies—so-called railway companies—under the guise of building a railway to develop these water-powers, and dispose of the surplus energy, well and good; for the present let it be so. But I venture to think that thoughtful people will not regard it as wise in the public interest. There is no use in us on this side trying to compel the government to do anything. Speaking for myself, I have done all that I could to urge the government to adopt a wise, general policy in regard to this matter.

Mr. CARVELL. I am glad to hear the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lennox) take this high stand, because in the absence of an express declaration to this effect, some hon. members on this side might have had the impression that there was some attempt to delay the progress of this Bill. I take it for granted that hon. members who have discussed this matter on three different occasions have been sincere in their expressions concerning it. They have been discussing it as though the proposition in this Bill was to give this company the right to go on and expropriate water-powers and use them at their own sweet will. My hon. friend from South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) knows better than that. He has been following this measure through the Railway Committee. So does my hon. friend from Selkirk (Mr. Bradbury) who has taken an active part in this discussion in the committee. He must know that as this Bill is amended, and as it is now before this committee, all that this company has is the right to legally hold the water-powers if they can get them. They have not the right of expropriation; they have not the right to acquire these water-powers otherwise than as I might acquire them if I went up there to do business. We are simply creating an entity having the legal right to own those properties, or those rights, if they can get them. It seems to me that is as far removed from the position which my hon. friend has been arguing as the North Pole is from the South Pole. All we are doing, if we allow this Bill to pass, is to create an entity which has a right to hold these water-powers if they can succeed in getting them from the proper authority, whether it be from the federal government or from the province of Manitoba after this land comes into the possession of the province of Manitoba. I do not know whether the time is far distant or near at hand when that will take place. We do know, however, that there will have to be a wonderful change in policy on the part of both governments ever since confederation if, when this territory becomes the property of Manitoba, the Manitoba government will have the right to deal with it. But even if they should get that right, and if there should be that change in policy, then all this company will have a right to do is to go to the province of Manitoba and make a satisfactory trade if they can do so; if they cannot, they get nothing. If these rights do not go to the province of Manitoba, then if they have a right to come to this government and make a satisfactory trade if they can. They are simply placed in the position I would be in, or the hon. member for Simcoe would be in, or anybody else who went out there and bought these properties, if they could do so. Now, it is passing strange that my hon. friends so strongly oppose the passage of this Bill and want a declaration of policy on the part of the government as to what they are going to do in the future when applications are made to them to lease or purchase water-powers, when only two weeks ago these hon. gentlemen had no compunctions of conscience in voting for Bill (No. 118) in which section 12 gave the company the right to operate these water-powers in the province of British Columbia. And perhaps they will say why such a change of sentiment has come over them, evidently, during the last week.

Mr. LENNOX. It is a growing time.

Mr. CARVELL. Yes, it is a growing time on the part of the hon. member for Simcoe, I think, and of some other hon. gentlemen who have grown so rapidly in their ideas of the preservation of natural resources since Bill (No. 118) passed the House. However, that is a matter for them to answer. But, it seems to me this Bill has been discussed pretty thoroughly, and my hon. friends opposite have kept as far away from the real principle of the Bill as they could. I hope that possibly this reminder may awaken them to the true import of the Bill, and that they will devote their attention for a few moments to the Bill itself, and not to some fanciful grievance which they have conjured up in their own mind. I am satisfied if they take that advice they will not see anything wrong in allowing this Bill to pass, and let us proceed to other Bills of as much importance as this.

Mr. J. HAGGART. We understand the nature of the Bill before the House just as well as the hon. gentleman. He says that the power of expropriation is taken away. What good would the power of expropriation in a Bill be against the Crown? What right would you have to expropriate against the Crown even if the power of expropriation was in it?

Mr. CARVELL. I am assuming now that if it goes into the province of Manitoba, then we would have the right to expropriate.

Mr. J. HAGGART. That would have to be granted in the province just the same. Any way, it is in the possession of the Crown, and of the Dominion at the present moment, and no power of expropriation would be worth one cent to the parties that would have it. That is not the contention of my hon. friend. We have no objections to the Bill, we know it only gives to a corporate power the same power as an individual has at present. All we ask is that there should be some declaration of policy by the government in reference to these waterways, the same as there is in every civilized country in the world. In the United States they have regulations by which companies and individuals can obtain possession of them, and, as he says, the same power of expropriation is included in the British Columbia Bill. In British Columbia the sale of water-powers is regulated by statute. All we ask from the Minister of Railways is a simple statement that any individual or corporation may approach the government on equal terms for the purpose of possessing the water-powers, and that, above all things, something which is the heritage of the people of this country shall be retained for them, or shall not be parted with without an equivalent. Now there is no use talking about opposition to the Bill on this side of the House. We are not opposing the Bill. We simply say, if you want your Bill, let the government make a pronouncement in reference to it. It seeks to obtain property which is valuable to the public, in regard to which property there are no regulations nor statutory obligations at all. All we ask from the government is that they will at least make regulations in reference to these waterways so that a moiety of them shall be retained for the people who own them.

Mr. MILLER. The hon. gentleman says that members of the opposition are not opposing the Bill. I would like to know what different course they would find it possible to take if they were opposing the Bill. They have delayed its progress now for at least three times. They say they are not opposing the Bill, but apparently I think they are using it as a cudgel to force the government to lay down a policy as to what they shall do in the way of giving water-powers to persons who may apply therefor. But I would like to know what consistency there is in taking the stand they do in refusing to let this Bill go through until the government declares its policy as to the granting of water-powers, when no member of the House, who has spoken in opposition to this Bill has pointed out a single section or a single word in the Bill that alienates to any extent one single drop of water or the rignt to use water. Until they can do that, I do not see any consistency in their argument.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not think the hon. member's argument is very strong, especially in view of Canadian history. We know how individuals have become possessed of many of these waterways, even from the Crown, without the Crown realizing anything in return. Now if we had a declaration from the government as to what their policy was, if we had regulations by which the public would own what was got out of these water-powers, and upon what terms they would be alienated, then we would understand it, and we could provide against any dangers happening in future, similar to those that have happened in the past.

Now, the hon. gentleman who spoke previously (Mr. Carvell) said they cannot get control of this by expropriation. In what other way could they get control? There are many other ways, but one way is that they may get control of it secretly from the government at a low rental, not to the advantage, but to the disadvantage, of the country. The hon. gentleman made reference to the incorporation of the Burrard Inlet Tunnel and Bridge Company. He says that the members of the opposition are not consistent because they were willing to allow that Bill to pass. The hon. member for North Lanark (Mr. Haggart) gave, to my mind, a very satisfactory answer to that, and that was that the right to get control of water-powers must be according to the law of the province and, therefore, it is plain and open to the world, but to say that there is any comparison between that Bill of the Burrard Inlet Tunnel and Bridge Company and this Bill, is to say what is not justified by the facts. What is the situation there? There are three corporations, they want to have a highway between these corporations, which highway must pass over the water or under it by tunnel, and they have joined, not for the purpose of private speculation by any means, but for the purpose of accommodating these three great cities. It is true that it was put in the name of private individuals, but these individuals were satisfactory to these corporations and were acting for them, and they do not desire to go into this undertaking for the purpose of making personal gain for themselves but for the purpose of accommodating these cities. Therefore, the committee went farther than they would have done had they been dealing with private individuals in giving the rights which they did under this Bill. There is no reasonable comparison between the two Bills. But in reference to this other Bill, I have it before me here, and it says that they are to acquire these rights under section 247 of the Railway Act, but they are not to have the right to expropriate. Of course, my hon. friend from Lanark says what is strictly correct, that they cannot expropriate what belongs to the Crown, but they can get it sometimes privately from the Crown for very much less than it is worth. If the government in future would lease all these water-powers at a reasonable rental, it would be a very good policy in the interest of the country. We should lease them and get a return for the country. If it is the federal government that own them, the return would come to the federal treasury; if it is the provincial government, the provincial government would get the rent. That would be a wise policy, and I have wondered for years and years why the government never gave the House any inkling of its desire to conserve what belongs to the people so that they could get the benefit of such water-powers rather than that they should be handed over to enrich private corporations. We want to know what the government intend to do with these water-powers, because almost every week during the session we have some Bill that seeks to acquire some rights of this kind. We have to view these Bills in such a way as we deem to be proper, because the government have not yet laid down any wise policy or rule to guide us in dealing with these questions. It would save the time of the committee and of this House if they did so, it would as well preserve to the country a beneficial interest in what belongs to the country, and it would put a stop to the practice of giving these water-powers to private individuals without a fair and reasonable return to the country.

Mr. CARVELL. My hon. friend (Mr. Sproule), I think, entirely misunderstands the true purport of this Bill. He undertakes to say that there is no inconsistency between the stand which hon. gentlemen opposite took upon the British Columbia Bill and that which they now take upon the present Bill. Why, Sir, possibly he has not read it, but section 12 of the British Columbia Bill takes the power out of the hands of British Columbia and gives to this company the right to expropriate powers anywhere, whether they belong to private individuals, corporations or to the province.

Mr. SPROULE. By British Columbia's own consent.

Mr. CARVELL. Not by British Columbia's own consent at all.

Mr. SPROULE. Yes.

Mr. CARVELL. Section 12 is as follows:

For the purposes of its undertaking, and subject to the provisions of section 247 of the Railway Act, the company may acquire and develop water, electric or other power.

And so on. Now, my hon. friend from East Grey ought to know that it was settled that under a decision of the Privy Council in a British Columbia case a corporation created by this parliament with expropriation powers has the absolute right to expropriate from private individuals or from the province.

Mr. SPROULE. I have no remembrance of any such decision.

Mr. CARVELL. Therefore, this Bill which my hon. friend and other hon. gentlemen allowed to go through so easily gives to this corporation the right to expropriate any water-power in British Columbia no matter to whom it belongs. Then, these hon. gentlemen come and say, as the hon. member for East Grey says, that is not a parallel case with this one. I agree it is not a parallel case; it is a case the iniquity of which is a hundredfold greater than that of the Bill under discussion.

Mr. BRADBURY. Admitting that to be so, would the hon. gentleman say that it is right for the House to pass this Bill?

Mr. CARVELL. I do not know of my hon. friend opposing it. I do not know of any hon. member who opposed it, and I did not hear any opposition to it when it was brought up for the third reading.

Mr. EMMERSON. I opposed it.

Mr. CARVELL. Did you?

Mr. SPROULE. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that the Burrard Inlet Bill gave that corporation power to expropriate water-powers in any portion of British Columbia. Did he read clause 8 of the Bill, which shows the distance that the corporation intends to go and which extends only a few miles?

Mr. CARVELL. That is only drawing a herring across the path. It gives this company the right to expropriate water-powers in British Columbia within the purview of its extent. It does not make any difference whether these powers belonged to private individuals or not; the company has the right to expropriate them and use them for the purposes of its undertaking. There are no such rights granted by this Bill at all. No expropriation rights are granted or claimed. The only right to be created is the power to purchase and hold these properties if they can do so. When I am discussing this subject it may not be out of place to say that in my opinion we are spending a lot of time discussing what is only a fetish of the province of Ontario regarding these water-powers. You would think that there never was a water-power on earth until four or five years ago when some gentleman in Toronto discovered such things. There have been water-powers developed all over Canada and all over the world for the last three or four hundred years. Almost every day when anything comes up in this House in which water-powers are mentioned some hon. gentleman gets up and says: You are taking away the inalienable rights of the people; you are taking away the water-powers which belong to the people. I would like to know what earthly good these water-powers are until they are developed. The water has been running away for thousands of years and you never can bring it back, and unless these water-powers are developed the water will continue to run away for thousands of years. I do not agree with the hon. member for East Grey when he says that in this case there should be a great big rental demanded, that these people should pay a large rental before they get these privileges. Take the case of the city of Ottawa. Under the terms of this Bill when the company have acquired water rights they may create electricity, but the rates to be charged for this electricity are to be governed by the Railway Commission. If this company are compelled to pay—I do not care whether it is $1,000, or $100,000, or $1,000,000 to the federal or local government, whichever may have the right to lease the power to the company—the Railway Commission, in establishing the rates to be charged to the public, must take that into consideration, and the rates will be just that much higher or just as much higher as the rental which the company is compelled to pay bears to the whole amount of the work done. Take the city of Ottawa. The electric company in Ottawa probably pays no rental, I presume it acquired its rights in the old days before the attempt was made to tie up everything in Ontario. Suppose the electric company in Ottawa were compelled to pay $500,000 to the Ontario government, does my hon. friend suppose that the citizens of Ottawa would get electricity at 8 cents a kilowatt hour, the cheapest rate in Canada? People get cheap electricity simply because the company get cheap development. If the company had to pay a high rate the people of Ottawa would pay the scorching, and the price instead of being 8 cents a kilowatt hour would be 9 cents, 10 cents, 11 cents or 12 cents, as it is in many other places. We have heard so much about this doctrine of giving away no rights to water-powers that it is time some one spoke on the other side and showed that this is only a fetish, something not sound in principle and which will not work out properly when put in practice, which will increase rather than diminish the cost of these public utilities to the users. After all, the main object of these public utilities is to give to the consuming public as low rates as possible and not to increase the exchequer of some municipality.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The argument of my hon. friend would lead to some curious conclusions. The coal in the mines of Nova Scotia is of no value until it is dug out; the timber in the forests of Ontario is of no special value until it is cut—

Mr. CARVELL. Can you replace the coal in the mines of Nova Scotia, or the timber in Ontario, as you can water-power?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. You can replace the timber by a proper system of cutting and planting.

Mr. CARVELL. In fifty years.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. But surely my hon. friend would not contend that on this account they should be given away without rental or royalty?

Mr. CARVELL. There is no comparison whatever.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. His argument would lead logically to that conclusion, because he would say that if you gave away the coal without royalty and the timber without rental, people would get them so much the cheaper and in that way the general interests of the country would be well conserved. I do not believe you can carry the argument to that extent in that way. The great difficulty about these water-powers is that there is a tendency in the United States, there may be a tendency in Canada to get them all under one control in different parts of the country; eventually they might come in this country under one gigantic control, and I do not think that would be desirable. The water-power, it is true, is of no use until it is utilized, but the conditions under which it should be utilized must require consideration on the part of the government.

As to the hon. gentleman's remarks in respect to the expropriation of property owned by a provincial government, I looked at the decision which he brought to my attention last year, and I also examined some 18 or 20 other cases in the Privy Council, in the Supreme Court of Canada, and in the Court of Appeal of the province of Ontario, and I would not be quite prepared to accept the conclusion at which he arrived. In the Privy Council Sir Arthur Wilson based his conclusion on two grounds, in the first place on the ground that the property in question was part of the foreshore, and in the second place on the ground to which the hon. gentleman has alluded. If that argument were to be accepted, it would necessarily follow that a provincial government would have the right to expropriate the property of the Crown held in right of Canada; I see no distinction, because every one knows that in the case of the Liquidators of the Maritime Bank of New Brunswick against the Crown, it was held that the executive and the legislature of a province are as supreme and sovereign within the ambit of their jurisdiction as the executive of Canada, and the parliament of Canada are supreme within the ambit of their jurisdicion. As a matter of fact in the case of the Privy Council neither in the argument nor in the judgment, was there cited, a section of the British North America Act, which has a very important bearing on the case. I do not observe that it has been cited anywhere except possibly some years ago in one Ontario case. That is section 117, which provides that:

> The several provinces shall retain all their respective public property not otherwise disposed of in this Act, subject to the right of Canada to assume any lands or public property required for fortifications or for the defence of the country.

There is one case expressly provided in which Canada can take the property of a province, and I would be inclined to think that a very strong argument would be made from that for the right of the province to hold its property absolutely against any invasion by he government or parliament of Canada, except in the particular case so specified. I appreciate the hon. gentleman's courtesy in handing me the decision, and I looked into the question at a good deal of length because it was very interesting; but I cannot come to any conclusion other than this in respect to the Privy Council case, namely, that it will hold precisely the same position in Privy Council jurisprudence that the decision upon the Canada Temperance Act, has held within the last 15 or 16 years; that is to say, in a case in every possible respect absolutely within the decision it might be followed, but I would have my doubts as to whether there might not be a good deal of hesitation in following it any further.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am sure if I could make a suggestion that would expedite the disposal of this Bill, the committee would be pleased in view of the time that has already been taken. I understand from the remarks of those hon. gentlemen opposite who have spoken that they are not opposed to the Bill, but they think before it is passed there should be some declaration of policy upon the part of the government as to the disposition to be made of water-powers which are owned by the Dominion government. I may say for the information of the committee that the Conservation Commission have this matter under careful consideration, and they expect to submit very shortly a report to the government on the subject. I need not say that their report, while I could not say it will be adopted, will be given the most careful and favourable consideration possible. The committee may, I think, rely that the public interest will be fairly safeguarded and that we will endeavour to act in accordance with the recommendation of the Conservation Commission.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. A word with reference to clause 12 of the Burrard Inlet Bill, which was referred to by the hon. member (Mr. Carvell). Those members who voted for that clause did so in the public interest.

Mr. CARVELL. No doubt.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. These incorporators represented five or six municipalities which contained within their limits one half the population of the province of British Columbia and therefore, in giving to this company those powers we were giving the benefits of those powers to one half the people of British Columbia because those incorporators produced there a trust deed by which they acknowledged that they were procuring these rights as trustees for the benefit of one half the people of the province of British Columbia. They went further and said they were going to operate their works free of charge to the public, they agreed they would not charge the people using the works to cross the river. We contend for that in the interest of one half of the people of the province of British Columbia and therefore in the public interest.

Mr. NEELY. Since the hon. member (Mr. Middlebro) has given his reason why he supported in the Railway Committee the Burrard Inlet Bill which contained the same clause as this Bill which he is now opposing, I have to say with regard to the Burrard Inlet Bill that while it is true the municipality in the vicinity of the town where the bridge and tunnel were to be erected did support the Bill, as being a benefit to the people of British Columbia, the Bill was in fact promoted by private individuals. The company was incorporated for $3,000,000, and the only information the committee had was that the municipalities were prepared to subscribe about $300,000 or 10 per cent of the stock; the balance, so far as we know, being held by private individuals. On the first day the Bill was considered in committee it is true that the company agreed that no tolls should be charged over the traffic part of the bridge, but they substantially withdrew that guarantee and the Bill as it passed the House provides for the charging of tolls on that traffic bridge. When my hon. friend (Mr. Middlebro) gives that as a reason for supporting the Burrard Inlet Bill he consequently cannot reconcile his assent in that case with his opposition in this case. The whole trouble seems to be that certain hon. gentlemen opposite want the government, in connection with this Bill, to pronounce a policy on the disposition of water-powers. Since this Bill passed the Railway Committee, this is the third time it has been before the Committee of the Whole, and I think, Sir, that some strong objection should be shown against the Bill before it is held up in this way. Hon. gentlemen opposite say they are not trying to obstruct the Bill, but if they are not what in the name of common sense are they doing? When the Bill was first before the committee the member for South Simcoe asked for the policy of the government, and the Minister of the Interior answered him by stating that his department had a stated policy as to the disposition of water-powers in the prairie provinces and in the north-west territories.

Mr. BRADBURY. The minister was mis taken.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. What was that policy?

Mr. PUGSLEY. To rent the water-powers.

Mr. NEELY. I have the words of the Minister of the Interior before me, and I read them from 'Hansard,' page 4949:

Mr. OLIVER. The demand has been made that this government should come forward with a policy with regard to water-powers. In so far as the waters of Canada are under the jurisdiction of this government, the government has a very definite policy in regard to water-powers, which has been in force for some time. With regard to the water which exists in the three prairie provinces, by the terms of the Irrigation Act, this water was vested absolutely in the control of the Dominion government. Under the terms of the Dominion Lands Act, passed in 1908, provision was made for the development of power upon these waters. Under the terms of the Act regulations have been passed and have been in force now for something like a year, providing the method by which rights in water-powers are acquired, making provision that a rental may be charged for the use of the water by the power company, which rental may be determined from time to time—that is at periods of 21 years—and making provision for the regulation of the charges which should be made to the consumers of the power generated from the water, such charges to be under the control of the Railway Commission, and to be subject to adjustment at periods of seven years.

And further he said:

Mr. OLIVER. I should have mentioned that I think the Irrigation Act applies to the Northwest Territories as well as to the three prairie provinces, but at any rate the Dominion Lands Act does and under the authority of that Act regulations have been made which would certainly apply to the water-powers that would be affected by either of these Bills. There is no question as to the policy of the government, or as to the administration of the government in regard to water-powers, which are unquestionably under the jurisdiction of the Dominion government. The present Bill applies to the Northwest Territories outside the limits of any province and therefore no question of provincial rights is involved.

That was the statement made to the committee by the Minister of the Interior, and yet hon. gentlemen opposite seem to want something further in the nature of a policy. Now, if the regulations already passed by the Minister of the Interior under the Dominion Lands Act and under the Irrigation Act are not satisfactory to hon. gentlemen opposite, it seems very strange that this particular private Bill must stand over until the whole question has been reconsidered and new regulations put in force. The objection of hon. gentlemen opposite is absolutely absurd. Are not the people of Canada quite satisfied that the water-powers under the control of the Dominion government are just as satisfactorily administered as those which are under the control of certain provincial governments? I think they are. I shall not discuss the situation in Ontario, but I do not know that the people of Ontario are getting very much cheaper power as a result of the Hydro-Electric Commission than are the people in the vicinity of water-powers controlled by the Dominion government. It is sufficient for me to call the attention of the House to the fact that the water-powers which are under the Dominion government are operated, leased and handed over to those who develop these powers under regulations framed by the minister by virtue of the authority given him in the Dominion Lands Act and in the Irrigation Act.

Mr. OLIVER. I want to make a little correction. I am reported as having said that the water-power regulations apply to the territory affected by this railway charter, which is the territory now known as the Northwest Territories, and is not within the three prairie provinces. If I am correctly reported, I was in error in making that statement. The regulations only apply directly to the three prairie provinces, but so far as any declaration of policy by the government can be made, these regulations are a declaration of the policy of the government, and the fact that they do not apply to the Northwest Territories is only an inadvertence and is not intentional. The policy of the government is set out in the regulations, and will be made to apply to all waters under the jurisdiction of the Dominion government.

Mr. EMMERSON. What is the charge per horse-power?

Mr. OLIVER. That will be fixed in the license and will vary according to circumstances. Where the cost of development is great in proportion to the amount of power, it would not be sound public policy to charge a heavy rental; but where the quantity of horse-power is large, and the cost of development comparatively low, it would be only right that the general public should receive some benefit. The policy is to provide for a rental charge which is to be adjusted every 21 years and the charge is to be at the discretion of the Governor in Council. The charge per horse-power furnished by those who have developed it, will be subject to adjustment by the Railway Commission in periods of seven years. It would not be proper to make a fixed charge for the power to be used which would apply under all circumstances and in all cases.

Mr. SPROULE. What would be the action of the government in the event of a canal company, such as the company in the present Bill getting an Act of incorporation, and then, under the powers of that Act, desiring to take possession of water-powers—what would be the policy of the government with regard to these water-powers? Would the corporation have the right to take them under terms different from what the government would fix in the case of a private company?

Mr. OLIVER. The duty of answering that question does not devolve upon me, but I would say most certainly that one company would be exactly in the same position as any other company or as a private individual. If a company wanted to secure water-powers belonging to this Dominion, they would have to get it under the policy of this government, which is expressed in the regulations already made and applicable to the three prairie provinces.

Mr. SPROULE. In these charters we give the right to take possession of water-powers in provinces where the land does not belong to the federal authority. Why should not the government go a step further and say it was their intention not to give such rights in charters but refer these companies to the provinces? We would then have a guarantee that no injustice would be done any province.

Mr. OLIVER. Do I understand my hon. friend's suggestion to apply to the prairie provinces?

Mr. SPROULE. Any province.

Mr. OLIVER. There is a difference between the position in the prairie provinces and that in the other provinces. Jurisdiction with regard to the land and the water which covers the land in the prairie provinces rests in the Dominion government, but in the other provinces it is vested in the provincial governments, so that the responsibility, which rests distinctly upon the Dominion government in respect of the three prairie provinces, does not rest upon that government at all in the other provinces. As regards the water-powers in the other provinces, the question whether we have any jurisdiction at all, is one I cannot answer. I am only speaking of the policy of the Dominion government as regards lands and waters unquestionably under its jurisdiction. We have declared our policy in that regard most unmistakably.

Mr. SPROULE. We had a Bill before us a short time ago for a canal, and it was contended that the federal power was the only one which could deal with a canal. If the company took possession of valuable water-powers belonging to a province for the purpose of running a canal, they would take them under the rights we gave them as a canal company and without regard to provincial interests, notwithstanding the land was the property of a province. The only way they would be checked would be by the refusal of the federal government to grant corporate powers to any company which would enable them to take what belonged to a province.

Mr. CONMEE. This discussion has taken a somewhat wide range. I have been listening for some time to the criticisms on the Bill and the reference made by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) to a Canal Bill which, he supposed, has taken away from somebody the right to water-powers. Now, I submit, that no such Bill has been presented to the House. All that ever was presented to the House was that the water-power, in so far as it was developed by the canal company, might be used for the purpose of operating the canal, and the surplus sold under certain regulations. The hon. gentleman seems to think that would perhaps give the company the right to take a great water-power and utilize it and, according to the language we hear on this matter, alienate it from the people. I submit that no such Bill has been presented to this House since I have been here. What is the principle of this Bill? It simply empowers a corporation which, without the Bill, would not as a corporation have powers, to expend its money for the development of water-powers that can acquire it. It is said this Bill differs a good deal from others because it is dealing with water-powers in the western provinces, and the question of expropriation is not as vital to the company as it would be under different circumstances. I do not see that that makes any difference in the principle. Because these gentlemen may acquire water-powers, whether they get them by expropriation or by agreement, how is the public prejudiced? That would be something hon. gentlemen should address themselves to. What can the public get from the development of a water-power? The leader of the opposition has compared water-powers to coal or timber. I do not think the comparison holds, for the reason mentioned by the hon. member for Carleton, New Brunswick (Mr. Carvell). Water-power is created by the flow of water past a given point. Once past, it is gone for ever so far as that portion of it is concerned. Coal can be exhausted, timber can be exhausted, but water-power can only be used as it presents itself. So, to discuss this question from the point of view of such a comparison is an error.

Mr. BOYCE. If you do not use coal and timber, they are still there as an asset.

Mr. CONMEE. You can conserve coal and timber, but you cannot conserve a water-power.

Mr. THOBURN. Why not?

Mr. CONMEE. Because it flows and is gone.

Mr. GOODEVE. May I ask this question? Does not the hon. member know that all these powers are alike in this—that if you give away a water-power, a coal mine or a timber tract, they are all equally gone so far as the public is concerned.

Mr. CONMEE. If you give a water-power to a private individual, there might be some logic in the hon. member's question. But who has ever proposed to do anything of that kind? It is true that, twenty years ago, legislation might have been passed to give private control over water-powers. But does any hon. member pretend to say that parliament under recent legislation loses control over these water-powers, because it gives a charter to a company to develop them? Does anybody pretend to say that parliament loses control over a railway because it gives a charter to a company to build a line? I have here an Act of the legislature of Ontario, passed in 1907. It empowers the Hydro-Electric Commission of Ontario to take any water-powers they please.

Mr. LENNOX. For the people.

Mr. CONMEE. My hon. friend (Mr. Lennox) says 'for the people.' This is not the place to discuss that question. But it does not make any difference whether it is in the interest of the people. The principle is that the Ontario legislature acted upon the principle that it had the power to take water-powers from private corporations, whether incorporated by the Dominion or incorporated by the province, and they empower their commission to take any water-power within the boundaries of Ontario. I grant that, in their view, they believed it was for the benefit of the people. But who knows whether it is going to be for the benefit of the people or not? Why, they got behind a private company and gave it plenary powers of monopoly for thirty years over the cities of Port Arthur and Fort William. I have the contract in my possession.

Mr. BOYCE. What company?

Mr. CONMEE. The Kakabeka Power Company. They give them a monopoly for twenty years of power that will cost the consumer at least $30. But I am not discussing that; I do not want to be drawn into that discussion, but the hon. member (Mr. Lennox) opened the door when he said it was for the public interests. Perhaps it may turn out to be more in the public interest than I think it to be. But that is not the point. This parliament does not lose its control over the water-powers We stipulate, in this very Bill, that the rates shall be subject to the Railway Board of Canada to adjust from time to time. Will any hon. member tell me what the public can get from the development of a water-power that they do no get under this Bill? If any hon. member can point out how, if the government develops a water-power, it could do better for the public or give more advantageous terms than can be secured from a company by the Board of Railway Commissioners, he will have made an argument, he will have made a point, and I shall be very glad to hear it. But I deny altogeher that it is possible for any government to develop and operate and supply power more cheaply than a company can do it. I would be very glad indeed to support a policy of development of water-powers by the government if the government would carry out that policy. But does anybody believe that this government, or any other, will develop the water-powers of this country as the people require them? It has been said by a great authority that water-powers are nature's gifts to the people. So they are. And, by the regulations which you are now adopting, and by the principle of public control for the public benefit, you are conserving those powers so far as they can be conserved, for the benefit of the people. But it is not for the benefit of the people to lock up these water-powers as has been done in Ontario. The Hydro-Electric Commission has been six years in operation, and it has not developed one water-power. Is that in the interest of the public? But this is not the place to discuss that. They have made arrangements concerning water-powers, and, perhaps, from their point of view, they are doing good work. I am not here to criticise or find fault with that commission. But what I say is that a community living within reach of the commercial use of a water-power ought not to be denied the benefits of that development simply because of the theory of some gentlemen that it ought to be held. Held for what? For a private company? Hon. members opposite are upholding a Bill which will have that effect. I do not accuse members opposite of knowingly or purposely playing into the hands of a corporation, but they did it just the same. In the case of the canal Bill, they forced the company that asked for the Bill—practically forced them—to abandon the Kaministiquia route. Why? To maintain the monopoly of a private company that has a thirty years' grip on the two great cities at the head of the lakes. That is what you accomplished.

Mr. BOYCE. May I ask a question.

Mr. CONMEE. Yes, any question you like.

Mr. BOYCE. By what process was that company forced, as the hon. gentleman puts it, to adopt another route? Was it not his own choice?

Mr. CONMEE. No, it was not my own choice.

Mr. BOYCE. Then I misunderstood the hon. gentleman's statement in the Railway Committee.

Mr. CONMEE. My hon. friend (Mr. Boyce) was one who opposed—as did a large number of others, backed by a strong deputation and assisted by a bench of lawyers—a particular feature of the Bill. This was done on public grounds. My hon. friend from Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Boyce) and no doubt my hon. friend from South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) acted in perfect good faith. I do not think they understood what they were doing, and it was not my place to enlighten them. But what they did was to compel that company to withdraw from the Kaministiqua route.

Mr. BOYCE. Did the hon. member say that they were lawyers of the opposition company, the Kakabeka?

Mr. CONMEE. Yes, Mr. Chrysler and others were there—

Mr. BOYCE. Mr. Chrysler was representing, as the hon. member knows, the city of Fort William, appointed by the council of that city.

Mr. CONMEE. The hon. member is entirely mistaken.

Mr. LENNOX. May I interject a word—

Mr. CONMEE. Yes, I want any question you like to ask.

Mr. LENNOX. I do not wish to ask a question, but to make a statement. The hon. member (Mr. Conmee) mentioned my name. Perhaps he will allow me to tell him that I was not present at all.

Mr. CONMEE. I was evidently mistaken about that, and so I withdraw my assertion. But the hon. member (Mr. Lennox) was there on another occasion; I have a distinct recollection of that. I say that my hon. friend from Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Boyce) is misinformed as to Mr. Chrysler being there for Fort William. Fort William was there because this company wanted the Bill to be amended, and the moment the Kaministiquia route was dropped, Fort William, Port Arthur, Mr. Chrysler and the whole bunch of them with the public interest at heart disappeared from the committee room and you heard no more about it.

Mr. BOYCE. If the hon. member will pardon me, I will make this statement. He well knows that that Bill has been referred to a committee, and the chairman of it purposes that all these persons interested, Port Arthur, Fort William, the Ontario government, and everybody else who wishes to be heard shall be heard before that committee. What does the hon. gentleman mean by saying that they have disappeared from the scene?

Mr. CONMEE. I will tell my hon. friend. He may hear from the Ontario government, he won't hear from the rest, because they are out of this trouble just now. They have the monopoly, and so far as I am concerned, I am willing to leave it with them.

Mr. BOYCE. There is no monopoly.

Mr. CONMEE. There has been a monopoly for 30 years. I have the document in my pocket, and perhaps I will put it on 'Hansard' before this session is over; anyway I will give it to my hon. friend. I submit that the attack upon this Bill is unwarranted. Hon. gentlemen are mistaken when they say that this is handing over to a private company public interests. Parliament does not lose its control, parliament can take this power out of the hands of this company at any time. Parliament can empower the Railway Commission to impose such conditions as will be in the public interest. The minister has stated that under the regulations parliament has the right to impose the condition of a payment to the public revenue for the use of the water; that is one of the conditions upon which it must obtain the power. It does'nt matter whether that power is in the three prairie provinces or within the territory of Ontario, the regulation applies to any power within Dominion jurisdiction. Now, there are cases even on international streams where waterpowers exist upon Crown lands that are absolutely within the control and under the ownership of the federal government. These powers exist there, and they are dealt with on the same basis and on the same principle as are laid down in these regulations. Now, if hon. gentlemen will come forward with a policy and show wherein they can better protect the public interest than it is now protected by these regulations and by this legislation which they are opposing, then they will have accomplished something, but until they do that it seems to me that their arguments are not very strong. Now Bill (No. 118), section 12, gives absolute control for the sale of the surplus power, the very principle that hon. gentlemen are opposing; and they did not oppose that Bill seriously in the Railway Committee, they did not oppose it in this House. Why? Is it because it bore on the back of it the name of one of their own members? Is it because it was put through by a colleague of theirs? Is that the only reason they were silent when it was going through the House? I do not say so, but the attitude of hon. gentlemen leads to that suspicion. I do not think it is in the public interest to attack private legislation, I do not think it is in the public interest to say that there should be no more development, no more enterprise, no more utilization of one of nature's great resources; you must wait on the policy of the Chinese empire, they have conserved a great many natural resources. Well, we do not admire that. To say that we must wait until parliament gets ready, until some administration appears that will develop these water-powers before you can have any use of them, I do not think it sound policy. I think parliament should conserve the public interest so far as it is possible to do so, but beyond that I do not think we should go.

Mr. GOODEVE. Some hon. members have stated that the members from British Columbia are obstructing this Bill after having allowed a similar Bill (No. 118) to go through this House. Now, as one of the members from British Columbia I desire to take exception to that statement. In the first place, I think the members from British Columbia have taken but very little interest in the Bill now before the House. Only one or two of them have spoken on it, merely setting forth that their only reason for taking any part in the discussion was a desire to obtain the view of the government in regard to the conservation of these water-powers. They have made that clear; so I think it is very unfair in hon. members opposite to say that the members from British Columbia have been obstructing the Bill. They have made certain comparisons, and I would also like to compare the two Bills. The hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Neely) said that Bill (No. 118) had been brought forward in the interest of monopolies. Let me tell that hon. gentleman that while it is true that a number of private individuals appeared in the Railway Committee as promoters of that Bill, they produced before the committee a deed of trusteeship showing that they were acting solely in the interests of the various municipalities interested. The fact was clearly brought out in the Railway Committee that the Bill was promoted by a trusteeship. There is another point of distinction. Bill (No. 118) was a very definite Bill in a well known district having a large population; it was between two close points only a mile or two apart, namely, for the construction of a bridge and a tunnel. That was their only power. So when it is contended that Bill (No. 118) gave similar powers to the Bill now before the committee, I want to point out that these powers are absolutely restricted by clause 8 of that Bill. When we read clause 8 in connection with clause 11, you will see that the powers are very restricted, they definitely point out that they can only develop power for the purposes of their undertaking. Now, for the purposes of their undertaking they acquire power to build a bridge and a tunnel between two definite and well known points, therefore, they only make use of this clause 11 in developing any power that they may have to use in connection with this specific undertaking. What is the case in the Bill before the House? We must also read clause 7 in connection with clause 13, and we find that instead of being narrow and definite powers, they are powers of a very broad nature. That is the strong objection taken by every one who spoke on this Bill before the Railway Committee. Clause 7 reads thus:

> The company may lay out, construct and operate a railway of the gauge of four feet eight and one-half inches, from a point on Lake Winnipeg, at or near its outlet into the Nelson river, or at or near the discharge of the Saskatchewan river into Lake Winnipeg, or from a place between the said points, to a point of junction with any railway to Hudson bay which may be located by the government of Canada.

Now there is no railway at the present time connecting with the Hudson bay, so you can see how broad that is. As a matter of fact it means that the company getting this charter practically has control of all the waterways in that great stretch of country from Lake Superior to Lake Winnipeg, draining this whole water shed. Furthermore, there is, in connection with these particular rivers, a large number of well known water-powers. One of the members stated that there were at least fifteen known water-powers in the territory referred to, and there is no doubt that there are many more powers that are unknown in a country which is as little known as this, and that is one of the reasons why, great reasons why we are pleading that before this Bill is passed the government should pronounce some definite policy in regard to this question.

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend has made the statement that this Bill will give to this company the control of these water-powers. Would my hon. friend be good enough to point out the section of this Bill that he says will give this company control of these water-powers?

Mr. GOODEVE. Under clause 18 of the Bill they have the right to acquire and develop waterways in connection with their operations and contributory to this is clause 7. I would like to ask the minister, in answer to his question, would they not have a certain existing right that would prevent future companies from applying to acquire these powers?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Absolutely not.

Mr. FIELDING. Does this Bill give, or pretend to give, any water-powers whatever?

Mr. PUGSLEY. None whatever.

Mr. GOODEVE. It gives them the right to acquire water-powers—

Mr. FIELDING. Any man has that right.

Mr. GOODEVE.——in connection with their railway, and I venture to say that if this Bill once passes and we attempt to give one of these water-powers to any other person, immediately these men would step in under clause 7 and say: You are taking away waters that we require for the purpose of our undertaking.

Mr. PUGSLEY. They would have no right to say so.

Mr. GOODEVE. My experience has been in regard to these corporations that when they get a Bill containing a clause, such as clause 7, they will make a strenuous effort to exercise their supposed rights, and it was along that line that the British Columbia legislature proceeded to pass their Water Clauses Act. That brings me to another point in the argument. The company incorporated by the Burrard Inlet Bill will be subject to the control of the Water Clauses Act of the province of British Columbia whereby they would pay a proportionate amount depending upon the number of units of water they took.

Mr. CONMEE. Where is that to be found in the Burrard Inlet Bill?

Mr. GOODEVE. They would come under the Water Clauses Act of the province—and it is not necessary to put it in the Bill. That is exactly the point that we are contending for. We say that if the government would lay down a fixed policy whereby these water rights, which now are the property of the country, could be regulated, and whereby any one applying for them would be under one jurisdiction, we would have no objection to this Bill. I agree with the hon. member for Rainy River (Mr. Conmee) and some other members, and I think I agree with the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals himself, in what they have said in regard to this aspect of the question. I want it distinctly understood that until such time as the government will develop these natural resources I am strongly in favour of their development by private parties, and I would be the last to make any objection to the development of these natural resources. We are not asking to prohibit their development but we would like that they should be properly conserved in the interest of the people as a whole.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Is not the field within which the Burrard Inlet Company are to operate, and where they are to get their water-power within the railway belt?

Mr. COWAN. No.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I had the impression that the company would operate twenty miles on each side of the railway.

Mr. GOODEVE. I think it is outside of the railway belt.

Mr. EMMERSON. I think we have travelled a great distance from the point raised by the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox). As I understand his objection to this Bill it is that there should be provision made——

Mr. GOODEVE. I was merely answering a question put to me by the hon. Minister of Public Works.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What was the answer of the hon. gentleman?

Mr. GOODEVE. That it would not be within the railway belt.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The railway belt extends twenty miles on each side of the Canadian Pacific railway.

Mr. GOODEVE. I know, but it is not in that particular district. It terminates at the other end of Port Moody.

Mr. PUGSLEY. But these water-powers would be developed east of Port Moody.

Mr. GOODEVE. No, they would be west.

Mr. PUGSLEY. If these water-powers are within the railway belt, under a decision of the Exchequer Court, they would stand exactly in the same position as water-powers in the Northwest.

Mr. GOODEVE. I quite agree with the hon. minister, but they are not within the railway belt. I have no desire to obstruct the Bill, and I intend to confine my remarks to the comparison between the two Bills. I could go farther afield, and discuss the general proposition as was done by the hon. member for Rainy River, but I do not intend to do so.

Mr. EMMERSON. The hon. member for Kootenay (Mr. Goodeve) had resumed his seat, and then he was asked a question. That question was answered by another hon. member from British Columbia, and I assumed that my hon. friend had finished his remarks. I beg his pardon for even seemingly having interrupted him. We have travelled a long distance from the point that was raised. As I understand the point of the hon. member for South Simcoe it is that he objects to this Bill on the ground that there is no provision made by the government to impose any charge upon the water-powers which may be utilized under the authority of the Bill. The answer given by the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) to that is very complete. I would join with my hon. friend if his objection was not met. Therefore, in view of the answer of the Minister of the Interior as regards the regulations now in force and enforced, his objection to this Bill falls absolutely to the ground.

Mr. LENNOX. The hon. member is not stating my position at all. I have no doubt he is inadvertently misstating it. My position is this: Regulations made by the department and which the department administer, from time to time, getting an order in council for them, is not such a broad, definite, specific, well known policy, as Canada should have as to so great an interest, but there should be some declaration by parliament, and parliament should be, to some extent, consulted upon the broad lines upon which this government shall administer this great asset, instead of the administration being provided for merely by regulations.

Mr. EMMERSON. I do not think my hon. friend has bettered his position in any way at all.

Mr. LENNOX. That may be, I am only putting it as well as I can.

Mr. EMMERSON. The answer has been made by the minister in that way, and it strikes me that the objection to this Bill must fall to the ground. Had the same objection been taken to the Burrard Inlet Bill I could have seen the force of it, because there we were doing something that we are not attempting to do by this Bill, as we are not giving any powers of expropriation. Under Bill (No. 118) relating to the Burrard Inlet Company we were giving powers to expropriate, and we were giving the company power to take the property of the people of British Columbia without making any recompense.

Mr. S. SHARPE. For the benefit of the municipalities.

Mr. EMMERSON. That contention with respect to the municipalities must fall entirely to the ground. It is not the property of the municipalities, but it is the property of the government and people of British Columbia. Bill (No. 118) is not incorporating municipalities, and nothing was shown to the committee whereby the municipalities would have control. They might have some interest, somebody might hold stock in the company for them. Whom do we incorporate in Bill (No. 118)? The section reads:

E. Mahon, E. W. MacLean, James P. Fell and Lambert Bond, all of the city of Vancouver, and John Y. McNaught and J. C. Keith, both of the city of North Vancouver, in the province of British Columbia, together with such persons as become shareholders in the company, are incorporated under the name of 'The Burrard Inlet Tunnel and Bridge Company,' hereinafter called 'the company.'

These are the gentlemen and they have the power, there is nothing to restrain them and there is no hold, so far as this parliament is concerned, upon any one of these gentlemen in behalf of a municipality or in behalf of a province, it is all moonshine to talk about that being a corporation under the control of municipalities, there was no such evidence, no sufficient evidence. The evidence that was presented did not carry us to the point to which my hon. friends would wish us to be carried. In this Bill (No. 118) we are not making any provision for a recompense for the rights which we granted, rights that under certain circumstances belong to the province of British Columbia, but by virtue of our declaration that it was a work for the general advantage of Canada we were infringing upon their rights, usurping property that was theirs and not imposing on this company any compensation for the province of British Columbia. When this Bill was before the committee on a previous occasion, I called attention to the rules adopted in some of the United States and particularly the rule that is applied in the state of New York. The Minister of the Interior says that under our system the federal government regulations do not impose any specific rate with respect to all companies but they impose a rate dependent on the circumstances which govern each case. Our system of government, it will be admitted is quite different from the system in the United States or in a state of the American union. As was shown to the committee the other day, the state of New York, whenever they incorporate any company granting power-rights or granting lands in connection therewith, or granting any franchise relating thereto, impose upon that company a fixed tax at the very inception of the Bill. That tax is increased annually until they are finally an operating company, and then there is so much imposed on the company for every horse-power developed by them. I quoted the rate at page 4939 as follows:

Upon all amounts up to 25,000 electrical horse-power, at the rate of 75 cents per horse-power; upon all amounts in excess of 25,000 electrical horse-power and up to 100,000 horse-power, at the rate of 50 cents per horse power; upon all amounts in excess of 100,000 electrical horse-power, at the rate of 25 cents per horse-power. In case said corporation shall generate or develop water-power as mechanical power without transmuting the same into electrical power, then for so much of said water-power as may be developed payments shall be made at the above mentioned rates per mechanical horse-power.

We should have that system in this country and I think we do have it according to my understanding of the statement of the Minister of the Interior. These charges made by the state of New York are applicable to the development of the water-power at the Long Sault so-called, that portion of the waters of the St. Lawrence that flow over American soil; and if like powers were granted by this parliament to any company to develop that power, in connection with the American company, I would assume that the government of Canada, before granting any rights to any such company, would impose amounts, at least equal to the amounts imposed by the legislature of the state of New York. Our parliamentary system is somewhat different from theirs, our governmental system is different. There, in the absence of any general governmental regulations, the legislature in respect to each individual company imposes what they deem to be right and proper in the interests of the state as well as in the interest of the corporation seeking the powers. If we had imposed upon the Burrard Inlet Company a charge such as is imposed under this Bill of Incorporation by the state of New York, we would have done what I would conceive to be proper because the regulations of the department could not apply to the development of the British Columbia water-power and the regulations referred to by the Minister of the Interior only apply to waters that are under the control and within the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada. If we are going to impose such charges on this company we should have inserted a similar provision in the Bill relating to the Burrard Inlet Company. We allowed the Bill to go through and, therefore, it would seem to me if it would be manifestly unfair to further delay this Bill which has in my judgment been unwarrantably delayed. Much time has been occupied, there are no features about it that are a menace or peril either to Dominion or provincial property. I opposed the Bill at its inception because of certain features, which features were amended. I feel now that any objectionable features connected with the Bill have been removed and that it stands upon the same basis as many other Bills which we have permitted to pass both the Railway Committee and this Committee of the whole House.

Mr. S. SHARPE. The Minister of the Interior has told the committee that he intends applying to the Northwest Territories certain regulations which have been in force for a year with regard to water-powers in the prairie provinces, and to that extent, at all events, the action of the opposition in discussing this Bill has been productive of some good.

Mr. EMMERSON. It would be an awful thing to say you were no good.

Mr. S. SHARPE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Emmerson) has stated that this Bill contains provisions similar to the Burrard Inlet Bill.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Only less so.

Mr. S. SHARPE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Emmerson) is wrong in that statement. In the Railway Committee the trust deed that was executed by the promoters of the Burrard Inlet Bill in favour of the municipalities was produced and read, and it is therefore not correct for the hon. gentleman to say that the promoters were not trustees for the municipalities.

Mr. EMMERSON. I said there was not sufficient evidence to show that.

Mr. S. SHARPE. I do not know what stronger evidence could be produced than the production of the trust instrument executed by the promoters of that Bill in favour of the different municipalities. The Burrard Inlet Bill promoters were trustees for the people, but the Bill now before us incorporates a private company which no doubt will exact the maximum fees out of the community. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Emmerson) also told us that we conferred powers of expropriation upon the Burrard Inlet Company without providing that the province should be compensated, but in that also he is mistaken, because under the Railway Act the company must compensate for the property expropriated whether it belongs to the province or to individuals. What we ask in connection with this Bill is that the government shall declare a policy with respect to these water-powers. At present the Minister of the Interior can act on his own discretion; he can charge anything he likes or he can charge nothing, and we know how easily these important franchises are granted to the friends of the administration when we consider the easy methods by which our grazing and timber lands were alienated from the people. What we feel is that the moment this company gets immense rights all over that great territory they will seek to grasp the water-powers, and the Minister of the Interior will no doubt facilitate them. The fees for these water-powers should be fixed by statute so that all may know them, and so that all may have an opportunity to obtain them on equal terms. I was surprised to hear the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Neely) cast reflections on the Ontario Hydro-Electric Commission, and for his information I would say that the policy of that commission has met with absolute approval from both sides of the House in the Ontario legislature, and has received the almost unanimous support of the people in every municipality in which it was submitted for their approval. The mere declaration of policy by the Ontario Hydro-Electric Commission was sufficient to reduce the price of power to consumers from one-third to one-half. The Toronto Street Railway Company had been paying one of the power companies $57 per horse-power, and the Hydro-Electric Commission are 'about to sell' citizens power at $25 per horse-power. That is something which the Ontario Hydro-Electric Commission has done for the benefit of the people. We were told by the Minister of Public Works that the Commission on the Conservation of Our Natural Resources are considering a broad policy in this matter, and as we are also told that their report is expected very soon, what is the harm of asking that this Bill should stand until we know from that report whether it is advisable to pass it in its present form or not.

Mr. NESBITT. The Minister of the Interior has clearly defined his policy which is that each application for the use of power will be dealt with on its merits, and when hon. gentlemen opposite consider that some water-powers may be worth a great deal more than others I think they will agree that such is the only policy that can be thought of. The water-powers concerned in this Bill are a long distance away from any probable users, and the exaction of any high fee would of course make development prohibitive. This Bill does not authorize them to generate power; it simply places them in a position whereby they can negotiate for the right to use and develop water-power. Indeed, under the provisions of this Bill the powers given to this company are very restricted, and limited. So far as I am concerned, I am not going to say anything to hon. members opposite for having voted for the Burrard Inlet charter because I voted for it myself. I do not see why it is mentioned here, because it has nothing to do with this particular charter, and because in the Bill before us, the charter is surrounded by some very stringent conditions. There is a little amendment which I could suggest to clause 11 when we come to it, and which is in one or two other charters, and it is one to which I am sure the promoters of the Bill will agree to. Everything else is so surrounded by conditions that I think hon. gentlemen opposite should be satisfied to let the Bill go through. I do not see how the country runs any risk, nor do I see how it ran any risk when the Burrard Inlet charter went through. As to the contention that the promoters of the Burrard Inlet charter were acting as trustees for the municipalities, we had nothing to show that they were. If they had been, they should have incorporated the trust deeds in their charter, and that would have been absolute proof. Now, this matter was fully discussed in the Railway Committee, and passed that committee, and I hope hon. members opposite will withdraw their opposition. I ask them in all fairness to do so.

Mr. S. SHARPE. The only water-powers available to this company are those owned by the Dominion, and I cannot see why the government, before they convey any water-powers to this company, should not declare that they will 'consider the whole question and lay down some definite policy.' The House should have the power to pronounce whether the water-power will be alienated or not. There are no people out there now and no market for the water, and the individuals who are seeking this Act of incorporation do not live in the territory. One of them is from Campbellton, New Brunswick, another from Montreal, and another from London, England. They have no personal interest in the locality and are simply company promoters.

Mr. EMMERSON. Does the hon. gentleman forget that we are giving them simply the right to acquire water-power in connection with their undertaking and not for general purposes, and the undertaking is to build a certain railway? When they come to build it and want water-power, the Minister of the Interior can deal out justice to them, and at the same time, protect the public interest.

Mr. THOBURN. I have had something to do with water-powers for the last 25 or 30 years, and the question to me is whether it is in the best interests of the people in general that water-powers, at the disposal of the government, should be acquired by either railway companies or canal companies, or whether it is not better that they should be left for the general use of the public. Take as an illustration this whole Ottawa valley, from the town of Brockville to Pembroke, where there are some ten or twelve towns and villages, and several streams that afford from one to ten water-powers in each town or village, I have never known that a railway company or a canal company had any control over those water-powers, and as a consequence they are developed by private parties for manufacturing purposes. The question to me is this, whether it would not be better in these towns, where these railways are going through, to have the water-powers under the control of the government, either Dominion or provincial, than under the control of a railway or canal company. From my experience, I believe it would be in the interest of the development of this country that whatever water-powers the government control should be retained by the government, because people would much prefer going to the government to get the franchise of a water-power than to a railway or canal company.

Mr. SPROULE. I would like to ask whether this Bill is not intended to give the incorporators the right to control water-powers under clause 15 of the Railway Act? That clause provides:

> Enter into and upon any Crown lands without previous license therefor, or into or upon the lands of any person whomsoever, lying in the intended route or line of the railway, and make surveys, examinations or other necessary arrangements. * * *

Admitting that there is a water-fall, if the company ran its line within a few feet of that water-fall—and I think they have the right to take 100 feet for right of way—if in that 100 feet is included that fall, would not this company thereby get control of the water-power, and actually, if it was not necessary to put a dam there to raise the water, get the beneficent effects of the stream and convert it into a power on their own property? It seems to me they could by that very means take possession of numerous valuable water-powers. If the minister has passed through Kenora in daylight, he must have noticed that the Canadian Pacific railway passes right by the edge of a water-fall, close to the Lake of the Woods Milling Company, where the fall is on the right of way of the railway, and the railway would have the right to go on that property and utilize that power. Notwithstanding the fact that that power is in the province, the province would be deprived of the right and the beneficial interest which they have in the stream because of the fact that this special company acquired the right to expropriate the land for the purpose of running its railway. Could not this company, by the same means, get control of valuable water-powers?

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend is entirely right if the water-power happens to be on the right of way of the railway. The railway would then be the owner of the water-power because it is the owner of the property. But it would have that right irrespective altogether of section 13. If my hon. friend imagines that a railway company will be allowed to go zig-zagging here and there to cross a water-power, of course, that might possibly occur, but it is a most improbable supposition. Under section 13, the company could not erect a dam without coming to the Minister of Public Works for the approval of the Governor in Council. It could not flood back the water without authority. And I think my hon. friend will agree with me that there are very few water powers in this country that can be utilized to advantage without the building of a dam, or without going to a large expense to sink flumes to carry the water from above the dam to the foot of the falls, which, in the great majority of cases, would carry a considerable distance beyond the right of way which the company is authorized to take. But the point to which I draw my hon. friend's attention is that it would not affect the case he refers to even if section 13 was struck out.

Mr. SPROULE. What I object to is giving a railway corporation the right to take over water-powers. I think they should have no such rights and have thought so for a long time. The minister said they would not zig-zag their railway to reach water-powers. But they may run a line straight to reach a valuable water-power, and their engineer would probably take good care of that. The minister knows that on the Canadian Pacific railway in the west are several water-powers under the control of the railway company. There are instances where there are substantial water-powers that could be used without erecting a dam at all.

Mr. CONMEE. The conditions at Kenora to which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) refers are against his own argument. It is true the Canadian Pacific railway runs over the water-power at that point—and not one but four water-powers, for the Lake of the Woods has three different outlets discharging into Winnipeg river. The railway crosses each of these at the head of the falls. But that does not give the Canadian Pacific railway the right to these water-powers. All four water-powers are developed, but they are in the hands of private corporations. The Lake of the Woods Milling Company was not a power development by reason of the falls, but by reason of the narrow strip of land between the river and the lake, and they tunnelled underneath across the railway. At the other outlets they made their power at Keewatin. The railway company got no control. At Keewatin, they have a 300-foot right of way, because they have sidings, but even that did not give them control of the water-power, because the water could not be taken from the head and vented in that space. They cross the Wabigon river where there is a water-power and, though the railway crosses right over the falls, that power is developed by a private company, and for the same reason. It is inconceivable that a narrow strip of right of way under any circumstances could give a railway control of a water-power. The best evidence that this cannot be done is the fact that there is not a single case that can be pointed out. I have travelled a good deal in this country and I do not know of one such case. I do not believe that any hon. member can point to a case where the railway right of way gave control of a water-power.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. member (Mr. Conmee) has cited instances where, although this power was within the right of way of the railway, the railway companies never used the water-powers they reached. It is for that reason that I say we should not put it in the Bill.

Mr. CONMEE. What I said was that not only the railway company did not control, but that other private companies have developed and used the water-power and are using it to-day. The power to which he has referred is all developed and is running great establishments.

Mr. SPROULE. I understand that some of them at least were by negotiation with the railway company.

Mr. CONMEE. Not at all.

Mr. SPROULE. Perhaps the hon. member is better informed than I am, but I am not always disposed to take what he says without further evidence than his mere statement.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Suppose that there are valuable undeveloped water-powers in that country, would it not be desirable, seeing that they are at a long distance from coal supply, to operate the railway by electricity? And, in that case, would it not be well for the railway to have authority to utilize water-power for that purpose? It seems to me the very thing the development of which we ought to facilitate if we are giving the company a charter.

Mr. SPROULE. We are told that they have millions of tons of coal in that country. But is there good reason to provide now by the incorporation of a company for what may happen a hundred years hence, tieing up, in the meantime, valuable assets of the country in the interest of private corporations? I do not think there is.

Mr. S. SHARPE. If it would pay the railway company to develop and use the water-power, would it not pay the government to develop it, then let the railway come to the government for what power it needs? The government could sell to the railway company what they want and get a reasonable return on the capital, and they could supply any municipality or others at favourable rates.

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend (Mr. S. Sharpe) is opening up a very broad question of government ownership. I would not like to say that it would not be wise for the government to do it, but I do not think the country is, at the present moment, prepared to approve of the government going into a large scheme of developing water-powers all over the country.

On section 11:

11. The company may purchase, lease, or otherwise acquire, hold, enjoy and manage such lands, water-lots, wharfs, docks, dockyards, slips, warehouses, elevators, offices and other buildings as it finds necessary and convenient for its purpose, and may construct any of such works or buildings, and sell or otherwise dispose thereof for the purposes of the company, and may carry on the business of warehousemen and wharfingers, and charge wharfage and other dues for the use of any such property, and may enter into any agreements with any such company respecting the use of any of the property of such company.

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend from North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) has placed in my hands an amendment which he has asked me to suggest to the committee. The amendment is to strike out the words after the word 'property' in the third line from the bottom, and insert the words, 'but no such wharfage or other dues shall be charged or taken until they have been approved of by the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada, who may also revise such wharfage and other dues from time to time.' I think that is a very good provision.

Mr. S. SHARPE. I would ask the minister whether, in this section, the words ' or otherwise acquired ' would cover acquisition by expropriation?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, that would mean by purchase, lease or otherwise acquired. It must be by some voluntary arrangement. It would not give power to expropriate.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I am not prepared offhand to say that this amendment would be in order, as rule 111 provides that it must have one day's notice.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I would not press it unless it had the unanimous approval of the committee. But it is limiting the powers of the company, it is making a charge of wharfage and other dues subject to the approval of the Railway Commission. I submit the amendment revised as follows:

But no such wharfage or other dues shall be charged or taken until they have been approved by the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada, who may also revise such wharfage and other dues from time to time.

Mr. SPROULE. It seems to me there is an anomaly here. Nearly all wharfage dues imposed by the government are imposed through the Marine and Fisheries Department, but we are transferring them now to the Railway Commission.

Mr. PUGSLEY. These are dues upon a private wharf owned by a railway company. But the wharf would be owned in connection with terminal railway facilities, and it seems appropriate that the Railway Commission should have charge of these dues.

Mr. SPROULE. There will probably be a mix-up. You can imagine that this railway reaches several towns where there is much shipping, and private wharfs exist alongside the company's wharf. In one case control of rates would be vested in the Marine and Fisheries Department, and in the other case in the Railway Commission.

On section 13,

Mr. S. SHARPE. I understand this section in connection with section 4 will give them no right to sell to the municipality without a by-law on the part of the municipality.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is clear.

Mr. S. SHARPE. Later on, by the amendment, it gives them express power to sell and distribute in a municipality.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That will be subject to the provisions of section 247.

Mr. S. SHARPE. I doubt whether it goes that far. In the general clause at the beginning of the section, we make it subject to section 247 of the Railway Act, and then, apparently contradicting that, we give them power to sell and distribute to the municipality.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Suppose we put in the seventh line on page 3 the words 'may subject to the like provisions'?

Mr. S. SHARPE. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. Subclause 8 of section 247 of the Railway Act has this provision:

Nothing contained in this section shall be deemed to authorize the company to exercise the powers therein mentioned for the purpose of selling or distributing light, heat, power or electricity in cities, towns or villages, without the company having first obtained consent therefor by a by-law of the municipality.

That requires them to get a by-law of consent from the municipality?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes. I would move:

That immediately after the word 'may' where it occurs in line 7, on page 3, there shall be inserted the words 'subject also to the provisions of said section 247 of the Railway Act'.

Mr. SPROULE. If they get this power subject to that section, and having regard to the subsection that I have just read providing that they may sell power after getting the authority of the municipality, would they not then have the power to sell without coming under the clause which provides that the Board of Railway Commissioners may approve of the tariff?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, the last clause covers that. There is a double security. There is the consent of the municipality under section 247 of the Railway Act, and then the rates must be approved by the Board of Railway Commissioners under the last clause.

Amendment (Mr. Pugsley) agreed to.

On section 16, issue of securities other than railway.

Mr. S. SHARPE. Should not the Minister of Public Works or some other responsible minister have some supervision over the amount of the securities to be issued under section 16? Suppose the company acquired a water-power, they could issue bonds away beyond what is necessary to construct a dam or other works, and then when they came to fix the rates the Railway Commission would not have in mind the cost of the construction so much as the amount of capitalization. The company would want a revenue upon the amount of the capitalization, and not upon the cost of construction.

Mr. CONMEE. The board is not bound to do that.

Mr. S. SHARPE. I know, but they always look at that for stock is transferred to widows and orphans, and the protection of vested rights comes in, and they say that we must give an income on the amount of capitalization, and not on the cost of construction.

Mr. PUGSLEY. There is a great deal in what my hon. friend says, but the objection to doing that is that you would have the Minister of Public Works certifying to the value of the property, investors would rely upon the certificate of a responsible officer of the government that the value would fairly represent their security, and it might do more harm than good. The investor usually looks out as to these things where the securities are issued upon floating property. They are simply upon the security of vessels, and other works which may be undertaken.

Mr. S. SHARPE. They would include water-powers.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think it would be better to leave it to the investor.

Mr. S. SHARPE. We limit the amount of securities that may be issued with respect to the railway. Why not with respect to the other works of the company?

Mr. PUGSLEY. In regard to the railway you limit it to so much per mile, but I have never known it to be limited in cases where railway companies are authorized to build steamers or other works. You cannot say that a company should not issue beyond $200,000 or $300,000, and if you say they cannot issue bonds beyond their value it means that the Minister of Public Works fixes the value and makes these bonds good. The idea is given to the public by the issue of a certificate of a reponsible officer of the government that the value is equal to the amount of the securities issued. If investors, relying upon that certificate instead of making an examination for themselves, were to suffer loss they would feel that the government had done them a very great wrong, and I think it would be very objectionable to attempt to make any provision in regard to that rather than to leave it to the investor to make the examination for himself.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

At six o'clock committee took recess.

After Recess.

Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

ST. LAWRENCE POWER TRANSMISSION COMPANY.

House in committee on Bill (No. 115) to incorporate the St. Lawrence Power Transmission Company Limited.—Mr. Pardee.

Mr. S. SHARPE. This Bill has many objectionable features even with all the amendments made to it in the Private Bills Committee. In its original form it had many objectionable provisions, some of which were removed after many days' discussion in the committee. When the Bill came up for discussion in the Private Bills Committee, I moved that it be referred to the Committee on the Conservation of the National Resources of Canada for report. The promoters naturally objected and asked, in somewhat querulous tones, what the Conservation Commission had to do with a transmission line? On a division, however, the Bill was referred to the commission and we had a report from the chairman. In that report he objected to 9 clauses out of 19. I have his letter here, which I think ought to be placed on 'Hansard'.

Referring to the letter of your clerk on the subject of Bill (No. 115), I beg to state that the Bill has been examined as carefully as time and information permits.

The St. Lawrence Power Company is at present seeking authority to develop a power scheme by damming the St. Lawrence river at Long Sault. This project is being opposed by the Commission of Conservation for reasons, some of which have already been made public.

An examination of Bill (No. 115) indicates clearly that the introduction of this Bill is a portion of the St. Lawrence Power Company's plans. It is to be noted that the president of the power company and one of its engineers are the first named among the proposed incorporators, and the powers asked for are of an unusual and very sweeping character.

The passage of the Bill as it stands would give parliamentary sanction to an important portion of the St. Lawrence Power Company's proposals, and would complicate the situation unnecessarily.

On the other hand it is urged that some of the towns affected, particularly Prescott and Brockville, are without a supply of power, and that a transmission line is necessary in their interest. There does not appear to be any reason why authority for the construction of a transmission line, simply, should not be given, and if Bill (No. 115) were for such a purpose alone there could be no serious objection to it.

Your particular attention is drawn to sections 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13 and 14 as being objectionable, on account of the large and unnecessary powers asked for. These clauses apparently contemplate monopolization of powers on a very large scale. It is to be noted also that there are no provisions in the Bill protecting the municipalities in regard to the use of streets or roads, nor anything requiring the company to acquire or pay for a right of way. Difficulty has already arisen in regard to this latter point in other cases, and it requires to be specifically provided for.

Under these circumstances it is recommended—

First, That sections 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13 and 14 be struck out, and that, in lieu thereof, there be substituted proper provisions giving authority for the construction of a transmission line, and for power to buy, transmit and sell power within Canada.

Second, That a clause be added declaring that the Act shall come into force only on proclamation of the Governor General in Council and upon such conditions as the Governor General in Council may by order provide, such conditions to be read as forming part of the Act.

The latter provisions will place upon the Governor in Council the responsibility of seeing that the Act is not made use of except for the purpose for which it is properly intended, and to protect the municipalities concerned.

Part of the objections raised by the chairman were removed by the Committee on Private Bills, but a great many of the objectionable features still remain. As the chairman of the Conservation Commission says, this Bill is merely a part of a much larger scheme promoted by a number of very wealthy American gentlemen, who desire to get control of the St. Lawrence power proposition on the St. Lawrence river. One significant fact was that the promoters would not say where they purposed getting their power. But the engineer and the chief promoters of this measure are applying for permission to dam the St. Lawrence, so that that is where they purpose getting their power. Another very great objection is the fact that this is a private Bill, promoted for commercial purposes and private gain, and contains some very large expropriation powers. This is a vicious principle to introduce into private legislation. What some member of the committee desired was that the promoters should specifically mention the clauses of the Railway Act they desire to apply to their company; but instead of doing this, they make the general provisions of the Railway Act apply where it suits them. But, instead, of that, they made the general provisions of the Railway Act apply to the company where applicable. These powers are very broad and general. By reason of the privileges and rights conferred upon them, they accept some of the provisions of the Railway Act and reject others. They accept such clauses as they think applicable to their enterprise and reject those detrimental to their interest and disadvantageous to the company. A company applying to parliament for a private charter to carry on a private enterprise of this kind ought to be made to declare specifically the powers they desire to have, instead of making the general Railway Act applicable to the enterprise.

Another great defect in this Bill is that under it the company may enter and expropriate the lands of the municipality and construct transmission lines upon them without the consent of the municipality. This question was raised last year under the Bill of the Ontario Michigan Power Company. It was amended by inserting the clause 10, which says:

> The company should not enter within the limits of any municipality with any transmission line or sell or distribute electrical or other power therein without the consent of such municipality expressed by by-law.

The promoters of the present Bill state that this provision is covered by section 247 of the Railway Act, but that clause merely provides that a company shall not sell or distribute electricity within a municipality except by the consent of a municipality. It does not prevent them from running transmission lines without the municipality's consent.

Mr. CARVELL. Do I understand the hon. gentleman (Mr. S. Sharpe) to say that, in his opinion, there should be a clause under which the company could not sell electricity within the municipalty without the consent of the municipality?

Mr. S. SHARPE. No, that is already provided by section 247 of the Railway Act.

Mr. SPROULE. If the company comes under that section?

Mr. S. SHARPE. Yes.

Mr. CARVELL. That is the expropriation section?

Mr. S. SHARPE. I refer to subsection 8 of section 247 of the Railway Act, which reads:

> Nothing contained in this section should be deemed to authorize the company to exercise the powers therein mentioned for the purpose of selling or distributing light, heat, power or electricity in cities, towns or villages, without the company having first obtained consent therefor by a by-law of the municipality.

This merely refers to the selling and distribution of electricity within a municipality, and has nothing to do with transmission lines. Under the Bill now under discussion the company can build their lines through any municipality by their powers of expropriation, without the consent of the municipality. Some of the municipalities which this company will traverse have already conferred rights on other companies to transmit electricity. If we grant the powers proposed in this Bill in its present shape, those powers will override the powers under that municipal by-law, and without the consent of the municipality this concern will be able to expropriate the works of the companies already doing business within the municipalities under by-law.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. And doing business under provincial charter.

Mr. S. SHARPE. Yes. Another great objection to the Bill is in connection with the question of provincial rights, a question which has repeatedly come before this House in connection with such Bills. If the province has an asset which this company desires to expropriate, it can expropriate under the powers proposed to be conferred. Mr. Lynch Staunton, counsel for the Ontario government, appeared before the Private Bills Committee on this subject, and I may say that there were very few members present at that committee, mainly for the reason, I suppose, that there was a meeting of the Railway Committee at the same time. I think that the rules of the House should provide that no two such important committees as railways and private Bills should sit at the same time. At the time that this Bill was being discussed before the Private Bills Committee, the energies of many hon. members were being directed against the Bill proposed by the hon. member for Thunder Bay and Rainy River (Mr. Conmee); that is, we had the spectacle of two private companies making—

Mr. LENNOX. Raids at the same time.

Mr. S. SHARPE. Yes, two raids at the same time, one in the Railway Committee and one in the Private Bills Committee; and both with respect to water-powers, which they sought to obtain through legislation in this parliament. It is quite reasonable that this Bill should be discussed in the light of the policy of the Hydro-Electric Commission of the Ontario government. We have heard much discussion of this policy. It was alluded to this afternoon by one hon. member, who, I am convinced, was not very familiar with the facts—who certainly did not speak by the book. He expressed a doubt that the policy of the Hydro-Electric Commission in Ontario had caused a reduction in the price of power. Everybody knows that the Hydro-Electric policy of the Ontario government has met with the absolute approval of both sides of the House in the local legislature. The present opposition in the legislature dare not challenge that policy—has never dared to challenge it. That policy has been submitted to many municipalities and has been carried by ten to one. The people are unanimous in its favour, except certain interests that are affected by it. Everybody knows that this policy is carried out on the plan of the maximum of service at the minimum of cost; and everybody knows that the private enterprises are carried on on exactly the opposite plan. Anything that will detract from the effectiveness of the Hydro-Electric Commission policy should not be encouraged by this parliament. The policy known as the Hydro-Electric has reference to every part of the province of Ontario. The commission, I understand, has laid out the province into several divisions, and has had its experts and engineers making reports on these divisions. I have here the fourth report, which is to be found on file in the library. It deals extensively, in a wise and comprehensive way, with this Ottawa and St. Lawrence district. Speaking of undeveloped locations—page 9—the report says:

Along the St. Lawrence river, which has no laterals in this part of Ontario, except a small stream at Gananoque, a peculiar situation has been created by the construction of the various ship canals.

These canals can be used to a limited extent as head races for power developments, but evidently extensive use is objectionable to the navigation interests, due to the creation of currents, and therefore no very extensive constructions of this type need be expected. The St. Lawrence has enormous potential water-powers, and the future outlook in this locality would seem to be in the nature of very extensive developments, possible only by placing dams in the main river, or else, as at Hoople Creek, near Cornwall, by means of an expensive head canal, circumventing and not interferring with the ship canals themselves.

It proceeds:

In general, it may be said that, with the exception of a small area, lying between the St. Lawrence and Ottawa rivers and east of Smith's Falls, the whole district covered by this report is bountifully supplied with water-powers capable of being developed for reasonable costs per horse-power.

Your commissioners, following the policy outlined in their earlier reports, have not thought it necessary to consider any but the more important undertakings, where electrical energy is being generated for power as well as lighting purposes, and transmitted some distance.

A partial list of plants in the district coming under this head are Andrewsville, Mattawa, Pembroke, Perth, Renfrew and Morrisburg. The St. Lawrence Power Company and the Hawkesbury Electric Light and Power Company have not furnished the necessary information asked for by your commissioners.

I will not delay by reading the full report, but it is exhaustive, and deals with water-powers and transmission lines in this particular district. I have a letter in my hand from a gentleman who is deeply interested in the success of the hydro-electric policy throughout Ontario. It is dated February 17, 1910, and reads as follows:

My Dear Sir,—I note that Bill (No. 115), to incorporate the St. Lawrence Power Transmission Company, Limited, has been referred to the commission. When the Bill comes before the commission for consideration, I desire that the commission should know that as early as 1906, the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario had the second and fourth reports on water-power prepared, copies of which are inclosed. The territory covered by these reports lies between Toronto and Brockville. Eleven municipalities in the teritory have asked for estimates and negotiated with the commission for a supply of power, and others are about to apply.

The object of the Hydro-Electric Power Commission is to supply power at cost to as many municipalities as possible, and the commission propose to provide a supply of power for all municipalities that can be advantageously served.

If the Bill is passed, the company would have authority to transmit power into a large section of the territory to be supplied by the commission, and a dual system of transmission lines would be the result. The commission has always considered that where municipalities are prepared to co-operate and so increase the demand for power from one source that a dual system is a hindrance to municipalities in the working out of their plans, and such a system should not be encouraged.

I shall be obliged if your commission will give the facts I have mentioned careful attention.

Yours faithfully,

Now the opposition that should be raised against this Bill is on the ground stated in that letter that it is a duplicate of those transmission lines.

An hon. MEMBER. Who is the writer of the letter?

Mr. S. SHARPE. The letter was written in confidence to myself, but I will show it to the hon. gentleman if he wishes to see it. As I was saying, the great objection the writer of this letter has to the Bill is the fact that it is duplicating these transmission lines. They have made a report which covers this very territory. If this transmission line is run along this territory it means that there will have to be dual rates in order to maintain two lines. The commission has made a report upon this very territory, and has provided a plan whereby municipalities can be served, and all it requires co-operation on the part of the municipalities in order to call into operation the wise policy of the Hydro-Electric Commission.

Mr. ROBERT SMITH. What municipalities have offered to take this power from the Hydro-Electric Commission?

Mr. S. SHARPE. I am glad the hon. gentleman has asked the question, because it gives me an opportunity to read an interview in the Toronto 'Globe' given on March 2, 1910:

> Fight McGuigan Bill—Province to Combat proposed Federal Measure—Contractor for construction of Hydro-electric Line seeks Power Rights on the St. Lawrence—Commission to Develop the East.
> Ontario will oppose the Bill to be submitted to the Private Bills Committee of the House of Commons to-day to incorporate the St. Lawrence Power Transmission Company.
>
> The situation is interesting. Mr. F. H. McGuigan, contractor for the building of the Hydro-Electric Power transmission line, is the head of the gentlemen who seek incorporation. They desire to generate power from the St. Lawrence and transmit it to the United States, portions of the province of Quebec and the counties of Leeds, Grenville, Stormont and Glengarry in Ontario. The proposition is opposed on behalf of the province by the Hydro-Electric Commission. Mr. Geo. Lynch-Staunton, K.C., left for Ottawa last night to represent Ontario in opposition to this Bill, and the Long Sault project.
> In an interview with the 'Globe' last night Hon. Adam Beck pointed out that the McGuigan Bill was a menace to the successful working out of the government power policy, in eastern Ontario, in that its adoption would mean the establishment of a dual system of power supply with all the embarrassments that such a condition invariably entails.
> 'The purpose of the proposed company,' said the Minister of Power, 'is not to supply the small consumers or serve them for any distance. It looks for a home market and a sale in large quantities. The commission wants the power for distribution on the same plan as that adopted in the west. Our object is to supply power at cost to all municipalities that can be advantageously reached.'
>
> From eastern Ontario, towards which the attention of the commission is now being directed, applications for power have been received from Kingston, Belleville, Deseronto, Brockville, Oshawa, Cobourg, Bowmanville, Port Hope, Picton and Durham, while reports have been made for Prescott, Napanee, Peterborough, Madawaska, Almonte and Renfrew.
> 'If the proposed Bill is passed,' observed Hon. Mr. Beck, 'the company would have authority to transmit power into a large section of the territory to be supplied by the commission, and a dual system of transmission lines would be the result. The commission has always considered that where municipalities are prepared to co-operate and so increase the demand for power from one source, that a dual system is a hindrance to municipalities in the working out of their plans, and such a system should not be encouraged.'

That is an interview giving the opinion of the chairman of the Hydro-Electric Commission opposing this plan of dual transmission lines.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I did not hear the discussion in the Private Bills Committee. Did any of the municipalities the hon. gentleman has just enumerated, Belleville, Cornwall, Brockville, Kingston, Renfrew, make any opposition to this Bill?

Mr. S. SHARPE. I think they were represented by the hon. member for Dundas (Mr. Broder) and the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Reid), and they offered strong opposition to the Bill.

Mr. GUTHRIE. As municipalities?

Mr. S. SHARPE. I do not suppose that the municipalities knew that this Bill was coming before the Private Bills Committee, although I suppose it would be advertised in the usual way. But this interview states that several of these municipalities have made application to the commission to develop and transmit electricity to the various municipalities, and they were in negotiation with other municipalities. The Hydro-Electric Commission served this very territory through which this transmission line is proposed to be run.

Mr. ROBERT SMITH. When and how?

Mr. S. SHARPE. That might be a very pertinent question for the hon. gentleman to direct to the promoters of this Bill. When they proposed to build a transmission line they had already proposed to get the power. The same sources of power for this transmission line are available for the Hydro-Electric Commission. The commission have power to expropriate any power in Ontario situate within the province for the purpose of the municipalities, and if there is no power available for the Hydro-Electric Commission, there is no power available for the promoters of this Bill.

I think it is well that this House should show their appreciation of the gravity of the situation as far as the natural resources of the country are concerned. The time of this House is occupied with fighting these power Bills. We are only coming to a proper sense of appreciation of the value of these water-powers. An hon. gentleman this afternoon spoke about the fetish that we are worshipping with respect to these water-powers. It is only of late years that these powers have been utilized for the purpose of developing electricity, and we are only properly appreciating their value and that we should not alienate them without proper consideration. We have had companies incorporated year after year lately for the purpose of acquiring these water-powers. Great octopuses are reaching out and gathering in these powers before the people are coming to a proper sense of their value and utility. Private members are occupied more than half their time in framing objections and fighting the piratical propositions of these companies for the purpose of acquiring these water-powers. The discussion of a Bill that was proposed this afternoon is apropos to the discussion in reference to this Bill, inasmuch as the same point is involved, that the government should have some definite policy with reference to water-powers. They should have some definite policy in reference to the right to expropriate municipal lands or rights as well as provincial rights, and we should have some expression of opinion from the ministry in connection with these Bills. I think there should be some rule provided as to the propriety of the whip of either side of the House being sponsor for any private legislation, particularly when he enjoys the popularity that the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) enjoys on both sides of the House. We know that these private promoters have the faculty of ingratiating themselves in the good opinion first, of the whips, then of the other members, and we know with what facility the whips can always get the party in line. I think it would be wise that we should adopt some rule whereby the whip should not be the sponsor of any private Bill when it has for its purpose the taking away of provincial or municipal rights. In connection with this Bill this company seem to have unlimited finances behind them. It is stated in one of the Ottawa papers today that there are millions behind this proposition, and that this transmission line is merely a subsidiary undertaking in connection with the bigger scheme of damming the St. Lawrence river. They have practically taken advantage of every method to get both parties in line on this Bill. We had a prominent Reform lawyer before the Private Bills Committee advocating with great ability the many good features of this Bill, and, on the other hand, we had a Conservative lawyer advocating the splendid features of the Bill, in order to catch both sides of the House. Then we had the hon. member for West Lambton promoting this Bill and endeavouring to get it through notwithstanding that there was great opposition in the Private Bills Committee.

As far as I am personally concerned, I am opposed to the whole principle of the Bill, but I think the promoters should consent to two amendments in the public interest. One of the amendments was suggested by the chairman of the Conservation Commission. They did not adopt that suggestion. It had reference to clause 10, and it was suggested by the chairman of the Conservation Commission:

That a clause be added declaring that the Act shall come into force only on proclamation of the Governor General in Council and upon such conditions as the Governor General in Council may by order provide, such conditions to be read as forming part of the Act.

The object of that amendment is to throw the responsibility upon the Governor General in Council of adopting the principle of the Bill. If the Bill is not a good one, the Governor General in Council will not bring it into force by his proclamation, and if he brings it into force, he can annex such conditions to it as he sees fit. But the promoters of the Bill did not adopt that suggestion in toto. They made a pretense of adopting it. The Bill as finally agreed to by the Private Bills Committee reads as follows:

10. The powers conferred upon the company by this Act shall not be exercisable until the company has first submitted to the Governor in Council plans of such works, and has received his assent thereto.

There is a vital difference between the amendment as suggested by the chairman of the Conservation Commission and that adopted by the Private Bills Committee. Under the clause that was suggested by Mr. Sifton in his letter to the Private Bills Committee, the responsibility of adopting the principle of the Bill is thrown upon the Governor in Council, whereas the amendment merely throws the responsibility upon him of assenting to certain plans. One is a question of principle, the other is merely a question of routine. As a matter of fact, when the company get their charter and their plans are submitted to the Governor General in Council, he merely consents to the plan. It is merely a matter of administration or routine, whereas the amendment suggested by the chairman of the Conservation Commission throws the responsibility of adopting the principle upon the Governor General in Council.

Mr. CONMEE. Do I understand the hon. member to advocate that this House should delegate to the Governor General in Council the policy to be adopted in regard to a matter of this kind? That would seem to me to be a very peculiar policy to come from the opposition.

Mr. S. SHARPE. I would say in answer to the hon. member for Rainy River——

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. It comes from the chairman of the Conservation Commission.

Mr. S. SHARPE—that this House is going to be asked to place in the estimates $50,000 to be placed at the disposal of this Conservation Commission. We are spending $50,000 to ascertain the best means of conserving our natural resources. A member of the Private Bills Committee has no means of ascertaining the true facts in connection with the Bill and cannot possibly pass an intelligent opinion upon it, but when the matter is left to the Governor General in Council, he can obtain the advice of the Conservation Commission and of their expert engineers. The Conservation Commission and the Governor General in Council have money and engineers at their disposal, they can ascertain the true intent, meaning, purpose and objects of this company, and unless they are proper to be brought into operation, the provisions of the Bill need not be brought into operation, but the Governor General in Council has means at his command to ascertain these facts that a private member cannot possibly have.

Mr. CONMEE. The hon. member is willing to delegate all the powers of parliament, under such circumstances, to the Governor General in Council? I would like to have an answer to that point.

Mr. S. SHARPE. We are willing to incorporate the company, and if it is a proper company to be brought into operation upon the conditions being ascertained, the Governor General in Council should assume the responsibility of bringing it into existence.

Mr. CONMEE. I do not think the hon. member will get many to support that principle.

Mr. S. SHARPE. Another amendment which the promoters of this Bill should accept is in connection with the rights of municipalities:

The company shall not enter within the limits of any municipality with any transmission line, or sell or distribute electrical or other power therein without the consent of such municipality expressed by by-law.

That was inserted last year in my hon. friend's Bill, the Ontario and Michigan Power Company Bill.

Mr. CONMEE. That is already in the general law of Ontario, chapter 5 of the Statutes of 1909.

Mr. S. SHARPE. What has the Ontario legislature to do with this?

Mr. CONMEE. It has control over the municipalities and no company can distribute power in an Ontario municipality without its consent.

Mr. S. SHARPE. This is a transmission line.

Mr. CONMEE. That is how power is sold.

Mr. S. SHARPE. The hon. gentleman does not mean to say that the Ontario legislature can pass laws that will have superiority over the laws passed by this parliament?

Mr. CONMEE. No, I do not say that.

Mr. S. SHARPE. If this Bill is allowed to pass in its present shape it will override provincial legislation and will invade municipal and provincial rights without the consent of these municipalities. This Bill says too that the plans shall be approved by the Governor General in Council, but it makes no provision for their publication so that the municipalities will have notice that the plans are being submitted to the Governor in Council. In an important matter of this kind where a transmission line will affect municipal and provincial rights, as this does, the plans should be published in the local newspapers in the municipalities affected, and announcement should be made that the plans will be considered by the Governor in Council and that the different interests will be heard before they are finally approved by the railway board.

Another amendment which I would propose is in connection with the question of provincial rights. This amendment was suggested in the Private Bills Committee and voted down by the friends of the promoters:

Nothing in this Act contained shall be construed to authorize the company to enter on, take or use any land or water, the property of any province, without having first obtained by order in council of the Lieutenant Governor the consent of the province to such entry, taking or user.

That protects provincial rights and there should be a similar clause to protect municipal rights. Before the Private Bills Committee the representatives of Montreal protested vigorously——

Mr. M. MARTIN. And we are here again for that clause.

Mr. S. SHARPE. Because this Bill in its present form gives the company power to enter Montreal and expropriate a right of way without the consent of the city of Montreal. That is an extraordinary power to be contained in such a Bill and the representatives of Montreal were quite right to appear before the Private Bills Committee and oppose it in its present form. There should be a clause to protect not only the provinces but the municipalities as well.

If the preamble carries and the Bill is discussed I purpose moving one or two amendments and discussing it further but at the same time I desire to register my general opposition to the whole Bill. My main reason is that it is duplicating the very line the Hydro-Electric Commission purpose taking in connection with the wide and comprehensive policy the commission has adopted for transmitting power to the municipalities.

Mr. J. D. REID. When the Bill was before the Private Bills Committee the promoters made it a special point that this transmission line was to be constructed to furnish power to Prescott and Brockville. When it was before the Private Bills Committee I suggested that a clause should be inserted providing that work was to be commenced within one year from the time the Bill was passed and to be completed within three years. The Private Bills Committee, however, inserted clause 15, providing:

This Act shall go into force on a day to be named by proclamation of the Governor in Council.

Suppose we pass this Bill in its present shape, then they may not commence this transmission line for a number of years and this will prevent others from building a line and furnishing power to Prescott, Brockville and other municipalities.

An hon. MEMBER. Why?

Mr. J. D. REID. The very fact of our passing this Bill will prevent others from building a transmission line. I would ask the committee to change clause 15 and to make it read that they must commence work within one year. This line can be built in two or three months and I submit that it is not fair to tie up the power that could be supplied to Prescott and Brockville by other parties who have water-power.

Mr. CONMEE. How does it tie up the power, what clause in the Bill?

Mr. J. D. REID. In this way that this parliament grants another company power to build a transmission line. There is not sufficient power required at Prescott and Brockville to warrant two companies building transmission lines to supply that demand. If this company will agree to build a transmission line immediately and furnish power that is satisfactory to Prescott and Brockville; we want power at these places. The St. Lawrence Company at Cornwall have plenty of power, they have admitted that at the Private Bills Committee.

Mr. CARVELL. Does the hon. gentleman say that if the Bill is amended so that they shall commence the work within one year the opposition to the Bill will be withdrawn?

Mr. J. D. REID. So far as I am concerned, if they will agree to that my opposition is ended so far as that clause is concerned; but I also submit that the amendment suggested by Mr. S. Sharpe should be inserted, that is to protect provincial rights. The hon. member (Mr. Pardee) was quite willing in the Private Bills Committee to insert a clause that this company should not take property belonging to the municipality without the leave of the municipality.

Mr. PARDEE. No.

Mr. J. D. REID. That clause is in the Bill.

Mr. PARDEE. That is provided for in the Railway Act.

Mr. J. D. REID. If the hon. member (Mr. Pardee) is willing that this company shall not expropriate municipal property without the consent of the municipality why should he not insert a clause in the Bill that they shall not expropriate provincial property without the consent of the province?

Mr. PARDEE. Section 47, subsection 5, of the Railway Act absolutely protects the municipality.

Mr. J. D. REID. It protects the municipality, but not the province.

Mr. PARDEE. You do not agree with the member for Ontario (Mr. Sharpe), who said the municipalities were not protected.

Mr. J. D. REID. If the amendment of the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. Sharpe) is passed, and also an amendment that they shall commence within one year and complete within three years I shall be satisfied.

Mr. CARVELL. My hon. friend (Mr. Reid) objects to the Bill unless it provides that the construction shall be completed within a certain period, because otherwise, he says, other corporations may be prevented from giving a service to the people; and my hon. friend from North Ontario taking an opposite view does not want the Bill passed because he says it will be an interference with the plans of the Hydro-Electric Commission. Let these two gentlemen reconcile their divergent views. As I do not belong to the province of Ontario, I may be able to give an impartial opinion from the standpoint of an outsider. I cannot agree with the hon. member (Mr. Sharpe) as to the many benefits to be derived by the province of Ontario from the operations of the Hydro-Electric Commission. True, I have not made a careful study of the matter, but during the last ten years I have had considerable experience with water-powers, and I have yet to see a case wherein competition has made electricity dearer. I do not see what harm can come to the municipalities along the river St. Lawrence from having just as many transmission lines as possible, because I believe the result will be cheaper electricity to the people, and less profit to the company. In my province a man would be drummed out of public life who would do anything to prevent an electric company or a railway company from spending money, and placing these utilities within reach of the people. If the amendment of the hon. member (Mr. Sharpe) should be adopted the promoter of this Bill might as well fold up his papers and withdraw it. There is no use disguising the fact that the opposition to this Bill is being put up by the Hydro-Electric Commission or their friends. It is the same old bogie we meet whenever water-powers have been mentioned in this House for the last five or six years. Every time you talk water-power you will find this Hydro-Electric Commission objecting, and why? It is in order to maintain for themselves an absolute monopoly of all electric energy in the province of Ontario, and from that policy I dissent. I do not believe in monopolies by private individuals, corporations, or provincial governments, and I do not believe it is in the best interests of the people of Ontario that the Hydro-Electric Commission should have the monopoly of all electric energy.

Mr. S. SHARPE. Is the hon. member aware that the Hydro-Electric Commission constructs these lines and charges the municipalities with the mere cost of construction, plus a small sum? What objection can there be to monopoly in such a case as that?

Mr. CARVELL. Yes, and I have been told that the Hydro-Electric Commission makes the municipality pay for peak loads which they may only use once in a year.

Mr. J. D. REID. You are wrongly informed.

Mr. CARVELL. Not by any means, and they grant monopolies for thirty years in order to prevent any one else getting into the cities, and they pretend to sell horsepower for $25 when as a matter of fact the cost amounts to $60 or $70.

Mr. J. D. REID. That is not right.

Mr. CARVELL. Yes.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Just mention such a case

Mr. CARVELL. Wait a moment, my hon. friend from Westmorland had to call you down this afternoon. This commission pretends to sell electricity at a low rate, but that only means the charge for it at the substation outside the municipality, and then they have to pay their share of the cost of transmission lines, and the cost of transforming, and the cost of distribution, and the cost of different other things which sometimes amounts to $60, and $70 per horse-power.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Give an instance where the Hydro-Electric Commission stated they would furnish electricity for $25 per horse-power and charged $60 or $70.

Mr. CARVELL. The town of Stratford is one, and the town of Ingersoll is another.

An hon. MEMBER. And the town of Galt.

Mr. S. HUGHES. What does Stratford pay?

Mr. CARVELL. As near as I can figure it out, it is $60 or $75 per horse-power.

Mr. S. HUGHES. It is $29.

Mr. CARVELL. Oh yes, but that is only at the outside station. The hon. gentleman wants to get acquainted with this business. They have to pay for different other things which adds to the cost. To come back to the Bill—my hon. friend (Mr. Reid) is mistaken as to the Railway Act with reference to municipalities. The Railway Act does not provide that a municipality can by its mere ipse dixit refuse to allow an electric company to do business within its borders. Subsection 5 of section 24 provides that if the company cannot obtain the consent from a municipality, the company may apply to the board for leave to exercise the power, and upon such application it shall present a plan of the highway, square, or other public place, showing its powers in this territory, subject to whatever conditions they may consider fair. My hon. friend (Mr. Reid) will see that a municipality, under that Act, has not the absolute right to exclude an electric power company. But if the amendment of the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Sharpe) should be adopted, it would give the province of Ontario the absolute right to exclude this company from any portion of the public domain of that province; and we may assume that the province, exercising the policy to which it is committed at present, would absolutely prevent this undertaking from going on, and the whole thing would become a nullity.

Mr. J. D. REID. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to argue that this Bill would give this transmission line power, under the Railway Act, to enter a municipality and do business there in so far as the furnishing of electric light is concerned?

Mr. CARVELL. No. Under the Railway Act this company would have the right to go on the public streets or other places in a municipality with its consent; but if it could not make a satisfactory arrangement with the municipality, it would have the right to apply to the railway board, and that board would grant its application subject to conditions. The company is obliged to go to the municipality first, but if the municipality will not be reasonable, it can apply to the railway board which has authority to act. If, however, the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Sharpe) were adopted, the province of Ontario would have the right to absolutely forbid this company from crossing its property, and that would be the end of the whole transaction.

Mr. J. D. REID. I understood in the Private Bills Committee that the intention was that whenever this company desired to enter or pass through a municipality the municipality alone would have the power to grant or refuse permission, and I understood that the promoters of the Bill were willing to have it amended in that sense.

Mr. CARVELL. The question arose as to what right should be given the company to enter a municipality. It was thought that if the Bill were passed as drawn, in which section 247 of the Railway Act was to apply only where applicable, that possibly there might be lack of definiteness; upon the request of one of the members of the committee, who was opposed to the Bill, section 247 was made to refer specifically to the matter of crossing or going through a municipality.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I happened to be in the committee at the time, and had with me the Ontario and Michigan Power Company Act. Speaking to Mr. McCarthy, the solicitor for the company, I pointed out that there were provisions in that Act which were not to be found in the Bill in question. I pointed out particularly sections 9, 10 and 11 of the Ontario and Michigan Power Act, and Mr. McCarthy said the promoters of this Bill had no objection to this clause being put in it. The clauses I refer to are as follows:

> The company shall not enter within the limits of any municipality with any transmission line or sell or distribute electrical or other power therein without the consent of the said municipality expressed by by-law.

I understood that the promoters were willing to allow that clause to go into this Bill. Then there is this other clause:

> None of the powers conferred by this Act shall be exercised within the limits of Port Arthur or Fort William or any other city unless a by-law has been submitted to the qualified ratepayers and duly passed by them authorizing the exercising of such powers within the limits of the municipality.

That gives the municipality the absolute right to say whether or not even a transmission line shall go across it. My understanding was that a similar restriction would be put in the Bill before the House.

Mr. J. D. REID. That is exactly what I understood. I understood that this Bill would come down with that clause in it. That clause gives the municipality absolute power, and it is that which I want in this Bill, and I think the committee should agree to it. I cannot see why there should be any objection. If that be agreed to, in so far as municipalities are concerned, why not agree also to a similar clause with regard to provincial property. With those two clauses in and another providing that the company must commence constructing this transmission line within one year and complete it within three, the Bill would have my approval. There is another company which has already purchased the right of way and is prepared to go on with a transmission line this spring, and furnish power to those two municipalities. Should this Bill be passed, it may block the other Bill, because I do not think that at present there is a sufficient quantity of power required in those municipalities to call for more than one company can supply. I understood the promoter of the Bill to say that he was willing that clause 15 should be amended so that the company must begin work within one year and finish within three.

Mr. PARDEE. This Bill is in the same form as that in which it came from the committee, where it was absolutely satisfactory to all the members, even my hon. friend.

Mr. J. D. REID. No, it was not.

Mr. PARDEE. I think the hon. member for Ontario contended that what the terms of this Bill should be and when it should go into operation should be settled by the Governor in Council. Of course, that was an absolutely novel and unique proposition. It simply meant leaving to the Governor in Council the right to legislate absolutely for the whole House, and was a proposition utterly untenable. Consequently we put in clause 15 to provide that the Act should come into force on the day fixed in the proclamation of the Governor in Council, and that clause is to be read in conjunction with the one dealing with the plans and specifications. The clause relating to municipalities was struck out in committee, and it was agreed to by every member of the committee that section 247 of the Railway Act absolutely protected the municipalities. As regards municipal and provincial rights, which we hear so much of to-day, if you were to put a provision in the Bill such as hon. gentlemen opposite desire, you would put it into the hands of a province or a municipality to stop the construction of the work at any minute. Even if we were at our last link and putting up our last pole, the province or a municipality might prohibit our going a step further. Suppose this company had expended large sums of money and suppose, at the completion of that work, it were necessary to put a pole or wire along the bed of a stream, and the province were to refuse to give us that power, we would be absolutely out of court and might just as well have thrown our money into the deep sea. It is all very well to talk of provincial rights, but surely there are some Dominion rights. Surely we have the right to give companies which we incorporate the power to carry on the works we have authorized them to do.

Mr. BRODER. Would the hon. member give them the power to expropriate Dominion lands without the consent of the Dominion government?

Mr. PARDEE. We are discussing provincial lands, just now.

Mr. BRODER. That is a point I would like the hon. member to settle. They cannot, under this Bill, expropriate Dominion lands—

Mr. PARDEE. But put the converse question, and would it be fair the other way? Two wrongs do not make a right. It is the Dominion parliament that is doing this.

Mr. BRODER. Then my suggestion would be, either take away this right that was given them over provincial land, or give them the power over Dominion lands.

Mr. PARDEE. This parliament is asked to give rights within its jurisdiction. To say that before we give these rights that are within our jurisdiction we must go to the province and ask them if we may do so would be to render the granting of a charter here clearly ridiculous. So far as municipalities are concerned, they are absolutely protected under subsection 5 of section 247 which provides that if the company cannot obtain consent from the municipal council or other authority—which clearly shows that, in the first place they must go to the municipality to obtain that consent—then the Board of Railway Commissioners is empowered to step in and say under what conditions they shall come in with their line. Surely, the municipality is protected under that. It is also provided under subsection 8 that nothing contained in this section shall be deemed to authorize a company to exercise the powers conferred upon it for the purpose of selling or distributing light, heat, power or electricity in cities, towns or villages unless the company has first obtained the consent of the municipality by bylaw to that effect.

Mr. HUGHES. Could not they sell to some one who would step in and sell?

Mr. PARDEE. They cannot distribute without a by-law.

Mr. HUGHES. Yes, they can.

Mr. PARDEE. I think not.

Mr. HUGHES. I would remind the hon. member (Mr. Pardee) that in the London Bill the other day, we put in a special clause to cover that very point.

Mr. PARDEE. I think it was entirely surplusage—it merely cumbered the Bill. My hon. friend from North Ontario (Mr. S. Sharpe) talks about the gravity of the situation and about natural resources. Within the four corners of this Bill, waterpowers are not mentioned. This is nothing more, and it is nothing less than a transmission line, pure and simple. You say, this is part of a larger scheme. But this committee must recollect that, if the company incorporated by this Bill cannot get the power to distribute—and, as I understand it, they have to come to this parliament for that—then the whole Bill is absolutely of no use to them. How, then, can the public be prejudiced, how can any one's rights be interferred with by the granting of a charter for a transmission line alone? So far as the Hydro-Electric Commission is concerned, it is very well to say that for six or seven years they have been contemplating coming in. I venture to say that, so far as the municipalities affected by this Bill are concerned, you will not find one man in fifty—not one man in a hundred—who, if there is a chance of having power transmitted by a bona fide company, will not hold up both hands for it. No municipality would think for a moment of getting in the road of competition in the distribution of electrical power, the same as competition in anything else. There is no reason why the Hydro-Electric Power Commission should be in a position to say to the people of this eastern portion of the province that they will come or stay away as they please, but that, in the meantime, even though a bona fide company comes and proposes to distribute the power this parliament shall not grant the necessary authority. As to this argument of a dual system why it answers itself. Whether dual, treble or quadruple

—the more competition you have the better for the people. I submit that, so far as the argument against this Bill is concerned, my hon. friend from North Ontario (Mr. S. Sharpe) and my hon. friend from Grenville (Mr. J. D. Reid) in their endeavour to find objection, in their supersensitiveness to objections, have really bumped into each other. This Bill was objected to as vigorously as possible in committee.

My hon. friend from North Ontario told us, to use his own terms, that the Conservation Commission would protect the rights of the people. The Bill went to the Conservation Commission; we had no objection to that. It came back with a letter, which the hon. gentleman has read, from the chairman of that commission. And the hon. member (Mr. S. Sharpe) himself says that with one exception, the provisions of the Bill were cut out. It is true, nearly the whole Bill was cut out. But we felt that, if the Conservation Commission thought these clauses should come out—that there was danger, that there was something lurking here not visible to the naked eye—we would take out these provisions. And we did take them out, down to the last suggestion in the letter of Mr. Sifton, the chairman of that commission. Surely, we have gone as far as it is possible to go. Every objection has been met, and every right safeguarded. The promoters of this Bill are asking nothing in the way of waterpower, they are not touching the natural resources of Ontario, they are here simply asking for a transmission line to run through certain counties and cities, And if they get the current to transmit, well and good, if not, so far as I can see, it is absolutely their own lookout.

Mr. EMMERSON. I desire to say a word here, largely for the purpose of securing information. I have not followed the Bill; I was not a member of the committee before which it was heard and considered. But I had supposed that this Bill was a preliminary to some other Bill that might, within the very near future, be brought under the consideration of this House. That is, I had supposed that this parliament would have under consideration at this session a Bill which would be a counterpart of a Bill passed by the legislature of the state of New York. Now, what I wish to know is this: Is it not within the knowledge of some hon. members of this committee that the authority to dam the St. Lawrence is at this moment held by a company, which company is associated with this power transmission company?

Mr. J. D. REID. Same crowd.

Mr. EMMERSON. As I understand it, some time in the nineties, a company was incorporated by the parliament of Canada with power to dam the St. Lawrence, and that this company did exercise its powers in part. They have built a dam, and have generated power, and the Cornwall canal, and other establishments in that vicinity are to-day enjoying, I believe, the benefits accruing therefrom. We have heard, in times past, in this parliament a great deal of discussion with respect to that company, and concerning contracts entered into between them and the government of Canada. And, if I understand it, that company is a part and parcel of this company, and that the danger in connection with this Bill is because the parliament of Canada has already given the powers to generate electrical energy by damming the St. Lawrence, and that the original company has since changed hands. That company, I understand, did not have the powers necessary for the transmission of the energy in many directions. Therefore it is they come here for these large powers which they consider requisite and in connection with which they will exercise the powers already given by this parliament. The point to which I would invite your attention in this debate is this: I have in my hands a copy of the Bill passed by the New York state legislature, and when we know that in giving these powers to a company having the same purpose in view they insisted upon that company only exercising that power for a consideration, I wonder why it is that the parliament of Canada is willing to grant this stupendous franchise for nothing. You say that is not involved in this Bill. I say that it is, because if there is any ground for suspicion that this privilege is to be exercised in conjunction with a company that we incorporated years ago in this parliament, it is time this parliament should halt and inquire how far the powers which we then gave to that original company are to be exercised. That great American company, in the exercise of their powers must pay into the state of New York a large sum of money annually. The very first tax upon them is $10,000. The purpose of the Bill is thus set forth:

An Act to incorporate the Long Sault Development Company, and to authorize said company to construct and maintain dams, canals, power-houses and locks at or near the Long Sault island for the purpose of improving the navigation of the St. Lawrence river and developing power from the waters thereof, and to construct and maintain a bridge, and carry on the manufacture of commodities.

Now that is the company which is incorporated by the state of New York. It can exercise all the powers and rights that they wish in connection with that portion of the River St. Lawrence which flows over American territory. They could not come over across the boundary line into the Canadian waters of that river, and therefore it was necessary for them to secure the same powers in this parliament. I apprehend that they soon discovered that there was a company that had all the powers that were necessary and that were granted at a time when the full exercise of those powers was not realized. Now, as hon. members who live down in that section will know much better than I do, there has been a dam constructed by that company on the Canadian side. If they will refer to the original Act they will find that company has powers which are still unexercised and which may be exercised in connection with other dams. For instance, they have a power—I am now speaking subject to correction, because I have not studied the Bill—they have power to construct a dam in connection with this company which has been incorporated by the state of New York. A company incorporated a few years ago by this parliament has the power to build in conjunction with the American company a dam for its purposes on the St. Lawrence river.

Mr. ROBERT SMITH. They have no such power.

Mr. EMMERSON. I am informed they have. I am informed that those powers have been granted by this parliament. If that is a fact, I cannot vote for this Bill, because I see lurking in it a menace to Canadian interests. If, however, it can be shown to me that this is merely a transmission line for power that may be generated under the authority which they are yet to secure from this parliament or some other legislative body then I would not have any great objection to this Bill.

Mr. PARDEE. They only have the right to import, not to export, even suppose they had those powers he speaks of.

Mr. J. D. REID. I see no advantage in it.

Mr. EMMERSON. My hon. friend misapprehends my point. Not with respect to expropriation, because that is regulated; even though they had the power, I understand that could be regulated. If the parliament of Canada can realize that they had granted powers which they did not contemplate would be exercised in the way that it is now proposed to exercise them, then it is time for us to consider how far we should supplement the powers which we have already given to a company which controls the rights which were granted by the parliament of Canada twenty years ago.

An hon. MEMBER. How does this Bill affect that?

Mr. EMMERSON. If that company got certain powers by that original Act to dam the St. Lawrence, but has no power of transmission in Canada and cannot exercise that power without our supplementing it, and giving through the medium of this Act advantages and franchises which are of value, then we can well understand why they are coming here now and seeking these privileges. Therefore I say that this parliament should hesitate, they should at least enact this legislation with their eyes open. If it were true, and could be demonstrated to parliament that, without realizing the full extent of the powers which they gave in the Bill of 1901—I think that was the year.

Mr. S. SHARPE. The hon. member for West Lambton would be able to tell us what the date was.

Mr. PARDEE. About 1894.

Mr. CARVELL. It must be ten years ago. There must be some limitation to it.

Mr. EMMERSON. They have exercised their rights and they have built a dam.

Mr. PARDEE. There is no dam there.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman may be confusing that with the contract that was given to M. P. Davis and Company, for all the surplus power of the Cornwall canal for 84 years, and which was entered into about 1896. There was a renewal when the present government came into power. It was for 21 years, and it was renewed for four times, and although he had control of that power he could not distribute it without the power to construct a distribution line. It may be in connection with that, although there is another power company in addition to that.

Mr. EMMERSON. There is another power company in addition to that, a dam was built, the company is in existence to-day, and I am informed that it is controlled by this great American syndicate that have acquired permission from the legislature of New York state, and are now seeking powers from this parliament to enable them to complete their great scheme of controlling the powers of the St. Lawrence river in connection with the Long Sault dams. If these facts are true, surely we, as a parliament, should have respect enough for ourselves to hold our powers in as high esteem as the legislature of the state of New York place upon the powers that they have to grant. When the scheme is consummated, and when they construct these dams and create these powers what will be the result? The state of New York will be receiving annually a very large sum of money from the company. The province of Ontario and the Dominion of Canada will not get one cent —no, they will not even get 'thank you' for it. This company of American capitalists will simply laugh at the parliament of Canada for being so guileless as to grant these powers without a thought as to the full effect and force of the powers that they have thus granted. That is the point I raise and it seems to me we should hesitate in a matter of this kind and at least learn as to whether there is a basis for these statements which are openly made. I had heard of opposition to this measure. I had read in the Toronto papers and the papers of Canada generally of the opposition to this transmission power Bill. I could not understand why there should be such serious objection to the incorporation of a company of this character for the purpose of transmitting power. If they had no power to transmit they would have to purchase it from somebody else. But that did not involve interference with the waters of the St. Lawrence. It in no way affected anybody's rights to transmit this power. They had to acquire it, they had to purchase it from somebody and distribute it. I therefore assumed that the objection to the Bill arose from the fact that there was in contemplation an application to the parliament of Canada along the lines of the successful application that was made to the state legislature of New York for a consideration, and that the applicants would be here seeking the powers which were given to their sister corporation in the state of New York.

Mr. JAMESON. In what year was the power given by the legislature of New York state?

Mr. EMMERSON. Several years ago. Reference can be had to it in the statutes, but I have a typewritten memorandum in regard to it

Mr. BRODER. Are these the people that propose to construct a dam at the Long Sault?

Mr. EMMERSON. At the Long Sault, I did not think that this transmission Bill was a dangerous Bill until information came to me from a reliable source. I was not interested, I am not now in any way interested in the matter only as a member of this committee, and therefore I have no connection with it. But information came to me to the effect that this transmission power company had rights in connection with the St. Lawrence under powers that were granted to a former company, a company which they now control, and which will be incorporated as part of their scheme in connection with this transmission power company, should they secure legislation from the parliament of Canada. If there is any truth in it, if there is any basis of foundation for these statements, then I say that it would be the duty of every Canadian to say: No, we will not grant to you gentlemen these powers that you want; we, it is true, granted to you certain powers in connection with the building of dams on the St. Lawrence, but we did not contemplate that anything of this kind would take place; we did not contemplate, when we gave you these powers, that it would result in interference with the navigation of the St. Lawrence, which will be effected as a national scheme; we did not take that into consideration; you have all these powers given to you for this purpose that are no good to you unless you get this supplementary legislation that you are coming here and asking for; it is true that we might impose upon you terms such as the New York state legislature imposed upon you, but we are going to hesitate to grant you any of these powers until at least a full and complete understanding is had with respect to the objects that you have in view, what your purposes are, how far you propose to interfere with that international stream, and how far you propose to affect Canada in relation to her position as a co-user of the waters of the St. Lawrence. These are matters of supreme moment, these are matters which the government of Canada certainly should take into consideration before this Bill takes many steps forward in this parliament. If there is nothing in what I am stating, if these statements that are made by men of responsibility, are not true, then, of course, it is only a question of the incorporation of a transmission power company which is stated to have been properly safeguarded by the committee. But I think it goes further, and I think that lurking about it is a something that shows, when there is so much interest in it, and when there are so many great American capitalists interested in it, that this Bill is worthy of inquiry on the part of parliament, that this parliament should hesitate before taking a leap in the dark, before committing itself to the disposal of powers that will be used to the advantage of a foreign country and to the detriment of our own.

Mr. BRODER. I wish to make a few remarks in reference to this Bill. There has been a good deal said about the Hydro-Electric Commission of Ontario. The hon. member for Carleton, New Brunswick (Mr. Carvell) seems to know just what they are charging here, there and everywhere. He must have got his inspiration from the hon. member for Rainy River. That hon. gentleman has locked horns with that commission in Port Arthur, and I think he came out of the struggle with the horns off. The people there had a chance to pronounce on his scheme in connection with the Ontario and Michigan Power Company and the Hydro-Electric Commission. Port Arthur pronounced against him, and defeated every candidate he put up in January to try and further his interests. The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) is not a good judge of matters in Ontario. His information has come from the hon. member for Rainy River (Mr. Conmee), and he is prejudiced against the commission.

I cannot understand how hon. gentlemen opposite pretend to say that this company which they are proposing to incorporate shall have powers paramount to the powers of the province of Ontario or any other province. Why should they give a body corporate, composed of a few individuals whom they may not know at all, a preference over the property of the province and leave the province nothing to say about it at all? The hon. gentleman referred to the fact that New York state had legislated in regard to the damming of the Long Sault. While the state of New York has legislated, it is also necessary for the federal authorities of the United States to legislate before the river can be dammed there. But while they respect state rights on the other side, and the federal authorities say to the state: You must first legislate, and we must then give concurrent legislation, hon. gentlemen opposite will ride rough shod over the rights of the province and not allow a word to be said. There is the difference between the two countries. The province of Ontario should have something to say in regard to this, and should be free to say that some fee shall be charged for that water. What is the policy in regard to water-powers in Ontario, where the province has control? The provincial authorities say to the individual who wants a water-power: Yes, you can have a lease of that water-power for so much rent a year; that rent will start at once, and unless you develop within a certain time your lease will be cancelled. That is why hon. gentlemen come here to get Bills granting water-powers; they want to get away from the laws of the province of Ontario which protect the peoples' rights.

Every one knows that this Bill is simply the forerunner of something bigger, and every one who saw the Bill when it was first submitted to the Private Bills Committee, realizes that this company propose to ride rough-shod over the peoples' rights to this extent that they did not intend to respect those rights if they could get the power to override them. They proposed to go right across the territory represented by a few of us who strenuously opposed the measure, to cut down trees, dig ditches or conduits, put in poles without consulting the people. So we have a perfect right to look with some apprehension on this legislation. There is no doubt it is part of a bigger scheme. They talk about the great public interests. Look at the company having control at Milles Roches. There has been a development there, and they get $63,000 a year for lighting the canals and running the gates for this government. The peoples' rights are very much respected by these gentlemen. At Milles Roches, a village two miles from the power-house, I am told the people are paying 40 cents a month for a 16-candle power light, that is $4.80 a year. In my little village, where the people own the plant, we get a 16-candle power light for $1 flat rate. We have a right to look into this matter and to attempt to protect the peoples' rights. It is all very well for the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) to talk about the Hydro-Electric Commission. Does any one dispute the statement that they have caused the price of power all over the province to be decreased owing to their policy? If there is a reason for the power costing less under that commission, it is because of the overhead charges. If several municipalities apply to the commission and put up the transmission line in common, it means that the power will cost less than under other circumstances.

Mr. CARVELL. Then you force every one to come under the Hydro-Electric Commission and make it a monopoly?

Mr. BRODER. You are making it much dearer. I think the province should have a right to say whether these people shall be permitted to put up poles or towers on property of the province. Subsection 4 of section 11 provides:

> Wherever in the Railway Act the word 'land' occurs, it shall include any privilege or easement required by the company for constructing or operating the works authorized by this Act, under, over or along any land, without the necessity of acquiring a title in fee simple.

Is that a fair thing, to say that these people shall run their lines over head over any man's premises without being obliged to buy the right of way?

Mr. PARDEE. Read subsection 6 of that clause.

Mr. BRODER. That does not overrride this.

Mr. PARDEE. Yes it does.

Mr. BRODER. Then we might strike out clause 4. There have been lawsuits in Montreal with the Power, Heat and Light Company to determine this matter. There should be no doubt as to the rights of individuals over whose lands they pass. The ordinary man in the country cannot go to law with a great corporation with millions behind it. For that reason, it seems to me it should be made so plain that there would be no doubt as to the rights of the company so far as these matters are concerned. If a motion is not moved by some one else, I shall propose one later that will amend clause 12. It seems to me that the right of the provinces in respect to property under their control should be protected.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I merely wish to enter my earnest protest against the Bill passing in its present form. It certainly interferes with provincial and municipal rights, and the Hydro-Electric Commission are opposed to it. The chairman of the Conservation Commission has been utterly opposed to it, and very few of the clauses which the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) gave us to understand were struck out in compliance with that request seem to have been struck out. In the Hydro-Electric Power Commission's report No. 4, on page 21, will be found a table of estimated annual charges, on fully developed generating plants in the very same towns through which these lines are liable to pass.

Transmission of Power.

In connection with the hydraulic developments in the Ottawa Vallay and that portion of the province bordering on the St. Lawrence river, four transmission schemes have been considered, viz., one, 20,000 volts, three phase, from Iroquois through Prescott to Brockville; one, 30,000 volts, three phase (scheme A), from High Falls through Perth and Smiths Falls to Brockville, Prescott and Carleton Place; one, 20,000 volts, three phase (scheme B), from High Falls through Perth and Smiths Falls, terminating at Carleton Place; one, 20,000 volts, three phase, from Fountain Falls through the Cobalt mining district, terminating at Haileybury.

In the following estimates, the use of high class wooden poles with concrete bases is assumed, the telephone line being mounted on the same poles.

It gives a thorough estimate of the cost of the line. The commission has at present under consideration a proposition similar to that contained in the Bill which it is sought to force through the House. The member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) in his wisdom, told the people of Ontario what they should do about this matter, and he said the town of Galt would have to pay $5 per horse-power. If you will turn to the first report of the Hydro-Electric Commission you will find that the cost of twenty-four horse-power in the town of Galt for the full load would only be $17.35, for three-quarters load $17.79, and for half load $19.90. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Carvell) also said that the town of Stratford would have to pay $75 per horse-power, and no doubt he was prompted to say these things by some of his friends on the other side, because you will not find many men in Ontario who will get up to condemn the action of the Hydro-Electric Commission, and their splendid administration of their affairs. Now, in Stratford the cost of twenty-four horse-power for a full load is $20.48, for a three-quarters load $21.41, and for half a load $24.04. The above cost of power is based on the estimated rate of $12 per twenty-four horse-power per annum for high tension power at Niagara Falls. I call the attention of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Carvell) to these facts just to show that his statement is absurd.

Mr. CARVELL. Is the Hydro-Electric Commission selling a single horse-power at Stratford at the prices quoted by the hon. gentleman?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. The hon. gentleman knows they are not in a position to sell power up to the present time, but that is a carefully prepared estimate by expert engineers of the cost at which these different municipalities will be supplied, and on which they have accepted the building of a transmission line. The hon. member for Westmorland stated that he had in his possession a Bill which was passed by the New York legislature showing that they had absolute control of water-powers in that state, and along the boundary line. Why should the people in the province of Ontario be interfered with in this regard and why should they not expect that a reasonable amount of money should be collected from these transmission lines. I quote from 'Hansard' the speech of the hon. member for Westmorland:

I have received, on an application which I made some weeks ago, a copy of a Bill passed by the legislature of the state of New York, being 'an Act to incorporate the Long Sault Development Company, and to authorize said company to construct and maintain dams, canals, power-houses and locks at or near Long Sault island, for the purpose of improving the navigation of the St. Lawrence river and developing power from the waters thereof, and to construct and maintain a bridge and carry on the manufacture of commodities.' Having a copy of that Bill in my hand, I will call the attention of the committee to this fact, that in the very inception the company is required 'to pay into the treasury of the state the fixed sum of $10,000, and in addition to the payment just mentioned, the company shall pay into the treasury of the state for the year 1910 the fixed sum of $15,000, and for the year 1911 the fixed sum of $20,000. For each year after 1911 the said corporation shall pay at the following rates upon the average amount of electrical horse-power generated during such year under the authority of this Act, that is to say: upon all amounts up to 25,000 electrical horse-power, at the rate of 75 cents per horse-power; upon all amounts in excess of 25,000 electrical horse-power and up to 100,000 horse-power, at the rate of 50 cents per horse-power; upon all amounts in excess of 100,000 electrical horse-power, at the rate of 25 cents per horse-power. In case said corporation shall generate or develop water-power as mechanical power without transmuting the same into electrical power, then for so much of said water-power as may be developed payments shall be made at the above mentioned rates per mechanical horse-power.'

Well, that is a practical common sense business arrangement, and the province of Ontario is perfectly justified in claiming, so far as the transmission of power to that section of the country is concerned, that they should have something to say in regard to what they would like to collect from that company, and, how they would like to control the transmission of power in that district. I shall certainly vote against the Bill as it is at present framed.

Mr. S. SHARPE. I beg to inform the hon. member for Carleton, N.B., (Mr. Carvell) that the estimates that have been quoted by my hon. friend (Mr. Armstrong) were carefully prepared by the engineers of the Hydro-Electric Commission, and since then contracts have been let by the Hydro-Electric Commission, and it is found that they will be able to supply these municipalities with power at a cost much less than that estimated by the engineers. I have here the St. Lawrence Power Company's Act of incorporation, 1901, and I call the attention of the hon. member (Mr. Emmerson) to this clause:

The company may—

(a) manufacture, use, supply and dispose of electricity, water and gas, and water, hydraulic or other power by means of wires, cables, pipes, conduits, machinery or other appliances; and construct, maintain and operate works for the production, sale and distribution thereof, and for the purposes aforesaid may construct, acquire, use, maintain and operate canals, water courses, raceways and water-powers in or adjacent to the St. Lawrence river, on the north side thereof, at any points eastward from Hoople's creek, in the county of Stormont, in the province of Ontario, to the eastern end of the Soulanges canal, and construct dams, wing-dams, sluices, conduits and buildings in connection therewith: provided that the works hereby authorized shall not be commenced until the plans thereof have first been submitted to and approved by the Governor in Council;

(b) acquire patent rights, letters patent of invention, processes, options and other rights and privileges and again dispose thereof;

(c) manufacture, acquire and dispose of pulpwood, pulp or the products thereof;

(d) manufacture and sell calcium carbide and all products produced in its manufacture; acetylene gas and other gases and products manufactured from calcium carbide;

(e) manufacture and deal in all minerals and the by-products thereof; construct furnaces, ovens and retorts for the reduction of such minerals;

(f) construct tramways, wharfs, docks, offices and all necessary buildings, and purchase, hire, build and repair vessels required for the business of the company;

(g) construct, acquire and operate by electricity, steam or other motive power, vessels for the transportation of passengers and freight, or towing of barges or other vessels in the River St. Lawrence and the lakes, canals and rivers connected therewith.

Mr. ARMSTRONG.

That gives them all the power they want. I understand the St. Lawrence Power Company have disposed of their rights and interests to the promoters of this Bill. When we read section 9 of the Act of 1901 we can learn why the present promoters are not applying for an extension of the rights under this Act of 1901, and it is for the simple reason that the Act of 1901 provides that they shall not exercise rights in any municipality without first obtaining the consent of the municipality. Section 9 reads:

9. The company, for the purpose of constructing and maintaining its works may, with the consent of the municipal council or other authority having jurisdiction over the same, enter on any highway, square or other public place, and as often as the company thinks proper, may, with the like consent, break up and open any highway or public place.

Under the Act of 1901 they must get the consent of the municipality but under the Bill now before the House they will have expropriation powers without the consent of the municipality. So we can readily understand why they are not asking for an extension of powers under the original Act of 1901. They are simply a subsidiary company getting distribution powers under the Railway Act and with full powers to expropriate, which they could not obtain if they were to ask an extension of these powers. They could in that case only exercise these powers and privileges with the consent of the municipalities. In view of the many objections raised, not only by my hon. friend from Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) but by many others, I think that this Bill should be referred back to the private Bills committee for further consideration. I move therefore that the committee rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. ROBERT SMITH (Stormont). I desire more particularly to refer to the remarks of the hon. member for Westmorland because he is labouring under an entire delusion as to what has occurred. He is under the impression that this company had obtained the power to build dams and had actually constructed them. There is no foundation for that statement. It never acquired any power to build a dam, it has no power to dam any part of the St. Lawrence river, and has not built any dam. The dams to which my hon. friend refers are the famous Sheiks island dams which are a part of the Cornwall canal, and were constructed by the Dominion government. The construction of those dams and the building of the Cornwall canal developed incidentally a certain amount of water-power. That water-power belongs to the Dominion, as a part of the Cornwall canal, and was leased by the Dominion government to the St. Lawrence Power Company.

Mr. EMMERSON. Is not that owned by this company?

Mr. ROBERT SMITH. No, it is owned by the Dominion of Canada and is held under lease. The water-power generated by those dams in the Cornwall canal is under lease to this company.

Mr. EMMERSON. And the company is owned by these parties.

Mr. ROBERT SMITH. They have no right to generate any other power except what is developed by the construction of these works by the Dominion government. My hon. friend might just as well refer to all the other powers leased along the Cornwall and Welland canals. At the town of Cornwall, the various mills have obtained by lease from the Dominion government water-powers which are developed by drawing water from the canal. The St. Lawrence Power Company do the same thing. They draw water from the canal at a point further up and discharge into the river.

Mr. CONMEE. What do they pay?

Mr. ROBERT SMITH. $1,000 a year That was a bargain entered into by hon. gentlemen opposite when in power. The dams were constructed during the regime of the Conservative party, and were leased to Mr. Davis prior to the change.

Mr. BLAIN. And renewed by the present administration some years ago.

Mr. ROBERT SMITH. Yes. The hon. gentleman has referred to the Bill obtained from the New York State legislature authorizing a certain American company to dam the St. Lawrence, and he assumes that that confers upon that company the power to dam a portion of the St. Lawrence. That is not the case at all. It requires the assent of the federal government of this country coupled with the authority of the State of New York, to authorize the damming of the St. Lawrence, because the St. Lawrence is a navigable stream.

Mr. S. HUGHES. Does the hon. gentleman not know that there is a Bill at present before the House of representatives confirming the law of the State of New York and the damming of the St. Lawrence—Bill No. 14531.

Mr. ROBERT SMITH. I do not see how that affects the argument. The federal government at Washington and the New York State government combined could not dam the St. Lawrence without the consent of Canada. Canada must be consulted.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. Canada has been consulted and has given her consent.

Mr. ROBERT SMITH. No, she has not. The only application made to Canada is the application which is before the International Waterways Commission. This company has applied to the joint commission for a recommendation, so far as that commission can give it. The International Waterways Commission has been investigating that application for some two years. The proposition was first referred to a certain board of engineers to investigate and report. That board reported that the plan was feasible, but the International Waterways Commission is still considering the question. It is to hold shortly another sitting and take further evidence and proposes to have further investigation by engineers. The result is that there is no danger whatever, such as the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) contemplates, of any power being given for the damming of the St. Lawrence without first obtaining the consent of this parliament.

Mr. BRODER. This International Waterways Commission is supposed to pronounce either for or against. Their decision will only affect our legislation because the Americans are acting independently of it. Have they not already got the consent of their own branch of the commission?

Mr. ROBERT SMITH. I understand that the American branch of the commission have reported to their authorities in favour of the scheme and that may affect the American federal legislation. But the Canadian branch has not, and the Canadian branch is conducting this investigation. What the final report may be, nobody knows; but no matter what may be the report of the commission, that has no effect as law. Nothing can have effect without the consent of this parliament, so that there is absolutely no danger of this damming scheme becoming the law of this country or of any one obtaining the privilege of damming the St. Lawrence until a Bill to that effect passes this House. The present Bill is solely for a transmission line. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that the company expect to get power to transmit over this line through this particular scheme. No doubt if they succeed in obtaining the consent of parliament to dam the St. Lawrence, they will. But they can get the power elsewhere. Power can be developed from the Long Sault rapids without this scheme going through in its entirety, and for that reason the transmission line may be a necessity and may be useful, quite independent of the scheme of damming the St. Lawrence. A very large amount of power has already been developed at this point. There is the power scheme first started by English capitalists in American territory. The Americans did not object at all to English capital going in and developing their own power. The Englishmen were unfortunate enough to lose all their money, and the works they had constructed went over to a new company. That work has been completed and a very large development is taking place from the Long Sault rapids. A considerable development is taking place on the Canadian side by means of the works of the Canadian government, and further development is possible without the actual damming of the river, but the large scheme would be carried out by the damming of the St. Lawrence. For that reason I do not see why hon. gentlemen should be so much alarmed about the effects of this Bill. The Bill itself can confer no other rights than are contained in it, and those are simply and solely for the construction of a transmission line from Montreal to Kingston. I do not see why the Ontario government should be consulted. As will be seen at once, the Ontario government, and the branch of that government known as the Hydro-Electric Commission, take the stand that any opposition to their schemes or their possible schemes should not be allowed by this parliament. And if they can stop any other scheme, no doubt, with the views they entertain, they will stop it. It was admitted by Mr. Staunton, when arguing in the Private Bills Committee on behalf of the Ontario government, that that government claimed the right of property in the bed of all streams. They claim that they own the soil under the bed of the St. Lawrence river. That is confirmed, I believe by the Privy Council. There are several streams that would have to be crossed by this line, and the provincial government could, under the amendment suggested, step in and say: You must not plant a pole in the bed of that stream; you must not lay the foundation of a tower. And, entertaining the views they do, that every possible scheme in opposition to the Hydro-Electric Commission must be squelched and killed, it follows, as a matter of course, that, under the amendment proposed, this scheme could be nipped at many points between the boundary of Quebec and Kingston.

Mr. HUGHES. Will the hon. member name a stream that would require a pole in the middle of its bed?

Mr. ROBERT. SMITH. Yes, at the city of Kingston, crossing the mouth of the Rideau river.

Mr. HUGHES. The Rideau does not flow there.

Mr. ROBERT SMITH. What is the stream there?

Mr. SMITH. There is Cataraqui creek; you could jump across it.

Mr. ROBERT SMITH There is the one over which a bridge about a quarter of a mile long is carried, the bridge that the troops have to cross in going from the city of Kingston to the camp ground.

Mr. ROBERT SMITH.

Mr. J. D. REID. It is not a hundred feet wide.

Mr. S. HUGHES. It is not fifty.

Mr. ROBERT SMITH. There is a very long bridge there.

Mr. HUGHES. There is no line across there.

Mr. ROBERT SMITH. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Hughes) perhaps, does not understand that is not the only right the government might have. If the Ontario government own the bed of a stream they have a right to prevent a line crossing that stream in the air. You cannot run a line, as a matter of law, across a man's land without buying that right, even though it does not touch his land. The same principle would apply to the property of the Ontario government in the stream.

Mr. BLAIN. Why should the Ontario government's rights be interfered with?

Mr. ROBERT SMITH. For the same reason that the Ontario government's rights are not considered when any other great national undertaking is going on. For instance if we wished to build a railroad from Montreal to Kingston, we would not consider the Ontario government. And the transmission of power to-day is growing as important to the people as the building of a railway. And, when we have a transmission line that is of national or interprovincial importance, the parliament of Canada has the power to provide for that line, and they ought to exercise that power in their discretion.

Mr. TURRIFF. This appears to be a larger question than we understood that it was when the discussion began. I happen to be a member of the Private Bills Committee and I attended rather regularly when the Bill was under discussion, and I want to confess that we did not get anything like all the information that was necessary, for I have heard a great deal to-night and have received a great deal of information on this subject, much that we did not get in the Private Bills Committee when the Bill was cut down very materially from the shape in which it was introduced. The only point I want to make is with regard to the statements made by the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson). The hon. member himself does not say absolutely that those statements are correct, because he does not know of his own knowledge. But he says that he has what he considers reliable information, and it is to the effect that this original company was started in 1901, was given certain powers in connection with the damming of the St. Lawrence river, powers that might not be given to-day, in the light of what we know now of the value of water-powers and of the facility with which power may be sent for long distances. Though this Bill does not deal with water-powers but simply proposes a transmission line—yet if, by passing this Bill, we enable that company, that big American company, which now owns the charter granted in 1901, to do something we would not grant power to do to-day, and if in the meantime they having carried out the provisions of their charter, then I say the hon. member for Westmorland is right and that we should hesitate about passing this Bill until we find out exactly the position in which this House stands. Far be it from me to seek to prevent any company or body of men from coming and developing the natural resources of this country. But here is an American concern that has privileges got from this parliament, privileges that, when accorded by the legislature of the State of New York for that side of the river will be upon the condition of the company paying $20,000 or $25,000 a year. If half the power got by damming the St. Lawrence belongs to Canada, I say we should hesitate before giving our half for nothing when the American side is being paid for at the rate of perhaps $25,000 a year. What I suggest is that we do not go on with the Bill at present, but either refer it to a special committee or send it again to the Committee on Private Bills for the purpose of ascertaining exactly the position of the matter and for the purpose of ascertaining whether the statements made by the hon. member for Westmorland are correct or not. I think that the promoter of the Bill will make greater progress if we are given an opportunity to understand exactly the position we are in with relation to this Bill.

Mr. HUGHES. I understand that the New York State Legislature has already passed an Act to authorize the construction of that dam, and that there is now a Bill before the United States House of Representatives, Bill (No. 14531) to confirm the Act of the New York State legislature—whether that Bill will pass or not is a matter of concern to many. Under the terms of this Act, how is the St. Lawrence river to be controlled? The great navigable portion of it is controlled by one lock, and the bed of it is to be handed over to the state of New York for ever, so that the growing navigation of the St. Lawrence river is to be practically handed over to the control of a monopolistic company for the generation of electrical power from which the state of New York will get a few thousand dollars a year, the Ontario nothing, and this government, I suppose, nothing but a little rake-off for politics. There is the situation as I am told it is. I would like the hon. member for Westmorland to look at this aspect of the case and tell us whether it is or is not true that by coupling up this company with the existing company and taking advantage of the New York and Washington legislation they can have the power to dam the St. Lawrence river. These gentlemen are worth watching. There is no great hurry in passing this Bill. It will stand over certainly for another session, and even this session long enough for this matter to be looked into. If this company can, under this Act, take possession by expropriation of the bed of the St. Lawrence river as far as the Ontario government owns it, and if they can control the waterway by expropriation, as they can under this Act, to the centre of that river, then the navigation of that river is closed in perpetuity. Every year that St. Lawrence river is a highway, traffic is increasing in volume, the navigation of these rapids is absolutely safe at the present time. Such a thing as a vessel of any size being wrecked is unheard of. More and more navigation requires that this river should be kept open and free. Now I maintain that in the interest of the province of Ontario, in the interest of the Dominion of Canada, in the interest of the St. Lawrence river, and in the interest of good fellowship with the United States, there should be no legislation passed here that will permit the damming of that river. We want to live in amity with our friends across the river, we want to stand shoulder to shoulder with them in promoting the interests of humanity the world over. But if these interests are permitted to get into the hands of private companies, it will bring discord, it will tend to breed dissension. That reason alone should be sufficient to prevent any such measure going through this House. It is a matter well worth looking into. The gentlemen who are behind this scheme have placed $2,000,000 for promotion. Now what promotion means I do not know, perhaps some one can tell us. But I am informed that $2,000,000 in capital has been set aside for promotion, and perhaps that explains the energy with which this Bill is being pushed through. At all events, I want this case to stand, and if it does not stand, then I want the rights of the province of Ontario to be guarded.

Mr. EMMERSON. I do not know that it adds to the strength of the opposition to this Bill to impute motives to those who are in favour of it. My opposition to this Bill is based entirely upon public grounds. I stated I had been informed that those who were seeking this legislation proposed to exercise the powers which would be granted them, in connection with certain other powers which they have secured, and that if they did so it would be a detriment to this country, and an advantage to the industrial world in the United States. Now I think every word that has been uttered since I expressed these fears, and every act that has been cited, confirm the views I expressed, and the fears I entertained. Now my memory has been refreshed. I recall that away back in the 90's Mr. M. P. Davis secured a lease from the government of Canada for certain water-powers in connection with the Cornwall canal. Subsequently, after 1896, when the present administration came into power, that lease was renewed and wider powers were given.

Mr. SPROULE. And extended from twenty-one years to eighty-four years.

Mr. EMMERSON. Renewed and perhaps extended. Subsequently Mr. Davis had a company incorporated, to wit, the St. Lawrence Power Company, and he transferred all his rights and privileges granted to him under the lease which he had from the government of Canada, to the St. Lawrence Power Company. Then he entered into a contract with the government of Canada to sell them certain lighting privileges on the canals of the St. Lawrence. He enjoyed the privilege of that contract for a number of years. Subsequently, if I am correctly informed, the St. Lawrence Power Company assigned to certain other parties their rights, and M. P. Davis and his associates mentioned in this Act of 1901 do not now control the contract, and the lease in connection with the Cornwall canal.

Mr. HUGHES. How much did they receive for selling it?

Mr. EMMERSON. I am not going to inquire into that, it is not germane to the question. The point is that all the rights contained in this Bill of 1901 are owned and enjoyed by a company that is associated with some great capitalists in the United States. Now, not only did they have the power under this Act in 1901 to secure, acquire, use, maintain and operate canals, water courses, race ways and water-powers, in or adjacent to the St. Lawrence river, on the north side thereof, but they have also the power to construct dams, wing dams and sluices, and buildings, in connection therewith. They have all the powers they require. I am going to read for the benefit of this committee, and in order to put it on 'Hansard' for the benefit of the people of this country, the powers which this great corporation enjoy on the American side of the line, in conjunction with the powers which they have secured or may secure on this side of the line, and the contrast between the conditions imposed by the American legislation and those which we do not impose, is certainly an appalling one.

Mr. NESBITT. Is that Bill of 1901 still in force?

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes, the Act of 1901 is in force. It has been exercised, and the company built the dam, and that is the company that holds the lease. It is called the dam of the St. Lawrence Power Company. Not only that, but they have the lease, which was granted to M. P. Davis. Now who are the incorporators in the Act of 1901? Michael Patrick Davis, Duncan Byron McTavish, D'Arcy Scott, Robert J. Devlin and William Hepburn Kerr, all of the city of Ottawa. These leases are held in the name of that company to-day, and that company, as I understand it, is owned and controlled not by the individuals whom I have mentioned as being the incorporators, but by gentlemen who live south of the boundary line. This is:

An Act to incorporate the Long Sault Development Company, and to authorize said company to construct and maintain dams, canals, power houses and locks at or near Long Sault Island, for the purpose of improving the navigation of the St. Lawrence river and developing power from the waters thereof, and to construct and maintain a bridge, and carry on the manufacture of commodities.

The people of the state of New York, represented in senate and assembly, do enact as follows:—

Section 1. Michael H. Flaherty, Frank S. Smith, Henry H. Warren, Walter F. Willson and John C. Crasper, and all such persons as are or may hereafter be associated with them, and their successors, are hereby constituted a body corporate and politic by the name and style of the Long Sault Development Company, for the purpose of erecting, constructing, maintaining, operating and using, in connection with the St. Lawrence river, a dam or dams, a canal or canals, a reservoir or reservoirs, and a power-house or power-houses and works appurtenant thereto, at or near Long Sault island, in the county of St. Lawrence, and of erecting and constructing a lock or locks, and works appurtenant thereto, at or near the same place, all for the development of electrical power and energy, and the permanent improvement of navigation on the St. Lawrence river at and above and below said place; and also of constructing and maintaining a bridge upon or in connection with said works, and of carrying on the manufacture of commodities with the said power.

2. Said corporation shall have power:

(1.) To have perpetual succession.

(2.) To have a common seal and alter the same at pleasure.

(3.) To acquire, by grant, gift, purchase, devise, bequest or other lawful means, and to hold and dispose of such property as its purpose shall require, subject to such limitations as may be prescribed by law.

(4.) To appoint such officers and agents as its business shall require, and to fix their compensation.

(5.) To make by-laws not inconsistent with any existing law, for the management of its property, the regulation of its affairs, the transfer of its stock, and the calling of meetings of its members.

(6.) To borrow money and contract debts, when necessary, for the transaction of its business or for the exercise of its corporate rights, privileges or franchises, or for any other lawful purpose of its incorporation; and it may issue and dispose of its obligations for any amount so borrowed, and may mortgage its property and franchises to secure the payment of such obligations or of any debt contracted for said purpose, subject in all respects to the provisions of section two of the stock corporation law.

(7.) Said corporation shall have all the other powers, privileges and franchises now or hereafter conferred by the general stock and business corporation laws of the state of New York.

3. Said corporation shall have the right to erect, construct, maintain, operate and use all such dam or dams, canal or canals, reservoir or reservoirs, gates, sluices, trunks, pipes, bulkheads, piers, flumes, abutments and other works appurtenant thereto, as may be proper or useful for the purpose of the development of water-power, and of electrical power and energy therefrom, at such point or points upon or adjacent to the south shore of the St. Lawrence river, near Long Sault island or Barnhart's island, and upon the said islands, or either of them, and between said islands, and between said islands or either of them and the shores of the said river and Sheik's island (but not across the international boundary line unless consented to by the Dominion of Canada) as may be selected by said corporation, and also in and upon so much of the said river and the bed thereof as lies to the south of the international boundary line, at or near Long Sault island or Barnhart's island, either independently or in connection with like works now erected, or to be erected, in so much of said river and the bed thereof as lies to the north or Canadian side of said international boundary line, and upon and adjacent to the northerly shore of said river; and to erect, construct, maintain, operate and use a power-house or power-houses, and conductors, cables, wires, insulators and other appliances in connection with the said works for the development of electrical power and energy; and also to take and use the waters of said rivers at and above the points of location of said works heretofore authorized, and to construct and maintain upon, over and in connection with said dam or dams and other works, a bridge or bridges across or partly across the St. Lawrence river, with the approaches thereto, for the use of foot passengers, animals and vehicles, and to charge reasonable rates of toll for passage thereon; the said rights being granted upon the express condition that said corporation shall make just compensation to all persons injured by the exercise of the rights and privileges heretofore granted, and that said corporation shall also erect and construct a lock or locks as may be required by the United States of America, and shall provide electrical power or energy for the maintenance, operation and use of said lock or locks, free of charge, and shall in all other respects perform, fulfil and abide by all and singular the conditions and provisions of this Act, and also of an Act of the congress of the United States relating thereto, and also upon condition that the rights hereby granted shall never be so used as to impair or obstruct the navigation of the St. Lawrence river, but, on the contrary, that such navigation shall be preserved in as good condition as, if not better than, the same is at present, regard being always had to the amount of the natural flow of water in said river as affecting its navigability from time to time.

4. After the congress of the United States shall authorize the construction of dams, locks and canals hereby authorized and after the payment by said corporation into the treasury of the state of the fixed sum of ten thousand dollars, the commissioners of the land office shall, upon application of said corporation, grant unto it the title and interest of the people of the state in and to lands under the waters of the St. Lawrence river to be covered or occupied by said works and locks and power-houses, provided, however, that any of the lands of the state which may be so conveyed to said corporation shall be forfeited and title thereto shall revert to the state unless the same are actually used by said corporation and covered by its dams, canals, reservoirs, gates, sluices, trunks, pipes, bulkheads, piers, flumes, abutments or other works appertaining thereto, or are necessary to the enjoyment for said purposes of any lands so used or covered, within fifteen years from the conveyance thereof by the commissioners of the land office to said corporation under authority of this Act, and in consideration of the conveyance so made under the authority of this Act, as well as for the rights and privileges hereby granted, the said corporation in addition to the payment aforesaid shall pay into the treasury of the state for the year nineteen hundred and ten, the fixed sum of fifteen thousand dollars, and for the year nineteen hundred and eleven, the fixed sum of twenty thousand dollars. For each year after nineteen hundred and eleven, the said corporation shall pay at the following rates upon the average amount of electrical horse-power generated during such year under the authority of this Act, that is to say: Upon all amounts up to twenty-five thousand electrical horse-power, at the rate of seventy-five cents per horse-power.

Upon all amounts in excess of twenty-five thousand electrical horse-power and up to one hundred thousand electrical horse-power, at the rate of fifty cents per horse-power; upon all amounts in excess of one hundred thousand electrical horse-power, at the rate of twenty-five cents per horse-power. In case said corporation shall generate or develop water-power as mechanical power, without transmuting the same into electrical power, then for so much of said water-power as shall be so generated or developed, payment shall be made at the above mentioned rates per mechanical horse-power.

In determining the average amount of electrical horse-power generated and the average amount of mechanical horse-power generated or developed in any year, for the purpose of determining the amount to be paid to the state, no day nor hour during which the works of said company are not in substantial operation shall be included in the total time for which such average is to be determined as the average for the year. In case the amount which would be payable at the rates aforesaid for either of the years, nineteen hundred and ten or nineteen hundred and eleven, upon the average amount of power generated during such year shall exceed the fixed sum hereinbefore required to be paid for such year, the said corporation shall also pay the amount of any such excess; and if for any year after nineteen hundred and eleven the amount payable at rates aforesaid is less than twenty-five thousand dollars, then said corporation shall pay for such year the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars instead of the amount that would be payable on or before the first day of February in the following year, and within ten days before the same shall become payable the said corporation shall deliver to the state engineer and to the state treasurer a verified statement showing the average amount of electrical horse-power generated, and the average amount of mechanical horse-power generated and not transmuted into electrical horse-power, by said corporation under the authority hereby granted, during the year ending on the thirty-first day of December next preceding the date of making such statement. The books or other records of said corporation, showing the amount of power so generated, and its works and plant shall at all times be open to inspection and examination by the state engineer for the purpose of verifying or disputing the correctness of any such statement.

The state engineer may prescribe the form of records to be kept by said corporation, and the character of measuring instruments and devices to be used and a reasonable standard of the accuracy thereof and the methods by which said accuracy is to be determined. Said corporation shall keep such records and shall provide and use such instruments and devices and have the same tested accordingly.

If any dispute shall arise in respect to the amount payable for any year at the rates aforesaid the court of claims shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the same.

In case the said corporation shall fail to pay any amount due hereunder within sixty days after the same is payable as herein provided, in addition to any other remedies which may exist by law, the rights and privileges hereby granted may be forfeited.

The payments above specified are based upon the assumption that the said corporation, under the authority of this Act, subject only to the lawful control of the United States government, may use for the purposes herein specified, at the places herein mentioned, all of the waters of the St. Lawrence river south of the international boundary line, but in case said corporation shall at any time be compelled to make any payment to the Dominion of Canada or the province of Ontario——

Mark this: They contemplate that Canada and Ontario would insist on a payment for the use of that water.

In case any said corporation shall at any time be compelled to make any payment to the Dominion of Canada or the province of Ontario for the use by said corporation of any portion of said water to generate power as authorized by this Act, said corporation shall be entitled to an equitable readjustment of the rate of compensation to be paid to the state for that portion of the said water for the use of which said corporation shall be compelled to make payment to said dominion or province.

They contemplate that Canada and Ontario would insist on a payment for the use of that water. We are going to give them our water and their own as well and they pay the State of New York. The State of New York is fair enough to say in its enactment that they expect the Dominion of Canada will look after its own interests and that there will be an equitable adjustment.

Such readjustment shall be made by arbitrators, one of whom shall be appointed by the said corporation and one by the governor of the state within thirty days after the receipt by him of written notice of such appointment by said corporation, and in case of their failure to agree the two said arbitrators shall choose an umpire. The decision of the arbitrators, or of the umpire, shall be made in writing, in duplicate, one copy shall be filed with the state treasurer and one delivered to the said corporation; such decision shall be final and binding on both parties, and from and after a date to be fixed therein, payments shall be made in accordance therewith, and pending such decision payments shall be made for each year at the rates aforesaid.

5. Said corporation may at any time, with the consent of the holders of at least two-thirds in amount of its capital stock at the time outstanding, given in writing or at a meeting of such stockholders duly called for that purpose, sell or convey all or any portion of its property and assets, and the franchises and rights appurtenant thereto, upon such terms as may be consented to as aforesaid, but subject always to all the conditions and provisions of this Act.

6. The existence of said corporation shall be perpetual.

7. The capital of said corporation shall be one million dollars, divided into ten thousand shares of the par value of one hundred dollars each; but said corporation shall not begin business until two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, par value, of the capital stock shall have been actually subscribed and paid for in cash, nor until the organization tax provided by the general laws of the state of New York shall have been paid to the state treaurer; and upon any increase of said capital stock such tax upon such increase shall also be paid.

8. The number of directors of said corporation shall be five. Said directors shall hold office for the term of one year after their election, and until their successors are elected and qualified. Michael H. Flaherty, Frank S. Smith, Henry H. Warren, Walter F. Wilson and John C. Crapser shall be the directors of said corporation for the first year and until their successors are elected and qualified. The first election shall be held on the first Monday after the third Thursday of February, in the year nineteen hundred and eight. Any vacancy in the board of directors occurring before the first election shall be filled by vote of the remaining directors. The number of directors may be increased as provided by law.

9. The said corporation shall begin the work of constructing its dam pursuant hereto within one year after the congress of United States shall authorize the construction of dams, locks and canals hereby authorized, and in case such construction shall not be so begun the grants, rights and privileges hereby granted may be forfeited.

10. This Act, and all the terms, conditions and provisions thereof, shall apply to the successors and assigns of the incorporators named in the first section hereof.

11. This Act shall take effect immediately.

Certain powers are granted the company by the legislature of the State of New York. We have granted certain powers. There can be a holding company that can assemble all these powers, control the whole of the waters there and all the water-powers, and I apprehend that would not be a Canadian holding company but would be a company originating in the United States and composed of gentlemen of great capital in the United States. It is true that under our law there can be no exercise of these powers on the St. Lawrence even by a company incorporated by this parliament unless the plans were filed and met the approval of the Department of Public Works. I apprehend that has been done with respect to the works which that company, that is the St. Lawrence Power Company, have already constructed. I apprehend that when they come to exercise the powers which they seek and require to exercise they can take this Act and under its authority can prepare additional plans and go to the Department of Public Works, and if their plans are approved of, they can have a complete system controlling the water-powers of the St. Lawrence, with everybody at their mercy in that vicinity and for a long distance removed from there. It seems to me that this legislation is such, taking into consideration all that it involves, all that it seems to involve, all that it may involve of which we do not at this moment know, that it is right and just and proper for this committee to now hesitate, to say we shall require further information, we shall require to know more as to the purposes of the company to see whether it is proposed to have an amalgamation. It is true the legislature of the State of New York did not have the full powers to enable that company to exercise all the rights that they require. They have to go to the Congress of the United States, the federal authority, but they do it there by legislation. We have done it already, we have legislated in this regard. We, in all such cases under the general powers given to the Public Works Department, authorize that department to have a control, to give their approval to grant a license practically for the exercise of any powers which we may have enacted in behalf of any company. I say that for these reasons, if there were no others, I would oppose this Bill. I would not wish to have any question arise in a matter of this kind as between the province of Ontario and the Dominion of Canada. There is no necessity for anything of that kind. It is something that is beyond even the question of provincial and federal rights, it is something that affects the citizenship of Canadians, that might injure or might protect the business interests, the industrial interests on our side of the line, and if there is a possibility in that regard, if there are any dangers, if there are any hopes, surely we should guard against the dangers and we should preserve the hopes of the people of Canada.

Mr. ROBB. Has the State of New York power to sell the water-powers along the St. Lawrence river tributary to the State of New York?

Mr. EMMERSON. The New York legislature exercised rights which under the constitution belongs to them; they have the ownership in the soil under the waters of the St. Lawrence south of the international boundary, and by virtue of that ownership they assumed to exercise legislative authority in connection with the powers granted to this company. The congress of the United States controls the navigation and the international aspects of the river, and congress would not permit the exercise of these powers without granting legislation supplementing the legislation of the state of New York, and approving of it.

Mr. ROBERT SMITH. Does the hon. gentleman contend that the authority of the state of New York, plus the authority of the United States government, would enable that company to dam the St. Lawrence south of the international boundary line without the consent of Canada?

Mr. EMMERSON. That question does not arise in connection with this legislation, but I admit most unquestionably that in the case of navigable waters and international streams the consent of the government of Canada must be first had. But what I say is: these people can do us no injury by reason of the legislation they have already secured from the United States or by legislation which they may secure. That can only become a menace and a peril to our conditions by reason of whatever unwise legislation we may pass here, and by reason of the action of the Dominion government. But we must not place the whole responsibility on the government, we have the responsibility as legislators ourselves. It seems to me that whereas we in the past may have given powers which we did not contemplate would go so far, that now when we are called upon to supplement these powers we should hold the reins in our own hands and say that they cannot have these additional powers unless there is a full and complete understanding with respect to the exercise of them.

Mr. HUGHES. Does not the United States federal legislation make the erection of a dam conditional on similar legislation being obtained from Canada?

Mr. EMMERSON. That is to be found in the Bill I have read.

Mr. BLAIN. When this Bill was first introduced it was evidently thought to be an innocent measure, but now the hon. member for Assiniboia admits that many new phases of the Bill have presented themselves even to-night and which were not considered by the Private Bills Committee. The Bill we are now considering is a second reprint, which is conclusive proof that the Private Bills Committee found it necessary to eliminate some of the powers sought by this company in the original Bill, and consequently it demands careful consideration at the hands of the House. Hon. gentlemen opposite would lead us to believe that the Ontario hydro electric commission only proposes to furnish power to western Ontario, but I commend to them the fourth report of the commission, in which they will find that in the St. Lawrence district (eastern Ontario) the commission proposes to supply power to six municipalities, in the central Ottawa valley district to 13 municipalities and in the upper Ottawa valley district to 7 municipalities. While, up to the present time the hydro electric commission and the Ontario government have concentrated on the development of the Niagara power it must be remembered that they intend to extend their operations in the interest of the people to every part of the province. The hon. gentleman from New Brunswick (Mr. Carvell) suggested that the hydro electric commission and the Ontario government were making an effort to compel municipalities to come under the commission, but I would mention to my hon. friend that the option has to be submitted to the voters of the municipalities before they can have the right to receive power from the hydro commission, and, therefore, the whole thing rests with the municipalities themselves. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Carvell) spoke about monopolists, but I would remind my hon. friend that there are two kinds of monopolists. There are private individuals who are constantly coming to this House endeavouring to get control of public utilities in their own interests, and there are the other monopolists like the province of Ontario who seek to develop and utilize our natural water-powers in the interest of the whole people of the province, and without any idea of making gain for themselves. Let me tell hon. gentlemen opposite that this is the foremost plank in the platform of the Ontario government. There are 107 members in the legislature, and although the government have a large majority, there is yet an active and enterprising minority led by an able man, and not one of that minority has ventured to say a word against the continuance of the hydraulic electric power commission and its efforts in the interest of the people of Ontario. There was some little criticism in the legislature as to details, but there was no opposition to the principle. Let me remind these gentlemen opposite also that a general election has taken place in the province since the Ontario government had the courage to adopt that as a plank in their platform, and that the government of the province has been sustained by the people by an overwhelming majority. I, therefore, contend that the provincial government should be consulted in matters of this kind, and that applies not only to the government of Ontario but to the governments of all the provinces who are anxious that the rights of their provinces should be protected. The Liberal party in former days claimed to be the great champions of provincial rights, but we have not heard so much about that claim since they became all powerful at Ottawa.

However I do not wish to introduce that phase of the question for discussion. What I want to point out is that it is high time the Dominion and the various provincial governments should come to some agreement in order that the rights of the people, both provincial and Dominion, should be protected, and protected not in the interests of men who come here from time to time seeking charters in order that they may sell them again. All these matters should be carefully considered, not alone by this government, but by this government in negotiation with the provincial governments, and not have the time of this House and its committees wasted upon these constant discussions regarding federal and provincial rights. This is a matter which should be settled between the provincial and Dominion governments. A clause should be put in all these Bills to provide that no charter granted by this parliament should be sold without the sanction of the Governor in Council. That would put a stop to some of the bartering and sale of charters. But if we allow Bills of this kind to pass, we are encouraging this kind of business and it will continue. I want to enter my protest as strong as possible against the granting of these important privileges without taking every precaution to protect the public.

Mr. CARVELL. I do not think my hon. friend, who is usually very logical in his remarks, intended this evening to draw the discussion away from its legitimate bounds; but evidently the result of his argument has been to waste one and half hour of our time in discussing the merits of the proposed Long Sault power question now before the Railway Commission. We are not discussing the building of a dam across the St. Lawrence. That is not involved in this Bill. The promoters are simply asking for the right to build a transmission line. They could not say that they are going to get their power from the St. Lawrence Power Company. They may get it from the Beauharnois canal or any where else they can. They simply ask the right to deliver power to the municipalities along the St. Lawrence river.

Mr. J. D. REID. They said in the private Bills committee they were going to get their power from the St. Lawrence Power Company.

Mr. CARVELL. I cannot help what they said in that committee, but I want to tell the hon. member for Victoria and Haliburton (Mr. S. Hughes) that I have not received, and do not expect to receive, any portion of that $2,000,000 we are told was set aside for promotion purposes. I am not a member of the private Bills committee, and I simply take the Bill as it came from that committee and is now before the House. My hon. friend from Peel (Mr. Blain) did not take the cue which the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) gave, although the hon. member for Westmorland was doing yeoman service. He was trying to draw the attention of the committee away from the real point and divert it to the Long Sault question. My hon. friend from Peel (Mr. Blain) gave his attention to the Hydro-Electric Commission, and that after all is the bogie at the bottom of the whole thing. It is a question whether the people of Ontario are to have any electrical development except what is controlled by that commission. I want to refer for a moment to the Act cited by my hon. friend from Westmorland, the Act of 1901. My hon. friend said that a gentleman of some authority informed him that the intention was to link up the St. Lawrence Company of 1901 with this company. I have read over this Act pretty carefully, and I find that by section 8:

The company may—manufacture, use, supply and dispose of electricity, water and gas, and water, hydraulic or other power by means of wires, cables, pipes, conduits, machinery or other appliances; and construct, maintain, and operate works for the production, sale and distribution thereof, for the purposes aforesaid.

And by section 13:

The powers granted by this Act shall cease and be null and void unless works of the company capable of producing at least 1,000 horse-power are completed within three years from the passing of this Act, and notwithstanding anything contained in any Act of parliament.

My hon. friend from Stormont (Mr. Smith), who ought to know surely what he is talking about because he represents the constituency immediately concerned, says that this company has never spent a dollar and never built a dam and never created a water-power.

Mr. ROBERT SMITH. If my hon. friend will allow me—

Mr. CARVELL. True they have built a power-house along the Cornwall canal and they are leasing water from the government, but they have not created one pound of water which would generate electricity. They have done nothing but build a plant with certain wheels and machinery in it and they get their water from the canal.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Does the hon. gentleman say that all the powers given in the Act of 1901 have become absolutely void?

Mr. CARVELL. If we are to believe the statement of the hon. member for Stormont, (Mr. Smith) that Act of 1901 is void.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. But I understand that the company is supplying power to the government to-day.

Mr. CARVELL. But not under the provisions of this Act.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Under what Act then?

Mr. CARVELL. They have not complied with the requirements of section 13.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The result of that is that all their powers have ceased and are absolutely void. What I desire to draw the attention of my hon. friend to is this, that that does not seem to be consistent with the situation as it exists at present, because that company is actually supplying power to the government, and it has not authority to do so except under the Act of 1901. Therefore I can hardly come to the conclusion that all the powers given it are void, since the government have actually made a contract with it.

Mr. CARVELL. As I consider this section, they have not complied with it:

The powers granted by this Act shall cease and be null and void unless works of the company capable of producing at least 1,000 horse-power are completed within three years from the passing of this Act, and notwithstanding anything contained in any Act of parliament.

They have not complied with those requirements. However I do not think that makes much difference.

Mr. ROBERT SMITH. There is no doubt that the company have complied with the Act. What was contemplated was that this company should construct a power-house which involves also the cutting of the bank so as to lead the water from the canal into the power-house and the constructing of a tail race to let the water into the river after it strikes the water-wheels. Also it was intended to develop what was known as the Hooples creek scheme. That consisted of digging a canal from the power-house some ten miles inland and conducting the water from the Sault rapids into the Hooples canal. That part has not been done.

Mr. CARVELL. I was just going to say that, as I view this case, it makes no difference whether the rights granted under this Act are null and void or not, because there is not in this Bill any evidence whatever that there is any intention of linking up with this company. I want to come to the argument of the hon. member for Westmorland.

Suppose it were provided in this Bill that the company now seeking incorporation might make an agreement with the St. Lawrence Power Company, with the right to purchase electricity—go even further than that, and suppose that they get the right to join up with the company organized by the legislature of the state of New York, and, if you will, dam the whole St. Lawrence river—wherein would the people of Ontario be injured by carrying out the scheme proposed by this Bill? Wherein would the people of any part of the Dominion be injured? I do not care if you admit that we are going to bring electricity from the state of New York into Ontario and Quebec and distribute it in Montreal, Prescott, Brockville, Kingston and other places up and down the St. Lawrence, does that hurt anybody in Ontario? I may not understand what the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) means. Section 12 of the Bill prohibits the exportation of electricity. They are only given the power to buy electricity and distribute it. I do not care whether they buy it from the New York company, from the St. Lawrence Power Company, or whether they have to go down to the Beauharnois canal and get it there. The people along the St. Lawrence want electrical energy, and this company wants the power to transmit it. It is said that if the old company is in existence, under section 8 they can transmit power. I think the statement of the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. S. Sharpe) is correct, that they would have to get the authority of the municipalities before they could go through their borders. Under this Bill, we are taking the modern method, provided in a good many cases by the Railway Committee, and asking that the operations under this Bill be governed entirely by the Railway Commission. If they want to go through a municipality, they must go to the municipality and try to make a trade; if they cannot do that, then the Railway Commission is empowered to make the conditions on which they shall go through. Let us get away from this Long Sault proposition that my hon. friend from Westmorland brings up so industriously; let us get away from the idea that we are going to export electricity; let us get away from the idea that under this Bill we are going to produce electricity. These things are not in the Bill. When we come down to the Bill we find that it is for the organization of a company to buy electricity where they can get it, and to distribute it to the people on the St. Lawrence, who are sorely in need of these facilities. I think hon. members are travelling far afield when they attempt to bring up such propositions as that of my hon. friend from Westmorland, unless they take the ground of my hon. friend (Mr. Blain) who is quite consistent——

Mr. EMMERSON. I desire to ask a question. Is the hon. member (Mr. Carvell) not aware that owing to the topography of the country, all the power on the St. Lawrence would be on the American side, and that that is the reason this transmission company want to import power—that the whole power will be generated on the American side?

Mr. CARVELL. So much the more reason for having this Bill. If you cannot generate power on the Canadian side, are you going to say that the people on the St. Lawrence shall not have power because it has to be imported?

Mr. HUGHES. If the object is to create a dam.

Mr. CARVELL. I say that, if the hon. member for Westmorland is right—I do not believe he is—and we cannot create power on the Canadian side, so much the more need for this Bill.

Mr. EMMERSON. I did not say that. I say that, by reason of the topography of the country, the effect of the works here proposed would be to throw the generating of the power to the other side. I remember that, a year ago, when I was in Massena, which is right near the Long Sault rapids, it was pointed out to me that under the legislation the people on that side of the line were going to get, the whole advantage of the proposed dam on the St. Lawrence, and they said that we ought to look out for it.

Mr. CARVELL. My hon. friend admits now that there can be some power developed on the Canadian side. If that be true, why should not the people along the St. Lawrence have the right to use it?

Mr. EMMERSON. This company does not intend to do it.

Mr. CARVELL. Of course not. This company intends to transmit power. Now, I come to my hon. friend from Peel (Mr. Blain). I say he is consistent. He does not try to draw a herring across the trail as does my hon. friend (Mr. Emmerson). He comes out like a man, plump and plain, and says that the Ontario Hydro-Electric Commission intend—sometime within a hundred years, I suppose—to come down and develop water-power, and distribute it, and therefore nobody else should be allowed to get in—let the people get along without these utilities until the Hydro-Electric is ready to serve them.

Mr. BLAIN. The hon. member (Mr. Carvell) has overlooked the reports of the Hydro-Electric that are in circulation.

Mr. CARVELL. That is not the first report sent out in the way of a prospectus that has not fulfilled what is propnesied. Let me tell my hon. friend from East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) that this talk about hoping to sell power in Galt and Stratford at $20 or $21 means distribution at a central station. Let me give two illustrations. Down home, or rather just across the border, in the state of Maine, in the town of Halton, they are buying electricity at two and a half cents a kilowatt hour, but it costs the people ten cents per kilowatt hour for their electricity. The difference goes in the cost of distribution. In the towns of Perth and Andover, in the constituency of Victoria, N.B., the electricity costs four cents at the station, and costs ten cents when it is distributed. When you talk of the price of delivering at the station, that is not a criterion of what it will cost to distribute it to the people.

Mr. BLAIN. Does not the hon. member know that in the face of such things as he is stating, the people have voted strongly in favour of the Hydro-Electric power?

Mr. CONMEE. They were deceived.

Mr. BLAIN. The people of Fort William were not deceived.

Mr. CARVELL. I am ready to leave these two hon. gentlemen to fight that out, while I get back to the Bill. The object, as I have said, is to distribute electricity, and to give the people the benefit of this utility. I contend that the measure ought not to go back to the committee, and it ought not to be subject to what the province of Ontario might decide. For, as as pointed out by the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Robert Smith) the moment a proposition of that kind is put in the Bill the Ontario government would find means to destroy the enterprise.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Does the hon. member think that the state of New York is justified in demanding, and receiving from the Long Sault power the large sums of money they are receiving from year to year, and that the province of Ontario should not receive any remuneration?

Mr. CARVELL. Under this Bill, the price at which this commodity should be distributed, and sold, is in the hands of the Canadian Railway Commission. If you place a big royalty upon it, the people will have to pay that much more for it; if you do not place that much royalty the people will get it for less.

Mr. CONMEE. I would like to call the attention of the committee to the statements made by the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson), and the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell). With regard to the Bill of the state of New York, to which he has referred, I understood him to approve of that Bill. I would like to know whether that is the case—is it a Bill that he would approve of it either in Ontario, or the Dominion parliament passed it? Would the hon. member oblige me with an answer?

Mr. EMMERSON. I do not know that it is involved at all in my argument, as to whether I do approve, or do not approve. One thing I do approve of, and that is, if we grant these powers to a private company, I approve of the action of the state of New York in imposing obligations upon them. They are not doing it for their health, they are not going to the legislatures for these powers for any other interest except their own. They propose to make money out of it, and I think it is right that the province, and the Dominion, in granting these franchises should impose obligations.

Mr. CONMEE. My hon. friend has brought in a Bill, and has placed it on 'Hansard,' and has given it a certain amount of approval. Now I do not think that my hon. friend nor any other member can approve of that Bill. I say that between that Bill and the legislation which we are passing from day to day, and the legislation in the very Bill under consideration, there is no comparison in the public interest. Under that Bill the state of New York gets about $30,000, and then they get a small percentage per horse power per annum. There is not a word in the Bill that protects the people of the state of New York either as to prices, or hours of service, or conditions of service. There the water-power is alienated from the people of the state for a paltry sum, and put into the hands of a private company. When you put in the Bill before us a condition that the Board of Railway Commissioners, the high court which the government has established for the protection of private interests as against railway or other companies, shall control the rates to be charged, then you put in conditions that conserve to the people the benefit of these great facilities. There is no comparison as regards the public interest between the legislation in the state of New York and the legislation which we are considering here.

Mr. BLAIN. Does my hon. friend say that the company has the right to fix their own charges in the general Bill of the state of New York? The private company to which my hon. friend refers has no right to fix the charges, they are fixed under a general law of the state of New York. My hon. friend understands that very well.

Mr. CONMEE. No, I do not understand it that way, if that is the case it is of recent date, but the reverse. I know that by a report made a couple of years ago by the president of the United States, wherein he pointed out that that was the weak point in the legislation of the various states of the union, that it should be guarded by the federal power, and upon that very ground he vetoed the Ontario and Minnesota Power Company's Bill, which was a federal Bill. Let me point out to the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Blain) wherein I think he and other hon. gentlemen are not consistent. We had a Bill to-day that was severely criticised because it had a provision to allow the sale of a surplus of electricity in the case of a railway. That was criticised for several hours, and no sooner had it passed than the hon. gentleman passed another Bill which had on it the name of a prominent gentleman who is leader of the opposition in the Senate (Mr. Lougheed) a canal Bill, in which were all the powers my hon. friends are objecting to in this Bill. I have in my hand an Act, chap. 128, to incorporate the St. Clair and Erie Ship canal. Hon. gentlemen spent the whole afternoon criticising a Bill having the same powers, they voted for in that Bill, which gives power to sell in the province of Ontario power generated from the St. Clair river and the St. Clair lake, and to exercise all the powers to which they are objecting now.

Mr. HUGHES. Does it give them all the rapids on the St. Clair river?

Mr. CONMEE. I cannot answer that question. It gives them power to generate electricity from the St. Clair river and lake, to sell it and to distribute it.

Mr. SPROULE. How could they get power in a canal where there are only two locks, one at the commencement and one at the other end, where there is no fall at all?

Mr. CONMEE. My hon. friend knows very little about power, or he would not ask that question. Where you have a lake such as Lake St. Clair to supply the power, and where you have the privilege of making a conduit, there is no limit to the power you can generate except the capacity of the lake to supply it. Now if it is the policy of the hon. gentleman opposite that when one of their friends has a Bill it goes through, no matter what powers it carries, but when some one else has a Bill it must wait for the Hydro-Electric Commission, I do not think that is a sound policy, either in the interest of the Dominion or of the province of Ontario.

Mr. STEWART. The hon. member for Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell) said that members on this side of the House who are opposing this Bill are guilty of some crime, because they say that it is in the interest of this country that the line should be built by private companies. I want to tell him that if he goes into a municipality and submits that question, and endeavours to satisfy the ratepayers that they are better off in the hands of a private company than in the hands of the Hydro-Electric Commission, he will find himself badly left. I know that in the city of Hamilton, where we have the largest power producers in the province, the question has been submitted three or four times to the ratepayers, and has been carried in favour of the Hydro Commission nearly three to one every time. The hon. gentleman also said that the horse-power was going to cost $75 per horse-power from the Hydro Commission. He has not proof for that statement, it is mere imagination on his own part; his figures is about three times as high as they ought to be. In the city of Hamilton our contract provides for $17.92 per horse-power. Power is $9.42 at the Falls, and $8.52 goes to make up the cost of the trunk line, the loss in transmission, building the plant in the city, and in other ways bringing the power right to the motor ready for use.

Mr. CARVELL. What do the people of Hamilton pay for electric light, and until what hour?

Mr. STEWART. They pay many different prices.

Mr. CARVELL. What is the average price?

Mr. STEWART. There are as many as three dozen different prices charged in the city of Hamilton.

Mr. CARVELL. I ask the hon. gentleman a fair question. What do the people pay?

Mr. STEWART. I cannot tell you how they make their charges but I paid somewhere in the neighbourhood of $30 per year for light for my house, which I consider very high. I pay $35 per horse-power in Hamilton to-day and I only use the power for eight hours. If I were getting my power from the Hydro-Electric Commission I would be paying $17.92 and only paying for the power for eight hours while under the present arrangement I pay $35 for eight hours. We were paying $85 per lamp for our street lighting for ten years in the city of Hamilton which claims to be the electrical city of the Dominion. Since the Hydro-Electric Commission has been inaugurated we are getting it for $47.50 per lamp.

Mr. CARVELL. I can tell the hon. gentleman that in my town, which is a company town, we are only paying $35 per year per lamp.

Mr. STEWART. I do not know anything about your service, but I know that the Hydro-Electric Commission is entitled to the credit for the cost of lights being reduced from $85 to $47.50. We have been paying anywhere from $35 to $40 per horse-power. The Cataract Power Company offered to give us power for $16 per horse-power and ten per cent less than the commission's price, no matter what it may be. Still, in the face of that the rate-payers would not take their offer but turned it down three to one. Surely, you do not mean to tell me that you would advise the people of this country to place themselves in the hands of a private company and pay their price for power when they could get their power from the Ontario government at cost price. Not only that but the Ontario government can borrow money at a less rate than any company can get it for, and surely the Ontario government is in a position to furnish power cheaper than any private company could furnish it for. I will venture to say that if you put a clause in to provide that this company should furnish power at cost price to the consumers you would not get anybody to come and ask us for a Bill of this kind. I said that we paid $17.92 per horse-power. Toronto pays $18.10 and Toronto gets 10,000 horse-power while we only take 1,000. If we were to take 10,000 horse-power the same as they do in Toronto our power price would be cut down about $4. Neither you nor anybody else can tell us what Stratford's power price would be unless you know how many horse-power they will take. If they took 500 horse-power the price would be in the neighbourhood of $30 perhaps $29, but it would not exceed $30 or $31. You cannot say that it would be possible to get any better prices than those which I have stated here because the Ontario government has employed the best engineers that could be got in this country to make these assessments and valuations, and the cost of trunk line, copper wire and all those things has only been a trfle over half what the estimate was. As it is we are getting power at $17.92.

Mr. CONMEE. Do I understand that the prices that the hon. gentleman is quoting are prices that the consumer has to pay for power in these different cities?

Mr. STEWART. The price I am quoting is the price that we pay for power. If the municipality sees fit to charge its customers a profit it can do so.

Mr. CONMEE. My question was if that was the price after they have distributed it or is that the price in bulk?

Mr. STEWART. It will cost $17.92 delivered from the motor to any customer in the city of Hamilton.

Mr. CONMEE. That is at the power station?

Mr. STEWART. Yes.

Mr. CONMEE. Does my hon. friend know what it will cost to distribute that to the consumer?

Mr. STEWART. Along the trunk line through the heart of the city it will not cost any more than that, but where there are lines at a distance leading to factories it will cost more. Will it not cost more by your company too? You cannot carry it along fences and sidewalks; no matter what power it is, you require a line to carry it.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Before the question is put I would like to say that if this Bill involves the damming of the St. Lawrence, interference with navigation or a possible alteration in that great inland waterway, it is a very large proposition. I believe that the question is at the present moment before the Waterways Commission. It appears, however, according to the argument of the hon. member for Westmorland, that it is involved in the very Bill that we have before the House. The hon. member for Carleton, New Brunswick (Mr. Carvell) referred to section 8 of the Act of 1901. The hon. member for Westmorland and other hon. members have asserted that that charter is now controlled by the gentlemen who are promoting this Bill. The hon. member for Carleton referred to section 8 but he did not refer to the important part of section 8. The important part of section 8 is this—I will eliminate the immaterial words

The company may construct canals and water-powers in or adjacent to the St. Lawrence river, on the north side thereof, at any point eastward from Hoople's creek, in the county of Stormont, to the eastern end of the Soulanges canal, and may construct dams, wing-dams, sluices, conduits and buildings in connection therewith.

There is power to construct a canal and water-power and to construct and maintain dams in connection with them.

Mr. McCOLL. Dams upon the St. Lawrence?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I will read it again:

The company may construct canals in or adjacent to the St. Lawrence river, on the north side thereof, at any point eastward from Hoople's creek, in the county of Stormont in the province of Ontario, to the eastern end of the Soulanges canal, and may construct dams, wing-dams, sluices, conduits and buildings in connection therewith.

I understand that legal opinions have been given by gentlemen of very high rank in the profession to the effect that under that power, coupled with the power contained in the Bill which has been passed by the legislature of New York, a dam may be constructed and maintained across the St. Lawrence from the Canadian side to the United States side. I do not know whether these powers are sufficient for that purpose. It would require one to investigate the locality and to apply the words of the statute to the physical conditions before he could come to a very definite or sure conclusion as to that. But, at all events the argument is a plausible one, the argument has been made, and legal opinions have been cited in support of it. Well then, if that be the case, the proposal before the House at the present time, embodied in this Bill, is to confer certain powers on the company now proposed to be incorporated which already controls these powers contained in the Act of 1901, and which, therefore, upon the passage of this Bill, would be in a position to control all necessary legislation on the Canadian side, the legislation on the other side having been secured or the company having made application therefor. It would seem to me that these considerations might very well give the government some concern, and I would not think it advisable that the committee should pass this Bill until the government are in a position to announce their policy in regard to it, and say whether or not, particularly in view of the applications before the Waterways Commission, they should give their sanction to legislation which would have that result.

Something has been said as to the rights of the province of Ontario, and hon. gentlemen have been inclined to make rather light of the position of Ontario. The people of Ontario, through their government, have decided that they will embark upon the project of undertaking the development of water-powers in that province and supplying power to the people of that province at cost. By what warrant should the parliament of Canada undertake to give any corporation power to interfere with that project? Is there any good reason in the public interest which can be adduced in favour of such a proposal? The people of Ontario having decided through their legislators, and government that it is in the public interest of that province that water-powers in the province of Ontario should be developed not by private corporations for gain, but by the people of the province in order that every person requiring power in that province should receive it at cost, is it within the fair purview of the parliament of Canada to pass any legislation which will interfere with that project? If any other province in Canada should enter upon and establish the same policy is there any good reason why the parliament of Canada should empower a corporation created for gain to interfere with a public utility of that kind proposed to be carried on by the province itself in the interest of the people of the province? And not only does this Bill propose to do that, but according to hon. gentlemen who have viewed this proposal with favour, the province of Ontario is to have its own lands expropriated, lands which it may require for the purposes of this project, and is to have its own scheme of development interfered with in order that a private corporation may be enabled to make money out of the expropriation of those lands, and out of the scheme carried on by that expropriation. Assuming that the parliament of Canada possesses such a power, it should not be exercised. The people of any province in Canada having determined to enter upon a project of this kind, a project of development of their own natural resources in the interests of the people of the province, should not have that project interfered with in any way by legislation passed by the parliament of Canada in favour of those who seek to develop the same water-powers for the purpose of gain. Such legislation would seem to me to be most undesirable for this parliament to embark upon, and yet if the argument of hon. gentlemen is correct as to the powers of this parliament, that certain result would follow.

The hon. member for Carleton, New Brunswick, (Mr. Carvell) referred to the desirability of granting these powers, because he said it might result in the creation of power on the United States side which would thus be imported into Canada, so giving to the people of this country greater opportunities of obtaining power than would otherwise be the case. So far as the development of power on the Canadian side or the United States side of the St. Lawrence river is concerned, it seems to me that would depend a great deal on where the dam is constructed. You might construct a dam on the St. Lawrence at one place and find the power nearly altogether on the American side; you might construct it at another place some distance away, and find that the power would be developed on the Canadian side. So I would not agree in the view that it is eminently desirable to pass this legislation, because under it the power to be created will be created on the United States side, and not on the Canadian.

Mr. CARVELL. My hon. friend misunderstood my statement. I made no such statement. The hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) stated that from his knowledge of the location the power would be developed on the American side. I said: So much the more necessity for this, if you cannot get the power on the Canadian side.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I apologize if I misunderstood my hon. friend; that is the way I understood his reference to the statement of the hon. member for Westmorland. It seems to me this consideration is another reason why we should not be too hasty about this legislation. If the St. Lawrence is to be dammed to create power —and as to the expediency of that, as at present advised, I would have a great deal of doubt,—I think it might be important to come to a conclusion as to the best place in the interests of the country for building such a dam and creatig power, for the very reason to which I have just alluded.

Mr. PUGSLEY. If I understand my hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) aright, his principal objection to this Bill is that in some way it would be interfering with the project of the Hydro-Electric Commission of the province of Ontario.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I did not say that was the principal one.

Mr. PUGSLEY. If that were so quite a strong argument could be presented, but has any one suggested that the Ontario government or the Hydro-Electric Commission propose to develop this water-power?

Mr. G. TAYLOR. Certainly.

Mr. PUGSLEY. No one has suggested that; it does not appear in the report that they propose to develop this power and the complete answer to the suggestion is that the Ontario government has no power on earth to develop this water-power. It is a power contained in a navigable river which, under the British North America Act, is obsolutely under the control of this parliament. Another insuperable objection is that it is an international river, and no power can be created there by the building of a dam unless that dam extends all the way across the river into American territory and I do not think any province has power to engage in the construction of a work which of necessity extends outside of the limits of the province. Therefore, for two reasons, neither the Ontario government nor the Hydro-Electric Commission created by it would have power to engage in this work, first because it is a navigable water, jurisdiction over which rests absolutely with this parliament, and secondly, because it is an international river, and for that reason the legislature of the province of Ontario would have no authority over it.

Mr. SPROULE. Then how did they get it at Niagara?

Mr. PUGSLEY. They do not, they rent from a company incorporated entirely outside the Hydro-Electric Commission.

Mr. HUGHES. A provincial charter?

Mr. PUGSLEY. They got a provincial charter, but if I mistake not they came to this parliament and also got it confirmed. But the reason, and the only reason, why they were enabled to go ahead there, was that they leased the ground from the Park Commission. Then there is no dam at Niagara Falls.

Mr. SPROULE. It being an international stream the minister would say that power could not be developed by the province and I ask how it was done there?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Because the works there are wholly on the Ontario side. Here it is proposed to erect a dam and the same must extend across the river in order to develop power. The Ontario legislature could not, in my judgment, authorize the construction of a dam to connect with a dam on the American side, because it would be all one work and beyond the jurisdiction of the province of Ontario. Neither could it authorize an obstruction in a navigable river. I do not deny that the Ontario government has constructed works for the development of water-powers in navigable waters. In that respect, I think—and it is worth the attention of the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Blain) who dwells so strongly on provincial rights—in that respect, I think they have encroached upon the jurisdiction of this parliament and have sought to do what this parliament and this parliament alone can do. It does seem to me that I ought to call the attention of the Committee to the fact that this Bill does not profess to give any authority to develop water-power upon the St. Lawrence or anywhere else. It merely incorporates a company for the purpose of distributing electrical energy.

Mr. BRODER. Don't you think the Bill should say where they intend to get the electric current from?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not think so. Before they commence operations the plans must be approved by the Governor General in Council, and the Bill will only come into operation by proclamation.

Mr. HUGHES. Does the minister state there is no proposition here to develop power along the St. Lawrence?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Not in this Bill.

Mr. HUGHES. Read subsection 5 of section 11.

Mr. PUGSLEY. These expropriation powers would be the power to string wires and place poles, but not the right to develop water-powers.

Mr. HUGHES. Has not the power to be obtained from the St. Lawrence river?

Mr. PUGSLEY. There is not a word in this Bill which gives authority to develop water-power along the St. Lawrence.

Mr. BLAIN. Does not the minister think they will develop their power on the St. Lawrence?

Mr. PUGSLEY. This Bill simply enables them to rent from another company which may develop power.

Mr. BLAIN. Where does the minister think they will get their power?

Mr. PUGSLEY. My own idea is that they will get their power from a company which may develop it along the St. Lawrence. I do not know that to be the case but I suspect it. This Bill simply incorporates a transmission company which would have to make an arrangement with another company for its power. The development of power upon the St. Lawrence must be provided for by another statute, but this Bill does not give the slightest authority to dam the St.Lawrence or construct any works in the St. Lawrence or anywhere else except such works as are essential for a transmission line. As head of the department which has been investigating this subject, the matter has come before me and hon. gentlemen are doubtless aware that the plans of the company were submitted to the government for the development of water-powers on the St. Lawrence. It was directed that these plans should be referred to the chief engineer of the Department of Railways, the chief engineer of Public Works, and the chief engineer of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Under what statute did the company profess to be acting when it submitted these plans?

Mr. PUGSLEY. They did not state, but I understood it to be under the St. Lawrence Power Company charter granted by this parliament some years ago. I also understood from them that they expected to have to come back to parliament to get authority to dam the St. Lawrence.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. They have it under the other statute.

Mr. PUGSLEY. So my hon. friend (Mr. Emmerson) thinks, but they did not lead us to understand that they had. The three engineers to whom the plans were referred reported adversely to the plans as originally proposed, and they suggested certain modifications which were accepted. The engineers reported that the project was feasible, that the dam could be erected without interference with navigation, and the matter is now before the International Waterways Commission. I can assure the committee—

Mr. HUGHES. I understand that the Waterways Commission have stated that while they are ready to hear any one, they are not ready to deal with the question.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The International Waterways Commissioners are hearing parties, pro and con, in order to get all the information possible, as the government desire they should do. They heard the statement of the transportation interest and representatives from the city of Montreal and others.

Mr. HUGHES. That is some time ago.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Some few weeks ago.

Mr. S. SHARPE. What power has the International Waterways Commission to deal with this matter?

Mr. PUGSLEY. They simply advise. It must be borne in mind that there is no doubt that the American section of the International Waterways Commission seems to be very strongly of the opinion that it is to the public advantage to develop the water-powers in the St. Lawrence at the Long Sault, and that not only will navigation not be interfered with, but that it will be improved. It is, of course, desirable that the Canadian section should examine into the subject from every possible standpoint and be quite sure that the decision will be in accordance with the public interest.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The minister was about to give some assurance to the committee when he was interrupted.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I was going to assure the committee that no plans would be approved of, no arrangement would be approved of, no agreement would be ratified by the government which does not amply protect Canadian interests. So far as the Department of Public Works is concerned, I can assure the committee that the plans will not be approved of unless upon the express stipulation, which will be thoroughly safeguarded, that one-half of the water-power which will be developed will be reserved absolutely for the use of the people on the Canadian side of the line.

Mr. HUGHES. Are these the dam plans?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes.

Mr. HUGHES. The thing is under consideration then?

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is the view my department has arrived at, and that will be made a sina qua non of any action the department will take.

Mr. J. D. REID. Has your department power to do that without the consent of parliament?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think not. Parliament will have to consent to the matter in the end, and my recollection is that some time ago, in answer to a question put by the hon. member (Mr. Hughes) the Prime Minister stated that before the plans were approved of, the whole matter would be submitted to parliament for consideration, and before definite action would be taken, parliament must be satisfied that the work will be in the interest of Canada.

Mr. EMMERSON. Were these plans which were submitted by the St. Lawrence Power Company to your department for approval, plans for the construction of a work to connect with another work that would come out from the American shore?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, the plans were for damming the river across from the Canadian side to the American side, and also for the building of a lock for the purpose of improving navigation, the idea being to give an additional lock to the one that is already there, and which was constructed, and is owned by the Canadian government.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. Does the plan provide for a lock on the American side?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, and that is strongly objected to by the engineers of the department. They urge that the lock should be built on the Canadian side.

Mr. BRODER. Were those plans not submitted to the Waterways Commission?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I understand they were.

Mr. BRODER. But the people who appeared before that commission had not access to them.

Mr. PUGSLEY. When these gentlemen came before the government they were told to go before the commission, and submit their plans with the view of all parties being notified so that they should have an opportunity of seeing the plans. Then, after the commission had decided the matter, it would be further taken up, and considered by the government.

Mr. BRODER. Is the hon. minister aware that the Waterways Commission absolutely refused to consider the details of the matter at all?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Such information has not come to me and I am not aware of it having come to any other member of the government, or any other department. With regard to the compensation to be paid, I, as Minister of Public Works, have been called on to consider the matter with the view of determining what would be fair to Canada in case we should finally approve of these works; and I am prepared to say that, so far as my department is concerned—and it will have a good deal to do with the fixing of rates—it will recommend to council that no agreement be entered into and no approval be given the works of the company unless there goes into the treasury of Canada as much revenue from this power as will go into the treasury of the state of New York. I shall insist that Canada shall be treated on an equal footing with the United States; and although our information is that at the point where it is proposed to build this dam, about ninety per cent of the water is on the American side, yet I shall insist, if we take any action in the matter at all—and I do not say that we shall—that at least one-half of the power shall be absolutely reserved for use on the Canadian side, and the revenue we shall receive shall be reasonable, and not be less than that received by the state of New York under the Bill to which my hon. friend from Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) has referred.

Mr. HUGHES. Are the works under the Act of 1901?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not think so. The plans are submitted for approval by the company which was incorporated under the statute of 1901. But I understand that before the company will be allowed to proceed any further, it will require to have the consent of this House, and must come to parliament for further legislation. That was the assurance which the right hon. the Prime Minister gave the House in answer to my hon. friend from Victoria and Haliburton (Mr. Hughes).

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Why should the hon. minister expect that the money derived from this source should go to the Dominion treasury, and not to the local government? In New York it goes to the state government.

Mr. PUGSLEY. There is a great difference between the jurisdiction of the state of New York over rivers, and that of a Dominion province. The state of New York has jurisdiction over, not only the soil, but the waters, and rivers within its territory, whereas a province of Canada has no jurisdiction over navigable waters.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What jurisdiction has New York over its waters?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Congress has no jurisdiction.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. But I understand that application was made to Congress by the state of New York for legislation in that connection.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I believe there has been legislation by Congress to remove any doubts, but at all events the state of New York has power to grant a charter while, in my judgment, a provincial legislature has not. For that reason I would say that the treasury of Canada is entitled to receive the revenue from this water-power, the sole jurisdiction to deal with which is vested in the Dominion parliament.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Will my hon. friend say that the soil of a river is vested in the Crown in the right of Canada.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is a point on which I do not care to express an opinion, nor do I think would my hon. friend. I do not think the question is settled as to where the ownership of the soil in navigable water rests. It may belong to the riparian owner, and in this case the riparian owners, I understand, are the St. Lawrence Power Company, for that company has acquired the land where these works are to be situated. That would be the law in my province. There the property in the soil, above the ebb and flow of the tide rests in the riparian owners.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I have not examined the question at all, and would not care to pronounce an opinion, but I understood the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Robert Smith) to say it had been settled by a decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

Mr. ROBERT SMITH. Mr. Stanton on behalf of the Ontario government so argued.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am not aware of any such decision. If the land had not been granted, undoubtedly it would rest in the provincial government. That was the case at Niagara Falls.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Does my hon. friend mean the land bordering the river or covered with water?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The land covered with water. In the case of the company which developed the power at Niagara Falls, my hon. friend will remember that the Niagara Park Commission are the riparian owners, and as such they gave a lease to a company which developed the water-power. That company leased the power to the Hydro-Electric Commission. But that is not the case at Long Sault. The land there has all been granted by the Ontario government, and I understand that a large portion, if not the whole of it, has been acquired by the St. Lawrence Power Company.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. A great deal would depend on the terms of the grant. It might be made so as to convey the land as far as the middle line of the stream, or it might be made otherwise.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am speaking of a grant in the ordinary terms.

Mr. HUGHES. Has the minister considered what would be the effect which a dam across the St. Lawrence would have on the Ashburton treaty, or whether the two governments combined have authority to close the navigation of that river?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The contention is that the navigation is not to be closed, but improved.

Mr. HUGHES. There can be no question that Great Britain would have to be a consenting party to any legislation providing for the building of a dam.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It might be that Great Britain should be a consenting party. At all events, there is no question that it could be done; it is a matter of detail. So far as the project itself is concerned, apart from the Bill before the House, I do not hesitate to say, speaking my own individual opinion, that, in view of the fact that an enormous water-pawer is there undeveloped, which, with development, could produce some 600,000 horse-power, the question is not one to be turned lightly aside. If that water-power can be developed at reasonable cost so that the people of Ontario can be furnished with cheap power for industrial and lighting purposes, and if navigation will not be injuriously affected, I think that the question is one that is well worthy the consideration of every one who has to do with legislation. Therefore, I am disposed to give the matter my most earnest consideration. I am disposed to look into the plans with great care. And, at the same time, as I have said, so far as I am concerned, I shall consent to no approval of the plans, to no agreement being made, to no development going on, unless there is absolutely and irrevocably secured to Canada half the developed water-power and also equal remuneration, so far as the rates are concerned, for the treasury of Canada as for the treasury of New York.

Mr. EMMERSON. I would like to ask the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley). Why the necessity of this legislation until these questions are determined? This company have come before this government already, as I understand it, and have been referred to the Waterways Commission for suggestions. It is quite apparent that the only way that they hope to acquire power to be distributed is by means of the proposed damming of the St. Lawrence and the carrying out of this scheme. Until this is determined by both governments, why the haste to grant this legislation? Why this leap in the dark?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I will answer as best I can. I do not know what is in the minds of the promoters of the Bill, but it does not occur to me that the Bill provides for great haste, because it is only to come into force on a day to be fixed by proclamation of the Governor in Council, and the Governor in Council will not issue that proclamation until the agreements are entered into, plans are fully considered, and it is understood that the works can be constructed in the public interest and without injury to navigation,—and, I would assume,—they would not issue the proclamation until these agreements were submitted and ratified by parliament.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The minister has frankly admitted that this Bill is really part of a larger scheme. There cannot be any doubt of that after the frank statement of the minister. It seems to me it might have been fairer to parliament and to the people, if some of these details could have been set before us——

Mr. PUGSLEY. If the hon. member will pardon me: I saw it stated somewhere, that the chairman of the Conservation Commission had written a letter to the committee in which he pointed out this very fact, that they were undoubtedly connected together, referring to the fact of the incorporators being the same,—and at his suggestion all the objectionable features were struck out.

Mr. BLAIN. Not all.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think so. I think the Bill is as harmless as any legislation you can have. And, in any case, it is not to become law until it is approved by the Governor in Council.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The Bill is harmless if the larger project of which it is part is harmless. I would ask the minister, if he has any objection to bringing down the plans which are under consideration. As the minister has referred to them in debate, we have the right to ask for them. But I do not put it so much on that ground as on the ground of public interest, that these plans, which have evidently been under consideration for a long time, should be disclosed to parliament in order that we may know exactly what the promoters of this scheme have in contemplation, and what the government is now considering Would there be any objection?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think not. Of course, they are not completed. They are not in the possession of the government at present, because they were referred to the Waterways Commission. I see no objection to producing them; I think it quite reasonable and fair and would be glad they should be produced. At the same time, I do not withdraw the statement I made, that they are not essential to the consideration of this Bill.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. That depends on whether this Bill is really a part of a larger scheme. The minister stated his opinion—and he knows more about the matter than any other hon. member—that the promoters of this Bill expect, under the provisions of this measure, to get their power from a certain source. The Bill will be useless until the larger project is carried out. So there cannot be any great haste about this Bill, as my hon. friend from Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) has observed. Speaking of the necessity of providing power for eastern Ontario, I have not heard of any great outcry from the people of that section for a further supply of power. I have been informed by hon. members from the very locality in question that there is a considerable amount of power that cannot find a market.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Will the hon. member (Mr. R. L. Borden) permit me to interrupt. I have been told by an authority which I cannot ignore and which I fully believe, that more than one important industry has moved from eastern Ontario to western Ontario just in order to get close to electrical power. The people in the vicinity of Brockville are very much in earnest over this. They feel that that section of the country is suffering by reason of the western development from the benefits of which they are excluded.

Mr. BRODER. There is a power developed at Iroquois, on which 500 horse-power is already available, with 2,000 more to be developed. The representative of that concern has been running around Prescott and Brockville for three months and offering them power at very reasonable rates——

Mr. PUGSLEY. What is 500 horse-power?

Mr. BRODER. He is able to offer 2,500.

Mr. PARDEE. How are they going to get it to Brockville?

Mr. BRODER. How is this company going to get from Cornwall to Brockville?

Mr. PARDEE. Over the transmission line.

Mr. BRODER. They can do it in the same way. It is 35 miles nearer. And, when we come down to that, the power right here in the vicinity of Ottawa is as near Brockville as the Cornwall power. There is no such terrible sweat over this matter. The Minister of Public Works

(Mr. Pugsley) saw fit to make the question of power paramount in this matter. I have always thought that the great navigation system of the St. Lawrence was paramount to the water-power. There is another fact that ought to stare every Canadian in the face: not a solitary American interest will suffer; every interest that runs the risk of injury is a Canadian interest, they have everything to gain and we have everything to lose. Nobody knows what effect a dam at the Long Sault will have upon the river above that point. The outlet of Lake Superior, for instance, is 600 feet higher than the level, say, at Quebec, and you are proposing to dam that river about half way down. The people living along the vicinity of that river have a right to be apprehensive as to the effect of that dam. Engineers have been known to make great mistakes before, in the Quebec bridge for instance, and the mistake they made even at Massena in putting in that enormous power. We are supposed to be governed by these scientific engineers, while the man of common sense is left out of the question altogether. These are questions that should not be dealt with in this flippant way by hon. gentlemen from New Brunswick and other places, who do not care a straw whether we are drowned out in Ontario or not. So far as I am concerned, local interests demand my attention, and as a representative of that section of that country I shall not neglect my duty.

Mr. WRIGHT. Has the Minister of Public Works submitted to the Justice Department the question as to whether this government has any control over navigable waters except for purposes of navigation?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not think it needs one lawyer to submit to another lawyer the question whether this government has not sole jurisdiction to prevent any obstruction in a navigable river, whether by a dam or any other method. That rests entirely with this parliament, under the British North America Act.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Has the hon. gentleman considered the effect of the treaty governing the navigation on this river?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, I have considered that. We recognize that this parliament could not pass any legislation which would authorize a dam to be constructed in a river without putting in a condition that it shall be subject to the approval of the executive government of the United States.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I want to emphasize the position taken by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Blain), and to show the hon. member for Rainy River (Mr. Conmee) that he is mistaken in what he says with regard to the law of the state of New York. There is in the state of New York a commission which governs the rates and all charters on transmission lines. Let him look at the Consolidated Laws of New York for 1909, volume 4, and he will find on page 3395 these words:

Public Service Commissions Law. 'An Act to establish the Public Service Commissions and prescribing their powers and duties, and to provide for the regulation and control of certain public service corporations and making an appropriation therefor.' (Became a law June 6, 1907.)

In clause 4 we read:

Commissions established; appointments; removals; terms of office.

Then on page 3430 he will find article 4 reading as follows:

Provisions relating to gas and electrical corporations; regulation of price of gas and electricity. Sections regarding application of article; general powers of corporations in respect of gas and electricity; inspection of gas and electric meters; approval of incorporation and franchises; certificates; approval of issue of stock, bonds and other forms of indebtedness, approval of transfer of franchise; complaints as to quality and price of gas and electricity; investigation by commission; forms of complaints. Notice and hearing; order fixing price of gas or electricity, or requiring improvements; forfeiture for non-compliance with order; defence in case of excessive charge for gas or electricity; jurisdiction; powers of local officers.

65. Application of article. This article shall apply to the manufacture and furnishing of gas for light, heat or power, and the furnishing of natural gas for light, heat or power, and the generation, furnishing and transmission of electricity for light heat or power.

66. General powers of commissioners in respect to gas and electricity. Each commission shall, within its jurisdiction:

1. Have the general supervision of all persons and corporations having authority under any general or special law, or under any charter of franchise, to lay down, erect or maintain wires, pipes, conduits, ducts or other fixtures in, over or under the streets, highways and public places of any municipality, for the purpose of furnishing or distributing gas, or of furnishing or transmitting electricity for light, heat or power, or maintaining underground conduits or ducts for electrical conductors.

So this commission has charge in the most complete manner of the transmission of electricity and the regulation of rates.

Mr. CONMEE. That law was only passed last year. It does not affect this Bill.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question, question.

Mr. HUGHES. Now that promotion stuff had not better show itself too soon tonight. The Minister of Public Works has stated that there are 500,000 or 600,000 horse-power to be developed at the Sault dam. He has given the whole case away. It seems this matter has been under the consideration of the department for a long time, the scheme has been held up his coat sleeve, it has been engineered by gentlemen interested in it, and these little accessories to the St. Lawrence dam are going to be slipped through, and later on we will be asked to confirm the construction of the dam on the pretense of this 600,000 horse-power that are going to be developed. Why, Sir, within 30 miles of the city of Ottawa there is not 600,000 horse-power lying undeveloped, but 3,000,000 horse-power available and undeveloped, and this is accessible to all those towns like Brockville and Prescott, over which the Minister of Public Works has been moaning, just as accessible to them as is the water-power from the town of Cornwall. Moreover, in the construction of the Georgian Bay canal there will be another 3,000,000 horse-power developed within short range of these very places on the St. Lawrence river. The minister, being so well informed, is possibly aware of the fact that gentlemen connected with this water-power have already been canvassing cities and towns in the state of New York and disposing of hundreds of thousands of horse-power to be derived from the construction of the dam which they have assured the people in the United States is already arranged for with the government of Canada. Might I ask the minister if he has given any guarantee to these people that the Bill will be passed?

Mr. PUGSLEY. There has been no guarantee of any kind given, the matter is simply under consideration. No decision has been arrived at, and no assurance of any kind has been given.

Mr. HUGHES. They have had the minister's word at one time, for he has assured them that they must give at least one-half the power to Canada.

Mr. PUGSLEY. If anything is done.

Mr. HUGHES. There is another important point. The shore on the north side of the St. Lawrence river is low; the shore on the south side is comparatively high. Under past conditions spring freshets have again and again done a great deal of damage to the immediate shores on the north side of the St. Lawrence river. If this enormous dam is constructed, raising the water to a very great height, when the spring freshets and the ice jam come along, still further damming the waters up, they may possibly overflow the whole shore of the St. Lawrence. The height of land between the St. Lawrence and the Ottawa is just a few miles from the St. Lawrence. Therefore, it is easily within the bounds of possibility that if this dam were constructed the whole eastern part of the province would be flooded by the jamming of the ice at the dam. But to my mind there is a more important element than the mere mercenary aspect of the case. The old historic river St. Lawrence is there, and we want the free navigation of that river. We do not want to go through any lock on the American side. We prefer to have it the same as it is at Sault Ste. Marie, and also the same as it is between Lakes Erie and Ontario. We want to go through canals on our own side and control them, we want free canals and the free navigation of the river, so that the products of our country may reach the ocean untrammelled by any dam. I would certainly recommend that this Bill be held over until the whole matter could be carefully looked into. I am satisfied that the minister will make as much progress with it as if he were to try to rush it through at the present time. I very much regret to see the anxiety displayed by a number of gentlemen who have no interest in the question, have never seen the river St. Lawrence or the rapids, and probably never will, to push this Bill through, though it concerns a work in which they can have no possible interest excepting an acquired interest.

Mr. EMMERSON. I think we can fairly state that this Bill came before this committee, if indeed it did not come before the House on its introduction, under false pretenses. It occurs to me that every fear I have expressed in regard to this Bill has been confirmed. I venture to say that the St. Lawrence Power Company's Bill of 1901 passed through parliament without ever a thought being given to the possibility that it contained powers that would enable the company to dam the St. Lawrence river in connection with any other company that might be incorporated under an American charter. I will go farther and say that the very promoters of that Bill in 1901 had no thought of the greater scheme which they evidently now have, or which somebody for them has, in contemplation. Apparently these gentlemen have come to the Department of Public Works and have asked for the approval of a plan. They surely would not go to the expense of procuring the necessary data to enable them to prepare the plans in the first place—even only to prepare them—without they thought that they had the power and authority from parliament to erect the works which are set forth in these plans. It must be apparent to every member of this committee that these applicants were and are under the impression that they were authorized by their own legislation to construct their dam on the St. Lawrence to the American boundary. Else why would they prepare plans? They must, on laying their plans before the Minister of Public Works, have placed before him the authority under which they came. No man goes to the Minister of Railways and Canals seeking the approval of a route map unless he takes with him the act of this parliament authorizing the construction of the railway to be built on that route. I venture to assert that there would be no one so foolish as to go to the Minister of Public Works and ask him to approve of a plan unless he showed the minister the authority under which he wished to construct the works in accordance with those plans. Evidently they thought they had the power or the authority from this parliament. How many people in Canada thought they had it? We have read the discussions in the public newspapers in reference to this matter, we have read of the hearings that were had before the Waterways Commission; how many readers of these newspapers but were under the impression that this was preliminary to the applicants coming to parliament to seek legislation and to seek powers? No one ever dreamed that these people had these powers or thought they had the powers. It has been mentioned even by members of parliament that such a Bill would be before parliament. Evidently the applicants have no such idea, evidently they think that they have the whole matter arranged and that all they now need is the approval of plans. What is the use of submitting it to the Waterways Commission when the suggestion is made that these gentlemen have that power as far as this parliament is concerned? It has been repeatedly stated that this Bill does not authorize them to build dams. Certainly it does not. They do not seek to get such powers. Any objection which I have taken to this Bill has not been on any such ground, but it is for this reason I have stated that they had hoped to build this dam under the authority of the Act of 1901, when it was never contemplated by parliament that any such works should be so constructed, and when it is necessary that these people, who wish to work out this scheme, shall get supplementary powers, we should withhold such supplementary powers until we regulate in some way the legislation of 1901 with respect to the powers which they claim we gave them, and which perhaps we did, to enable them to construct a dam on the St. Lawrence in conjunction with American legislation. That is the objection I have to the enactment of this legislation. The hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) has asked, and very properly asked: Is there any objection to having the plans laid before this committee before this legislation proceeds? I think that is a fair request and I think that the Minister of Public Works should accede to it because it is a fair proposition. What does this legislation mean? How many of us know? I do not. How many hon. members know what it does contemplate? It evidently means the transmission of power in connection with some scheme that is to be carried out under legislation already had from this parliament, and that legislation warranted the promoters in preparing plans for the carrying out of this scheme. What are those plans? It would give us and the country an insight into the objects and proposals of these applicants and would be only fair that every member of this committee should have the plans before him to see just what they have in mind, what they propose and desire to carry out and what they wish us to give this legislation for now in order to enable them to carry it out to its full completion, because the generation of power without the ability to distribute and utilize it would be of no advantage to them. I would suggest that the committee should rise and before we further consider the matter the plans should be before us. It is an important matter. No Bill of a private nature more far reaching in its consequence has been brought to the notice of a committee of parliament for many years. It affects not only our internal affairs, our provincial affairs, but it affects our international relations under a treaty of the empire. I submit that we should not be called on at this time to decide yea or nay with respect to this Bill, we should first have an opportunity of viewing the plans.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I would suggest to the Minister of Finance that the committee ought to rise at this stage.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I would yield at once to the suggestion of my hon. friend (Mr. Emmerson) if it were not for the fact that this Bill gives no authority whatever to construct any works on the St. Lawrence river, and for the further reason that the Prime Minister has made the statement to this House that before any authority is given to construct any dam in the St. Lawrence, the matter shall first be submitted to and approved of by this parliament. Nothing could be fairer than that. No matter what the company thinks its powers are, there is a reserve power vested in the Governor in Council, and that will not be exercised and this company allowed to go ahead until the whole matter is submitted to parliament.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The very fact that the minister has mentioned ought to give us pause. It would seem that it is too big a question to leave in the hands of the Governor in Council for submission to parliament.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I said it had to be submitted to parliament.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I cannot conceive that the Minister of Public Works and the government would send the engineers of three different departments to investigate and report on it unless they were inclined to concur in the view of the St. Lawrence Power Company that authority exists at the present time. It seem a remarkable state of affairs to exist if the minister's statement is to be accepted without qualification. Here is a company which on the premises laid down by the minister has no power to build a dam on the St. Lawrence, and yet we find this government on the application of this company which has no statutory powers sending engineers of three departments to investigate. Does any one imagine that this would have been done unless there was something more in the supposed authority and power than the minister has disclosed to us? Why should the minister, at the instance of people who, according to his statement, have absolutely no power to do anything of the kind, have caused to be sent the engineers of three departments to investigate and report on these plans?

Mr. EMMERSON. Why is it left to the Waterways Commission?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Yes. There seems to be a great deal more at the back of this than any one suspected. I am astonished to learn that this project has gone so far without anything being known to parliament. It is not of such trivial importance as the minister suggests. At the present time a vessel can go from the ocean into the great lakes, and never leave Canadian waters. Under the proposals of the government nothing of the kind can take place because, as I said, the Minister—

Mr. PUGSLEY. The same lock will exist on the Canadian side, all vessels going up through the river pass through that lock.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I understood from the scheme as disclosed to me by the minister that the lock would be on the American side.

Mr. PUGSLEY. There will be two locks, one on the American side.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. If I am not correct in my appreciation of what the minister said, I withdraw any argument on that point, but apart from that it is a very big proposal and one which concerns the commerce of this country from end to end, concerns every part of Canada, concerns the future interests of this country in several very important respects. Inasmuch as this Bill is not to go into force until proclaimed by order in council, inasmuch as the minister himself has said that, according to his understanding, this company is to get its power from this source, why is there such tremendous haste to press this Bill? There seems to be no occasion for haste in any of the circumstances disclosed. I concur in the suggestion of my hon. friend from Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) that the plans should be laid on the table of the House before this Bill which is only part of a greater project should be submitted to this committee.

Mr. FIELDING. In answer to the suggestion of the leader of the opposition, I am not aware that the government have made any proposals at all. This is a private Bill, and I have no desire to have it treated differently from any other private Bill. I have not followed the matter as closely as some hon. gentlemen. I am very much impressed by the fact that this Bill was examined by the Committee on Private Bills, that objection was taken, it was referred to the Conservation Commission, amendments were proposed and the committee, as I understand, unanimously reported the Bill.

An hon. MEMBER. Oh, no.

Mr. FIELDING. It was so stated in the House. At all events, the committee reported the Bill. There are occasions when members of the House who have given close personal attention to a matter feel free to go outside of the report of the committee, but the general trend of the House is that where a Bill is investigated and examined by a committee and reported, the judgment of the committee should be sustained. Speaking for myself, I see no objection to it going through. It is a private Bill, we have adopted it, and whatever the sense of the House may be, we may as well take it.

Mr. COWAN. The Minister of Public Works has announced that when this Bill is passed the government will have all the powers that are needed to enable this company to dam the St. Lawrence, and that all this company will have to do would be to submit the plans to the Department of Public Works and have them approved. The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) told us there was no connection between the promoters of this Bill and the parties incorporated in the Bill in 1901 and he further said that the Act of 1901 was void. He told us also that the company incorporated in 1901 never developed power, and in that statement he was corrected by the hon. member for Stormont. But the Minister of Public Works let the feline out of the sack when he told us that this company far from being defunct had actually prepared plans and laid them before his department for approval, under, I presume, the navigable waters Act.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Not at all.

Mr. COWAN. At any rate the plans were before the minister and the minister has been considering them, and apparently they are awaiting the approval of the government and the passage of this Bill. The Minister of Public Works has also stated that he would give authority to this company rather than to the province, because he says the province has no power to construct a dam to the boundary of the United States. But surely this parliament can invest the province with exactly the same powers that it may invest a private corporation with, and in view of the fact that the province is developing power at cost to supply the people cheaply, surely, if the minister were actuated by the proper spirit he would empower the province rather than a private corporation whose object is to make a profit. The Minister of Public Works also said that he would take the revenues to the Dominion rather than to the province, because as he understands it the ownership of the bed of the stream is in the Dominion.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I did not say so; I said it was because the jurisdiction over these water-powers rests entirely with the Dominion parliament.

Mr. COWAN. I understood the minister to say that the ownership of the foreshore, down to the water at least, did not rest with the province.

Mr. PUGSLEY. If the land was granted I did not think it did.

Mr. COWAN. If I remember right in Caldwell vs. Hurdman it was held that the province had the right to grant these water lots on the bed and foreshore of the Ottawa river which was a navigable stream. If in that case the title rested with the province it would seem to raise some question as to whether or not the title to the bed and foreshore of the St. Lawrence is not in the province of Ontario. It seems to me that this House instead of guessing at what its rights are should defer discussion on the Bill until they are ascertained. Surely the Minister of Public Works is willing to give to the province a power which it is exercising in the public interest, surely he would prefer to give that power to the province rather than to a private corporation, surely the House would hesitate before it dams up and annihilates a portion of an international waterway established such by solemn treaty between two nations; surely the government will not attempt to rush through this legislation without considering all these questions. If that be the case, the Canadian locks will no longer serve the purposes of transportation and we will be driven to using these locks built on the American side, the title to which is to be vested in the State of New York

When the discussion began, I saw no particular reason why I should oppose the Bill, but I think abundant reasons have been developed in the course of the discussion, and no interest will suffer if the matter is allowed to remain until opportunity be given to examine the plans and to ascertain the status and rights of all parties.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. I understood from the Minister of Public Works a few minutes ago that, when he was negotiating with the promoters of this scheme—the original company chartered in 1901—he declared that in case any arrangement should be agreed to, the Dominion treasury would receive as much as the state of New York. What I want to ask him is what provision he has made to protect the citizens of this country. Would this company come under the Board of Railway Commissioners which would regulate the prices the Canadian public would have to pay?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The company waited upon me through its representative, was the company called the St. Lawrence Power Company, incorporated by the state of New York. They were desirous of getting the requisite authority from the Canadian government and parliament to carry out their scheme. I stated to them—and they seemed disposed to acquiesce in the view—that, so far as my department was concerned, we should insist that the power should be equally divided or rather that at least one-half should be absolutely reserved for use on the Canadian side, and also that we should receive the same revenue as that derived by the state of New York, and in addition that the rates should be under the control of the Board of the Railway Commission, so that both the public interest would be protected, and we would get our share of the revenue.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. That is information which the hon. gentleman did not give us before. A moment ago when a question was put to him about the navigation of the river, he said that the locks were there, and the boats could go up as they do now. But in case this dam is built, and built at the head of the locks, and the water raised fifteen or twenty feet, how are the boats going to get up the Canadian side?

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend is misinformed. The plan submitted by the engineers show no such state of affairs. They refused to approve any plans which would interfere with the Canadian locks.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. I know the canal and the locks, and all about it. If you build a dam to raise the water——

Mr. PUGSLEY. Whatever parliament will be asked to do—if the matter ever goes that far—the plans will all be submitted for the information of the House. I would have no objection to submitting them at any time; but before parliament will be asked to take steps, the plans will be laid on the table.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. We are asked to make a very important step now, and we ought to see the plans. It is now half past one in the morning, and in view of the fact that this Bill was before the Private Bills Committee and that committee made a report by no means unanimous, several amendments having been submitted, and only voted down by a majority of two or three——

Mr. FIELDING. Was there a minority report?

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. No, but the minority did not approve of the committee's action, and the majority was a very slight one. As the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) says, we have had a great deal of new light since the Private Bills Committee made its report. No one knew in that committee that this company was part of the parent company of 1901, which was given the power of damming the river. That was never mentioned then.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am told it was mentioned and mentioned several times, in addition to having a letter from the chairman to that effect.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. It was not admitted by the Minister of Public Works as he has admitted it to-night. Nobody knew that he had sent his engineers to look the ground over.

Mr. CONMEE. There would have been a bigger majority if that had been known.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. My hon. friend knows better. The hon. member for Westmorland has expressed a different opinion. He admits that he has been enlightened by the information we have had from the Minister of Public Works, and so has every other hon. member. I certainly think that the Bill should stand over, and the opinion of the Minister of Justice be taken on the matter. Before we pass this legislation, which will enable the company to proceed under the Act passed in 1901, giving it full powers to go on, and build dams and wings and locks and anything it likes, we should hesitate, and take time for reflection.

Mr. HUGHES. A little while ago the Minister of Public Works referred to a promise made by the Prime Minister. I have been endeavouring to find out what that promise is, but have not succeeded, and in view of the fact that this is rather an important Bill, I think the government should not press it through committee to-night. Since the Act of 1901 gives the company power to build that dam, has not the Prime Minister's promise been violated, that the company could do nothing farther without coming to parliament?

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend surely is not serious in putting that question? What the right hon. the Prime Minister said was that the matter would be laid before parliament, and parliament be asked to give its opinion upon it, but that referred to future action.

Mr. HUGHES. But the company already has the authority, and does not need to go to parliament. It is independent of the Prime Minister.

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, because it cannot do anything until it gets its plans approved, and my right hon. colleague said that it could not get permission to go ahead until its application had been submitted to parliament.

Mr. HUGHES. The hon. the Minister of Finance referred to the fact that this Bill had received the sanction of the Committee on Private Bills. Is he aware that developments have taken place here to-night which he did not hear of before?

Mr. FIELDING. I was not before the Committee on Private Bills, and so did not hear anything.

Mr. HUGHES. Will the Minister of Public Works say that facts have not been developed to-night that were never heard before the Private Bills Committee?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am not able to admit that because, from the statements made, I would conclude that the Private Bills Committee was informed of everything material.

Mr. HUGHES. Will my hon. friend not admit that he himself has made statements to-night which for the first time have been made to the country?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not think so, because this matter has been in the press for months. A good many months ago it was reported that the engineers had considered the matter and had made a report; that that report had been referred back to them and they had made a new report which had gone to the Waterway Commission.

Mr. HUGHES. The minister has kept tab on the press.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I always read the papers.

Mr. HUGHES. Was there any system by which all this was done and yet the House and the country kept in the dark? Will the minister tell me what is to be the height of this dam?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Believing, as I did, that that had nothing to do with the Bill before the House, I have not the information with me.

Mr. HUGHES. The minister remembers so clearly what is in the newspapers, I should think he could remember a little item like that. Has he any report of the effect the raising of this water by the dam is likely to have on the Canadian shore and upon the Canadian locks?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question.

Mr. HUGHES. Hon. members opposite can earn their money easier than this.

Mr. PUGSLEY. My view is that the hon. member (Mr. Hughes) is not acting in a manner worthy of himself and his standing in this House in making the vile insinuation with regard to gentlemen on this side—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I think the hon. member should not use the expression 'vile insinuation.'

Mr. PUGSLEY. When an hon. member of this House——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I will not argue, Mr. Chairman, but at once withdraw the expression. But I think, on reflection, my hon. friend (Mr. Hughes), even though the hour is late and he is perhaps unconscious of what he says, when he realizes the extraordinary nature of the insinuation he has made, will withdraw it.

Mr. HUGHES. If the minister will pay attention to the gentlemen behind him, many of them from other provinces and who never saw the St. Lawrence rapids, and will try to keep them in order, I shall be glad. But I deny his right to lecture me in this House. I was asking, when I was interrupted by the unseemly conduct of gentlemen behind the minister——

Mr. PUGSLEY. The hon. gentleman must withdraw that.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman should not use that expression.

Mr. HUGHES. I will retract that, if you say——

Some hon. MEMBERS. No conditions.

Mr. HUGHES. I will withdraw it unconditionally. The conduct struck me as unseemly, but I will not use the expression. Now, will the minister tell me the effect of this dam on the Canadian shore between Cornwall and the Galops rapids?

Mr PUGSLEY. I regret that I cannot give the information. These matters will be very carefully considered before the government takes action.

Mr. PUGSLEY.

Mr. J. D. REID. I am surprised the minister wants to leave this question to be decided by his engineers. If we consider how the engineers, not only in his, but in other departments, have given decisions for some little time, I think it will be safer to leave the matter in the hands of hon. members of this House. In his own department, we have seen an engineer put an upset price of 20 cents a yard on dredging and that dredging afterwards said to be done at a reasonable price at 90 cents a yard. And we have investigations going on in the Public Accounts Committee in regard to the decisions of engineers on the Transcontinental, and the people have no great confidence so far as their workings are concerned. Now, here is a great work which the government is going to grant power to undertake—for, I take it from what the minister has stated, that it is the intention of the government to grant this franchise to dam the St. Lawrence river.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I have not given any intimation of that kind. The government has not decided the matter.

Mr. J. D. REID. They could not get through first a Bill giving power to dam the St. Lawrence. That Bill will come after. The hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) tells us that this company had practically deceived us in bringing the matter before the committee. Let me tell the minister what the company did do. The promoters of this Bill went into every town, beginning at Prescott, and told the people they could not give them power unless the dam was put across the St. Lawrence. They took people down to Cornwall, paying all their expenses and entertained them. They have men employed in every town from Cornwall to Brockville to promote this scheme. They have newspapers subsidized throughout the Dominion to influence the public in favour of this work. I have heard on good authority that they have placed $2,000,000 simply to pay out for this great scheme. And let me tell the minister that the company behind this scheme is greater than all the railways and the Standard Oil Company put together. Here is an article in a magazine that explains what this trust is. I will read a little of it——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read it all.

Mr. J. D. REID. Well, perhaps I will. I think it will be interesting to gentlemen on the other side. For I have confidence in hon. members opposite that, if they knew what this scheme was, they would not go into it so lightly. I believe they want to know the facts and to do what is fair. There are many members opposite who do not know anything about this matter. But we who live along the St. Lawrence river know the conditions, and we want the committee to treat us justly. Let me read part of a magazine article that will be interesting. It is headed: 'A gigantic new trust in sight':

It is found in the great water-powers of the country. And those are to-day well on the way to control by a trust bigger than any that has ever been dreamed of; a trust that, if it shall be able to carry out the systematic plan now in hand will be as wealthy as if it owned all the railroads of the nation, with standard oil and United States steel on top. Then a few score of the minor trusts tossed in for good measure.

This is the water-power trust. Its existence was first suspected by government officials five years ago. Since then it has been gathering in the best power sights in every part of the country. It has subsidiaries that operate in Canada. It has grown to such proportions, and its purpose to monopolize the water-power of a continent that has become so plainly apparent, that President Roosevelt thus referred to it not long ago in his veto of the James River Dam Bill:

The people of the country are threatened by a monopoly far more powerful because in far closer touch with their domestic and industrial life, than anything known to our experience. A single generation will see the exhaustion of our natural resources of oil and gas and such a rise in the price of coal as will make the prices of electrically transmitted water-power a controlling factor in transportation, in manufacturing, and in household lighting and heating.

President Roosevelt told congress that thirteen corporations or interests, centering in the General Electric and the Westinghouse Electric, now controlled one-third of the developed water-power of the country, and added:

This astonishing consolidation has taken place practically within the last five years. The movement is still in its infancy, and unless it is controlled the history of the oil industry will be repeated in the hydro-electric power industry, with results far more oppressive and disastrous to the people. It is true that the great bulk of our potential water-power is as yet undeveloped, but the sites which are now controlled by combinations are those which offer the greatest advantages and therefore hold a strategic position.

That message said President Roosevelt, a few days after it had been delivered, was one of the most important in my whole administration. This proposal, now far under way to accomplishment, of monopolizing the nations water-power, has a significance which ought to be made clear to the people.

Up at the top of this scheme stand the General Electric Company, with $65,000,000 capital and $15,000,000 funded debt, and the Westinghouse Electric and Manufacturing Company with $28,000,000 stock and $29,000,000 funded debt. The General Electric owns all the shares of the Edison and Thompson-Houston Company and the British Thompson-Houston; the Sprague Electric Company, the Stanley Electric Manufacturing Company, and the Electric Bond and Share Company are controlled; and the company is identified in various ways with many other corporations.

Relations between the General Electric and Westinghouse are indicated by the fact that since 1896 their patents have been pooled. The Westinghouse Company controls the stock of British, Canadian and French Westinghouse Companies, both General Electric and Westinghouse interests appear in the officiary or directorates of the numerous corporations that are broadly denominated as related to the water-power trust. The investigations by the government have caused the following companies to be classified as of general electric affiliation:

United Electric Securities, Electrical Securities Corporation, Electric Bond and Share Company, Schenectady Power Company, Caroline Power and Light Company, Rockingham (North Carolina) Power Company, Animas Power and Water Company (Colorado), Central Colorado Power Company, Montgomery (Alabama) Light and Water Power Company, Summit County Power Company (Colorado), Butte Electric and Power Company (Montana), Montana Power Transmission Company, Madison River Power Company (Montana), Billings and Eastern Montana Power Company, Washington Water Power Company (Washington and Idaho), Great Western Power Company (California); besides a number of others whose connection with general electric is indicated.

The Westinghouse group, as classified by the government investigators, includes the Security Investment Company (New York), The Electric Properties Company (New York), the 'Smith interests,' the Atlantic Water and Electric Power Company, Ontario Power Company (Canadian), Niagara, Lockport and Ontario Power Company (New York), Electric Power Securities Company (New York).

There are a great many more that I will not read. Also the power at Massena on the American side is owned by this same combination. The Minister of Public Works, if he will tell what he knows, will stand up here and tell us that the St. Lawrence Power Company is in this same power trust.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not know anything of the kind.

Mr. J. D. REID. Well, he can find out if he inquires. Let us go into the history of this St. Lawrence Power Company. Four or five years ago this company could have been taken over by the government for about $300,000. In a report in the Department of Railways and Canals, he will find that the question came up as to the lighting of the Cornwall canal. And by the way, that has been referred to as a contract given by the Conservative party and which his government has to carry out. Let me tell the minister about that contract. That contract was given in June, 1896, just before the Conservative party went out of power.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What do you suppose it was given them for?

Mr. J. D. REID. I have no idea what it was given for. The minister hints that perhaps it was given for some wrong purpose. The minute the Liberal party came into power they cancelled several contracts on the canal that were given in June. There were contracts let a few days before the government went out of power for the building of canals which this government promptly cancelled. They did not cancel this contract but about four weeks before the next election an order in council was asked for by the then Minister of Railways and Canals providing that permission be given him to bring into force a contract to pay the St. Lawrence Power Company $50,000 yearly for lighting the Cornwall canal. After they had given the minister power to pay $50,000 a year, two or three weeks before the election, the contract was changed from 21 years to 84 years. Will the Minister of Public Works tell me why that was done prior to the election of 1900?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I really cannot.

Mr. J. D. REID. Not exactly. He would have a better idea than I why these things were done because he has been a minister not only here, but in the New Brunswick government and similar things have taken place under his own administration.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think my hon. friend is a past master.

Mr. J. D. REID. No. I have not had the experience that the minister has. This combination on the other side want to dam the St. Lawrence river. They knew that if they came to this parliament to get permission to do it they could not obtain it with the St. Lawrence power company in existence. M. P. Davis had his water-power there. He would immediately raise the question that this was going to interfere with his rights, and the result as that this combination had to give M. P. Davis, some say $750,000 and others say $1,000,000, simply for this power that he had in order to get his franchise and thus prevent any opposition from that source. When the Railway Commission come to deal with this matter the owners of the St. Lawrence Power will say that they have been obliged to pay $1,000,000 for it, that they have their money invested in it, that they have to get a certain revenue and, therefore, the commission should fix a price on what it cost them to purchase the power from M. P. Davis. The result would be that the people of eastern Ontario would be subject to this great monopoly. As far as the transmission line is concerned, why did they not tell the people in Prescott and Brockville what they told the committee? They went to Prescott and Brockville and told the people that they had not any power to sell at Cornwall, that power must be developed and that it was absolutely necessary to dam the St. Lawrence. In the committee the other day they said that they had plenty of power now developed at Cornwall under the present franchise. Ever since that power has been developed at Cornwall we have wanted them to run a transmission line to Prescott and Brockville, but they never would do so. M. P. Davis and others said there was not sufficient power required to pay for running the transmission line up there. They never thought it necessary to run a transmission line up there until this scheme of damming the St. Lawrence was brought to the front and they thought that such an agitation would take place amongst the people of the St. Lawrence counties that the members of this House would grant them the right to dam the river. On the other side of the river at Massena they have an immense water-power that they are using at the present time. The minister knows that locality well. There is what is called the South Sault on the American side. It could be dammed and not hurt navigation at all and then it would probably develop 200,000 or 300,000 horse-power. I think the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. R. Smith) knows where I mean.

Mr. R. SMITH. I would not endorse the hon. gentleman's statement that you could develop 200,000 or 300,000 horse-power. It is estimated, I believe, that you could develop 65,000 horse-power and that would be conditional upon the building of a wing dam.

Mr. J. D. REID. Well it may be that you could only develop 65,000 horse-power at the South Sault.

Mr. R. SMITH. That is if the big dam is continued across. It will be about 30,000 with a dam only at the South Sault.

Mr. J. D. REID. Well, I do not know, but it would not hurt navigation at all. If this company are willing to take the power and bring it along the river front they have, according to their statement in the Private Bills Committee, sufficient power at Cornwall at present to supply all the river front and they have the power at Massena as well. But this whole thing is part of a great scheme. According to the papers right here in Ottawa there is a company being formed. I have only read it in the newspapers, but I know from the gentlemen who are connected with it that it is true. Senator Edwards and a number of other gentlemen are organizing a company that will develop 500,000 horse-power along the Ottawa river. From Ottawa to Prescott it is 52 miles. From Prescott to Cornwall it is 60 miles.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Where are they to get 500,000 horse-power near Ottawa?

Mr. J. D. REID. I saw a fair estimate and the statement gave the falls and so on. I asked Senator Edwards the other day if he intended doing it, and he said certainly, and that he expected in about a year to have this power supply ready. I suggested in the Private Bills Committee that the St. Lawrence Power Company are the ones who are going to furnish this power. They admitted in the Private Bills Committee that they were going to do it through the company at Cornwall, and I asked them why not bring in a Bill to amend clause 11 in their charter. Clause 11 gives them power to run a transmission line about 12 miles west and down to Soulanges. Why not bring in a Bill to have that amended so that they could extend their transmission line to Brockville and Kingston? But that would not answer their purpose. I wonder if the minister saw the first Bill. This Bill is not like the first one.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This Bill is perfectly harmless.

Mr. J. D. REID. About as harmless as the minister. They would not do that, and that showed that there is a scheme behind it. The minister has let the cat out of the bag. I cannot understand why the minister wants to force this Bill through without giving the members an opportunity of seeing the plans.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The minister is not forcing the Bill through, he has nothing to do with it except as a member of the committee.

Mr. J. D. REID. The minister knows that if he asked to have the committee rise it would rise at once.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It is not for me to say if the committee shall rise or not.

Mr. J. D. REID. I think the Minister of Finance should give us an opportunity of looking into this scheme, and should not try to press us too hard to-night.

Mr. FIELDING. I am not pressing the Bill one way or the other, but I would like to see some progress. There has been a very fair discussion, and my own judgment is that the House should divide. The Bill need not go to a third reading to-night, it could stand until another day, and there would be ample opportunity to discuss the matter further.

Mr. J. D. REID. We should have an opportunity of looking at the plans and seeing the general position.

Mr. ROBERT SMITH. Has the hon. gentleman never seen the plans?

Mr. J. D. REID. I never saw them.

Mr. ROBERT SMITH. They have been published in many newspapers in the last two years, and the promoters have explained them in the hon. gentleman's own town before the International Waterways Commission.

Mr. J. D. REID. I have not seen the plans, and the promoters knew I was opposed to the scheme and I suppose would not show them to me. As to the newspaper plans, no newspaper would publish the large plans that would come before the government.

Mr. BLAIN. If the plans were published in the newspapers it would be under the authority of the Minister of Public Works. I am surprised they should be so published before being submitted to the House. In what newspapers were they published.

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend would like to find out also whether they were published in Conservative newspapers as well.

Mr. BLAIN. My hon. friend is very suspicious on a point on which he is very guilty.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I did not know they were published and I have not seen them in the newspapers. In connection with this Bill we have nothing to do with them as this is merely a transmission line.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Has the minister considered that the tourist passenger traffic going down the St. Lawrence will be interfered with, and also the large rafts of timber? Does he remember that the International Waterways Commission feared an ice jam if a dam were erected in Niagara river near Fort Erie, and would there not be a similar danger of damage to property on the St. Lawrence river if this dam were erected?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I did not introduce the Bill.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. The minister is largely responsible for its introduction.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Not at all. If the question of approving of works in the St. Lawrence should come before me as minister I shall feel it my duty to give all these matters my most careful consideration. The Bill gives no power to dam the St. Lawrence, or to place any kind of obstruction in that river.

Mr. EMMERSON. I suggested some time ago that the plans setting out this scheme should be laid before us before we are compelled to reach a decision on this Bill. The Minister of Finance who is leading the House said he had no objection personally to that suggestion.

Mr. FIELDING. No.

Mr. EMMERSON. It is a fair request and if the Bill is allowed to stand for the present no harm can be done. The Senate adjourns on Wednesday next until the 6th of April, and consequently there will be no delay in the final passage of the measure. It seems to me that too much of a party tinge has been given to this question. I did not consider it a party matter at all and before I knew the opinion of other members I formed my own judgment. I am honest and sincere in desiring to see these plans before the Bill is passed. I would go home, but I do not want to run away from my convictions. If the committee should now rise it would add to our good health and good humour.

Mr. PUGSLEY. We are all good humoured.

Mr. EMMERSON. We are trying to be, but we are not any more than we can help.

Mr. BLACK. The procedure to-night is a repetition of the procedure before the Private Bills Committee. We considered it for a whole month there and there was a certain group of members who were bound to block the Bill, one member going so far as to say that he was there specially for that purpose. I have listened attentively to every speech delivered to-night and there has not been one single argument or idea advanced that was not advanced before the committee and fully considered. I can tell these hon. gentlemen that those of us who are in favour of the Bill will stay here until Saturday night if necessary.

Mr. S. SHARPE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Black) was elected to preside over the Private Bills Committee in the absence of the regular chairman and before the preamble had been fully discussed he insisted on taking the vote of the committee.

Mr. BLACK. The preamble was not discussed until all the other clauses were discussed.

Mr. S. SHARPE. When the hon. gentleman could not get a vote on the preamble he said they would dispense with the passing of the preamble and discuss the clauses one by one. I do not know what the hon. gentleman's interest in the Bill is, but he displayed the same anxiety about it in the Private Bills Committee that he does here. There must be some overwhelming, compelling interest in this Bill; there seems to be some personal canvass and some personal interest in it, because we have here this morning five cabinet ministers and more members than there have been in the House for a long time.

An hon. MEMBER. What about your side?

Mr. S. SHARPE. We are protecting the public interest. No private Bill in my experience has received such favourable attention at the hands of the government since the Canada Life Bill which was an attack on the rights of certain policy-holders. I would like to ask the Minister of Public Works when these plans were first submitted to him and how long he has had 'them' under his consideration?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The first plans were submitted, I should think, nearly two years ago. Then there were amended plans which must have been submitted six months ago.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. When were the engineers sent?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I should think eight or ten months ago.

Mr. S. SHARPE. That should excite the suspicion of the House more than ever. The fact that the Minister of Public Works has had the plans under consideration two years, that the engineers have reported some eight months ago, and that this House has not received any information concerning these plans or reports, is certainly very extraordinary. Surely it is important that we should have all that information which has been so long before the minister. Why not allow this matter to stand over until the House has been given possession of it? We have had the whole day taken up with this private Bill, when there are public Bills in the names of private members which are kept back on that account. The plans, which the minister has had so long, were never submitted to the Private Bills Committee. Surely that committee should have been put in possession of them before making its report. You cannot sever the two companies. The promoters are the same in each, and the names are almost identical. One of the great objections I have to the Bill is the large power of expropriation which it gives and then the Railway Act is made applicable to the company wherever possible. In section 151 of that Act there are 17 subsections. Subsection C allows the company to expropriate any property whatever for its purposes. Subsection L allows it to divert or alter the course of any river, stream, or watercourse, or highway, for certain purposes. All these powers are given to this company under the terms of this Bill. Judging by the interest taken in it by the cabinet ministers, this measure has the endorsation of the government, and the government is determined to press it through at all hazards. But surely, in the public interest, it ought to be allowed to stand over and hon. members given an opportunity to inspect the plans.

Mr. SEELEY. I have no disposition to prevent discussion, and so long as any member has anything advantageous to place before the House we should remain. I think, so far as I can understand the situation, this is a Bill for a transmission line only and although I am not familiar with the particular section of the country it covers, judging by our experience in the vicinity of the Niagara peninsula, the more transmission lines we have in operation the better for the community. Take the cities of Hamilton and Dundas, perhaps the only two towns in Canada where we have electric competition, they are the two that have the cheapest electric energy. And I am glad to say that they are the two chief localities sought after by manufacturing and other interests, as a location for their establishments. What is good for our locality ought to be good for others. We are all pleased with the introduction of hydro-electric power into our vicinity. It has created competition, and we have the benefit of that competition. The only objection that can be urged against the Hydro-Electric Commission is their method of obtaining right of way and the unfair prices they pay the farmers. I can see no reason why the company under discussion should not have a transmission line in the vicinity of the St. Lawrence river and the Hydro-Electric Commission as well. The two lines should give better results than one; and while the Hydro-Electric Commission do not propose to make any profit, but deliver the energy to the consumer at actual cost, there is a good deal of difference of opinion as to whether that is the cheapest method. In Hamilton, for instance, the Cataract Power Company offer freely to give power to the consumer at 10 per cent less than the lowest hydro-electric cost. A week ago Saturday I passed some construction work of the hydro-electric and I am satisfied that the footings they were putting in cost three times more than private corporations would pay or than it would have cost the hydro-electric had they done the work as they did some other work last year. All this extra expenditure on construction is added to the cost, and that no doubt accounts for private corporations being able to deliver power 10 per cent cheaper and still have a profit. But be that as it may, I think that competition is a splendid thing. Let us have the hydro-electric, and this transmission line, and a hundred others if possible As to the amount of revenue the government should get out of the St. Lawrence powers, if one half goes to Canada, that is perhaps all we are entitled to. But I do not think the government should pride themselves about getting a very large toll. I think that the amount of revenue would be better applied to the cheapening of power to the consumer through the Dominion Railway Commission. For these reasons, if this company is entirely on its own account, as the Bill before the House shows, and is a transmission line, it certainly cannot do any harm to give it opportunity to construct a transmission line and let the trials of strength be between their transmission lines rather than between the two sides of this House. If the Hydro-Electric Commission should have to come to this House for authority to build a line along side it, and in competition with it, I would be delighted to give them that privilege, and see the two companies and as many more as can be had, to build transmission lines and give competition and increased accommodation and energy, which would be for the advantage of this country and stimulate our industrial development.

Mr. HUGHES. I would urge upon the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), if the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) will permit him, to adjourn the House.

Mr. PUGSLEY. So early?

Mr. FIELDING. Will the hon. member (Mr. Hughes) see if he can get the minister's (Mr. Pugsley) consent?

Mr. HUGHES. I know that the smile of the Minister of Finance is very influential, but when the Minister of Public Works frowns and curls his brow, even the Minister of Finance must sit up.

Mr. PUGSLEY. If the hon. member (Mr. Hughes) would do a little more work and a little less talk, he would get through.

Mr. HUGHES. But I have data here that, I am sure, will be of interest to the members of the House. Now, the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Templeman), one of the quiet, modest, unassuming ministers, is possibly doing more to benefit this country than is the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley). The Minister of Public Works we find connected with sawdust wharfs, electrical development, the damming of the St. Lawrence—everything where you find the promoter and the man behind the machine. But the Minister of Inland Revenue is quietly developing the peat industry. Water-power is not our only source of energy. It is true that, with the power that can be developed by the construction of the Georgian Bay canal, we shall have 6,000,000 horse-power capable of development.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Half an hour ago, it was 3,000,000.

Mr. HUGHES. I said 3,000,000 within thirty miles of the city. I really must repeat my statements, if the minister pays so little attention to them as he has evidently done to this one. I said 3,000,000 horse-power already available; 3,000,000 more through the construction of the Georgian Bay canal—and three and three are six. I was about to point out that there are also thousands of acres of peat in the eastern part of Ontario and in the adjoining province of Quebec. The Minister of Inland Revenue, with commendable honesty and energy, is assisting in the development of the peat industry. There is every hope that the time is near at hand when, with the producer gas from peat, we shall be able to produce energy at one-half the cost of producing it by water-power. Why, then, this mad haste to dam the St. Lawrence? It must not be forgotten also that other sources of energy are opening to us. Radium, which is now being produced on a commercial scale, opens wonderful possibilities for the future. Scientific journals of this week tell us that a pinch of radium, such as will lie on the thumbnail, will drive a 15,000-ton ship at fifteen knots an hour for 6,000 miles continuously. But science is still advancing, and another material, called, I believe, polonium, has been discovered which is one thousand times more powerful than is radium. With all these opportunities opening before us, why destroy the navigation of the St. Lawrence for the sake of a power scheme? Why court international complications with the United States in this project of damming the St. Lawrence?

Reference has been made to this Bill when it was before the Committee on Private Bills. I have distinct recollection, when in the Railway Committee, of seeing gentlemen rush into that committee and hustle the fellows out to the Private Bills Committee, and there, without having the slightest knowledge of what they were voting on, they would put through a Bill or vote down a motion for amendment. That was what at first excited the suspicion of members of this House—the fact that these gentlemen, led by some of the ministers, who threw their whole soul into it—the Minister of Public Works or, if not he, the horny-handed son of toil, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) who would be looking after it, voted in this way. I say this first excited the suspicion of honest men. It appears from this discussion to-night that the Minister of Public Works has had this matter of damming the St. Lawrence at his finger ends for two years, yet has never taken the House of Commons into his confidence. This justifies the conduct of members of the opposition in fighting this Bill. And I can give the hon. minister (Mr. Pugsley) my word that he will find that, from one end of this country to the other, more than the Liberal-Conservatives are a little surprised as to developments that have taken place in this matter.

Now I asked the minister if he could give me some elevations, and he could not. I will be pleased to give him some knowledge. The elevation of the River St. Lawrence at Cornwall is 155 feet at the site where the dam is. The elevation of the Grand Trunk station at Cornwall is 191 feet; the elevation at Mille Roches is 225 feet, at Morrisburg 268 feet, at Iroquois 242 feet, at Prescott 247 feet. The great rise in the stream occurs in the first eight or ten miles above Cornwall. Now I am satisfied that, from the elevation of the country, from the lowness of the banks on the Canadian side, if this dam is erected and if an ice jam occurs, there is no telling how many miles the whole country between the St. Lawrence and the Ottawa rivers may be flooded.

Mr. NEELY. I rise to a point of order. The Bill under discussion has nothing to do with elevations or with building dams. The hon. member is discussing matters wholly foreign to the Bill before the House, and I ask your ruling.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The discussion has certainly taken a very wide range. The item that has been called is section 1, and there is also a motion that the committee rise and report progress. It appears to me that arguments have been brought to bear on this particular question referring to improvements on the St. Lawrence, that were not very relevant, and yet they appeared sufficiently relevant to be allowed. While I regret the width and range of the debate, yet I do not feel at liberty to rule it out of order.

Mr. HUGHES. I had nearly completed the elevation idea in the absence of a profile. But there is another aspect. War might possibly occur between Canada and the United States, and it might be necessary, in the interest of Canada, that the free navigation of that river should be maintained. It would be a standing menace to peace between these two countries if that river was dammed. In case of war Canada should have free control of the St. Lawrence. It is impossible to-day for any enemy to cross the river for a number of miles above Cornwall. We have an impassable barrier in the Long Sault rapids. Our frontier is much more easily defended by having the St. Lawrence unimpeded by dams than it would be if a dam were constructed there and a lake created which could be easily crossed in boats instead of the rapids which now exist. The shipment of the produce of our country is carried on to a greater extent in boats than it formerly was, and the waterways will become the great highways of commerce in the future. Therefore, we must preserve the River St. Lawrence unimpeded in the interest of transportation. To-day freighters laden with grain go through the Long Sault rapids in the time that they would be getting through the first lock of the canal if they had to go down through the canal system.

Mr. ROBERT SMITH. Did the hon. gentleman ever hear of a boat laden with grain going through these rapids?

Mr. HUGHES. I have been on freighters when they went through the rapids, Freighters go through these rapids every week in the summer time.

Mr. ROBERT SMITH. Grain freighters do not.

Mr. HUGHES. The hon. gentleman will not deny that freighters go through these rapids in summer time?

Mr. ROBERT SMITH. If they only drew six or seven feet of water they might go through.

Mr. J. D. REID. Nine feet.

Mr. ROBERT SMITH. No, not nine feet.

Mr. HUGHES. There are only two points in the rapids where there is any possibility of hitting at less than nine feet. A few charges of dynamite will clear the channel, and permit vessels drawing from twelve to fifteen feet to pass down. Does the hon. gentleman not know that the Long Sault Rapids have fifty feet of water throughout the greater part of them? Therefore, I maintain that in the interest of honest government we should stop this charter hunting, this charter-mongering, this handing over, without any plausible excuse, of the rights and interests of this country to men who have never contributed one dollar to its upbuilding. The Minister of Public Works, if he were true to the interests of Canada, instead of sitting here to-night engineering this scheme through, would stand up and fight these people, and compel them to come here and show what they are going to do. If he had the interests of the country at heart would he be here to-night engineering this scheme to dam this river to the detriment of the Dominion government and in the interests of a foreign corporation? No, he would stand shoulder to shoulder with the opposition in fighting this company and insisting that these men should not be granted the corporate powers which they are now seeking. That is where the Minister of Public Works should be if he were a true patriot, instead of the true friend of charter hunters.

Mr. BLAIN. I asked the Minister of Public Works what newspapers these plans were published in in Ontario, and he was good enough to make the answer that he knew nothing about the publication of the plans in any newspapers. I would like to ask the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Robert Smith) in what newspapers these plans were published. I would like my hon. friend to state in what newspapers these plans were published so that we could send to the library and have them here because it is almost impossible to arrive at any sound conclusion in the absence of the plans.

Mr. ROBERT SMITH. The particular publication that I saw myself was in the Cornwall 'Standard' but I was informed by others that they had seen them in certain Toronto papers. When the promoters applied to the International Waterways Commission, first at Buffalo, and then at Toronto, these plans were produced, and the newspapers as a matter of news, and of enterprise copied them.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. What date?

Mr. ROBERT SMITH. Hon. gentlemen will remember the sitting of the International Waterways Commission some weeks ago. There is to be another sitting to take further evidence in Montreal in a few days.

Mr. BLAIN. Surely the hon. gentleman who suggested that there was unreasonable opposition on this side of the House was not serious? The strongest language and the most vigorous opposition to this Bill have come from the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) a member of the Private Bills Committee who said that the new points which have come up for discussion to-night are a great surprise to him and the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) who stated that the Bill was introduced under false pretenses. I appeal again to the Minister of Finance to grant the request not only of this side of the House, but of the ex-Minister of Railways.

Mr. FIELDING. If this were the final stage I could understand the objections, but the Bill was discussed at length before the Private Bills Committee and has been discussed the greater part of to-day. No one can say there has been any lack of the fullest opportunity for discussion and I cannot see what the plans have to do with this Bill. I think we ought to divide, that we ought to dispose of the matter at this stage. The Bill need not then go to the third reading at once and there would be ample opportunity for hon. gentlemen to place themselves on record on the third reading.

Mr. HUGHES. Does the minister think we are going to pass all the clauses of this Bill to-night?

Mr. FIELDING. I do not know why we should not.

Mr. HUGHES. Not on your life.

Mr. BLAIN. I would call the minister's attention to the objections of his political friends which I cited.

Mr. FIELDING. I do not know of any sides in this matter. This is not a party matter. If these hon. members had not heard of these important points earlier they have had no lack of information on them during the last two hours.

Mr. J. D. REID. The Minister of Public Works has admitted that there is a scheme to dam the St. Lawrence, and that this Bill is part of the scheme.

Mr. PUGSLEY. No.

Mr. J. D. REID. When we have these plans they will show whether it is part of the scheme or not. There must be some object in trying to shove this Bill through without the members understanding it.

Mr. FIELDING. No private Bill of the present session has received so much discussion.

Mr. HUGHES. Or needed it so much.

Mr. FIELDING. That may be so, but at all events it certainly is time now to endeavour to get on with the public business.

Mr. J. D. REID. It is all very well to talk about reserving half of the power for Canada, but Canada does not need half of this 30,000 horse-power now, and it will be exported to the United States, and vested rights would intervene and we will never be able to get that power back. The hon. member for Hants (Mr. Black) said he was prepared to sit here until Saturday night. Well, we on this side are prepared to do the same. I know that the government are anxious to get on with some government business, but this will not help them. It is now a quarter past three in the morning and we have to meet at three p.m. If the suggestion I have made be accepted, this Bill will go through in much less time on Monday than it possibly can now. Let the committee rise and the plans be brought down and laid on the table, and let the Minister of Public Works consult with the Department of Justice before proceeding further with the measure; and on Monday next the Bill will go through in less time than it has the slightest chance of doing now.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am always glad to meet an offer of compromise, but you can never compromise if one side insists on having everything its own way. Our hon. friend wants something unreasonable. He wants us to bring down plans which might relate to some other Bill. There are none in connection with this Bill.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. The hon. gentleman has admitted himself that this Bill and the other one were practically the same Bill.

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend ought to be ingenuous enough to suggest some other way out of the difficulty. I have always said that before any work will be commenced on the St. Lawrence, the company will have to come here and get legislative authority.

Mr. HUGHES. But the minister's word is not statute law.

Mr. TURRIFF. Early in the discussion I said that in my opinion it would be advisable for the Bill to stand over in order that we might ascertain if the statements made by the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) were well founded. I am still of the opinion, and am prepared to vote that way. At the same time I am not prepared to sit here all night and day simply for the purpose of obstructing. I want to vote for what I really think is right. This is a private Bill, and I do not consider that in voting against the majority on this side, I am voting in any way against the government or Liberal party. But I might say to the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Blain) that if a member on this side happens to vote with him on any subject, it does not help that member to pat him on the back. It only makes it a little more difficult for the man who wants to take an independent position. If hon. members opposite do not wish to take a vote, I would suggest as a compromise that we pass the preamble of the Bill, and that the committee should then rise.

Mr. BRODER. There are one or two clauses that require to be amended. Suppose we should allow the preamble to pass and put the Bill through the other stages later on, I would want it understood that the proposed amendments may be moved.

Mr. FIELDING. Undoubtedly my hon. friend would have to give notice. The Bill would then be referred back and he would be at liberty to do that at any stage. I would undertake to say the third reading would not be pressed until the hon. gentleman gave his notice. Let me suggest that if there be any particular clause specially objectionable, let the clause be held over and let the committee make progress with the rest of the Bill.

Mr. HUGHES. We would then be debarred from discussing the general features of the Bill.

Mr. FIELDING. The hon. gentleman would be debarred from discussing the clauses already passed, but not the clauses he wishes to hold over.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. As I understand, by reference to some of the papers, in the month of February when the commission met in Toronto, they made a report. Did the Minister of Public Works have that report sent to them?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The commissioners did not make any report.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Would it not be wise to investigate some of the statements made by the commissioners. In taking up the Cornwall 'Standard' of Friday, February 25, I find that, during the discussion, chairman Gibbons explained the Act introduced in the United States congress to authorize the construction of this work said it was subject to a special provision by which the powers of the company could be taken away at any time if they interfered with national interests. There is certainly no such provision in this Bill:

> And that the commencement of this work was subject to the consent of the Canadian government, he thought, and if the commission came to the conclusion that the scheme was practicable and feasible, and would not interfere with the interests of navigation, that we might assume that the Canadian government would be as astute as the United States government in protecting the interests of our country.

The Minister of Public Works knows that when the commission met in Toronto, the strongest objection was raised along different lines. As far as the commission are concerned, I think they should be made aware of these different statements. I have just picked up a few and judging from what I have read, the Montreal Harbour Commission is strongly opposed to this Bill going through.

Mr. PUGSLEY. He does not mean this Bill.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Am I to understand that several members from Montreal tonight were quite willing to get up and do their utmost to stop the passage of this measure? One of them made that statement on a front bench. If that is the position we are in, that several Quebec members are strongly opposed to this measure, and have not the liberty to speak on it, and the Montreal Harbour Commission, and the Light, Heat and Power Company are opposed to it—

Mr. CONMEE. Quite naturally.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. We have heard nothing about these objections. Has the commission had placed before it the fact that this scheme will lower the water in the St. Lawrence? Of course that may not seem, to some hon. gentlemen, of great importance. It is of great importance, and, in addition, some of the navigation companies have been sending in the strongest kind of condemnation of this Bill. So, it is not an unreasonable request that this Bill should be allowed to remain over, and I hope the Minister of Public Works will see the justice of that request and accede to it.

Mr. CONMEE. I think that hon. gentlemen ought to consider that this matter has been before the House for a couple of months. It has been fully discussed before the Private Bills Committee. This is not a question of the navigation of the St. Lawrence or the building of a dam. The discussion to-night has been entirely wide of the Bill. It is the suspicion that this Bill may involve questions of navigation and the constructing of a dam across the river that causes this discussion.

Mr. BLAIN. Did not the commission take all these matters into consideration?

Mr. CONMEE. What the commission had before them was the building of a dam and not this Bill.

Mr. BLAIN. Are they not so connected as to be inseparable??

Mr. CONMEE. I do not think so. No doubt, as the minister has said, there may be in view the obtaining of power from its development at the Long Sault rapids. But even so, we have the word of the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) that before anything is done, everything will be brought before this parliament. The company will have to get a Bill under these circumstances.

Mr. S. SHARPE. Under the Act of 1901 have not they got the authority to dam the St. Lawrence?

Mr. CONMEE. The American Bill provides that the consent of the Canadian parliament must be had.

Mr. S. SHARPE. They have already got our consent.

Mr. CONMEE. No, they have no ratification of plans; they cannot build a dam.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I cannot understand why there is such persistent opposition to allowing this Bill to go over. It cannot be because the company want to make use of this lifeless transmission line, because they cannot make use of it until the plans are approved by the Minister of Public Works and the government. But I believe the reason the government are pushing this Bill so strongly is apparent. If the company had the power under the Act of 1901, the power they are now asking, they would not be here. That law does not give them the power to build transmission lines within a municipality, except by that municipality's consent. This Bill proposes to give them that power subject to the usual expropriation powers of the Railway Act. It is only by expropriation powers that they can force their transmission lines through the municipalities. They have the horse in the shape of the St. Lawrence power; they want us to give them the harness to put on that horse. And then they will have everything they require as completely as though they had had it given them under a special Bill. But if they were to come now asking for these combined powers, in our present knowledge of what is involved and with our present judgment, would we give them these powers? I say we would not. We have no right to give them these powers, then, under the plea of a mere supplementary Bill. What is the position of the two parties? It is said this is not a party question. I cannot understand then why members of the cabinet will remain here until a quarter to four in the morning to do—what? To give private individuals the power to make money out of a public asset of this country as against the Hydro-Electric Commission, which proposes to utilize these powers for the benefit of the public. No municipality has asked the government to pass this Bill. The 'Globe' newspaper, the representative of the Liberal party, has protested in the most strenuous terms against the passing of the Bill. Can any member of this House on the other side say that his position is in the interests of the public, standing as he does against the Hydro-Electric Commission, a body which was incorporated for the very purpose of conserving these water-powers and giving power to the public at cost, without the intervention of the middleman? It is idle for my hon. friends opposite to say that we are here for the purpose of obstruction only. We are trying to further the policy inaugurated by the Whitney government which has been supported, not only by a vote of 65 to 17 in the legislature, but by a popular majority of 100,000 in the province.

Mr. CARVELL. That is honest.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Quite as honest as the hon. member (Mr. Carvell) being here in the interest of the middlemen. I would like to ask the Minister of Public Works when he conceived the idea that this company was going to pay as much for power as the state of New York is charging the company on the other side of the line? I assume that policy was conceived after the statements made by the member for Westmorland whereby it was proved that the state of New York were charging the companies over there not only a lump sum but paying a horse-power rate therefor. On the other side of the line they charge a large annual sum for the use of natural resources: on this side we get the benefit of the utilization of those powers, and the people get an annual sum in the shape of cheaper electricity as it is administered by the Hydro-Electric Commission.

Mr. HUGHES. A little time ago the Minister of Public Works made the statement that this was not a government measure but a private Bill. I would like the Minister of Public Works or the Minister of Finance to point out in the history of the parliament of Canada where five ministers of the Crown sat up all night fighting in the interests of a private Bill. I tell the Minister of Public Works that this is a government measure. He has confessed that for two years he has been carrying on secret negotiations with gentlemen who are behind the power scheme to dam the St. Lawrence, and he has never once given the people of Canada that knowledge which we squeezed out of him to-night. In the title attributed to the Sovereign of England are to be found the words 'Defender of the Faith'. The Minister of Public Works, I am afraid, will go down to history with the label plastered over his crest: 'Defender of United States trusts'. He will go down to history as the man who sat up all night in order to betray, by his actions, the rights of the people of Canada in the waterway of the St. Lawrence river. He will go down as the man who engineered the closing of the St. Lawrence to the people of Canada in the interests of United States corporations and trusts and not as the man who stood up to defend the rights of the people of this country. He will go down as the man who increased the freight rates on the produce of the farmers, increased the passenger rates on the farmers, and closed up that magnificent river which has been the delight of tourists in all periods of the nation's history. He will go down as the man who increased the cost of electric power by handing it over to a gigantic monopoly. He will be known as the man who stood cheek by jowl with the corporate interests and trusts of the United States. He will go down in history, not as a traitor in war, not as a man who would serve his country in time of war, but as the man who in time of peace, gave to the United States the enormous advantage which would accrue to them if war should ever occur between the two nations. We wondered why the Liberal members were so active on that committee. We thought it was an ordinary transmission Bill, until we saw the canvassing and the drumming up of members to come down and vote, then our suspicions were aroused, and our curiosity was excited in this matter. Five ministers of the Crown were found sitting here at four o'clock in the morning fighting for what they term a private Bill, and yet we are told that it has all been talked over by the government for two years, and although they are quite familiar with all the details, they refuse to bring them down for our information. I want to know why it is that they are giving over to a gigantic corporation the control of the River St.

Lawrence, to the detriment of the people of this country? Why are these people favoured by a Minister of the Crown, and why has he promised to jam through this Bill? This Bill is necessary to make the other Bill effective and the two Bills taken together are necessary to make the whole conspiracy complete and take from the Dominion the control of its waterways. I do not blame the promoters. Grafters come around at all times and on all sides, but I blame the men who are here as trustees of the company for neglecting the interests of the people. Before I proceed further I would ask the Minister of Finance——

Mr. FIELDING. The hon. gentleman is doing well, and I do not complain.

Mr. HUGHES. I am ready; I am in good trim. But I really would insist that the minister should get home to bed.

Mr. FIELDING. I do not see why my hon. friend should be so unkind.

Mr. HUGHES. It is the reverse. I have a warm feeling for the minister. In the vicinity of Ottawa we can develop 6,000,000 horse-power from water, and in the eastern part of Ontario, we can develop, under the plans that are being carried out by the Minister of Inland Revenue another 6,000,000, and possibly 10,000,000 more. Therefore, we can produce in this locality by water and peat alone nearly one-third of the power consumed on the continent of North America. With the data before us why in the name of all that is decent should these sworn ministers of the Crown be parties to engineering through this House any such Bill as this. It behooves us as trustees of the people to see that the water-powers of the St. Lawrence are not handed over one hour before it is necessary to hand them over, and then we must harness them with such safeguards in the interest of the people as will prevent any great monopoly from controlling them. President Roosevelt in the United States sought to save the people's water-powers. The Minister of Public Works, the Minister of Justice, the Minister of Finance, and a couple of other ministers with the whole party behind them are working to take away the people's water-powers. The interests in the gigantic power trust are said to be greater than the combined railway, Standard Oil, and Steel Corporation interests of the United States of America. In the minister's meetings with these gentlemen promoting this project, has he obtained any idea whether or not they are in this gigantic water-power trust.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I regret I am unable to give my hon. friend the information.

Mr. HUGHES. The minister is aware that they are in a very good trust of their own.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am not aware of that.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. After listening to the splendid address just delivered by my hon. friend from Victoria and Haliburton (Mr. Hughes) I am sure that the government must feel that this measure is worthy of much more consideration than it has received in the past. In following out the line of argument taken by my hon. friend I wish to read for the benefit of the Minister of Finance an article from the Daily 'Star' of February 28. (The hon. member reads the article). In the face of that very strong article, which appears on the editorial page of the Montreal 'Star,' I cannot but feel that the Minister of Finance would be acting in accordance with the interests of the country if he would allow this Bill to stand over until we have an opportunity to investigate it thoroughly. I have another article here from the Montreal 'Star' of February 25, headed, 'Must keep control of waterways.' It gives a strong resolution passed by the Montreal executive of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association opposing this measure. Thus we have not only the Conservation Commission, speaking by its chairman——

Mr. PARDEE. The chairman is not against it. Read his leter.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. He practically condemned it, there is no question about that. We have not only the Conservation Commission, but also the Hydro-Electric Commission of Ontario, which is developing water-powers and furnishing electrical energy at the lowest possible cost, having contracts with the Niagara Power Company——

Mr. PARDEE. Does the hon. member expect that the Hydro-Electric Commission is going to transmit Niagara power to Eastern Ontario?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. They will not undertake such a proposition. But here the hon. member (Mr. Pardee) proposes to give away one of the most valuable water-powers in the country for private interests and for nothing. And here we have a strong resolution of the Manufacturers' Association in Montreal in condemnation of the proposition. I am sure that if we had time to look up others, we could find many of them. And we may be sure that, when private capital controls these privileges, they will charge high rates and then they will pump enough water into the proposition to make those rates seem necessary.

Mr. TOBIN. Their rates are subject to the Railway Commission.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Does the hon. member suppose that the towns to be supplied will be in the same position as if the Hydro-Electric Commission had the control of affairs?

Mr. PARDEE. Much better.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. The hon. member (Mr. Pardee) knows full well that he dare not go into western Ontario and take that position.

Mr. PARDEE. Yes, he dare.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. No man from Ontario dare go to the western part of the province and take the position that the Hydro-Electric Commission are not giving the people of Ontario power at the minimum cost.

Mr. SHARPE. He dare not say it here.

Mr. PARDEE. Yes, he dare say it here or anywhere. I say that the Hydro-Electric Commission are not furnishing power at many points in Ontario at the prices they promise.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. That is a very mild way of putting it. It is open to two meanings. 'Not furnish power at the prices they promised.' They may have furnished it at lower prices.

Mr. PARDEE. I mean higher.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Will the hon. member name a few places of which that is true?

Mr. PARDEE. I will not interrupt the discussion. Let the hon. member go on.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. The hon. member's argument against the Hydro-Electric Commission is a very weak one. Now, this resolution of the Manufacturers' Association was passed unanimously. It is another evidence of the feeling against this Bill. I sincerely hope the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) will see the justice of our case and not keep us here any longer. It is a quarter to five in the morning.

Mr. FIELDING. The hon. member (Mr. Armstrong) is keeping himself. I would not keep him for a moment.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. But I should not be serving the interest of the people I represent, and of the province from which I come if I did not resist the attempt to force down our throats this most unjust measure. Now, I have another article here from the Montreal 'Star,' February 21st, under the heading, 'Long Sault Dam':

Mr. FIELDING. It may be well for me to say once in every two hours, so that there may be a record of it, that there is no foundation for the talk of hon. gentlemen opposite about this Bill being forced through to-night. Several hours ago I said that if hon. gentlemen would indicate the particular clauses they would like to hold over we would let them stand over and not take the Bill out of the committee stage. Therefore, any statement that we are trying to force this Bill through to-night is not according to the record.

Mr. SMYTH. The Minister of Finance is undertaking to give us a lecture.

Mr. FIELDING. I thought I should mention that point just once every two hours.

Mr. SMYTH. The responsibility for what has occurred to-night rests on the ministers. It is not often in a British parliament that you see the majority holding up the public business for the sake of a private Bill. It leads us to think that there must be something behind this. I notice a significant absence of the Ontario members here to-night, and I know that not one of the Ontario members except our friend from Rainy River, who has something coming afterwards that he wants put through, would have the hardy hardihood to stand up here and say anything against the power policy of the Ontario government. We have the member for Carleton, N.B., (Mr. Carvell) taking an active part in favour of this measure, and we always look with a little suspicion on a measure that he advocates. We also view with suspicion the Minister of Finance taking an active part in a private Bill, or in fact any public Bill that he is mixed up with. I am not here to block the public business, but I am here to see the rights of the people of the province of Ontario safeguarded. The Hydro-Electric Commission has done noble work in Ontario, and the people of the province endorsed the government by an immense majority last election, and the Liberals in the Ontario house are taking a manly stand in favour of the policy of the government in this regard. For some reason which I do not understand, but which I may refer to later on, we have the ministers and the members from Quebec and Manitoba and New Brunswick, especially New brunswick, endeavouring to foist on the people of Ontario something they detest. We are to-night fighting for the interests of the people of Ontario, and gentlemen on the other side can make up their minds that we will stay here till Sunday morning if need be.

Mr. J. D. REID. Everything to-night indicates that the government are behind this private Bill, and I would ask them to listen to what the Toronto 'Globe' of February the 9th says about it. If this Bill goes through, the government will have power to grant the privilege of damming the St. Lawrence without coming to this House at all. I have that information from a gentleman in this concern.

Mr. CONMEE. It has already been pointed out that the premier stated that the scheme would first be brought before parliament and submitted to our consideration; and the Minister of Public Works on two other occasions this evening made the same statement, that the matter would not be dealt with until it was ratified by this House.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The hon. member for Victoria and Haliburton put a question earlier in the session to the Prime Minister as to whether the government would consent to the damming of the St. Lawrence river at the Long Sault without the matter first coming to parliament, and the Prime Minister stated in the most equivocal language that it would not. The government has power to approve the plans or otherwise, and he stated distinctly that the government would take no action until the matter had first been approved by parliament.

Mr. J. D. REID. The Minister of Public Works also states that if this dam is granted the government will see that we get the same rates for power that they do on the American side.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Provided it is granted by parliament. The government is not going to grant it, parliament will have to deal with it first.

Mr. J. D. REID. Let me ask the minister: What does the government charge per horse-power along the canals or anywhere else?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The charge varies according to the location and value of the power.

Mr. J. D. REID. They already charged a nominal rate of $2 per horse-power, and a few years ago they raised the rate to $4 per power. They state that they will develop, I think, 800,000 horse-power, of which we will get 400,000. Now, if we take it at the lowest rate, the people of this country will receive $800,000 per annum.

Mr. CONMEE. If they build this dam they will have to construct not only the dam but the conduits, the head gates, the pen stocks, and all that sort of thing. That is all done in the case of canals; therefore we cannot expect to get the same revenue out of these that we could from a lock.

Mr. J. D. REID. If the hon. gentleman would take a trip along the St. Lawrence canal he would recognize that his statements are not borne out by the facts. Take Iroquois. The gentleman who has the power there is trying to sell it in these towns. He had to dig a place away from the canal, then he had to build his dams, and realize before he put in his power at all.

Mr. ROBT. SMITH. Will the hon. gentleman say that that gentleman who is developing power on the Iroquois canal is not using much of the canal built by the government for the purpose of getting water from the head of the rapids? Is he taking water out of the government canal into the river?

Mr. J. D. REID. If these people build the dam across the St. Lawrence they will be emptying the water, and I cannot see what difference that makes at all.

Mr. CONMEE. At Lachine and Cornwall, and places on the Welland and other places where power is being used, the power is already created, so far as hydraulic pressure is concerned, by the works of the government.

Mr. J. D. REID. But I am satisfied that the development of power under this proposed power scheme Bill will not cost so much per horse-power as the development of power from the Cornwall canal. Yet the government charges $4 per horse power in that case. If the government were to make the same charge in this case, the revenue to the public would be $1,600,000 per annum. I suppose not more than five or ten per cent of the possible power can be used in Canada at the present time. We could not expect them to spend the money for development and not use the power developed. So, they would have to export the power.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I would not allow them.

Mr. J. D. REID. Would not allow them to export?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No.

Mr. J. D. REID. It has been allowed in other cases.

Mr. PARDEE. There is a provision against it in this Bill.

Mr. J. D. REID. But did not the hon. member (Mr. Pardee) propose that it should be allowed?

Mr. PARDEE. Almost as soon as we took the matter up in the committee, the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. J. D. Reid) said that the great objection was to the export of power, and it was agreed that the right to export power should be cut out.

Mr. S. SHARPE. But when it was suggested that an audit should be made under which the power should not be sold to any company that had the right to export it, the hon. member (Mr. Pardee) refused that.

Mr. PARDEE. That is right.

Mr. J. D. REID. So, this power would go to build up industries in the United States.

Mr. PARDEE. No, under the hon. gentleman's own scheme, which he has been talking about all night, there would be as much power sent to the other side of the line as under ours. This is to build up industries here.

Mr. J. D. REID. Why, they intend to take it from Massena and for a hundred miles on the other side and there are large cities there calling for a great deal of power.

Mr. PUGSLEY. We would not let them take it. We could insist on half of it being kept in Canada.

Mr. J. D. REID. But another company may be formed with the right to export power, and that is the way of getting round it. And vested rights will be formed, and once they are formed the United States would not allow us to interfere with those vested rights on their side. The minister knows that 95 per cent of the water is on the American side.

Mr. CONMEE. That would not be the case after the dam was built. The object of the dam would be to equalize and control the flow. It will cost a little money, but it can be done.

Mr. J. D. REID. Not in that locality, on account of the way the river runs and the way the islands are situated. And the Americans will claim more than half the power, and the government is not going to war about it.

Mr. J. D. REID. But the Minister of Public Works told us that this scheme was coupled up with the other scheme.

Mr. BLAIN. In answer to a question of mine the Minister of Public Works stated that the power would come from a dam on the St. Lawrence

Mr. PUGSLEY. I said I had no knowledge whatever about the matter, but I surmised that if the power were developed on the St. Lawrence they would use it. There is nothing in the Bill to prevent them getting power anywhere else.

Mr. BLAIN. That was quite sufficient to give the members of the committee to understand that this transmission company would get their power generated by the other company. I ask the Minister of Finance what objection he has to this amendment to the Bill which was moved in the committee and voted down by his supporters:—

Nothing in this act contained shall be construed to authorize the company to enter on, take or use any land or water, the property of any province without having first obtained by order in council of the lieutenant governor of the consent of the province to such entry taking or user.

Mr. J. D. REID.

Surely that is a fair proposition.

Mr. FIELDING. There must have been some good reasons advanced in support of voting down that resolution. I take it for granted that my hon. friend thinks that this company will in some way or other be brought into conflict with the Ontario Hydro-Electric Commission. I have no quarrel with the Ontario government on that, but I have always understood that what they desired was not a monopoly but competition. If that be so they cannot object to some other corporation entering the field. If this corporation cannot supply power cheaper than the Ontario Hydro-Electric Commission then they will get no customers. However, I have not studied the question sufficiently to deliver a judgment off-hand on the resolution read by my hon. friend.

Mr. BLAIN. The minister has fairly stated that the policy of the Ontario government is to create competition so as to cheapen power. But when the Ontario government has expended a large amount of money in pursuance of that policy, this government is not justified in taking away their rights.

Mr. RANKIN. What money did the Ontario government expend?

Mr. BLAIN. The credit of the province for some millions.

Mr. RANKIN. The Ontario government finances that, but the municipalities pay the whole burden.

Mr. PARDEE. And it does not apply to anything east of Toronto.

Mr. BLAIN. The province of Ontario have not been able to cover the whole province as yet, but it is their intention to supply power to the very municipalities that this Bill proposes to supply power to. What objection has the Minister of Public Works to the resolution I read?

Mr. PUGSLEY. When we get down to business and come to a section in connection with which that resolution might be moved, I can assure the hon. gentleman that the committee will give it fair consideration. Let us get down to business and not act like children.

Mr. PRICE. It seems to me it is the Minister of Public Works and his supporters who are acting like children. This is a very serious Bill, there is an important principle involved in it and we are perfectly justified in fighting it.

Mr. TURCOT. What is the principle?

Mr. PRICE. It is the principle of provincial rights. Why did not the minister accept a fair sugegstion and postpone this Bill until the plans were here, so that we might consider the matter from a business point of view.

Mr. CARVELL. Is the hon. gentleman aware that the plans have nothing to do with this Bill and that they are plans which are before the Waterways Commission in connection with another matter.

Mr. PRICE. I know all about that; I know it is not only this Bill we are considering but the whole scheme connected with it. Personally I am opposed to obstruction and in favour of expediting business.

An hon. MEMBER. Then expedite business.

Mr. PRICE. We will not be bluffed by the other side of the House. We have as much good stuff on our side as you have on yours.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The plans were not asked for until twelve o'clock last night and they could not be brought here. Ordinarily my hon. friend (Mr. Price) is a sensible business man.

Mr. PRICE. Thank you.

Mr. PUGSLEY. And the hon. gentleman is ashamed of the way the business has been conducted here to-night. Hon. gentlemen opposite must recognize that the majority must rule. If the preamble of this Bill and some non-contentious clauses are passed I will send to the chairman of the International Waterways Commission and have the plans sent here if possible. I am prepared to do anything to prevent the unseemly spectacle we have had here all night.

Mr. PRICE. I know that the majority must rule, but at the same time the minority have rights which it is their duty to fight for. I am not a lawyer but a business man, and I want to see the business of the House expedited.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Why not pass the preamble then.

Mr. PRICE. I do not think the proposition is reasonable.

Mr. TOBIN. What do you see in the present Bill that you object to.

Mr. PRICE. I do not know much about the Bill.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. PRICE. I know enough to know that it affects the rights of the city of Montreal and that the rights of that city should be respected.

Mr. CARVELL. The Bill does no touch the city of Montreal.

Mr. PRICE. I believe it does.

Mr. CARVELL. Yes, I beg your pardon it does include the city of Montreal.

Mr. PRICE. I honestly stated that I know very little about the Bill but notwithstanding that the hon. gentleman has been with the Bill throughout the committee stage I seem to know more about it than he does. I think the hon. gentleman should not be so ready to correct without reason a novice such as I am.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. The Minister of Public Works said a moment ago that we are acting childishly. I would like to know from him who are the parties that are acting childishly. He says the majority must rule. Who are the majority in this case? It is not a government Bill, it is a private Bill, and one man has just as much right in this House as another on a private Bill. If it were a government Bill, I would yield immediately.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What I meant was this, that instead of wasting the time by unnecessary talk at this late hour in the morning, let us take a vote and then we will know where the majority is.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. I have been in this House for 28 years, and this is the first time that I ever saw the time of the House wasted in this manner on a private Bill. Now, if that dam is erected, I want to ask how boats can go up and down the river and through that canal.

Mr. ROBERT SMITH. Under the propoed plan the Cornwall canal will not be interfered with in any way, and there will be no more to prevent boats going up and down than there is to-day.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. Is the water not to be raised by the dam?

Mr. ROBERT SMITH. The water is not to be raised at the head of the Cornwall canal. They are not going to raise the water so high as to be above the head of the canal.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. The dam will be practically at the head of the canal.

Mr. ROBERT SMITH. The dam is not to be at the head of the canal. It will not be sufficiently high to raise the water as high as the head of the Cornwall canal. The proposed dam is some five miles below the head of the Cornwall canal; there is a large descent in the river at that distance, and it is not proposed to raise the water as high as the head of the Cornwall canal.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Question.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. It is now a quarter to seven o'clock. The Minister of Public Works said we were childish, because the majority must rule.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I did not say the hon. gentlemen were childish. I said we should get to work instead of staying here and wasting the time of the committee and wasting the money of the public by useless discussion.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. The government is responsible in fathering a private Bill in which they have no interest unless they are backing up a monopoly, and it is the duty of the opposition to prevent the country being looted, and if necessary to do that we will remain here until Satutrday night.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Let us take a vote, and we will see where the majority is.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. The vote is not going to be taken. When the minister says that he is not speaking for the government, when he says that the government make this Bill their Bill.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I said nothing of the kind. I did not intend any such reference to be drawn from my remarks. There would be no truth whatever in such a remark. I said let us take a vote and then we will see where the majority is. The majority may be on one side or the other

Mr. ROBERT SMITH. The Cornwall canal leaves the river at the east end of the town of Cornwall; it runs along the shore of the river, passing through a number of locks. On the Canadian side the distance from the head of the canal down to the dam is probably eight miles. There are islands intervening between the two channels. On Sheik's island, on the Canadian side, there is a drop of about thirty feet and the proposed dam is considerably further down.

Mr. PRICE. As I understand the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Robert Smith) the dam across the river will raise the water probably thirty feet, but it will have no effect upon the lock. Consequently the Cornwall canal will not be affected. Of course, the hon. gentleman, I understand, is thoroughly convinced that the dam will cross at this place.

Mr. ROBERT SMITH. I speak of what the plans propose.

Mr. PRICE. But I asked for information, and now the hon. member seems to be in doubt about it.

Mr. ROBERT SMITH. I say that that is the proposition the company is making to the government.

Mr. PRICE. Then the plans have been submitted to the Department of Public Works. I would like to ask the hon. minister (Mr. Pugsley) if he quite agrees with the hon. member for Stormont. He has seen the plans and knows about them.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I did not think then, and do not think now, that the plans of the contemplated works in the St. Lawrence had anything to do with this Bill, and I am not prepared to give the information he is asking for. But the plans were submitted to the government and are now before the International Waterways Commission. As I recollect them, they show the dam a considerable distance below the locks of the Cornwall canal, and I believe the engineer stated that these construction works would not affect the Cornwall canal. But all this will be considered when the matter comes up for determination.

Mr. PUGSLEY.

Mr. PRICE. Now, we have taken up a great deal of time, and I would draw the attention of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) to the situation. I think this is about the first time I have had the honour of addressing him. I feel a little diffident about it. At the same time, no one more thoroughly appreciates his bonhomie and good humor than I do. Now it seems to me we have been wasting a good deal of time.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. PRICE. But whose fault is it? It is now a little after seven o'clock. I can say to the minister that if he wishes to go on, we can go on in this way until Saturday evening. But there is no sense in this sort of thing. We should act like business men and like representatives of the Canadian people.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Then, why not do so?

Mr. PRICE. Quite right. That is what we want to do. We have strong objections to this Bill—not so much to the Bill, perhaps, as to what goes with it. It seems to me it would be better in the interest of both sides, if you put this off until the next day for private Bills, and, in the meantime, let the information be laid before the House. We are prepared to take a proper view of the subject, and if we are to be defeated, as we believe we are, why, we shall be defeated. But would it not be better to make some arrangement and facilitate business? Of course, if the minister does not want to do that, we are ready to fight.

Mr. HUGHES. There has been some discussion of the position of the locks. Would the hon. member for Stormont tell us where these dams are to be placed?

Mr. R. SMITH. The first proposed dam on the American side is from the foot of Long Sault island to the American side, and there they propose to put in a lock. The next is from the foot of Long Sault island to Barnhardt's island, and the last dam goes from the foot of Barnhardt's to the bank of the Cornwall canal, about eight miles below the head of the canal and four miles out from the foot.

Mr. COWAN. I object to this secondary evidence concerning documents that are in existence and that could be produced in short order. In no court of justice would that kind of evidence be listened to for a moment. One member says the dam is at one place and another member says the dam is another place and we cannot tell where the dam is. The Minister of Public Works, says that the dam may be below Montreal or above Montreal but he says that no matter where the dam is, it will not affect the Cornwall canal. If the plans were here we would know where the dam is and we would know whether it would affect the canal or not, and so we have spent the whole night here because the Minister of Public Works has forgotten where the dam is. The Minister of Public Works has told us that the majority must rule, yes, but the majority must rule according to justice, and if there is nothing to hide bring forth your plans and then, if everything is satisfactory, we will pass your government measure.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It is unnecessary for me to state again that this is not a government measure and that the government is not behind it. Any member of the government or any supporter of the government can vote on it just as he pleases.

Mr. COWAN. Let the minister not pretend that he has not made this a party measure; he knows it is a party measure and that every man on that side of the House is at his back. I tell the minister and the party behind him that the moment they attempt to divert the public resources of Canada from the use of the people into the coffers of a private corporation, the party on this side of the House will oppose that. Does the member for West Lambton pretend to say that this company will not get its power from the St. Lawrence Power Company.

Mr. PARDEE. I do not know, and the Bill does not say anything about it.

Mr. COWAN. Then if the hon. member does not know, in all justice postpone the consideration of the Bill until he ascertains the fact that this company will get its power from the St. Lawrence Power Company which in conjunction with an American company intends to dam the St. Lawrence. Let any member on the other side of the House stand up and tell me that this company will not get its power from the St. Lawrence Power Company; let them stand up individually because I want to get them on record. I cannot understand how men become so tied up to private corporations as to become blind to the public interest.

Mr. TOBIN. Does the hon. member say we are tied up to private corporations.

Mr. COWAN. As far as I can judge the hon. member for Wolfe and Richmond and all of his ilk to-night are tied up body and soul to the passage of this Bill.

Mr. TOBIN. I rise to a point of order. The hon. member (Mr. Cowan) has made the statement that the member for Richmond and Wolfe and all his ilk are tied up to private corporations. I ask Mr. Chairman, that you compel him to withdraw that statement.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I did not understand the member for Vancouver (Mr. Cowan) to use exactly the words the hon. gentleman has indicated. I will let the hon. member state himself the exact words he used.

Mr. COWAN. I say that I understand that the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe and gentlemen on his side of the House are tied up body and soul, using it figuratively, to the passage of this Bill.

Mr. CARVELL. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe rose to a point of order and quoted words which he understood to be used by the member for Vancouver. I do not think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tobin) quoted them exactly; I think the statement made by the member for Vancouver represents the words he used and while the language is very strong I know of no rule that he has actually violated.

Mr. COWAN. I have no desire to charge gentlemen on the other side with the intention to make this Bill law. If any gentleman on the other side is against this Bill I shall be glad to let him say so. I notice the peculiar reiteration with which the Minister of Public Works has said that it would be better to let us have a vote and get this thing through. You will notice the peculiar lack of principle in that suggestion; not a lack of cunning, not a lack of art in the railroading of a Bill through the House, but a peculiar lack of principle. Am I to understand that the minister is opposed to any further powers being given under the Act of 1901?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I stated that no decision had been come to by the government in the matter.

Mr. COWAN. But the plan has been laid before the government, these plans are for the minister's eye and not for the members of this committee, and yet the whole case is based upon these plans, which are hidden from us, which are concealed from us, which are withheld from us, which are pigeon-holed in the minister's department and which he dare not lay on the table.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I stated already that they were before the International Waterways Comssimion.

Mr. COWAN. I am ready to take my seat if any man will be good enough to suggest the remotest semblance of a ghost of a reason for withholding the plans from this House. I get no reply. Am I to assume that their ingenuity is exhausted? Am I to assume that silence is their only recourse? Am I to assume that this Minister of Public Works and his party behind him are so absolutely run to earth that they have not one word to say why they are withholding these plans from this House? It has been suggested that they are asleep, Mr. Chairman. I have visual proof that they are not asleep, and I believe if they were asleep that nature, who has that happy faculty of revealing the truth at unexpected times, would reveal to this House the location of those plans and their nature. No, Mr. Chairman, it is not a sufficient answer to say that the minister and his followers are asleep, because I know that if that were the case the truth would out. Is the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Neely) in favour of diverting this water-power belonging to the public into the possession of a private corporation of the United States?

Mr. NEELY. That is not the question before the House.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. There is growing up a habit of hon. members addressing each other across the floor, while still keeping their seats. The hon. member who is addressing the House should be allowed to do so.

Mr. COWAN. Listening to the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Neely) I am particularly anxious to get the measure of his ideas. Before I leave for breakfast I would like to ascertain where the hon. member thinks this company will get the power it is to transmit. The hon. gentleman does not reply, and my curiosity is unsatisfied. Mr. Speaker, I desire to treat this thing seriously, but it is hard to do so in view of the absurdity of basing the whole case upon plans seen with eyes of one colour by the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Robert Smith) and seen as through a glass darkly by the Minister of Public Works. And these gentlemen who have seen these plans come and tell us their forgettings about them, and, in the end, we know nothing either about the plans or about the dam.

Mr. CARVELL. The hon. member for Vancouver has told us that he intends to go home and get breakfast. I have known people to talk strangely because of something in their stomachs, but I have never heard one talk so strangely as the hon. gentleman because of nothing in his stomach. I am sorry that he has seen fit to mar this pleasant evening. For, while this has been obstruction pure and simple, it has, on the whole, been carried on in a very pleasant manner. The speech of the hon. member for Victoria and Haliburton (Mr. Hughes) was a jewel. He did not say anything unpleasant; in fact, he did not say anything at all. He said nothing but what others said for him, so he was not called upon to draw on his mental resources or even greatly on his physical resources. The hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) obstructed in a thoroughly gentlemanly manner. The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. George Taylor) wants to get home, but did not say anything unpleasant. But as to the hon. member for Vancouver, I would remind him that this Bill is for the purpose of incorporating certain gentlemen as a company for the transmission of electrical energy.

Mr. COWAN. What electrical energy?

Mr. CARVELL. If the hon. member does not know what electrical energy is, it would be hardly worth while for me to explain.

Mr. COWAN. I know about electrical energy and could give an instructive lecture upon it. But whence is it to come in this case?

Mr. CARVELL. From water-power.

Mr. COWAN. From what water-power?

Mr. CARVELL. From somewhere along the St. Lawrence river—I do not know where. Nor do I care. And I think the people along the St. Lawrence will not care very much either. If hon. members opposite, particularly the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Cowan), think they are making political capital out of this, they are welcome to all they can get out of it. There are other places in the Dominion than the province of Ontario, and we are not all bound to the chariot wheels of the Hydro-Electric Commission, though the hon. member for Vancouver may be.

Mr. COWAN. Or to the public interest.

Mr. CARVELL. I feel bound by the public interest and consider the course I am taking in the public interest. The hon. member did me the honour to intimate that I had some object in trying to force this Bill through. I have no interest at all. I am not a member of the Private Bills Committee. I advocate the Bill because I believe it to be in the public interest. I have stated before that I did not care how many transmission companies or other public utilities came into my constituency—the more the better. The hon. member for Vancouver, though he has spent an hour and a half in opposing this Bill had no qualms of conscience in putting through this House Bill (No. 118) to give his friends in British Columbia the very rights he wishes to deny to others.

Mr. CONMEE. And over the head of the province.

Mr. COWAN. What Bill—what is the title?

Mr. CARVELL. Bill 118. The hon. member knows what it is. He is not so innocent as he looks. Only two weeks ago he put this Bill through the House giving to his friends powers he now would deny to others. And he deliberately insinuates that the Minister of Public Works is hiding the facts, withholding the plans——

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. It is only just to the member for Vancouver to say that he withdrew that.

Mr. CARVELL. But he repeated his statement.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I think not.

Mr. CARVELL. I must bow to your ruling, but the hon. member did not withdraw it until he was forced by the chair to do so. He knows that the St. Lawrence Power Company's Bill, passed in 1901, is not now under discussion. If that company be alive to-day and have carried out the terms of its charter, it has the right to build these transmission lines without reference to this Bill. If that be so, what becomes of the argument that this company is only a subsidiary company?

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. It does not give them power of expropriation.

Mr. CARVELL. It does. Section 14 gives them that power.

Mr. S. SHARPE. It does not give them power to enter a municipality without that municipality's consent.

Mr. CARVELL. No. But what has that Bill to do with the Bill now under discussion?

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. It is the same people.

Mr. CARVELL. Does the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Geo. Taylor) want to prevent the distribution of electrical energy in his county?

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. Certainly, if it means the destruction of the navigation of the St. Lawrence.

Mr. CARVELL. For three or four hours this Bill was opposed because it would interfere with the plans of the Hydro-Electric Commission. Now, we have an entirely new reason—the navigation of the St Lawrence. Does not the hon. member know that the plans must be approved by the Governor in Council? And has he not heard the Minister of Public Works say that when the plans are submitted to him they were handed over to the Waterways Commission for investigation and that that body has not yet reported? Is it reasonable to hold up a Bill for an electric transmission company because it may theoretically have some effect upon matters of navigation which are in the hands of the Waterways Commission? If hon. members say: We do not want this Bill to go through and we have the physical power to sit here until Saturday night and commence again next Monday and sit until next Saturday night, of course, they are within their legal rights. But I think it would be much better if they take the ground that they are opposing this Bill because it interferes with the schemes of the Ontario government. It would be better for our hon. friends opposite to come out and frankly admit that they are opposing this Bill at the behest and by the orders of the province of Ontario. If they do that, we will know exactly what we have to face. But I pray my hon. friends not to take shelter behind this childish proposition that in some way or other they want the Minister of Public Works to bring down plans of a scheme which is on foot to dam the River St. Lawrence, and which has nothing whatever to do with the Bill under discussion, and which is entirely safe in the hands of the Waterways Commission and the government.

Mr. SAMUEL SHARPE. I would like to submit to the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Carvell) whether this discussion does not go deeper than the mere passage of this particular Bill. I think there is a question which goes deeper than any mere opposition, and deeper than the principle contained even in this measure. The question is, when a private member proposes a Bill and the leader of the opposition asks that the Bill may stand over until certain papers are produced, whether the Bill should not be laid over for further discussion. The leader of the opposition asks that further information be furnished, and surely as a mere matter of courtesy, if not of right, that request should be granted. The public have been led to believe that they would have access to these plans. We have Chairman Gibbons of the International Waterways Committee, stating at Toronto that the government and the commission have the plans, but they are withheld from the representatives of the Ontario government. Surely it is an extraordinary thing that where such vital interests are concerned, the representatives of the province of Ontario has not had an opportunity to see the plans upon which the committee are supposed to act. It is, I think, a grave discourtesy that one side if given information which is withheld from the other side. The representatives of the province of Ontario, of the great interests that are opposing this proposition, are not allowed to see the plans, while those in favour of the proposition are allowed to see them.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. In glancing over the hon. members sitting on the government side of the House, I find there are 26, and only four of them come from the province of Ontario. One is the promoter of this Bill, the other is the redoutable member for Rainy River (Mr. Conmee), who always looks after the interests of the people of Ontario, one is asleep, and the other has not so far been heard from. So I think that if the interests of the province of Ontario are to be left in the hands of members from that province on the government side of the House, they are sadly neglected indeed. Now, reference has been made to the Bill passed the other day by the Railway Committee in reference to the Burrard channel. As I pointed out before, although the government did give that company the powers of expropriation, they were given to a company which produced documentary evidence showing that it was acting as trustee for five or six municipalities in the province of British Columbia, which municipalities contained one-half the population of the province. When we asked them if they were willing to carry on their undertaking without making any charges, they replied they were. Therefore that cannot be said to be a company incorporated for any other interest than the public interest of British Columbia.

Mr. PUGSLEY. If they said that, why was not that provision put in the Bill?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Because the Minister of Railways himself said it was not a reasonable proposition, and it was at the suggestion of the Minister of Railways himself that a clause was inserted giving them power to charge a toll. But the proceeds of that toll came to the people of British Columbia, because it was a public undertaking and represented half the people of the province. But let us consider the consistency of the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell). He spent hours in this House arguing for the incorporation of the Nelson River Railway Company, basing his plea on the fact that the Bill gave no power to expropriate water-powers. But now he argues that we should not oppose this transmission Bill although it gives powers of expropriation. In the Bill of 1901, we expressly provided that the company should not enter any municipality without the consent of that municipality. But the present Bill seeks to enlarge such powers and to give this transmission company entrance to a municipality regardless of the will of its people. In Bills that we have passed this session, we have specially inserted provisions denying the right of expropriation of water powers. In the Nelson River Bill, in the London and Lake Erie Railway and Transportation Company and in others.

Mr. HUGHES. I rise to a point of order. There is no minister of the Crown in the House. The debate should end.

Mr. CARVELL. This is a private Bill, and the presence of a minister is not necessary.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Rivet). I do not think the point is well taken.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I ask the hon. member for Carleton where is his consistency in view of the facts I have submitted?

Mr. CARVELL. If the hon. member wants an answer, I would say that, so far as the Ontario and Michigan Power Company is concerned, it was fought about as viciously as this Bill has been, and the promoter, to get it through, was willing to accept almost anything. But since 1901, the Railway Commission has been created and under section 247 of the Railway Act, which creates that commission, it is provided that if such a company as the one provided for in the Bill under discussion cannot get the consent of a municipality to establish works within it, it must get the consent of the Railway Board. I think that, for the purposes of uniformity, all our Bills should be passed subject to that provision.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. The hon. gentleman did not use that argument in support of the Nelson River Bill.

Mr. CARVELL. I do not think I opened my lips on that Bill.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Certainly. Last night, when he was——

Mr. CARVELL. That is right. I thought the hon. gentleman was referring to the Vancouver Bill.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. The hon. member last night said we should pass the Nelson River Bill because it had no expropriation powers; now he says we should pass this with expropriation powers.

Mr. CARVELL. I am talking of transmission lines going through a municipality.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. But we are granting exporpriation powers against private property.

Mr. CARVELL. A public utility Bill would be unworkable without it.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. The hon. member (Mr. Carvell) does not agree with the Minister of Railways (Hon. Mr. Graham) who announced as the settled policy of the government that every Railway Bill should contain a clause denying the power to transmit electricity save by the consent of the parties interested.

Mr. CARVEL. Then I certainly differ with him.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. If we strike out the powers of expropriation, the municipality that desires to have the service of the Hydro-electric Commission can have it. But if you give this company powers of expropriation under the Railway Act you open the way for the middleman.

Mr. CARVELL. The hon. member says the municipality should be free to choose the Hydro-Electric. But we on this side say that there should be the Hydro-Electric and as many others as want to come in. Let the competition be as free as possible. The Hydro-Electric Commission want a monopoly.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. For the benefit of the people.

Mr. CARVELL. I hope this parliament will never grant a monopoly to the Hydro-Electric Commission or any other body. Does the hon. member (Mr. Middlebro) mean to say that if this Bill becomes law and this company erect their transmission line to Brockville that will prevent, legally or otherwise, the Hydro-Electric Commission from entering Brockville?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. It will mean that the poles will be erected, the wires strung, the houses wired and the connections made, and the Hydro-Electric Commission will be practically prevented from coming in.

Mr. CARVELL. Legally or from a business standpoint?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. The other company would be installed, as the Bell Telephone Company is to-day so that nobody else can get in.

Mr. CARVELL. The logical conclusion of the hon. member's argument is that if the Hydro-Electric Commission get into a municipality they would be able to charge the rates they want and make the people pay those rates even though they would be higher than if there was competition.

Mr. BRODER. The hon. member (Mr. Carvell) seems to constitute himself an advisory board of one to tell the opposition how to argue their case.

Mr. CARVELL. The hon. member (Mr. Middlebro) asked my opinion.

Mr. BRODER. I am surprised at the hon. member, the watchdog of the public interest allowed such a notorious Bill as he describes that of the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Cowan) to have been to pass the House.

Mr. CARVELL. I did not characterize it as notorious. I say it is a proper Bill.

Mr. BRODER. Talking of monopoly, if you leave it to the people in the section affected by the Bill now under discussion, whether they will have electrical energy furnished by this company or by the Hydro-Electric Commission, the people will soon decide irrespective of politics.

Mr. CARVELL. Then why not have both?

Mr. BRODER. Because the Hydro-Electric Commission propose to give power to the municipalities at cost, and the smaller number that take it from them, the higher the cost will be to those who do take it.

Mr. NEELY. If the Hydro-Electric Commission give the power at cost, surely there is no danger in incorporating this company, because, according to the hon. gentleman's argument, it will not be able to do any business.

Mr. BRODER. The charges of the municipalities vary according to the cost of transmission, and my argument is that the fewer the municipalities that take the power, the higher the overhead charges will be, and consequently the higher cost of the power. But a stronger reason for my opposing this Bill is that it is simply a stepping-stone to the greater Bill which is to come later to give a private company the control of the water-power on the St. Lawrence river. What will happen if we slow the current by the proposed dam?

Mr. CARVELL. You will have dead water.

Mr. BRODER. Anchor ice will form and will cause the water to overflow the land.

Mr. CARVELL. Anchor ice only forms in running water. The dead water will freeze over.

Mr. BRODER. Even if the water freezes over, the current from the river above will overflow it at the rate of several miles an hour. The hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Smith) evaded the question of the height of the proposed dam. It was first proposed to be 54 feet. Now it is lessoned to 42 or 45 feet. The Cornwall canal is eleven miles long, and has a fall of 48 feet, with six locks. The hon. gentleman said that the proposed dam would be five miles from the head of the canal, so that it would be upwards of 40 feet high at six miles from the lower end of the canal. Involved in this question are the interests of the navigation of the St. Lawrence and the interests of the people in that whole section of country. The American people are at present dependent upon our canals to get up the St. Lawrence river. The hon. member for Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell) is evidently willing that they should have a canal on the American side of the river. I am not willing to give them that privilege upon the St. Lawrence river, which is a great asset of this country.

Mr. CARVELL. The question of damming the St. Lawrence is not involved in this Bill. Moreover, the Minister of Public Works states that the proposition of this company is to build a dam that will not affect the intake of the Cornwall canal. The hon. member for Dundas is wrong in his figures. If the dam is to be built seven or eight miles below the mouth of the canal, that will create a tract of level water eight or nine miles long, forming a lake, which will freeze over in the winter time, and be free of anchor ice. The only issue is whether this committee will give the company a right to build transmission lines to various points of Ontario and Quebec.

Mr. MAGRATH. I regard it as an outrage that the members of this House should be kept here all night for the sake of private interests. It is all very well to say that this is only a transmission company, but it must obtain its power from somewhere, and, in view of the public interests in Montreal and along the St. Lawrence river opposed to this project, I think this Bill should be held over until the question of damming the St. Lawrence is before us, so that the two questions, which are involved in each other, can be taken up together.

Mr. GOODEVE. We are not asking that this Bill should be destroyed. We are only asking that due consideration be given to the various questions that have arisen in connection with it. I think a feeling is growing in the minds of members on both sides of the House that we should begin more carefully to conserve our great natural resources such as are affected by this Bill. It has been admitted that the Bill is now before the Waterways Commission and all we ask is that it be set aside until we have received the report of the Waterways Commission. This is not a government Bill, it is purely a private Bill in the interests of private parties, who are asking for large powers. And it is our duty to demand that we be furnished with all the information that is available before we consent to the passage of this measure. It has been said by the hon. member for Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell) that what he stood for was the principle of open competition. I think he is aware that while there may be no actual legal opposition to two companies operating in a municipality for the production of power, yet it is well known that here are means of preventing an opposition company from coming into a municipality where another company is already installed. In our own western country when the telephone first came in, we were given a certain rate, afterwards another company came in and amalgamated with it, and immediately we were served with notices that the price was doubled for every telephone in the city. In regard to water-power we are paying many times the price that our neighbours are paying in districts surrounding us, where a public company is serving the people. We realize that if these companies were established in the municipalities under this Bill, it would be impossible for the Hydro-Electric to come in. We have appointed a Conservation Commission, and it is proposed to vote them $60,000 for their work. We realize more than in former times the value of our great waterways with their water falls as sources of energy. Surely, the government should accede to the request of the opposition and allow a Bill such as this, which is said to have the effect of giving to private individuals one of the greatest water powers on our greatest river, to stand over for further information.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. I see the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) has retired, but three ministers have come in. I desire to secure information which the Minister of Public Works did not give us. I would like to know the height of the dam shown in the plan that has been referred to. And, if it is to be 42 feet high, as has been stated, how can the present canal be used for Canadian traffic. The Minister of Public Works stated that it would not interfere with the passage upwards of Canadian boats, leaving us to infer that it would throw all the downward traffic on the American side. I see the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) here. He is the senior of the ministers who have recently entered the chamber, and I will ask him for information on this subject.

Mr. FISHER. I am rather surprised that the hon. member (Mr. Geo. Taylor) has singled me out for information on the subject of a dam. Knowing my mild and peace-loving disposition as he does, I should think that he would know that I am no authority on the subject of dams. But I know something of the wording of this Bill, and I do not understand that there is any reference in it to a dam.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. The hon. minister was not present, but the Minister of Public Works said that this Bill was in conjunction with that passed in 1901——

Mr. CARVELL. That is hardly a correct interpretation.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. That was the meaning.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. This is a power Bill.

Mr. FISHER. No, a transmission Bill.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. The Minister of Public Works admitted that the other company was to make the proposed works——

Mr. CARVELL. No.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. He said that this Bill and the other would work conjointly.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. That the same parties were concerned in both.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. CARVELL. The minister did not say that.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. He tried to get out of it, but he admitted it in his first statement.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. We will prove it by 'Hansard' when it comes out this morning. I appeal to the Minister of Agriculture again. He is an old member of the House, as I am. I think he will agree with me that never before has he seen the House held up in debating a private Bill.

Mr. FISHER. That proves that my hon. friend's friends are the most unreasonable men that have been here for many years.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. The leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden), before leaving at two o'clock this morning, asked that the committee should rise, that plans that had been referred to in connection with this matter might be brought down. That was a reasonable request. The Minister of Public Works said the majority must rule. The majority is the government, and they are defending and supporting this Bill, a graft Bill of the worst kind. But they say the majority must rule and we will force the opposition down.

Mr. CONMEE. We do not know which is the majority until we vote.

Mr. G. TAYLOR. The hon. member for Hants (Mr. Black) threw out the challenge that they would stay here until Saturday night at six o'clock or pass the Bill. Hon. gentlemen on this side said they would stay with them and we purpose doing so. If the government are going to defend this Bill until Saturday night, it will be the first time I knew a government to back up a private Bill in this way. I think the government ought to accede to the reasonable request to allow the committee to rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again and in the meantime bring down the plans so we will see what we are doing, because there is no denying that it is all one company trying to dam the St. Lawrence and to use this charter to transmit power.

Mr. FIELDING. As a number of gentlemen have entered the House recently who have not had the great pleasure some of us have had of sitting all night until 9.30 o'clock, and for their benefit, I wish to again place on Hansard the exact position of this matter. I stated at an earlier stage that every two hours I would put this point on record so there might be no misunderstanding. I wish it to be understood that there is no proposal on the part of anybody, still less on the part of the government, who have nothing to do with this Bill, to press this Bill through at this sitting of the House. I want that to go on Hansard in large letters. A proposal was made hours ago that this Bill might be treated like any other Bill, that the clauses that are unimportant might be passed and any contentious clauses might stand over, the Bill remaining in committee until a future day. We offered that hours ago, I offer it now.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. The Finance Minister has made that proposal time and again, but he must see the unreasonable part of it, that is that if we accept the Bill as it is at present, we will have to have the measure put through and it will be forced through by the government, no matter what the clauses are. When we come to discuss it on the clauses, we will be confined to the clause before the committee. It cannot be too strongly impressed that this Bill is opposed by many important interests, such as boards of trade of our Canadian cities, and the Conservation Commission.

Mr. BLAIN. I wish to read a resolution that was moved in the Private Bills Committee for the addition of a clause to this Bill, and was voted down:

Nothing in this Act contained shall be construed to authorize the company to enter on, take or use any land or water, the property of any province, without having first obtained by order of the lieutenant governor in council the consent of the province to such entry, taker or user.

I wish to ask my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture what objection he would have to a clause of this kind being inserted in the Bill.

Mr. FISHER. My hon. friend is well aware that I am not a lawyer, and consequently would not like to commit myself on such a point without very careful legal advice. My own idea would be that the rights of the Dominion and the rights of the various provinces are pretty well defined in the British North America Act, and we could probably leave to those definitions to decide whether we were interfering with the rights of any province or not.

Mr. BLAIN. I suppose the next in order will be my hon. friend the Minister of Labour.

Mr. KING. As I understand, the discussion of the committee is at present engaged on one section of the Bill. After I have an opportunity of listening to the debate as a whole, I shall perhaps be better able to appreciate whether the proposed amendment has any significance or not.

Mr. BLAIN. As these hon. gentlemen belong to this government, which is pressing the House to pass this Bill——

Mr. FIELDING. No, no.

Mr. BLAIN. The Minister of Finance may suggest that the opposition all comes from this side of the House; but I may remind him that the strongest pronouncement against the Bill has come from the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson), and that it is also opposed by the hon member or Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff). If it is not proposed to take away any rights from any province, what objection can there be to this clause going into the Bill? I appeal to the Minister of the Interior, who before he entered this government was a champion of the rights of the people, to say if he sees any special objection to such a clause being inserted in the Bill.

Mr. OLIVER. I would have to follow the discussion more closely than I have done in order to be able to give an answer to the question. Apparently this is a very involved matter. It has occupied the House during twelve or fourteen hours, and I certainly do not profess to have been able to follow the discussion during that time or to be able to make up my mind on the mere reading of the resolution.

Mr. CONMEE. I wish to point out that my hon. friend has brought forward this resolution on two or three occasions, and that the Minister of Public Works has pointed out that the question of dealing with the water power of the St. Lawrence river is not in the Bill before the House, but that if it were in issue, the declaration in the resolution proposes to settle a matter in dispute between the Dominion and the province by giving to the province wider powers than it has under the British North America Act. If this were a Bill involving the question of the construction of a dam, I would oppose that resolution on this ground. If the province controls the water-power, that control cannot be taken away by any declaration or legislation of this parliament. Why should we make a declaration which undertakes to give the province a more extended power than the constitution gives it?

Mr. NORTHRUP. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken is evidently an ardent opponent of this Bill, or at least will be when he comes to understand what it really means. We have had within the last ten minutes the lamentable exhibition of a minister of the Crown coming in at ten o'clock in the morning and frankly admitting that he is using all his power to force through the House this Bill without knowing what it is; and we find the hon. member for Rainy River (Mr. Conmee) who should understand this Bill if any one does, distinctly stating that it does not and cannot take away from the province any rights it now has.

Mr. CONMEE. Does the hon. gentleman say it would?

Mr. NORTHRUP. I certainly say that it both can and does.

Mr. CONMEE. Does he say it deals with water powers at all?

Mr. NORTHRUP. I mean to say it does give water powers.

Mr. CONMEE. Will my hon. friend read the clause?

Mr. NORTHRUP. It has been read a dozen times, but I will explain it and perhaps then the hon. gentleman will see that it does give water powers and is intended to give them. Let us understand where we are. By jumping into the middle of the discussion, my hon. friend fails to understand——

Mr. CONMEE. I have been here all night.

Mr. NORTHRUP. I have read that seed sown on stony ground just as carefully as on other ground did not take any root. That may be the case with my hon. friend. We had an Act passed in 1901 which no member of this House, if he will divest himself of his political prejudice, will say reflects any great credit on its judgment. By the Act a copy was incorporated, and it is a matter of notoriety that this House gave such powers to the gentlemen who obtained that charter that they were able to sell it at a handsome fortune. However, all that is past and gone, and the only argument I draw from that is this, that having made an outrageous blunder in 1901, is all the more reason why we should be doubly careful now not to give a little more and supply an omission which the promoters, by an oversight, failed to notice in the Act of 1901. In 1901 they are asking a little privilege which will make the government of 1901 absolutely complete. In the statute of 1901, the directors are given pretty broad powers. Under the 8th section they can manufacture and dispose of electricity and build a transmission line. It is perfectly clear that under that Act this company has the power to construct its transmission line exactly where it asks to construct it by the Bill before it.

Mr. CONMEE. My hon. friend is mistaken in that. He will find that it does not give the company the power of expropriation for their transmission lines.

Mr. NORTHRUP. The hon. gentleman is perfectly right, and that is the reason the company come here to take the land belonging to the province of Ontario for the purposes of their enterprise. By this Bill, however, they ask that power. They have the right to manufacture all the power they want in the Act of 1901, and they have the right to expropriate but not to expropriate provincial lands.

Mr. CONMEE. Where does my hon. friend find that?

Mr. NORTHRUP. I find nothing in the Act of 1901 which gives this company power to expropriate provincial lands. There is all the difference in the world between giving power to expropriate the land of individuals and the land belonging to the Crown. Under the statute of 1901 there is no power given the St. Lawrence Power Company to expropriate any land belonging to the province of Ontario. But this Bill of 1910 expressly gives the company all the powers conferred by the Railway Act.

Mr. CONMEE. For the purposes of its works.

Mr. NORTHRUP. Certainly.

Mr. CONMEE. That would give them power if necessary to expropriate provincial lands.

Mr. NORTHRUP. No, there is merely the general power given but not the rest to expropriate land vested in the Crown and provincial lands are vested in the Crown just the same as Dominion lands. The provincial claim held in the Attorney General of British Columbia against the Canadian Pacific Railway that section 108 of the British North America Act specially empowers the Dominion parliament to legislate regarding any lands including the foreshores proved to govern part of a public harbour. It empowers the Dominion to give the right to expropriate provincial crown land and, therefore, it has the right to expropriate the provincial foreshore for the purpose of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Taking this decision as our basis, we find in the powers conferred by the Railway Act that corporations have the right to expropriate provincial lands. Beyond question that follows from the decision in this case. Nothing can be clearer than the words in this Bill making the Railway Act applicable to this company. So it is obvious that this company, while professing to ask simply the power to extend their lines along the shore, are really asking something different.

Mr. FISHER. I would ask the hon. gentleman whether that power, which he says is conferred under this Bill, of expropriating lands and waters belonging to a province, would apply to any waters or lands belonging to a province which they expropriate for the purpose of creating power. This Bill is one allowing the company to transmit power, and for that purpose the Railway Act and its expropriation clauses apply to these people, but that would not make those clauses apply to powers granted another company under another Bill.

Mr. NORTHRUP. This company is given rather broad powers under section 6.

Mr. FISHER. Under this Bill the company has no power to generate electricity.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What is the difference between a scheme carried on under one act of incorporation and a scheme carried on under two charters, if they are both controlled by the same people?

Mr. FISHER. Any powers given under this Bill for the purposes of transmission do not apply to rights and privileges for the purpose of creating power.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. That is a distinction without a difference if both companies are controlled by the same people.

Mr. FISHER. I do not think so.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I do.

Mr. BLAIN. The Minister of Public Works said that in his opinion this company we are now asked to incorporate, is simply a transmission company. When asked where they expected to get their power, he said from a dam that will be constructed across the St. Lawrence, suggesting the charter of the St. Lawrence Power Company. It would not be worth while to pass a Bill of this kind unless the company were to get their power from some other company because there is no power in this Bill for the generation of electricity.

Mr. FOSTER. That is what I have been pointing out.

Mr. BLAIN. Would the hon. minister state where this company is going to get their power.

Mr. FISHER. That is for them to find out.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Will he explain in whose name and on whose behalf plans for damming this river were brought to the Minister of Public Works? I thought we had a pretty plain statement from that minister but perhaps my hon. friend will give a little new light.

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot see how this matters in the slightest degree to this Bill.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The promoters of this scheme, having secured that particular Act, possessing it and controlling it, propose under that to dam the St. Lawrence and already have their plans filed and submitted to the Minister of Public Works, who has had them considered by the engineers of three departments—does my hon. friend claim, if that be the case, and the claims of these men that they can dam the river under that Act be well founded, that this Bill, which gives certain powers to the very men who control that charter, is not part of a great general scheme for damming the St. Lawrence? This is an ingenious scheme for creating power and for conveying the ownership of that power by a very easy method to this company. By employing this company for the purpose of transmission, it is simply doing the work by two companies instead of by one. Can my hon. friend not see that?

Mr. FISHER. I cannot see why, if an Act of this parliament gives them power to generate electricity, they should not then be given the power to transmit that electrical energy where this Bill allows them to do it. The question of a dam and the creation of power are not in this Bill. That is not conferred on the company by this Bill; but if my hon. friend is correct in his interpretation of another Bill and they have the right he says they enjoy, then I do not see why they should not be allowed to transmit the power to various localities in Canada which might benefit by using it.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I will give the hon. gentleman some reasons. There was not the slightest suspicion in the minds of any man in this House when the Act of 1901 was passed, that any such scheme was intended. I have carefully looked over the debates of 1901 and find that the Bill went through the House without a word of comment. Some very clever words were introduced into some of the paragraphs in the Act of 1901, and the contention of those who control that charter is that it enables them to build a dam across the St. Lawrence joining a dam on the American side, and thus generate that power. Having that authority, they ask that this parliament shall give them certain other powers which will only be useful for the purpose of carrying out the bigger scheme to which I have alluded, and I say that that is too big a scheme to receive the approval of this House under the conditions which prevail at present. We do not know enough about it. We have not even seen the plans which have been in the possession of the Minister of Public Works for eight months, and which we find, to our astonishment, he had submitted to three engineers of the government who made a report without any man in this House knowing anything about it. We were astounded last evening to discover how far this project has advanced and how far the government is committed to it without making known its intentions to parliament. Under the circumstances, when this Bill is proposed as part of that great scheme, vitally and materially affecting the future interests of this country, affecting the great waterway of the St. Lawrence, the products of the west, and when there is lack of information and the absence of any definite policy of the government in regard to that scheme, it is perfectly clear it should not receive the approval of the committee.

Mr. FIELDING. The hon. gentleman stated that he was surprised to find how far the government were committed to this scheme. I think he will see that last night it was distinctly stated by my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works that the government were not committed at all to it.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I said I was surprised to see how far the government were committed to it. I did not say that the government were absolutely committed.

Mr. FIELDING. If they are not committed, how can the hon. gentleman see how far they are committed?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I could not say. My hon. friend should know more about that than I do.

Mr. FIELDING. No, my knowledge is the same.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Perhaps so. Afterwards we discovered from the Minister of Public Works yesterday that he had gone so far as to send the engineers of three different departments to consider these plans, that they had been considered with certain objections which had been raised and that finally the engravers had come back with the plans which he said they had approved and which, as far as I can gather, had the approval of the government. They might not have had the formal approval of the government—I do not understand that they had—but if these three engineers had been sent to report upon the project and if they had reported favourably upon it with certain modifications it seems to me that they have made very great progress indeed towards winning the approval of the government. That impression is very greatly strengthened by the circumstance that the Minister of Public Works seemed to have committed himself to the project by attempting to drive this Bill through the committee before the committee should rise, although a respectful request was made to him at one o'clock this morning, when we had sat an hour and a half later than the House usually sits, and when the discussion had been absolutely relevant and instructive in every respect, that the committee should rise, the request was refused and we were told shortly afterwards by an hon. member on the other side of the House that the government had determined to sit until Saturday night for the purpose of driving this Bill through. That would seem to indicate that the government are pretty well committed to this Bill or they would not take a stand of that kind. I never knew a statement of that kind to be made with regard to a private Bill or any other Bill under similar circumstances. There had not been one minute of debate in regard to this Bill that had not been relevant and instructive up to the time I made this request. A great deal of the debate had been raised by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, by the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) and by the hon member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff), one of whom declared that this was evidently a much larger scheme than the House was aware of at first, and the other of whom stated that this Bill had evidently been presented to the House under false pretenses. I say that the action of the Minister of Public Works under the circumstances indicates that whether the government is committed to this scheme or not the Minister of Public Works is very strongly committed to it; otherwise he would not have taken the action that he did.

Mr. FIELDING. I am obliged to take exception to the hon. gentleman's inaccuracies. If this matter is as important as the hon. gentleman thinks it is, he will agree with me that he should not be inaccurate in his statements.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I am very glad to be corrected.

Mr. FIELDING. I take exception to the statement that he made that some hon. gentleman on this side of the House stated that the government would sit here until Saturday evening. I say that no such statement was made.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What was the statement then?

Mr. FIELDING. If my hon. friend is making the statement he should not ask me to furnish him with the information.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Does the hon. gentleman say that the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Black) did not state that?

Mr. FIELDING. The hon. member for Hants spoke for himself. The hon. member for Hants made no allusion to the government. No man undertook to speak in the name of the government in reference to this Bill. From the beginning to the end it was stated to be a private Bill in which the government had no concern and if my hon. friend was informed that a member on this side of the House said that the government would stay here until Saturday night and force this Bill through I can assure him that he was misinformed.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The hon. member for Hants is the chairman of the committee which had this Bill under consideration, is he not?

Mr. FIELDING. I understand that he was acting chairman.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Well, he seemed to speak with some authority.

Mr. FIELDING. The hon. gentleman says that he 'seemed' to speak with some authority. A moment ago he said that the hon. member for Hants said that the government had determined to force this Bill through.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What did the hon. member for Hants say?

Mr. FIELDING. I am not called upon to answer for the hon. member for Hants; I am called upon to answer for the government when the government is misrepresented. My hon. friend was not so anxious to make a point against the hon. member for Hants as against the government. The essence of his statement was that he said that the government was going to force this Bill through.

Some hon. MEMBERS. So he did.

Mr. FIELDING. I can assure my hon. friend that in that respect he has been misinformed. I have another objection to make to a statement of my hon. friend in which statement my hon. friend has also been inaccurate. He said that he was surprised to find how far the government have been committed to this scheme of damming the St. Lawrence. The English language is plain enough for my hon. friend to know that if he was surprised to find how far the government was committed, then the government must have been committed, and yet the statement made by the Minister of Public Works was that the government was in no way committed, although it had caused some inquiry to be made by engineers. There are many projects presented to the government and to parliament as to which engineers are asked to make reports; but would any one contend that because the government sent out an engineer to inquire into a matter the government are committed to it? It is not a reasonable argument at all.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I would like to say in reply to what the Minister of Finance has advanced that I do not think all the inaccuracies are on this side of the House. What the hon. member for Hants said he said in the presence of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. FIELDING. Did my hon. friend hear him?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I heard him.

Mr. FIELDING. I beg my hon. friend's pardon; I thought he was not present.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. He said: We will stay here until Saturday night to put this Bill through. I am not quoting his exact words, but that is the substance of them, the Minister of Finance was here at the time and he did not disclaim them. He seemed, as far as I could judge, to assent to that declaration. The hon. member for Hants said that in his presence and said it after I had asked respectfully and courteously, at one o'clock, and after the hon. member for Westmorland had also asked that this committee should rise. Take the language of the hon. member for Hants, unrepudiated by the Minister of Finance, and take the action of the Minister of Finance in refusing to permit this committee to rise, put these two things together and let us see whether the inaccuracy is on my part or on the part of the Minister of Finance. My hon. friend says that I am inaccurate in stating that I did not know how far the government was committed to this project.

Mr. FIELDING. No, that was not the hon. gentleman's statement. His statement was that he was surprised to find how far the government were committed.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Well, I am surprised to find how far the government are committed. Actions speak a great deal louder than words. When we find what has been going on without the knowledge of parliament, when we find that the Minister of Public Works informed us that these plans have been under consideration for eight months, when we find that they have been referred to engineers, that these engineers have reported favourably upon them, with some modifications, and when we find the Minister of Public Works evincing such a deep and abiding interest in having this Bill go through without the production of these plans upon the table of the House, I am surprised to find the government is committed to this project to that extent.

Mr. FIELDING. To what extent?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. To the extent of carrying on these negotiations with these gentlemen, having these plans referred to the engineers, receiving a favourable report about them, and making no communication whatever to this House in regard to the form of that report. It only come out last evening by accident. What does it mean? We had the Minister of Public Works endeavouring to convince this House at first—he was obliged to abandon the position afterwards—that these plans had been submitted to the government without the authority of any statute. Did any one ever hear of such a position? A body of men, without any statute, without any charter, without any legal sanction, come to this government and say: Here are certain plans for damming the St. Lawrence; will you be good enough to send the engineers of your department and have these plans considered? That was the position which the Minister of Public Works took at first, but afterwards, under the effect of certain discussion, raised not from this side of the House, but from the other side by the hon. member for Westmorland, the Minister of Public Works was obliged to admit, and did admit in answer to myself that these plans were put forward to this government under the authority conferred by a Bill passed by this House in 1901. This House was absolutely in ignorance of the fact that the persons controlling that charter believed themselves to possess the power to dam the River St. Lawrence. I had no knowledge that any such claim had been made until that admission was drawn from the Minister of Public Works last night by the hon. member for Westmorland. This has been going on behind the back of parliament and behind the back of the country. Certain gentlemen acquired the charter of the St. Lawrence Power Company. These gentlemen had raised the claim that under that they have authority from parliament to build a dam across the St. Lawrence as far as the boundary line. The same gentlemen have procured legislation from the State of New York authorizing them to build a dam from the American side to the same boundary line. These gentlemen, having these charters in their possession, came to the government, probably more than a year ago, presented their plans, and these plans have been under consideration by the government, knowing of the claim of these men, for at least eight months. The Bill now before the House is, according to the admission of the Minister of Public Works, a Bill which is designed to carry out part of this great scheme. That is the position, and under the circumstances and having regard to the action which this government have taken in endeavouring to force this Bill through against all custom and precedent, I am surprised that they have been so far committed to this project as they seem to have been.

Mr. FIELDING. The hon. gentleman has made an outcry, and many other hon. gentlemen have done the same thing, as to the government having in their possession certain plans which they did not present to the House, and which they say they are hiding from the House, which they are suppressing. There are hundreds of plans presented to the government in relation to public matters, and which are to be found in the various departments, which are never presented to parliament, and unless some hon. gentleman had asked for a plan and it had been refused, there would be no ground whatever for complaint.

Mr. HUGHES. I asked for them.

Mr. FIELDING. The hon. gentleman asked for them last evening when he knew he could not get them.

Mr. HUGHES. I did not know that I could not get them. The Finance Minister and the Minister of Public Works stated here last night that these two Bills had a most important relation one to the other.

Mr. FIELDING. I have said that plans are submitted to the government and unless there was some special request for them they would not be brought down to the House and so this bugaboo is extremely ridiculous.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Would the government send three engineers to see whether plans prepared by persons having no authority to build a line of railway should be approved?

Mr. FIELDING. Perhaps not, but if they did send an engineer and plans were produced and filed in the archives of the department they would never be brought to this House unless they were asked for.

Mr. HUGHES. Were they not asked for at the Private Bills Committee?

Mr. FIELDING. I do not know. The hon. member says he never knew anything about them until last night.

Mr. HUGHES. I am not on the Private Bills Committee, otherwise you bet they would have been asked for.

Mr. FIELDING. I find I was too charitable in supposing that the leader of the opposition was not here when the member for Hants spoke, he was here. He shifted his ground in his last speech, he first said that the member for Hants stated that the government would sit here. I took exception to that statement and when he was called to account he said that he heard the hon. member for Hants and that hon. member said: 'We.'

An hon. MEMBER. Who is 'we.'

Mr. NORTHRUP. Who controls this House?

Mr. FIELDING. Nobody controls this House, this is the free and independent parliament of this country and it is not controlled I say in the name of the Liberals of this country there is no authority to control the parliament of Canada.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. To whom did the member for Hants refer when he used the word 'we'?

Mr. CONMEE. The friends of the Bill.

Mr. FIELDING. I suppose the member for Hants spoke for himself, perhaps he is in the editorial chair sometimes.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. If the government are not committed to this proposition is that not all the more reason to call a halt.

Mr. FIELDING. My hon. friend does not know, we called a halt long ago when he was sleeping.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. If they are not committed to the project and it is known that this is part of a much wider project, why commit the House to this minor proposition when there is still a major proposition to be dealt with? The government will surely take time to discuss this with the International Waterways Commission, the Conservation Commission and other bodies of that kind. The Minister of Finance is engaged in a great issue in regard to the tariff. It is said that the United States government may have to put in force their maximum tariff against this country on account of some action of this government, and at this very time we propose to pass legislation which means that the greatest power we have left on the St. Lawrence may be so developed that the bulk of the power will be transmitted to the United States for the development of their resources. We ought to keep in our hands the absolute control of that power which may be an important factor in this tariff discussion with the United States. This power is to be used, as far as I can judge, to electrify the New York Central Railway, one of the greatest rivals of our Canadian system. That power ought to be reserved to electrify the Canadian roads. The Bill could well stand over for another year. An international claim may be based on what is done now and so we should move slowly. The province of Ontario and the people of Toronto are trying to work out a great political principle known as public ownership. For some reason this principle is being assailed by many interests, and a determined effort is being made here to prevent the progress of that movement in relation to electrical energy. There is no urgency except the urgency of private as against national interest. Is the national interest to be jeopardized in order that private interests may be advanced? Where is the national urgency? The matter should at least rest for a time to allow the fullest discussion and amplification of the facts.

Mr. CONMEE. The leader of the opposition and some other members may not have heard the offer from the Minister of Finance early in the evening, that in order to prevent a deadlock he would be willing that the committee should pass the non-contentious clauses of this Bill?

An hon. MEMBER. There are none.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. CONMEE. That is what I understood him to say. The course of hon. members opposite is a pure question of obstruction on their part, and in all fairness and having regard to the rules of this House and to the general conduct of public affairs in any legislative assembly, a minority ought not to undertake to dictate or to control the House either in regard to the legislation of the mode of procedure with any particular legislation. I cannot see any difference between a private Bill and any other kind of Bill. It is just a question of the majority ruling. This Bill has nothing to do with the navigation of the St. Lawrence river. It does not disturb the lock, which is on the Canadian side, and not on the American side. The reason for the proposal of a lock on the American side is that there is a channel there which steamers coming down the river run without going through the lock.

Mr. J. D. REID. Large steamers cannot go through the south channel.

Mr. CONMEE. But certain steamers do use it. It is not this government that is insisting on a lock on the American side, but the United States congress. In that there is no menace to Canadian interests, but an improvement. The Minister of Public Works has stated time and again during the debate that the government were not committed to any improvements of the river, and that no plan would be approved of by them until it was first submitted to and approved by parliament. The hon. member says this Bill is linked with another Bill. I do not know that it is so.

Mr. J. D. REID. The Minister of Public Works said so.

Mr. CONMEE. The Minister of Public Works was asked where they were going to get their power, and he said he expected they would get it from the St. Lawrence Power Company.

Mr. BLAIN. Where does my hon. friend expect they will get it?

Mr. CONMEE. I do not know, and I do know that my hon. friend knows; but I do know that they could get more than 100,000 horse-power without dealing with the St. Lawrence Power Company at all. I know that there is power at the Lachine rapids, at Cornwall and at other points on the St. Lawrence where they could get power. Hon. gentlemen have referred to the Bill passed in 1901 giving a charter to a company to build a dam and generate and utilize electrical power. It is doubtful if they have exercised that power sufficiently to hold their charter. But assuming that they have that power, hon. gentlemen do not take it away by holding up this Bill. Moreover, at that time we did not make the rights of the company subordinate to the control of the Board of Railway Commissioners. Under this Bill, we protect the public interests by putting machinery in force that will insure to the people cheap power and reasonable service. I do not care whether it is Canadian capital, or American capital, or English capital that develops this or any other waterpower so long as the people of Canada have that power under their control. This company cannot, under the law, export any power unless the government allows them to do so, and I have sufficient confidence in this government to believe that it will not alow them to do that. I may have objections to some of the clauses of this Bill, but the time has not come to discuss them. Hon. gentlemen who are opposing the Bill are determined that, as they are in the minority, they will not allow a vote to take place. I do not think any good purpose can be served by that attitude. I submit that the hon. minister has made a reasonable proposition which hon. gentlemen should accept.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call your attention to the fact that the Railway Committee, of which you are the chairman, is called to meet at eleven o'clock this morning, that it is now that hour, and that there are engagements to meet to-day by that committee, and parties are here attending on those engagements who would like to go on; and I submit to the leader of the House, in order that the work of the House may not be disarranged, especially in view of the statement that the government is not committed to this Bill, that the committee should rise and report progress, and that those who are members of the Railway Committee should have an opportunity to go and attend to its business.

Mr. FIELDING. I quite appreciate the desire of my hon. friend to put an end to this protracted sitting and to go to the business of the Railway Committee; but after all we must meet the situation as we find it. He is not aware of the proposals made on this matter when he supposes that the government is attempting to force this Bill through the committee. That is due to a misapprehension of the facts. At an early stage of the discussion I asked that this Bill be treated as any other private Bill. Most of the clauses are unimportant and non-contentious, and I proposed that we pass them clause by clause, and that whenever a clause was reached that any hon. member wished to have stand over, I would raise my voice to have it stand over, and the Bill would remain in committee to give hon. members a reasonable time to prepare their amendments or do anything else that was necessary. That is a fair and reasonable proposition, and is entirely at variance with the suggestion that the government are trying to force this Bill through.

Mr. HUGHES. Let the Minister of Finance recall the situation last night. Until the Minister of Public Works made the formal statement that he did regarding the connection between the company controlling this Bill and the St. Lawrence Water Power Company, the feeling on this side was to accede to the suggestion made by the Minister of Finance. But how were we met up to that time? Five ministers of the Crown sat in a row, and, I say it advisedly, never during the twenty sessions that I have been in this House have I seen them fight more ardently for any government measure than they fought for this Bill.

Mr. FIELDING. I think the only other minister who spoke on the matter besides myself was the Minister of Public Works. If there were five ministers of the Crown sitting here, they were only doing their duty.

Mr. HUGHES. If more of them sat here while the government measures were being discussed, we would be less surprised; but when a government measure is before the House, there are usually only two or three ministers present. But on this private measure, the mandate was sent out by the leader of the House to the chief whip from the province of Ontario, the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee), who is in charge of this Bill, that not one concession was to be made, and the Minister of Finance told me that we had to let the Bill pass last night. That was early in the evening. We have discovered by our fighting that the company promoting this Bill is intimately asociated with the St. Lawrence Power Company, and I give the minister notice that we are going to get to the bottom of this thing before this Bill goes through.

Mr. FIELDING. I hope you will, and I will help you.

Mr. NORTHRUP. It might be well to find just how far we are in accord. We have a Bill before the House to confer certain rights on a company in connection with transmitting power throughout a district on the St. Lawrence river not very far from here, and for some reason no member from that district, and knowing the feelings of the people there, would father such a Bill, and its promoters had to go to the western limits of the province to find any one to father it, and selected the chief government whip for that purpose. That is a piece of evidence which certainly points in one direction, though it does not necessarily prove what is behind the Bill. Then the Bill comes before the House and we do not find the hon. gentleman who fathers the Bill or any of the hon. gentlemen from the part of the country more particularly concerned taking any active part in supporting it.

Mr. CONMEE. I beg my hon. friend's pardon. I have been strongly supporting it all through the debate.

Mr. NORTHRUP. I apologize to the hon. member for Rainy River. I admit that I was wrong. I admit that he is the father of all waterworks legislation save this and he is the step-father of this. We find that this Bill was introduced by the chief government whip and that it is supported by the members of the cabinet, and when an hon. gentleman, sitting beside the minister who is now leading the House (Mr. Fielding), says that they will sit until Saturday night if necessary to force the Bill through, that is certainly further evidence to excite suspicion. The hon. gentleman who leads the House found fault with the leader of the opposition because he did not exactly quote the words used by the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Black). But the hon. gentleman himself did not quote his words.

Mr. FIELDING. Why should I?

Mr. NORTHRUP. I think he should have done so or not have contradicted the leader of the opposition. As a man of honour, he could not contradict him.

Mr. FIELDING. I have no right to answer for the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Black). I understand that the hon. gentleman, feeling displeased at the conduct of hon. gentlemen opposite, expressed his own views. He did not profess to speak for the government, he had not the right to do so, and he would be the last man to attempt to do so.

Mr. NORTHRUP. In order to be perfectly fair to the Minister of Finance and afford him the opportunity to make the explanation, I am sure he is anxious to make, I ask him now whether it is the intention of the government to force the Bill through?

Mr. FIELDING. The government have no intention in the matter. This is a private Bill, and I have expressed the view that this Bill shall not be forced through and that hon. gentlemen opposite, if they will only take a reasonable course, will have ample opportunity to consider what they deem the contentious clauses. If they will only consent to our making some progress, the Bill may remain in committee, and they will be given ample time to consider it. Can anything be fairer?

Mr. NORTHRUP. The proposition would be perfectly reasonable and proper if it be admitted that this is a government measure, because what the hon. minister suggests is the practice which is followed in connection with government measures. In 1903 I had the honour of affecting a settlement along similar lines with the Minister of Justice in connection with a government measure. The principle admitted as settled is that when this House meets to transact government business, some government business must be transacted or that is an admission that the government has lost control of the House. Therefore, in connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific Bill, hon. members on this side, although bitterly opposed to it, consented to some objectionable clauses, assuming that the Bill must eventually pass because it was a government measure. But here the case is different. If the hon. minister says that no pressure will be brought on members of the House——

Mr. FIELDING. I have certainly said a dozen times at least that as this is not a government Bill, I would not presume to recommend it to any member of the House. How any member of the House may vote, I do not know or care. All I desire is to make some progress with business.

Mr. NORTHRUP. Inasmuch then as it is not a government measure, and hon. members are not bound by political allegiance to support it, there may be some chance that, by discussing it, we may possibly succeed in protecting the interests of the country against the promotors of this Bill. Whatever the facts may be, it is unquestionable that the province of Ontario is bitterly opposing this Bill as encroaching on its rights. Whether the province be right or wrong is another question. In my opinion, it is right. But here we have these cabinet ministers, who formerly used to boast that they were the special defenders of provincial rights, using their influence to put through a private Bill which the Ontario government says is an interference with its rights. Here we have the singular spectacle of a government intervening in the case of a private Bill to force it through, which the Ontario government says is an interference with its rights.

Mr. DEVLIN. I have not made up my mind on this Bill entirely, but would like to consider it clause by clause. The only point affecting provincial rights is clause one, which gives some gentlemen the right to form themselves into a company.

Mr. M. MARTIN. I am opposed to this Bill, and ony a few minutes ago I told the hon. the Finance Minister that I would vote against it. He said to me: Do as you like, because it is not a government measure. I am against it, because the Board of Trade and the municipality of Montreal oppose it, but I want to be understood that in any vote any hon. member may give on this side, he is not influenced by the government, and no one on this side is voting in a certain way because of ministerial dictation.

Mr. NORTHRUP. We are getting more and more light as the debate progresses, and probably by Friday evening or Saturday morning the House may unanimously agree to throw the measure out. In the first place, we have the Bill introduced in this House by the chief government whip, who lives 100 miles away from the locus in quo, and in the second place, the Bill is being pushed through the house by the government.

Mr. FIELDING. No.

Mr. NORTHRUP. It is by the efforts of the hon. gentleman who is leading the government that the Bill is thrust upon the House. Then we have this other fact. If we look into the Act of 1901, we find that that Act would apparently require the construction of works on this side of the St. Lawrence, and it seems to me impossible for the St. Lawrence Power Company, under their Act, to carry on their business without constructing works on this side of the St. Lawrence. But the company now being incorporated is asking the power to make contracts for the purchase of electricity from any other company. So that this company could lease their electricity from the American side. In every way therefore the interests of Canada would be overlooked and the interests of the state of New York protected. We all know the wonderful strength of vested rights. If these enormous power plants were established on the American side and the electricity distributed along the Canadian shore to various industries, then the time might come when the supply of electricity from the United States might be shut off unless our Canadian industries would give way to some threat from the other side. As was held by my hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean) this is a most inopportune time for Canada to do anything which would in any way jeopardize its supply of electric power. We have recklessly given away an immense amount of national wealth in timber, coal and minerals, and here it is proposed that we should part with the last and greatest of all our assets, the water-power of the St. Lawrence, which is equal to almost all the water-powers on this continent taken together; and we are doing this in absolute ignorance because there is not a member in this House competent to discuss and estimate the consequence of such an act.

Mr. DEVLIN. I want to try and give an intelligent vote on this Bill. I have listened for some hours to the discussion, and as I understand the rules of the House, we are simply called upon to consider clause 1 of the Bill. Clause 1 provides that certain gentlemen of Ontario, with the exception of one who is a resident of the town of Messina, N.Y., shall be incorporated into a company. The question of provincial rights I understand may be discussed under clause 6. When we come to the other clauses, if we find that the rights of any province are jeopardized, it would then be proper to reject any proposal which will have this effect. But by rule 53, I take it that this Bill must be considered clause by clause. I think it is a very fair proposal on the part of the government to ask hon. members to consider clause 1, against which there can be absolutely no objection and then, after the clause is passed, it will be in order to consider whether we should go on with another clause.

Mr. LANCASTER. I do not understand what my hon. friend means by saying there can be no objection to clause 1. Why should we incorporate a number of men, a lot of them unknown, to transmit power? Where are they going to transmit it to?

Mr. DEVLIN. We will come to that in considering the other clauses.

Mr. LANCASTER. The hon. gentleman says we must stick to clause 1. I would point out that he is prepared to vote for something without knowing what it may amount to. Where is this power to be transmitted to?

Mr. DEVLIN. That will come up for consideration in a subsequent clause.

Mr. LANCASTER. Not necessarily. This clause undertakes to say what the name of this company shall be. It is the St. Lawrence Power Transmission Company, Limited. The St. Lawrence river is a boundary stream, and if you are going to transmit power from the St. Lawrence you are just as liable to transmit it southerly as northerly, and I do not think this clause should pass without more limitation.

Mr. DEVLIN. I am not now discussing the merits of the Bill. I may wish to vote against clause 6, but that is no reason why I should vote against clause 1.

Mr. LANCASTER. I do not think we should pass clause 1. I do not agree with the point raised by the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, that there is no harm in passing clause 1 even if I did admit that there was nothing but the name of the company in it. When we are incorporating this company as the St. Lawrence Power Transmission Company, Limited. I want to know what sort of transmission they are going on with.

Mr. DEVLIN. If the hon. gentleman could point out anything against the honour or ability of the gentlemen seeking this incorporation, I could understand that there must be an objection to it. But, if they are honourable gentlemen, the usual practice of parliament is to allow them to be incorporated and then decide afterwards what shall be the powers to be given to them.

Mr. LANCASTER. The hon. gentleman might be quite willing to give them all the powers that they ask, but I am not willing and I do not say that this is any slur upon their honour or ability. The government is not prepared to tell us what these gentlemen are going to do. The government apparently knew months ago but they have not seen fit to place these plans before parliament, and parliament does not know. The company are in this position, that they cannot legally get this legislation by any secret arrangement with the government, although they must have made one. They ask parliament to endorse it, but they will not show the plans to the endorser. Yet my hon. friend thinks we should go on and consent to clause 1 of the Bill If my hon. friend knows that there is no harm in clause 1 will he give us the information that he possesses and undertake to get these plans that we have asked for so that parliament may vote intelligently upon this question.

Mr. DEVLIN. That is just what I want to do. I want to give an intelligent vote upon the Bill after due consideration of it.

Mr. LANCASTER. By whom?

Mr. DEVLIN. By the House.

Mr. LANCASTER. Well, let us have the plans.

Mr. FIELDING. We have no plans affecting this clause.

Mr. DEVLIN. By rule 53 I find that 'in proceedings of the committee of the whole House upon bills, the preamble is first postponed and then every clause considered by the committee in its proper order, the preamble and title to be last considered.' We are now at clause 1 and there is absolutely no question of plans in clause 1. When we come to subsequent clauses it may be open to any hon. gentleman to ask for the production of plans in order that we may see just exactly what power they seek, but it is certainly not under clause 1.

Mr. BLAIN. Is it not unusual that plans are withheld until we reach a clause in the Bill which requires a discussion of the plans? Would it not be fair to submit the plans when the subject was introduced for discussion in the committee?

Mr. DEVLIN. I perfectly agree that it will be proper for the promoters of this Bill to produce the plans of the powers which they may be seeking to exercise when we come to the consideration of those particular clauses, but under clause 1 of the Bill I fail to see how any plans which might be produced would enlighten us upon the character, the quality or the honour or ability of the few gentlemen of the province of Ontario who are seeking incorporation under the name of the St. Lawrence Power Transmission Company, Limited.

Mr. LANCASTER. Clause 1 seeks to incorporate these gentlemen under the name of the St. Lawrence Power Transmission Company, Limited. Before we allow them to be incorporated under that name surely we ought to know what sort of power they are going to transmit and where they are going to transmit it to. The hon. gentleman says that when we get to certain clauses these plans should be produced. Are we going to bring the promoters before the bar of the House when we get to these clauses and call upon them to produce these plans? I say that they should have been produced when the Bill was called, but the hon. gentlemen admits that when we get to certain operative clauses these plans should be produced.

Mr. DEVLIN. What plans is the hon. gentleman referring to?

Mr. LANCASTER. To the plans that you were referring to that you stated the promoters should be called upon to produce?

Mr. DEVLIN. I was not referring to any clause, but I said that if there were any plans to be produced, I presumed they would be produced. I did not know what they referred to.

Mr. LANCASTER. We should have had these plans put on the table of the House before the Bill was called at all, why should we be prevented from examining them? These plans might be produced at a subsequent stage of this Bill, but the clause applicable to them would be called carried while hon. gentlemen were looking at the plans to see what they contain. There must be some reason in all this. I suspect this is a huge attempt being made by some persons—some of whom are mentioned and some of whom are not—to get possession of these water-powers on the St. Lawrence and avoid all our legislation about the exportation of electrical power, &c. These plans would settle the question. The people want to get that information, and they will have it.

Mr. DEVLIN. What information?

Mr. LANCASTER. The information that the government have, but that parliament has not. The engineers have made these plans, the government have seen them and still they withhold them from parliament. Why do they want to keep that information from the country? What is wrong about it? Some hon. gentlemen propose to stay here until Saturday night to put this Bill through. I am prepared to stay until Saturday night, if the Lord allows me to live that long, before I shall vote for any such legislation.

Mr. NEELY. If the hon. gentleman is sincere in his position——

Mr. LANCASTER. Did the hon. gentleman ever know me not to be sincere in any position I took?

Mr. NEELY. I am asking if he is sincere——

Mr. LANCASTER. You can bet your life on that.

Mr. NEELY. The rules of the House compel us to accept any hon. gentleman's statement as to his sincerity and I am not questioning the hon. gentleman's sincerity. If he wants to question it he has a perfect right to do so. The proposition that this Bill should be considered clause by clause seems to me to be very reasonable. The hon. member knows that passing a clause in this committee does not finally pass it. If the hon. member is sincere in his desire not to give these gentlemen any undue powers, why can he not wait until we arrive at the clauses in the Bill which are objectionable to him as giving undue powers? He talks about plans. I find no reference to any powers granted to the incorporators in this Bill that call for any plans. That has been said over and over again. Hon. members are simply trying to connect up this Bill with some other Bill, some other proposition, that has no relationship to the Bill before us.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. The Prime Minister is now here and perhaps he would use the influence of that sweet smile of his to induce the hon. members behind him to permit the committee to rise and report progress, and ask leave to sit again, as it is about twelve o'clock. The Prime Minister has not heard the argument on this Bill. It is a private Bill and the government should not take sides on it. When the Bill was introduced the opposition and others asked that it should stand over, but the Minister of Public Works could not agree that the minister said last night that the majority must rule. This being a private Bill there is no majority unless the government force their majority to back it up. Hon. gentlemen on this side took a different view of it and we have been talking since five o'clock last evening. The question which was asked of an hon. member a few minutes ago was not answered as the Minister of Public Works answered it last night. The discussion that then took place was as follows:

Mr. BLAIN. Where does the minister think they would get their power?

Mr. PUGSLEY. My own idea is that they will get their power from a company which may develop it along the St. Lawrence. I do not know that to be the case but I suspect it. This Bill simply incorporates a transmission company which would have to make an arrangement with another company for its power. The development of power upon the St. Lawrence must be provided for by another statute, but this Bill does not give the slightest authority to dam the St. Lawrence or construct any works in the St. Lawrence or anywhere else except such works as are essential for a transmission line. As head of the department which has been investigating this subject, the matter has come before me and hon. gentlemen are doubtless aware that the plans of the company were submitted to the government for the development of water-powers on the St. Lawrence. It was directed that these plans should be referred to the chief engineer of the Department of Railways, the chief engineer of Public Works, and the chief engineer of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Under what statute did the company profess to be acting when it submitted these plans?

Mr. PUGSLEY. They did not state, but I understood it to be under the St. Lawrence Power Company charter granted by this parliament some years ago. I also understood from them that they expected to have to come back to parliament to get authority to dam the St. Lawrence.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. They have it under the other statute.

Mr. PUGSLEY. So my hon. friend (Mr. Emmerson) thinks, but they did not lead us to understand that they had. The three engineers to whom the plans were referred reported adversely to the plans as originally proposed, and they suggested certain modifications which were accepted. The engineers, reported that the project was feasible, that the dam could be erected without interference with navigation, and the matter is now before the International Waterways Commission.

I was going to assure the committee that no plans would be approved of, no arrangement would be approved of, no agreement would be ratified by the government which does not amply protect Canadian interests. So far as the Department of Public Works is concerned, I can assure the committee that the plans will not be approved of unless upon the express stipulation, which will be thoroughly safeguarded, that one-half of the water-power which will be developed will be reserved absolutely for the use of the people on the Canadian side of the line.

Mr. HUGHES. Are these the dam plans?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes.

Mr. HUGHES. The thing is under consideration then?

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is the view my department has arrived at, and that will be made a sine qua non of any action the department will take.

Mr. J. D. REID. Has your department power to do that without the consent of parliament?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think not. Parliament will have to consent to the matter in the end, and my recollection is that some time ago, in answer to a question put by the hon. member (Mr. Hughes) the Prime Minister stated that before the plans were approved of, the whole matter would be submitted to parliament for consideration, and before definite action would be taken, parliament must be satisfied that the work will be in the interest of Canada.

Mr. EMMERSON. Were these plans which were submitted by the St. Lawrence Power Company to your department for approval, plans for the construction of a work to connect with another work that would come out from the American shore?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, the plans were for damming the river across from the Canadian side to the American side, and also for the building of a lock for the purpose of improving navigation, the idea being to give an additional lock to the one that is already there, and which was constructed, and is owned by the Canadian government.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. Does the plan provide for a lock on the American side?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, and that is strongly objected to by the engineers of the department. They urge that the lock should be built on the Canadian side.

Mr. HUGHES. Why build a lock on the Canadian side unless the water is to be raised? The minister approves of it, the engineers say that lock has to be built, but they insist on it being on the Canadian side and the minister corroborates every word the opposition has contended for, that this company is a part and parcel of the company which got a charter in 1901. He says so here in plain language. I think the Prime Minister should allow the members of the committee to take recess and have dinner. The opposition have made a strong claim that they do not want to go on with the Bill until they see the plans in the minister's possession. I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. DEVLIN. There is already an amendment to the motion.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. As I understand it, clause 1 is before the committee. There was a motion that the committee rise and report progress but that was defeated and it cannot be repeated until some further business is done.

Mr. G. TAYLOR. No vote was taken.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I declared a motion of that kind lost at an earlier stage and it cannot be repeated until some further step has been taken.

Mr. DEVLIN. I think it is unfair for honourable gentlemen opposite to keep us here against our will and prevent the public business from going on.

Mr. LANCASTER. Private business.

Mr. DEVLIN. We want to get at the public business. I am as keen as any other hon. member to maintain provincial rights, but I hardly see how that question comes in here. We are dealing with the St. Lawrence river, which is a navigable river, and is therefore under the exclusive jurisdiction of this parliament. But we are now considering simply clause 1 of this Bill, and the question before us is, shall a number of gentlemen of the province of Ontario be allowed to form themselves into a company for some purpose to be here after considered? I ask the leader of the opposition whether he considers that we are wrong.

Mr. LANCASTER. Let me enlighten the hon. gentleman with regard to clause 1, which he evidently does not understand. The St. Lawrence River Power Company, which was incorporated in 1901, and this company, are practically one and the same company, incorporated to do the same thing.

Mr. DEVLIN. They are two different companies, composed of altogether different gentlemen.

Mr. LANCASTER. I do not say they are the same people; but the hon. gentleman proposes to incorporate two companies to do the same thing on the same river.

Mr. DEVLIN. Will the hon. gentleman state whether, if we vote for clause 1, we must of necessity give this company powers that may conflict with those of another company?

Mr. LANCASTER. It follows that we must give them some powers, and it follows from the name of the company that we must give them powers for the transmission of power from the St. Lawrence river.

Mr. BLAIN. My hon. friend from Wright (Mr. Devlin) asks for some expression from this side of the House as to why this Bill should not pass. May I direct his attention to his neighbour sitting besides him, the hon. member for St. Mary's division, Montreal (Mr. Martin). That hon. gentleman will say that in his opinion, in the interests of the largest city in Canada, this Bill should not become law because it gives this company the right to enter on the streets of Montreal without the consent of the municipality.

Mr. FISHER. That statement is not correct, as the Bill stands before the committee. This company will have no power to enter on the streets of Montreal or those of any municipality without the consent of that municipality. If permitted, I would like to make clear one or two points which are evidently not known to some hon. gentlemen opposite. I had not an opportunity to be here early in the discussion, as I arrived in Ottawa only at midnight. According to my interpretation of the Bill as it has been reported on by the Private Bills Committee, the rights of the city of Montreal are absolutely safeguarded.

Mr. BLAIN. May I ask the hon. minister if the hon. member for St. Mary's division agrees with that?

Mr. FISHER. I do not think my hon. friend would dispute it for a moment, if he reads the Bill and also section 247 of the Railway Act.

Mr. BLAIN. I may say that the hon. member for St. Mary's division (Mr. Martin, and the hon. member for St. James division (Mr. Gervais) appeared before the committee and contended that this Bill did invade the rigths of the city of Montreal.

Mr. FISHER. That was before the Bill was changed. I was in the committee at the sitting when this Bill was finally passed upon and reported to the House. It was only in that sitting that the provision I have referred to was inserted. Consequently any disputes in regard to that point must have been at previous sittings.

Mr. LANCASTER. Which provision does the hon. minister mean?

Mr. FISHER. The section providing that clause 247 of the Railway Act shall apply to the works and undertakings of the company. That is subsection 3 of section 6 of the Bill as reported. That section was inserted for the express purpose of protecting the rights of municipalities and was accepted by the promoters of the Bill. The section provides that when any company is empowered by special Acts of the parliament of Canada, to construct or operate lines for the conveyance of light, heat, power or electricity it may, with the consent of the municipal council, or other authorities having jurisdiction over any highway, &c., enter thereon. And subsection 8 says:

> Nothing contained in this section shall be deemed to authorize the company to exercise the powers therein mentioned for the purpose of selling or distributing light, heat, power or electricity in cities, towns or villages without the company having first obtained consent therefore by a by-law of the municipality.

That being the case, the rights and privileges of Montreal and all the other municipalities are absolutely safeguarded.

Another word or two with regard to some of the provisions. When the Bill first came in, there was nothing to control the rates, but we added a clause which gives the control to the Board of Railway Commissioners. The Bill, as it left the Private Bills Committee, is entirely different from the original measure.

My hon. friend from Peel (Mr. Blain) has spoken about the opinion of the Commission for the Conservation of Natural Resources and he read a portion of a letter addressed by the Hon. Mr. Sifton, chairman of that commission, to the chairman of the Private Bills Committee. I propose to read that letter of which my hon. friend gave a part.

Mr. BLAIN. The letter had been previously read by the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. Sharpe).

Mr. FISHER. I was not aware of that:

> Referring to the letter of your clerk on the subject of Bill (No. 115), I beg to state that the Bill has been examined as carefully as time and information permits.

The St. Lawrence Power Company is at present seeking authority to develop a power scheme by damming the St. Lawrence river at Long Sault. This project is being opposed by the Commission of Conservation for reasons, some of which have already been made public.

I want to point out that the company referred to is the St. Lawrence Power Company and not the St. Lawrence Transmission Company.

An examination of Bill (No. 115) indicates clearly that the introduction of this Bill is a portion of the St. Lawrence Power Company's plans. It is to be noted that the president of the power company and one of its engineers are the first named among the proposed incorporators, and the powers asked for are of an unusual and very sweeping character.

The passage of the Bill as it stands would give parliamentary sanction to an important portion of the St. Lawrence Power Company's proposals, and would complicate the situation unnecessarily.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. Was this modified Bill submitted to Mr. Sifton for his opinion?

Mr. FISHER. I do not know, but I was going to point out that his suggestions, with hardly an exception, have been embodied in the Bill, and, consequently, there was no need of submitting it to him. The Bill as reported from the Private Bills Committee is exactly in the lines of the recommendation of the chairman of the Commission for the Conservation of our Natural Resources. Mr. Sifton goes on to say:—

On the other hand it is urged that some of the towns affected, particularly Prescott and Brockville, are without a supply of power, and that a transmission line is necessary in their interest. There does not appear to be any reason why authority for the construction of a transmission line, simply, should not be given, and if Bill (No. 115) were for such a purpose alone there could be no serious objection to it.

This letter has been quoted to prove that the chairman of the Conservation Committee is opposed to this Bill. But the words I have just read in this letter show that on the contrary Mr. Sifton does not see any reason why there should be any objection to the Bill if it were for the construction of a transmission line simply.

Your particular attention is drawn to sections 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13 and 14 as being objectionable, on account of the large and unnecessary powers asked for.

These clauses are practically all struck out of the Bill and other clauses giving the safeguards asked for are inserted in their places:—

These clauses apparently contemplate monopolization of powers on a very large scale. It is to be noted also that there are no provisions in the Bill protecting the municipalities in regard to the use of streets or roads, nor anything requiring the company to acquire or pay for a right of way. Difficulty has already arisen in regard to this latter point in other cases, and it requires to be specifically provided for.

Under these circumstances it is recommended—

First, That sections 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13 and 14 be struck out and that, in lieu thereof, there be substituted proper provisions giving authority for the construction of a transmission line, and for power to buy, transmit and sell power within Canada.

The Bill provides for that.

Second, that a clause be added declaring that the Act shall come into force only on proclamation of the Governor General in Council and upon such conditions as the Governor General in Council may by order provide, such conditions to be read as forming part of the Act.

At the end of the Bill reported is clause 15, which provides that this Act shall come into force on a day to be named by proclamation of the Governor in Council. That is an acceptance of Mr. Sifton's recommendation, but does not go quite so far. He asked that such conditions as the Governor in Council may by order provide, shall be read as forming part of the Act. When that came before the committee, I rather took exception to that last part of the recommendation, and I did so on this ground: I believe it to be the duty of parliament to insert the conditions under which the Act shall have effect and force, and not the duty of the Governor in Council to provide those conditions and add them to the Act. If my hon. friend opposite see fit to entrust that duty to the hands of the present government, that would be a mark of their confidence, but that should not warrant this parliament in shirking its duty and putting that responsibility on the shoulders of the Governor in Council. If hon. gentlemen opposite, however, wish to impose it on the Governor in Council they may move to that effect. Under these circumstances, I did not support that proposition of the chairman of the Conservation Commission, but all the other propositions which he advised are embodied in this Bill, and the clauses to which he objected are eliminated. Had that not been done, I would have protested against the Bill being reported and I would have opposed its adoption in the House. Now that the Bill is safeguarded in the way that I have indicated, first that they can only transmit power, that they cannot export any power to the United States, that they can take no action in case of any municipality without obtaining the permission of that municipality, that their expropriating powers are subject to the clause in the Railway Act and that the Bill shall only come into force by proclamation of the Governor General, I cannot see why it should not pass. Personally, I am not interested in the Bill any more than any other member of the House. As a member of the Private Bills Committee, it was my duty to examine the Bill to listen to and take part in the discussion and see to it that the Bill fulfilled the conditions necessary to proper legislation on the part of this parliament. As to whether this Bill overrides the jurisdiction of the local legislatures I do not presume to give an opinion, but the contention of the hon. gentleman for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) does not seem to me to be an accurate one. He seemed to imply that this Bill would extend the power to expropriate the property of a provincial government, obtained under section 247 of the Railway Act, to what is called the original company. I am not a lawyer and I do not profess to give a legal opinion, but it does not seem to be possible that the power which is given to one company under one Act of a certain character can be thereby given to another company under another Act.

Mr. LANCASTER. The same people may acquire stock in both companies.

Mr. FISHER. The same people may be in the two companies, but the powers given to one incorporation under the statute could only apply to the works exercised by that corporation and not to the works which they exercise under another statute.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I think I observed in the letter of the Chairman of the Conservation Commission an expression of opinion that this was merely part of the larger scheme.

Mr. FISHER. No, not a part of the larger scheme. He says that:

> The introduction of this Bill is a portion of the St. Lawrence Power Company's plan.

That may be so. I am not aware of what their intention is.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. We know that from the declaration of the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. FISHER. Whether it is or is not, the powers given under this Bill have reference to works connected with the transmission of electricity, and they cannot apply to the powers given under the original incorporation for the erection of a dam, &c. I cannot understand how powers created by this Bill for a certain work defined in this Bill can be transferred to work which is to be done under another and different statute. My understanding is that only this has the Railway Act applied to it and consequently the power which under the Railway Act is given to companies incorporated by this parliament to expropriate the property of provincial governments is not included in the charter of the original corporation. It is only by reason of the fact that the powers of expropriation under the Railway Act are given to this company that they get power to expropriate property of the provinces, and the reason that was given was that if they were not given that power, under the involved construction of provincial rights in regard to land under streams and on river beds, they might be prevented from crossing any river bed in Ontario, which would mean practically that they would be obstructed absolutely and forever in any work which this parliament authorized them to carry on.

Mr. BLAIN. Does not that take away some rights of the province of Ontario?

Mr. FISHER. I am not going to give a legal opinion on that, but if there is a right on the part of Ontario to obstruct a company's works which are in the interest of the people of Canada, then I say that the property of the province ought to be subjected, as private property is, to expropriation to enable the works of the company to be carried on. If the works are not in the public interest this parliament ought not to give a charter at all, but if it does give a charter it should give facilities to the company to carry on the works which this parliament has authorized.

Mr. BOYCE. Would the minister advocate a measure which would override the rights of the municipality or the province?

Mr. FISHER. If this parliament sees fit to incorporate a company for certain purposes, it ought to give that company the power to carry on its purposes.

Mr. BOYCE. The minister is saying today the very opposite of that which he said last session. Last session when he introduced the Bill to establish the Conservation Commission he explained that the interests of the provinces and municipalities as well as the interests of the Dominion would be safeguarded by this commission. We had presented the argument that this House had created certain committees on conservation, and that, therefore, there was no necessity of going to the expense of creating a Conservation Commission. Asked by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) what the Conservation Commission would do, he said on May 12, page 6369 of 'Hansard':

> They will hold a meeting and discuss what recommendations they may be able to lay down for the treatment of the natural resources of Canada in the future on such lines as may rightly appeal to the administrative bodies, all through Canada, whether municipal, provincial or Dominion who have control over natural resources.

A committee of the House is purely federal in its character. It does not enlist the sympathy or co-operation of the provincial or municipal authorities.

When the question was raised that there was a committee of this House on natural resources the minister said:

A committee of the House is purely federal in its character. It does not enlist the sympathy or co-operation of the provincial or municipal authorities.

Now, the hon. gentleman says that he would vote in support of measures which would absolutely override and take away rights municipal and provincial, notwithstanding what these rights may be, and in favour of federal legislation. My hon. friend must see the inconsistency of that position. I have a word to say to the hon. member for Rainy River (Mr. Conmee). He takes a rather extraordinary stand in reference to this Bill. He has said that we should override by this Bill the rights of the provinces. The hon. gentleman has not always spoken along that line. When he was a member of the provincial house in Ontario, supporting the provincial government, he took a different position, and in the first year that he was a member of this House he also took a different position.

Mr. CONMEE. No, there has been no inconsistency in my position.

Mr. BOYCE. Having regard to the principles which are involved as regards the rights of provinces and municipalities through which this proposed transmission line would pass, I feel that this Bill should be allowed to stand over. With regard to the principles of this Bill, the time has to come, and it might as well come now, when a policy must be laid down for dealing with these questions. It is the duty of the government to lay before this House such a policy as will prevent such a discussion as this being precipitated and will prevent private rights, municipal rights and provincial rights being so continually invaded as they are at the present time.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I would like to ask the Minister of Agriculture what he makes of section 11 subsection 4.

Mr. FISHER. I take that to mean that the company has the right to acquire in fee simple such lands as it may need for the construction of its transmission line. The words, fee simple, were put in so as to require the company to buy the lands and not simply obtain a lease of them.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Section 247 of the Railway Act, to which my hon. friend referred, and the general provisions of the Railway Act on which he relies, do not seem to cure the situation created by this subsection, which apparently gives the company the right to enter on and expropriate any land without acquiring a title in fee simple. This might give the company the right to obtain an easement in any municipality without acquiring the right in fee simple. Subsection 6 of section 11 says:

In the event of the company exercising the rights of expropriation hereby given for the purpose of acquiring land for its right of way, such land must be acquired in fee simple.

I do not know what the effect of these two provisions read together is. I would think it extremely probable that under subsection 4 the provisions of section 247 of the Railway Act might not be of very much avail.

Mr. FISHER. If that is the case, the clause, when we reach it, ought to be amended, because the Private Bills Committee fully understood that all questions of expropriation should be subject to the permission of the municipality, and I would be prepared to support any amendment which would make it clear that no such power would be left in the hands of the company.

Mr. J. P. TURCOTTE. The difference between the two subsections is this: that in every case of expropriation the company would be obliged to acquire a title in fee simple; but they would not be required to do so in obtaining an easement or a privilege.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. If that is the intention, it has been very badly expressed. The Railway Act gives a company power to expropriate land. This Bill proceeds to say that 'the word land, so far as it applies to this Act shall include any privilege or easement required by the company for constructing or operating the works authorized by this Act without the necessity of acquiring a title in fee simple.' Therefore it seems to me that this result would follow, that this company would have the right to acquire a right of way without the necessity of acquiring a title in fee simple. If this clause gives it the right by expropriation to obtain an easement for the purpose of erecting one pole, it has an equal right to acquire an easement by similar proceedings for the purpose of erecting all its poles.

Mr. FISHER. I would suggest to my hon. friend that that can be very easily remedied when we reach that clause in the Bill. Therefore I would suggest that we facilitate our reaching it.

Mr. LANCASTER. I have listened with a good deal of interest to what the Minister of Agriculture said in regard to the innocent character of this Bill as it now stands, and his explanation of the letter of the hon. Chairman of the Conservation Commission. I do not read this Bill as of the innocent character that the Minister of Agriculture does, and I think he must give more consideration to it before he comes to that conclusion. As I understand the letter, Mr. Sifton, the Chairman of the Conservation Commission, wanted the Bill to be limited to transmission, and I do not understand the minister to say that Mr. Sifton has seen the Bill in its amended form. If it be intended that this Bill is to accomplish nothing but transmission, that is not its effect even as amended. By clause 6 the company may purchase or lease electric power, and acquire such lands, easements and privileges as are necessary for the purpose of its undertakings. Now, it must be admitted that the Act of 1901, incorporating the St. Lawrence Power Company, though it may be a different Act, gives that company the right to sell those powers, and that Act contains no clause such as we insert in railway charters, preventing any amalgamation with any other company except with the approval of the Governor in Council or the Railway Commission. So that the two companies, being under the one control, could be so manipulated as to give them the joint power of generating and transmitting electricity. Clause (6) provides that the company may:—

(a) construct, maintain, operate, use and manage conduits, tunnels, transmission lines, structures, buildings, machinery, plant, appliances, instruments and devices, and erect and maintain poles and towers, and lay and maintain pipes, cables, wires or other conductors and connect them with similar lines in other provinces and with similar lines in the United States for the purpose of importation only.

It does not say for transmission only, and I cannot presume that would be the result

Mr. FISHER. That is the whole object.

Mr. LANCASTER. Why not limit this clause so as to provide for transmission only in Canada?

Mr. FISHER. When we reach that clause we can put that in.

Mr. ROBB. Let my hon. friend read clause 12.

Mr. LANCASTER. That clause provides that nothing in this Act shall be construed to empower the company to export electricity or electric or other power to the United States. But there is nothing here that limits in any way their rights to transmission. We have this statute of 1901 which gives powers far beyond transmission to another company, almost identical in name and composed of the same parties, and we then are asked to pass this Bill in which care is taken not to limit the powers of the company to transmission. An attempt has been made to show that municipal rights will not be invaded and a clause was put in to that effect. Whether operative or not shall be found out later. The Bill declares what the works and powers of the company are to be, but it does not limit them to a transmission company or to anything that could be so construed. On the contrary, we do say that they can acquire, lease or obtain current, power or force, and may supply, sell, &c. They can buy or sell from any other company that can give them current. We are giving them this power and we are not putting in any such safeguard as that they should be subject to the Railway Board or to the Governor in Council. The chairman of the Conservation Commission who is not merely as an individual for whom we might have respect objected to this measure. He is not a gentleman who is simply appointed and who is desirous of protecting this country, but he is, under statute, made the policeman or guardian of these things, and it is his duty to watch and keep tab on such legislation. That gentleman has condemned this Bill as far as we know. I would like a letter from the chairman of the commission saying that, having seen the amended Bill, he is satisfied that it is all right. I understand the Bill does not remove his objection. If it were limited to transmission only, the chairman saw much objection to it, but he made the distinct statement that it should be limited to transmission only. This Bill is not limited to transmission. Does not the Minister of Agriculture think that if it is to be limited to transmission only, it would be well to put into this Bill a statement to that effect, either at the end of clause 6 or in some other part of the Bill, so that it would be quite clear?

Mr. FISHER. When we reach the clause in question I am ready to support any wording which will make clear the intention I have already described.

Mr. LANCASTER. We are asked to pass clause 1 saying what the name of this company shall be, but we have not yet determined that the name is the proper one. I am not prepared to vote that this company shall be a transmission company if it is to be something else, and the Bill indicates that it is to be something else. It is to be a great deal more than a transmission company.

Mr. FISHER. I think that the corporation ought to be made to agree with the title of the Bill, which is that of a transmission company. It is a transmission company that I am prepared to incorporate and grant powers to.

Mr. LANCASTER. There is nothing that limits it to a transmission company.

Mr. FISHER. I think there is. If there is not I am ready to put it there.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Was I correct in understanding the Minister of Agriculture to say that everything objected to by the chairman of the commission had been struck out?

Mr. FISHER. As far as I can see the Bill has been reframed in exact accordance with the recommendations of the chairman of the Conservation Commission except what he proposed in regard to conditions being put in the order in council.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I observe that the chairman recommends that clauses 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13 and 14 should be struck out of the original Bill. Clause 10 has not been struck out as it appears here as clause 7.

Mr. FISHER. I see that the clause is exactly the same but it seems to me that other clauses having been put in to prevent the power there provided for being exercised except under certain restrictions that clause is not objectionable.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. He seemed to think that it was and he continues the objection to it as it stands at present. There are rather peculiar words in clause 7:

> The company may construct or acquire by lease, purchase or otherwise, and operate in connection with the works, lines and business of the company and for the purposes thereof, lines of telegraph or telephone or other works and means of communication.

Mr. FISHER. The words 'and for the purposes thereof' mean that these lines of telegraph and telephone are only to be used for the purposes of the company in the same way that a railway company is allowed to use telegraph and telephone lines for its own purposes.

Mr. LENNOX. Is the minister quite sure of his statement when he says that all the recommendations of the chairman of the Conservation Commission have been embodied in this Bill? The hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. Sharpe) produced a letter from the chairman of the Conservation Commission and I gathered from his statement that there were very material differences between the recommendations and the Bill as presented to the House. I notice that the Minister of Agriculture seems to have the impression that the Bill carries out all that the chairman recommended.

Mr. FISHER. With one exception.

Mr. LENNOX. Is the minister sure that all the recommendations made by the chairman of the commission purported to be carried out—that the committee decided to adopt them all?

Mr. FISHER. That was the intention of the Private Bills Committee.

Mr. LENNOX. Would the minister be good enough to state again what the exception was?

Mr. FISHER. It was that the chairman of the commission thought that in the proclamation of the Governor General bringing the Act into force there should be additional conditions imposed which I objected to on principle.

Mr. LENNOX. I do not recall whether the chairman is appointed by order in council or selected by the commission itself.

Mr. FISHER. He is specially appointed as chairman.

Mr. LENNOX. The practice is growing up in the committees of referring matters to what is called the Conservation Commission; that is referring them practically to the chairman of the Conservation Commission. I recognize that the chairman is a man of very exceptional ability, but that alone does not constitute a reason why we should leave matters of important legislation to him. The question of ability is not the sole question. I have a very serious objection to that method. It works exceedingly well at all times. It may work well on this occasion, but the time will come when it will work in the reverse order, and I think that if we once adopt that method of referring matters nominally to the Conservation Commission, but to be actually decided by the chairman or even directly referring them to the chairman, we will come to a very dangerous condition of things before long. For a time the chairman may recommend things that seem to be in the line of conserving the public interest, and the opposition will say it is very willing on these occasions to adopt them, but we have no guarantee that on other occasions the chairman will not recommend the adoption of a Bill which is a very dangerous Bill, and the fact that we have referred it to him will get us into the practice of being careless in investigating matters ourselves, and it will not be very long before a serious blunder will result from this practice. I do not wish to attack either the Conservation Commission or the chairman of that commission, but I say that in principle it is wrong. We are delegating our duties to a commission which has no responsibility, because we cannot consider that Mr. Sifton as chairman of the commission is filling a responsible position in the sense of being a member of this House, although he happens to be a member. By referring Bills to that commission or its chairman, we are delegating duties which we should perform ourselves, and we will yet bring censure upon ourselves for doing that. The most valuable work of the commission will be to deal with general cases, not on reference of a particular instance or particular Bill. They take a general survey of the country, its interests and resources, and form an opinion on these matters, when no one is interested in influencing them in a certain way, but I feel it is a dangerous principle to relegate our duties to the chairman of that commission or even to the Conservation Commission itself.

Mr. BOYCE. Was this Bill not referred to the Conservation Commission?

Mr. PARDEE. The original Bill was, but this Bill was not referred to them. The Conservation Commission went over the first Bill and cut out what they thought were objectionable clauses, and returned the Bill to the Private Bills Committee. They had no objection to the Bill going through in its amended form.

Mr. BOYCE. The Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of the Interior and the Minister of Mines are ex-officio, by the Act, members of the Conservation Commission, to which this Bill was referred. I ask the Minister of Agriculture whether any meeting of the Conservation Commission was called for the purpose of considering the Bill that was referred to that commission? It must be clear that it has never sat and deliberated upon this Bill, and we have no recommendation from the commission as to the best method of dealing with this matter. This Bill was referred to a body composed of 35 members, and we have received, not the opinion of the commission, but the opinion of one member of it who is called the chairman, and whose duties, as defined by the Act, are purely administrative, to carry out the decisions of the commission. Therefore, unless we are to make a farce of the proceedings of that commission, we should refer to it this Bill and obtain the recommendations of the commission, and not merely those of the chairman. I would like to know the opinion of the Minister of Agriculture, himself ex-officio a member of that commission, and the minister who introduced the measure creating the Conservation Commission, as to the chairman of the commission, without calling the commission together, himself disposing of questions referred to that commission?

Mr. FISHER. The only reason, so far as I know, that this question of the Conservation Commission has come up at all, is that hon. gentlemen who oppose this Bill, quoted the letter of the chairman of the commission, and used it for the purpose of obstructing the Bill.

Mr. BLAIN. The hon. gentleman is wrong in saying that the letter was used for the purpose of obstructing the Bill.

Mr. FISHER. I apologize. I meant to say for the purpose of opposing the Bill, the argument being advanced that this Bill was opposed by the Conservation Commission. That is why I referred to the matter. As to referring this question to the Conservation Commission, that suggestion is open to objection and also to commendation. There are reasons on both sides. But it is obvious that the commission, composed of thirty gentlemen scattered over Canada, cannot be got together to discuss every question that may be referred to them. If a question of that kind is referred to the commission, either the whole commission will have to be called together to deliberate and pronounce upon it, or the chairman may call together the executive committee for that purpose. I am not aware whether or not in this case he called together the executive committee.

Mr. BOYCE. You are a member of it.

Mr. FISHER. No, I am not. One of its members is one of the hon. members for Toronto, another is the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), another is Dr. Robertson, another is the Attorney General of Nova Scotia, another is Senator Edwards, and there are two or three others. What the chairman wrote may be his own personal opinion as chairman, or it may be the opinion formed in consultation. Hon. gentlemen opposite, supposing that the letter of the chairman supported their opposition to this Bill, brought it up; but now that they find that it does not oppose the Bill in its present form, they are rather tired of the subject and are objecting to the opinion of the chairman of the commission being quoted against them.

Mr. BLAIN. The hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. Sharpe), in reading the letter last night, distinctly stated that some of the requests of the commission were granted in the Bill, and some were not.

Mr. FISHER. I think they all are practically.

Mr. BLAIN. My hon. friend will not say they all are.

Mr. FISHER. With one exception.

Mr. BLAIN. A very important exception.

Mr. BOYCE. I will repeat my question. Does the Minister of Agriculture, as the minister having charge of the Conservation Commission, consider that a reference to that commission is conformed to by a reply from the chairman of the commission, and is that the way the Conservation Commission is going to do its work?

Mr. FISHER. I would say that if the chairman of the commission is not authorized by the commission to act in that way, his reply would be of very little value except as an expression of his own personal opinion; but if the organization of the commission authorizes the chairman to act for the commission in certain circumstances, then his reply would have the force of the commission behind it.

Mr. BOYCE. My hon. friend knows that there is no authority for the chairman to act in that way.

Mr. FISHER. Not by statute.

Mr. BOYCE. Then, upon the minister's own statement, there is no report of the Conservation Commission on this Bill; and if we accept this letter from the chairman as the judgment of the Conservation Commission, the hon. minister must see how dangerous a precedent we are etsablishing in dealing with the natural resources of this country. This is a precedent which the hon. Minister of Agriculture himself (Mr. Fisher) is supporting by his attitude in the House. It was he who explained last session the great value of this commission for the conservation of our nat ural resources in dealing with just such cases as this affecting federal, provincial and municipal matters, and I appeal to him, as a responsible minister of the Crown, not to allow this matter to be dealt with simply by one member of that commission. I ask him to see that where there has been a reference to the commission, that commission shall pass upon it as a body and not have it simply dealt with by one of its members, no matter how distinguished that member may be. It is the report of the commission as a whole that the parliament of Canada is entitled to, and that report the minister should see that parliament obtains.

Mr. MACDONELL. We have had from the Minister of Agriculture the rather startling and novel statement that this parliament has the right to empower a private company to expropriate the public domain of any province. That is a claim which has never before been put forward in this House by any hon. gentleman much less by a minister of the Crown.

Mr. FISHER. Is it not true that under the provisions of the Railway Act, this company may get that power, and was not that Railway Act passed by this parliament and agreed to unanimously?

Mr. MACDONELL. That is one reason why I object to this Bill. It is declared to be a work for the general advantage of Canada and the company are given very extensive powers under the Railway Act. We are indebted to the minister for this very frank statement of the policy of the government. It has never before been contended in this House that the Crown, as represented by the Dominion parliament, has the right to authorize the expropriation of the territory or domain of the Crown as represented by any one province, because a province is just as much entitled to its Crown rights and the entirety of its Crown privileges as is the Dominion. The provinces have just as much right to the preservation of their exclusive ownership to whatever property they possess. But the statement is now made for the first time that one Crown has the right to authorize a corporation to expropriate the right of another Crown. No court has held that doctrine in this country at any time. There was a case in British Columbia in which a company was given the right to expropriate the Crown domain for the purpose of carrying out an undertaking authorized by this parliament, but that had reference to Dominion lands in that province. The Minister of Agriculture went further and practically supported every clause in this Bill. What would be the use, therefore, of our acceding to the apparently moderate request of certain hon. gentlemen opposite that the first clause of this Bill should be passed? At the end of the final clause, the hon. gentleman was somewhat doubtful as to whether he would not add a line to it, but apart from that he is perfectly satisfied with the Bill. Apparently the government is going to force the Bill through, no matter what objections there may be to it. The hon. minister attempted to quiet the well founded apprehensions of hon. members representing the constituency of Montreal and he read the Railway Act to prove that this company has no power to enter upon the highways and byways of that city without its consent. Surely that is elementary. Every one knows section 247 of the Railway Act, and that section simply protects the municipalities to the extent that no one shall enter upon their highways without their consent. The Railway Act does not say that this company shall be bound by section 247 and that it shall not enter the city of Montreal without the consent of the city.

Mr. BLAIN. The Minister of Agriculture was not successful in using the words of the hon. member for Montreal, St. Mary's (Mr. Martin), because he resented and did not endorse the statement made by the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. MACDONELL. Quite true, I was not in the House at the time, but I understand that to be the fact. This Bill gives this company the right to expropriate indiscriminately throughout the entire territory from Kingston to Montreal, inclusive. They have to buy their way, but they are given not only powers of expropriation, but the Bill gives the company the right to expropriate as far as they require expropriation powers.

Mr. J. P. TURCOTTE. With the authorization of the municipality.

Mr. MACDONELL. No, without. I make the statement, and I challenge contradiction of it, that this Bill gives the right to this company to expropriate without the consent of the municipality. A company operating under the Railway Act was bound to acquire in fee simple and pay the value of property expropriated, but this company have the additional right of being able to acquire any privilege or easement. It means that they can run their lines anywhere in the city of Montreal, upon the side of a building or over a building, and they can acquire a privilege or easement wherever they please. They do not have to expropriate a right of way. That costs a lot of money. They do not need to spend that money. They can simply acquire an easement or right or privilege and run their lines wherever they please; the company gets this power under subsection 4 of section 11 of the Bill. I hope that hon. gentlemen representing the city of Montreal will see the effect of this thing and join with those who are trying to protect provincial rights. The Minister of Agriculture said that he saw no peril in the amalgamation of this company with its predecessor, the St. Lawrence Power Company incorporated in 1901, that whatever rights the old company had they would retain, and that this company would retain its rights, but that they could not in any way by making a combination form one company, merge their powers and operate for the joint advantage of both companies. The minister is entirely mistaken, because if he will read the statute incorporating the St. Lawrence Power Company in 1901, he will see that by clause 11 this company have the power to amalgamate with the company which is now being formed, and that the rights possessed by each company will be owned by the joint company. The company which we are incorporating will possess the entire rights of the old company, the old company of 1901 will possess the entire rights of this company, and they will jointly have the enormous powers that are provided for in both cases. With the power given to the old company to amalgamate with this company, these two companies will become one and there will be one gigantic corporation enjoying the powers of the old power company, together with the very large privileges sought in this Bill by the distributing company.

Mr. BLAIN. Why was that information not communicated to the Private Bills Committee?

Mr. MACDONELL. I do not know. Possibly it was.

Mr. BLAIN. No, my hon. friend from North Ontario says it was not.

Mr. MACDONELL. Well, it is here in the Act. They bear on their face the evidence that they are one and the same. They have practically the same name, the old company being called the St. Lawrence Power Company, and this company being called the St. Lawrence Power Transmission Company. If this company that is applying to-day was not in substance the old company, would not the old company object to the similarity of names? The minister sees no danger in the exportation of power to the States. I contend that it is extremely doubtful, under both Bills, whether or not the company can be prohibited from exporting power, because the old Act contains no restriction whatever on the exportation of power. The company can sell its power.

Mr. CONMEE. No, the Exportation Act would cover that.

Mr. MACDONELL. Chapter 16 of the Exportation of Fluid Act of 1907 provides for licenses to export power and unless this company is prohibited from exporting its power it has the right to apply for a license to the Governor in Council under the Act of 1907, and if there is no good reason why it should not get a license it will doubtless get one. There is no attempt made to say that this company shall be prohibited from exporting this power, and if it applies for a license no doubt it will be given the right to export its surplus. Let me point out the unwisdom of allowing our power to be exported. Let me refer to the condition that existed at Niagara Falls many years ago, a condition of affairs that we are now repeating on the St. Lawrence river. The International Waterways Commission found that they had developed power on the American side largely in excess of their right according to the flow of water, but having regard to the establishment of industries and vested rights they divided the power over the whole river by giving to Canada some 36,000 horse-power, and giving about 20,000 horse-power to the American side, whereas, if it had been dealt with on a proper basis, the American side would not have been entitled to more than one-sixth of the total power that could be developed as less than one-sixth of the water flowed over the American side. What has happened there will happen here, and history will repeat itself. You will have the water and power diverted to the American side, or you will have the power exported to the American side, and the Americans will get a great deal more than they are entitled to. Ultimately when the question comes up to be dealt with as an international question our rights will be sacrificed, and we will get the small end of the horn, and not what we are entitled to. It is claimed that we are obstructing because we are going on record as being in favour of protecting the interests of the people as against this corporation which is seeking to be incorporated at the public expense for its own private interest and advantage. The Minister of Agriculture has made the startling statement that this House has a perfect right to incorporate a company, and give that company the right to expropriate the domain of any province. He justifies that by saying that the company may have to run across the bed of some provincial stream, and they should have the right to expropriate there. Does that justify the sweeping power given to this company to expropriate the public domain of Ontario throughout nine counties along the St. Lawrence from Kingston to Montreal? If the Bill is only intended to give the right to expropriate the river bed here and there why not say so?

Mr. A. McCALL. I must discuss this Bill on the assumption that there is an intention to dam the St. Lawrence. That may not appear in this Bill, but it does in the Bill of 1901. I think it is clear that in time a dam will be erected across the St. Lawrence; that will be found to be the joker, the little elusive pea that is under the shell. We all agree that the St. Lawrence is one of our great national assets. It drains the Great Lakes and forms the only natural outlet for the trade of the best part of the north American continent. The Americans would give untold wealth if they could acquire the exclusive right to navigate the St. Lawrence from the lakes to the ocean. That is our great privilege, and we ought not to consent to put the slightest hindrance to the free flow of the trade that properly belongs to our great water route. So jealous are the American authorities on the subject that a proposal to build a bridge across the Detroit river was rejected at Washington, and the railways had to spend $12,000,000 to tunnel the river. The proposal to build a dam at the foot of Lake Erie, near Buffalo, to maintain the waters of the lake at standard level, has been rejected for fear of causing an ice jam with consequent flooding of the land bordering the lake and the checking of the flow of the Niagara river.

The building of such a dam as this on the St. Lawrence river would put a stop to the carriage of rafts of timber down the St. Lawrence, and it would destroy one of the great scenic attractions of the St. Lawrence river, the shooting of the rapids, which would be a very serious loss from a sentimental point of view.

The Welland canal is admittedly one of our greatest national assets. It has been enlarged three times, and the Minister of Railway and Canals proposes a still further enlargement. That would mean an enlargement and deepening of the St. Lawrence canals, but it is more likely that if this dam is erected it will be found a serious obstruction in the enlargement of those canals, as the water supply might be affected and currents caused that did not before exist. The whole condition will be changed by this scheme of spoilation. By means of our great water routes we have it within our power to draw the trade of half of the north American continent, a trade which now taxes the American shipping interests and railroads. All that is open to us with a proper system of water transportation. Moreover, it is within the range of possibilities that ocean vessels will soon find their way up the lakes. We are face to face with the possibility of difficulties in connection with our coal supply from the United States. In connection with the discussion of tariff matters now pending there may be a difficulty in adjusting the question of duties. We are all looking forward to utilizing our own coal supply in Nova Scotia so as to make it serve the lake ports and the northwest. To do all this we require the unobstructed navigation of the St. Lawrence. This is a larger question than one of a week's discussion. It is much larger than the question of the transmission of power to a number of large towns. It should be considered from a national point of view. Hon. gentlemen should not consent to the alienation of this most valuable asset of the nation which we have in the St. Lawrence river. From every point of view we should not consider for a moment the possibility of an obstruction being placed in that waterway. If we agree in all this, can we not get together on this question? I am willing, in conclusion, to propose that we call this debate off and get out and have an old-fashioned game of snow-ball before the snow disappears—and I invite my friend Mr. Loggie to be my opponent in a friendly game—and we will come back on another day and dispose of this matter quickly.

Mr. HUGHES This morning three ministers were appealed to in succession by one of the hon. members on this side of the House, and each of them gave the clearest possible reason why this Bill should be postponed immediately. The Minister of Agriculture, in answer to the query what he thought of the Bill, stated that before he could answer he required to consider the Bill; the Minister of Labour stated that before he could express an opinion, he would require to consider the whole discussion; and the Minister of the Interior stated that the question involved matters which had taken up twelve or fourteen hours of discussion, and he wanted more light. I appeal to the Minister of Militia, who is now leading the House, to comply with the very proper request of the leader of the opposition, that this Bill be laid over until the plans can be looked into.

Committee divided on the question that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again: Yeas, 32; nays, 34.

Mr. HUGHES. When this Bill first came before the Private Bills Committee, it attracted very little attention. Very few on this side of the House suspected that there was anything behind it. Our suspicions were first aroused by seeing the great interest taken in it by certain gentlemen who were never known to attend the meetings of the Private Bills Committee at all. They were there early and late; they drummed up their friends and urged all sorts of arguments for the passing of the Bill. On one occasion thirty or forty men deserted one power scheme in the Railway Committee to float another through in the Private Bills Committee. The spectacle naturally excited the attention even of honest plodding Conservatives, and we thought it our duty to commence an inquiry Then suspicion grew, based on the rumour that behind this scheme was the plan to dam the St. Lawrence river, and hand over the entire water-power to this grasping corporation of American trusts. I was amazed to see the determined interest taken in that Bill by the government. I strolled in, not expecting anything special on, but when I saw the activity of five or six ministers of the Crown in pushing through this private Bill, I began to suspect, to use an Americanism, that there was a nigger in the wood pile. The Minister of Public Works in a moment of excitement gave the whole story away. He frankly admitted that there was a connection between the two Bills, the St. Lawrence Power Company, and the St. Lawrence Power and Transmission Company. He admitted that he had been waited upon repeatedly during the last two years in the interest of that Bill, that this company had come to him and had shown him the plans for damming the St. Lawrence, and had talked the whole matter over with him, and he admitted that the two Bills were one and the same thing. Up to that time we had confined our efforts to preserving the rights of the province of Ontario. We asked the Minister of Public Works to let the Bill stand over until we could obtain information on certain matters, and that we might look more carefully into it. That was refused, they point blank refused to take anything short of the passage of the entire Bill. Well, the Minister of Public Works saw that he could not carry his point. Then, as the night wore on, these gentlemen agreed to compromise the matter if we would pass the preamble, and all the clauses, leaving one to be reserved for discussion. We very properly rejected that proposition. We were determined then that before this Bill should go through the plans of that dam should be brought down, and we would see what was behind it all. I am sure that there is nothing that any fair minded man on the government side could object to in the position we took. Then what was the next step on the programme? Two of these gentlemen from Ontario. the province that was being robbed of her natural resources, commenced in their usual manner to try and shove this matter through. They found that did not work. So in the small hours of the morning the government came to their senses, and another proposition was made that section 1 should be passed, and all the rest should stand over for consideration. But since we had been denied an opportunity to see the plans, we decided to reject that proposition. Our duty to our constituents demanded that we should get to the bottom of this whole matter. I see before me now three ministers who were not here during the night, the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of Labour, and the Minister of the Interior. Have they heard the reasons why this matter should be adjourned? I am sure the Secretary of State will join them in a desire for more light on this matter. I regard this as a most dangerous measure in the interests of the peace and good relationship which should exist between this country and the United States. I feel satisfied that if the Minister of Militia will only give my hon. friend the leader of the opposition a definite statement that these plans will be brought down we will be prepared to end this matter by the passage of section 1.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. I would not venture to give an assurance because I have not been here during the debate and I am not familiar with it at all, but I understand that the Minister of Public Works did make some offer during the debate.

Mr. HUGHES. The Minister of Public Works did offer to bring the plans down, but he insisted that the Bill should go through. Later in the night he changed his tactics.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Would the hon. gentleman again state that?

Mr. HUGHES. I have no doubt that the leader of the opposition—and I believe he speaks for the entire party on this side—will accept the assurance of the minister that the plans will be laid on the table and in case that would be done we would be competent to pass clause 1.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Would the opposition be willing to allow section 1 to pass? I am not able to state as to the plans.

Mr. HUGHES. The Minister of Public Works promised to bring them down.

Mr. S. SHARPE. The hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Smith) said that the plans were in the possession of everybody, that they were published.

Mr. PARDEE. Did he not say that they are not in the minister's office, but that they are in the possession of the Waterways Commission?

Mr. S. SHARPE. You could easily send for them.

Mr. CONMEE. It might take a couple of days.

Mr. S. SHARPE. You cannot reach the conclusion of the consideration of this Bill before the expiration of a couple of days.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I may say to the Minister of Militia that the difficulty originated in the very unreasonable attitude which was taken by the Minister of Finance who was leading the House last evening. I do not know whether it was his own view, but certainly he expressed it. There had been a very interesting and instructive discussion of this Bill. The opposition to it was not on party lines. The strongest attack upon the Bill was made by the hon. member for Westmorland, and a somewhat similar attack was made by the hon. member for Assiniboia. There was nothing to indicate a desire for anything except to ascertain all the facts, to get at the bottom of the project, and in the course of the debate the Minister of Public Works referred to certain plans and stated the purport of the plans that had been submitted to him. I asked the Minister of Public Works to lay the plans on the table of the House and I suggested at one o'clock, about an hour after the usual time of adjournment, that it was time for the committee to rise and report progress. The Minister of Finance did not acquiesce in that view for some reason which I cannot apprehend. It was a most reasonable request. The request was rejected and the discussion went on. A little later a gentleman on the other side of the House intimated that it was the intention to sit until Saturday unless the opposition were prepared to give way. That is the whole situation.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Did my hon. friend wish information from me?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Well, I feel that I have got a good deal already, but I would be quite glad to get more. I want to know whether the minister intends to lay these plans on the table of the House.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I will be very frank with my hon. friend. I stated last night that I would be very glad indeed to lay the plans on the table. The situation in regard to the plans is this: There was a joint report made by the chief engineer of the Public Works Department, the chief engineer of the Department of Railways and Canals, and the chief engineer of the Department of Marine and Fisheries upon the amended plans. These plans were in charge of the late Deputy Minister of Railways and Canals, Mr. Butler. In accordance with the promise I made to my hon. friend I telephoned to the chief engineer of my department and I find that the plans are not in my department. Of course, they were submitted to the International Waterways Commission, but I am informed that it is not unlikely there is a copy of the plans in the Department of Railways and Canals. I have asked the deputy minister to see and, if they are available, I will have them this afternoon, and I will be very glad to lay them on the table of the House. If not I shall send to the chairman of the International Waterways Commission and get them here as soon as possible.

Mr. BLAIN. How many sets of plans were there in connection with the work altogether?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I only saw one set, which was submitted accompanied by the joint report.

Mr. BLAIN. They were submitted as the amended plans, were they not?

Mr. PUGSLEY. They were the amended plans. I am now referring to the amended plans upon which the three engineers reported.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I do not know that I have any special warrant or authority to speak on behalf of those who are opposing this Bill. Some are on the other side of the House, but, as far as I am concerned, I would like to ask the minister whether or not the plans to which he alludes and which he has said he would be glad to lay on the table of the House, include any reports in connection with the plans?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, there is the joint report made by the three engineers and my desire is to submit that at the same time.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Well, I would recommend to my friends, as far as I have any influence with them in regard to a matter of this kind, that upon the assurance of the minister that these will be laid upon the table before the Bill is taken up again, we should allow the first clause of the Bill to pass upon the condition that the committee shall immediately afterwards rise and report progress. I cannot speak for hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House who are opposing this Bill with fierce determination, but perhaps the Minister of Public Works can use his persuasive powers to induce them to agree to the same thing.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I have just had communication with my hon. friend from Lambton, who is in charge of the Bill, and he would be quite willing, and I think I can speak for other gentlemen on this side of the House, if the first clause is allowed to pass, then to report progress, with the understanding that I will get the plans as soon as possible, and have them laid on the table.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. And that they shall be laid on the table before the Bill is taken up again.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not say that; but if the plans are not laid on the table, there will be the best possible reason for it. They will be laid on the table if they are available, and I have not a shadow of doubt that they will be available. I may have them this afternoon.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. In case the plans are not laid on the table, it will be for the committee to consider the very good reason which my hon. friend thinks he can produce.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not think that question will arise at all, for I have no doubt that the plans will be submitted.

Mr. BLAIN. These will include all the plans that have been under consideration by the government, including the modified plan which my hon. friend referred to a few days ago in the House.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What I had in mind was the final plans, those which were recommended by the engineers, and accompanied by their report.

Mr. BLAIN. In order that there may be no mistake, I refer to 'Hansard' of January 18:

Mr. J. D. REID. I would ask the government if the rumour is true that a deputation from Montreal waited on the government yesterday to ask that they be granted the privilege of placing a dam across the St. Lawrence river? If so, has any decision been arrived at?

Mr. PUGSLEY. There was a deputation consisting of representatives of the company which proposes to develop the power, and that deputation presented certain statements to the Committee of the Privy Council.

Mr. J. D. REID. Was any decision arrived at?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, it was understood that they would present a modified plan to the International Waterways Commission, and that commission would give an opportunity to the navigation interests and those who might naturally be opposed to any obstructions to navigation, to be heard. After that the matter would come again before the government for consideration.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is the plan which I would propose to lay upon the table, together with the joint report of the three engineers in reference to that plan.

Mr. BLAIN. When my hon. friend made this statement, I presume that there were two sets of plans submitted by the company to the members of the Privy Council. Will he submit both?

Mr. PUGSLEY. What I mean is that I will submit the modified plans, which were approved of by the engineers. With regard to the plans first filed, I could not undertake to submit them, because they may have been withdrawn; but the important point is to have the modified plans, accompanied by the report of the engineers.

Mr. HUGHES. As I cannot understand how a dam 42 feet high can be placed where a dam of 20 feet would flood the countryside, I would like the minister also to bring down profiles.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I shall be glad to bring down all the plans which are in the possession of any of the three departments, together with the report of the engineers.

Section 1 agreed to, and progress reported.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 136) respecting the St. Clair and Erie Ship Canal Company.—Mr. McColl.

Bill (No. 98) respecting the Trust and Loan Company of Canada.—Mr. Doherty.

Bill (No. 123) respecting the Central Canada Manufacturers Mutual Fire Insurance Company.—Mr. D. A. Gorden.

Bill (No. 124) respecting the Eastern Canada Manufacturers Mutual Fire Insurance Company.—Mr. D. A. Gordon.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 156) to incorporate the Weyburn Security Bank.—Mr. Turiff.

Bill (No. 157) for the relief of Cecilia Marie Pringle.—Mr. Price.

Bill (No. 161) respecting the Sovereign Trust Company.—Mr. Nesbitt.

Bill (No. 153) for the relief of James Albert Green.—Mr. Prowse.

Bill (No. 164) respecting the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada.—Mr. A. H. Clarke.

RELIEF OF ADA ANN REID.

Mr. NESBITT moved the second reading of (Bill No. 158) for the relief of Ada Ann Reid.

Mr. BOYCE. I desire with some reluctance to point out to the House, some features in connection with this Bill. Doubtless, most of the members have read the evidence. It does seem to me that the committee before whom the witnesses were examined must have proceeded upon a very extraordinary method of dealing with the evidence. There are two matters which contain the substance of the evidence on which the relief was based. One was the co-habitation of the respondent with another woman and the other was the production of evidence tending to show that the respondent was afflicted with a venereal disease. I present to the House this proposition that upon a perusal of the evidence given before the Senate Committee and sent over to this House there is not one fact from which even a presumption, if a presumption were proper, could be drawn as to the affirmative of either of those two facts. What is the evidence with regard to co-habitation with another woman? There is the evidence of only one witness, a medical clergyman, and the whole statement by that one witness consists of his having met this man in a shanty in the Yukon or in Alaska territory out of which shanty, before he went there, he had met a woman coming. That is the whole evidence with the exception of what he states himself was evidence of a notorious fact with regard to co-habitation which as all hon. gentlemen know is no evidence at all where the direct fact has to be proved. The evidence with regard to the other part of it, from which fact if proved might be drawn a presumption of infidelity, is absolutely wanting. It is the evidence of a medical man, a man used to the care of the sick. He at first stated that it was his opinion that this respondent was afflicted with that disease, but when he is asked, not on cross-examination but in examination in chief, whether he is sure of that fact he says: No, he is not, it had the appearance of that, but it might be something else. I do not desire to interfere in a private Bill or to prevent relief which doubtless is, apart from the weighty considerations attached to it, very much to be desired between two people evidently not mated to one another. I do not desire to interfere, but I feel it my duty to submit to you and to the House the fact that it appears to me that there are absolutely wanting any elements and all elements on which this House can safely proceed to give the relief asked for by this Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

QUESTIONS.

EMPLOYMENT OF FRITZ CIRKLE.

Mr. STRATTON:

1. Has Mr. Fritz Cirkle been employed by the Department of Mines?
2. Has the attention of the department been called to alleged unprofessional conduct on the part of Mr. Cirkle during the time he was said to be employed by the department?
3. If so, was there an investigation into such charge and what was the result?
4. Will the papers relating to such investigation, if any, be laid on the table of the House?

Hon. WM. TEMPLEMAN:

1. Yes.
2. Yes.
3. Investigated during the month of July, 1909. Result: Charges not sustained.
4. Yes.

MONTREAL HARBOUR BERTHS.

Mr. MONK:

1. Upon what dates were the local berth allotments made by the Montreal Harbour Commission in the years 1907, 1908 and 1909?
2. Has such allotments been made for the season of 1910? If so, when? If not, why not?
3. Has any complaint reached the government from shipping companies or importers regarding delay in the allotment of berths by said commission?
4. Is it a fact that shipping companies are unwilling to quote freight rates until the berths have been allotted?
5. Is it a fact that importers are in consequence said to be unable to calculate the cost of imports which must be delivered f.o.b. at their destination in distribution throughout Canada?
6. Are the sittings of the commission open to the public, and have any complaints been received that the sittings are held in camera?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN:

Answers to questions 1 and 2 are furnished by the Montreal Harbour Commissioners.

1. 1907, 8th March; 1908, 27th February; 1909, 24th March.
2. Not yet, for the reason that on the 25th February, when the allotments of berths with permanent sheds were made for Transatlantic steamers delay was given until 10th March, for acceptance of allotments, which were made conditionally, and which delay was, on the 8th March, at the request of the shipping agents, extended to the 21st March, and until a decision was arrived at concerning the allotment of berths for Transatlantic steamers it was not considered advisable to make local berth allotments.
3. No.

4 and 5. The government has no information on the subject.

6. No.

CANADIANS IN PERMANENT FORCES.

Mr. WORTHINGTON:

1. What proportion of officers and other ranks of the permanent forces, respectively, are native born Canadians?
2. To what extent has recruiting for the Canadian permanent services been carried on among discharged soldiers of the imperial army?
3. What number of officers and other ranks, respectively, have been transferred from the imperial army to the Canadian permanent forces?

4. Has service in the imperial army been admitted under the Militia Pensions Act other than as respects the officers and men transferred to the Canadian service on the taking over of Halifax and Esquimalt? If so, under what authority?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN:

1. Approximately ninety per cent of the officers and twenty per cent of the rank and file.

2. Discharged soldiers of the imperial army are enlisted provided they fulfil the conditions required for enlistment in the permanent forces, and vacancies exist.

3. 431.

4. No.

SURVEY CHU-CHU-WAY-HA RESERVE.

Mr. BURRELL:

Were written instructions given to Capt. Jemmett in connection with the survey in 1889 of Chu-chu-way-ha reserve No. 2 Similikameen district, B.C.? If so, what was the wording of such instructions?

Hon. FRANK OLIVER:

Instructions to surveyors in British Columbia, including those to Capt. Jemmett, were issued direct from the office of the reserve commissioner, under authority of the Dominion and provincial governments, for the purpose of allotting and defining the Indian reserves in that province. The particular instructions given to Capt. Jemmett are not of record in the Department of Indian Affairs at Ottawa.

ROSS RIFLE.

Mr. WORTHINGTON:

1. How many Ross Rifles Mark II. have been received from the manufacturers to date?

2. What further number, if any, have been contracted for?

3. How many bayonets for the Ross rifle have been received from the manufacturers to date?

4. What further number, if any, have been contracted for?

5. How many Ross Rifles Mark I. are on store charge and on issue to militia corps, respectively?

6. How many Ross Rifles Mark II. are on store charge and on issue to militia corps, respectively?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN:

1. 60,000 up to 3rd instant.

2. 3,000.

3. 47,500 up to 3rd instant.

4. 4,500.

5.

On ordnance charge	5,024
Under orders for distribution to units	3,952
Converted to parts	2
With inspector of small arms	5
Lost (paid for)	17
	9,000

6.

On ordnance charge	39,322
On units charge	18,041
Under orders for distribution to units	1,173
Converted to parts	149
Royal Northwest Mounted Police	1,000
With inspector of small arms for conversion	15
In use with sub-target machines	300
	60,000

With regard to the replies to questions Nos. 5 and 6, rifles shown as 'under orders for distribution to units' have been converted by the inspector of small arms, and are now awaiting removal for issue.

MAJOR DE LA RONDE.

Mr. WORTHINGTON:

1. Has the Department of Justice yet dealt with the case of the investigation by a Militia Court of Inquiry into charges of malfeasance of office said to have been preferred against Major S. E. de la Ronde and Captain S. E. de la Ronde, jr., of the Army Service Corps? If so, what was the nature of the action taken or advised? If not, when is it expected that this matter of alleged infraction of the Criminal Code by officers occupying positions of trust in militia service will be disposed of?

2. Is the government aware that Major S. E. de la Ronde has been replaced in the office of Chief of Police of the city of Ottawa?

3. Is the government aware that, while resting under the onus of charges said to have been formally made against him by officers of his corps, which were stated by the Minister of Militia and Defence to the House to be 'sub judice,' Major S. E de la Ronde officially called upon the officers who had preferred such charges against him to submit their resignations in writing as officers of the corps? If so, was such action taken by direction or with the approval of the Militia Council?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN:

1. Advice has been given by the Department of Justice in regard to some features of the case. Such advice is confidential in its character, and the case it at present under consideration in the Department of Justice in regard to other features of it.

2. The government has no official information with reference to this matter.

3. This particular rumour has not yet reached the government except as suggested by the question.

MOTIONS AGREED TO WITHOUT DISCUSSION.

For a copy of all memorials, reports of surveys, engineers' reports, estimates, correspondence and documents in the possession of the Department of Railways and Canals, and of the Intercolonial Railway Commission, relating to the survey and construction of a proposed branch of the Prince Edward Island Railway through New London and along the north shore of Queens county, in that island. —Mr. Warburton.

For a copy of all memorials, reports of surveys, engineers' reports, estimates, correspondence and documents in the possession of the Department of Railways and Canals, and the Intercolonial Railway Commission, relating to the survey and construction of a proposed branch of the Prince Edward Island Railway to the west shore in lots 7 and 8 in that island.—Mr. Richards.

For a copy of all correspondence, proceedings of courts of inquiry, and other documents, respecting the dismissal from His Majesty's service by the Governor in Council of officers of the Canadian militia, during the past ten years, without trial or option of trial, by a legally constituted military or civil tribunal having statutory powers of trial and punishment.—Mr. Worthington.

For a copy of all correspondence, reports, documents and papers relating to the strike of the employees of the Dominion Coal Company and the Cumberland Coal and Railway Company, in the counties of Cape Breton and Cumberland, Nova Scotia.—Mr. Rhodes.

For a return showing: 'Since the appointment of the Government Railways' Managing Board, how many employees of the Intercolonial Railway have been dismissed at Truro, at Halifax, and at Stellarton respectively, with their respective names; at what kind of work each was employed; on what dates respectively, each one was dismissed; how many of them since re-employed; on what dates respectively, each one was re-employed how long since such re-employment each one has remained in the service; how many of them are still in the service, with their names and what each one is employed at'—Mr. Rhodes.

For a return showing the names of all persons who have been fined for breach of fisheries regulations in the coast waters of the counties of Pictou and Cumberland, Nova Scotia, and Westmorland, New Brunswick, during the years 1907, 1908 and 1909, together with a full statement of the penalties inflicted, moneys collected, and fines or portion thereof remitted, if any, in each case, and for a copy of all instructions issued, reports, correspondence and documents relating in any manner thereto.—Mr. Rhodes.

For a return showing, for the last two months, the time of each transmission of mails from Montreal to London, England, and from London, England, to Montreal, and showing the date and hour of closing, and date and hour of delivery in each case.—Mr. Monk.

For a return showing what amount of money has been paid each year to Geo. Walton, Manitoba, by the Interior Department, from January 1, 1906, to December 31, 1909; and what moneys Mr. Geo. Walton has received since January 1, 1909, from any other department of the government.—Mr. Schaffner.

For a return showing the number of accidents to trains on the Intercolonial railway between April 1, 1909, and present date, and the location and particulars of each; the number of persons killed or injured in each of such accidents since April 1, 1909, to date; and the cost of each of such accidents to the Intercolonial railway, respectively, for repairs, property destroyed, compensation to passengers, and for compensation to shippers for freight and baggage.—Mr. Stanfield.

For a return showing the number of accidents to trains of the Intercolonial railway for ten months, from April 1, 1908, to December 31, 1908; the number of persons killed or injured in each of such accidents for ten months, from April 1, 1908, to December 31, 1908; and the cost of each of such accident to the Intercolonial railway, respectively, for repairs, property destroyed, compensation to passengers, and for compensation to shippers for freight and baggage.—Mr. Stanfield.

For a return showing on what occasions counsel has been employed by this government, or paid out of the public funds of Canada, to represent or act for witnesses before the Public Accounts Committee, or to represent or act for the Transcontinental Railway Commission, in respect of the examination of witnesses before such committee, with the names and addresses of such counsel, when they were paid, for whom they were acting and what services they actually rendered.—Mr. Rhodes.

For a copy of all papers and correspondence relating to the sale and refund of the money paid on the sale of the N.E. ¼ section of section 11, township 1, range 9, west of the 1st meridian in Manitoba.—Mr. W. H. Sharpe, (Lisgar).

For a copy of all correspondence, papers, affidavits, cancellations, &c., in connection with the entry of Wm. Reid Gardiner, for the N.W. ¼ section 22, township 35, range 16, west of the 2nd meridian.—Mr. Roche.

For a return showing the names of the sessional and temporary employees of the House of Commons who were under pay on the 27th January last; and the number of the said employees stated in the estimates of 1909-10. —Mr. Best.

For a copy of all papers and correspondence between different persons or companies and the Department of Mines, in reference to a charge of unprofessional conduct made in the 'Canadian Mining Journal' of July 1, 1909, against Mr. Fritz Cirkle, a mining engineer, temporarily employed by the Department of Mines in preparing a report on the asbestos mining industry of the province of Quebec.—Mr. R. Smith.

IMMIGRATION ACT.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of the Interior) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 102) respecting immigration. He said: In view of the fact that some explanation was given on the inroduction of the Bill, and in view of the further fact that the Bill was before the House during a great deal of last session, it will not be necessary to make any very lengthy introductory remarks. The main reason for the introduction of the Bill is not so much the desire to change the policy of the government as to facilitate the administration of that policy to a degree that is not provided for under the present Act, and to bring out, as clearly and as fully as possible in the form of the Act, what the policy of the government is, so that all parties interested may understand it.

There have been, of course, changes of conditions since the Act of 1906 was passed. One important change, and one that leads to a number of amendments in detail which appear in this Bill, is the necessity which has arisen for the exclusion of immigrants at international boundary ports. Up to the time of the passing of the Bill of 1906, there had not arisen, so far as we then understood the matter, any necessity for special efforts toward the exclusion of immigrants at these points. It was understood that there was such necessity at ocean ports, but in the framing the details were not made so clearly applicable. Since then, cause has arisen for quite as strict exclusion provisions at international boundary ports as at ocean ports, and necessarily, in the application of the policy of the government, there are points arising from day to day which make it desirable that they should be made as far as possible in legislation, so that, as I said, all parties interested shall have due notice of the intention of the government in administering its policy. There are many changes in detail throughout the Bill—all these changes in the Bill are changes of detail and not of policy. Some of them are important—in fact, we believe them all important or they would not have been proposed—but they are made for the purpose of carrying out more thoroughly and with more notice of the public the policy of the government, rather than to secure any change in the policy or in methods of administration.

One or two of the more important details I may mention. One is to define the word 'domicile.' As matters stand at present, the person who has once lived in Canada is entitled to come back, whether he is desirable or not. We agree that after a man has established his domicile in Canada, whether he has become a citizen or not, he should be entitled to re-entry into Canada. But there has been an indefiniteness on that point which should be cleared up as far as it can be cleared up. We are aware that a definition of 'domicile' is very difficult, but, for the purposes of this Act, for the better administration of the government's policy and for the better information of the public—both immigrants and those interested in transportation—we think it well that this word 'domicile' should be defined as clearly as possible. There is another very important provision, one which may not meet with the approval of the House. I drew attention to it when I brought the Bill before the House in the first place, and I again draw attention to it. This is a provision which, while guaranteeing to the immigrant every opportunity to establish his right to enter the country—guaranteeing to him the full opportunity of giving evidence and of having that evidence recorded, with the right of appeal—yet does not permit the immigrant to take advantage of the protection of the courts until he has passed the administrative authority of the government at the port of landing. We believe that it is desirable, in the interest of proper exclusion of undesirable immigrants, that this provision should be made. We understand that it is a somewhat radical provision, and as I have said, it may not meet the approval of the House. But, as I have said also, we believe that it would be in the best interest of immigrants, transportation companies and the country generally if that provision were adopted. As I have suggested, there being no change in policy or administration intended, it will be more convenient to deal with the changes of detail as we come to them in the different clauses of the Bill, and with the opportunities of explanation and discussion that are afforded when the House is in committee.

Mr. BLAIN. Is there a demand from any part of Canada to abolish altogether assisted immigration?

Mr. OLIVER. There is no assisted immigration into Canada so far as this government is concerned. I know of no demand to abolish that which, in this case, does not exist.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Does this Bill apply to Doukhobors?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes, it applies to all my hon. friend's (Mr. Campbell) friends.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I want to tell the hon. Minister of the Interior that, if he is going to class me with the Doukhobors, he is like Paddy's dog, making a mistake. I want to tell the hon. gentleman that while they are perhaps pets, the so-called Sifton pets of this government, they are no pets of mine, and I will tell the hon. gentleman the reason. They have been a detriment to the civilization of the west in every possible manner. They have been a people so immorally indecent—innocent perhaps—that they have been a disgrace to the people of the west, and to the administration that brought them here. I want to ask the Minister of the Interior, if he will come down from the lofty position of levity he is assuming, how many of these people he expects, and how he is going to take care of them? I want to ask him what the cost has been to the Dominion in the past in bringing that class of immigrants into this country; and further, what cost it has been to the decent self-respecting people of Canada in taking care of them, and keeping them in some way of decency since they came. I want to ask him what the cost has been to compel these people to comply with the laws of Canada, that all other immigrants are obliged to comply with.

Mr. OLIVER. Perhaps it would be as well to defer question and answer of this nature until we are in committee. I am unable to give my hon. friend at the moment the information he asks for. He has asked for considerable information in the way of figures and facts, of course he does not expect me to have them in hand. But I will be glad to furnish all the information we have that he has asked for. The intention of the Bill, and the policy of the government, is that all immigration shall be treated on exactly the same footing, on the same basis, according to their merits, irrespective of their race or religion. Our purpose in the Bill is to put before the public as plainly as we can what the policy of the government is, so that there may be no misapprehension in regard to it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I would ask the minister if, after the experience of this government with regard to that particular class of people, he considers them desirable as immigrants?

Mr. OLIVER. As I have said already, I think it would be more in order that question and answer should pass across the House while we are in committee. But as my hon. friend has asked me a question, I can only say that I do not think it is a matter of concern to this House what my private opinion may be in regard to that subject.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am merely asking——

Mr. SPEAKER. On the second reading the rule applies that a member can only speak once.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am not presuming to speak, I am only presuming to ask a question.

Mr. SPEAKER. The object of going into committee is to allow discussion to be carried on more freely.

Mr. MONK. I can tell my hon. friend what it cost us to move the Doukhobors out here. The transportation of the Doukhobors by the government from their native country to their settlement in the Northwest, cost $48,000. That was the answer given several days ago in the House by the government when asked upon that point. But it must not be forgotten that since they are in this country they have cost us large sums of money every time there has been amongst them a breaking out which is familiar to most of the members of this House. One is naturally led to inquire whether we have not advanced far enough to take precautionary measures before we import into this country in large numbers certain classes of people. That is a question that naturally arises at this stage of the legislation. Nor is it, I think, for the minister to say that we have not state-aided immigration. We have not state-aided immigration in the sense that we do not take the immigrant at our own expense on foreign shores and bring him here. There are not many nations that do that, in fact I do not know of any. The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Blain) alluded to the system we have followed of bonusing immigrants in the first place, and in the next place of keeping a large number of immigration agents in different parts of the world, many of them at great expense, and to very little purpose. Should we continue that system? Is it wise, for instance, to keep in the United States so many immigration agents, who are merely nominees of the government for political purposes, and who do very little there, when we see, as we do at this moment, such large numbers of immigrants coming into this country, according to my mind, without any particular action on the part of these agents that cost us so dear? They came in last year, I think over 60,000 from the United States. We are not in a position to say how many of these men were brought in through the action of these very expensive immigration agents, I think none at all. We have no trace of any one that was brought in by our agents from Michigan or Minnesota. Look at the expense of those agents, the paucity of their reports. Indeed, we have no reports from them in the departmental report. There is a general report from the chief, but surely when an agent in Michigan, or some other state, costs us between $6,000 and $8,000 a year, we ought to get from him a detailed statement, some document that would give us information showing what use he is to the country and what results he has obtained. Hon. members of the House know that we have also in England and in many parts of the continent immigration agents, and even there I question if they are of much use to us. I think the time has arrived for Canada, as for the United States, to adopt a different policy, not catering for immigrants, but making a suitable advertisement of this country by a grant when exhibitions occur, keeping an office in London in a general way, but not paying men to remain over there for the purpose of soliciting immigrants. I think the time has come when such an effort on our part is superfluous. So I think I am right in saying that we have an absolutely different policy from that of the United States, who receive over a million immigrants a year, and sometimes more than that. They are overcrowded with immigrants, without paying a single cent for soliciting them. On the contrary, they charge a head tax which leaves a handsome surplus and enables them to defray entirely a system of inspection.

Mr. BLAIN. Does not my hon. friend think that the policy of this government is in reality a policy of assisted immigration?

Mr. MONK. Certainly, I call it assisted immigration, as much so as in any country that adopts it. My hon. friend thinks that assisted immigration means defraying part of the expense of immigrants who come out here.

Mr. BLAIN. I have no such thought in my mind.

Mr. MONK. Then we assist immigration in that we provide considerable help for the immigrant when he arrives. That, I think, to a certain extent, might continue. We have spent a great deal of money on hospitals and inspection. I heard from a medical man that the disease of trachoma, which is a great pest in eastern Europe, has spread very considerably, and that it now exists in different parts of Canada. For a time we had it in Montreal, and I believe they have had it in certain parts of the west. The minister speaks of this Bill as being a continuation of the policy of the government. I do not think he is altogether correct in that. This Bill is getting away from the policy of the time when we spent $50,000, and more in importing Doukhobors, and making special conditions for them, one of which was that they would be entirely exempt from one of the duties of every citizen of this country—military duty. That would not be done to-day by my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior. This Bill is an improvement and I regret that we did not adopt it last year. But, that improvement—let us be fair—is due to two causes particularly. In the first place, it is due to the criticism which for several years we have offered in this House of the system of immigration as it is being continued. It was more or less the system which brought the Doukhobors in. The inspection was insufficient and faulty in many respects. The principle of the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Sifton), who then occupied the position of my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior, was to fill the country up at any cost with anybody, provided we crowded up the country, and could report to the people that the immense prosperity of Canada was producing this result. We criticised that system. We pointed out that every man admitted to the Canadian family should only be admitted after careful examination. We were seconded by the immigration officers of the United States who made representations to this government that they were not exercising due severity in the examination of the immigrants that we bonused to come here, and who then went over to the United States, because that course had been followed for a long time. Bonused immigrants passed over to the United States. The Americans got the cream of them, and those that they refused remained in this country with their diseases and short-comings. That criticism brought about an improvement in the regulations. The representations of the American officers in their yearly reports on immigration in which they blamed very severely what we were doing brought about this change, and I think we can claim some of the credit for having brought about the improvement in this line. But, let the House bear in mind that even to-day we keep no trace of the immigrants who came here. Where do they go? About 60,000 Americans came into Canada last year. I think a larger number went from Canada to the United States.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. 85,000.

Mr. MONK. Who were they? You must, under your immigration system, trace those who come in, and those who go out. We do not trace those who go out, and until we have a provision to that effect in our law, our law would be failing in that respect. We have spent millions a year in securing immigration, we should know that we have it here, and I think we are getting the full benefit of this expenditure. We ought to know who are going out too. We ought to know if our own people are going out. There was a time when there was a large exodus from Quebec, and the maritime provinces, and when the best in those provinces left us. We should know that, and we should rather spend our money to find that out than to take it to pay our cousins, our friends and our defeated candidates, large salaries to do, we do not know what, in the United States, and elsewhere. There is an improvement in that policy, and some of the credit for that improvement is due to us, but as the minister is not always willing to give it, it is better to call the attention of the House to it. I notice some points in connection with this new legislation to which I desire to particularly call the attention of the House. This Bill fails entirely, as every other Bill has failed, to provide for moral guarantees with respect to immigration. We continue to receive somewhere about a quarter of a million people every year without any inquiry whatever as to who they are or as to what are their moral qualifications. Who are the men who compose this vast herd that is going to make up the nation here, and that is going to enter into our families? I contend that we should endeavour to secure some certainty as to who these people are. I do not pretend to solve absolutely the problem that presents itself as to how that can be done, but no effort is attempted in that direction. Could we not secure some certainty as to his moral qualifications from the immigrant before his embarkation? It seems that that could be done since we have a staff of immigration agents in foreign countries. At any rate, could the immigrant, when he arrives, bring something to show where he comes from, and who he is? This is just as important as the physical examination. Members of this House who have given this matter any attention know that when the immigrant arrives in a batch of 1,200, and sometimes 2,000 on a ship, he passes the physical examination very quickly. The inspector general told us once at the Immigration Committee that as many as four a minute passed the inspecting medical officer. It is somewhat difficult even to ascertain the physical condition. He is detained, of course, if there is some suspicion as to his condition. What about his moral qualification? Would it not be necessary that a man should be required to bring, when he comes to this country, some reference, something from the mayor of his municipality, from some responsible officer, from somebody, to show that he is not a criminal, and that he ought to be welcomed into this country? You do not admit a man into your family without letters of introduction. When these people come in large numbers we ought to have some means of ascertaining who they are, because it is needless to say that a vast number of those found in our jails in Montreal, and in Toronto, and in the jails, penitentiaries, and houses of refuge of Ontario, and of my own province, and probably in others there is an undue proportion of foreign criminals. I think that we might, before the immigrant starts out, or at any rate when he arrives here, have some means to get from him guarantees as to his moral qualifications. A very serious question arises as to whether it would not be an act of humanity to the immigrant himself, a great economy for ourselves, and generally a better course to secure the examination physically before he leaves foreign shores.

I am sure that is possible. It is done in the United States to a very large extent. They have an examination at the port of destination, no doubt; but I understand that in the great ports of embarkation in Europe there is an officer who examines the emigrants. I think that last year the cost of our deportations considerably exceeded $25,000, because even though the transportation companies are obliged to take a man back if he is rejected at the port of debarkation, or after a certain delay, still he sometimes wanders into the country and causes great expense to the municipalities and to the government before he is brought back under guard to the place of embarkation and handed back to the country from which he came. Anyway it is a great expense and a fearful hardship. You have to separate families; you return a man to Europe and land him there penniless and hopeless. Instances appear from time to time in the papers. This is a matter which I think ought to engage the attention of the government. I repeat what has already formed the subject of a question by my hon. friend from Peel: ought we not now to abolish state aid in any form? Canada is becoming well known; we advertise it, and should continue to make it known everywhere in the proper way; but should we pay more bonuses? The answer given to the question of the hon. member for Peel was that there was now no state aid properly so called. But it must be borne in mind that the labouring classes in the country, through the Trades Congress and other societies, have from time to time called on the government to abolish bonuses, giving reasons therefor, and coming and urging these reasons verbally on the government. There is, therefore, a large class, and a class exposed to suffer from bonused immigrants, who have repeatedly asked for the abolition of bonuses. I think that the Bill, even in its incomplete and imperfect state, is a considerable improvement on past legislation. There is a point which I wish to make in favour of the immigrants, and it is the result of representations made to me in the city of Montreal and elsewhere, not by government officials as a rule, but by men who are familiar with immigration and who take a large part in assisting worthy immigrants. Is it right to fix the amount of money which an immigrant on landing should have? I have often raised an objection to that. It very often happens that an immigrant who lands without a cent, is just the man to fall to work at once; he may be an excellent immigrant, eager to work, and yet because he has not that fixed sum in his hand, he is sent back. There is no discretion in the office. Lately my attention has been called to Syrians, who are to be found in Montreal and elsewhere. They came to this country very poor, but I am not aware that there has ever been a Syrian who has required public aid. Why should we not admit into this country men of that race, or of any other race, if they are willing to work, and are qualified in every other respect to become excellent settlers? A man who arrives here with more than the requisite sum of money may be a very unfit man, who intends to live on that money and afterwards to rove. This is the testimony I have heard from men who follow closely the movement of immigrants. When I first raised this question, I was told by my hon. friend that it was a dangerous discretion to leave to the officer who inspects. Surely an officer who is obliged in a few moments to judge of the moral, physical and general qualifications of an immigrant ought to be able to say whether he has sufficient resources upon him or whether he is disposed to become a public charge. If he is a suitable officer for this important function, he ought to be able to exercise that discretion. On the whole, I think the Bill is a good one, because it constitutes a progress on the laxity of previous legislation; but I shall never be satisfied, so far as I am concerned, until we advance a step further—until we consider that the admission of an immigrant into this country is not a goal to be sought for at all costs. The country is rich, we are called on to make a great country of it, and we ought not to admit any but the most suitable into it. We should go further even than the Americans have gone in the selection of those who are to constitute so large a section of the Canadian people.

Mr. ANDREW BRODER. I am sure that the members generally are glad to realize that the government are getting a little more exacting in regard to the class of immigrants who are allowed to come into this country. We have an agent of the Department of the Interior living at Iroquois, in the county of Dundas, who has had to do with deporting undesirable immigrants, and I am glad to say that I think he is very attentive to his duties and uses a good deal of judgment in carrying out the law. This is required, because an official ought to be able to tell, on looking at an individual, whether he has money or not, what is in him. But there is a more serious side to this question than perhaps even the minister is aware of. We sometimes hear it said that there are no more people leaving Canada than are coming into it. I want to show that that is a fallacy, and every patriotic Canadian will be sorry that that is the case. I hold in my hand the report of the Commissioner General of Immigration of the United States for 1909. Every one who looks into these records will realize that they are very thorough and effective in all their statistical work. I was simply astounded in looking over this report to find these figures. He gives these figures of those who have come into Canada, acknowledging the courtesy of the department here in giving these figures. He says:

Through the courtesy of the superintendent of the Immigration Department I am able to invite the attention of the bureau to the record of immigration to Canada for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1909, such record being as follows:—

He gives the different months, but I shall simply give the totals.

Total for the British Isles.. ..	47,407
" Continental..	32,315
" United States..	72,349
Total..	152,071

What surprises me, and I think that which must strike everybody as a very undesirable condition of things, are the following figures. He gives the number of people who have gone out of this country:

Aliens manifested on board steamships and examined at ports of arrival under the immigration laws of the United States..	15,417
Aliens coming originally to Canada and who sought entry to the United States within one year from date of arrival.	6,116
Aliens who entered Canada via United States ports, and aliens from the United States who sought re-entry thereto within one year..	9,495
Aliens claiming residence or more than one year in Canada, but who were unable to give satisfactory proof thereof.	4,454
Aliens who applied for admission to the United States after a residence of more than one year in Canada (the transportation companies being exempt from payment of head-tax as to this class)..	12,920
Citizens of Canada entering the United States for permanent residence.. ..	33,118
Total..	81,520

In addition to that there should be added United States citizens returned to the United States after a residence in Canada, approximated 15,000 people, making a grand total of 96,520. Deducting this from the total immigration of 152,071 we find that we have a balance of 55,551 in our favour.

We swapped off 34,000 Canadians, our own people, the best citizens we could have, for aliens from Europe, or some other country. This is a condition of things that should be more thoroughly looked into. The figures are carefully collated, and there is no doubt that they are correct. We hear so much about the outflow being stopped, about no more Canadians leaving Canada. There never were so many leaving in our history as there are now. I can quite understand the 15,000 Americans who go back home. They come here and buy land, and go home, they are speculating in our lands. They have not got their coats off, they come over here with their pocket books. We hear so much about $92,000,000 coming into the country with these people. If a man comes into our country with $92,000,000 and invests it and makes the price double in ten years, if he is not doing so much, for this country, especially, if he goes home with his coat on to wait until those lands become valuable. Fifteen thousand people have done that.

Another astounding thing to me is that coming and going by our different transportation lines into the United States, and back again last year 8,000,000 passengers passed to and fro between this country and the United States according to this book. These are rather astonishing figures to contemplate, that is more than the whole population of this country. That is a large outflow compared with what we thought there was and some record should be kept of the fluctuation of population. If we cannot fasten them down somewhere, we ought to be more careful about bringing them in.

I can understand the effort made a few years ago to bring all kinds of people into this country. Why? Because a good many men influential with the government wanted to see the prices of land go up because they were holders, and therefore wanted to fill the country with any class of immigrants who would come in order to make lands in the Northwest more valuable.

Another serious question is the outflow of people from the older provinces to the west. I do not find fault with that, the western country is the heritage of the older provinces; but there should be some attempt on the part of the government to counteract that in some sense by bringing other people into the older provinces to take the places of those who leave. There are no better pioneers than our own Canadian born young men who grow up full of energy and strength and purpose, no better men, but while they go out to the west, to build up that great country, and make it what it will be, a good country, some reasonable attempt should be made to fill their places by suitable immigrants from some part of Europe. I suggest these things to the House, thinking they will look more thoroughly into them. It is a condition of things that should not exist, and we ought to make some attempt to counteract these things.

Mr. JAMESON. While the Immigration Bill is under discussion I wish to draw to the attention of the government, and parliament the fact that immigration so far as the Atlantic provinces of Canada are concerned, has in the past, been neglected. The efforts which the government have been putting out for many years past have been entirely directed to the filling up of our western country. With the peopling of that country, and with its development, we in the east have no quarrel whatever. On the contrary it is our pride, and it would be a very great source of satisfaction to us to see that country filled up with a desirable class of people, to see it developed and to see it prosper.

At the same time we cannot but recognize that the government have overlooked almost entirely, if not entirely, the needs of the maritime provinces so far as immigration is concerned. Only some few weeks ago, the question of the representation of these provinces in parliament was discussed in this House. It was then very clearly pointed out that there has been serious loss in the population of the three maritime provinces during the past few years, and the next redistribution will probably result in the loss of two or three, possibly more seats in this House to the maritime provinces. The question is one of very vital interest to Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. The government should make some effort to see that these provinces, which have been described as the long wharfs of this Dominion, should not merely serve the purpose of a wharf, but should retain a certain percentage of the people brought to this country as the result of the government propaganda. We have in the past lost tens of thousands of people who have gone to the United States. Some of our best and most capable people who have gone there have secured in that country eminent positions. They as a whole have been a credit to the country from which they went and were gladly received by the American nation. But when this government, some time ago placed immigration agents in the eastern states for the purpose of inducing the return of some of those people from the maritime provinces back to Canada, the instructions, so far as I am informed—and I am led to believe by the answer which the Minister of the Interior gave to a question put last year that my information is correct—were given those agents to endeavour to secure the return of those people not to the maritime provinces, but to direct them to western Canada. I do not think that is right. In view of the fact that the maritime provinces have lost very seriously in population, and that their representation is likely to be seriously impaired after the next redistribution owing to the fact it would be only right and proper that the government should make a special effort, and direct its energies particularly, towards the preserving to the maritime provinces of a percentage at least of the immigrants of the agricultural class brought into Canada through those provinces. For many years the literature which this government has been circulating in Europe has been almost entirely that descriptive of our western country. As I said a few moments ago, we of the east have no quarrels with the west, on the contrary the west is a source of great pride to us, but I say that the government have unfairly discriminated against the east in their immigration policy. I trust that in the future a more equitable and proper view of the matter will be taken by the government and that some of the energy of their various representatives in Europe will be directed toward sending immigrants to the maritime provinces and towards informing them of the advantages offered by those provinces. This in a measure will redeem the injury they have sustained through the serious emigration from our provinces which took place some years ago and which let me add is still continuing, to the eastern states of the American union. I hope also that the government will change the instructions to their agents in the eastern states and instruct them, when they seek to return to this country the people who have left it in years past, not to alone direct their attention to the Canadian west, but make at least an effort, and a fair effort, first of all, to see that these people are reminded of the advantages which the maritime provinces offer them, and endeavour to return to the land of their birth those who left it. In this connection I may refer to the condition which has developed as the result of some regulations recently issued by the Postmaster General with regard to postage upon newspapers published in Canada and going to the United States. Some time ago I put a question on the order paper respecting this matter and the answer I received I confess was somewhat confusing. I placed the question on the order paper at the request of the editor of a local paper in the town where I reside. He told me that up to the time that increased postage was imposed his paper had a large circulation in the United States, and that these papers were taken very largely by people who had formerly been residents of the county of Digby and also by subscribers among American summer tourists who spent part of their time in Digby. The result of the increase in the postage necessitated an advance of 50 per cent in the subscription for the paper, an advance from one dollar to one dollar and fifty cents. The consequence was that he found the circulation of his paper in the United States declined very materially. This, he said, did not represent all the loss. The greatest loss was to the country, through losing touch with the former residents. This applies to all weekly newspapers in the east. The local paper is the best repatriation agent. So long as we are able to place in the hands of people who have left this country our weekly newspapers and they can see what transpires from week to week in their old home, so long do we retain their interest in the place and we have always a prospect of bringing them back. I have known of many instances where, because of some development reported in the weekly newspapers, people have returned to the country and taken up their abode there again. I consider that the imposition upon the weekly newspapers of that increased postal rate is a very serious detriment and is in no way compensated by the paltry increase in postal revenue. I trust that the Postmaster General will remove the charge, as I think it would be for the general benefit of the country, by keeping our people who have gone to the United States in touch with their old homes. The severing of that tie involves the risk of losing them for ever, as residents of the maritime provinces.

Mr. MAGRATH. I confess that I have not made any preparation for this debate, but there are a few observations I should like to offer in view of the fact that I have given some attention to this question of immigration. I think I am correct in saying that this Bill is similar in principle to the existing Act. This Bill elaborates certain features of the existing law. My opinion is that, so far as the operation of the law is concerned, we can accomplish the same results under it as under this Bill. The principle of this Bill is to keep undesirables out of the country. Therefore, the Bill is good. Any weaknesses are not a question of law, but in the operation of the law. There is a law, ordained some centuries ago, commanding men not to steal. That law has been elaborated from time to time down through the ages, yet it has not wholly restrained people from walking off with their neighbours' goods. If we had only one entrance to this country and instructed the doorkeeper to allow none to enter but the morally and physically sound, we might elaborate the order into pages of law, but unless the man had the discriminating faculty to sift the good from the bad, the law would not be of much effect. I make no criticism of the immigration officials, for those I know appear to be very good men. But I suggest to the minister that he cannot get results under the present system of selecting the outside service. This applies whichever government may be in power. You cannot get the same results as if you placed the selection of these officers under a commission and allowed the superintendent of immigration to pick out men specially suitable for that character of work. We hear much about the greatness of Canada and of the vast number of people we are going to receive into this country. We certainly are having some prosperous years. Lean years will come, and the movement, some day, will be from the cities back to the land. If we have confidence in our own statements as to the riches of this country, we must believe that there will be a vast movement of people towards our borders. We ought not to wait until that time comes before beginning to train our immigration service. There is no portion of our public service so necessary or important as this immigration service. The commissioner general of the United States, in reporting on his men in his report for the year ending June 30 last, states:

The bureau never fails in its annual reports to call attention to the high estimate it places upon the character and capacity of employees, as a whole and taken individually, and to its appreciation of their loyality, zeal and industry. The work upon which they are engaged is quite different from that performed by many other classes of government employees. They handle human beings, and must, in order to be successful in the highest sense, exhibit the qualities of mind and heart that have no particular place in the handling of books, papers or commodities.

Our present system of securing an outside service, by patronage committees, the recommendation of members of parliament —I speak regardless of what party is in power—must certainly result in putting some men into this immigration service who are better fitted for something else. We must get away from that system if we wish to properly guard our borders. I am making no complaints about the officials; I believe our men are doing good service. But there will be a greater service for them to render when later on they will be called on to inspect vast masses of people who turn towards Canada. When that movement comes it will carry with it the flushings of vice out from the large centres of population. Upon our immigration officials depends our ability to maintain the moral and physical standard of our people. Let that go down, and it is unnecessary for me to say what will happen to this country.

So far, I assume, the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) will largely agree with what I have said. If there should be a question of difference between us, it may be on what I am about to say. I believe that it is the duty of the government to appoint a royal commission to investigate immigration matters. It will cost a little money, of course, but great results will accrue. We are largely creatures of habit; the ordinary business institution gets into a rut; departmental officials are apt to get into a rut. It is desirable to bring in fresh thoughts and ideas and have these matters thoroughly investigated. That idea is not original with me, as the minister knows. The United States government, in 1907, appointed a commission of nine—the President, the Senate and the House of Representatives each appointing three. That commission is doing a most valuable work for the United States. If it has not already done so, it will shortly present its report to congress. I believe the time has arrived when there should be a royal commission to investigate immigration matters in this country, and I certainly think there should be a representative of the labour interest on such a commission.

Another question is that of naturalization. I believe that we make ourselves too cheap in the making of Canadian citizens. Everybody knows that we pay no heed or attention to the matter. If citizenship implies anything in Canada, it must mean ownership. In some European countries, citizenship means burdens. In this country it carries responsibility, but it means also the ownership of something very valuable. Are we not offering this citizenship too freely? We all know that the idea of making citizens never occurs to any one until there is an election. And we know, in the west, at least, the method is this: A foreign-born man is met somewhere; he takes an affidavit before a notary public; this is posted up for a few days; and the man is shortly afterwards certified by the judge as a citizen of this country. The United States have realized that this is a very serious question. In the past few years they have changed the Naturalization Act, and the three-year period no longer exists. At present no man can become a citizen of the United States without being approved by two other citizens who will guarantee his fitness to become a citizen. Perhaps the minister might not agree with me in this matter, but I think it is one that might be profitably looked into by a royal commission, certainly it is of great importance to this country, and I am sure that every hon. gentleman in the House realizes that I am correct in that statement.

The Bill before us has no bearing on the policy of the government. There are some features in connection with the immigration administration that I will refer to in committee, when the minister will be better able to discuss it with me. We have a branch of our government supplying us with statements as to the estimated population. I am afraid we will discover, when our next census is taken, that the population will not be as great as we have hoped. A short time ago, I put a question on the order paper, and learned that those estimates are based upon the increase of births over deaths as determined at the last census, which increase was 12·7. To that is to be added yearly the increase by immigration as shown by the returns. Well, this country is not like Siberia, where people who come in cannot get out. There is freedom to come in and to go out, and there is a movement of population back and forth. Population is more or less in a fluid state, and there are many people who come in and who go out, of whom no account has been taken in these estimates of population. In the United States, while they have not much information to work upon, they estimate the population that remains at 68 per cent of the entire immigration. I mention this because, if I am correct in the interpretation of the answer that was given me, I repeat we will probably be disappointed when the next census is taken.

Mr. URIAH WILSON. Before you leave the Chair I would like to make a few remarks on this question of immigration. The minister has increased the time for deportation from two to three years. Dr. Clark, of the insane hospital in Toronto, is strongly in favour of increasing the period to four years. For myself I can see no reason why there should be any limit fixed to the time within which deportation may take place. If people come into this country who are not able to take care of themselves, who have to be sent to an insane asylum, or other places, to be supported by the public, I do not see why we should retain them at all. There is another provision that I am sorry the minister has not put into his Bill. In the law of the United States they have a clause that when transportation companies bring aliens into the country having a loathsome or dangerous disease, or of weak mind, if the diseases are such as might have been discovered at the port of embarkation, those companies are liable to a fine for each case of $100; and last year, for that offence, the fines amounted to $27,400. In his last report the commissioner recommends that the fine be increased to $200. I think that such a provision should be put into our law also, because there is a temptation on the part of transportation companies to bring people into this country for the purpose of getting the price of their fare across the Atlantic. Then there is another matter which has been mentioned by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), and that is the advisability of doing away with commissions. I am in favour of cutting out these commissions altogether and of appropriating the money now spent on that purpose, or as much money as is necessary, to the employment of a doctor on each immigration ship, who shall thoroughly examine every immigrant on the voyage across the Atlantic from whatever country he may come. I think in that way we would be able to exclude people coming to this country who are diseased, or weak minded, or otherwise unfit to become permanent and useful citizens of our country. The question of weaklings and undesirables is troubling the United States as well as Canada. There are people in the United States, as stated by the report of the Commissioner General, who advocate an increase in the head tax. Some are advocating a literary test, and some are in favour of both. Now, whether that would be advisable, I am not prepared to say. But one thing is certain, and that is that we ought to get at the best possible means of discovering those undesirables before they embark, and keeping them out. That is a question in which not only we are personally interested, but in which our children and our grandchildren will be still more interested, because they will have to live side by side with these undesirable people who succeed in entering our country. We ought to take every precaution to keep the physical standard of Canadians as high as possible. There are people in the United States who even think that there should be a physical test applied to immigrants, and that all males from 16 to 50 should be submitted to a physical examination as severe as the military test. A good many people are sent to this country by relatives who are anxious to get rid of them. I notice in the reports from the asylum that people have been sent out here, and after they have been deported, their friends in the old country have admitted that they sent them out here for the purpose of getting rid of them. I could mention a number of such cases. I have here the report issued by the Ontario government for the last year, in which is pointed out quite a number of cases that are very interesting. Here is what it says about deportations:

> The work of deporting undesirables has been effectively carried on throughout the year, and with the result that 263 persons were deported.

That is from Ontario alone. There is here a comparative table showing the number of persons deported in the years 1906, 1907 and 1908. In 1908 there were 263 persons deported. In November of that year, 18 insane persons were deported as not coming within the provisions of the Immigration Act. Arrangements have been made by the Ontario government agent at Liverpool for the reception of deported people in their respective homes upon their arrival. So that these eighteen were not deported in the regular way. Private arrangements were made by the government of Ontario whereby these people were sent back to their friends in the old country.

> Of these 18, nine were acknowledged as being mentally defective before coming to Canada and two others were acknowledged epileptics, the relatives having no hesitancy in stating that they were sent to this country for the purpose of getting rid of them. . . . Of the 65 insane deported, their average residence in the hospitals for the insane was one year and two and a half months. Of 81 criminals deported 15 were committed to the Central prison and 66 to the jails of the province. Of the 117 deported 'as likely to become a public charge,' 26 had been living on public charity since their arrival in Canada, 44 were young children of undesirables who were deported, and the remainder were deported owing to disease, physical infirmities and immorality. The pecuniary advantage to the provinces by the deportation of the insane persons alone amounts to over $325,000. In addition to the deportations which were mentioned above, the chief of frontier police at Niagara Falls, acting on instructions received from the Attorney General's department, deported to the United States, during the three months ending December 31, 1908, 303 undesirables.

These were people in regard to which nothing was done by the Dominion government. I have a good deal of that kind of information, but perhaps it would not be worth while to go into it at this stage. It was mentioned here to-day that we have a very imperfect way of ascertaining the number of people that are living in this country. I recollect that the Minister of Finance, in his budget speech, made the statement that there were in this country at the present time 7,450,000 people. I quite understand how he got that information. He, in all probability, got Mr. Blue to prepare the statement for him. That statement was made up from the census of 1901, and every person then in Canada was enumerated in that census. Then the natural increase was added. We all know that large numbers of people from the older provinces went to the Northwest. Train loads of them went. Only the other day 4,000 left Toronto. We know that in 1906 a census was taken in the northwest. Every person who went to that country from the older provinces between 1901 and 1906 was enumerated there as if he had been a newcomer. Then, my hon. friend the Minister of Finance took the reports of the Immigration Department and added the figures which were there given to make the total amount. According to the figures in the United States reports for 1907-8, 58,000 people left Canada and went to the United States. For the year 1908-9, we have the report that 81,000 people left Canada and went to the United States. We also know that the United States keep track of their immigration, and I have some figures here taken from their report. In 1908 there were arrivals in the United States to the number of 924,695. Of these, it was reported that 714,874 left the United States again, leaving a net increase in population of 209,867. Then, in 1908-9, the total arrivals in the United States numbered 944,235 and the departures 400,392, leaving a net increase of 543,843. They do not claim in the United States that more than 68 per cent of the immigrants that go to that country stay there. and I do not see how we can reasonably expect that we will retain anywhere near the whole of our immigrants because there are attractions in the United States. There are people who come to this country to work during the summer time many of whom go to their own countries in the fall. Possibly there are a great many reasons why men should stay here and there are a great many why they should not, I presume. However, I am very strong upon the point that we should be very particular about the inspection of immigrants coming to this country, and I think the best way to do that is to have a doctor upon every ship that brings immigrants and have them thoroughly examined on the voyage. Those that are not up to the mark should not be allowed to land. I think that is the best from the humanitarian point of view, because it is cruel to allow people to be brought to this country when we know they will have to be deported and sent back to their own country, after having spent perhaps all the money they have in their attempt to get to this country. We should keep in mind the reports from the asylums and jails. In the province of Ontario we have not quite 20 per cent of a foreign-born population. It is about 17·1 or 17·2 per cent. I mean people born outside of Canada, but in our jails, prisons and insane hospitals, according to the report of Dr. Clark, 40 or 50 per cent of the inmates are foreign-born. That is a state of things that ought not to be, and it did not exist before 1900. The whole trouble has been that we have been too careless in our inspection. Just imagine 7,000 people being landed at one port in one day to be examined. I do not care how many officials you have at such a place, there is no room to examine them properly and do justice. At Ellis Island, New York, they will not allow the number to be examined to exceed 5,000 in any one day, and the equipment that they have there must be better than ours, because their immigration is so much larger than that which we have, and it is necessary for them to have a better equipment. I do not know that I shall continue this debate any longer, because as the Bill proceeds we will have an opportunity of speaking on the different clauses. I think it is an improvement on what we have had heretofore, and I think that the government has to some extent listened to the suggestions that have come from time to time from the opposition. If we cannot get quality and quantity it is essential that we shall have quality anyway. I think the minister himself has come to that conclusion and that the immigration work should be carried on upon that principle. I think that Mr. Scott is a real good official. He wrote a letter in 1908 to his assistant over in London, saying that the only kind of people we wanted in this country were experienced farm labourers, farmers who are able to take up land, farmers who had money to buy land, or female domestic servants. These were the three kinds that he specified as being desirable, but I notice that the government are very anxious to take credit when they get before a popular audience, excepting it be an audience of workingmen or a trades union, to show the great number that they have brought to this country. But, when they are talking to the trades unions that view of it does not get very much prominence. They then give more prominence to the class of people that they are paying bonuses for, that is farmers, farm labourers and female domestic servants. I hope that this Bill will be made as perfect as possible, and that a clause will be inserted providing that the transportation companies that bring undesirable people to this country shall be fined and made to take them back, and if necessary made to take a caretaker with them so that they will not suffer.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The provisions of the Bill, as I understand, do not involve any radical departure from the law as it exists at present. There is some elaboration of the provisions for the restriction of immigration with a view to securing a thoroughly desirable class of settlers in this country. In so far as the Bill promotes that ideal I am thoroughly in sympathy with it, because I entirely agree with what has been said by other speakers that we in this country can, and do offer inducements which should invite the settlement in this country of the very best of the emigrating population from the most favoured countries in the world, I was very much impressed with the figures cited from the annual report of the Commissioner General of Immigration of the United States for the fiscal year ended the 30th of June, 1909. Some two or three years ago, I had occasion to make a personal investigation of the methods of the United States immigration service. I was impressed with the wonderful thoroughness of their organization. I say that without in the slightest degree desiring to cast any discredit on our own organization. Perhaps it might be expected that the organization of the immigration service of the United States would be more advanced than ours. They have been dealing with this problem longer, and they have had a number of very able men dealing with it. I am convinced that there is no service more thoroughly and efficiently organized for the purpose for which it is intended than the immigration service of the United States. For that reason I attach the more importance to the report of the Commissioner General of Immigration of the United States, with respect to immigration from Canada to the United States in recent years. We were told, and we were glad to hear it, that immigration from Canada to the United States had practically ceased. That is by no means the record contained in this report. I would like to read once more, exactly in the words of the report, what is said by the Commissioner General of Immigration for the United States with regard to that particular subject. In the first place, as my hon. friend from Dundas (Mr. Broder) pointed out, there is set forth on page 139 of this report a record of the immigration into Canada during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1900. The details are as follows:

Britain	47,407
Continental	32,315
United States	72,349
Total	152,071

Then at page 140 the report continues as follows:

For easy comparison of emigration from the United States to Canada with immigration from Canada to the United States during the past year, the showing of our records regarding the number of aliens admitted is given.

A. Aliens manifested on board steamship and examined at ports of arrival under immigration laws of the United States	15,417
B. Aliens coming originally to Canada, and who sought entry to the United States within one year from date of arrival	6,116
C. Aliens who entered Canada by United States ports, and aliens from the United States who sought re-entry thereto within one year	9,495
CC. Aliens claiming residence of more than one year in Canada who were unable to give satisfactory proof thereof	4,454
D. Aliens who applied for admission to the United States after their residence of more than one year in Canada, the transportation companies being exempt from payment of head tax as to this class	12,920
E. Citizens of Canada entering the United States for permanent residence.	33,118
Total	81,520
F. To which there should be added United States citizens returning to the United States after residence in Canada approximated	15,000
Total	96,520

Now, I put out of consideration for the moment classes A, B, C, and CC, and I take simply classes D, E, and F, for the purpose of coming to a conclusion as to what the actual immigration from Canada to the United States amounted to for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1909, according to this report. The total of these three classes is 61,038. Let us see what is said in another portion of the report, with respect to these classes. First, with regard to class F, 15,000 is merely an approximation. Let us see on what that approximation is based. The language of the report, on page 137, is as follows:

There has been an element in the travel from Canada to the United States, in which I feel our bureau will be especially interested, reference being had to citizens of our own country, who, having settled in Canada, return to again take up their residence in the United States.

Commencing with January 1, of the current year, a record has been compiled, showing that 6,869 of such citizens were interviewed by our officers during the past six months, and as containing important information, it has been directed that a similar record be obtained in the future. As the foregoing record covered that period of the year when the movement would naturally be northbound, I feel it perfectly safe to say that not less than 15,000 American citizens returned from Canada within the year to resume residence in the United States.

There is another significant passage in this report to which I think the attention of the Minister of the Interior ought especially to be directed. I have always understood that the efforts of the government in regard to immigration from Europe were directed towards securing agricultural settlers, agricultural labourers and domestic servants. We have agreed with the government as to the wisdom of that policy. Occasionally matters have been discussed which lead to the conclusion that some officials of the government have directed their energies towards bringing other classes of settlers into this country and particularly a labouring population. The commissioner of the United States government in dealing with Class E, numbering in all 33,118 and comprising citizens of Canada entering the United States for permanent residence, states that the movement of that particular class of immigration from Canada to the United States increased very greatly during the fiscal year 1909. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908, the number of such immigrants into the United States from Canada was 18,111. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, the number increased to 34,689, being an increase of 91½ per cent. The commissioner in dealing with that increase and with that class uses this language:

Reference to class E above, shows a remarkable movement in the number of Canadian citizens coming to the United States for a permanent settlement, the increase approximating 92 per cent over the fiscal year of 1908. * * * Should those interested in statistics inquire for a cause for the above exodus of Canada to the United States, it may be stated, as a result of careful questioning, for manifest purposes, that, in many instances, the claim is made that native workmen are being replaced by those brought into Canada under the government's immigration policy, and to accept this explanation is not difficult when we recall conditions existing in the United States, where in many of the great manufacturing centres, particularly in the New England states, native help has been entirely superseded by the foreign article.

I am not prepared to speak as to the accuracy of the comment made by the Commissioner of Immigration of the United States in this particular connection but, knowing as I do the thorough organization of their immigration service, I would be inclined to attach some credit to it and I simply quote it for the purpose of asking the Minister of the Interior to take this comment into consideration and to inquire whether or not he concurs in it, and if not what explanation there is of this very large emigration from Canada to the United States during the fiscal year, 1909. As I have already pointed out, taking all the various classes mentioned which I think ought to be fairly taken into consideration, the total emigration from Canada to the United States amounted to at least 61,038 during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and the total immigration from the United States into Canada during the same period was 72,349, showing a balance in favour of Canada of a little over 11,000 in all. That is certainly not the idea that I have had from the statements of my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior and other members of the government as to the actual conditions. I think the matter is perhaps deserving of some comment and some explanation from the Minister of the Interior later on. I can only say that the results as disclosed in this report of the Commissioner General of Immigration for the United States were a very great surprise to me when they were read in the House this afternoon by the hon. member for Dundas (Mr. Broder).

Mr. WRIGHT. I would be very pleased if efforts were made to improve the immigration into this country. I have in my hands the report of the Superintendent General of Immigration of the United States, and as it has been freely quoted from I shall not cite many figures. In the opening pages of the report, the commissioner deals with the accuracy of the work done by his department and states that it is as nearly perfect as possible. He refers to the fact that further legislation will be required to keep the undesirable immigrants out of the United States. With all the perfection they have obtained they still find it necessary to recommend that further steps be taken in the way of legislation in order to keep out this class of people. I shall quote his words:

It is not intended and should not be regarded as a declaration that the bureau is satisfied that the law, even if made at every point effective of its present intent, would be all-sufficient to control immigration. On the contrary, the bureau believes that the time has come for the adoption of some measures more restrictive than any so far enacted That such is the case has been demonstrated by the evils that have grown out of immigration, particularly in the large cities of the east and middle west, which evils have been accentuated during the past few years of industrial depression. The point at which, perhaps, the law is especially inadequate is in the class of excluded aliens termed 'persons likely to become a public charge.' This standard is not high enough. The alien who becomes a burden on the taxpayers is ultimately undesirable principally for financial reasons. The alien who is barely able, perhaps even with the assistance of private charity, to eke out an existence is continuously undesirable for economic reasons. The presence of such persons in the community tends always to lower the standard of living, of work, and of wages; must have, in an economic sense, a degrading effect. Each community can in time elevate a few such persons to its own level, but its capacity in this respect is limited, and many of our communities have been degraded, and many others will be unless some means are found of preventing the immigration of the alien who is barely able to maintain himself.

We will all recognize the difficulty of drawing the line with regard to alien immigration. The figures have been given in this report of the total immigration into the United States during the last financial year as 944,235 and I would like to point out that of that total immigration three-quarters is what they term immigrant and one-quarter non-immigrant immigration.

They found it necessary to stop a large number at the borders, and of that amount of 944,000, over 400,000 went out of the country almost immediately during the year. Where did they go? We can arrive at no other conclusion than that a large number are trying to make their way across the border into Canada. I have it from the Immigration Department that over 6,700 of these people were stopped at the border last year, and only some 1,300 from all other countries. That would point to the fact that there must be a large number of an undesirable class who manage to get into the United States in some way, and either the American authorities are trying to squeeze them out of the United States, or these undesirables are trying to get into our borders.

I am pleased that a step has been taken to make the regulations more stringent, and I hope the minister will be able to keep out a larger number of these undesirable immigrants. A year or two ago I said I did not believe that Canada was getting an excess of immigration from the United States over and above the emigration going there from this country. There is a balance in favour of the United States. Whether that could be overcome by efforts on our part I do not know, but it is more important that we should get the best class than have a larger immigration, it is especially important that we should keep our young people at home. We ought to direct our attention to getting the diversified employment necessary to keep our young people in the country rather than run the chance of getting foreign immigration to replace those who leave us for the United States. If there be no way of preventing that large emigration from this country to the United States, we must do the best we can to get the best class of immigrants to fill their places. What has been the gain of our Northwest Territories has been in a large measure the loss of our provinces in the east. In Ontario we have been losing our best young men. There has been a depreciation in the value of farms in the east, and they are worth less to-day than they were worth twenty years ago. Go into any of the outlying settlements in Ontario a little distance from the large cities, and you can buy a farm cheaper than you could at any previous time in my memory. That is caused by the drain to the United States on the one hand, and to our Northwest Territories on the other. We ought to make that up to the eastern provinces; but if I understand rightly, the hon. minister is directing his sole attention to filling up the west. I do not object to his giving his attention to the west, but without any effort on the part of this government, the people of the east are flocking out there to get these free lands. In my humble judgment every quarter-section homestead in that country is worth, when the patent is issued, $1,000, and our government are offering that as a bonus to people from the United States. A large number of these people, when they get their homesteads, sell them as soon as possible. They simply settle in our country as a speculation, and return to the United States as soon as they can. Some 15,000 of them returned last year and 18,000 of them the year before. That being the case, it would be well to look into the question, and see whether the regulations might not be changed so as not to allow these settlers to get their patents so quickly, and in that way keep them in the country.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. EDWARDS. It seems to me that this government has made the same mistake that was made by the Conservative government; it has been entirely too anxious to bring immigrants into this country. We all recognize that we have a great heritage in the west. But I think what we do not recognize is that that heritage belongs to the people of Canada rather than to the people of any other country. It seems to me that the people of the older provinces, Ontario, Quebec, and the maritime provinces, should have been more considered than they have been in times past in settling the Northwest. There are many parts of Ontario and Quebec, for instance, that, in the days of the lumber kings, gave employment to hundreds of people and that were far more capable of yielding a livelihood to the people than they are to day. In my own county, for instance, there are sections which have been denuded of their timber, yet which are entirely unfit for agriculture. I believe that if some of the money expended in times past in inducing immigrants to come to Canada had been expended in assisting some of these people to take up homes in the Northwest, that money would have been well expended. One of these settlers from the older portions of Ontario, acquainted as they are with our laws, our language and our customs, would be worth more to this country than a whole colony of Doukhobors. I think it would be worth the government's while to take into consideration the people of the older provinces in settling the Northwest. We know that there are people in older Canada who would be only too glad to take up homes in the west and would do so if they had a little encouragement and assistance. But they find, if they make their way to the Northwest with a view to taking up lands, that the lands have been apportioned to peoples from other countries. Their means are limited, and they find themselves unable to cope with the conditions. I am heartily in accordance with the expressions of the hon. member for Lennox (Uriah Wilson). The statistics of our jails and asylums afford ample evidence that not sufficient attention has been paid to the quality of our immigrants. In our anxiety to people the Northwest we have thought rather of quantity, and have paid too little attention to quality. I agree with the hon. member for Lennox in advising that the government should use the utmost care in examining immigrants, not only as to their financial standing and the amount of money they have, but, also, and even more carefully, as to their mental, moral and physical qualities. I reserve any further remarks I may have to make on the subject of immigra- to another occasion.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time, and House went into committee thereon.

Mr. FIELDING. I propose for the consideration of the committee, that we should rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again at the present sitting of the House. I do this in order that I may have an opportunity to move the House into Committee of Supply to take the necessary steps to give effect to an understanding come to on both sides of the House for the passage of a special supply Bill.

Motion agreed to, and progress reported.

SUPPLY—INTERIM SUPPLY BILL.

On motion of Mr. Fielding, the House went into Committee of Supply.
